Dharma teaching turns the whole thing around. Instead of saying, "I'm unhappy because I don't have the object," the teaching, the impact of the second noble truth is: "I'm suffering because of the presence of this desire force." The desire force itself brings an unsatisfying feeling, brings a feeling of unfulfillment, of lack, of inadequacy.

When we tune in to the actual experience of the desire, we realize that in itself, that's suffering. And that's what the attention to desire needs to see—that the wanting itself hurts. It doesn't satisfy.

Now in addition to things in outside life that we wish we could experience, there are lots of things in the retreat setting that we want. We want our body to be comfortable. I spent many years on the cushion, actually in this very hall—because this is where I did a lot of my early practice—trying to make my body comfortable through manipulating the energy inwardly. I'm sure some of you who've been doing this for a while have learned a lot of those tricks.

If you flood an area with awareness, it tends to soften up the solidity of that area. You can soften up knots that way, by being there with a gentle attention again and again and again. You can soften some of the pain that way. So I would soften up one area. That would take me a few sittings. Then I'd notice that the tension had gone somewhere else. So I'd go soften up that area for a while. I'd get that soft and then I'd notice that another part was constricted. So I'd go soften that up. Then I'd get my whole body clear and I'd think, "Now I can meditate."

That would last for about half a sitting. Then my body would go into a huge overall contraction, and I'd start all over. So about one half of a sitting every other day I would have a good time, and the rest of the time I was struggling, struggling, struggling.

I would have been much better off, I would have been much smarter if I'd realized: "You're in discomfort. You're going to have some discomfort. You can bear it. Work with equanimity. Work with accepting this physical discomfort and let your mind settle." If I had let my mind settle, I would have gone much deeper in my practice much more quickly.

This is actually a wholesome approach to working with physical discomfort. Find that we can tolerate it to a certain degree. Don't try to make it go away—it's really pretty much a wasted effort, unless you can adjust the posture slightly in a skillful way. But find that increasing ability to be with the physical pain, and then this wanting, this kind of endless rat race of wanting can die off.

The other thing that we often want is to re-experience a pleasurable sitting or walking meditation. We'll have a really great sitting, and then the next time we come into the hall, we're eager to have that sitting again. We want to get back in the hall, but it doesn't happen. And then we want it to happen. So we find ourselves in the position of trying to make it happen or straining for it. And then we start wondering why our mind is scattered, why we can't rest effortlessly in the present the way we did the last sitting. It's because the desire force has kicked up. We want that back.

I start to look within myself when I'm beginning to recognize that feeling of meditative striving, straining to recapture something. It almost feels like I'm being pulled out of myself, leaning forward. I'm reaching out for something that's not here, and my being feels split. It's the exact opposite of the relaxation that we've talked about so much—where we just come and settle so easily into the present moment as it is.

So start to look for that in your practice. That feeling of leaning forward to grab something, and the contrast of just settling into how the moment is.

Another of the big five hindrances is anger, or we could say negativity, or we could say aversion. It's a feeling of being dissatisfied with the situation, mostly with the externals of a situation. We tend to put the blame, put the fault on something outside ourselves. We go through the lunch line and see someone who took too much food, and that's irritating. Or someone's making too much noise in the hall, or someone took a shower outside the shower hours and we couldn't sleep, or the weather is depressing and that's not right for us. And then we get into this unpleasant, negative, critical frame of mind and we think that it's caused by the outside.

The Buddha told a story to his monks about a jackal that illustrated this kind of tendency of mind. He said, "Monks, did you see that jackal that was around the edge of the forest this morning? It stood for a while and then it ran into the underbrush and then it ran out again. Then it ran into a tree hollow and then it ran out again. Then it ran into a cave and it ran out again. It wasn't comfortable standing, it wasn't comfortable in the underbrush, it wasn't comfortable in the tree, it wasn't comfortable in the cave. It blamed its unhappiness on the ground, it blamed its unhappiness on the underbrush, it blamed its unhappiness on the tree, and it blamed its unhappiness on the cave. But the problem, monks, was with none of these." He said that jackal had mange. The problem was the mange. That jackal wasn't going to be happy wherever it sat.

When aversion gets established in our minds, it's like the mange. Nothing is going to satisfy. And we think that the problem is the weather, the food, the person sitting next to us—whatever the external looks like. The problem is the aversion itself. The state of mind that's always critical, where nothing's quite right.

So again, the storyline with aversion or anger is that the fault is out there. But if we look more closely at the actual experience of the aversion, we can feel that it feels tight. It feels constricting. It feels burning. And when we feel that again, we can see the suffering that we bring to ourselves in holding on to that negativity. If we can let go of the storyline that blames it on the outside, the feeling will go in its own time. We don't have to make it go. It will lift.

The third one I want to mention is the area of self-judgment, where we turn this negativity toward ourselves. And it leaves us feeling that we're not good enough, that we're not fully human, that something is wrong inside of us. Something has fundamentally gone off in us, and so we're not really worthy to be a full human being. This sense of not being worthwhile or worthlessness seems almost like an epidemic in the West today. So many people have this feeling.

There's a group of Western teachers who were meeting with the Dalai Lama some years ago in Dharamsala, and they told the Dalai Lama about this problem and asked him how to work with it, how to address it. The Dalai Lama said, "What do you mean?" He didn't know what they were talking about. He couldn't relate to it. He said, "In Tibet, children are really valued, loved, and they're shown that kind of love from the time they're really young." And he went around and asked each teacher, "Do you know what this feels like? Can you relate to this?"

And every teacher there said, yeah, I got it.

So the Dalai Lama himself seems entirely free of this feeling. He's a beautiful inspiration. He came to Spirit Rock this year. We had a conference of Western teachers that we were at, and he was with us for a day and a half. He was talking about how he views himself and how other people view him. And talk about someone who's exposed to praise and blame.

The Dalai Lama said, "You know, some people call me the God King." I didn't know that he actually knew people called him that, but it's true. And he said, "Other people call me the living Buddha." He said, "No, no, no, I am not. I am not. I am just a simple Buddhist monk. That is all." He said, "But other people, they call me a wolf in monk's clothing." I've read that statement myself. "Or," he said, "they call me a counter-revolutionary. That's what they see." He said, "But I don't care. I just don't care. I look at my own intention. If my intention is good, then I trust in that. What somebody else sees, that's their problem. I look at my own intention."

So he has this tremendous self-confidence and at the same time an openness to whatever somebody else's point of view is. For me it was really inspiring—one of the most beautiful moments of the conference—that inner strength that he has in the middle of this huge responsibility, bearing the weight of the Tibetan people on his shoulders.

So this sense of worthlessness is one that we can actually experience also in our meditation. When it comes, again, if we can separate out the storyline from the actual feeling, the feeling can be touched directly. The feeling of inadequacy, of not being good enough, of some degree of shame or embarrassment about who we are. But then there's a storyline also that goes with it: "People don't love me. People don't care for me. People don't express their affection. Nobody cares about me."

If we can learn to let go of those thoughts or even question those thoughts—because mostly they're not true—just abide with the feeling. See if we can open ourselves up and bear the feeling, accept the feeling. We can find our way through that kind of inner conflict.

I had a friend when I was in the robes who was another Western monk, a man with a lot of metta, a lot of heart, very warm and a well-loved person. And as I got to know him, he told me that he had spent the first nine years that he was in robes working through his self-hatred. It was incredible to me because I didn't detect any of it from him. But that had been his work for the first years of his practice. He had really worked through it, and it was very inspiring to see. He was full of warmth and love.

So with all these states, what transforms us in relation to them? Where's the transformation coming from? The beautiful thing is that all these states are workable. They all can be understood through our practice. They all can be accommodated within our hearts. And as our hearts get bigger, we can hold them more and more from a place of compassion. There's nothing in us that we can't open to and accept.

It's not easy and it won't happen the first time that we run into one of these states, or even the second time or the third time. But we meet them over and over again, keep trying to open a little further each time, and over time we really find that we're able to accept them.

I went through a huge change in my relation to fear through the course of practice. I spent many, many hours being afraid of my fear.

not being able to accept it, feeling that it shouldn't be there, feeling that it was going to really destroy me or damage me. But as I opened to it little by little, I came to the place where whether that fear arose or didn't arise, I really didn't care. It was easy either way. And that kind of acceptance really is possible for us.

When I came to that level of acceptance about fear, I really felt like it wasn't a problem anymore. Now I've gone in and out of that level of acceptance since, but I've touched that level many times. So any of these states can be seen and related to in that way. If we can accept them fully, they're really not a problem and they lose their power over us.

The key thing is being able to feel them directly. And for that, the more you can generate an attitude of interest, curiosity, investigation, and really wanting to understand—that will support the opening. They're really just forms of energy. Until we invest in them, they're not a problem.

Can we see them with mindfulness? Mindfulness being not just a cold sort of clinical look under a microscope, but mindfulness being a quality that has a lot of friendliness in it, a real accepting kind of attention. Can we see fear or desire or anger or sadness with a really friendly kind of attention?

If we can, this is really a miracle of practice because what we're doing is a very profound thing in that moment. We're taking a moment that to our ordinary mind would just be full of negativity, full of this difficult emotional state. And we're starting to suffuse it then with the qualities of mindfulness. And that means the qualities of attention, of friendliness, of wisdom, of patience, of compassion, of openness.

What that means is that we're actually giving birth in that moment to the awakened heart. Right in the middle of our most difficult experiences, we're bringing forth from ourselves our deepest nature, our truest nature, this inherent good that we talked about earlier.

A moment of anguish and difficulty is being transformed into a moment of openness, awareness, wisdom and compassion. This really is the alchemy of our practice. There's no technique that can do this. This kind of bringing forth doesn't come out of a meditative technique. It has to come from your heart and it has to come fresh every time. It's not a recipe and it's not a formula.

But the more we're able to do it, the easier it becomes to bring that kind of awakened heart out in the middle of any situation, of any circumstance that we find ourselves in. This is what transforms us, this bringing forth of that beautiful heart moment after moment.

One of my teachers, Tsoknyi Rinpoche, a young Tibetan Lama, said to me, "The sacred point of our practice is the liberation of confusions." That's what is sacred that we're doing.

I'd like to close with a quotation from Gampopa, who was a disciple of Milarepa, the great Tibetan saint from the 11th century. This is put in the form of a prayer or supplication. Who it's directed toward isn't entirely clear. It could be toward anyone—toward the divine, toward a teacher, toward a lineage master, toward the great mystery.

This is called "The Four Blessings of Gampopa":

Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

CHAPTER 226

The Buddha Knows the Dhamma

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong shares insights from a retreat with Ajahn Sumedho on the meaning of "The Buddha knows the Dhamma" - understanding our pure awareness as the Buddha nature that receives all arising phenomena. Armstrong explores the Buddhist view that our basic nature is radiant and good, drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya teaching that "this mind is radiant and brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it." He offers practical guidance for working with the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa): desire (kāmacchanda), aversion (byāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). Through personal stories and classical teachings, Armstrong shows how mindfulness transforms our relationship to difficult emotions not by eliminating them, but by understanding them clearly. He emphasizes that these challenging states are temporary visitors while our pure awareness is the permanent resident - the Buddha nature that remains unchanging as all phenomena arise and pass away.

The subject of this evening's talk is "The Buddha Knows the Dhamma."

As you know, a few of us just finished spending time with His Holiness the Dalai Lama down in Mountain View. About two weeks before that, we also had the opportunity to sit with another great teacher here at Spirit Rock—Ajahn Sumedho. Ajahn Sumedho is a Theravadan monk who's been in robes for thirty-five years. He's really the senior person in the Western form of the Vipassana teachings as they come from Asia. He's an American who lives in England, and I had such deep appreciation for his teachings and so much respect for his being and his development. I really think he is one of the very few Western masters that we have today.

In tonight's talk, I have borrowed his title, and I'd like to share some of the teachings from that retreat with you because they're still alive for me—still resonating. If I was going to be cynical, I might say that I was stealing some of his thunder, but I prefer to think of it as paying tribute to a great teacher.

This title, "The Buddha Knows the Dhamma," was a line that he used again and again throughout the retreat, and it was kind of cryptic. The Buddha knows the Dhamma. I thought, well of course he did—he made it up. Who else would have invented it? But when he explained the meaning of it, I got a different slant on it.

When Ajahn Sumedho talked about the Buddha, what he meant was the way we describe the refuge in the Buddha, which is the refuge in our own awakened attention. The Buddha being that part of ourselves that is the pure awareness, the awareness that's uncluttered by any afflictions. And then the Dhamma in this case means the truth of the moment, the truth of this present moment's arising, which means all the phenomena that we experience in the here and now—the sights, the sounds, the smells, the bodily sensations, the thoughts and emotions that go through our mind, everything that makes up the quality of our life as we feel it here and now. Because dhamma with a lowercase "d" from the Pali just means thing, object, phenomenon, event, sense experience.

So "The Buddha knows the Dhamma" means that what's actually going on in our life is that this awakened intelligence of ours, this pure awareness, greets and receives all the different arisings that are generated through our sense contact of our five physical senses and the sense door of the mind. So "The Buddha knows the Dhamma" is kind of an enlightened view of our experience of the world.

I just want to put that in as a kind of frame for the talk, and we'll get into the pieces as we go.

It's really quite encouraging to me that the Buddhist perspective on life is that our basic nature is good—our basic nature is really good. It's considered to be pure from the very beginning. Even today, after all the struggles of our life, it's considered to be untouched or unstained by our suffering. And it's a resource, it's a treasure that we uncover through the practice of meditation as we walk the path.

Sally and I were teaching earlier this year in Australia, in Perth. Perth is a really interesting place. It's kind of the farthest edge of the Western world. You go from the East Coast and you go through California. You know what they say about California—they turned the country on its side and all the loose pieces ended up here. Then you go a little further and you get to Hawaii. Then you still go further and you get to Australia, still going west. Then you go all the way to the other side of Australia and you get to Perth. Perth is actually in the same time zone as Singapore, so there's a big Asian community in Perth.

This retreat was the first time I actually had the chance to meet a number of Asians in a practice setting. It was such a delight because I love Asian culture. I've spent over three years living in Asia, practicing in Asia, and it was a chance to give just a little bit back of what I had gotten from the Asian culture.

We were talking about the state of mind of Westerners and the state of mind of Asians with a psychiatrist there. He's of Sri Lankan descent, but speaks very good English and is a practicing MD and psychiatrist. We were talking about how a lot of people in the West have a feeling of not being very good about themselves, not being very worthwhile. I said, "Do the Asians that you come in contact with tend to have this feeling?" And he said, "No, by and large they don't." I said, "Well in the West it seems like an epidemic. What do you think the difference is?"

He said—and I don't know if this is true or not—"I think it comes down to the concept of original sin." It's very interesting that this concept, which goes so far back in our Judeo-Christian heritage, really could be coloring our whole culture and our whole view of what it means to be human. And it's radically different from the Buddhist view, which is that the core of us—the part we get closer and closer to as we get right down to the center of who we are—is pure and good and wholesome.

The Buddha described this in the Anguttara Nikaya in a sutta where he said: "This mind is radiant and brightly shining, but it is colored by the attachments that visit it. This the untaught person does not understand, and so for them there is no cultivation of this mind."

There's actually a lot in here.

The mind is radiant and brightly shining, but it's colored by visiting attachments. So the qualities of fear or aggression or desire or sadness or self-criticism that come in color the mind so that we don't quite see that natural brightness. But these visiting attachments are only temporary. They're only visitors, and the goodness is a resident. That's the home base.

But if you don't understand that, then you take the visitors as real, and you don't realize that there's a way to develop this basic goodness. And the sutta continues: This mind is radiant and brightly shining, and it is free from the attachments that visit it. This the noble follower of the way understands as it really is, and so for them there is cultivation of the mind.

When we sense our potential of purity, of freedom, of awakening, then we know that all we have to do is work to purify these temporary obscurations and we have the possibility of abiding in that purity and in that freedom, in that goodness. This is really the work of our practice.

This description brings together the two halves of the Buddhist teaching. The Buddha said over and over again, "I teach suffering and the end of suffering"—always these two together. So we look at the visiting attachments as the source of our suffering, the difficult emotions that we encounter in life. And then the end of suffering is the touching, the uncovering, the living more and more in this place of innate freedom and purity.

Because there's so much talk in Buddhism about suffering, some people think it's gloomy. "What a pessimistic religion. Why are you guys always going on about dukkha, dukkha, dukkha? Geez, can't you lighten up?" But it's so interesting that it's almost always in the suttas paired—suffering and the end of suffering—in this beautiful balance.

When we start to look, of course, suffering is pervasive in a way. If we look into our own life with a really impartial eye, we can see the suffering that we have touched from early childhood on up through our teenage years and into our adulthood. If we look in the outer world, the world is full of conflict and fighting and argument and destruction. Even in places where we don't expect to find it, it kind of pops through.

A newspaper reporter visited Disneyland not long ago. You may have seen the ads—the Disneyland tagline is, "The place where happiness never ends." So that's a destination where there really shouldn't be suffering, right? He was backstage, and you know the characters are actors who dress up in the outfits of the Disney characters. So he was backstage and there were a couple of the actors who were just taking a quick break and hadn't gotten out of their costumes. He was basically watching a conversation between Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck. And Mickey was saying to Donald, "I've really got to get in some overtime hours. I don't have enough money to pay my therapist." Even for Mickey Mouse, this life is not so easy.

So as we sit and practice, of course we're going to experience both these elements of the Buddha's teachings. We're going to come in contact with suffering, and hopefully we're also going to touch that point of the end of suffering, where the mind is steady and clear and not under these visiting attachments. And I hope you really start to get a sense of even moments of that in your practice.

The objects of our practice seem really interesting at times. At times they seem incredibly boring—the breath and the sensations of walking and the sounds and the sights and the tastes and so on. But over time what tends to happen is the objects which are so primary in the beginning—our understanding starts to shift and what actually becomes to the forefront is the mindfulness itself. The mindfulness being this thread that kind of weaves together all the different objects.

You notice that in the instruction that whatever the thing we're pointing to—breath, body, sound—the constant factor is the mindfulness. And this really becomes our home over the days as we practice together. Whatever object it's illuminating, the mindfulness or the awareness starts to take the center stage in our view.

And this is really the discovery of our Buddha nature, the discovery of that purity. It's very closely tied to the awareness. This is something really precious, this ability to understand our experience. It's said that this constitutes the preciousness of our human birth, and that the creatures don't have this capability. So this is really something that we're blessed with as human beings.

And I think this is true. Sally and I have a few cats. You may have heard from earlier talks. And one of them is very fearful. And since her birth she's been fearful. And even though we've given her a lot of love over the years, that fearfulness hasn't changed.

And there's a way in which it really can't change because she can't understand it. She just sees it as the true nature of the world. So she doesn't have the capacity to see it in context of this purity of awareness.

We have this capability. We have this ability to find our home in our basic goodness and to see the attachments in perspective.

In Asia, an important part of practice is reflecting on our own goodness. People are instructed to do that, they do that, they're comfortable with it. One of the ways that they take to reflect on it is through acts of generosity. So they are generous to their parents, to their relatives, to their family members, in their support of the monks and nuns, and then they're told to reflect on how good the generosity feels.

And in fact, there's kind of a science of it in Thailand. There are sort of outlines of if you do this act of generosity, this will be your return. One of our friends told us that if you'd like to be beautiful in your next life, you should bring flowers to the temple. I won't vouch for that. But I do know that giving creates joy when we reflect about it.

So Ajahn Sumedho was talking about this practice of reflecting on our goodness. And he put it in a way I hadn't heard before, but that rang true for me. He said when he reflected on it, he realized that as a child, he was always a good child. He tried to be a good child. He wanted to be good. And that in his life, he was always drawn to what was good and what was noble in character. He said, "You know, I realized I'm basically a good person."

And I thought about all the people that I meet on meditation retreats and the people who come to dharma centers, and I realized we're all basically really good people. And sometimes we lose sight of that view because we don't see the broader society of the six billion people on the earth. How many people would dedicate a week just to developing their goodness? A week that's quite difficult, quite demanding. In order to do that, you have to have a really strong conviction in what's wholesome and what's beautiful. And people who are dedicated to this kind of practice have that.

So I think we can remind ourselves that we are basically good people. Even though we make mistakes, even though we hurt others, that there is a real purity in our intention to do what's good in the world, to seek what's just and true.

When we come into meditation, actually that tendency to goodness creates its own problem. Because as good people, we tend to want to do it right. We tend to want to do in our meditation practice what's really good, what's really perfect sometimes. And that can be a great burden.

So we can approach our meditation with a sense of trying to get it right and being afraid of getting it wrong. And that creates a kind of tension of success and failure, just like in worldly life.

Ajahn Chah said that in worldly life, success and failure are opposites, but in spiritual life, success and failure are of equal value. I thought this was a beautiful reminder. Ajahn Chah was Ajahn Sumedho's teacher and Jack Kornfield's first teacher, a great master. Success and failure are of equal value. Therefore, you can learn from both. And he said that success actually is noticing what's happening. So whatever you do, if you do it and pay attention, you can't really go astray. You'll be succeeding.

And that can actually, when we take that into our meditation practice, give us a real confidence. For instance, people wonder about which technique to use at a particular point in their practice. It doesn't really matter. You can try all the choices, see what works for you, and learn from it. Sometimes we learn a lot more from failure than we learn from success.

So as good people, there's a way in which we need to be bolder about our practice and be more trusting in ourselves. Not be afraid to make mistakes with our practice. It's a way we learn in practice like in life. And especially for those who have been doing it for a while and who have some faith, as James talked about last night, to be in a way a bit more nonchalant in your practice. Because we can monitor it and kind of stay on top of it a little too closely. So to develop this confidence that we can't really go wrong with it, then we can give ourselves or we can surrender even more to the practice.

And the reason that it's so safe is the truth of impermanence. Because we're not going to get stuck anywhere. Impermanence is what makes it safe for us to feel.

I want to read this poem from Rilke, the German poet. It's from a book called Rilke's Book of Hours, subtitled Love Poems to God.

It's translated by Joanna Macy and Anita Barrows. It was written when Rilke was quite young and had gotten onto a religious path. He was in Russia visiting many cathedrals, and he was deeply touched by the power of the religion he found there. So he returned home and these overtly religious poems poured out of him.

This is one where God is speaking to human beings as he creates each being before their journey into life:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You'll know it by its seriousness. Now, give me your hand.

Experience the beauty and the terror. No feeling is final. This is really the kind of trust that opens us up to the whole range of our experience.

In this evening's talk, I'd like to explore some of the difficulties we encounter in meditation practice. The Buddha spoke about them repeatedly. Working with these states of heart and mind forms a huge part of what meditation practice is about.

When we consider what's difficult in life, there's the difficulty of the body's vulnerability—the body is vulnerable to sickness, pain, aging and death. The other main source of vulnerability is our mind and our own tendencies toward difficult states of heart and mind: our sadness and grief, reactions to loss, our fears, anxiety, and worries.

We can't do much about the illness and aging of the body and its eventual death, but we can make a huge difference in how we relate to the emotions. A very significant part of our practice is coming to understand how to work with the difficult emotions that we all face.

The Buddha had several lists of these qualities of mind, and the one I'd like to discuss tonight is what he called the five hindrances. He identified five particular states of heart and mind that always arise for meditators. As soon as one begins the process of deepening awareness, these states come up almost as a reaction or response. The five are: desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt.

I want to explore each of them this evening.

Desire is this force in the mind that seeks satisfaction in the future. Something feels not quite right as we are. We attach our wanting to some object we don't have right now, that we hope to have in the future. There's a storyline underneath: when I have it, it will make me happy. There's an incompleteness now, and I'll reach that completeness when I get that object. You can feel this moving in your practice—it may be connected to objects outside, or to objects or experiences here. But when desire is present, it brings with it a sense of incompleteness, a sense of insufficiency.

We were teaching a retreat in Italy last summer—Carol, Franz, Sally and I were all there. It was actually a delight to work with Italians. I'd never taught in Italy before, and everything you imagine about Italian people I found to be true. They were very warm. Their emotions were really close to the surface.

It's not that they didn't have difficulties in their lives—everybody did, just as we do here. But they would come into interviews, and there were some quite serious things happening for people in that retreat. There was one woman dealing with a recent diagnosis of terminal illness, and she was there to try to find some equanimity with it. There was a mother, a young woman probably in her early thirties, whose seven-year-old daughter had been diagnosed with an illness that would probably lead to her death within a year or two. She was dealing with that profound sadness.

But as people came into interviews—and they were very open in talking about what they were going through, even though we worked through a translator since they didn't speak much English and I don't speak Italian—they would preface these moving stories with this sort of rueful smile. "Oh, I'm having such a hard time today," they'd say with a smile, and then tell me these deeply touching stories.

And they would often smile as they were telling me about it. What it communicated to me was a kind of fluency with their own emotions that I found just remarkable. They were at home with this whole range of feelings that we all have as human beings. So it was very uplifting to be with them.

One of the guys who came in for an interview early on was a young Italian man, and he said, "Well, I'm having trouble settling into the retreat." I said, "Oh, really? What's going on?"

"Well," he said, "I'm having doubt."

I said, "Okay, that's a hindrance. I know about that hindrance. We can talk about that hindrance. What's up for you?"

He said, "Well, I don't really want to be here."

"Oh, okay, well, what's happening?"

And he said, "Well, you know, this is August. This is my vacation time. And some friends of mine had booked a vacation in the Caribbean. And they asked me if I'd like to go with them. And I thought, oh, the Caribbean. What great beaches. What beautiful women. I really want to go to the Caribbean." And he said, "But I couldn't get a ticket. The flights were all booked. This was my second choice."

So it didn't stack up to the Caribbean beaches for him. He was constantly in these fantasies of being in the Caribbean with his friends and having a really good time, and then he'd sort of come back to the present moment and his body was sore and we were in this Catholic convent and what am I doing here? So he had a little bit of struggle coming back to Earth.

But he'd been on a retreat before and he knew how to work with it. He could see that it was just a form of wanting. And when he could let go of the wanting, there wasn't really a problem. And this is what's so interesting. The desire makes us feel incomplete. But then you have to stop and ask: is it really the absence of the object that's the problem? Or is it the feeling of the desire that's the problem? And it was clear for him, it was the feeling of the desire that was the problem. When he could let go of it, the present was actually fine.

So what's important with desire is kind of tuning into how it feels in the mind, how it feels in the body. I've started to recognize that desire is active when I feel a strain with the present moment. It's like there's a force that's pulling me in a different direction. And I've started to recognize how that feels in my body. There's a kind of distortion that comes into the way my body appears to me. And I've started to notice that there's a leaning forward or reaching out connected with that.

So then I just stop to look. Can I connect with something that I'm wanting? Can I tune into an object that I'm looking for? And often I can. And tuning into it and being willing to feel it means I can bring awareness to it. And if I can bring awareness to it, then I'm partway there to being able to let go of it.

One of the tips that a friend gave me—I have a good friend who's a greed type. I tend to be an aversive type, so I wouldn't have thought of this myself. But being a greed type and having a lot of desire, he said he'd worked with it often. When he felt the presence of desire, he would ask himself the question: is there anything truly lacking in this moment? Is there anything truly that I need that I don't have? And the answer would almost always come back, no. And that would help him just settle in and kind of appreciate the moment that was here.

The second of the five hindrances is the state of aversion or negativity. And this is a particular term that has a lot of different blooms, a lot of different forms. Aversion can be expressed through disliking, through hatred, through negativity, complaining, criticism, impatience, anger, fear.

These are all different expressions of not liking. Sadness is another one—not liking the past. Fear—not liking the future.

Retreat seems like particularly ripe ground for aversion to bloom, which makes it a good training ground in this practice. So I want to pass on a prayer to you that may be helpful. The prayer goes like this: "Dear God, thank you for your strength and comfort today. Thanks to you I haven't been impatient or grumpy or cross with anyone so far all day. But I'll be getting out of bed soon and I think I'll really need your help then." You can take this as your mantra if it helps.

Often the thing that's so tricky with aversion is that we think it's appropriate to the situation. We think the situation is the cause of the aversion. It's not in my mind. It couldn't be in me. It's definitely the outside situation.

I was on a fairly long retreat a few years ago. I'd been on retreat for about two weeks and had a favorite walking spot that I went to every walking period. I would walk there for the whole walking period. I'd worn a track in the grass, done everything short of spray painting my initials in the track.

One day I went out from the meditation hall and was walking very mindfully down to my track—lifting, moving, placing. And I saw somebody was there. Someone had gotten to my track before me. I immediately felt annoyed. I thought, "What are they doing there? I've been walking there every walking period. Don't they know that?"

Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving. I was very mindful, I thought. I wondered, "Is this some kind of weird head game? Did I cut in front of them in the breakfast line or something? Are they trying to get back?" Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing.

So I kept being irritated and trying to figure out why someone would do that. They must not be very well developed. Then I just walked to a different walking place, which was absolutely fine. I had a walking period that was just as good as my old spot.

But it wasn't until about halfway through my walking period that I noticed, "Oh, I'm angry. I'm actually irritated." I'd just been putting my attention on lifting, moving, placing, and I hadn't even noticed the anger that was there. I thought I was being mindful.

This is what these hindrances do, and aversion is a good example. We set up the early warning system with the radar of mindfulness. We're really looking out for what's happening. But these states of mind zip in underneath our radar. They take us over and we may be feeling them and acting from them for quite a while before we even know what we're feeling.

This is actually a great challenge in practice—to know at any given moment what we're feeling as we're feeling it. This can become a whole avenue for practice, an excellent reflection throughout the day. Just checking in every five minutes if you like: What am I feeling right now? What's the predominant mood, state of mind, state of my heart?

Because until we can identify what we're feeling, we're a slave to it. We're taken over by it. We're caught in a reaction. And there's no freedom in that. As soon as I could identify it as anger, I could start to relate to it. I could be aware of it. I could start to investigate it. I could question it.

Is he really out to get me? Or could that be a projection? Maybe he's just as confused as I am. And I could start to work through it. Actually, once I recognized it and could let go, it started to fade quite quickly in just a few minutes.

So this tuning into what the experience is, is really the key with these hindrances. To know this is what aversion feels like. To feel it in the body, to feel its tone in the mind, and then to start to relate with it.

What happens with all the hindrances is that they generally come with some kind of story, some kind of line of thought that justifies them. With desire, the story is: "I'll be happy when I get that thing." With aversion, the story is: "This situation is the cause of my unhappiness." We don't see that the source of desire and fear is actually in our own mind. We get deceived by the story about the hindrance.

If we keep focusing on the story—"You made me angry, it's your fault"—we can never get to release the feeling. So as far as possible with the hindrances, it's really helpful to drop the story that thoughts are feeding us and just come back to the bare feeling. Just feel the desire, feel the anger, feel the fear in the body and the mind.

Sometimes aversion sets in as a long-term situation. I think this comes when there's been a lot of pain in our life that we haven't been able to open to. The mind can get locked in a state of resistance or not wanting that experience of pain. When we're in a mind state like that, it's as though everything in the world is unsatisfying and is a source of friction.

There's a story from the Buddha's time. He was in the forest with a group of monks and he asked them if they saw the jackal that was running out of the forest in the morning. He said, "Did you see the jackal run out of the forest into this clearing? It came into the clearing and stood for just a short while, then was obviously uncomfortable and ran away into the hollow of a tree. It lay down in the hollow of a tree, but it didn't stay there very long either. It quickly got up and ran into a cave. It sat down in the cave looking out, but it wasn't comfortable there either. And it ran out of the cave back into the forest."

The Buddha said that the jackal was uncomfortable in the clearing and blamed its discomfort on the clearing and on standing. Then it went into the hollow of a tree and wasn't comfortable—it blamed its discomfort on the tree and on lying down. It went into the cave and blamed its discomfort on the cave and on the sitting posture. The Buddha said the problem was with none of these. The jackal had mange. It wouldn't be comfortable anywhere.

When aversion sets into our being in this way—as a long-term or entrenched state of resistance—then we're not comfortable anywhere. We're not comfortable until we can accept the very fact of the resistance and open to that level of pain. When we do that, we find the heart actually has the capacity to accommodate it. But we have to move out of the sense of struggle, a resistance to the resistance itself, a resistance to the aversion, to open up to feel it directly. Then there's the possibility for peace, some softening, and some release.

One of the ways that aversion expresses itself often on retreat is as negativity toward ourselves, criticism of ourselves. This was strong for me in the early years of my practice. I sort of staggered out of the 60s, kind of a product of all the excesses of that era. I came into practice with a lot of confusion and unhappiness. In the early years of my practice, which were not at all easy, I had a lot of self-criticism, a lot of self-judgment.

I remember sitting on one retreat and getting very, very unhappy. I came in for an interview with my teacher, and he said, "How are things going?" I said, "Oh, I'm having a hard day." He said, "What's up?" I said, "Well, I'm having a lot of difficult thoughts, a lot of aversive thoughts." See, I put it in meditation terms. I thought that would be good enough. A lot of aversive thoughts. Let's move on and talk about something else.

But he kept probing. He said, "Well, what kinds of thoughts?" I said, "Well, I'm feeling like I really don't like myself very well."

And he said, "You're not seeing things as they are. Your problem is that you don't accept yourself." So this really came home like a lightning bolt to me—that I didn't accept myself the way I was.

This is an important facet of our metta practice. Sometimes when we say "may I be happy," happiness can seem too remote. A really good phrase instead is "may I accept myself just as I am." I didn't have the metta practice back then, I didn't know it, but I took this theme of self-acceptance for a long time, for years in my practice, and really struggled with it.

I didn't understand it at first. Accept myself? Wait, I thought in Buddhism we don't have a self. How can there be a self to accept? Am I supposed to find some little being inside me and kind of wrap my arms around him? So I had to work with it and find my own way.

What I came to realize is that accepting myself just meant accepting my experience moment after moment after moment—accepting my experience in whatever form it came. That's what I needed to be at peace with. That was my direction for years, and it was a really helpful direction.

It's amazing for me to be around people who have come to such deep levels of self-acceptance. Ajahn Sumedho was inspiring in that way. He would talk about himself very honestly. We had a teacher's retreat for the Spirit Rock teachers after the public retreat, and we had a discussion group in the afternoon. He just started off the discussion group saying, "You know, when I sat down to teach you all this morning, I was very nervous. I didn't know if I had anything to say to a group of people who'd been doing this practice for a long time. I was quite anxious." I thought that was very self-revealing of him.

I was also encouraged to find out that when he started teaching, he didn't have a great deal of self-confidence at all. He said the first time Ajahn Chah asked him to give a Dharma talk, it was in Thai, and he was really nervous. But he really prepared, made some notes, and the night came when he was supposed to talk to the villagers in Thai. He was getting more and more nervous as the time for the talk approached, really working himself up into quite a state of anxiety.

Ajahn Chah said, "It's time to give the talk, Sumedho."

And Sumedho said, "I can't do it. I'm just too nervous. I can't do it."

I thought Ajahn Chah would push him and say, "You have to anyway." He didn't. He said, "Okay, okay, okay. You don't have to do it tonight."

Then just a little while later, villagers were at the temple again. They'd done chanting and some meditation. All of a sudden, Ajahn Chah turns to Ajahn Sumedho and says, "Sumedho, give the talk." He didn't have time to get nervous, so he got up and gave the talk. He said it was a little bit primitive—he was saying things to the Thai people like, "Buddhism is good. I like it very much." And he said they gave him really great feedback on his talk.

Now he's so self-confident. He spoke impromptu at these retreats for an hour in the morning and an hour in the evening every day, and I was rapt. I loved the talks.

Another person who has this incredible self-acceptance is the Dalai Lama. You could see it again when we were down with him in Mountain View. I don't really like to get into news reports in the middle of retreats, but there's one piece of news I did want to pass on: today the Dalai Lama had a meeting with George W. Bush. It was a formal and scheduled meeting that was on Bush's agenda. There are official photographs of the two of them sitting down and talking together.

And yesterday, he also had a formal meeting with Colin Powell. The Dalai Lama said that both men listened to him very intently, and he found them quite sympathetic. Afterwards, Bush expressed something quite significant—he wanted to convey the United States' commitment to the religious freedom and cultural traditions of the Tibetan people. He said it very strongly and directly. That was very uplifting, very nice to hear.

The Dalai Lama was in Mountain View last week, teaching to probably six or seven thousand people. It was a big deal. This event took probably a year to organize. There were three days of teachings and then a couple of other events. The stage was huge—it's Shoreline Amphitheater, so it's a place where Bruce Springsteen can play, so of course it's massive. The Dalai Lama was sitting on a high throne in the center of the stage, with about a hundred monks and nuns on either side, facing toward the center. That's kind of an imposing situation in itself, looking out on a sea of six or seven thousand faces. His image was projected on one of these huge video screens above him, so the people in the very back on the lawn could see him too.

He actually talked about the situation of being on the throne and said, "We do this often in Tibet. We have teachings from a high throne." He explained that it's important to understand the throne is there not because the person is important, but because the teachings are profound and important. "Some teachers confuse these two," he said. "For them, feelings of pride and self-importance arise because they're sitting on a high throne talking down to people. We actually have a name for this in Tibet. We call it the high throne syndrome. But I don't have that problem. Pride and self-importance don't arise for me in this situation."

It was amazing—looking out on seven thousand people, with the talks being webcast live so you could listen anywhere in the world, being videoed and recorded—and he was completely at ease. He would sit up there, and while the translator was translating his Tibetan, he would be smiling at people in the audience, looking at his watch, scratching the back of his head, examining his fingernails. Totally at ease. There is this really beautiful possibility of this really deep inner peace and acceptance that's just one of the qualities he manifests so beautifully.

The next of the hindrances is one you're all familiar with, generally called sloth and torpor in the old Victorian language. Dullness and drowsiness felt through mind and body. But I like this term sloth and torpor—it's really quite evocative. Also in the early days at Insight Meditation Society, our sister center in Massachusetts, Carol and I were on staff together in the late seventies. We had a maintenance crew that were not exactly known for their work ethic. They got nicknamed—the pair of them got nicknamed McSloth and McTorper. I think of them fondly when I think of this.

With drowsiness, we can't see clearly. Everything's like in a fog. The body is in a fog. The breath is in a fog. Sounds are in a fog. We can't connect directly with anything. This is not actually that unpleasant a state often. I have personally spent many happy hours fully asleep on my meditation cushion and not falling over.

But the problem is that the meditation doesn't really develop from this place. The dullness obstructs the deepening. So it is useful to start to probe it a little bit, to work to bring up energy. Energy is the antidote to drowsiness. All the things that I've seen a lot of you doing are right on track. Sitting up a little straighter, taking a few deep breaths to bring up the energy, opening your eyes. And then if you're still sleepy, standing up. It's much harder to fall asleep standing—although someone in this retreat said they just about did it the other day.

So it's possible. During the next walking period, perhaps take a brisk walk. Over the days, this drowsiness tends to get cut through as different sources of energy arise from our meditation.

If the drowsiness persists beyond these first three days, become curious about it. Get a little skeptical, because sometimes the dullness can be a defense. What happens is we're moving along in our practice when we catch a glimpse—out of the corner of our eye—of some feeling, some memory, some situation we don't really want to know about. Then almost automatically, it's as if a curtain descends, cutting us off from whatever was arising.

If this occurs after the first few days, start getting curious. Simply look: what was there right before the drowsiness came in? Was there a glimpse of anything? There may not necessarily be, but if the dullness is acting as a defense, there may be something worth investigating.

The next hindrance is restlessness—the other end of the spectrum from drowsiness. Instead of being too low on energy, we're far too high on energy. The physical body is full of energy, thoughts race at lightning speed, perhaps many emotions surge through us, and it feels like there's a swirl inside. We can't even untangle what's the body and what's the mind—it's all a big blur.

In such moments, trying to find the breath is like trying to find a piece of straw in the middle of a tornado in Kansas. It simply won't work. Often our tendency when there's abundant energy is to think, "Oh, I need to get concentrated. Let me find the breath again. If I can get really close to the breath, I can cut through this swirl." So we struggle and strain.

But this approach—trying to be really precise—bottles all that energy up. It's like taking a ten-megawatt reactor and forcing it into an incredibly tiny space. This is usually counterproductive.

The most helpful approach is to make the awareness really broad, really spacious. Sounds offer a good avenue into this spaciousness, so you might try listening at that point. Have the sense that awareness is truly vast. Also cultivate the sense that you're grounded to the earth, connected through your sitting. Feel the touch points of your sitting bones or feet—whatever connects you to the earth so you feel some stability.

Then simply be willing to let all that energy rip within the big space you're giving it. Don't feel you need to be precise or calm—it might not be possible. Just let the wildness of that energy move and stay in touch with it, perhaps by noting "restlessness." Or as James mentioned last night, "confusion." That's enough. That's mindfulness. It's a different lens opening, as James said, but it's still awareness of what's true in the present moment. The meditation will develop.

So let yourself feel the restlessness. Let yourself know what that experience is actually like.

The last of the hindrances is doubt—the question "What are we doing here? Why am I doing this practice?" James spoke about this beautifully last night in discussing the development of faith, so I don't want to explore it in further detail. But know that if you can see doubt as doubt, you don't have to buy into it. That's the key. If you don't buy into it, it will pass. Just keep doing your practice—keep doing the sittings, keep doing the walking periods. The doubt will pass, and the connection will return.

These are the five common states of mind that meditators encounter.

Desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt. The beautiful thing in our practice is that these all purify as we go. But the purification doesn't mean that we get rid of them, because the beautiful thing is we don't have to get rid of them in order to purify. What we purify is our relationship to them. And we do that through the tool of awareness or mindfulness.

So please don't have it as your goal that it's wrong to feel desire, it's wrong to feel aversion or judgment or sadness or fear or doubt. That's not the message. The message is that we want to use this meditative space to understand them. Because when we understand them, we don't have to be fooled, deceived, and misled by them.

Ajahn Sumedho had a line that I really liked a lot in describing this kind of relationship. He said, when you experience desire, know: "Oh, desire is like this." When you're in a state where desire is absent, know: "Oh, non-desire is like this." Aversion is like this. Non-aversion is like this. Suffering is like this. Non-suffering is like this.

So you really get the feel of that state of mind, that difficult state of mind and its absence. You understand how it feels when we're in suffering and also the end of that suffering. You know the state of bondage and you know the state of freedom. And in a way, we don't even have to have in this retreat a very preferential attitude toward those two. That's one of the things that it's really helpful to give up as you're in the process of this kind of training.

We're really here to learn about these experiences. Because in learning about them, we develop wisdom. And it's the wisdom that brings the freedom.

So it's actually a great gift to be able to explore fear in this setting, to explore anger in this quiet, silent place where we really don't have anything else to do, to explore our sadness, our grief, our self-judgment. Then just to know: that's what this feels like, that's the truth of this Dhamma, this current phenomenon is like this. Its absence is like this. Then we really get an understanding of the way that the mind works when it goes in the direction of suffering, of clinging, of attachment, of bondage. And we also know firsthand the quality of the mind when it's in that state of purity, of freedom from the attachment, of ease, of peace, of that lack of struggle. So it's very helpful to know both sides of this equation extremely well.

In relating to the emotions directly, it's very helpful to name them. Because that naming is activating the wisdom factor. And it's activating the awareness. So we name it as anger. We name it as fear. Then having named it, we can start to relate to it. We can bring it within our field of awareness. Then the Buddha is knowing this Dhamma. This pure awareness is starting to create a relationship with this difficult, painful state of mind that has often led us into suffering again and again and again. And it's the contact between this clear awareness and the painful mind state that starts to purify it. We don't have to do any more than that—touch it and know it for what it is.

And then these states are so deeply conditioned in us. They've been active for so long. They've fascinated us for so long. They've gripped us. More exactly, we've gripped them for so long. But the awareness starts to loosen that. The awareness and the influence of the wisdom, the wise seeing, starts to loosen the hold of that conditioning.

In classical terms, it's said that this is a path that leads to the end of karma. Karma is the investment in all our conditioning from beginningless time. And the influence of awareness undoes karma and that investment in those mind states.

And we find as we start to move in that way, one, we understand the state of mind and the emotion through seeing it clearly again and again, but then we also start to shift our sense of identity. The more we can trust in the seeing, in the awareness, the energy comes out of the mind states. It's like a balance pan. You take the weight off of one side and the other side goes up. In this case, you take the energy out of the mind state by putting it into the awareness.

The awareness gets stronger, the state gets weaker. And so we just constantly keep poking holes in it, aerating it through this steady application of clear and kind attention, again and again and again.

And then we actually start to see that our sense of self changes. Who are you? Are you the difficult mind stuff? Are you a sad person, an angry person, an unhappy person? Is that really a constant and ongoing identity? Or could you more appropriately take your identity from this steady and clear attention that's always accessible?

The mind states are just visitors. They come and go. So why should I claim that as my personality or my being? Why not more take it in the sense of this pure awareness that's intrinsic and deep and in a way unchanging? Maybe that's who I really am. And maybe that's how I should consider myself.

Ajahn Sumedho said, if you believe that you're an unenlightened person and you have to totally change through lots of work in order to become awakened, you'll never arrive. But if you hold the view that your basic being is this clear awareness, you're already there.

So then the means and the end come together. Where we want to be in the path is how we walk the path. By abiding in this clear and pure awareness, we're activating our Buddha nature and we're arriving at the destination at the same time.

This pure awareness has a tremendous spaciousness to it. It can hold all these difficult emotions because of its basic emptiness. It can hold them all without reacting. This is how the Buddha knows the Dhamma. The changing Dhammas of life are all held within this steady and ongoing pure sense of presence.

I'll just close with a quotation from Ajahn Mahabua, who was a colleague of Ajahn Chah's. They were both students of the same teacher. And Ajahn Mahabua is still alive, teaching as an abbot in Thailand today. This is his comment on the Buddha knowing the Dhamma:

"There's no escaping this truth. Whatever arises has to vanish. Whatever is true, whatever is a natural principle in and of itself, won't vanish. In other words, the pure mind won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind. All that remains is simple awareness, utterly pure."

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Whatever arises has to vanish. Whatever is true won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish.

CHAPTER 227

The Eight Worldly Conditions

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines one of the Buddha's most practical teachings for navigating daily life: the eight worldly conditions (aṭṭha lokadhammā) of gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, and success and failure. Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, Armstrong explores how these alternating conditions keep "the world turning around" and why our attempts to always land on the positive side inevitably lead to suffering.

The talk addresses a fundamental challenge for lay practitioners: sustaining spiritual practice while managing worldly responsibilities. Armstrong shares personal stories from his time at Microsoft and experiences in dharma teaching to illustrate how these conditions manifest in modern life, from Silicon Valley's boom-bust cycles to the challenges of receiving feedback as a teacher.

Central to the discussion is the Buddha's guidance on developing equanimity—understanding that all eight conditions are impermanent and subject to change. Armstrong explores how an "instructed noble disciple" relates differently to these experiences than an "uninstructed worldling," emphasizing the importance of not letting our minds become engrossed by either gain or loss, praise or blame. The talk concludes with reflections on renunciation as right priority—caring more about freedom and awareness than outcomes—and how this shift enables us to act in the world from compassion rather than attachment to results.

Somebody asked in an interview the other day what I thought was a really great question: why is it so hard to stay present in daily life?

We looked at it and discussed it, exploring several different reasons. First, we simply don't have the habit of being present. To a certain extent, it's just a habit that we can develop—being here more often. It's really why retreats are so powerful. We generate that habit again and again and again. In daily life, we get quite busy. Thoughts and emotions get active, stirred up, and carry us away. It's hard to focus on the present because the thoughts are quite active.

But then another aspect of daily life is that we're involved in things that we care about, and we get subject to a lot of ups and downs because of those things we care about—our work situation, our relationships with coworkers, whether a project is coming together, whether our kids are home at the time they said they were going to be, whether our partner is upset with us because we forgot to do something that particular day. We meet a lot of changing conditions in our daily life.

In a way, you could say that as laypeople there's an inherent tension with dharma practice. I think it exists with monastics too, but for laypeople it's even more exaggerated. We have to sustain two tracks of intention in our daily life.

One is that we have to take care of ourselves and our families. This is part of the metta phrases—the fourth phrase that says something like, "May I care for myself happily in this world." It really refers to our outer life: our livelihood, our relationships with partners, with children, with parents, with friends. May all that go smoothly and easily. As you know, that's kind of a full-time job all in itself. Sometimes being a worker, a partner, and a parent is more than a full-time job—much more.

And then, in addition, we're supposed to sustain this intention of dharma practice—coming back to the moment, nourishing mindfulness, and developing metta. And you've also found that that's a full-time job. So it's as though going back into the world, we're assigned two full-time jobs, at least. If you're a parent, maybe three.

How do we do this? The good news is that over time it gets easier. It gets easier to combine those intentions of paying attention with the intention of carrying out our activities in the world.

But there's also a built-in pitfall: the worldly activities themselves can be so involving and consuming that we lose track of the spiritual orientation. This easily happens in outer life. Not only are the daily activities consuming, but they're also really seductive. They offer so many intriguing possibilities, don't they? All the interesting jobs there are to do, all the different projects we could get involved with as volunteers, all the different people we could meet, ways we could take our work into new areas, different activities we could do with our kids and partners, richness we could bring to our parents in their older years. There are so many rich possibilities and ways to spend our time in the outer world.

We can see as we get back into it that the forces of wanting, of desire, can lead us down a lot of these different tracks. It really is easy to forget to keep bringing in the spiritual focus, to keep coming back to awareness as a refuge, to metta as a direction and compassion. So it's actually quite easy, I think, to go back into the world and get lost in the pursuits of our daily life.

One reason is that the desires in outer life are so manifold and so compelling that we may lose our sense of spiritual purpose. We may lose an orientation or a direction.

This is a quote from Tony Parsons. He's the new competitor to Eckhart Tolle in the Western self-realized category, which you may have discovered is a blooming category these days. All these masters are coming along who've never had any spiritual teacher but blossom spontaneously. Eckhart Tolle is one, and Franz just turned me on to Tony Parsons, who's a British guy born in 1933. He had a spontaneous awakening when he was twenty years old and has now been teaching for the last few years.

This is a quote from Tony Parsons: "Whatever I seek or think that I want, all of my desires are only a reflection of my longing to come home. Home is my original nature. It is right here, simply in what is."

I'll read something from Eckhart Tolle's book The Power of Now that says something similar. For those who don't know him, Eckhart Tolle is now fifty-three and had a spontaneous awakening at age twenty-nine. He's German-born but lives in Canada and is now teaching quite a bit in the States.

"All negative emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who we are beyond name and form."

I'll read that again because it's quite dense. All negative emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who we really are beyond name and form.

What both these comments are pointing to is that we've lost touch with our true nature. You could call it awareness, you could call it emptiness, you could call it presence or being or God, if that language speaks to you. Having lost touch with this nature in this kind of fall from grace, there's a deep sense of disappointment, of frustration, of abandonment, of incompleteness that befalls us sentient beings separated from our Source.

Because this sense of disappointment and loss is so burdensome, we escape from feeling it through all the outer activities of our lives. The spiritual path begins when we start drawing back that outer-directed energy and realizing that the only thing that will truly satisfy us is returning to the source, returning to our true nature, our true home.

We're conditioned by society to look in worldly directions for happiness and satisfaction, but the message of the spiritual path is that these directions are actually misleading, taking us away from what will truly heal and bring us genuine happiness and satisfaction when we put our real emphasis and intent there.

One of the best descriptions of the ways our life can go off on worldly tracks is found in a sutta from the Anguttara Nikaya titled "The Vicissitudes of Life." This gives us the title for our talk this evening: "The Eight Worldly Conditions."

The Buddha speaks: "These eight worldly conditions, O monks, keep the world turning around, and the world turns around these eight worldly conditions. What eight? Gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure."

The Buddha teaches that these eight conditions are something we're all subject to, and what's particularly striking is that they're all impermanent, always changing. We can never land forever in any one of them, neither the positive nor the negative sides. We continue to be exposed to their alternation.

If our attempt in life is to find happiness by landing in one of the positive states—gain, praise, pleasure, or success—and to always keep away from experiencing the negative states of loss, blame, pain, and failure, we simply can't do it. It's not possible because the conditions of the world are such that these will always be alternating.

As practitioners, our understanding and direction should be that we can't escape these changing conditions of life, but we may be able to find a kind of equanimity amidst them. Rather than pinning our hopes on always being on the positive side—which doesn't happen for anyone—we can find a way, a place within ourselves, a strength of character and understanding to move more and more easily through the fluctuations of the ups and downs.

Let me explore these four pairs and how they impact our lives. The first pair the Buddha mentioned is gain and loss. It's fascinating to live at this time in 2001 with the phenomenon of gain and loss, because our society is so affluent. Here in the Bay Area, the impact of the computer industry is so significant that stories of gain and loss are everywhere around us.

I mentioned earlier that I used to work at Microsoft, joining the company in 1988. The man who hired me was a wonderful manager—I loved working for him. He was very supportive and skilled, and I thought he was excellent at his job. I discovered after a while that he had been given stock options when he joined the company: 10,000 shares.

Those 10,000 shares of Microsoft in 1988 weren't worth much at the time. But over the following thirteen years, the stock split by a factor of 72. Those shares would today represent 720,000 shares of Microsoft stock, which even after the market's decline, is still worth considerable money.

In early 1989, my boss was passed over for a promotion. The position was given to someone he didn't respect, another manager he considered incompetent, and he was told he would have to report to this person. This really upset him. He felt mistreated, unacknowledged, disrespected. After a conflict with his new manager, one Friday afternoon he wrote a resignation letter and walked out of the office, leaving behind his 10,000 options.

Monday morning, he called his manager to apologize and tried to withdraw his resignation, but it wasn't accepted. The manager said, "No, I accepted your resignation. You're terminated from the company." With that one fit of temper, he essentially left behind about $40 million.

Then, in this past year, the Internet boom has gone bust.

And then the next sitting, the mind is scattered and restless, and there can be a real sense of loss. "Oh no, I've lost my concentration. Where did it go? I had it just an hour ago, and now it's gone." This attachment to meditative states can create the same kind of suffering as attachment to material gains and losses.

In meditation, we can practice this very teaching of the Buddha by recognizing when we're getting elated about a good sitting or dejected about a difficult one. We can reflect that this too is impermanent, bound up with suffering, and subject to change. The concentrated mind will pass. The scattered mind will also pass. Neither state defines our practice or our worth as practitioners.

I remember when I was on my first long retreat, I had what felt like a breakthrough sitting. The mind became very still, and there was a profound sense of peace. I was so excited about this gain that I spent the next several sittings trying to recreate that experience. Of course, the more I grasped for it, the more elusive it became. I was caught in exactly what the Buddha was describing—letting my mind become engrossed in the gain, and then suffering when I couldn't maintain it.

The practice becomes much more peaceful when we can approach each sitting with fresh eyes, not carrying the burden of our previous experiences, whether they were wonderful or terrible. We sit down with whatever mind we have right now, work with whatever arises, and don't get caught in comparing this sitting to yesterday's sitting or hoping for tomorrow's sitting to be different.

This teaching applies equally to our daily life practice. When mindfulness is strong during the day, when we catch ourselves getting angry and are able to step back, when we respond with kindness instead of reactivity—there can be a sense of spiritual gain.

"I'm really getting good at this dharma thing." And then the next day, we explode at our partner over something trivial, we spend the whole day caught in worry, we act in ways that we know cause suffering. The sense of spiritual loss can be devastating.

But here too, the Buddha's instruction applies. The mindful day is impermanent. The unmindful day is also impermanent. Neither defines who we are or determines our capacity for awakening. They're all just changing conditions to be met with equanimity.

This doesn't mean we become passive or indifferent. We still make effort in our practice, we still care about our actions and their consequences. But we hold it all more lightly, with less attachment to outcomes, with more acceptance of the natural fluctuations that are part of any genuine spiritual path.

But concentration is one of the really variable factors in meditation practice, as you probably have noticed. It comes together, it grows strong, and you can do absolutely nothing wrong. You can be doing your practice fully and carefully, yet the concentration just decays. It's one of those factors that's really out of our control.

Again, when it goes, we may get unhappy and think, "Oh, I've blown it." But it's just the natural decaying of the factor of concentration. As we continue with a steady application of mindfulness, it will build back up. So concentration really manifests through the retreat in these cycles of gain and loss, and so do the experiences of calm.

Mindfulness tends to be much steadier in development. Mindfulness—being the capacity of the mind to know its experience—seems to grow little by little, but more steadily through our practice. The kind of gain in mindfulness that you develop over a retreat doesn't entirely desert you when you leave. I think it's one of the things that carries over most powerfully. The concentration will probably go, sorry to say. Most of you know that's going to disappear fairly soon. But the mindfulness is much more steady.

The second of the pairs is praise and blame. I used to think that once one reached a certain level of togetherness, integration in one's life, one was somehow free from blame. But the Buddha actually said somewhere in the suttas that there's no one who is not subject to blame. Looking back on his own life after his awakening, he got this in spades.

You'd think that somebody whose heart was kind and whose actions were thoughtful might possibly be exempt, but it wasn't the case. He went places where people were jealous of him. Teachers in different schools were threatened by him. People spread lies about him, defamed him, tried to keep him from being respected or cared for in different places that he went.

There's a very interesting story about one of his bhikkhus, a bhikkhu named Puna. Puna had come from a land on the west coast of India, and he wanted to go back to that land in order to practice. He didn't like the area where the Buddha was teaching, so he wanted to return to the west coast, to this land called Suna Paranta.

The Buddha said, "But Puna, the people of Suna Paranta are wild and rough. If they abuse and revile you, what will you think about that?" In other words, if you come upon this kind of blame in this land of wild and rough people, what are you going to do about it?

Puna replied, "Venerable sir, if the people of Suna Paranta abuse and revile me, then I will think: these people are excellent, truly excellent, in that they do not give me a blow with the fist."

The Buddha says, "But Puna, what if they do give you a blow with a fist? What will you think about that?"

"Oh, well, if they give me a blow with a fist, then I will think: these people are excellent, truly excellent, in that they do not give me a blow with a clod."

Of course the Buddha replies, "But what if they do give you a blow with a clod?"

Puna replies, "Well, then I will think: these people are excellent, truly excellent, in that they do not stab me with a knife."

"Well, what if they do stab you with a knife?"

"Well, then I will think: these people are excellent, truly excellent, in that they do not take my life with a sharp knife."

This is equanimity. This is being strong in the face of praise and blame.

We have a kind of modern-day example in the figure of Bill Clinton. He's somebody who I think could say something like that and kind of mean it. I don't know if you saw this news item—I think it came before the retreat started. He was at a meeting in Europe, and a protester who was concerned about globalization threw an egg at him. Clinton said, "Young people ought to get angry. They should have somebody to get angry at." Equanimity.

Praise and blame is also kind of an integral part of dharma teaching. It keeps the job juicy, so it always provides interest. If somebody comes up to me after a dharma talk and says, "Can I give you some feedback?" then I know I'm in trouble.

One of the interesting stages here at Spirit Rock is the Monday night class that Jack Kornfield leads. Probably a lot of you have seen that and may have come into Spirit Rock through that class. Teaching up here is like a heaven realm because you all have so much commitment and dedication to the practice.

You're really a wonderful group to work with. The Monday night people are often new to Spirit Rock, new to spiritual practice, and don't have the kind of commitment that people on eight-day retreats always have. There are many committed people in the Monday night group, but it's also where newcomers first encounter Spirit Rock. People come from all sorts of backgrounds, and you do meet some interesting characters on Monday nights.

I actually took over Monday night for about six months a few years ago when Jack was away. I was a fairly green dharma teacher at the time, and looking back I wonder how I ever had the nerve to do that. It was like being president of the Jack Kornfield fan club when Jack Kornfield was away. I did learn a lot from the experience.

I kept Jack's schedule: we sit, then we have a break, then a talk, followed by questions. So we reached the break after sitting for about forty-five minutes. I announced the break and immediately started going through my papers to prepare my talk. There were about two hundred people there that night, and I was still pretty nervous, being fairly new to that scene.

This guy comes up to me and says, "I'm really angry. I'm really angry about the way you manage the time here. Would you like me to go into it now with you, or shall I write you a letter?"

I looked at the two hundred people, looked at my notes, and said, "Why don't you write me a letter?"

He said, "Okay," and started to walk away. Then he turned around and said, "But if you don't answer it, I'm going to be really angry."

I was glad he didn't stab me with a sharp knife.

In my early years, I really resisted that part of dharma teaching. I didn't want those experiences. I thought I shouldn't have to endure them. But I've actually changed my view on this, and Ajahn Sumedho has been helpful to me in this regard.

As a young monk—I mentioned he's been in robes for thirty-five years—when he was young he took to the practice easily and was very happy and contented on his own. He spent years with Ajahn Chah, and what he really wanted was to go off to the forest and just meditate. He wanted to find a peaceful place, live in a small hut, and be really quiet on his own.

But Ajahn Chah, for various reasons, kept pushing Sumedho into community life. When Sumedho had been a monk only eight years, he was made abbot of the first Western monastery in Thailand called Wat Pah Nanachat, which is still operating. They've had a series of abbots over the years, and it continues introducing many Westerners to the practice.

He kept grumbling, thinking, "Only eight years. I've only been a monk eight years and I have to be an abbot. Chah got twenty years of practice before he had to be an abbot. Now he's making me be abbot at eight years."

Not many years later, Ajahn Chah sent Sumedho to England to establish a Western monastery there. He had to live in London for two years and then start a whole community, becoming abbot. Now there's a huge and thriving network of monasteries in England and branch monasteries around the world that Ajahn Sumedho has launched. He's the head of a very large community.

In community life, as you know, it's not always easy. The number of problems in a community basically goes up exponentially with the number of people. So the bigger the community got, the more difficult it became. And he received a lot of blame and criticism from his community. The women were upset that they weren't being treated equally—they didn't have the same opportunities as monks. The young monks who were coming up and starting to feel their own power rebelled against him as the father figure and authority. Different people didn't like the way he was managing various aspects of the community. He really got blasted.

He talks about this quite openly—this is not private news. He said when it first started happening to him, he got very shaken by it. He really couldn't take the criticism. But over time, he started to use it as dharma practice.

He started to examine these experiences through the lens of personality view—recognizing how criticisms would trigger different self-images he held about himself, attachments to being perceived in particular ways that didn't truly define who he was. He realized that while he couldn't make his personality perfect—and nobody can—he could find his perfection in Buddha knowing, in Buddha mind. Taking refuge there, he began to see personality problems as simply arising and passing away phenomena.

He spoke about this transformation frequently, saying recently that he's genuinely grateful he didn't get to become a hermit. He's actually thankful that Ajahn Chah pushed him into community life, because otherwise he would never have faced his deep-seated fear of people.

I've heard others express similar gratitude—actually welcoming difficulties in their practice because these challenges illuminate areas where they're still clinging, still attached. Without the conflict that brings up such difficulties, these shadow areas would remain hidden. But when they're illuminated through the suffering of attachment, we gain the possibility to understand them and move toward greater freedom. This is why this aspect of blame can actually serve our practice and growth.

The Dalai Lama addressed this theme when he was here last summer. Surya Das, a Western teacher in the Tibetan tradition, posed a provocative question during a gathering of about 225 teachers in this very hall. He said, "There's significant popularization of Buddhism happening these days, which risks watering down or trivializing the teachings. Your Holiness, you're the greatest popularizer of us all. What do you make of this? What do you think about your role in popularizing Buddhism?"

The Dalai Lama was quiet for a moment before responding with characteristic directness: "Some people call me a living Buddha. Some people call me God King. No, I am not. I'm just a simple Buddhist monk. But other people call me a counter-revolutionary, or they call me a wolf in monk's clothing." Then he said something that struck me deeply: "When that happens, I look back at my own intention. And if my own intention is good, I don't care what other people say. If they perceive differently, that's their problem. It's not up to me. If my intention is good, then I don't care."

He said those last words—"I don't care"—with remarkable strength and conviction. I was deeply moved by this combination of tremendous responsibility—being the main voice for Tibetan culture in the world—alongside the extreme praise and blame that comes his way, and his inner strength to hold that entire spectrum by returning to his own intention.

This offers us guidance when we encounter criticism. Can we examine our own intention? Was there something unskillful in our action—some thoughtlessness, intent to harm, or negligence? If so, can we simply acknowledge that and apologize? And if there wasn't, can we trust in that clarity? Can we recognize that the criticism isn't appropriate or justified and remain confident in our own understanding, our own honest assessment?

For me, the challenge with criticism has been that when I've done something wrong, I become devastated as a person—as if I've transformed into a completely bad person because I've offended someone or acted unskillfully. This, of course, is unrealistic. We're all going to make mistakes occasionally, and that's actually perfectly fine. The key is not letting these mistakes invalidate our fundamental worth as human beings.

We're doing our best, and when I make a mistake, that's okay. This capacity for such spaciousness of heart comes from growing self-acceptance. The more I trust that overall I'm genuinely trying to do my best, the more I can allow imperfection to exist without devastation.

The other side is praise—how do we relate to appreciation and positive feedback? In many cases, this proves even more challenging to receive gracefully than blame.

I don't know if you've ever noticed this, but if you've done something in a group, one person might come up and say, "Wow, that was great. I really appreciated your comment." And somebody else will come up and say, "I thought that was really the worst comment of the whole thing. I was very offended by what you said."

Which one sticks in your mind longer? The praise just sort of comes in and out, and the blame really tends to hang around for a while.

So with praise also, take a look and see if you can take in what's being said, because often what's being said, the real subtext of it is, "I love you," or "I dig you," or "I care about you." Something like that. Often praise is just kind of a way of touching another person and expressing affection.

When I was younger, I think I took praise in a kind of narcissistic way. I'd take it in and I'd kind of inflate my ego. I'd sort of pump myself up with it. But now I just try to tune into the kindness of what's being offered and the sense of affection that's being exchanged. And that just feels wholesome. It doesn't feel like there's a need for a whole lot of clinging around that piece of it.

When we are offering feedback to somebody else, constructive criticism, of course, the Buddha had some really clear guidelines for that that I try to keep in mind. He said, "One who is about to admonish another should realize within themselves five qualities before doing so: At the right time will I speak. Gently will I speak. Truthfully, not with exaggeration, will I speak. To their benefit will I speak, not to their harm. And kindly will I speak, not in anger."

These are beautiful guidelines for saying what sometimes needs to be said, but doing it with a real spirit of care and mutual benefit, mutual interest.

The next of the pairs is pleasure and pain. These also alternate all the time in life, as you see so clearly in meditation retreat. Even for the Buddha, these alternations didn't go away. The Buddha had back pain. You can find this in the suttas. He'll say, "Moggallana," one of his two chief disciples, "you give the Dhamma talk tonight. My back is aching. I'm going to go lie down." And now they'll describe him going off to one side and lying down while Moggallana gives the talk.

His cousin, Devadatta, tried to kill him. Rolled a rock down a hill trying to kill the Buddha. Someone sent an enraged elephant after him, which it's said that he caused to halt with the force of his loving kindness. And he died actually from eating a poisoned meal. It's not any suggestion that it was poisoned purposely in order to kill him, but maybe the food had gone off or it was bad or something. He died from that.

So this alternation of pleasure and pain will come all the time.

In the ascetic traditions, in the Thai forest tradition, there's often an emphasis that the monastics try to reduce the pleasure in their life in order not to develop clinging. And Ajahn Chah at his monastery used to take all the beautiful Thai food that was brought by the lay people to feed the monks, dump it into one bowl, stir it all around, and then serve it out. So you'd get a curry mixed with a banana, mixed with a dessert, and that would be glopped into the bowls of all the monks and nuns. And Sumedho said it tasted awful. He said, "I can't eat this food any longer. I can't bear this any longer." And then he found a way to bear it longer.

Where I was practicing at Wat Suan Mok, Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery, it was a fantastic setting. We were given a huge degree of independence and self-reliance, and I think basically he trusted us. But because it was so comfortable, they made the food terrible. Because otherwise it would have been too attractive for people to just come down and hang out and have a cushy life for a long time. So the food there was awful. But everything else about the monastery was fantastic.

This is not an ascetic tradition, as you may have noticed. We actually refer to this style of practice as the upper middle way. We trust that you'll find enough pain from other sources in your practice.

The last of the pairs is called success and failure. Sometimes this couplet is put as fame and disrepute. Sometimes it's translated success and failure.

I want to talk about success and failure because I think it's a little broader for us. We often look at our lives this way around areas that we're responsible for. We look at our job situation. We look at our relationship. We look at our parenting or taking care of our own parents.

In all these areas, clearly, success is helpful. Doing a good job in all these areas is really, really a good thing. We need to provide for our families. We need to raise our kids in a loving way. We want to have a partnership, an intimate partnership that has kindness as its foundation and not conflict.

So there's a certain amount of self-confidence that comes when we bring a level of success into these areas. And again, this ties into the fourth of the metaphors, being able to look after ourselves happily. This is important. It's self-confidence, it's not pride. We don't get pumped up about it, but we reassure ourselves that we can take care of ourselves well in this world.

And it's a little bit similar in meditation. We want to find a way that our meditation goes reasonably well, so that over the long term, we're seeing that our difficult emotional states and reactions are declining rather than increasing. I think this is kind of the best long-term gauge for our practice, that the difficult emotions are going down, not going up.

One of my teachers actually said, if you practice over a few years and these difficult emotions aren't going down, you're wasting your time with your Dharma practice. And you might as well take a break. Have a holiday. Do something different. But for the most part, this is a good gauge.

But beyond that broad generality, which really takes some years to see, we can get really concerned with too much detail of success and failure in a meditation retreat. And then it turns into striving. We get very goal-oriented, and we're near-term goal-oriented.

I was practicing quite some years ago in a system of meditation where certain experiences are considered a standard sequence of unfolding. And I knew a little bit about this sequence, and I knew my teachers would be very happy if I came in and described one of these experiences. So I was really putting myself under a lot of pressure to have one of these experiences. And as you know, you can't force experience in meditation. I hadn't really learned that yet. I was still trying. So I kind of tied myself up in knots trying to make certain things happen in my meditation.

I went in for an interview with my teacher and reported an experience I had and he said, "You're not very deep. I could tell by the way you walked in the room, you're not very deep. So-and-so is much deeper." And he named a friend of mine who was practicing on that same retreat. "They're much deeper than you are."

This didn't exactly raise my motivation level in the retreat.

So I think if we hold a very long-term view of practice, then we don't get so caught up in short-term success and failure. Because when we do and we fall into striving, we can really make ourselves tense. And if we're tense, then the real heart of the meditation—qualities like freedom and relaxation and compassion and loving-kindness and even wisdom—don't have a chance to flower. Those things flower from letting go, not from striving.

So have the sense that you really can just keep your orientation toward this moment, not try to create some special experience here and now. And trust that the letting go and the softening, the gentleness and the relaxation will allow the Dharma to unfold you, rather than you having to push the Dharma. That way it will unfold beautifully in the beginning, it will unfold beautifully in the middle, it will unfold beautifully in the end.

Ajahn Chah said, and I think I mentioned this earlier, that for a practitioner success and failure are of equal value. I love this. Because when we really take that to heart, we realize we can learn from our successes, we can learn from our failures. And it gives a kind of trust and fearlessness about our life. We're not so afraid to make a new step and maybe get off course, because if we are, we can learn from that too.

This kind of leads into an area I want to explore a little bit, which is what success means in work and relationship. Often success means, or I'd say has meant for me, getting my way. I have an idea of something I want to have happen in an organization or in a relationship, and I'll try to direct things so it unfolds in that way.

As an example, two years ago I was president of the board here at Spirit Rock.

I did that for a year. I'd been on the board for a few years, and then for one year, I was the president. And I felt a new burden when I became president of the board because I felt all of a sudden I was responsible for the organization. I felt responsible for what the organization decided to do.

So I felt as president, I had to get the rest of the board to make the right decision—right being the way I thought it should go. Partly this was just coming out of personal involvement, my own attachment. And partly it was really trying to take good care of the organization and have it unfold in the way that I thought was most skillful. So there was an interested and a disinterested component to it. But I really felt that if I didn't control the organization in that way, I was letting it down.

I remember one of the issues that came up at that time—we were looking for a director. We met Evan, who's our current general manager, and who I think is a really great director. He happened to be the first candidate we met. So we hadn't interviewed any other people. We met Evan and I really liked him right off the bat. I wanted to hire him without interviewing anybody else because he had another job offer pending.

Sally was also in the group involved and we both agreed, but we couldn't convince anybody else to do that. We tried. We struggled. We may have threatened and bullied a little bit. And we couldn't get it to happen. So we gave up. Evan took the other job. We went on a long search for a director and hired somebody else. Then about a year ago, we had another vacancy. Evan came back in the picture, went through the process, and he got hired. It would have been great if we could have hired him a year earlier perhaps, but this is the way it unfolded.

So I got quite frustrated at that at points. And I realized from that I couldn't control the board. I have enough trouble controlling my mind, much less the minds of fifteen other people. There's often in organizational life this wish to have our decision go, but it's something that's out of our control. In relationship, the same way. We may want it to go a certain way, but our partner might not want it that way.

So this is a quote from the Bhagavad Gita. This is Krishna speaking: "The way to freedom in this world is to act without attachment to the fruits of your actions."

Now this seemed really idealistic to me for a long time, but the more I started working with it, the more it became really practical to me. And I take it now as my direction for acting in the world without so much concern about success or failure.

The way that it comes across for me is I start to realize the limits of my control. I can't control fifteen other people's minds. I can influence them. And so what I try to do is to put things as clearly and as wisely and as lightly as I can because then I think it has the best chance of being heard. If I put things in a heavy way, there's going to be resistance.

So one of the ways that I check my own attachment is, can I be light with this idea? With this proposal, with what I'm trying to have accomplished? And if I see I can't be light with it, that's a sign of my own attachment. But if I can be light with it and put it clearly and my own emotions aren't disturbing the delivery, then it has the best possible chance of being received in a favorable way by the people who are listening.

And then I realize that's all I can do. I can put it out clearly and lightly and then it's out of my hands. And then I have to surrender to how everybody else sees it. This has been a fantastic learning for me in getting along more easily in groups, in relationship with other people. I can't control the outcome. I can only put in my best and cleanest effort.

This is also really true of meditation practice. If you're with the breath in order to get concentrated, you have an ulterior motive—it's not going to work. If you're with the breath in a pure and light and clean way with no ulterior motive, you'll get concentrated. So check your attachment.

in being with the breath or being with a meditation object.

So with this looking at these four kinds of outcomes—gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure—coming to a clearer relationship is really a way of purifying our motivation as we act and live in the world. And as our motivation becomes purified just to do what's right from loving-kindness, from wisdom and compassion, then we trust that the outcome will take care of itself, will take care of us. So we just find lighter and lighter ways to do the things that we're already doing.

Ajahn Jamnian was here about a year ago. He's a Thai teacher, a great master of loving-kindness and vipassana. And he said that in his monastery he sees people from the moment he gets up until the moment he goes to bed. He's receiving visitors. Lay people come and want to consult with him. Monks come to see him to talk about their practice. Nuns come to see him. Monks come to talk about running the monastery. And he says he never gets tired. He can be with people all day long and he never gets tired.

And we said, "How can you do that?"

And he said, "I do it because all the time I'm speaking and interacting, I'm resting in emptiness. I rest in emptiness the whole time and I never get tired. I tell my monks to do this, but they can't do it. They keep grasping at the things that come by, at the people, at the things that are happening. But I can rest in emptiness."

That is a fantastic talent. And what that really says to me is that he cares more about this place of freedom that he abides in than he cares about the passing, changing show of gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure.

And I think when we also care more about our freedom than the passing show, when we care more about awareness and attention than we do about outcomes, we will also be resting in emptiness, just like Ajahn Jamnian.

This is really why renunciation is such an important factor on the path. Renunciation doesn't mean we become a monk or nun and we put everything away. It means that we see things in the right priority. We see that the practice of freedom is the greatest contribution we can make for our own life and the well-being of the world. We trust that the right action will come from that place of freedom, so we try not to get too anxious about it.

Then our motivation for being in the world can shift from always trying to accumulate the positive aspects of this cycle—always trying to accumulate gain, praise, pleasure, success—to being in the world from a place of having renounced outcome. And our fundamental reason for being there can more become compassion. Compassion for ourselves, compassion for others. Just present, kind of hanging out, ready to purify our own hearts, deepen our own freedom, and offer that freedom to others.

I'll just close with a quotation from the Sutta Nipata. Someone asked the Buddha, "What is the greatest blessing?" And he answered in a few different ways, and this is one of the ways that he answered:

"When one's mind is sorrowless, stainless, and secure in the deathless, and one is not disturbed when touched by life's vicissitudes, this is the greatest blessing."

Let's just sit for a moment together.

Cascading Pools of Mettā

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong uses the beautiful metaphor of cascading pools from the ancient suttas to explain the traditional progression of mettā (loving-kindness) practice. Starting with the classical sequence of self, benefactor, friend, neutral person, difficult person, and all beings, he acknowledges that for many Westerners, developing mettā for oneself can actually be the most challenging. Armstrong emphasizes that mettā should develop "where it's easiest," encouraging practitioners to find their natural entry point into loving-kindness.
> The talk explores mettā as a powerful healing practice in the Buddhist tradition, examining how it works differently from vipassanā meditation. While vipassanā reveals spaciousness through mindfulness, mettā fills that space with warmth and acceptance. Armstrong discusses the "near and far enemies" of loving-kindness, explaining how genuine mettā differs from attachment-based affection. He highlights the significance of the neutral person as a turning point where we begin caring beyond self-interest, opening to boundless compassion.
> Drawing from the Mettā Sutta, Armstrong presents loving-kindness as a concentration practice that transforms our entire mindstream—images, emotions, and thoughts—into wholesome directions. He emphasizes patience with the practice, using the Buddha's teaching about gradual accumulation like raindrops filling a jar, and encourages practitioners to trust their own wisdom in finding the right balance between mettā and vipassanā practices.

Through the day today we've been using different individuals to develop the loving-kindness with, and the thinking behind this comes from an image in the ancient texts in the suttas which is the image of cascading pools.

The idea is that if there's a river running down a mountain slope and there's a big rainstorm on the top, the river will start to fill up at the top. As it gets to one pool, that pool will fill up. As the rain keeps coming down, it will overflow. When that pool overflows, it will run further down the mountainside and come to the next pool. Then that will fill up, overflow, and run down to the next pool. So this is the image of the cascading pools.

The reason it's an analogy for the mettā practice is it's considered classically that it's easiest to develop the loving kindness with ourselves. So we let that pool fill up, and then we let it run down to the next pool, which is our benefactor. Then as that one fills up, we let it overflow and run to the next, which is a good friend. Then it fills up and runs over, spills over to a neutral person, and then to a difficult person, and then to all beings. So there's actually a logic to this sequence of the way we develop the mettā practice. We start closest to home, extend to those we naturally feel affection for, those we're neutral toward, those we have difficulty with, and then we can extend to all beings.

Often for us in the West, it doesn't work quite in this logical order. Many people find that doing mettā for ourself is actually the most difficult. It's very helpful to have someone like a benefactor or a friend where it's easy because you can let that pool fill up and then come back to yourself and let it spill over to you.

So check this order out for yourself, but know that this is the principle of mettā: we develop it where it's easiest. This is actually quite refreshing after Vipassana, where it seems like everything develops in the most difficult way possible. But in mettā, it's intended to develop in the easiest way possible. So if the easiest access for you is through yourself, that's where you should spend most of your time. If it's easier for you going in through a benefactor or a friend, spend a lot of time there and then bring that mettā back to yourself.

The mettā coming back to oneself is really a key. As we said at the beginning of the day, if we love ourselves, then we don't harm others. Everything starts inside and if there's love here, it's so easy to share it outwards. But often the love for ourself is the most difficult part to touch, and so we need to borrow from other sources. We also need to be really persistent with it. It's a process of training the heart. Like every other part of us, the heart is trainable. It can learn to love. We can learn to love. It's part of our nature. We just need to bring it out.

By and large, we've never been taught how to do it. Our culture doesn't provide us the guidelines. Our parents don't provide us the guidelines. Typically religions have not provided us the guidelines. But there are practices such as this that are proven to bring it forth. We just need to do the work.

When we develop the mettā for ourself, we find that mettā has a range of flavors. Just like there are a range of people that we can extend it to, it comes in a range of flavors or degrees. When mettā is really strong, we feel this strong sense of unity, of oneness, of integration that is a characteristic of love, of deep, true love. When it's a little toned down from there, we feel a warmth or a friendliness to others. When it's a little toned down from there, mettā takes on the quality of acceptance. We may not be crazy about ourselves or the other person, but there's a growing sense of it really being okay with us, how we are and how others are. So just that spirit of acceptance itself is mettā too.

One of the phrases people sometimes like to substitute is an acceptance kind of phrase. You'll be going through a hard patch in practice and you'll be saying a phrase like, "may I abide in happiness," and you just go, "that's out to lunch. Happiness? Not in this lifetime. I don't think so." So when the phrases start feeling that remote or disconnected, bring it back to earth. Acceptance is a really good way to do it. So instead of "may I be happy," you might say something like, "may I accept myself just as I am." That is also the flavor of mettā. Acceptance is an important aspect. Some people like to phrase this, "may I love and accept myself just as I am."

This is a nice way to make metta more approachable for ourselves. Metta is a powerful healing practice—it is essentially the healing practice in our tradition. Where there's a sense of incompleteness in our relationship to ourself, from earlier wounding or a strong sense of unworthiness, metta is the recommended approach.

You can stay with metta for yourself for a long, long time. Sometimes people connect with the practice and intuitively feel it's right to keep returning to themselves. There's simply a sense that there hasn't been enough care for oneself, and so there's a need to replenish the tank. If you feel this way, you can pour metta into yourself for as long as necessary. You don't need to bring in other people in the beginning. One meditator worked with themselves for three years with metta before they felt ready to include anyone else. And if that's your case, that's absolutely fine.

Also be really open to what works, to bringing out the quality of metta. One meditator found that there wasn't a good connection with any beings, so she used a stuffed animal that she had actually brought on retreat with her and kept on her bed. Other people like to use pets because we can really open to their vulnerability and innocence. The important thing is the quality of loving kindness. The being that awakens it is not as important.

It seems curious—when we start the metta practice, the emphasis appears to be on my benefactor, my friend, my neutral person. But from the point of view of practice, the important emphasis is on the feeling tone, the connection, and the caring. It really doesn't matter what we use to get it going. Once it's flowing, it changes our relationship to the whole world. When your heart is full of metta, you see everybody from that space of metta. The whole world looks different from a place of metta. So we don't really care how we get there. The important thing is to start drawing it out, strengthening that sense of caring and connection, and little by little that flame grows.

When we first touch metta, it seems insignificant. We think, "Yes, okay, I can care about my friend, so what?" It doesn't seem like it's going to go anywhere. Often because of this, we don't keep planting the seeds. We think, "Oh, that was a nice little thing," or we feel a moment's peace from our meditation and think, "That was nice, but no big deal."

But what we don't see is that this is a radically different approach than we normally live from. It's subtle in the beginning. The really wholesome mind states are actually hard to appreciate at first because their vibration is more subtle than the strong reactive mind states. If we get into fear, anger, or self-judgment, it has a lot of pop—we can really tell something's happening. Yesterday, some veteran practitioners shared that difficult mind states sometimes give them a greater sense of vitality, a sense of being alive when they're really grappling with fear, desire, or anger.

The beautiful mind states have a subtler kind of vibration. They don't come up and knock you over the head immediately. But that subtle vibration can get stronger and stronger over time, and loving-kindness is definitely like that. The first time we feel the sense of connection, we may think it's no big deal. But we don't realize the potential that's there when we cultivate it.

So may we not give up planting the seeds. The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, thinking this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled."

This is a beautiful image because in Asia, rainwater is usually collected in large earthenware jars about three feet tall and two and a half feet across. When I was a monk, I had one of these at the base of my hut. The rainwater would fall down into a gutter, and the gutter would channel it into this jar. Storm by storm, in the rainy season, my jar filled to a very great height. If you put any container out during one of our Marin winter storms, little by little, drop by drop, it fills up.

So it is with loving kindness. Each drop doesn't feel like much—it feels like something we could write off. But please begin in your practice to tune into how it feels. Tune into that quality of connection, whether it's strong or weak, because that's what is going to grow and become as big as love can be. It can be huge.

You meet somebody like the Dalai Lama and you realize how big the force of love can get. And it all comes from one drop after another. As you notice what each one feels like, then it gets easier and easier to put the mind back in that place. You're creating actually a channel to that quality of connectedness and affection and caring each time you activate loving kindness in yourself. And then you can start to see it manifest. You can start to see it ripple through your life. And you know it's happening when your friends or partner tells you that something's changing. You can really count on it.

The Dalai Lama is always an inspiring example to me. He was here, as I mentioned, a year ago. And because he's the head of a state in exile, the U.S. State Department provides security for him wherever he goes. So while he was on the land teaching for a couple of days last year, everybody who came in to see him had to go through a metal detector. The people who were staying up in the residence halls had to evacuate their rooms at about seven in the morning so that the Secret Service could search and send dogs in to sniff for explosives.

The security guards, when we passed through the metal detector, were heavy duty. They had a gun on one side and a nightstick on the other. They were strong. They were professional, like professional bodyguards. They were hired by the State Department. And you didn't joke around with these people.

At the end of the conference, every one of them wanted to have their photograph taken with the Dalai Lama because he had so touched their hearts just in his coming and going. So they all got together for a group photograph. Now, would they have done that for Bruce Springsteen? Maybe. Bill Clinton? I don't know. So this quality of love has such a potential to reach out and touch others and to invite them into the way, into awakening.

I also want to talk a little bit about how metta and vipassana work differently with our conditioning. I mentioned that metta is a very strong healing practice. And the way that it works is as the sense of friendliness or warmth grows, it's not that we get rid of our stuff—our psychic stuff, our reactive mind of wanting and anger and impatience and self-judgment. But more and more, it all starts being held in the space of acceptance and friendliness.

One of the qualities of love is it's tremendously integrating. Love joins things together. And when love starts to awaken in the psyche, it pulls the psyche together. So those parts of ourselves that we couldn't accept before—we just thought, this is not good enough. If I allow myself to really feel my fear or my anger or my incompleteness or my sense of abandonment, I'm not a good enough person. Often we take these difficult emotions as invalidating us in some way. But when love is present in the mind, we can look at those things and go, "Oh, that's okay. That's just a part of being human. We all have the whole package. We all have all those feelings." And love makes it all acceptable. It brings it all together under the light of acceptance. So there's this very deep unification and healing that takes place through the metta.

The other thing that happens with the metta is that positive states of mind—the brahmaviharas for shorthand: love, compassion, joy and equanimity—are starting to really take root and flower in the mind. And these are real alternatives to our habitual reactions. The mind finds a new home in these positive states.

Now my experience was that this was a little different from vipassana. The wholesome qualities that vipassana activates are more neutral in tone. Mindfulness, for example—awareness is extremely powerful. I'd say it may be the most powerful factor on the whole path, but it's very neutral in its quality. It's like clear water. It doesn't have a property of its own. It doesn't have a coloring of its own because it can go with everything. You can put clear water with rocks, with soup, with sugar, with anything. Mindfulness goes with anything so it doesn't stand out.

What I found with many years of vipassana practice was my dominant mental tendency in the beginning was fear. If my mind went off balance it would go to fear or anxiety. And over years and years, that got smaller and smaller and smaller with the influence of mindfulness. But still, if I went somewhere, I would tend toward fear.

That was the conditioning. Vipassana, through its great spaciousness, reduces this conditioning, yet on the emotional level, it doesn't necessarily put anything in its place. The Brahma Viharas, however, do.

After practicing metta for a while, I discovered that instead of leaning into fear, my mind would lean into metta. This became the new home it found. I was generating a new kind of conditioning—a wholesome conditioning that my mind could rest in, different from my old conditioned reactions.

I sum it up this way: Vipassana reveals this vast emptiness, and loving kindness fills it with warmth. These two practices are profoundly supportive of each other. As Vipassana empties the mind, space opens for metta to come through, to be truly felt and color our entire world. As metta flows more freely, we become more inclined to let go of the reactive patterns. And it's this letting go that opens us into the emptiness.

These two sides are deeply complementary. They develop one another and offer alternative ways of working with our conditioning—both tremendously helpful.

Metta, because of its quality of friendliness, serves as the antidote to aversion. Aversion manifests in countless forms. In Buddhist psychology, people are sometimes categorized as one of three types: those dominated by greed or wanting, those dominated by aversion or negativity, or those dominated by delusion or confusion. We all contain all three tendencies—it's simply a matter of which predominates in our makeup.

In someone particularly prone to aversion, it usually expresses itself as anger, critical mind, judgment of others and ourselves, irritability, or fear. I would include depression in this list of aversive reactions as well.

Because metta embodies affection, warmth, and friendliness, it undoes aversion. The mind cannot simultaneously hold metta and negativity. For those whose personalities are governed by aversion, metta is the traditional antidote—the practice that counterbalances the tendency toward negativity. This is why, with my fearful temperament, metta was such a perfect fit.

When I discovered metta practice, I dove in completely for about two years. I had been practicing Vipassana for fifteen or sixteen years when I attended my first metta retreat. I was so captivated by metta that I essentially stopped doing Vipassana for the next year and a half. Everything I practiced, both in retreat and daily life, was metta.

Sharon Salzberg used to tell stories about her early metta practice with Upandita, a fierce Burmese master. Whenever she'd sit retreat with him, he'd insist on Vipassana practice. She'd request to practice metta instead. He'd counter, "You're sitting for three months—two weeks of metta, the rest Vipassana." She'd negotiate for two months of metta. "No, maybe one month." "How about six weeks?" "Done." They'd bargain until she secured a bit more metta time than he initially offered.

As you navigate your spiritual path—and I assume most of you practice or will practice some Vipassana—find your own balance between these two approaches. If you feel drawn to metta practice, it can be your primary or even exclusive practice for some time. This is perfectly appropriate.

In the long run, you'll want to integrate it with Vipassana, because Vipassana is the practice that liberates. In our tradition, the wisdom practice is Vipassana, and it's wisdom that ultimately frees us. Opening the heart can take us far, but without clear seeing into the nature of things, there's no lasting freedom. At some point, Vipassana practice—or some equivalent wisdom practice—must be included for your spiritual path to be complete.

You can find your own schedule, your own pace. In daily life, you might practice some metta and some Vipassana each day—perhaps ten or fifteen minutes of metta, then the remainder of your sitting in Vipassana, as feels right for you.

Feel your way into this. See where your intuition leads you, where you feel drawn. Follow that. Trust that.

Trust your own sense of what is right for you at this time.

Ajahn Sumedho was here about a month ago. He gave a nine-day public retreat, and then he gave a five-day retreat for the Spirit Rock teachers. I happened to sit in both of them—the first time I'd sat a long retreat with him—and he was a very impressive and inspiring teacher. One of the things he commented on, looking over the whole spectrum of meditators that he's seen, and he's seen a lot, is that he thinks the main thing people need is to trust themselves more. There needs to be more trust in our own wisdom. I thought that was a really interesting comment. He basically said we know more than we give ourselves credit for knowing. So we're often looking to an outside authority for the answer, but we need to start trusting in our own seeing.

He also said something beautiful about good qualities. At the start of a metta session, we're instructed to reflect on our good qualities. Sometimes those are hard to find, especially when we've been sitting for three hours and feeling a little lonely because of the silence. It's hard to connect with those good qualities. So he said something I found really refreshing. He said, "I thought about when I was a child and I realized that I always wanted to be a good child. And I've always loved what was noble and beautiful in life." I thought, you know, I bet that's true of most of us.

In the spiritual scene, most people who come here have very good intentions. You wouldn't sit through the discomfort if you didn't. But sometimes we lose sight of the fact that in the general scheme of things, we're basically pretty good people. Generally, we do care about others. We could do a poll—I bet a good part of this room is involved in service work as livelihood, for example, or does volunteer work of one kind or another, and generally has a sense of coming from a place of caring about the world, caring about the environment, caring about creatures.

So in the general scheme of things, that makes us pretty good people. It's not to puff up about that, but just to take it as our intentions are basically good and we can trust in that. And maybe reflecting back to your childhood will be a way into that for you too. We tend to be way too critical of ourselves.

As the pools cascade and we come into relation with the benefactor, this can be another really powerful part of practice. There's a tradition in one school of Buddhism called union with the teacher—it's called guru yoga, actually—where we meditate a lot on our teacher. In that tradition, the teacher is usually the benefactor. The point of that meditation is not worship. It's not like putting them way up. It's to realize that their wisdom mind and our wisdom mind are one and the same. So if they can be free, we can be free. It's actually coming to an understanding of our basic nature being the same as the Buddha's, already being awake in our basic nature. And it actually increases our self-confidence.

When you pick a benefactor, if you pick somebody who's got a lot of wisdom, a lot of love, a lot of understanding, as you hang out with them in doing the metta practice, you're going to soak all those things up. So you're actually sort of practicing union with the teacher if your benefactor is that caliber of being.

I had some very strong, almost ecstatic moments in doing the meditation on the benefactor when I did the intensive metta retreat. I was practicing with the benefactor for three weeks of the six-week retreat and got very familiar with them. It really deepened my connection with them, but it also deepened my trust in my own wisdom mind. Because how could I recognize their wisdom except from my wisdom? How could I recognize their love except insofar as it touched my love? So picking a benefactor who has those qualities is a really good way to bring them out in yourself.

That's why some people like to use, even if they don't know them personally, the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh or somebody of that stature, like the Karmapa. I don't know if you've tuned into the Karmapa. He's a seventeen-year-old kid who just escaped from Tibet into India. It was quite a big international news story when he did it. He's tall, he's young, he's very good looking. I think he's going to be incredibly charismatic. And his predecessor was an amazing yogi, the last Karmapa who died in the early eighties—I think it was the 16th Karmapa. He's the head of one of the schools of Tibetan Buddhism.

When he was dying, he was in a Chicago hospital, and his followers were looking after him. They were very concerned about his passing.

But every time they came into the room to check on how he was doing, he would sit up and ask them, "Oh, how are you doing?" And have this big smile. But after a while, he could tell they were really worried about him. And he didn't want to see them worried. So he told them, "Oh, don't worry. Nothing happens when I die."

What an incredible place of freedom to see one's death even as "nothing happens." That kind of a mind has really transcended birth and death. That kind of a mind has found a freedom beyond any kind of change. It's awesome and inspiring. So taking someone like that, even if you haven't met them, can be a beautiful way to start opening our own hearts and minds.

What we're trying to do in developing the metta moment after moment based on these different beings is basically to try and stabilize the heart in that quality of friendship. Just like in vipassana practice, we practice mindfulness moment after moment. What we're really aiming at is stabilizing ourselves in a state of awareness. So in metta, we're aiming to stabilize the heart in the quality of loving kindness or friendship. And this stability actually becomes more important than the changing events of life. It gives the mind greater strength and greater steadiness as it becomes more rooted, more of a home in our being.

It's really supported by the factor of concentration. I mentioned earlier that metta is a concentration practice. You may have noticed when the metta practice is going well - take a look at what's happening in your mind when you sustain the metta practice, even for a short time. It's pretty amazing. You've pulled up an image of, let's say, your benefactor, which is a positive image for you. You have developed a quality of caring or connection or friendship through the metta. And the phrases going through your thoughts are very wholesome phrases about wishing the other person safety, happiness, and health.

What makes up our mind stream at any moment in time? Isn't it basically images, emotions, and thoughts? Is there anything else there? That's pretty much it. So when the metta practice is going well, you've taken control of your entire mind stream and set it in a very positive and wholesome direction. Even if that doesn't last very long, that's an extraordinary thing to do. How many moments in a waking day of daily life are we in charge of our images, emotions and thoughts? Not very many. And when we're not in charge of them, often they're in charge of us. Often we're invaded by unwholesome tendencies of reactivity, thoughts of anxiety, images of what might happen next week.

So this is a very audacious undertaking, the metta practice. That's why you shouldn't be discouraged if they don't all come together at one time for you. This is a big deal, pulling all three together. Sometimes maybe just the image will be there. Sometimes just the emotion. Sometimes just the phrase. Maybe two will be there. And then sometimes when all three are really there together, that's kind of like a peak experience in life. But as the concentration grows, we find more and more the ability to hold all three of these at the same time and to stabilize that kind of experience. That's a very wholesome direction to put into the mindstream.

What we want to come to in the long run - the vipassana developing the awareness and the loving kindness developing the warmth - is a fusing of the two. We want to develop a mind that is here and now, really awake and aware, but filled with warmth. I like to remind myself that we're really developing a warm attention. Bringing the quality of warmth into our mindfulness practice and bringing the quality of present moment attention steadily into our loving kindness practice.

When we come to the friend, often for many people this is the easiest. A lot of people in the West don't really have a benefactor. It wasn't part of our growing up often. So the friend is often the easiest person for us to connect to. But one of the things you might find is that the relationship with the friend can slide into what are called the near and far enemies of loving kindness.

Every one of the brahmavihāras has both a near and a far enemy. The near enemy is a feeling that looks like the brahmavihāra but is an unwholesome state of mind. The far enemy is the exact opposite, so it's definitely unwholesome. With metta, the near enemy is affection with attachment - clingy or grasping kind of love. And the far enemy is anger or ill will.

So with friends, we often encounter both the near and the far enemy. We find that, yes, we like them, but we want something back. And if they don't give it to us, then it can slide into ill will or anger. So especially with friends, it's important to start tuning into metta's tendency—how our mind slides into the near and far enemies.

One of the qualities of metta is that it doesn't come with strings attached. We don't say, "I like you if..." or "I'll be friendly to you if." It's just a kind of unconditional state of caring. It doesn't expect anything particular back. But affection with attachment is looking for something back. You hear this all the time in pop music—it's hard to miss. "I love you, I want you, I need you. I'll die if I don't have you." It can't really be true love if there's a demand attached to it. It's the near enemy of attached affection.

With a difficult person, especially, of course the far enemy tends to come in, and then you have to find ways to make space for that. Sometimes it's helpful to be creative with the difficult person. One person said that they could do loving kindness for the difficult person only if they imagined them bound and gagged, so they couldn't talk back. Somebody was doing loving kindness for the difficult person on a retreat up here and they said they could only do it if they imagined them as far away as Woodacre. They couldn't bring them in the room, but if they were far enough away, then they could do it. So it's okay to get creative in that way.

The neutral person is actually a really interesting one because it's kind of the turning point of the metta practice. It's the place where we start to open up not based on self-interest. Self, benefactor, friend can all be based on self-interest, but the neutral person we really don't care about. That's why they're the neutral person.

And what's our tendency with someone we really don't care about? We ignore them. With someone we like, we tend to develop greed. With someone we don't like, we develop aversion. And with somebody we don't care about, we develop delusion. So these are the three main distortions of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. With the neutral person, it's delusion. We just kind of write them out of our lives. They don't matter because they're not important to me, to my satisfaction.

So when we start to look on the neutral person and find we can care about them—in spiritual terms, this is a big deal. This is really opening up to the possibility of a boundless compassion, a boundless caring. And that's what makes it possible then for us to go into all beings, because the neutral person is kind of like the representative of all beings. It's kind of the generic being in the universe. And if you can care for the generic being, you're there, basically. You can care for any generic being.

It's very interesting to develop this meditation on the neutral person because most people who do find that they actually fall a little bit in love with their neutral person. There was a fellow who did a day-long with me a few years ago who picked a supermarket cashier for their neutral person. And he said he worked with that neutral person for about a year. Then he came back and told me that he started to get nervous every time he went into the supermarket because he developed a secret love for the person. And every time he got around her, he got a little bit fluttery like she was going to find out that she was his secret love.

So this is really cool, that we can care that much about people that we don't know and who don't trigger us in any particular way. That's what opens it up to the possibility of all beings.

I'd like to read just a little bit from the Metta Sutta. This is one of the main texts from the Sutta Nipata on the theme of loving kindness, where the Buddha said:

"Wishing in gladness and in safety, may all beings be at ease. Whatever living beings there may be—the seen and the unseen, near and far away, those born and to be born—may all beings be at ease. Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world. Freed from hatred and ill will, one should sustain this recollection. This is said to be the sublime abiding."

So that's a really beautiful and inspiring vision, I think—that we can sustain this recollection of a really unconditional care for all beings everywhere. But it doesn't come particularly easily. It's one of those things that develops more and more through practice. But this is the potential, this is the direction of the practice of loving-kindness.

So I think we'll stop there with the talk and ask if you have any comments, questions, or experiences you'd like to share—anything to clarify.

Question: How can you tell if you're in the near enemy?

This is an excellent question. How do you tell if you're in the near enemy as opposed to authentic metta? One way I discern this is by examining whether the emphasis is on me or on the other person. When we're in the near enemy, the focus is really on what I need from them.

Sometimes we may not actually know it at the time. If there's a hidden link back, if there's a condition on the affection, we might not recognize it immediately. So sometimes in the middle of it, it's not possible to tell. You have to track it over time and see. I think it's a question of tuning into to what extent the relationship is gratifying me, or whether there are demands that aren't being met. That definitely tends to highlight the quality—or whether the focus is really on their well-being or not.

You could also imagine different situations. I have to be honest: intimate relationships always have this quality of need, as far as I can tell. If you're with your partner, you could say, "Well, if they were happier with somebody else, good for them." But we aren't actually going to feel that way. So it's important not to be too idealistic about this.

Realize that relationships with intimate partners are going to have a lot of the near enemy. It's probably a big part of what motivated us to get involved in them. These relationships tend to clarify fairly slowly over the whole course of spiritual practice. So don't set out to make a project of clarifying the impurities out of your intimate relationship—that's a lifelong practice. Just be accepting that we got into those relationships out of need. And even if our needs went away, hopefully we'd stay out of compassion. But the point at which our needs will go away is some way in the future. So don't get impatient about that or judgmental about that.

Question about difficult emotions arising during metta practice

Yes, one of the main ways I think metta practice works is through purification of heart. When we undertake this practice and keep turning the mind to the wholesome—to love or compassion or joy or equanimity—it actually tends to evoke the opposite from our being. There's some way in which when we set our direction toward wholesomeness, everything of the other nature pops up.

When it pops up, there's the possibility of transforming it through holding it in love, holding it with compassion, and seeing it clearly with awareness. When those things are buried and don't pop up, we don't have any possibility of releasing or transforming them. So the metta practice is particularly beneficial because it evokes the difficult states so readily. When they're evoked, we can work with them.

At the same time, it's growing the wholesome. Through these seeds we're planting, the wholesome is growing up, and the wholesome is part of what does the work of purifying the difficult.

I think what I'd like to do is close with loving-kindness meditation, but we've been sitting for a long time. Maybe before we close, could you lead us in about five minutes of stretches? That would be great—just to get a little juice in the body.

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of mettā (loving-kindness) practice using the traditional metaphor of cascading pools from the ancient suttas. He explains how mettā naturally flows from ourselves to benefactors, friends, neutral persons, difficult people, and finally to all beings - though he notes that for Western practitioners, the sequence often works differently, with self-mettā being the most challenging.
> Armstrong discusses mettā as both a healing practice and the antidote to aversion in all its forms - anger, fear, criticism, and depression. He explains how mettā differs from vipassanā in working with conditioning: while vipassanā reveals vast emptiness through mindfulness, mettā fills that space with warmth and creates new wholesome conditioning. He addresses the near and far enemies of loving-kindness, offers practical guidance for working with difficult emotions that arise during practice, and emphasizes that acceptance itself is a form of mettā.
> Drawing from the Metta Sutta, Armstrong presents the Buddha's vision of boundless loving-kindness extending to all beings everywhere. He concludes by exploring how mettā practice works as purification, evoking difficult states so they can be transformed through the growing wholesome qualities of love and compassion.

Throughout the day today, we've been using different individuals to develop loving-kindness with, and the thinking behind this comes from an image in the ancient texts, in the suttas, which is the image of cascading pools.

The idea is that if there's a river running down a mountain slope and there's a big rainstorm on the top, the river will start to fill up at the top. As it gets to one pool, that pool will fill up, and as the rain keeps coming down, it will overflow. When that pool overflows, it will run further down the mountainside and come to the next pool. Then that will fill up, overflow, and run down to the next pool. This is the image of the cascading pools.

The reason it's an analogy for the mettā practice is that it's considered classically that it's easiest to develop loving-kindness with ourselves. So we let that pool fill up, and then we let it run down to the next pool, which is our benefactor. Then as that one fills up, we let it overflow and run to the next, which is a good friend. Then it fills up and spills over to a neutral person, then to a difficult person, and then to all beings.

There's actually a logic to this sequence of the way we develop the mettā practice. We start closest to home, extend to those we naturally feel affection for, those we're neutral toward, those we have difficulty with, and then we can extend to all beings.

Often for us in the West, it doesn't work quite in this logical order. Many people find that doing mettā for ourselves is actually the most difficult, and that it's very helpful to have someone like a benefactor or a friend where it's easy, because you can let that pool fill up and then come back to yourself and let it spill over to you.

Check this order out for yourself, but know that this is the principle of mettā: we develop it where it's easiest. This is actually quite refreshing after vipassanā, where it seems like everything develops in the most difficult way possible. But in mettā, it's intended to develop in the easiest way possible.

If the easiest access for you is through yourself, that's where you should spend most of your time. If it's easier for you going in through a benefactor or a friend, spend a lot of time there and then bring that mettā back to yourself.

The mettā coming back to oneself is really key. As we said at the beginning of the day, if we love ourselves, then we don't harm others. Everything starts inside. If there's love here, it's so easy to share it outward. But often the love for ourselves is the most difficult part to touch, and so we need to borrow from other sources. We also need to be really persistent.

It's a process of training the heart. Like every other part of us, the heart is trainable. It can learn to love. We can learn to love—it's part of our nature. We just need to bring it out. By and large, we've never been taught how to do it. Our culture doesn't provide us the guidelines. Our parents don't provide us the guidelines. Typically religions have not provided us the guidelines. But there are practices such as this that are proven to bring it forth. We just need to do the work.

When we develop mettā for ourselves, we find that mettā has a range of flavors. Just like there are a range of people that we can extend it to, it comes in a range of flavors or degrees.

When mettā is really strong, we feel this strong sense of unity, of oneness, of integration that is a characteristic of love—of deep, true love. When it's a little toned down from there, we feel a warmth or a friendliness toward others. When it's a little toned down from there, mettā takes on the quality of acceptance. We may not be crazy about ourselves or the other person, but there's a growing sense of it really being okay with us—how we are and how others are. So just that spirit of acceptance itself is mettā too.

One of the phrases people sometimes like to substitute is an acceptance kind of phrase. You'll be going through a hard patch in practice and you'll be saying a phrase like "may I abide in happiness," and you just go, "That's out to lunch. Happiness? Not in this lifetime. I don't think so."

When the phrases start feeling that remote or disconnected, bring it back to earth. Acceptance is a really good way to do it. So instead of "may I be happy," you might say something like "may I accept myself just as I am." That is also the flavor of mettā. Acceptance is an important aspect. Some people like to phrase this: "May I love and accept myself just as I am."

This is a nice way to make it a little more approachable for ourselves.

Metta is a powerful healing practice. It is essentially the healing practice in our tradition. So where there's a sense of incompleteness in our relationship to ourselves, from earlier wounding, from a strong sense of unworthiness, something like that, metta is the recommended approach.

And you can stay with metta for yourself for a long, long time. Sometimes people connect with the practice and they just intuitively feel it's right to keep coming back to themselves. There's just a sense that there hasn't been enough care for oneself. And so there's a need to replenish the tank. So if you feel like that, you can just pour that metta into yourself for a long, long time. It's absolutely fine. You don't need to bring in other people in the beginning. One meditator worked with themselves for three years with metta before they felt ready to bring in anyone else. And if that's the case, that's absolutely fine.

Also be really open to what works, to bringing out the quality of metta. One meditator found that there wasn't really a good connection with any beings, so she used a stuffed animal that she actually had brought on the retreat with her and that was on her bed. Other people like to use pets because we can really open to their vulnerability and to their innocence. The important thing is the quality of the loving-kindness. The person that awakens it is not as important.

It seems kind of funny. When we start the metta practice, the emphasis appears to be on my benefactor or my friend or my neutral person. But from the point of view of practice, the important emphasis is on the feeling tone and the connection and the caring. It really doesn't matter what we use to get it going. The fact is, once it's going, it changes our relationship to the whole world. If your heart is full of metta, you see everybody from that space of metta. The whole world looks different from a place of metta. So we don't really care how we get there. The important thing is to start drawing it out, strengthening that sense of caring and connection, and little by little that flame grows.

When we first touch it, it seems like something insignificant. It seems like, "Yeah, okay, I can care about my friend, so what?" It doesn't seem like it's going to go anywhere. And often because of that, we don't keep planting the seeds. We just think, "Oh, that was a nice little thing." Or we feel a moment's peace from our meditation, and we think, "Oh, that was nice, but it was no big deal."

What we don't see is that it's a radically different approach than we normally live from, and it's subtle in the beginning. Actually, the really wholesome mind states are hard to appreciate at first because their vibration is more subtle than the strong reactive mind states. If we get into a good bit of fear or anger or self-judgment, it has a lot of pop. We can really tell something's happening. We were having a discussion yesterday with some veteran practitioners who said that the difficult mind states sometimes give me a greater sense of vitality. I have a sense of being alive when I'm really coping with fear or desire or anger.

The beautiful mind states have a subtler kind of vibration, so they don't come up and knock you over the head immediately. But that subtle vibration can get stronger and stronger over time. And loving kindness is definitely like that. The first time we feel the sense of connection, we may feel it's no big deal, but we don't realize the potential that's there when we grow it. So may we not give up planting the seeds.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, thinking this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." This is a nice image because in Asia, rainwater is usually collected in these large earthenware jars that are about three feet tall and two and a half feet across. And when I was a monk, I had one of these at the base of my hut. The rainwater would fall down into a gutter, and the gutter would channel the rainwater into this jar. So storm by storm in the rainy season, my jar got filled to a very, very big height. If you put any container out during one of our Marin winter storms, little by little, drop by drop, it fills up.

So it's this way with loving-kindness. Each drop doesn't feel like much. It feels like something we could write off. But please begin in your practice to tune into how it feels. Tune into that quality of connection, whether it's strong or weak, because that's what is going to grow and become as big as love can be. It can be huge. You meet somebody like the Dalai Lama and you realize how big the force of love can get. And it all comes from one drop after another.

As you notice what each one feels like, then it gets easier and easier to put the mind back in that place. You're creating actually a channel to that quality of connectedness and affection and caring each time you activate loving-kindness in yourself. And then you can start to see it manifest. You can start to see it ripple through your life. And you know it's happening when your friends or partner tells you that something's changing. You can really count on it.

But the Dalai Lama to me is always an inspiring example. He was here, as I said, a year ago. And because he's the head of a state in exile, the U.S. State Department provides security for him wherever he goes. So while he was on the land teaching for a couple of days last year, everybody who came in to see him had to go through a metal detector. The people who were staying up in the residence halls had to evacuate their rooms at about seven in the morning so that the Secret Service could search and send dogs in to sniff for explosives.

The security guards, when we passed through the metal detector, were heavy duty. They had a gun on one side and a nightstick on the other. They were strong, professional—like professional bodyguards hired by the State Department. You didn't joke around with these people.

At the end of the conference, every one of them wanted to have their photograph taken with the Dalai Lama because he had so touched their hearts just in his coming and going. They all got together for a group photograph. Now would they have done that for Bruce Springsteen? Maybe. Bill Clinton? I don't know. So this quality of love has such a potential to reach out and touch others and to invite them into the way, into awakening.

I also want to talk a little bit about how metta and vipassana work differently with our conditioning. I mentioned that metta is a very strong healing practice. The way that it works is as the sense of friendliness or warmth grows, it's not that we get rid of our stuff—our psychic stuff, our reactive mind of wanting and anger and impatience and self-judgment. But more and more, it all starts being held in the space of acceptance and friendliness.

One of the qualities of love is it's tremendously integrating. Love joins things together. And when love starts to awaken in the psyche, it pulls the psyche together. So those parts of ourselves that we couldn't accept before—we just thought, "This is not good enough. If I allow myself to really feel my fear or my anger or my incompleteness or my sense of abandonment, I'm not a good enough person." Often we take these difficult emotions as invalidating us in some way.

But when love is present in the mind, we can look at those things and we can go, "Oh, that's okay. That's just a part of being human. We all have the whole package. We all have all those feelings." And love makes it all acceptable. It brings it all together under the light of acceptance. So there's this very deep unification and healing that takes place through the metta.

The other thing that happens with metta is that positive states of mind—the brahmaviharas for shorthand: love, compassion, joy and equanimity—are starting to really take root and flower in the mind. These are real alternatives to our habitual reactions. The mind finds a new home in these positive states.

My experience was that this was a little different from vipassana. The wholesome qualities that vipassana activates are more neutral in tone. Mindfulness, for example. Awareness is extremely powerful—I'd say it may be the most powerful factor on the whole path—but it's very neutral in its quality. It's like clear water. It doesn't have a property of its own. It doesn't have a coloring of its own, because it can go with everything. You can put clear water with rocks, with soup, with sugar, with anything. Mindfulness goes with anything, so it doesn't stand out.

What I found with many years of vipassana practice was my dominant mental tendency in the beginning was fear. If my mind went off balance, it would go to fear or anxiety. And over years and years, that got smaller and smaller and smaller with the influence of mindfulness.

But still, if I went somewhere, I would tend into fear. That was the conditioning. The Vipassana, through its great spaciousness, kind of reduces the conditioning. But on the emotional level, it doesn't necessarily put anything in its place. The Brahma Viharas, though, do. And after I'd been doing metta practice for a while, I found that instead of leaning into fear, my mind would lean into metta. That's the sort of new home that it found.

So what I found is that I was generating a new kind of conditioning, a wholesome conditioning, that my mind could find a home in that was different from my conditioned reactions. The way I kind of sum it up to myself is that Vipassana reveals this vast emptiness and loving kindness fills it with warmth. So the two practices are actually very supportive. As Vipassana empties the mind, the space is there for the metta to come through, to really be felt and to really color our whole world. And as the metta comes through more and more, we're more inclined to let go of the reactive patterns. And it's the letting go that opens us up into the emptiness. So these two sides are very complementary. They really both develop one another and offer alternative ways of working with our conditioning. Both are really helpful.

Metta is also, because of its quality of friendliness, the antidote to aversion. And aversion has many forms. You probably know that in Buddhist psychology, people are sometimes talked about as one of three types: a type dominated by greed or wanting, a type dominated by aversion or negativity, or a type dominated by delusion or confusion. These are the three ways that psychology classifies us from a Buddhist point of view. It's just to understand that we all have all three of these. It's just whichever one happens to be predominant in our makeup. It's not that we get rid of the other two or don't have the other two.

So in someone who is particularly prone to aversion, it usually expresses itself in anger, critical mind, judgment of others, judgment of ourselves, irritability, or fear. Those are all different manifestations. I would also probably include depression in the list of aversive reactions. So because metta has this quality of affection, warmth, and friendliness, it undoes aversion. The mind cannot be in a space of metta and negativity at the same time. So for people whose personalities are governed by aversion, metta is the traditional antidote. It is the practice that undoes or counterbalances the tendency to negativity. So that's why for me, with the fear temperament, it was such a good fit.

When I discovered the metta practice, I got into it big time for about two years. I'd been doing Vipassana practice for probably fifteen or sixteen years at that point when I did my first metta retreat. And I was so taken with the metta, I basically didn't do any Vipassana for the next year and a half. Everything I did in retreat and in daily life was metta.

Sharon Salzberg used to tell stories about when she was getting into metta. She was practicing with Upandita, who is this very fierce Burmese master. And every time she'd go to sit a retreat with him, he would want her to sit Vipassana. And she was also really getting into the metta practice and would say, "But I'd like to sit in metta this retreat." He'd say, "Okay, okay, you're sitting for three months, you can do two weeks of metta, the rest Vipassana." She'd say, "How about two months of metta?" He'd say, "No, maybe one month." She'd say, "Okay, six weeks, done." So they'd negotiate and she'd get a little more metta than he had first thought.

So I think as you go through your spiritual path, and I'm assuming most of you are also doing some Vipassana practice or will be doing some Vipassana practice, find your own balance between the two. If you feel really drawn to the metta practice, it can be your primary practice or exclusive practice for some time. That's absolutely fine.

In the long run, you want to incorporate it with Vipassana because Vipassana is the practice that liberates. In our tradition, the wisdom practice is Vipassana, and it's wisdom that frees us in the end. Opening the heart can go a certain way, but without the clear seeing into the nature of things, there's no lasting freedom. So at some point, the Vipassana practice needs to come in for your spiritual path to be complete, or something equivalent, some equivalent wisdom practice.

But you can kind of find your own schedule with it. You can do it at your own pace. In your daily life, you might like to do some metta every day and some Vipassana every day. You do ten or fifteen minutes of metta and the rest of the sitting Vipassana as you like. So feel your own way and see what your own intuition leads you to. See where you feel drawn and follow that.

Trust that. Trust your own sense of what is right for you at this time.

It's interesting—Ajahn Sumedho was here about a month ago. He gave a nine-day public retreat, and then a five-day retreat for the Spirit Rock teachers. I happened to sit in both of them, the first time I'd sat a long retreat with him. He was a very impressive and inspiring teacher.

One of the things he commented on, looking over the whole spectrum of meditators he's seen—and he's seen a lot—he said the main thing he thinks is that people need to trust themselves more. There needs to be more trust in our own wisdom. I thought that was a really interesting comment. He basically said we know more than we give ourselves credit for knowing. So we're often looking to an outside authority for the answer, but we need to start trusting in our own seeing.

He also said something beautiful about good qualities. At the start of a metta session, we're instructed to reflect on our good qualities. Sometimes those are hard to find, especially when we've been sitting for three hours and feeling a little lonely because of the silence. It's hard to connect with those good qualities.

So he said something I found really refreshing. He said, "I thought about when I was a child, and I realized that I always wanted to be a good child. And I've always loved what was noble and beautiful in life." I thought, you know, I bet that's true of most of us. In the spiritual scene, most people who come here have very good intentions. You wouldn't sit through the discomfort if you didn't. But sometimes we lose sight of the fact that in the general scheme of things, we're basically pretty good people.

Generally, we do care about others. We could do a poll—I bet a good part of this room is involved in service work as livelihood, or does volunteer work of one kind or another, and generally has a sense of coming from a place of caring about the world, caring about the environment, caring about creatures. So in the general scheme of things, that makes us pretty good people. It's not to puff up about that, but just to take it as our intentions are basically good and we can trust in that. Maybe reflecting back to your childhood will be a way into that for you too. We tend to be way too critical of ourselves.

As the pools cascade and we come into relation with the benefactor, this can be another really powerful part of practice. There's a tradition in one school of Buddhism called "union with the teacher"—it's called guru yoga, actually—where we meditate a lot on our teacher. In that tradition, the teacher is usually the benefactor. The point of that meditation is not worship. It's not like putting them way up on a pedestal. It's to realize that their wisdom mind and our wisdom mind are one and the same. So if they can be free, we can be free. It's actually coming to an understanding of our basic nature being the same as the Buddha's, already being awake in our basic nature. And it actually increases our self-confidence.

So when you pick a benefactor, if you pick somebody who's got a lot of wisdom, a lot of love, a lot of understanding, as you hang out with them in doing the metta practice, you're going to soak all those things up. You're actually sort of practicing union with the teacher, if your benefactor is that caliber of being.

I had some very strong, almost ecstatic moments in doing the meditation on the benefactor when I did the intensive metta. I was practicing with the benefactor actually for three weeks of the six-week retreat, and got very familiar with them. It really deepened my connection with them, but it also deepened my trust in my own wisdom mind. Because how could I recognize their wisdom except from my wisdom? How could I recognize their love except insofar as it touched my love?

So picking a benefactor who has those qualities is a really good way to bring them out in yourself. That's why some people like to use, even if they don't know them personally, the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh or somebody of that stature, like the Karmapa. I don't know if you've tuned into the Karmapa. He's a seventeen-year-old who just escaped from Tibet into India. It was quite a big international news story when he did it. He's tall, he's young, he's very good looking. I think he's going to be incredibly charismatic. And his predecessor was an amazing yogi, the last Karmapa who died in the early eighties—I think it was the 16th Karmapa. He's the head of one of the schools of Tibetan Buddhism.

When he was dying, he was in a Chicago hospital. His followers were looking after him and were very concerned about his passing. But every time they came into the room to check on how he was doing, he would sit up and ask them, "Oh, how are you doing?" and have this big smile. But after a while, he could tell they were really worried about him. He didn't want to see them worried, so he told them, "Oh, don't worry. Nothing happens when I die. Nothing happens."

What an incredible place of freedom to see one's death even as "nothing happens." That kind of a mind has really transcended birth and death. That kind of a mind has found a freedom beyond any kind of change. It's awesome and inspiring. So taking someone like that, even if you haven't met them, can be a beautiful way to start opening our own hearts and minds.

What we're trying to do in developing the metta moment after moment, based on these different beings, is basically to try and stabilize the heart in that quality of friendship. Just like in vipassana practice we practice mindfulness moment after moment—what we're really aiming at is stabilizing ourselves in a state of awareness. So in metta, we're aiming to stabilize the heart in the quality of loving-kindness or friendship.

This stability actually becomes more important than the changing events of life. It gives the mind greater strength and greater steadiness as it becomes more rooted, more of a home in our being. It's really supported by the factor of concentration. I think I mentioned earlier that metta is a concentration practice.

You may have noticed when the metta practice is going well—I mean, take a look at what's happening in your mind when you sustain the metta practice even for a short time. It's pretty amazing. You've pulled up an image of, let's say, your benefactor, which is a positive image for you. You have developed a quality of caring or connection or friendship through the metta. And the phrases that are going through your thoughts are very wholesome phrases about wishing the other person safety, happiness, and health.

What makes up our mind stream at any moment in time? Isn't it basically images, emotions, and thoughts? Is there anything else there? That's pretty much it, isn't it? So when the metta practice is going well, you've taken control of your entire mind stream and set it in a very positive and wholesome direction. Even if that doesn't last very long, that's an extraordinary thing to do.

How many moments in a waking day of daily life are we in charge of our images, emotions, and thoughts? Not very many. And so when we're not in charge of them, often they're in charge of us. Often we're invaded by unwholesome tendencies of reactivity, thoughts of anxiety, images of what might happen next week.

This is a very—I would say quite an audacious undertaking, the metta practice. And that's why you shouldn't be discouraged if they don't all come together at one time for you. This is a big deal, pulling all three of these together. So sometimes maybe just the image will be there. Sometimes just the emotion. Sometimes just the phrase. Maybe two will be there. And then sometimes when all three are really there together, that's kind of like a peak experience in life.

But as the concentration grows, we find more and more the ability to hold all three of these at the same time and to stabilize that kind of experience. And that's a very, very wholesome direction to put into the mind stream.

What we want to come to in the long run—the vipassana developing the awareness and the loving-kindness developing the warmth—is a fusing of the two. We want to develop a mind that is here and now, is really awake and aware, but is filled with warmth. Or a way that I kind of like to remind myself about it is, we're really developing a warm attention. To bring the quality of warmth into our mindfulness practice and to bring the quality of present moment attention steadily into our loving-kindness practice.

When we come to the friend, often for many people this is the easiest. A lot of people in the West don't really have a benefactor. It wasn't part of our growing up often. And so the friend is often the easiest person for us to connect to. But one of the things you might find is that the relationship with the friend can slide into what are called the near and far enemies of loving-kindness. And every one of the Brahmaviharas has both a near and a far enemy.

The near enemy is a feeling that looks like the Brahma vihara but is actually an unwholesome state of mind. The far enemy is the exact opposite, so it's definitely unwholesome.

With metta, the near enemy is affection with attachment—a clingy or grasping kind of love. The far enemy is anger or ill will.

With friends, we often encounter both the near and far enemies. We find that, yes, we like them, but we want something back. And if they don't give it to us, then it can slide into ill will or anger. So especially with friends, start tuning into the tendency of our mind to slide into the near and far enemies.

One of the qualities of metta is that it doesn't come with strings attached. We don't say, "I like you if," or "I'll be friendly to you if." It's just a kind of unconditional state of caring that doesn't expect anything particular back. But affection with attachment is looking for something back. You hear this all the time in pop music—it's hard to miss. "I love you, I want you, I need you. I'll die if I don't have you." It can't really be true love if there's a demand attached to it. It's the near enemy of attached affection.

With a difficult person especially, of course, the far enemy tends to come in, and then you have to find ways to make space for that. Sometimes it's helpful to be creative with the difficult person. One person said that they could do loving-kindness for the difficult person only if they imagined them bound and gagged, so they couldn't talk back. Somebody was doing loving-kindness for the difficult person on a retreat up here, and they said they could only do it if they imagined them as far away as Woodacre. They couldn't bring them in the room, but if they were far enough away, then they could do it. So it's okay to get creative in that way.

The neutral person is actually a really interesting one because it's kind of the turning point of the metta practice. It's the place where we start to open up not based on self-interest. Self, benefactor, friend can all be about self-interest. But the neutral person we really don't care about. That's why they're the neutral person. And what's our tendency with someone we really don't care about? We ignore them.

With someone we like, we tend to develop greed. With someone we don't like, we develop aversion. And with somebody we don't care about, we develop delusion. So these are the three main distortions of mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. With the neutral person, it's delusion. We just kind of write them out of our lives. They don't matter because they're not important to me, to my satisfaction.

So when we start to look on the neutral person and find we can care about them, this in spiritual terms is a big deal. This is really opening up to the possibility of boundless compassion, boundless caring. And that's what makes it possible then for us to go into all beings. Because a neutral person is kind of like the representative of all beings. It's kind of the generic being in the universe. And if you can care for the generic being, you're there, basically. You can care for any generic being.

It's very interesting to develop this meditation on the neutral person because most people who do find that they actually fall a little bit in love with their neutral person. There was a fellow who did a day-long with me a few years ago who picked a supermarket cashier for his neutral person. He said he worked with that neutral person for about a year. Then he came back and told me that he started to get nervous every time he went into the supermarket because he developed a secret love for the person. Every time he got around her, he got a little bit fluttery like she was going to find out that she was his secret love.

So this is really cool that we can care that much about people that we don't know and who don't trigger us in any particular way. That's what opens it up to the possibility of all beings.

I'd like to read just a little bit from the Metta Sutta. This is one of the main texts from the Sutta Nipata on the theme of loving-kindness, where the Buddha said:

"Wishing in gladness and in safety, may all beings be at ease. Whatever living beings there may be, the seen and the unseen, near and far away, those born and to be born, may all beings be at ease. Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world. Freed from hatred and ill will, one should sustain this recollection."

This is said to be the sublime abiding.

So that's a really beautiful and inspiring vision—that we can sustain this recollection of a truly unconditional care for all beings everywhere. But it doesn't come particularly easily. It's one of those things that develops more and more through practice. Yet this is the potential, this is the direction of the practice of loving-kindness.

So I think we'll stop there with the talk and ask if you have any comments, questions, or experiences you'd like to share—anything to clarify.

"How do you tell if you are in the near enemy?"

Good question. Let's just take metta to keep it simple. One way that I approach this is to examine whether the emphasis is on me or on the other person. When we are in the near enemy, the focus is really on what I need from them.

Sometimes we may not actually know it at the time. If there's a hidden link back, if there's a condition on the affection, we might not recognize it right away. So sometimes in the middle of it, it's not possible to tell. Then you kind of have to track it over time and see.

I think it's a question of tuning into the extent to which the relationship is gratifying me, or whether there are demands that aren't being met. That definitely tends to highlight the quality—or whether the focus is really on their well-being or not.

You could also imagine some different situations. I have to be honest: intimate relationships always have this quality of need, as far as I can tell. If you're with your partner, you could say, "Well, if they were happier with somebody else, good for them." But we aren't actually going to feel that way.

So it's important not to be too idealistic about it. Realize that relationships with intimate partners are going to have a lot of the near enemy, and it's probably a big part of what motivated us to get involved in them. I think they tend to clarify fairly slowly over the whole course of spiritual practice.

So not to set out to make a project of clarifying the impurities out of one's intimate relationship, because I think that's a lifelong practice. Just be accepting that we got into those relationships out of need. Even if our needs went away, hopefully we'd stay with it out of compassion. But the point at which our needs will go away is some way in the future. So not to get impatient about that or judgmental about that.

Any other questions?

"Could you say some more about metta practice as purification?"

Yes. One of the main ways I think metta practice works or is helpful is as a purification of heart. Basically what it means is that when we undertake this practice and we keep turning the mind to the wholesome—to love or compassion or joy or equanimity—it actually tends to evoke out of our being the opposite.

There's some way in which I'm going to set my direction this way, and something in us says, "Oh, no, you're not." And anything that's of the other nature pops up.

So when it pops up, there's the possibility of transforming it through holding it in love, holding it with compassion, and seeing it clearly with awareness. When those things are buried and don't pop up, we don't have any possibility of releasing or transforming them.

The metta practice is particularly good because it evokes the difficult states so easily. When they're evoked, we can work with them. At the same time, it's growing the wholesome. All the time, through these seeds that we're planting, the wholesome is growing up, and the wholesome is part of what does the work of purification of the difficult.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 230

The Power of Mettā

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores mettā (loving-kindness) as one of the two essential wings of spiritual development, alongside vipassanā wisdom practice. Drawing from his experience at Insight Meditation Society and encounters with Asian masters, he explains how mettā practice opens the heart qualities that may not develop spontaneously through insight meditation alone.

Armstrong introduces the four brahmavihāras (divine abidings) - mettā, karuṇā (compassion), muditā (sympathetic joy), and upekkhā (equanimity) - showing how loving-kindness forms the foundation for all heart practices. He addresses common challenges practitioners face, including the initial sense of artificiality and periods of dryness, while offering detailed guidance on technique: starting from silence, connecting with the heart center, generating clear images, and allowing phrases to carry genuine wishes for well-being.

The talk emphasizes that mettā is fundamentally about planting seeds of caring rather than controlling outcomes, comparing the practice to the gradual filling of a water jar through accumulated raindrops. Armstrong explains how this practice naturally brings up whatever needs purification in the heart, making it a powerful healing modality that teaches us to 'reteach a thing its loveliness' - both for ourselves and all beings.

When we start a retreat, vipassana or metta, we often ask people on the first evening to reflect why they came, what they are doing here, because we feel that point of motivation is so important to how they guide themselves during the retreat.

That question came back in a lot of the interviews this morning, but framed a little differently. It was: what am I doing here? And what's this practice about? Where are we going? So what I wanted to do in the talk tonight was to try to answer this question of what we're doing here and talk a little about the mechanics of the metta practice—how it works, how it's meant to work, and what it does for us.

It's often said in the Buddhist tradition that a bird needs two wings to fly and our spiritual life really needs two wings to take off. These wings are called the wings of wisdom and compassion. In our tradition, the wisdom practice is said to be the vipassana practice, the insight practice that reveals the deepest kinds of freedom that are available. The other wing—you could call it compassion, you could call it loving kindness, you could call it the wing of the heart—is represented in our tradition by the metta practice. It's a practice that's designed to open up the heart qualities within us and bring them to flowering so that they can enrich our lives and the lives of the people that we touch, that we meet.

One of my early vipassana teachers—I asked him about the development of love in practice and he said, "Oh, very simple. Love is the child of freedom." The implication was just develop your vipassana practice and as the freedom grows, the love will come spontaneously. And there is a certain truth to that. Love does flower with more freedom.

But in my observation, it's not always that simple for people. And it wasn't that simple for me. My observation is that people who have a pretty emotional temperament tend to develop a lot of emotional openness through doing the vipassana practice. But people who are a little more cerebral or maybe people whose temperament tends to be aversive can really benefit—both of those describe me—can really benefit from the introduction, the addition of the loving-kindness practice. In my experience of vipassana and metta, it has been the most transformative for my own heart qualities.

I had another illustration of this. I was on staff at a retreat center in Massachusetts, Insight Meditation Society, in the late seventies. We had a visit from a very famous Asian master. We'd been preparing for months to receive this monk and four other monks who were traveling with him. It was a big deal for us. First time really that we'd had Asian leaders coming to the retreat centers in the West. Working on staff, we put a lot of preparation into it. We got to go to the airport to meet them and pick them up.

So we drove to the airport, Boston Airport, walked to the gate where the monk was supposed to arrive on the flight. You know how it is watching a plane arrive. A hundred people, a hundred and fifty people must have gotten off that flight. Couldn't see any monks. And it's not easy to miss those guys. Shaved heads and the orange robes. You're going to spot them. And no monks.

So finally, everybody came off the plane. We thought, well, maybe he missed his connection in Bangkok or something. But very slowly, very mindfully out of the gate came walking the head monk. Just another mindfulness day for him and the four other monks behind him. Each was carrying a fan, which is a teaching device in Asia. Often dharma talks are given with a fan in front of the speaker's face. The idea is that you should pay attention to the words and the dharma and not the personality delivering them. So it's a way to deflect the sort of personality cult that can develop.

Each of them was carrying a fan, and it was embroidered with the name of the monk. And then it said, "World Tour 1979." So it's not part of the monk standard issue, but it had obviously been provided by loyal supporters who wanted to wish him well on his trip.

So we took them home with us and had them in the center for a little over two weeks. Being on staff, I got to be with them behind the scenes and also I got to sit a part of the retreat that they led. They were very impressive individuals. Most of them had been monks since they were boys, probably eight or ten years old as novices and then took full ordination when they reached adulthood. I really felt a tremendous power of purity from their presence. They weren't looking for anything from us. They already had their return ticket, so that was covered. They didn't really care if we liked them or not. They didn't tell stories from their second grade schooling experiences or read Mary Oliver poems. It was very straight, straight dharma teaching. And I was very moved by the power of their words and that aspect of the transmission.

And in observing this head monk for two weeks, behind the scenes and in a group, I never once saw him smile or laugh or give any hint of joy. And I thought, hmm, is this the fulfillment of the spiritual life? Is this the fulfillment of the path that I want to go down? And for me, it was not an inspiration, that aspect of their being.

Another friend commented that this monk's metta was like starlight. It was there, it was pure, but it was rather distant.

So I've come to feel that for a lot of us, the opening of the heart really doesn't happen all by itself. It needs the extra support, the extra attention, and the kind of extra prompting that the practice of loving-kindness can give.

And I think this monk wasn't suffering. He was very cooled out, very equanimous. It's not necessary to have this juicy kind of heart quality to be peaceful. But my observation is that we touch other people more directly through the heart qualities that we manifest. And so I think of this almost as a bodhisattva practice—that we like to light up our own heart in order to touch other people in the world. And maybe as a gift for the world to share that part of our being as it wakes up.

So one way that I think about it is that the vipassana practice, which is really the foundation that we all teach from, reveals the emptiness, the spaciousness, the equanimity of our being. And emptiness on its own can get a little cold. So the metta practice pervades it with warmth. And the two come together—they're slightly different tracks of practice, but they come together down the road in this building of a warm attention, this kind of warm present moment awareness that takes in the truth of life but can relate to it from a place of friendliness. And in my view, that's the kind of support that the metta practice can give to our vipassana practice.

One of my teachers said that what these practices do is that they bring juice into our lives. They're basically to juice up our practice and juice up our life. And juice here means the wet, fun, sweet stuff that's there in us. It means qualities of love and compassion and faith and devotion and joy. And all these qualities get activated by the practice of loving-kindness.

It's extraordinary when we meet someone who has developed these qualities to a great degree. And the person I often reflect on is the Dalai Lama who manifests this all the time. He was at a conference once and somebody asked him what his religion was—I guess they hadn't read the program notes very clearly. And he replied without any kind of irony: "My religion is kindness." And he said that many, many times.

He was at a conference here. He was actually in this room a little over a year ago with 220 Asian and Western teachers. And Sylvia and Sally and I all had the chance to sit in with him for a couple of days and meet with him. And he said it to us too. We were talking with him about how to transmit the Dharma in the West. And he said, "I'm not interested in propagating Buddhism. I'm interested in propagating human values"—which is basically kindness, the way that we can reach out and touch one another.

And it's very interesting to see how well he does that. Because at this conference, because he's the head of a state in exile, the U.S. State Department set up security here. So everyone who came to meet with him had to pass through security guards and metal detectors. And the people who were staying in the residences here had to evacuate their rooms at 7 in the morning so the guard dogs could run through and sniff for explosives and bombs and that kind of thing. So it was very serious stuff.

And let me tell you, the State Department security guards are not amateurs. They were manning the metal detectors with a pistol on one hip and a nightstick on the other. And if you tried to get a little too close, they very firmly stopped you—serious security professionals at this gathering.

At the end of the conference, all the security guards, who had no interest in Buddhism, asked if they could get their pictures taken with His Holiness. They all wanted to come together and hang out and just kind of bask in his glow because they felt what he had, the kind of heart quality that he had.

So metta is really just the introduction to the opening of the heart. And it's the first of these four states that in Pali are called the brahmaviharas. Brahma means heavenly. Vihara means home or abode. So we often translate this as the divine abidings. They are the beautiful states of consciousness that are available to us that really are a natural part of our being. They are metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

They are actually separate practices for each of the four, and we'll be working with all of them before the retreat is over. But in our tradition, we consider that metta is the foundation for the other three.

And loving kindness, as we've talked about, is simply a sincere caring about the welfare of a being, ourselves or another being. There's this kind of open-hearted friendliness that holds another person or holds ourselves and really cares about how it feels inside to be this person or that person. How's the mind? How's the body? How's the heart? How's the outer life going for you?

It's said that when this open heart of metta turns to someone who's in suffering, the response of that heart is compassion. In fact, compassion is defined as the quivering of the open heart in response to suffering. And suffering is said to be the proximate cause for compassion.

Then when that open heart looks on someone whose life is going well, who's having a lot of happiness, what comes forth is a happiness at their happiness, sometimes called sympathetic joy. It's like those strings on the sitar, the little strings that resonate in tune with the big strings up top. They're called the sympathetic strings of the sitar. They're what give the richness to the sound. So this third quality of joy is considered to be a sympathetic resonance with someone else's happiness. Your happiness makes me happy. I get a response of happiness when I look on your happiness. That's the third of the brahmaviharas.

And the quality of equanimity is the balance of mind that can hold this whole range of the joys and the sorrows of life without being so deeply disturbed by them.

So in this way, the four brahmaviharas kind of provide a map of the emotional life. And not only a map of the emotional life with all its ups and downs and the beauty and the terror of our human life, but they also point us to a wise response that's already within us. So instead of looking on suffering and becoming depressed, we can touch, we can open up that place in us of compassion, whether it's our suffering or another's. Instead of looking on somebody's happiness and feeling envious or jealous, we can discover that place in ourself that can be happy and share in their happiness. And then all of them get held within this balance of equanimity.

So metta is the foundation of these four brahmaviharas, and it's really a part of our true nature. It feels like a lot of work in the beginning. I see some heads nodding. And I know after two days of it, you know how much work it is. It often felt to me in the early days of my metta practice like I was just pushing this big boulder uphill all day long. I'd done quite a lot of vipassana practice and I was reasonably comfortable in sitting. But just going over the phrases again and again and again—oh, it wore me down. It really did. It was very hard work in the beginning.

It does get easier. And it seemed kind of contrived to me at first. I'm kind of a wisdom type, basically. And I thought, this stuff's kind of hokey. "Oh, may I be happy. May I be peaceful." Blah, blah, blah. It was for other people. It was not for me. I had a lot of skepticism about it.

But I put in my time and it started to make a difference. It started to make a shift for me. So even if in the beginning it feels a little bit artificial or a little contrived, if you're willing to hang in with it for a bit, in time the phrases really do start to evoke the quality of loving kindness, of caring. So hang in with it.

This is an intrinsic part of ourselves, but it just needs to be uncovered and uncaged. So the phrases are a way of bringing it out into the light. The Buddha said, "This mind is radiant and brightly shining, but it's colored by the attachments that visit it." And you've probably seen a lot of those attachments over the course of today. The restlessness, the sleepiness, the impatience, the frustration, the wanting to be somewhere else, the not wanting to be here. But when these clouds start to thin, then the loving kindness can start to show through in a purer and purer way.

The quality of metta is said to be unconditional.

And when I first heard this, I thought, "Boy, that's a really high bar. I don't know if I can jump quite that high. Unconditional love. Maybe Jesus or the Buddha, but not me."

But it actually doesn't mean unconditional in the sense that it never goes away. It means there aren't any strings attached to it. So when we look upon a friend or someone we don't know, we're willing to be friendly to them without asking for something back. That's all it means. We're willing to make the first step in friendliness.

Oftentimes in worldly life, friendship is kind of a bargain where I'll be friendly to you if you promise to be friendly to me. And this is friendship without bargaining. That's why it's unconditional. It's also different from romantic love in that way. Usually with romantic love, there's a lot of expectation about the return, or else the romantic love tends to crumble. I'm just waiting for a pop song—maybe the heavy metal bands will do this—whose lyrics go something like, "I love you, I need you, and I'll kill you if I can't have you." The essence of some kind of romantic love.

As we do this practice, we're connecting to ourselves and we're connecting to others. One of the questions that came up today was: Is this going to change something for the other person? As I send them my wishes of loving-kindness, can they feel it? Is it going to make a difference in their life?

Well, the texts say—the traditional texts say—that it can and does, but it depends on the power and purity of the sender and the clarity and purity of the receiver. So there are no guarantees in this business.

They actually did do an experiment, which I'm sure many of you have heard about, on patients who were recovering in a San Francisco hospital. They did it as a controlled experiment. Half the group was a control group and nothing happened for them. But for the experimental group of patients, they wrote their names out and gave them to Christian prayer groups in the city. They asked the prayer groups to say prayers for these patients. And the fifty percent who were prayed for had a statistically higher rate of recovery than those who weren't. Kind of interesting.

So it could well be that what we're doing does affect the other, does reach them and touch them and help them. But we might never know that. If you're doing it in order to make that happen, it might be unreliable. You might never know the effect.

But what we do know and can feel firsthand is that it really affects us. Sylvia talked last night about the eleven benefits of loving-kindness—the list that starts with "sleep easily, wake easily, and have pleasant dreams. People and angels love you." It's a nice list.

The Buddha said that the heart of loving-kindness, even if sustained just for a moment, brings really great blessings in our life. He said there are great blessings from worldly actions like generosity. Giving and expressing our caring for people through sharing what we have brings merit, brings wholesome results to our own life. But he said that the benefits of generosity and worldly actions are not one-sixteenth the benefit of a heart of loving-kindness.

So that's a very powerful force to awaken in our lives.

And somebody who manifests this a lot—this kind of benefit—is Ajahn Chah. He's a Thai master, about sixty-five now, a Thai forest master who was just here. He was here in the latter part of June. Ajahn Chah has done a lot of vipassana practice and a lot of metta practice. He's one of the happiest people I've ever met. He actually says that in the last twenty-five years he hasn't had any anger, which is astounding. And he's a teacher who can talk from the moment he sits on a platform in the morning until ten o'clock at night when everybody else is ready to go to bed. He can give Dharma talks all day long because he has that fantastic energy. And his favorite teaching—he doesn't know much English, but his favorite teaching is just two phrases. He goes, "Empty, empty, happy, happy. Empty, empty, happy, happy." And he just manifests it.

He's got this beautiful, strong, radiant energy that you can just feel when you're in his presence. And it's a combination of his Vipassana practice, but also his metta practice. He has a huge heart.

The other thing I really love about the practice of loving kindness is that it opens us out to all of life. It can't help but do that. It's part of the design. With Vipassana practice, it's not meant to do this, but it can be kind of self-enclosing. With Vipassana practice, we can get really concerned about my suffering, my problems, my pain, my patterns, my conditioning, my progress, my peace, my liberation, and so on. But the metta practice you can't use in that way because from the very beginning it opens us outward. First to someone that we're close to like a benefactor and then further in these rings until it takes in all beings. So it's really a beautiful way to open our practice to connect to all of life. It connects us with everything that lives.

This is from Shantideva, who was a Buddhist philosopher in India in about the 9th century AD. He said, "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy." This really gets to the heart of our practice of loving kindness. It's a tremendous source of happiness to care for others. And it's also a tremendous source of happiness to care for ourselves. Both pieces are really true. And this is actually the mechanism by which the loving-kindness practice develops happiness in us.

The Dalai Lama said, "If you can get off on somebody else's happiness, your chances for happiness go up by the odds of six billion to one." So this is a very good gamble to be making. It's putting your money on a winner.

Sometimes when metta gets described as unconditional love or unbounded love, it seems really grandiose. And I think it's really helpful, especially in doing the practice, to bring it down to your and my reality, to something that's really accessible. Just think of it as this sense of friendship, or warmth or caring or connection. This is really the essence of metta. If you, as you think of someone, just can have that spark of connection, sort of just touching the truth of their human life and thinking, "Ah, I hope you're happy. I see there's a human being in there. I hope you're happy." That little spark of caring is the fuel for the whole power, and it's a really transforming power of loving kindness. That is metta.

That little wish, or you could call it an intention or an aspiration, is what fuels the whole practice. And that's all that needs to be there. It doesn't have to be a full-blown, overwhelming, blissful, tearful experience. Just that inclination of caring is enough and everything will unfold from that.

So I want to talk a little bit about how to refine the artfulness of doing the loving-kindness practice, built around the idea that this seed is really what's important. When people were asking today in interviews, "Isn't this a lot like affirmations?" or it could be compared to prayer. And I think this is a Buddhist kind of prayer, actually. Although who it's to, I'm not quite clear. I haven't figured that part out yet, but I do believe it's a prayer.

But I think one of the real differences between affirmations and prayers and loving kindness is that in the first two, generally we're really interested in the result. If we say something like, "May you be happy" or "May you be healthy," what we really focus on is the outcome, the production of the happiness or health in the other person. But in the loving-kindness practice, we realize that that outcome is kind of out of our control. As much as I wish for my benefactor's happiness, I can't change it very much. If they're ill, I can't heal them through my wishes. So that result is kind of out of our power to a large extent.

And so the motive in the metta practice is different. The outcome is really secondary. That's not our main focus. The main focus in the metta practice is on this aspiration. The wish that we have for their well-being is real, independent of the actual outcome, whether they're happy or not, whether they're healthy or not, our wish is genuine. And it's the genuineness of that wish that does the change, that makes the difference in our heart. So it's by putting ourselves in this very wholesome place of wishing well for another that little by little and moment by moment we're transforming the way we relate to the world.

It's actually the exact analogy to the quality of mindfulness in our Vipassana practice.

In Vipassana, we want to just touch that quality of pure awareness moment after moment after moment. It's that which purifies our consciousness—purifying the forces of greed, hatred, and delusion. In the metta practice, the exact analog is this little seed of caring. It's a very pure quality. As we plant that seed in our heart again and again and again, it purifies our hearts moment after moment by bringing out the wholesome that's already within us.

Often when you first touch it, it doesn't feel like it adds up to much. Similarly with mindfulness—you connect clearly with one breath and say, "Okay, that was no big deal. I don't get the power of this. What's going on?" But you put a lot of those moments together, as most of you have done in intensive retreats, and you see that there's a tremendous momentum that grows from those moments when they're put together. This is the onward leading quality of mindfulness practice, and it also applies to the practice of loving-kindness. Moment after moment, as we purify our heart through this caring motive, the heart becomes clearer and purer—again, relieved of the forces of greed and hatred and delusion.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, 'This will come to nothing.' By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." However big the jar is, it is filled. I used to have, when I was in the monastery in Thailand, this huge earthenware jar outside my kuti that caught the rainwater when the rainy season came. It was a very big jar and at the start of the season could be bone dry. As the rains fell, little by little that huge jar would fill up and then became a reliable source of water for me. It's the same way with our practice, either of mindfulness or of loving-kindness. Our mind fills up with these qualities—either of the pure awareness of Vipassana or of this open-hearted caring of the metta practice.

So I want to talk a little bit about the way that I try to do this practice when I can do it the best that I can. To get a little bit more into the technique of it. People commented that it's tiring to always be involved with the phrases—it's kind of wearying just to be with phrase after phrase. So one of the things that I do is start my phrases from silence. When I'm going to start a set of phrases, I touch into the silence that holds all the words. That gives me a sense of being able to rest without interrupting the flow of the practice, but starting from a place of quiet, of peace, of restfulness. So I interrupt any sense of busyness or habituation by touching into the silence before I say anything.

Then I put my attention into the center of my chest, into the heart center, and just let it rest there for a moment. I get in touch with any physical sensations that are there. The heart center is a strong emotional seat and a good place also to experience a lot of different emotions. In connecting with that physical center, you're also opening yourself to feel any of the emotions that might come through.

Then I generate an image of the person, because I found this is really helpful for keeping the connection. In generating the image, I let myself feel their qualities—whether it's my benefactor or myself. I generate an image, and in doing that, I feel their vitality. I feel their uniqueness, their personality. It brings them alive for me.

Then, still in the silence, I try to connect with that sense of caring about them. It's a non-verbal caring, but it kind of expresses this: "Oh, I hope you're happy. I hope things are going well." Then I say the phrase. I sort of let the phrase carry the wish to the person, travel out across the space to touch the person, going from my heart outward. The phrase is just another expression of this wish—this basic wish: "Hope you're happy, hope you're well."

After I say the phrase, I return the attention to the heart center and just let myself feel the reverberations. Sylvia mentioned this last night also—listening for the callback. What's the response of your heart to the meaning and the sense of this phrase and the offering it to the other person? In that, I'm back into the silence again. So then I'm ready for the next phrase to go through the same sequence.

That's the way that I try to practice. I try not to rush with the phrases at all and have the sense that each one is like a gift that I'm sharing with my friend or my benefactor or myself. I have the sense that it's an offering from my heart in a very slow and relaxed way to them.

When I practice like this, I don't feel busy because I find enough space and silence within it that the whole thing feels really spacious to me. But I have to admit, it's hard to do that if the mind is quite active. I have to have a certain amount of stillness to do it. So you could say it takes a degree of concentration to do this. But at the same time, doing it this way really builds concentration.

Because think of all the things that you have to be aware of to do that style of practice. You have to connect with the physical sensations. You have to summon up the image of the person. You have to connect with the caring. You have to be mindful of the phrase and the meaning as you send it to the person. And then you have to come back and feel the effect in your own heart. So there's mindfulness, there's attention with each of those steps. And because you're with a lot of different objects, your concentration has to be good to do that. But doing it in that way, you will refine your concentration. It'll have to build up to meet that challenge.

So I offer this as one possibility. When my mind is very active, as I said, I'm not able to do it in this way. And then what I try to do is just stay with the phrases. And I find if my mind is active, but I'm able to stay with the phrases, then it starts to calm down. So it's a way of using the phrases to bring back a little bit more stillness. And once the mind has settled again, I can go back to this really slow and more artful way of practicing.

This is just the way that I do it. You don't have to do it this way. It's just a suggestion if you'd like to play with it. There are lots of different ways to do the phrases. Some people like to sing their phrases, and I just thought I would mention that. Some people find that naturally comes to them, and that can be a really nice way to get the rhythm going.

One time early in my metta practice—I have a set of long phrases where I get a lot of meaning, and I have a set of short phrases that are really good for the rhythm—my long phrases started to fall into a country and western song. And I'm not going to share that with you because those things can be contagious and I wouldn't want to wish it on you. Fortunately, it didn't last very long, so I went back to the short phrases.

As you're with the phrases, you'll go through lots of different cycles with them. Sometimes the phrases feel incredibly dry to me. Dry and meaningless and rote and mechanical and repetitious and boring and unenlivening. Anybody familiar with that? Yes, it happens at times. And you might think, I'm doing something wrong or these aren't the right phrases or this isn't the right person. I need to be with a different person. But just know that the practice itself goes through cycles of dryness and wetness or juiciness. So there will be times when it will just be dry.

And actually, I don't know if it's possible for the heart to be open all the time. I don't know. Mine isn't. Mine goes through periods of opening and periods of closing, and I see that a lot in my metta practice. And I've come to realize it's not that there's something wrong with me. It's just the heart doing its thing. It opens for a while and it closes for a while. So just know that that's part of the natural cycle. Don't feel like you're doing anything wrong.

Also, don't worry if it doesn't feel like any strong feelings are coming through. You'll talk to some really emotional friends who've done metta practice and they say, "Wow, it was so powerful. I was crying by the second day and then I was in bliss on the third day and had strong concentration on the fourth day."

That's not the standard model. Don't take it as the standard for your metta practice. People respond very, very differently to this practice, and they're all perfectly fine.

Sharon Salzberg, who loves this practice deeply, said the first time she did a metta retreat, she felt absolutely nothing for the first week. But at the end of the retreat, as she reentered daily life, she found she had totally changed in relation to it. Something had shifted within her.

It's very difficult to evaluate a metta retreat while you're in the middle of it. Please, no need to try. Wait until you're able to go back home. See how you feel going back into your daily life before you judge the effectiveness. What happens is often subtle. The lasting transformations that occur are subtle—a subtle way that we change in relating to the world. That's what really emerges from this practice.

Instead of walking down a street wrapped up in our own fantasies, we start to walk and realize there are other beings out there. Every once in a while, we might tune in and wonder, "Hey, how's life for you? How's the heart? How's the body? How's life in the world for you?" We're simply reforming a habit of connecting to the happiness and sorrow in the lives of every being we meet. When we start to do that, it changes how we feel in the world. We feel more connected to people and to life.

This doesn't happen overnight, obviously. It takes cultivation, just like mindfulness practice does. We also can't control the rate at which the unfolding happens—the opening of the heart. We start to realize it's not our job to control that.

The phrases are actually just like seeds. Every time you say a phrase, you're planting a seed. That's all your job is. You plant it and you water it by doing it again and again and again. That's all you can do. You can't decide when the plant is going to grow up and how tall it's going to get and what color flowers it's going to have and when those flowers are going to bloom. That's not your job. Your job is just planting the seeds and providing the fertile conditions. Then you let go.

Trust that the phrases which have been working for at least fifteen hundred years—the details of this practice go back at least to the Visuddhimagga, which is fifteen hundred years old, with echoes of it before that and the Buddha's general instructions twenty-five hundred years ago—they've been working for people for all these centuries. None of us is so special it's not going to work for us. Just trust that all you have to do is say the phrases with that connection of caring, and nature will take care of the rest. The phrases will evoke the feeling. It will happen.

You don't have to worry that you have to create some special feeling as you're saying it. You don't have to summon up any strong feeling of any kind. One of my friends was practicing with Sayadaw U Pandita, a very powerful Burmese teacher. He's actually the teacher who taught our teachers this practice—the one from whom we basically imported this practice. My friend was practicing with U Pandita, doing extended metta in Burma, and he said, "I'm not feeling much as I do the phrases and as I connect to different people. Is that a problem?"

U Pandita said, "That's no problem at all. As long as your mind is inclining to metta, that's all that you need. The practice and the phrases will take care of the rest."

So you don't have to force any particular kind of feelings. As we generate loving kindness toward ourselves, it actually tends to bring up all kinds of feelings. We may think that these are not at all like metta. This is not what we expected from this practice. We thought we were going to love ourselves more. But we actually start the practice and find ourselves feeling blame, judgment, guilt, sadness, or resentment.

All different kinds of feelings arise. It's easy to think, "Oh, I'm doing it wrong. This isn't what loving kindness is supposed to feel like." But this isn't true at all. Actually, the very act of directing the mind toward loving kindness tends to bring out anything in us that's not like that. As we incline the mind in one direction, everything that's a different flavor will come up as though to say, "It's not like that. You're not like that. That's not really true. That's not really the way it is."

This is part of the beauty of the metta practice. The fact that those states come, those difficulties, doesn't mean that it's not working—it means it is working. Because when we start the metta practice, it's as though we take a magnet with strong positive energy and run it right through our body. Everything that's of another charge comes right forward and is drawn to it.

This is part of the beauty of this practice. It's a purification practice. The only way all that material within us can be purified is by being brought to the surface. Holding it in the light of awareness, holding it with the flavor of metta, is what allows it to be released.

So this is a natural part of the practice and, I believe, one of the great powers of metta meditation. It's a practice that goes straight for the heart and brings out what needs to be purified within it. Whether it's sadness, grief, self-judgment, or anger—whatever it is—these feelings will come forth. This is why the metta practice is such a powerful healing practice. It is really, in my view, the main healing practice in our tradition.

I'd like to close by reading a poem that speaks to this aspect of healing. Many of you have heard this poem before. It's one of my favorites, by Galway Kinnell, called "Saint Francis and the Sow."

The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower, for everything flowers from within, of self-blessing; though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness...

Let's sit for a minute together.

For everything flowers from within, of self-blessing, though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on its brow and retell it in words and in touch: it is lovely, until it flowers again from within, of self-blessing.

Thank you for your attention.

The Fruits of Mettā Practice

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the profound benefits that arise from dedicated mettā (loving-kindness) practice. Drawing from years of intensive practice, he explores the two primary fruits: samādhi (concentration/collectedness) and the brahmavihāra of mettā itself. Armstrong clarifies common misunderstandings about samādhi, explaining it not as narrow focus but as a unification of mind—like concentrated orange juice that becomes potent and powerful. He describes how genuine caring intention, rather than self-centered effort, becomes the karmic engine driving the practice forward.

The talk addresses practical challenges practitioners face, including doubt and the tendency to strive for pleasant states rather than maintaining authentic care for others. Armstrong emphasizes that mettā practice involves taking control of one's mindstream—replacing unwholesome thoughts, images, and emotions with wholesome ones through the cultivation of caring intention. He discusses the five jhānic factors and how they counteract the hindrances, creating states of protection and liberation. Through personal anecdotes and teachings, he illustrates how faith and surrender allow the Dharma to carry practitioners forward, transforming the practice from effortful striving into natural flowing generosity.

The talk tonight is on the fruits of metta practice.

When I started intensive metta practice some years ago, I'd been doing Vipassana practice for fifteen years or more. But when I started the metta practice, a lot of doubt came up in me, primarily because I didn't know if I was going to be able to do the practice or not. I didn't know if it was going to work for me. I really felt like a baby again, a new meditator. And I had to find out for myself the way through the doubt.

It reminded me of a story that I heard at a retreat about a year ago. I was sitting in a retreat and one of the other guys on the retreat was a college teacher. He teaches mathematics. He said there was a young woman who turned up for the first day of his calculus course and said she wanted to check the course out to see if she wanted to stay in it for the semester. She wasn't sure if she was going to stay or not. And she said that before she could commit to staying, she had to know that the course would help her.

And so the teacher said, "Well, what field are you in?" And she said, "Civil engineering." And he said, "Well, calculus is really a great benefit for civil engineers." And she said, "Well, can you tell me a problem that I could solve with calculus that I couldn't solve without it?" And he said, "Sure." And he sketched up this civil engineering kind of problem on the board and said, "You see, you need calculus to solve this." And she said, "And your course will teach me how to solve it?" And he said, "Yes, it will." And she said, "Well, how do I know that?" He said, "Well, I'm telling you, you have to trust me." And she said, "But I have to know it for myself before I take the course that I'll learn how to solve that problem in the course of doing it." And he said, "You just have to take my word for it." She said, "I'm sorry, that's not good enough." And she dropped the course.

So this was told at a retreat with a young Tibetan teacher who was leading the retreat, a teacher named Sokny Rinpoche. And he likes to watch a lot of videos when he's in this country because it helps him understand our culture. And his comment was—his comment was, "Good story, but bad ending." He said, "Like a European movie." That was pretty tuned in, European movie.

So hopefully we're in the American version of the film, and this story is going to have a happy ending.

You know, I think there are still a lot of questions for people about this practice. People are still wondering: Do I have to use these phrases? Do I have to say phrases at all? Do I have to say words at all? Can I just hang out with a feeling? But by and large, it seems to me that there has been a real shift over these five days. I've felt it in the interviews that people have really engaged with the practice and found that it has a lot of power. I've heard a few people comment that they're surprised by the power of this practice. It just looks like a little kind of sentimental add-on to the Vipassana and finding it actually has a lot to offer.

So the faith has been there from various impulses to start to make the effort. And that's really what's needed. Faith leads to effort. Effort leads to the fruits of the practice. And the effort, as a lot of people have commented in this practice, is not an easy one. It's not like Vipassana where you can just come in, sit down, open up, and it all happens. There's a lot of work that's asked of each of us in the loving-kindness practice.

And what it reminded me of is a merit badge that I had to earn as a Boy Scout. I was going for a camping merit badge, and we had to make a fire without using matches. And I thought, surely that art isn't needed anymore in the world today, but I'll try it anyway. So the instructions were: you get a flat piece of dry wood, you make a little hole in it using your twentieth-century very sharp craftsman knife, and dig out a little hole about a quarter of an inch across, and you take a branch that's kind of round and about this long, you put it in the hole, and you shave some little wood carvings into the hole around the branch, and then you twirl the branch back and forth in your palms as fast as you can. And the friction of it in the hole...

And little by little, you get a little puff of smoke, and then a bigger puff of smoke, and then a little flame. But that's after a lot of twirling—a lot of twirling. My hands were getting sore, they were getting hot, and I was thinking, "I'm going to burn my hands before I burn anything in the wood." I didn't know what would happen, but finally it caught. And once it had caught, I could add more wood shavings and little leaves and branches, and then it burned by itself.

This is exactly like our metta practice. Twirling the stick is like the phrases. You say the phrases over and over again. It feels like it's wearing blisters in the mind. You kind of get worn out, but you keep going, and all of a sudden there's this heat, this warmth that comes from it. As you work with it, the phrases kind of become self-generating. They have caught fire over time, and a lot of the pushing that's so hard in the beginning starts to go.

People have talked about how the phrases can be going even while they're thinking about other things—one of the mysteries of the practice. So then you know it's really become somewhat automatic at that point. Not that that's a phase to stop at, but it's progress.

The fruits of the practice really are twofold. There are two main reasons that we do it. The first is concentration. The second is the loving-kindness itself, as one of the Brahma Viharas, and all the purification of heart that goes with that. These are the two things that I want to talk about tonight: concentration and loving-kindness.

Concentration is the translation we usually use for the Pali term samadhi. This is one of the most important factors of mind that the Buddha talked about. It's one of the aspects of the Eightfold Path under the meditation section. It's one of the five spiritual faculties, and it's one of the seven factors of enlightenment. So it's a very important concept in the overall path.

There's no English word—or no word in any European language that I know of—that adequately renders this term samadhi. When there's no word in the language for a concept, it means the culture doesn't know this concept. So basically European culture doesn't have a clue what samadhi is about, and that's why it's so hard to understand. Mindfulness is easier because we have words like awareness and consciousness that come close to it. But we don't have any word that really accurately conveys samadhi. For me it was one of the more mysterious concepts that only became clear after probably fifteen years of practice.

It's usually translated as concentration, but this isn't quite right. This misses something really important. When we say in English, "I'm concentrating," what we usually mean is that we're taking a very narrow focus of attention. We might say, "I'm trying to concentrate on my book, could you please turn off the television?" or "I'm trying to concentrate on my paper, can you please shut the kids up in the other room?" There's this sense of exclusivity—that we want to bring the attention to one thing and exclude everything else.

Samadhi doesn't have this connotation. Within samadhi, there is no sense of an exclusive attention. There is a coming together, a unification. But it's not particularly about a unified attention that's exclusive in any way.

I'd say that the mind gets concentrated kind of the way frozen orange juice has gotten concentrated. You take this very liquid, runny substance that's a combination of water and essence of orange, and you throw out all that's not really essential. You're left with this frozen orange juice concentrate that you put in your freezer, then bring out and add water to make orange juice. It's gotten really potent. If you ever taste that concentrate by itself, it's a very potent taste—kind of like essence of orange times two.

That's the kind of power that the mind gets when it gets concentrated. It means that all the juice of the mind has been brought together. But it doesn't necessarily mean that it's just on one thing.

It can be brought together in a very expansive way. You can be in a state of samadhi and be very wide open with your attention. Have a very spacious and open kind of awareness and the mind can be unified. So a good way to translate samadhi might be collectedness, unification, composure.

And what it feels like is that the mind, when it gets collected in that way, feels very strong. It's returning all the power to its source. So it feels strong, it feels stable, it feels firm, steady, unmoving. And in the depths of it, it feels unshakable. And all this comes about because we are letting go of the distractions that normally carry us away from this present moment. So samadhi comes from collecting all our mental energy into the present moment.

I thought it was a really interesting question this morning about why do we call it a natural state of mind? And aren't these distractions fairly natural? I think that samadhi is a natural state of mind. I think in Buddhism we use this word "natural" in a little different way. I think we use it to mean the mind that's not under the influence of self-centered bias.

And our distractions, if you look at them closely, aren't just neutral and random. They're really mostly about greed and aversion. They're about hope and fear. So they're fueling us to leave the present moment driven by these strong underlying emotions of self-interest. And that's why they're so powerful in their influence, because there's a strong force behind them.

So the natural state of mind, from the Buddhist point of view, is one where these temporary visitors of greed, aversion, and confusion aren't active. And we take a look at what's really there in our hearts, in our minds, without the influence of these distorting forces. And that's what we mean by natural.

So we acknowledge that the distractions are normal and universal in a way, but they're something that's been added to our natural being. And a lot of meditation is to find out what is your experience in a moment when those forces of self-interest aren't acting?

This becomes a really central topic for investigation, both in vipassana and in metta. What does it feel like when the forces of greed, aversion and confusion are suspended, even just for a moment, are temporarily absent? That experience is what we call the natural state. It's the state that's always there. It's, you could say, the foundation.

Somebody came into an interview today with a really interesting insight, and he said that he had discovered the silence in which all sounds are held, and a silence that's not disturbed by the arising and passing of any sound. And in the same way, there's a natural peace and undistractedness of our own heart and mind that we can discover. And when we discover it, we see it isn't even damaged by the comings and goings of greed, aversion and delusion. But it's hard to discover when those things are thick and really active.

So the function of samadhi is to collect all the mind's energy by letting go of those distractions. And then we find that the mind has a natural stillness and steadiness and power that returns to it.

How do we develop samadhi? We develop it by bringing our full attention to whatever we're doing. So if it's repeating a phrase, we give our wholehearted attention to thinking that phrase or saying that phrase. If it's feeling the echo in the body, we give our full attention to feeling that echo in the body. We're doing it in vipassana practice too, obviously, by being fully with our experience. In metta the objects are different, but the concentration is the same, or the samadhi is the same.

The Korean Zen teacher, Sansanim, said, "When you sit, just sit. When you walk, just walk." That was the way he expressed this flavor of samadhi. And then one day his students walked in on him in the dining room, and he was eating his breakfast and reading a newspaper. And the student said, "But teacher, you told us when you do one thing, just do that one thing fully." And he said, "Yeah, and when you eat and read, just eat and read." Samadhi continues.

When we bring the attention back in this way and bring it home—and a lot of people describe meditation as homecoming—when we bring it home in this way, then the mind can settle in its own steadiness, or in its own stillness.

And one of the images that came to me is actually when I was doing a period of metta practice and feeling the growth of samadhi. Anybody remember—I think a lot of us are of a similar generation—remember the Prell shampoo commercials on television in the late fifties? And there was this bottle of Prell, which you knew was green, even though the TV sets were black and white. You knew it was green because you'd seen it at the supermarket. And they were trying to illustrate the richness of the shampoo.

And do you remember what they dropped into the top? A pearl. They drop a pearl into the top, and then it just floats ever so gently and steadily down to the bottom of the bottle of shampoo. And that proves how thick and viscous the Prell shampoo is.

That's actually what samadhi felt like to me at that moment. I had the sense—this might be the Prell sutta—I had the sense that my mind was settling into my body, the thickness of my body, just like that pearl drifting down slowly, easily, relaxed, calm, peaceful, held in this really gentle way. That was what the actual experience of samadhi was like for me at that time.

So as the mind settles within itself, it finds a buoyancy, an ease, a quality that's very satisfying. And then it doesn't have to rush out to look for past and future, doesn't have to concern itself with hope and fear, because the present is very rich.

I'm describing my experience in fair detail, but I hope it relates to your experience when you're feeling connected to the phrases, to the person, to the loving-kindness, to your heart center. I know you've all had these moments when the phrases are going well, the connection with the person is there, the practice has come together, even if it only lasts for a set of four phrases. Take a look and examine that state of mind, the steadiness of the attention and the feeling in your mind and body. Part of it is the steadiness and firmness of samadhi, of the mind coming together.

The second fruit of the practice is the loving-kindness itself in all its expressions. It's really a spectrum from acceptance to patience, warmth, friendliness, all the way up to real love and passion. I've had some very passionate moments, particularly with my benefactor. There's a practice in one tradition of Buddhism called union with the teacher. The aim is to realize that our wisdom mind is the same as our teacher's wisdom mind—there's no difference. In doing the metta practice for my benefactor, I felt that their wisdom and their love and their kindness had completely penetrated my being. It was a very ecstatic discovery.

So loving-kindness has this whole range of feelings that are all aspects of metta. As the retreat has gone by, I know you've all touched aspects of this in different ways. We suggest the different individuals because each one might provide a better entry point for each of us. For some, the self is the best way in. For some, the benefactor. For some, the good friend. One of the beauties of metta practice is we're taught to go where it's easiest. Isn't that a relief? Go where the metta is easiest, because the practice really is about gladdening the mind. It's not to make things any more difficult.

Just as in vipassana practice, we start with the breath and then move on to body and sounds and thoughts and emotions. In the beginning, all the different objects seem so important, so critical. I think if there were going to be wars in Buddhism, they would be wars between people who say you can only do meditation on breath at the nose, and those who say you can only do it on breath at the belly. Sometimes these views get really tightly held. But that's not the key thing. The key thing is the mindfulness. What stone you want to sharpen it on is really secondary. The objects aren't the most important thing—the most important thing is that present moment attention.

Similarly in metta, the different individuals that it can be directed to are actually not the most important thing. The most important thing is the quality of metta that they evoke. Just as in vipassana practice what we're aiming to do is stabilize the attention in connection to the present, in metta practice our real aim is to stabilize the heart in loving-kindness. To be able to find a reliable channel to the quality of metta more and more and more. We just use whatever tools, whatever individuals best evoke that, so that in the long run we want to be able to find ourselves in metta independent of the circumstance of our life. Just as with vipassana we want to be in that state of clear awareness, untroubled by greed, aversion, delusion, regardless of the outer circumstance that we find ourselves in.

When we find that stability coming in more and more in the flavor of loving-kindness, then the heart starts to become really responsive. It starts to become really sensitive and open and juicy. And of course when the heart opens, it doesn't just open to the beautiful.

It also opens to the difficult. So sometimes in the metta practice it can feel like we're going backwards because we've opened up to beauty and then we might get hit by one of the difficulties, one of the hindrances that Sally talked about the other night. And because we're more sensitive, we actually may feel its impact more strongly than we did before. But that's actually a sign of deepening. That's not to be avoided. Because what's also happening is that the heart is getting wider at the same time and is more able to allow all of our emotional life within the spirit of acceptance, within the spirit of metta.

So both these developments of samadhi and of metta bring with them a really deep sense of contentment. That's one of the great combinations of this practice. They both reinforce each other in that way.

This Tibetan teacher I mentioned a little while ago, his name is Sogkni Rinpoche III. And Sogkni Rinpoche I, who was a couple of generations back, was the abbot of a large monastery in Tibet, in eastern Tibet. He actually had a large nunnery also. And to this day, the nunnery continues. There are a thousand nuns living at this nunnery in eastern Tibet.

It's kind of interesting because the Chinese government doesn't seem very concerned about nuns. They're not very threatened because they don't take them very seriously out in eastern Tibet. So they've continued with really deep practices. And they're allowed to continue in ways that at least monks in Lhasa have not been allowed to continue.

So a few years ago, Sogkni Rinpoche III was asked if he would take his old nunnery back under his guidance, because they consider him the third incarnation of the first Sogkni Rinpoche, and he said that he would. And so then they invited him to their tummo ceremony.

The tummo ceremony is an event they do on the midwinter, where the nuns wrap themselves up in sheets that have been soaked in ice water, walk around the nunnery walls at midnight, and they have to dry the sheet by the time they finish one walk around, with the power of tummo, which is the yoga of inner heat. And out of the thousand nuns at the monastery, about seventy completed that exercise in the past year. So Rinpoche said he actually declined that invitation because he was afraid they would ask him to join in and do it too, and he didn't want to do that.

Anyway, this first Sogkni Rinpoche had a really beautiful poem. And part of the lines of this poem said, "There is nothing else to search for, rest in your natural face. There's nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face."

And this is kind of the feeling of this union of samadhi and metta. When they come together, there is the peacefulness, the steadiness of samadhi, and there is the warmth and friendliness of the loving-kindness. And the combination of the two leads into this deep sense of contentment because we really feel this is what we've been searching for—this combination of peace and warmth. And so there really is nowhere else to go.

So it reinforces both the samadhi, because we're more happy just to rest. We don't tend to look outside as much. And it reinforces the metta, because the growing sense of contentment brings a happiness with it.

Also, one of the really amazing things when these two come together and they're strong is that the hindrances are suspended. Sally talked the other night about the five hindering energies in meditation: sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness and doubt. When samadhi reaches a certain depth, a certain strength, the hindrances can no longer arise. And when the loving-kindness is present as well, it acts as a further block to them.

So again, tune into your experience in these states where the concentration feels good and notice the absence of the hindrances in that situation. It's such a delight to have the mind not being assailed by desire and aversion, restlessness, dullness, doubt.

The Buddha said that one who has temporarily set aside the hindrances feels like someone who has been freed from debt, who has recovered from sickness, and who has been released from prison. It's a really beautiful state.

And we may only touch it for a few moments, and we may think it's nothing really special. It's just kind of a passing meditation state. But it's really a pointer to this true nature that we want to get more and more familiar with. This is what our hearts and minds are capable of when we're not distracted. This is, you could say, the basis of our being.

They say that as concentration develops, you can start to look for five factors that are signs of it. And these are called the five jhanic factors. When they're strengthened, they lead into strong states of concentration called jhana. And the first is connecting with the object. The second is sustaining the attention on the object.

The object here is the phrase or the image, the person, the heart center, and so on—the feeling itself. The third factor is a quality of rapture. The fourth is the quality of happiness. And the fifth is the quality of one-pointedness, which is that collectedness of mind, that samadhi.

It's said that each of these factors actually offsets one of the hindrances. For example, rapture offsets aversion, because when the mind and body are full of rapture, there's no interest in disliking anything—that experience is intrinsically pleasant. Connecting the attention offsets sloth and torpor. When we rouse the energy to connect to the meditation object, it cuts through dullness. Sustaining the attention offsets doubt, because when we're able to be with the meditation object for a period of time, doubt can't arise. Furthermore, happiness offsets restlessness, because the mind's not going outward. And one-pointedness offsets sense desire—again, we're not looking outward for satisfaction.

As concentration develops, the experience becomes greatly wholesome, free of the disturbances that our minds are usually subject to in normal life and in the early days of retreat. It's not that this kind of experience will be the ongoing reality for all the days of retreat—it may just be there for a few moments, a set of phrases. But tune into the quality of this kind of mind. As we access it more, we generate a pathway back. The more we're able to find it and get to know it, the more familiar it becomes, the easier it is to place ourselves back there. So start to look into these times when the attention is strong and clear, and feel in yourself what that actually feels like.

One of the things that helped me in understanding the practice of loving-kindness was understanding that the path of practice is basically a karmic unfolding. The whole Eightfold Path is an exercise in karma. The overall meaning of karma is essentially this: when we act in the world out of a wholesome intention, wholesome things come back into our life. When we act in the world out of an unwholesome intention, unwholesome results, painful results, come back into our life.

The whole unfolding of the metta practice depends on karma in the same way. The essence of karma is intention—what is our intention in acting? If it's a wholesome intention, what comes back into our life is wholesome. When we're doing the metta practice, we're generating wholesome intentions moment after moment after moment: this intention of caring about someone else or ourselves. It's that little seed of caring that is the karmic engine that drives the metta practice. Moment after moment, we are developing the wholesome, acting on the wholesome. In fact, you could say that the path is really for those who love the wholesome, who delight in the wholesome.

In Tibetan teachings, the phrases for loving-kindness and compassion are clearly karmic phrases. The Brahma-viharas are called the Four Immeasurables, and the metta phrase in the Tibetan tradition is expressed like this: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." The compassion phrase is expressed like this: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue."

So we start to look at our intention in practice really, really closely, because it is the key to the unfolding. For me, this became more clear with metta than with anything else I'd done. I was practicing in my first metta retreat, and I'd been doing it for about ten days. The practice was starting to develop nicely. The mind was settling down. I was starting to get some feelings of caring. Then something came in externally that interrupted the flow of my meditation. It threw me off track for about a day.

I started to settle back in, and I really wanted to get back to where I had been. Have you noticed that? Sometimes it's so sweet, all you want to do is get back to it. So I was in that headspace—I just want to get back. So I tried really hard. I tried really hard with myself. I tried really hard with my benefactor, which is what I was up to at that point. And it just wasn't coming together. I was struggling. My body was tense.

I was hurting. I wasn't getting any concentration. There wasn't any peace at all. And then I had an interview with Joseph, as it turned out, who was my teacher at that point. I told him my situation, and he did a very skillful little intervention. He pointed out that I was trying to get back to something pleasant. And he said, "But Guy, we're not doing this practice for ourselves. We're doing it for the other."

All of a sudden this light went off in my head. I'd forgotten about really caring about the other. And that's when I saw that my effort had become corrupted. It had become completely self-centered—I didn't care about my benefactor anymore. I just wanted to get back to my own peace and happiness. So I was doing the phrases in order to get calm, and what it was doing was making me tense. Or if I was doing the phrases in order to feel metta, because it felt good to feel metta, that was a selfish motivation. And that doesn't work either. Or if we do the phrases to make the result happen—you know, I think I'm going to make my benefactor happy—that's striving also, and that doesn't work.

So there's only one way to do this practice so that it works, and that is to genuinely care about the people that you're sending to. But the curious thing is when we genuinely care about the people that we're sending to, it feels great. And for me, this was a really beautiful teaching on karma, on right effort, on wise intention, and on generosity. Because what it points to is that when our real intention is wholesome and not self-centered, it rebounds in filling us up with peace and happiness and joy. But if we start doing pseudo-practice in order to feel those things, it doesn't work.

So the metta practice is a constant reflection of the authenticity of our intention. You can't trick this practice. If the intention isn't quite right, it won't deepen in exactly the same way.

Now, it's also important to say that the strength of our intention and our ability to really be with it goes through lots of ups and downs. Samadhi is a very impermanent factor. And you may have noticed that. You can get really concentrated in one sitting, do the same thing, bring the same integrity of effort, and the next sitting it will have fallen apart. And it's not because you have done anything wrong. It's just because samadhi is an impermanent factor. Whether you did it perfectly or imperfectly, it's going to come together and it's going to fall apart. It's going to come together and it's going to fall apart. So don't take it personally. It's a very impersonal process.

And mindfulness, for example, is a much steadier factor in life than concentration. The path kind of develops mindfulness on an overall upward line. But concentration is bouncing around that upward line like crazy all the time. So don't worry about it. Don't feel like you've done anything wrong or like you have to really change the way you're practicing. Just hang in there with it and wait for it to come back together, which it will.

You can't make concentration happen. The proximate cause of concentration—I thought this was really interesting—is happiness. It's not effort, which is what I'd assumed for a long time. It's happiness. So again, there's that sense of just the contentment of settling within ourselves as being the key to concentration. If we have our effort directed to a particular goal that's kind of a self-centered goal, that kind of effort doesn't work.

There's a story from Japan. A young student of karate goes to the greatest master of karate in all of Japan. And a very dedicated student, traveled all the way across the country to meet the master, goes up to the master and says, "I want to be the best student in all of Japan. How long will it take me?"

The master says, "Ten years."

And the student says, "Ten years, that's a really long time, but I'll train twice as hard as anybody else of your students. Then how long will it take me?"

The master says, "Oh, in that case, twenty years."

And the student says, "But I'll stay up all night training. Then how long will it take?"

"Thirty years."

And the student says, "Well, how come? I'm willing to do anything!"

And the master's reply is: "Because someone who has one eye on the destination has only one eye to see the way."

Can we bring this kind of quality into our practice of loving-kindness—really with our attention on the way and not on the destination? And what that really means is: can we make a really full effort and not be attached to the results, to the outcome?

When I reflected on this a little, I realized that's also what our Vipassana practice is asking. The Vipassana practice really, in its pure form, works when you're willing to be fully in the present moment without expecting anything back out of it. If there's an expectation of something back, then desire is active, and then the ego is involved again.

So in Vipassana: can you come into the present moment fully without expecting anything in return? But metta takes it a step further: can you come into the present moment fully without expecting anything in return and give away everything you've got? Give away your heart and your caring and your kindness. Then it unfolds.

That's the amazing thing about life in virtue, life in generosity, life in giving. This is from Rilke:

"I believe in all that has never yet been spoken. I want to free what waits within me so that what no one has dared to wish for may for once spring clear without my contriving. If this is arrogant, God, forgive me, but this is what I need to say. May what I do flow from me like a river, no forcing and no holding back the way it is with children."

I really like this image of "the way it is with children" to describe our natural state of mind. As children, we had access to that natural state of mind in a very ongoing way. Unfortunately, children don't have the wisdom to support it. And so that natural state of mind gets covered over and closed down as the years go by, and we have less and less access.

But if you hang out around kids, you'll see that natural state of mind. It's hard to get a kid out of the present moment. They almost don't know any other way to be than the present moment. And the joy and the love and the instinct for generosity.

Sylvia's grandson and granddaughter were at lunch today with us. And Harrison's grandson is three and a half—a very bright, verbally precocious guy and a beautiful spirit. At the end of the meal, we had all pretty much finished, and he had brought a box of cookies from home. He went around to each of us at the table and asked us if we wanted a cookie.

I was engaged in another conversation and didn't quite get what was happening. He came over and offered me a cookie, and I said, "No thanks, I'm not hungry." Sally kind of nudged me and said, "Yeah, take the cookie." So I said, "Oh, thank you. Thank you very much," and I took the cookie.

And Harrison said, "I brought this box of cookies from home so I could share it with the people here."

It was so sweet and so spontaneous and not something he'd been taught—just something he wanted to do. It was that natural impulse of generosity. It was a very nice cookie too.

This gives me a lot of trust that our basic nature, which we see in children all the time, is so good. There's so much goodness and happiness in it, but it's gotten obscured over the years of habit, over the years of self-centeredness, of unwise intention.

So often now, as adults, we kind of feel victimized by our own mind stream. We feel the victim of these forces that come in—the various manifestations of greed, aversion, and confusion. When we look closely, we see how we generate them ourselves. When we touch a certain depth, we see that they are volitional. But it's hard to touch that kind of depth.

But in the metta practice, we're doing something really pretty radical. We're taking the unwholesome thoughts that often come and we're replacing them with the thoughts of the metta phrases.

We're taking the images that often provoke anxiety or regret or grief and replacing them with images of people we care about. We're taking the feelings that frequently invade—of fear or sadness or wanting—and beginning to encourage the heart to move toward metta, toward acceptance, toward peace, toward love.

What we're actually doing is taking control of our own mindstream and orienting it in a wholesome direction. This is very audacious. This is a big, big undertaking.

When you feel in the flow with the phrases, with the image, and with the feeling of metta, you are protected. You are protected from any unwholesome influx from thoughts, images, or emotions. This is a big deal. It's not something we learn to master in a day or a single retreat. It's really a lifetime of dedication. But this is the direction we're moving in. This is the direction of the loving-kindness practice.

So don't feel badly if it doesn't all come together all day long. If you connect with one of these elements and you have wholesome thoughts in your mind for a good part of a sitting, that's a big deal. If you have wholesome images, that's significant. If the feelings of loving-kindness in its various forms start to come through, that's a real shift. Little by little, we develop it more and more and become increasingly protected.

The curious thing is it all revolves around this simple intention for caring. We can't replace these mental formations in a heavy-handed way because that would only come out of more desire, more greed, and more aversion. So we start the shift just out of this simple act of caring, and then we surrender. We put it out, and then we trust in the universe to grow those seeds into the flowers of metta and samadhi.

We can't force those things to happen. But we can plant the seed and then surrender. And so we're back again with faith. We're back again in the atmosphere of trust. We say the phrase, we connect with the caring, and then we just open and let the Dharma carry us. This path of faith is a whole path in itself.

The Buddha described this state of loving-kindness as an immeasurable deliverance of mind. Feel it when you're in that space. It is a deliverance. It is a liberation. And it's a boundless one, an immeasurable deliverance of mind, when the mindstream is protected like that. Then we trust more in opening up to the Dharma, to the flow of this current.

I'll close with a quotation from the Buddha: "Pingya," he said, "other people have freed themselves by the power of trust. Vakali, Bhadravuda and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Let's just sit together for a minute, please. Other people have freed themselves by the power of trust. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death.

CHAPTER 232

Vicissitudes of Life

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the challenge of maintaining spiritual presence while navigating the complexities of modern life. Drawing primarily from the Aṅguttara Nikāya teaching on "The Vicissitudes of Life," he explores how the Buddha identified eight worldly conditions that dominate our attention: gain and loss, success and failure, praise and blame, pleasure and pain. Armstrong illustrates through personal stories and examples how these alternating conditions inevitably create dukkha when we mistake them for sources of lasting happiness.
> The talk addresses why staying present in daily life proves so difficult, examining both external distractions and internal conditioning patterns. Armstrong emphasizes that true fulfillment comes from knowing our essential nature beyond name and form, rather than pursuing endless worldly desires. He discusses the importance of simplification and renunciation—not necessarily of outer possessions, but of inner clinging to these changing conditions.
> Drawing on teachings from various Buddhist masters including Ajahn Chah and contemporary teachers, Armstrong shows how equanimity allows us to be "in the world but not of it." The talk concludes with reflections on the brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity) and how spiritual practice can shift our motivation from getting to giving, opening the bodhisattva path of service to others.

For those of you who weren't here at the beginning, my name is Guy Armstrong. I'm one of the Spirit Rock teachers. Sylvia couldn't be here this morning, so she asked me to sit in with you all, and I'm really happy to be here. I've had great times with Sylvia's group in the past, so I'm delighted to come again.

What I thought we might talk about this morning is something along the themes of our worldly life and our spiritual life. While these two don't need to be in conflict, they often are. Especially living in Marin County in the twenty-first century—life is so complicated these days and so expensive around here. That breeds some of the problems, and some of it also is a shift in values that happens as we get more and more into practice. So I wanted to talk about this from a few different directions—looking at both the outer and the inner relationship to these questions.

Somebody asked me at the end of a retreat recently, up the hill. They were in an interview and asked, "Why is it so hard to stay present in daily life?" I thought that was a really good question because I think we should all be looking at that question in our own lives, in our own experience.

So I'll just put it out to you all as a group: Why is it so hard to stay present in daily life?

A participant responded that it seems normal, even more than normal—universal. "Well, the distractions are endless, multiplying, and overwhelming."

"Lots of distractions," I replied. "Such as?"

"Traffic drives you crazy, or the price of everything drives you nuts, and the crowds of people swarming around are incredibly aggravating."

Certainly there are lots of stimulations, lots of things to deal with out there.

Another participant shared: "I'd like to just say how I had a difficult time coming here today. The exits or entrances to the freeway were closed and I didn't know how to come. I thought I was going to beat the whole system by having a tape of Sylvia Boorstein listening to her talking about how to be happy. She also has one on road rage, so that's a good one. So I was very focused on listening to her tape. Consequently, I got lost.

"Trying to outdo the Fairfax construction and taking side roads, I ended up going back to the East Bay. When I finally realized that I was really on the wrong road, I had to turn the tape off. And then I started to cry because I thought, 'I'm really confused. I'm really trying very hard.' I was just on my first residential retreat this last weekend. I'm having a very difficult time re-entering, or holding on to that, and trying to come back here—it was the only safe place I knew to come, and yet I couldn't get here.

"I left in plenty of time, and it took me over an hour to get here, and I was late. Once I turned the tape off and clearly focused on what was going on—if I went on Center Street, I would avoid all that confusion. And I got here in a short time. So trying to beat the system doesn't seem to work. What happened is I wasn't fully able to listen to what Sylvia was saying because I had to pay attention to the traffic. Trying to do two things at once did not really work."

This is really a good illustration of spiritual values and worldly values, and where we put the emphasis in our attention.

Another participant offered: "I think the problem is that your mind tends to jump around from subject to subject anyway, even when there's no stimuli."

I'd like to look at both aspects of that comment. The first part was that the mind tends to jump around anyway, even when there aren't stimuli. I think this is a really important thing for meditators to start to notice and to take into account.

Our minds are habitual in their jumping around. This is sometimes described as monkey mind, where the mind just swings from one branch to the next and won't let go of one branch until it sees the next one to cling onto. This tendency of the mind to always be occupied with some kind of distraction is a really important thing to come to terms with.

This is something that can be trained. This is really the purpose of meditation—to train this habit to be in a different mode so that the mind starts to like being in the present moment more and more, and sees that it doesn't actually need these distracting thoughts to cling onto in times when there's basically peace or lack of stimulation around. So partly we could say this is a habit, but as you mentioned, when there are lots of stimuli coming in, it stirs the mind up even further.

Another participant observed, "I think the modern day tendency is that there are so many complexities in modern life that our attention is drawn in many ways. I've often thought that actually one of the banes of modern existence is this tendency towards what we call multitasking. And I think it's a fallacy because I read an interesting article that a scientific study has shown that attention cannot be drawn in more than one direction. Instead of increasing our focus, it actually decreases the focus on tasks. The concept of mindfulness seems to be a strong antidote to that. I noticed it the other day, making a peanut butter sandwich. It was actually a delight to take a moment and focus on what I was doing, spreading the peanut butter, cutting the bread. It was actually a delightful respite."

I think these comments are right on. The dividing of attention, when we look at what it does inwardly, fragments us. As a culture, we've kind of lost our ability to be wholehearted with what we do in the present moment. You look at kids—they have that. They're completely with whatever they're doing. You give them one thing to do, and if it engages them, they're 100% with it. Whereas for us, we've been so fragmented by training that it's hard to bring 100% of our attention and energy to anything we do. Mindfulness offers a clear alternative of fully being with what is in the present.

Someone else added, "Underneath that is the reason why we feel we need to multitask. There are so many cultural messages saying we're not doing enough, we should be more, we're not good enough the way we are. You can get rather desperate activity trying to remedy that, but it doesn't seem to work."

This gets to another piece of the heart of what I wanted us to explore this morning: In our worldly life, are we doing the things that will actually bring us happiness? Or are we getting lost and distracted in our very activities, leading down a trail that will lead somewhere but not necessarily to real happiness?

A final participant noted that this conditioning is something really highlighted by the practice of meditation. When we start to try to come into the present in an ongoing and consistent way, we really see how easily the mind just swings to the past or the future out of habit, out of conditioning. The good news is that this can be changed, retrained. We can learn a new habit.

These comments have highlighted many of the themes I hoped we would touch on this morning. Let me ask: how many people here have been on at least a day-long silent retreat? And how many have been on a residential meditation retreat?

One of the things we find when we try to sustain this practice of mindfulness over eight hours or eight days is that it becomes pretty much a full-time job. It can take all of our attention just to stay in the present moment. The nice thing about the retreat setting is we don't have any other responsibilities. We don't have to interact with people, carry out our jobs, take care of our children, or look after our partners. The only task we have in those settings is to be in the present moment with our experience. And we find out how difficult that is, even when we don't have anything else to do.

But I mean, I don't know if people would be willing to share—how much of the time are you able to be in the present moment even under these ideal settings? Ten percent? Twenty percent? A little tiny bit? It's hard. It's tough work. And that's when we don't have anything else to do.

Now, then we go back into worldly life. As practitioners, if we want to take this practice on as a real commitment, we want to bring that ability to be in the present moment fully into our daily life as well. This is not just something we do on the cushion or during a daylong or in a silent retreat. We really want to live from that place of being in the present moment. And there's no reason that we can't, with training and with practice. That's really what practice is for. It is possible, but it takes a lot of work.

So in lay life, we have this full-time job of wanting to be in the present. We have another full-time job in lay life, in worldly life—which I'm sure you've noticed—of earning a livelihood, taking care of our family, looking after our health, doing our volunteer work and service work, looking after aging parents and children, relationships and so on. So we basically, in worldly life, have two full-time jobs: being in the present and attentive to all of that, and taking care of all the external things that we need to take care of.

So it's no wonder that it takes a while to put these two full-time jobs together. Don't be discouraged if this doesn't happen automatically or easily. This is a long process of training. They can go together, but what's happening is that we have to divide our attention—or we might say our intention—just as you shared about driving over here and trying to listen to a tape and also follow the detour signs.

In worldly life we need to bring our attention into the present moment. That's one sustained attention we need to maintain. But then we also need to care for all the things of our daily life with a lot of attention also. So we're kind of divided, and I'd say there's an inherent conflict in the beginning for us because we're trying to support two intentions, two different intentions at the same time.

"It seems like there's just not really enough time today if you don't move like that. If I'm not reading while I'm walking my dog..."

I think we are way overscheduled. I think that's really true. And sometimes it seems like the only answer is to jam things in further together.

How many of you have seen the movie Himalaya? About the same number who've been on these residential retreats. Himalaya is playing at the Rafael and probably other places in the Bay Area. It's about village life—theoretically in Tibet, actually filmed in Nepal—about the life of people who grow grain and then trade that grain for salt, trade the salt for more grain. So you get a sense—it could have been set a thousand years ago, could have been filmed a thousand years ago—of the simplicity of the life that people used to live.

This is true in our culture as well. In western culture, farming was the occupation of most of the nation a hundred or two hundred years ago. That simple, down-to-earth life where there weren't things like tax-free mutual funds and a hundred different kinds of sandwich that you could order every time you go to the deli, ten different activities for your children after they finish the school day. Life was much, much simpler and kind of lent itself to being in the present moment in a way that modern life really doesn't.

So on some level I think we probably need to take a look as practitioners at the complexity of our outer lives. I see in myself as I get older and in a lot of friends as we get older a real interest in simplifying. Now there's a time in life when that's not possible. When you're starting a career and raising a family, especially in this area—it's so expensive, there are so many demands—there may not be any choices for simplification. But as we get older and some of the family responsibilities start to lift, I really think we need to look seriously at simplifying and creating space.

When we create space outwardly, it creates so much more space in the mind. It's amazing.

Taking the outer clutter away just opens up a huge amount of inner spaciousness. Even choices like how much television we watch, how many films we go to, how many magazines we read during a week—renunciation in those areas can make a difference too. The outer dimension is important.

But I want to focus primarily on the inner. Part of the problem is that we have these dual intentions: to look after ourselves and our families while remaining present as we do so. But worldly life offers so many seductive possibilities. There are countless ways we can lose track of our spiritual orientation because our culture simply doesn't support spiritual values. I don't believe it supports them at all. Try talking to your employer about taking an extra week's leave for a meditation retreat and see how supportive the external situation is.

Worldly life offers many possibilities that are intriguing, fulfilling, rich—lots of people to meet, things to do, ways to become known, ways to serve. But they don't necessarily support a spiritual life. The problem is that we can get lost in any one of these avenues.

I was talking to someone this week who had lost her partner to cancer. She told me that before her partner's death, she was very wrapped up in her career—it was almost more important than her family. Going through the illness and death of her partner totally shifted her priorities. Her career now feels hollow to her because she sees how much more important the people in her life are.

But until we get a wake-up call like that, we can all tend to put a huge amount of emphasis on career. There are many enjoyable aspects to work situations these days, but at the end of the day, I wonder if it's the most important thing in our life. This is something we need to examine.

I want to share a couple of quotations from what might be called a new breed of spiritual teacher—people not connected with any tradition who have awakened on their own. Eckhart Tolle is a prime example. His book, The Power of Now, has been on the San Francisco bestseller list for about four months. It's not on the national bestseller list, but it has remained on the Bay Area list for some time.

Tolle is fifty-three, German by birth, now living in Canada. He had a spontaneous awakening some years ago and spent time sitting on a park bench, sharing his understanding with people who wandered by. Now he teaches, and I think his book is quite good.

He writes about working with difficult emotions, the afflictive emotions of the mind: "All these emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who you are beyond name and form."

This is dense, so let me clarify. Who we truly are is not this body and personality. Who we truly are is something that goes beyond our name and form—something the Buddha pointed to as the deathless. All major religions point to an aspect of immortality in our being that is formless. Tolle is saying that when we lose touch with knowing that we are deathless in the most fundamental way, a deep anguish arises from that disconnection.

I'd also like to share from another teacher in this same vein: Tony Parsons, a British teacher born in 1933 who had a spontaneous awakening at twenty. In his book As It Is, he writes: "Whatever I seek or think I want, all of my desires are only a reflection of my longing to come home. Home is my original nature. It is right here, simply in what is."

Both teachers are essentially saying the same thing. Eckhart Tolle points to the pain of that loss; Tony Parsons points to the desire to return. Parsons suggests that all forms of desire are really just a longing to return to knowing who we truly are, because that's the only place lasting fulfillment can come from.

What I think happens in our worldly life is that these myriad forms of desire point us in different directions—toward money, fame, sexual relationships, pleasures of food and drink, beautiful houses. All these proliferating desires are misleading indicators of what we really want. What we really want is to know our being beyond name and form, beyond birth and death, beyond perishing. But having lost touch with that, we seek it through many avenues that ultimately cannot lead to lasting happiness.

This doesn't mean these outer activities are wrong.

We need to be involved in a livelihood that takes care of ourselves. We need to be involved in looking after our family and our partners and our parents. So the question is: to what extent can we be involved in those areas and not get misled about what's really important and where our real happiness is going to come from?

To me, the best description of where we get misled is spelled out by the Buddha in a sutta from the Anguttara Nikaya called "The Vicissitudes of Life." It's a great title. And it starts off like this: "These eight worldly conditions, O monks, keep the world turning around. And the world turns around these eight worldly conditions. What eight? Gain and loss, success and failure, praise and blame, pleasure and pain."

He's basically saying the way we get misled is we mistake these eight conditions as the most important things in life. And the degree to which we invest in them is the degree to which we carry ourselves off from our true spiritual track.

I find these very helpful topics for reflection and to look in my own life at how much my focus in living and where I put my time and energy is around these eight situations, as opposed to the true spiritual practice of knowing who I am, coming back to my source. Because the problem with these conditions is they're always changeable. They always alternate. Have you ever known anyone who has experienced only gain, only success, only pleasure, or only praise? It's not possible. They alternate for all of us.

And if our happiness is bound up just with the positive half, we're going to get slammed when we encounter the negative. It's not through any fault of our own that we encounter the negative. Everybody encounters loss and pain and blame and failure. Even the Buddha. And I'll tell some of the stories about the Buddha's difficulties as we go, just so you know, even if you're really cooled out, these things happen to you.

Let me talk a little bit about each of them. I'll talk first about gain and loss, and I don't really want to get into the kinds of great losses in our life. I think losing a partner to death, losing a child, loss of parents—those are major things and hopefully we only encounter those relatively few times in our life. But mostly the Buddha talked about gain and loss in more worldly terms.

And in worldly terms, this is a great territory, the Bay Area, to see gain and loss. You've probably noticed the stories in the newspapers over the last year—the dot-com downturn, the stock market collapse. There are huge stories of wealth rising and falling in this area.

I'll just tell one from my experience. About thirteen years ago, I went to work for Microsoft. They were still a small company back then. I worked for them for about five years. It was after I left that they started getting into all their trouble—that's their problem.

My first boss, the guy who hired me into the company, was a really great guy. I liked him a lot as a person and as a manager. Shortly after I was there, he got into kind of a political difficulty in the company. He got passed over for a promotion, and the job went to somebody else in our office who he didn't respect, didn't think was a good manager. He was very upset that he'd been passed over, and he was more upset that now he had to report to this other person who he felt was not as good a manager as he was.

One thing led to another, and one day in a peak of anger, he resigned, tendered his resignation. Over the weekend he had second thoughts, because I came to find out he had about 10,000 stock options back then in Microsoft. And over the years since then, Microsoft stock has split a total of 72 times. So today that would be something like 720,000 shares of Microsoft, which he could have bought at something like a dollar a share. I figured out that today he would have been worth about $40 million if he had stayed with the company.

But in a fit of anger, he tendered his resignation. He called up on Monday and said, "You know, I'm very sorry. I didn't mean it. I'd like to take it back." But his new manager said, "I'm sorry. Your resignation has already been accepted." Forty million dollars. Boom.

A friend of mine commented because of the stock market collapse that he knows people who are worth twenty million dollars now who feel themselves to be poor because a year ago they were worth forty million dollars. And you know there's a lot of dukkha in the collapse of the stock market. We don't hear much about it, I think, because people at that level are embarrassed to talk about feeling poor with twenty million dollars—and probably they should be.

But there's a lot of dukkha in the collapse of the stock market, the gain and the loss.

So the Buddha goes on to talk about how he sees relating to these conditions. He says, "These eight worldly conditions are encountered by an uninstructed worldling"—meaning someone who hasn't heard the teachings—"and they are also encountered by an instructed noble disciple. What is the difference between these two?"

He goes on to say, "When an uninstructed worldling comes upon gain, he does not reflect upon it thus: This gain that has come to me is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change. He does not know it as it really is. And when he comes upon loss, he does not reflect upon it thus: This is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change. He does not know it as it really is.

"With such a person, gain and loss keep his mind engrossed. When gain comes, he is elated, and when he meets with loss, he is dejected. Being thus involved in likes and dislikes, he will not be freed from birth, aging, and death, from sorrow, grief, and despair. He will not be freed from suffering, I declare.

"But, O monks, when an instructed noble disciple comes upon gain, he reflects on it thus: This gain that has come to me is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change. And so he will reflect when loss comes upon him. He understands these things as they really are, and they do not engross his mind. Thus he will not be elated by gain or dejected by loss. Having thus given up likes and dislikes, he will be freed from birth, aging, and death, from sorrow, grief, and despair. He will be freed from suffering, I declare.

So the Buddha is basically pointing to an equanimity of mind as we meet the changing conditions that life presents—the changing conditions of gain and loss. And an important aspect of it is wisdom, that we see the impermanent nature of gain and loss. We see that nobody is always gaining. Nobody is always being praised. Nobody just has the positive side of these things. These things change for everybody.

There's another amazing story from the Tibetan tradition about this. This is a teacher named Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche. He was born in Tibet in 1932, escaped from Tibet in 1959 and went to India. He's a very great Dzogchen master—one of the greatest probably of the last fifty years, and one of the few who came to the West and taught in the West, and somebody I had the pleasure of meeting. Very impressive man.

He'd practiced in Tibet and gotten a lot of high realization. He'd gotten instruction from some very great teachers. And then he came to India as part of the Tibetan refugee movement. And there wasn't a lot of provision for Tibetan refugees in India. There wasn't a great safety net, you might say.

He says, "I lived in India for twenty-five years by myself without accumulating anything. Just one old man alone. Sometimes I gave Dharma talks in monasteries. Sometimes I stayed with sadhus in Rishikesh and Hardwar, along the Ganges, in ashrams, under trees, wherever the descent of dusk found me. So many different dreamlike experiences. Sometimes I gave empowerments to great assemblies of people, including dozens of tulkus and lamas, where they put a golden initiation vase in my hand and I placed it on the heads of thousands of monks."

So here he was in this position of great exaltation and giving blessings to thousands of Tibetan practitioners.

"At other times I was utterly poor, living hand to mouth on the streets in Calcutta, wandering around with my hand out begging for pennies... So many unexpected ups and downs. Who can describe them? Life is like that—full of unexpected twists and turns, impermanent, ungovernable and unstable. What a spectacle!"

So even great realized beings encounter these same kinds of swings of fortune that we do. And then how do we relate to them? How do we deal with them?

The Buddha was not immune to these either. At one point it said in the suttas that he realized through his psychic powers he could take the highest mountain in the Himalayas and turn it into gold. And he contemplated, should he do that or not? I mean, that would have been good for the monks and nuns, right? To have a mountain of gold and then they could always be supported.

But he chose not to do it. And what he reflected on, he said, is that there's no end to the greed for gold. Once you start down that path, it's never satisfied. So he just didn't do it.

The Tibetan definition of renunciation is beautifully simple: to accept what comes into our life and to let go of what goes out of our life. Accept them both equally.

This teaching resonates with the Buddha's own words: "Insignificant, O monks, is the loss of wealth and fame. The loss of wisdom is the greatest loss. Insignificant, O monks, is the increase of wealth and fame. The increase of wisdom is the greatest gain. Therefore, monks, you should train yourselves thus: We will grow in the increase of wisdom."

Praise and blame present another fascinating area for reflection. I once thought the Buddha was so impeccable in his speech and actions that nobody could criticize him, that nobody could blame him. But this isn't the case at all. The Buddha encountered praise and blame just like everyone else. In fact, he taught that there is no one in this world who is not subject to praise and blame.

His own cousin tried to kill him. This cousin was also a monk who had grown jealous of the Buddha's position at the head of the Sangha. Wanting that position for himself, he attempted to murder the Buddha so he could take over. Fortunately, he missed.

The Buddha would often travel to villages with monks and nuns, only to have people spread false stories about them, slandering them and claiming they were evil people trying to harm the community. Sometimes villagers would try to deprive them of food out of jealousy or local disputes. Even the Buddha was not immune from such treatment.

Ajahn Sumedho, the great American teacher who was here about a month ago, shared a profound story about this. As a young monk, he simply wanted to be a hermit. He dreamed of going away to a cave or a little hut in the forest to practice on his own for the rest of his life. But his teacher, Ajahn Chah, kept forcing him into more and more responsibility in the monasteries, eventually making him an abbot after only eight years of practice.

Ajahn Sumedho protested: "How can you do this after eight years? You practiced for twenty years before becoming an abbot. How can you make me one after only eight years?"

Ajahn Chah simply replied, "This is what's needed, Sumedho. You go do it."

Now Ajahn Sumedho deeply appreciates what happened. Being thrown into community life meant receiving so much criticism and anger that he had to learn how to work with these reactions. If he had simply gone into the forest to live a peaceful, solitary life, he would never have learned to deal with praise and blame. He would have always remained afraid of other people. But through years of community life, he developed remarkable equanimity—a kind of fearlessness you can truly feel in his presence. Now people can say anything to him, and he remains untroubled by it.

Pleasure and pain alternate in our lives constantly. I don't need to dwell on this since it's so central to meditation practice—observing how we respond to pleasure with grasping and how we try to push away pain.

Success and failure present another key area for contemplation. In certain ways, we naturally want to be successful. In our livelihood, we want to earn enough to support ourselves and our families. In relationships, we want happiness rather than suffering. We want to contribute meaningfully to the world through our work and service. But there's a way we can go beyond what's actually needed, becoming focused on accumulating wealth or fame and pegging our self-worth to external measures of success.

The same pattern appears in meditation. We want a practice that helps us open and grow. To me, the true measure of meditation is whether difficult emotions are diminishing over the years—less anxiety and fear, more generosity and kindness, less anger. These are the real tests. But these aren't short-term goals. To make genuine character changes, I think in terms of about five years to truly gauge whether practice is working.

There's a way we want to be successful, but if we try to control what happens moment by moment and base our success on that immediate control, we tie ourselves in knots. It's essential to approach meditation with a spacious attitude: Whatever happens when I sit down to meditate is perfectly okay. This openness itself creates the optimal conditions for practice.

If you become tight about wanting high-level concentration right now, or insist on staying with every breath for an entire hour, you can make yourself incredibly tense in meditation.

You don't get the benefits of relaxation from it.

Ajahn Chah had a saying that I like very much. He said that in worldly terms, everybody wants to succeed and they don't want to fail. But in spiritual terms, success and failure are of equal value. Success and failure are of equal value. We often learn more from failing than we ever do from succeeding, and failure brings humility, which is such an important part of the path.

What we really want to develop as practitioners is a way to be in the world but not dominated by it. Sometimes we say "in the world but not of it," which I understand to mean not dominated by its values. When we're after worldly values, there's no lasting satisfaction because they're always changing. They alternate for everyone.

For me, being in the world but not of it means I'm in the world, but my intention is to deepen my understanding of who I am and to deepen my compassion and loving-kindness in the world. I try not to put my primary emphasis on gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure. The more I invest in those things beyond what's necessary to support my life and my family's life, the more I feel it takes energy away from the spiritual orientation.

There's a wonderful example of this attitude with Ajahn Chomnian, a Thai monk who comes here once a year. Many of you may have met him. In one dharma talk, he described his work as abbot of a very large monastery in Thailand. He's a famous monk there, and he explained: "I see people from the time I get up in the morning until I go to bed at night. Sometimes non-stop. I'm just seeing people all day long. It's monks and nuns who want to talk about their meditation practice. It's lay people coming from the nearby town or village to talk about their family life and work situation. It's monastery administrators who want to know how much money we have to spend on new buildings. I receive people all day long."

But he said, "I never get tired. I try to tell my monks how to do that, but nobody else seems able to do it. I'll tell you my secret: I never get tired because I'm always resting in emptiness as I talk to them."

The way I interpret this is that he is always in a space of non-clinging, a space of freedom. Even though these stories of gain and loss, suffering and happiness are going on in front of him, he doesn't cling to them. He's not drawn out of that space of peace—that clear, aware seeing—by the changing conditions of life. This is what's truly needed to be in the world but not of it.

This means we actually have to care more about our freedom, our inner freedom, than we care about the changing nature of gain and loss, success and failure going on all around us. This is why renunciation is such an important value. Renunciation doesn't mean you have to give away all your goods and move out of Marin to live in a shack in the Sierra. It means that mentally we're not so invested in those outward things. It's giving up the inner clinging that opens the door to freedom, not necessarily giving up the outer.

When we're not in the world so much about getting, getting, getting for ourselves, our motivation shifts. We can start to look at our reason for being in the world more from a place of giving. This is where our practice begins to enter onto the bodhisattva track. When our reason for being in the world moves from getting to giving, that opens the door for us to act and be in the world as bodhisattvas. A person like that, in the real flowering of the bodhisattva spirit, remains in the world out of concern for others.

I'll close with a quotation from Shantideva, one of the Dalai Lama's favorites, from the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life: "For as long as space endures and as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the unhappiness of this world."

Let's stop there and see if there are comments, reflections, or discussion.

A participant raised a point about my earlier comments on farming: "It's a little off everything you discussed, but at the very beginning when you talked about life on the farm as a life of simplicity and so much better than our modern complexity, my partner's parents and grandparents grew up on farms in Wisconsin. They worked night and day, and they hated it. I understand what you're saying—there's a simplicity that we would like to feel. I enjoy farming myself, for example, which doesn't have all the pressure to make money and survive attached to it. But I think the reality of farming may not have been so simple."

You're absolutely right. The ideal I'm speaking of is concealed within farming but is, of course, just that—an ideal. The reality of farming for survival was often grueling and difficult.

I agree with that. It's an interesting question how livelihood has evolved over the centuries, even thousands of years of human life. Someone who had studied anthropology quoted a figure to me that I haven't verified, but it may be true. She said that when human beings lived as hunter-gatherers, on average we spent about two hours of our day supplying ourselves with food. That meant there were basically twenty-two hours for other occupations.

From my time in Asia, farming is still very hard work and doesn't bring much income. But there are also seasons where there's not much work at all. Even if people work hard for six months a year—planting rice, tending to it, harvesting it—in the dry period, for rice farmers there's not much to do. So there seem to be much bigger chunks of leisure time built into farming lifestyles than in our modern way of life.

But it's interesting that when you present the alternative to young people today anywhere in the world—to move off the farm and come to the city—they almost all take it. Part of it is because farming life is hard work. Another part is that it's not very glitzy. The nightclubs, the discos, all the action is in the cities. This is happening throughout Asia. Traditional ways of life are being lost as countries become developed. It works for greater comfort and a higher standard of living. I'm not sure it works for dharma values.

Even though farming life is hard, there's a way in which farming economies can better support dharma values through their simplicity. Buddhism in Thailand was stronger fifty years ago than it is today, and I think part of that is the increased affluence. All through Asia, if communism doesn't get Buddhism, capitalism is going to. That seems to be the story.

"This might seem obvious, but I'm trying to understand non-duality. When you were talking about pairs of opposites and told the story of Ajahn Sumedho and Ajahn Chah being in emptiness or not reacting to either side—are they in non-duality? When you're not affected by both sides, is that what non-duality is?"

There are probably depths to the term non-duality. The main term I would use for their stance is equanimity—where you're not so thrown by the changing circumstances of life. If equanimity deepens, I think it goes into non-duality when you realize there's no self there to own the gain or the loss. Because that's the real non-duality: self and non-self.

When you see through the fiction of subject and object—a subject to experience the gain or loss, and gain or loss as the object—that's what creates the sense of dualism. When we create a strong sense of subject and object in relation to something happening, it brings up the sense of self. Non-duality really means the sense of self is not present, so there's not a very strong experience of subject and object. Even if there's a slight experience of subject and object, if the wisdom factor is present, we know there's no true self involved. Those subject-object formations just arise lightly in the moment, but they don't grab us. They don't deceive us.

"I'm following on what you said about staying in that sense of equanimity in all our relationships. You know, I call it being with somebody who—it's not their fault, but for me they're maybe an energy sucker. You're with them and you're just exhausted for whatever reason. To be able to hold that place of equanimity—I can see where that would be wonderful. To be in that place all the time, I think that would really be it. But I'm not sure I could do that on an ongoing basis. That must take a lot of practice."

The near enemy of equanimity is indifference. It sounds like the person you were with may have been manifesting indifference rather than true equanimity. True equanimity never closes the heart. It's not about withdrawing or becoming emotionally unavailable. It's about holding someone's pain or joy with complete presence and love, while simultaneously understanding that their experiences are unfolding according to the natural laws of karma.

When someone we care about gets cancer, true equanimity would look like being fully present with their suffering, offering whatever support we can, feeling the natural grief and concern that arises, and at the same time holding the bigger picture that their illness is part of their karmic journey. It's not about being detached or unmoved. It's about being deeply moved and simultaneously peaceful with the reality of what is happening.

Indifference, on the other hand, is a closing down, a withdrawal, an emotional distancing that can feel very cold and hurtful to someone who is suffering. So I think what you experienced was not true equanimity at all, but rather this near enemy of indifference.

True equanimity would have allowed that person to be completely present with you, to feel their own grief about your illness, to offer whatever support they could, and to hold you with tremendous love while also holding the understanding that this illness was part of your path. Does that distinction make sense?

The Brahmaviharas always work together. We can't practice true equanimity without metta, without loving-kindness. The heart stays wide open. We just add this quality of accepting what is, of understanding the lawful nature of experience, without closing down to the immediacy of what's happening.

And so equanimity really comes from a place where the heart is open and can feel and respond to other people's suffering, but there's no inner disturbance happening alongside that responsiveness.

What it sounds like to me is that your friend had an equanimity that was shading toward indifference and didn't have the kind of equanimity that includes a truly compassionate dimension. Equanimity can be used to armor the heart, which is not what's supposed to happen. The Brahmavihāras are meant to open the heart.

If you look at the Dalai Lama, he's like a grandmother when he's around somebody who's suffering. He'll enter a group and his radar will zero in on the person who's experiencing the most pain, and he'll go directly to them—taking care of them, talking with them, holding them. But at the same time, he does this with tremendous humor. He won't fall into pity or become glum about the situation. He maintains this bright, joyful presence even while being with people who are suffering. The full expression requires this balance.

A participant named Lynn offered a beautiful insight: "When we're truly wishing ourselves happiness and wishing happiness for other people, we're wishing them to be in that state of emptiness—that openness—so they can take whatever comes and see it in perspective, not owning the things happening around them, but remaining in that spacious state."

This points to something profound. The heart of happiness might indeed be freedom itself. When we engage with the mettā phrases over time, they reveal different sources and conditions for happiness. The first phrase points to being safe and protected from harm. The second relates to being happy at heart. The third connects to harmony with the body—either through health or acceptance of illness. The fourth involves living with ease in the outer world, through harmonious livelihood and family relationships.

As we dwell with these phrases through sustained practice, we see that all of these are components of happiness. But the deepest happiness the Buddha spoke of was inner freedom, inner peace. This becomes one of the essential qualities we wish for others.

There's an important recognition that equanimity is not a passive or neutral quality—it's profoundly benign and beneficial. Equanimity is one of the highest states the Buddha described. In the list of the seven factors of enlightenment, it appears as the factor that immediately precedes enlightenment itself. It appears on numerous important lists, including the Brahmavihāras.

This state of mental balance that remains unmoved by the constant changes of life—the comings and goings, the ups and downs—represents perhaps the closest approximation to nibbāna, to the unconditioned reality, that we can point toward. It is a great state of freedom, where we can meet whatever arises with an open heart that neither pushes away nor clings, but simply receives with wise and compassionate presence.

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines why it's so challenging to stay present in daily life, exploring the tension between worldly responsibilities and spiritual practice. Drawing from the Aṭṭhalokadhammasutta in the Aṅguttara Nikāya, he discusses the Buddha's teaching on the eight vicissitudes of life: gain and loss, success and failure, praise and blame, pleasure and pain. These conditions, the Buddha taught, keep the world turning in saṃsāra when we become attached to the pleasant experiences and averse to the unpleasant ones.

Armstrong addresses the particular challenges of maintaining mindfulness in modern life, especially in affluent areas where complexity and overscheduling fragment our attention. He explores how our culture's emphasis on multitasking contradicts the wholehearted presence that meditation cultivates. The talk includes practical reflections on simplifying our outer lives to create inner spaciousness, and how all worldly desires ultimately reflect our longing to reconnect with our true nature beyond name and form.

Using contemporary examples from the dot-com era and teachings from modern non-traditional teachers like Eckhart Tolle, Armstrong illustrates how an 'instructed noble disciple' develops equanimity toward life's inevitable changes through understanding their impermanent nature, while an 'uninstructed worldling' remains caught in the cycles of elation and dejection that perpetuate dukkha.

For those of you who weren't here at the beginning, my name's Guy Armstrong. I'm one of the Spirit Rock teachers. Sylvia couldn't be here this morning, so she asked me to sit in with you all, and I'm really happy to be here. I've had great times with Sylvia's group in the past, so I'm happy to come again.

What I thought we might talk about this morning is something along the themes of our worldly life and our spiritual life. While these two don't need to be in conflict, they often are, especially living in Marin County in the 21st century. Life is so complicated these days and so expensive around here. That breeds some of the problems, and some of it is also a shift in values that happens as we get more and more into practice. So I want to talk about this from a few different directions—a little bit the outer and also the inner relationship to these questions.

Somebody asked me at the end of a retreat recently, up the hill, during an interview: "Why is it so hard to stay present in daily life?" I thought that was a really good question because I think we should all be looking at that question in our own lives, in our own experience. So I'll just put it out to you all as a group: Why is it so hard to stay present in daily life? It seems to be more than normal. It seems to be universal.

"The distractions are endless, multiplying and overwhelming," someone responded.

"Yes, lots of distractions. Such as?"

"Well, the traffic drives you crazy. The price of everything drives you nuts. The crowds of people swarming around are incredibly aggravated."

Certainly there are lots of stimulations, lots of things to deal with out there. What else?

"I'd like to just say how I had a difficult time coming here today. There were detours on the road. The exits or entrances to the freeway were closed and I didn't know how to come. I thought I was going to beat this by having the dharma tape on, trying to walk through the Fairfax construction, taking side roads and ending up going back to the East Bay. And when I finally realized that I was really on the wrong road, I had to turn the tape off. I was having a very difficult time re-entering or holding on to presence. And trying to come back here, it was the only safe place I knew to come, and yet I couldn't get here. I left in plenty of time and still was going to be late. But once I turned the tape off and then clearly focused on what was going on, I went on Center Street, avoided all that confusion, and got here in a short time. So trying to beat the system doesn't work. What happened is I wasn't fully able to listen to the tape because I had to pay attention to the traffic. So trying to do two things at once did not really work."

Thank you. This is a really good illustration, isn't it, of spiritual values and worldly values and where we put the emphasis in our attention. I do want to come back to this because I think this is a good example to explore.

The first part was that the mind tends to jump around anyway, even when there aren't stimuli. I think this is a really important thing for meditators to start to notice and to take into account. Our minds are habitual in their jumping around. This is sometimes described as monkey mind, where the mind just swings from one branch to the next, and it won't let go of one branch until it sees the next one that it's going to cling onto.

So this tendency of the mind to always be occupied with some kind of distraction is a really important thing to come to terms with. This is something that can be trained. This is really the purpose of meditation—to train this habit to be in a different mode, so that the mind starts to like being in the present moment more and more, and see that it doesn't actually need these distracting thoughts to cling onto in times when there's basically peace or a lack of stimulation around.

So partly we could say this is a habit, but as you mentioned, when there are lots of stimuli coming in, then it stirs the mind up even further.

I think in the modern day, there are so many complexities in modern life. I've often thought that actually one of the pains of modern existence is the pain towards what we call multi-tasking. And I think this is a fallacy because I read an interesting article yesterday or the day before in a San Francisco paper about a scientific study that has shown that attention cannot be drawn in more than one direction effectively. Instead of increasing our focus, we actually have to keep switching focus, and the tasks take longer.

Your comments are right on. The dividing of attention, when we look at what it does inwardly, fragments us. I think as a culture we've kind of lost our ability to be wholehearted with what we do in the present moment. You look at kids—they have that. They're completely with whatever they're doing. You give them one thing to do, and if it engages them, they're one hundred percent with it. Whereas for us, we've been so fragmented by training that it's hard to bring one hundred percent of our attention and energy to anything that we do. And mindfulness does offer a clear alternative of fully being with what is in the present.

I think this gets to another piece of the heart of what I wanted us to explore this morning. Are we, in our worldly life, doing the things that will actually bring us happiness? Or are we getting lost and distracted in our very activities and leading down a trail that will lead somewhere, but not necessarily to real happiness?

And this conditioning is something that really is highlighted by the practice of meditation. When we start to try to come into the present in an ongoing and consistent way, we really see how easily the mind just swings to the past or the future, just out of habit, just out of conditioning. And the good news is that can be changed. That can be retrained, and we can learn a new habit.

So I think these comments have highlighted a lot of the themes that I hoped we would touch on this morning, and I want to go into them all in a little more detail.

Let me just ask, how many people here have been on at least a day-long silent retreat? And how many people have been on a residential meditation retreat? Much of the same population, actually.

That's interesting. One of the things that we find when we try to sustain this practice of mindfulness over eight hours or eight days is that it becomes pretty much a full-time job. It can take all of our attention just to stay in the present moment.

The nice thing about the retreat setting or the day-long setting is we don't have any other responsibilities. We don't have to interact with people. We don't have to carry out our jobs. We don't have to take care of our children or look after our partners. The only task we have in those settings is to be in the present moment with our experience. And we find out how difficult that is. We don't have anything else to do. But how much of the time are we able to be in the present moment, even under these ideal conditions? Ten percent? Twenty percent? A little tiny bit? It's hard. It's tough work. And that's when we don't have anything else to do.

Then we go back into worldly life. As practitioners, if we want to take this practice on as a real commitment, we want to bring that ability to be in the present moment fully into our daily life as well. This is not just something we do on the cushion or during a day-long or in a silent retreat. We really want to live from that place of being in the present moment. And there's no reason that we can't, with training and with practice. That's really what practice is for. It is possible, but it takes a lot of work.

So in lay life, we have this full-time job of wanting to be in the present. We have another full-time job in lay life, in worldly life—earning a livelihood, taking care of our family, looking after our health, doing our volunteer work and service work, looking after aging parents and children, relationships, and so on. So we basically, in worldly life, we have two full-time jobs: being in the present and attentive to all of that, and taking care of all the external things that we need to take care of.

So it's no wonder that it takes a while to put these two full-time jobs together. Don't be discouraged if this doesn't happen automatically or easily. This is a long process of training. They can go together, but what's happening is that we have to divide our attention, or we might say our intention, just as you shared about driving over here and trying to listen to a tape and also follow the detour signs.

In worldly life we need to bring our attention into the present moment. That's one sustained attention we need to maintain. But then we also need to care for all the things of our daily life with a lot of attention also. So we're kind of divided, and I'd say there's an inherent conflict in the beginning for us because of trying to support two intentions, two different intentions at the same time.

I think we are way overscheduled. I think it's really true. And sometimes it seems like the only answer is to jam things in further together. How many of you have seen the movie Himalaya? About the same number who've been on these residential retreats. Himalaya is playing at the Rafael and probably other places in the Bay Area.

It's about village life, theoretically in Tibet—actually filmed in Nepal—and it's about the life of people who grow grain and then trade that grain for salt. You get a sense, it could have been set a thousand years ago, could have been filmed a thousand years ago, you get a sense for the simplicity of the life that people used to live. And this is in our culture as well. In Western culture, farming was the occupation of most of the nation a hundred or two hundred years ago.

That simple down-to-earth life where there weren't things like tax-free mutual funds and a hundred different kinds of sandwiches that you could order every time you go to the deli, ten different activities for your children after they finish the school day. Life was much, much simpler and it kind of lent itself to being in the present moment in a way that modern life really doesn't.

So on some level, I think we probably need to take a look as practitioners at the complexity of our outer lives. And I see in myself as I get older, and I see in a lot of friends as we get older, a real interest in simplifying.

Now, there's a time in life when simplification simply isn't possible. When you're starting a career and raising a family, especially in this area where it's so expensive, there are so many demands that there may not be any choices for simplification. But as we get older and some of the family responsibilities start to lift, I really think we need to look seriously at simplifying and creating space.

When we create space outwardly, it creates so much more space in the mind. It's amazing. Taking the outer clutter away just opens up a huge amount of inner spaciousness. So even choices like how much television we choose to watch, how many films we go to, how many magazines we read during a week—renunciation in those areas can make a difference too. I think the outer is important, but I want to focus most on the inner.

Part of the problem is that we have these dual intentions: to look after ourselves and our family and to be present while we do it. But worldly life offers so many seductive possibilities. There are so many ways that we can lose track of our spiritual orientation in worldly life because our culture doesn't support spiritual values. I don't believe it supports them at all. Try to talk to your employer about taking an extra week's leave to do a meditation retreat and see how supportive the external situation is.

Worldly life offers many possibilities that are intriguing, fulfilling, rich—lots of people to meet, lots of things to do, ways to become known, ways to serve. But they don't necessarily support a spiritual life. And I think the problem is that we can get lost in any one of these avenues.

I was talking to someone this week who had lost their partner to cancer. She was saying that before her partner's death, she was very wrapped up in her career—it was almost more important than her family. Then going through the illness and death of her partner totally shifted her priorities back. Her career right now feels kind of hollow to her because she sees how much more important the people in her life are. But until we get a wake-up call like that, I think we can all tend to put a huge amount of emphasis on career. There are a lot of fun things about many work situations these days, but at the end of the day, I wonder if it's the most important thing in our life. Again, something I think we need to look at.

I want to read a couple of quotations from a new breed of spiritual teacher that's popping up. They're not connected with any tradition, but they've sort of woken up on their own. One prime example right now is Eckhart Tolle. His book, The Power of Now, has been on the San Francisco bestseller list for something like four months. It's not on the U.S. bestseller list, I can assure you, but it has been on the Bay Area bestseller list for a while. He's fifty-three years old, German by birth, now lives in Canada, and just had a spontaneous awakening some years ago. He spent time sitting on a park bench and sharing his understanding with people who wandered by, but is now teaching. I think his book is pretty good.

He's talking about working with our difficult emotions, the afflictive emotions of the mind: "All these emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who you are beyond name and form."

This is a little dense, so let me read this again. All afflictive emotions are modifications of one primordial, undifferentiated emotion that has its origin in the loss of awareness of who you are beyond name and form. In other words, who we truly are is not this body and this personality. Who we are truly is something that goes beyond our name and form, something the Buddha pointed to as the deathless. All the major religions point to an aspect of immortality in our being that's formless. He's saying that when we lose touch with knowing that we are deathless in the most fundamental way, there's a deep kind of anguish that comes out of that.

I'd also like to read from another teacher in this same mode. His name is Tony Parsons. He's British, born in 1933, and he had one of these spontaneous awakenings when he was twenty. His book is called As It Is: "Whatever I seek or think I want, all of my desires are only a reflection of my longing to come home. Home is my original nature. It is right here, simply in what is."

These two are basically saying the same thing. Eckhart Tolle is pointing to the pain of that loss, and Tony Parsons is pointing to the desire to get back. What Parsons is saying is that all forms of desire are really just a desire to get back to knowing who we truly are, because that's the only place that lasting fulfillment can come from.

What I think happens in our worldly life often is that all these myriad forms of desire point us in all different directions—toward money, toward fame, toward sexual relationships, toward pleasures of food and drink, great houses.

And all these kinds of desires that proliferate are misleading indicators of what we really want. What we really want is to know our being beyond name and form, beyond birth and death, beyond perishing. But because we've lost touch with that, we seek for it in many different avenues that can't ultimately lead to lasting happiness.

This is not to say that these outer activities are wrong. We need to be involved in a livelihood that takes care of ourselves. We need to be involved in looking after our family, our partners, our parents. So the question is: to what extent can we be involved in those areas without getting misled about what's really important and where our real happiness is going to come from?

To me, the best description of where we get misled is spelled out by the Buddha in a sutta from the Anguttara Nikaya called "The Vicissitudes of Life." It starts off like this: "These eight worldly conditions, O monks, keep the world turning around, and the world turns around these eight worldly conditions. What eight? Gain and loss, success and failure, praise and blame, pleasure and pain."

He's basically saying the way we get misled is we mistake these eight conditions as the most important things in life. The degree to which we invest in them is the degree to which we carry ourselves off from our true spiritual track.

I find these very helpful topics for reflection—to look in my own life at how much my focus in living, where I put my time and energy, is around these eight situations as opposed to the true spiritual practice of knowing who I am, coming back to my source.

The problem with these conditions is they're always changeable. They always alternate. Have you ever known anyone who has experienced only gain, only success, only pleasure, or only praise? It's not possible. They alternate for all of us. And if our happiness is bound up just with the positive half, we're going to get slammed when we encounter the negative.

It's not through any fault of our own that we encounter the negative. Everybody encounters loss and pain and blame and failure—even the Buddha. I'll tell some stories about the Buddha's difficulties as we go, just so you know. Even if you're really cooled out, these things happen to you.

Let me talk a little bit about each of them, starting with gain and loss. I don't really want to get into the great losses in our life—losing a partner to death, losing a child, loss of parents. Those are major things, and hopefully we only encounter those relatively few times in our life. But mostly the Buddha talked about gain and loss in more worldly terms.

In worldly terms, this is a great territory, the Bay Area, to see gain and loss. You've probably noticed the stories in the newspapers over the last year—the dot-com downturn, the stock market collapse. There are huge stories of wealth rising and falling in this area.

I'll tell one from my experience. About thirteen years ago, I went to work for Microsoft when they were still a small company. I worked for them for about five years. It was after I left they started getting into all their trouble—that's their problem.

My first boss, the guy who hired me into the company, was a really great guy. I liked him a lot as a person and as a manager. Shortly after I was there, he got into a political difficulty in the company. He got passed over for a promotion, and the job went to somebody else in our office who he didn't respect and didn't think was a good manager. He was very upset that he'd been passed over, and even more upset that now he had to report to this other person who he felt was not as good a manager as he was.

One thing led to another, and one day, in a peak of anger, he resigned—tendered his resignation. Over the weekend, he had second thoughts, because I came to find out he had about 10,000 stock options back then in Microsoft. Over the years since then, Microsoft stock has split a total of 72 times. So today that would be something like 720,000 shares of Microsoft, which he could have bought at something like a dollar a share. I figured out that today he would have been worth about $40 million if he had stayed with the company.

But in a fit of anger, he tendered his resignation. He called up on Monday and said, "You know, I'm very sorry..."

I'd like to take it back. But his new manager said, "I'm sorry. Your resignation has already been accepted."

Forty million dollars. Gone. Just like that.

A friend of mine commented, because of the stock market collapse, that he knows people who are worth twenty million dollars now who feel themselves to be poor because a year ago they were worth forty million. There's tremendous dukkha in the collapse of the stock market. We don't hear much about it, perhaps because people at that level are embarrassed to talk about feeling poor with twenty million dollars—and probably they should be. But there is genuine suffering in these cycles of gain and loss.

The Buddha continues by exploring how we can relate to these conditions skillfully. He says these eight worldly conditions are encountered by an uninstructed worldling—someone who hasn't heard the teachings—and they are also encountered by an instructed noble disciple. What distinguishes these two?

When an uninstructed worldling experiences gain, he does not reflect upon it thus: "This gain that has come to me is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change." He does not know it as it really is. When he encounters loss, he does not reflect: "This is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change." He does not understand its true nature.

With such a person, gain and loss keep his mind completely engrossed. When gain comes, he is elated; when he meets with loss, he is dejected. Being thus caught up in likes and dislikes, he will not be freed from birth, aging, and death, from sorrow, grief, and despair. He will not be freed from suffering.

But when an instructed noble disciple experiences gain, he reflects: "This gain that has come to me is impermanent, bound up with suffering, subject to change." He reflects in the same way when loss comes upon him. Understanding these things as they really are, they do not engross his mind. Thus he will not be elated by gain or dejected by loss. Having given up likes and dislikes, he will be freed from birth, aging, and death, from sorrow, grief, and despair. He will be freed from suffering.

This is the difference between an instructed noble disciple and an uninstructed worldling.

The Buddha points us toward an equanimity of mind as we meet the changing conditions that life presents. A crucial aspect of this wisdom is seeing the impermanent nature of gain and loss. We understand that nobody is always gaining, nobody is always being praised, nobody experiences only the positive side of these conditions. These things change for everybody.

There's another remarkable story from the Tibetan tradition that illustrates this. It concerns a teacher named Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, who was born in Tibet in 1932, escaped to India in 1959, and became a great Dzogchen master.

Meditation in the Noble Eightfold Path

In this retreat dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the meditation section of the Noble Eightfold Path, focusing on the three essential qualities that define vipassanā practice: right effort, right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi). Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Armstrong explains how these factors work together to create "full awareness in the present moment" - the essence of insight meditation.

The talk emphasizes mindfulness as the heart of the meditative path, describing it as "bare attention" that simply witnesses experience without interference. Armstrong explores how our karmic momentum from past actions creates the mental proliferation (papañca) that pulls us away from present-moment awareness, and how consistent mindfulness practice gradually weakens these patterns. He discusses the balance between mindfulness - which brings alertness and clarity - and samādhi, which provides stability and strength of attention.

Offered during the early days of a retreat when practitioners often struggle with restless mind and doubt, this teaching provides both practical guidance and encouragement. Armstrong reminds us that like drops of rain filling a large jar, each moment of mindfulness accumulates to create profound transformation, ultimately leading toward the "empty center" of the Eightfold Path - nibbāna itself.

So it's the second night of the retreat, and I trust that everybody's hanging in there. Hanging might be the operative word after a day like today. The first few days of retreat are not supposed to be easygoing. It's supposed to be difficult, and if it's been hard today, that's par for the course.

I was struck in the interviews today by how much equanimity and maturity people were bringing to these early days. Once you've gone through the experience a number of times, you just know that the first three days are going to be full of restless mind and aches and pains and a lot of discontent and struggle. People were just coping with that and not suffering too much with it.

I wanted to read a quote from a well-known spiritual teacher and see if you know who the author is: "Enter by the narrow gate, for the gate is wide and the way is easy that leads to suffering, and those who go through it are many. But the gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to true life, and those who find it are few."

Do you recognize the speaker? It's Jesus. I had not come across this in my Presbyterian upbringing. It didn't seem part of what they wanted to share with us about the church, but I discovered it in Stephen Mitchell's book, The Gospel According to Jesus, and he attributes it to Matthew 7:13. The gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to true life, and those who find it are few.

This practice is really simple. I think Joseph gave the basic instructions in about ten minutes the other morning, but it's obviously not so easy. In the first days of retreat, one of the common things that I see coming up in myself, especially when I do a long retreat, is a form of doubt that basically shows itself in the question: What on earth am I doing here? I can't remember at all why I signed up or why I came. I think of a hundred other things I should be doing with my time.

You look around and try to get some support from the people around you, and that doesn't necessarily help very much either. In the hall it looks like everybody's sitting like Buddhas—no ruffles on those oceans. You go out to walk and, frankly, it looks strange. Have you ever just stopped and looked at a walking period from kind of an outside point of view? It looks strange.

Ajahn Chah came here for the first time in 1979. His style of practice is not intensive like this—sit, walk, sit, walk, sit, walk. His style is more: "Hey, come live with me in the forest for five years. Don't get involved with much. Ordain as a nun or a monk, and your mind will quiet." They do a lot of talking and work and form community, so he thought this style was kind of extreme.

One afternoon in a walking period, he would go around to different people on the front lawn who were doing their walking. He'd say something in Thai and give them this big smile, then walk on. He'd go to the next person, say the same thing in Thai, and then walk on. At the end of the day, a few people asked the translator what Ajahn Chah was saying to us when he would come and talk to us during walking. The translator said, "Oh, Ajahn Chah was saying, 'I hope you get well soon.'"

I hope we all get well soon. But it does look funny, doesn't it? It's kind of a funny thing we're doing, and sometimes it's hard to remember exactly what we're about here.

In tonight's talk, I really wanted to go over the basics of meditation the way it's described in the Noble Eightfold Path and remind ourselves of the mechanics of what we're about—just so when that question comes up, "What on earth am I doing here?" maybe there will be a little more of an answer.

You could say that our way of meditation could be put in the phrase "full awareness in the present moment." It's not a bad description of our vipassana practice. If we tease apart the different aspects of this phrase—the fullness, the awareness, and the present moment—we actually come up with the qualities of effort to stay present, awareness or mindfulness, and the fullness described by the word samadhi, usually translated as concentration.

In this little phrase, we actually have the qualities of effort, mindfulness, and concentration, which are the three aspects of the Noble Eightfold Path in the meditation section. These are the three qualities I want to talk about this evening: effort, mindfulness, and concentration.

I think it's important as we consider them to think for a moment about what the Noble Eightfold Path is for. The Noble Eightfold Path is the way to the end of suffering, or nirvana. The way I understand it, it's often represented in a diagram, as it is on the wall behind me, of a wheel that has eight spokes. Like all good wheels, the center is empty. The hub is empty through which an axle could go. Then there are the eight spokes, which are the eight points of the path.

We're kind of eccentric. We've wandered away from our center.

And we're kind of on the outside of that wheel. As we travel the eight spokes, we actually walk toward the center of the wheel, which is emptiness, or the unconditioned, or nibbana. So as I understand the path, the eight spokes all lead to one point, which is the center—emptiness, nibbana, the unconditioned.

I think it's particularly striking in the meditation section because that's where the descriptions are most evocative. I think that the Buddha was describing from an outside view the experience of nibbana. So these three qualities of effort, mindfulness, and concentration more or less describe the state of mind that the Buddha inhabited. And as we follow them as closely as we can, we imitate his mind, and we more or less jump into the awakened state, or as close as we can get.

The whole practice of meditation is just trying to approximate over and over, as best we can, the nature of the Buddha's mind and heart. And I think these three steps particularly describe that quite eloquently.

I'd like to start by talking about mindfulness. This is really the heart of the meditative path. Very simply, we could say it's paying clear attention to something in the present moment—something real in the present moment. There's a sign in a Las Vegas casino that says, "You must be present to win." It's true in Las Vegas and it's true in meditation. If you're not present, you don't win this particular game.

But when we do dwell in the present, we find we can avoid a lot of problems, because the moment is basically so simple. As the Dalai Lama said, the moment is the only place that we can experience love.

This quality of being in the present is often described as bare attention. This term was coined by Nyanaponika Thera. It's a great description because it points to an awareness that isn't actively interfering or really even engaging with its contents. It's an awareness that isn't choosing or comparing or evaluating or judging, or projecting, or interfering. It's an awareness that is simply with the bare experience of what is.

What is is the truth. It is the Dharma. Practicing the Dharma means being with the truth, being with the moment just the way that it is.

We've forgotten how to do this. We've gotten lost in so many concepts. And sometimes it takes a shock to bring us back.

Somebody came to see Picasso early in his career, when he was not yet a world-famous celebrity. The guy said, "Why don't you paint something more realistic?" He didn't quite dig this abstract cubist stuff. Picasso said, "What do you mean? What do you consider realistic?" The guy pulled out his wallet and said, "Well, I've got a photograph of my wife. Why don't you paint more like this?" Picasso said, "Is that realistic? Is that what your wife looks like?" The guy said, "Yeah, that's really what she looks like." Picasso said, "Hmm, she's very small, isn't she? She's also rather flat. Is that really what she looks like?"

Through all of our concepts about reality, we've wandered away from direct contact. Our practice really brings us back in touch. And we find some very interesting things about it.

This won't be news for any of you, but I'd just like to refresh it for us in our experience. So I'd like to ask you to try a short experiment. Just sit for a moment. Eyes can be open or closed—it doesn't matter. Simply be present without any particular focus and be aware of what is. Then notice when the mind starts to drift into thought activity. If it's drifting into thought activity, let that thought activity go for a little bit. And now come back again to the present moment.

Make that effort to come out of the thoughts, attending in the present moment. And let the mind, if it wants, drift into thought activity.

So just take a look now within your experience. You can stop that exercise. Within your experience, what is the feeling in you when you're just easily in the present moment? Any comments? Anybody willing to share? What did that feel like?

Peaceful? Bright? Open? Vivid. Spacious. Embodied.

Thank you. So these are some of the qualities of present moment attention. Then when the mind moved into the thought activity, what did that feel like?

Tense. Removed. Drifting, heady, busy.

Thank you. Let's try it a little bit different way. I want to ask you to think a particular thought and encourage you to get into it. I'd like to ask you to think the thought, "I'm really a bad meditator." And see if you can summon up some conviction as you think about it. Just take a moment, maybe close your eyes and think that.

Okay, and let go of that thought. What did that thought feel like?

Contracted. A heaviness around the heart. Strained. Depressed.

Wasn't very pleasant, was it? Okay. Let go of that thought. Again, close your eyes for a minute and just let yourself think the thought, "I am." I am. And now let go of that thought.

What did that one feel like? Was it as strong as "I'm a bad meditator"? More neutral? Did you feel any of the contraction? Some did? Okay. Some did, some didn't. So for some it was quite neutral. For some there was still some contraction.

Now again, go back into not thinking any thoughts. Just experience the state of awareness and presence. And now just come back and open your eyes if you like. How did that feel? Again, not having any particular thought. Relief? Did it have that kind of open, spacious, vivid quality again?

Good. This is really the contrast between the state of awareness and the state of being engaged in thinking. Meditation is kind of a bipolar condition. And we're either in this present moment awareness to some degree, or we're lost in this tissue of thoughts that brings with it qualities of being contracted or tense or strained or removed, cut off.

Our human situation is one that we have a whole kind of tidal wave. You could say a karmic momentum that's lodged in us, that's built up from our past hopes and fears and plans and aspirations and intentions and actions. All the places we've put our energy over the years to find satisfaction, to find happiness, to avoid the unpleasant, have generated an impact, a momentum in our hearts and minds.

And when we sit, that's what manifests as this drifting into thought. Although we might have our intention to be just in the present moment, it generally doesn't take too long before this karmic wave starts to assert itself. And we're away. We're away from the present.

This experience is one meaning of the equanimity phrase that I'm sure a lot of you know: all beings are the heirs to their karma. This is one way in which we inherit our karma. All those intentional actions, all those investments of time and energy live on in us through this force of the karmic momentum. It's really made up of our past clinging, our past investments.

And as the Buddha said, by whatsoever a person clings to, by that Mara will track them down. As meditators, we are sitting ducks. Mara is on our scent and knows just where to find us because we aren't defended. We have taken away all our usual escapes and defenses against this karmic momentum. And when we sit and open ourselves to the present, we're opening ourselves to that karmic force of our own hearts and minds.

This really provides the juice or the grist for our meditation practice. It's a powerful thing. You can tell, especially in these first few days, because it's what sweeps us away again and again, despite all our good intentions—this projective power of mind based on past clinging.

So often in the beginning of a retreat, people will come to interviews and report, "I could be with about two breaths, and then I was away for 20 minutes." This is not uncommon in the early part of a retreat. So if this is your batting average today, know that you're not alone. That's the force of this momentum.

This image of being swept away is one that I think illustrates the feeling of the experience of being caught in this wave of thoughts. And it's interesting that when the Buddha described our current situation in the suttas, he used a lot of water imagery, just like this. He talked about the difficulties of mind being compared to the influxes. He talked about the flood of becoming, the tides of conceiving, and the ocean of existence.

We often feel that we're at the mercy of this tide. We very seldom have any choice about what comes up, what is swept in with it. Sometimes it's really pleasant. I'm sure many of us have spent good parts of today thinking about pleasant experiences in the past or looking forward to pleasant experiences in the future, remembering vacations or family or loved ones. Sometimes it's painful and we don't have that switch to determine. The painful often comes unbidden. And so we think about regrets, remorse, blame, and anger related to past incidents. We can easily develop fear or anxiety about future incidents to come.

The advice is to be mindful. But at first, this doesn't seem to make much difference. We can be mindful at a number of moments through a period of meditation. It doesn't seem to do much to that karmic tide. And so it doesn't feel like mindfulness is any big deal.

The problem is that our mindfulness is like a baby. And this karmic momentum is all grown up. Because we've been following it for most of our life. According to the Buddha, we've been following it for countless lifetimes. So it's an adult, fully born, strong, capable. Mindfulness is just a little twig in the face of that for us.

But the important thing is to take a look and see how that mindful presence actually feels. This is the important thing. And so to notice the times when we're not lost in those thoughts, to notice the time when we're in touch with the vividness, the peace, the embodiment, the ease of the present moment, and to trust in that.

It may be a baby form of mindfulness, but it's real. And that baby form of mindfulness will grow up just by giving it our time and energy and attention over and over and over. And when it grows up and becomes strong, then it has the power to undo that karmic momentum, that karmic tide.

Again, with a water image, the Buddha said that mindfulness can dam any flood. Mindfulness can dam any flood.

It can interrupt the flow of conditioning. It can stop the momentum entirely. So every time we have a moment of mindfulness, we're applying a kind of brake to that wheel that's been built up with so much momentum. And as we apply it over and over again, sometimes that wheel comes to a stop.

So it's important to get in touch with the feeling of those moments when you're in touch with the present, to whatever degree. Start to know that feeling. Know that this is the feeling you want to connect with again and nurture and grow.

There's no technique for getting to that kind of awareness. The technique is just a tool for honing it, as it were. But the actual summoning up of that kind of awareness has to come from someplace really deep in us. The more we do it, the more easily it comes forth. We're conditioning the mind in that direction. But there's no technique to bring it forth. The more we get to know it, the easier it is to find.

And we start to realize this is what it means to imitate the Buddha's awakened mind. In touch with the actuality of our experience, we find there is a quality of freedom in it. Just as Carol was speaking about last night, learning to trust in this awareness. It not only is the doorway to freedom—there is freedom here and now when we touch that.

Something else that's useful in relating with mindfulness: we have a lot of training in vipassana of being mindful of the difficult. We spend a lot of dharma talks discussing the hindrances and greed, aversion, and delusion. We tend to spend a lot of time on the first two noble truths in dharma talks. And we become quite expert, especially in the early years of our practice, about working with the negative, working with the difficult.

And we sometimes forget to pay as much attention to the wholesome when it comes. I saw this in my own practice again and again. A moment of peace or happiness would arise, and I could have been noting quite steadily—anger, guilt, fear, blame, resentment, panic, desire. And a moment of peace would come, and I would sort of stop noting.

I realized that what was happening in my mind was this subconscious belief: "Oh, this is what it's supposed to be like." So I would just take that moment for granted. This is what it's supposed to be like, so I wouldn't think to notice it. But then I wasn't really tuning in to my own growth. I wasn't tuning into the beautiful qualities that were starting to unfold in me.

It's really important to tune into the beautiful—as important or more important than tuning into the difficult. Because the corollary of taking the wholesome for granted, because it was supposed to be like that, meant the unwholesome was not supposed to be there. So when the unwholesome was there, it meant I'd done something wrong. That's the very denial of equanimity. There's no ground for equanimity if we hold a view like that.

When we see with more equanimity, we see the arising of the wholesome and the arising of the unwholesome on more or less equal footing. And I think that's because this pure state of mindfulness, the empty state of open awareness, doesn't have any bias. It's not really enthralled to the negative, and it's not really enthralled to the wholesome. It's free of both. And it can see either one with equal ease.

It's very interesting in the suttas of the Buddha that they all tend to be very balanced in this kind of way. If he talks about the first two noble truths, it's always balanced by the last two noble truths. Suffering and its cause are always balanced by teaching on the end of suffering and the way.

So we begin to bring this kind of even-handed seeing into our own practice, into our mindfulness, delighting in the wholesome. We appreciate it when it's there. We don't take it for granted. We know it and appreciate it as a sign of our growth and development in the dharma.

Right mindfulness includes with it also an attitude of real acceptance. Because we don't think that the unwholesome is something that's gone wrong. It's just part of the makeup of our nature. So this acceptance actually has a kind of friendliness to it. And there is actually within true mindfulness a quality of metta, or loving-kindness—this embracing quality.

So a way that our metta practice and our vipassana practice come together is in this experience of a warm attention to whatever is arising for us.

So also noting that quality of warmth when it's there, that inclusive, friendly quality.

I gave part of this talk in Italy last year, and I had to share a story to illustrate this friendly quality, so I'll tell it again because it's a story I enjoy. I don't know if you remember a few years ago, there was a movie called Life is Beautiful, starring Roberto Benigni, the well-known Italian actor. He won the Academy Award the following year. It was a very moving story about people who tried to maintain their spirit in the concentration camps in Germany.

When Benigni won the Academy Award for it, he could hardly stop talking—he's a very ebullient kind of guy, as you probably noticed. So having won the Academy Award, he got to go to the White House to meet Clinton, who was president back then. When he met Clinton in the Oval Office, he ran up to him and jumped into his arms, saying, "I'm so happy to meet you!"

This is a very good illustration of that kind of friendliness—jumping into the arms of our experience, saying, "So happy to meet you." And Clinton, who I think is six foot four, held Benigni quite easily. The Secret Service guys were kind of freaking out, but it didn't bother Clinton at all. A good image of our metta.

This mindfulness is not only free in the moment, but it's onward leading. It goes further. It goes deeper. Its power builds as we access it, moment after moment, and it starts to change our relationship to our experience—which is to say, to our life—one moment at a time.

There's a quotation from the Dhammapada, where the Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." It's important to remember this. When we first touch the mindfulness, it seems weak. But one drop after another, huge jars can fill up.

When I was a monk in forest monasteries, the jars that were recommended for drinking water were these large earthenware jars about four feet tall and three feet in diameter. They'd be put beside the roof of our kuti. Cloth would be tied over the top, and when it rained, the water from the roof would pour off into the jar. Little by little over the course of the rainy season, the jar would fill up.

So that's the size of jar we need to think about filling with our drops of mindfulness. It's not a quick filling, but little by little that jar will be filled. Inevitably, it has to be. No moment of mindfulness is wasted. They all go to filling up the jar. It may not feel like anything is happening for a long time, but things are happening.

I had an interview with someone a couple of weeks ago from a group that my wife and I lead in California, Spirit Rock Senior Students. He was talking about the feeling of slowness of progress in his practice, but he said he actually still had a lot of faith. He told me a story about when he was a teenager and needed to earn some money over the summer. His girlfriend's father offered him some grunt work, which was to break up the concrete floor of a carport in their yard.

You can imagine how much concrete goes into a carport—probably twenty feet by twenty feet. That's a lot of concrete. So the father gave him a sledgehammer, pointed him to the concrete and told him, "Your summer job is to break it up." But he also helpfully gave him one technique: "Start near the corner."

So he started about eighteen inches in from a corner, and he just started pounding the concrete with a sledgehammer. Nothing happened. Pounding and pounding and pounding, no impact whatsoever. Pounding and pounding and pounding. Finally, a little crack appeared right around where he'd been hitting, and that was the way in. Then he started pounding around the crack, and pretty soon he had that eighteen-inch square out, then on to the next.

It wasn't an easy thing, but the mindfulness practice is like that. We apply this mindfulness to this wave of karmic momentum again and again and again, and it doesn't feel like it's having any impact. But after we do it enough times, sometime there's a crack in it. It comes to a halt. We open to just the freshness of the moment, really uncontaminated by the past. And then we see there's been an impact. And we keep going. We keep going with that constancy.

The Buddha compared it to an ocean-going vessel that's been brought up onto land near the ocean and just left out by the ocean.

And he said that the riggings and the sails of that ocean-going vessel will easily weaken and rot away in the elements of the salt air, the wind, the sun, and the rain. They're just left exposed to those elements. He said, in the same way, our fetters, our bondage, easily weaken and rot away under the influence of meditation practice. We just have to have the trust to be steady with it. It does rot away.

So this is the quality of mindfulness. I want to say one last thing about mindfulness before we go on. We often think of mindfulness as paying attention to the here and now. But there's another aspect to it that's really important, and you get this if you read the Satipatthana Sutta, the Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness. When the Buddha describes mindfulness, what he says again and again is the quality of knowing our experience. This is what comes through in every passage in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness.

Joseph referred to this yesterday morning: knowing that I breathe in long or knowing that I breathe in short; knowing that a feeling tone is pleasant or unpleasant or neither; knowing that the mind has desire or aversion or non-desire or non-aversion; knowing that the hindrances are present or absent, and so forth.

So in addition to this awareness, there's a quality in mindfulness of knowing what our experience is. This is an important point, because this knowing, which is key, is an aspect of wisdom. This is the entryway for wisdom to come in. And it's really wisdom that liberates us.

Let me give a really simple example of this. Wisdom is to see and understand things the way they are. It's not anything in our memory. It's not something that we've learned or stored up. It's a present moment clarity of knowing and seeing things the way they are. That's what's freeing.

Carol was talking last night about this beautiful, very helpful line from Ajahn Sumedho: "It's like this." Desire is like this. Non-desire is like this. Fear is like this. Confidence feels like this. Suffering is like this. Non-suffering is like this. The reason I believe that's so powerful is because it really draws out that wisdom aspect of mindfulness. We're seeing what is, but we're seeing it in its true nature and with some perspective.

This is also what's happening in the noting practice. If you do the noting practice, you're giving yourself a verbal cue moment after moment of exactly what your experience is, and that strengthens this wisdom quality of mindfulness. In the end, it's not necessary to verbally label it, but it's helpful when there's a struggle, when there's a conflict.

In the Thai forest tradition, mindfulness and wisdom are so closely related that they often talk about them as one word: satipaññā in the Pali. Sati is mindfulness, paññā is wisdom. They often talk about the growth of satipaññā, both together.

Now, mindfulness and effort. Sometimes we can abide in the present moment effortlessly. I'd be interested to hear your reflections at some time: what was it like when I asked you earlier in this talk to just abide without any particular effort in this sitting? Sometimes we can do that for a fairly long time in an easy way. Sometimes when we apply more effort or more technique, it can actually intrude on that ease. So it's wonderful when that effortless abiding comes and you can rest there, but it's never guaranteed.

So effort is stressed in the Eightfold Path very highly. In fact, I would say that of the wholesome factors that the Buddha talks about in the suttas, probably the four that come most often are energy or virya, which is the forerunner of effort—it's the source of effort—mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. We basically have three of those factors here in terms of effort, mindfulness, and concentration, with wisdom being the fourth. So effort is really all that separates us from liberation and from freedom.

Classically, effort is defined as abandoning the unwholesome and developing the wholesome.

And virya carries this beautiful sense. In fact, in Tibetan, the word for virya is sandrul, and in Tibetan understanding it means taking delight in what is wholesome. I love reflecting on this quality of effort—that the energy of effort, the very purpose of effort, is for us to take delight in what is wholesome.

This means delighting in qualities of heart and mind like wisdom and clear seeing, generosity and metta, non-clinging, renunciation, contentment, and compassion. I often like to pause and reflect that this is what unites us as a group. We're brought together as a sangha because together we all love and take delight in what is wholesome. Otherwise, we wouldn't be spending six weeks or three months cultivating these factors.

The Buddha said that just as the river Ganges flows east, when a person develops right effort, that person will flow to nibbana, to liberation.

In retreat practice, the primary form of right effort in Vipassana is simply to be present to what is—just to touch what's coming out of the nothingness into existence in this moment.

John Donne wrote: "I throw myself down in my chamber and invite God and his angels hither. And when they are there, I neglect God and his angels for the noise of a fly, for the rattling of a coach, for the whining of a door."

In the middle of this beauty and mystery, we give ourselves to distractions. So our effort is to come back out of distraction and contact that present moment.

But this brings up an interesting question: Have you ever tried to really find this so-called present moment? Is it findable? If you have one, I'd love to see it.

Yesterday morning during sitting, there was an insect making a very loud chirp every few seconds somewhere in the courtyard. In Zen, they have a saying: "How do you stop the sound of the river?" As I sat there, I experimented with trying to stop the sound of that insect chirping every few seconds. What was interesting to me is that the more I tried, the further I got from it. But the more I relaxed, the closer it came to me.

This effort is really a graceful kind of dance, and a crucial part of it is the quality of relaxation. The more we can relax really deeply within ourselves, the more the present moment is just there. When we strain after it, it runs away.

You can play with this sense of relaxing very deeply and easily within yourself as you begin a sitting, and see how the moment comes closer. Because fundamentally, the present is ungraspable. It's not solid. It's not a thing. It's a changing experience.

We often think that with effort we have to do something special to do it right. I especially found this when I started doing metta practice intensively a few years ago, never having done it before. The biggest question that came up for me in the first week was: "Is this going to work for me?" I remember feeling this in my early days of Vipassana too—"Is this going to work for me?"

But the wonderful thing is we can't be aware wrongly. If we simply make that effort to touch the present, it will start this chain of change and opening.

When Ajahn Sumedho was teaching at Spirit Rock this past April, he said that in his opinion, the biggest obstacle for experienced meditators in the West was that we didn't trust our practice enough. I think this is a really accurate observation.

We simply need to surrender into this relaxed presence with the present moment, and the Dharma will take care of the rest. It's like Munindra's statement: "If you sit and know that you're sitting, the whole of the Dharma will unfold for you." We really can trust this.

This doesn't mean we shouldn't make effort. When we're lost in distractedness, we need to make the effort to come back. But having made that effort, that's really all we need to do. The rest will be taken care of for us.

The unskillful sense of effort is trying to make something special happen—struggling with our experience. You might take a look today: Where has the struggle been? Where has it not been easy to open and relax to your experience? Is it physical discomfort? I spent a lot of time working with this in the early years of my practice. I had the idea that I had to be completely physically comfortable throughout my body before I could meditate.

It didn't happen very often. I would spend an entire day trying to sort out these blocks. Then the body would be relatively clear, and I'd have one meditation. I'd go out walking, come back, and find more contraction. Then I'd have to start all over again. It was a complete waste of time.

If I had simply relaxed into the discomfort with equanimity, my deepening would have gone much more easily, much more quickly. I had to learn this the hard way.

The wandering mind is often quite frustrating in the early days—this inability to focus, being all over the place. But if we try to stop the thinking, we just become more tense. And of course, thoughts are not the problem. A stray thought comes and goes; it's not an obstacle to mindfulness. Thought isn't the problem—it's our hanging onto thoughts that creates difficulty.

We get fascinated by their content, mesmerized by them. The stickiness is from our side, not the thought's side. The thought is quite happy to arise and pass, just like a sound. It's we who grab it.

So becoming aware of the feeling of peace, ease, and openness when we're present, and becoming aware of the sense of struggle when we're caught in some kind of distractedness—of course we know we ought to let go. We all know that's a good idea. But sometimes we just can't.

In those times when there's a caughtness with thought, when we can't let go, we can also tune into compassion for yourself in that moment. This is the truth of suffering. It is the fact of bondage. And being open to our own suffering opens us to the suffering of others.

The last of the three factors in the meditation portion of the path is samadhi. There's no word in English that really translates this effectively. It's usually translated as concentration, but that's a little off the mark. When there's no word in a language that translates a concept, it means we don't have that concept in this culture. In fact, in no European culture do I know of a word for samadhi. It's simply not in our vocabulary.

It took me a long time to figure out what samadhi was about, what concentration was truly about. Concentration in English means something like narrowing attention exclusively down to this little part of existence, not wanting to be bothered with anything else. There's an excluding quality going on.

Samadhi doesn't have this exclusive property. The samadhi mind is concentrated rather like frozen orange juice is concentrated—meaning that all the good stuff has been squeezed together and all the dross has been tossed away. Once it's concentrated in that way, it has come together. It's very strong. Concentrated orange juice, if you take a bite of it, is intense. It's powerful. So is the concentrated mind, the mind that has collected itself.

This is probably a better translation of samadhi: collection. The mind that has collected itself is stable, steady, still, unmoving. And it's strong. There's a strength to it. Because of this strength, it's not so easily moved by the arising of the hindrances. This is one of the great benefits of samadhi.

You can sort of take your samadhi temperature by finding out how long you're able to connect with the present moment. That's the measure, the metric of samadhi. But it's not samadhi itself.

Samadhi is an inner experience. And the length of time of connecting in the present is just like a thermometer reading of it—it's not the real thing. So get familiar with that sense. When you're easily in the present, when there's that stability of attention, that's the quality of samadhi.

One of the great opportunities in retreat is to develop samadhi much more than is usually available in daily life, and a great support is slowing down. When the body slows down, it sends a message and the mind also tends to slow down. So that karmic momentum tends to be interrupted a little bit. As you move around the building, as you get lunch, slowing down somewhat—to the degree that it's comfortable for you—will help develop the samadhi. And as Trungpa said, this slows down the speed of neurotic mind.

So just to sum up: mindfulness and concentration need to be balanced. Mindfulness brings in qualities of awakeness, alertness, brightness, interest, and clarity. These are all energizing qualities. The samadhi brings in qualities of peace, stability, stillness, and calm.

One of the ways to check your practice is: are they both present as you meditate? If the mindfulness side—the awareness, alertness, brightness side—is on the strong side, then there will be a kind of disturbing energy. If the concentration side is stronger, there may be stillness, but there won't be very much knowing. That means that wisdom quality that really sees and knows our experience as it is won't be functioning. It won't be bright and alive. One of my teachers, in a kind of facetious way, describes this as "stupid samadhi." He talks about it quite pejoratively. It just means that it needs a factor added to it, which is this alert, aware, interested clarity of mindfulness.

So be aware of those balances. Mindfulness is kind of like water—like clear water that goes with anything. It doesn't have a special flavor of its own, but that's why it can accommodate every other flavor. It goes with anything, and that's why it's available in any situation. It is the liberating factor because of its entryway to wisdom. Wisdom comes in via the doorway of mindfulness. And that's why the Buddha said that heedfulness is the path to the deathless. Heedlessness is the way to death. And I love the Pali rendering of this which is from the Dhammapada, which says: "Heedfulness is the path to the deathless." It's also the open door to all the wholesome qualities that delight in the wholesome. Wholesomeness really flowers through mindfulness.

I wanted to talk about these topics tonight just to illustrate a little more of the mechanics of our practice. But also to remind us all: however much we talk about the mechanics, however much the Buddha talked about the mechanics, what goes on here is a total mystery. I don't know how it works. I don't know why it works. I'm not even sure the Buddha did.

What I know is that this silent awareness heals us and frees us. How does it do that? How is it that when we drop this karmic momentum of self-interest, some purity starts to shine through and acquires a tremendous momentum, an unstoppable momentum? Where does that wholesome power come from? I don't know. It seems to be built into the very fabric of our hearts and minds, into the very fabric of the universe.

But I do know that all we need to do is stay in that silent awareness and let it work through us. Let the Dharma do its work.

I'll close with this quotation from the Satipatthana Sutta: "Friends, this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, and for the realization of nibbana—namely, this establishment of mindfulness."

Let's just sit together for a minute.

The Four Noble Truths

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the Four Noble Truths as taught in the Buddha's first discourse, the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), delivered at Sarnath after his enlightenment. Armstrong skillfully addresses common misconceptions, clarifying that the Buddha never said "life is suffering" but rather identified dukkha as an inevitable component of existence that includes physical pain, emotional distress, impermanence, and the inherent instability of all conditioned phenomena.
> The talk explores the three types of suffering: dukkha-dukkha (direct pain), pariṇāmadukkha (suffering of change), and saṅkhāradukkha (suffering of conditioned existence). Armstrong explains how tanhā (craving/thirst) - manifesting as desire for sense pleasures, existence, and non-existence - creates the cycle of suffering through our resistance to what is. He emphasizes balancing insight into dukkha with practices like mettā (loving-kindness) and compassion to avoid overwhelming aversion.
> The discourse culminates in the possibility of liberation through the Noble Eightfold Path, showing how temporary experiences of letting go offer glimpses of nibbāna - the unconditioned peace available when craving ceases. Armstrong presents these ancient truths with accessibility and warmth, demonstrating their practical relevance for contemporary meditation practice and daily life.

The subject of the talk this evening is the Four Noble Truths. Sometimes when I would be on retreat and the teacher would announce that the topic was the Four Noble Truths, my body would sort of go into this contraction. And I'd think, oh no, not more dukkha. I can't hear about any more dukkha. So I thought I would open this talk with a quotation from the Buddha, from the Samyutta Nikaya, where he says that the realization of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy. So let's let that be the tone for the discourse this evening.

I want to base this talk on the Buddha's first discourse where he expounded the Four Noble Truths. Just to set the stage a little for that event, he had become enlightened near the town of Gaya. After his enlightenment, he stayed around the Bodhi tree for another seven weeks. In those forty-nine days, he was simply enjoying the bliss of his deliverance and reflecting on what he had come to understand.

He was inclined not to teach. He thought nobody would understand. Then Brahma came down and asked him to teach, saying there are beings with little dust on their eyes who would understand. The Buddha thought, who do I know who might get it? He thought of his first two meditation teachers. Then he looked with his psychic vision and saw that both of them had just recently died, so they were not available for him to teach.

Then he thought of five friends with whom he had been doing ascetic practice. He thought these five ascetics would be able to understand. Again, with his psychic vision, he saw that they were in Varanasi. So he walked to Varanasi to find them.

He encountered them at the deer park, what's now Sarnath. When they saw him coming, they didn't want to talk to him. They saw that he'd put on weight and therefore knew he had fallen off the true path. He was no longer mortifying his body, so they weren't interested. But he persisted, and finally they agreed to lend an ear.

The sutta has come to be called the Dhammacakka-Pavattana Sutta, which means setting in motion the wheel of the dhamma. Giving these teachings set this entire history of Buddhist teachings and awakening in motion that we are now participating in. It was all set in motion on this day over twenty-five hundred years ago.

The Buddha described to his five friends his progress in this way. He said the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which leads to enlightenment. This middle way he described as going between the extremes of indulgence in sense pleasures—trying to seek happiness through the pleasure of the body—and the extreme of self-mortification, of harming the body. He called both these extremes ignoble and unbeneficial.

It's also a way of balance between many other extremes. There's an extreme of trying to pull pleasure toward us called greed. There's another extreme of trying to push the unpleasant away called aversion. The middle way finds a balanced way in between those two. There's an extreme of over-efforting where we push ourselves too hard, become brittle and tense. There's a way of under-efforting where we're actually lazy and don't have the energy to fire the practice. There are extremes of eternalism and nihilism, believing that the world is eternal or believing that nothing is really here. The extremes of existence and non-existence. This middle way has profound depth to it, as became clear when the Buddha continued to teach.

So the Buddha began to expound his understanding to the five friends in the form of the Four Noble Truths. He declared that the first truth was the truth of suffering. This is often misstated as "life is suffering," but that's not what the Buddha said. He never made a statement like that. What he did say is that there is suffering that's an inevitable component of life.

The term he used, of course, was dukkha, and as you all know, this has many meanings. It's usually translated as suffering, but other good connotations include unsatisfactoriness, unhappiness, unreliability, or stress. He went on to explain what he meant by this first noble truth. I'd like to read this passage from the text: "Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering."

Sorrow, grief, pain, distress, and despair are suffering. Association with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not getting what one wants is suffering.

I love this formulation because it's so universal. It's something that all of us can relate to. It describes our inner experience. When we look at the kinds of suffering that the Buddha touches on, we can see that we're subject to all of them. And when we look around the world, we see the world subject to these very intense kinds of suffering.

The events of three weeks ago are one extreme form that touched us and people that we know quite closely. But if we use that as an eye to look upon the world, we see that Americans or New Yorkers are certainly not alone in that kind of suffering. Just in recent years, we can look at the conflicts in Bosnia or Kosovo or the Middle East, and we see the influence of war, of starvation and poverty, the acting out of genocide and exploitation, and the occurrence as instruments of state policy of torture and rape. Even in our own country, which is said to be relatively civilized, the widespread influence of racism and abuse in its many forms touches so many lives with suffering.

These are the grosser forms that we can see on the face of the planet going on every day. Often we feel we're exempt somehow from these grosser forms. A couple of years ago, I was leading a class of senior students at Spirit Rock—people who have quite a few years of Dharma practice—and I asked them to talk about the kinds of suffering that they felt in their own lives. What really constituted dukkha for them?

This is some of what people said: They felt lonely or isolated or not connected with others. They had conflict in their intimate relationships. They were plagued by the afflictive emotions of fear or depression, sorrow or anger. They had to deal with their own aging, sickness, physical pain, and they also had to deal with the aging of their parents and the death of people that they loved. They described pressures in their work life, the pressure to perform, the sense of overwhelm from having too many tasks, a fear of inadequacy in their jobs. They noted they had a lot of self-judgments, that they were critical of themselves and others were critical of them. And they had fear and anxiety about their future.

All these forms of suffering we are also exposed to. We're not immune from them.

The Buddha went on to describe that there are basically three kinds of suffering that we encounter as human beings. The first he called dukkha dukkha, or you could say the suffering of pain itself. This is the suffering that comes from difficult experiences in mind and body, the difficult emotions—desire, disliking, anger, fear, grief—and the physical pain, bodily experiences of pain, of tension, or injury, or illness, or aging.

A more subtle kind of pain—almost anyone can feel and describe this kind of dukkha-dukkha—a more subtle kind of pain he called parinamadukkha, the suffering of alternation or change. And this is the unsatisfactoriness that comes even from the pleasant in life, because in time the pleasant will decay and fall away and fade. And when it goes, if we've been clinging to it, we will suffer from its passing. Everything that comes to us will also change, will alternate.

In talking about these two, the first two kinds of dukkha, Ajahn Chah said that it's like grabbing a poisonous snake. If you grab the head of the snake, it bites you and you feel the pain immediately. This is dukkha dukkha, grabbing the head of a poisonous snake, feeling the direct pain in mind or body. But he said if you grab the tail, this is like parinamadukkha, the pain of alternation. You grab the tail, which seems pleasant enough, but soon the head whips around and bites you. And then there's dukkha dukkha. So the one leads to the other.

The third kind that the Buddha talked about he called sankhara dukkha. You could describe this as the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena. Conditioned phenomena are unsatisfactory because they're not solid or stable. They're decaying even as we experience them. Every state that is compounded, that is conditioned, that arises out of causes and prior conditions, is already falling apart.

Carol and I were teaching this May, this spring in California by the Dalai Lama. It was really a beautiful event. It was three days of teachings on the Heart Sutra. It was outdoors in Mountain View in the Bay Area. It was beautiful weather. There was a big stage and a huge amphitheater with probably about 6,000 people sitting and listening. And up on the stage were about 100 monks and nuns from all the Buddhist traditions with their colorful robes. The Dalai Lama was up on a high throne decorated the way only the Tibetans can decorate. And behind him, there was this beautiful, huge canvas that stretched across the whole stage—a stage that is used in rock concerts—on which was painted the Potala against an evening kind of twilight, really deep blue in the sky.

It was almost like seeing His Holiness back in his home of Lhasa. The energy there was like a dharma Woodstock. We'd run into people we knew and hang out on the grass, have our lunch, and soak in the vibes he was emanating. It was really a beautiful event.

In talking about the Heart Sutra, which is on the theme of emptiness, the Dalai Lama said—and this is also in connection with bodhicitta—if you really want to help others, you have to understand all the ways that they suffer. Each of these three kinds of suffering that the Buddha talked about is a little more subtle than the one before. It's fairly easy to grasp dukkha-dukkha, and it's fairly easy to grasp the pain of alternation. But he said it requires quite a lot of meditative subtlety to see this third kind, the sankhara-dukkha, the pain of formations that are not stable.

He made a point of emphasizing this. He said that we sometimes have the idea that impermanence means that things are stable now, but at some time in the future they're going to decay. He said that's the wrong understanding. The right understanding is that everything is unstable, even in this moment. If you look at the body through the eye of meditation, through the eye of samadhi, you can feel how the body sensations are just coming and going moment after moment, and there's nothing solid that we can rest in throughout the whole body.

His Holiness was saying that this whole world of conditioned phenomena is just like that. It is always unstable. This is why certain mental states—happiness, joy, delight—don't last. Even refined states like mindfulness and concentration, much less the outer situations like job satisfaction and harmony in personal relationships and the health of the body, are not fundamentally lasting. They're not stable. They're not capable of that.

This is a verse from the Samyutta Nikaya: "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not delight in form." We can feel this as we sit in meditation, feeling the fluttery energy within the body, which a number of people have talked about during this retreat as connected with anxiety or symptomatic of anxiety. As you pay attention to that fluttery energy throughout the body, you feel how there's nothing solid that we can hold to there.

But we don't usually see like this. We don't see these three kinds of dukkha that clearly. We really have a deep felt longing for the world to be stable, for phenomena to be solid, for there to be something that we can hang on to. We really would like the world to be quite safe, cozy, predictable, warm, inviting, and not changing. Sort of like curling up in a Winnie the Pooh story. It would be really nice just to live with Pooh and Christopher Robin where everything would be taken care of. You have great adventures, but basically come to bed at night and get warm milk and a cookie.

But the world isn't like that. As we see through our meditation, it's quite intense, this world. The impingement of mind and body on our delicate consciousness is quite intense. It feels kind of piercing at times. It's very vivid. The pleasure and pain we take quite raw, undiluted, often. This is more the way the world is. Can we align our perceptions to it? Can we align our expectations to the way that the world really is?

It's not altogether bad that the world is this way. It's not good news when we first hear it—kind of upsetting, because we'd like that Winnie the Pooh world. But it's not altogether bad. The Buddha actually said that if there was one speck of form or matter in this world that was permanent, there could be no living of the holy life. There could be no liberation. That's an amazing statement.

The reason liberation is possible is because of the emptiness of created phenomena. If form were solid, suffering could be solid, and then it wouldn't be able to be abandoned. Because form is not solid, neither is suffering, and it's able to be abandoned.

The Buddha said that this truth of dukkha is to be understood. This was his advice. The truth of dukkha is to be understood. How do we relate to that point? This is an important point in our practice—how we hold the truth of dukkha. It's a painful truth to take in. It's not an easy one to hold.

It's very easy when we hear this truth of dukkha and learn about its pervasiveness to see the world as a scary place or view it in an aversive light. But on the other hand, if we don't stay in touch with it, we get fixated on ambition. We think that we can set goals and reach them, believing our meditation is going to land us on some cozy plateau of mindfulness and concentration that we can stay at forever—a kind of spiritual materialism. We get gaining ideas.

But as we hang out with the truth of dukkha, it's easy to let it condition a kind of aversion to life. If life is unsatisfying, then I can't like it. This is not the intention. The Buddha addressed this directly. He said, "A practitioner is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm himself with suffering. She does not give up the pleasure that accords with the Dhamma, yet she is not infatuated with that pleasure."

I think this is a very interesting statement. If we feel ourselves overwhelmed with the suffering in our practice, we're not quite on the Buddha's track. Then we need to bring some uplift into the mind and to find ways that work for you to bring that uplift.

One of the ways that's been really helpful for me in practice has been the cultivation of loving-kindness. Developing the practice of loving-kindness generates a kind of friendliness toward the world, and with it a kind of joy that can hold the seeing of dukkha. So that in a way, the insight into dukkha and the presence in the heart of loving-kindness or friendliness can grow up together, side by side as we walk the path. This factor of metta is an antidote to aversion. Metta and aversion can't coexist. I think this is a very skillful way to deepen one's practice of opening to dukkha without falling into aversion.

Closely tied to that is the factor of compassion. Compassion actually arises out of the seeing of dukkha. It's said that suffering is the proximate cause of compassion. So if we feel strongly caught in the grip of dukkha, we can convert in that moment to a feeling of compassion for ourselves, first of all, and by extension to all other beings, knowing that this suffering is universal, knowing that we all feel it.

There was a great teacher in India from the 7th or 8th century named Atisha, who taught from a Mahayana point of view and gave a number of pith teachings that were like pointers for people along the path. One of his pith sayings that I recall again and again was, "Always keep a cheerful mind." I love this reminder: always keep a cheerful mind. It's not easy to do—I'm sure you've found this many times—but I love it as a direction. We can steer ourselves more in that direction, and we can find things like metta that bring us uplift. Or as Joseph talked about, the qualities of devotion, whether to the three gems of Buddha, Dharma, Sangha, to a benefactor, to a teacher that you particularly love or are inspired by, like the Dalai Lama—to remember what is wholesome in life and on the spiritual path.

When Jack Kornfield went to practice with Ajahn Chah as a young monk, one of the first things that Ajahn Chah said to him was, "I hope you're not afraid to suffer." And Jack said, "Suffer? I didn't come here to suffer. What are you talking about?" Ajahn Chah said that there are two kinds of suffering: there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and there's suffering that leads to the end of suffering. "Hopefully, you're here to practice the suffering that leads to the end of suffering."

Suffering is a vital deepener of our practice. I don't think we can deepen our practice without touching suffering. And yet we have such a fear around it. We hold ourselves back from going in and touching it in all its energy and all its rawness. Sometimes this is skillful. Sometimes we know that too much suffering can overwhelm us, and we need to hold ourselves back. But at other times when we're in a balanced place, can we get an interest in that suffering and a kind of fearlessness about it, knowing that we can learn from it and not holding back?

I was on retreat here a few years ago and I was seeing Joseph as my teacher. I was in retreat for about a month, and I hit this phase of a lot of mental agitation and confusion. I was just having a real whirring of thoughts and energy and restlessness. It was very unsettling because my practice had been getting quite calm and pleasant and deepening very nicely up to that point. Then I hit this mass of confusion. I got particularly upset about it because I thought, "Oh no, I'm not going to be able to further my practice because of this."

So I went to Joseph, and I was crying on his shoulder about all this agitation and confusion. He said, "Well, what bothers you the most about it?" And I said, "Well, it's because my practice isn't going to deepen." Joseph replied, "Guess what, guy?

He said, this is the deepening of your practice.

That put such a different light on it for me. I could suddenly take it as a source of learning, something I could grow from and come to understand. It's another manifestation of dukkha. Let me open to this and understand this. It gave me a whole new relationship to it.

Sometimes when we find ourselves in a place of suffering and we aren't able to release, it's very helpful just to note it as suffering. Or "suffering is like this." Or simply "dukkha." I sometimes will just drop in the note "dukkha" if I'm really stuck in it, and it gives me a different relationship to it. It actually opens the door to compassion because I connect with the universality of it. I realize that it's not that anything has gone wrong with my practice. This is an integral part of life. As long as we're not awakened, this is an integral part of our practice. It's okay. It doesn't mean we've done anything wrong.

So the Buddha continued with the second noble truth, which he said is the noble truth of the origin of suffering. "Now, what is the noble truth of the origin of suffering? It is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight now here and now there. That is, craving for sense pleasures, craving for existence, craving for non-existence."

To me, this is one of the most beautiful passages in human history—to know that there is a cause for suffering. When I came into the dharma, I didn't know that. I thought my suffering was this impenetrable block in my being, something I had no way of working with or changing. I thought it was just a mass that was an inevitable part of life. But when the Buddha said there is an origin of suffering, I realized that anytime there's an origin, there can be an ending. This is a fantastic doorway.

Craving in this passage is the translation of the Pali word tanha. The original meaning of tanha is very simple—it means thirst. This is a really evocative word in this context. The cause of suffering is thirst.

Number one, it points to the deep root of it. Which of us thinks we'll ever get beyond being thirsty? But it also points to the recurring nature of it—how it's just arising in our being, latching onto an object, getting satisfied, ending, and then coming back. When you're thirsty, you know how great it feels to drink a glass of cool, clear water. It feels fantastic, and the thirst goes. But how long is it before the thirst comes back?

Craving—another word often used to translate tanha—is desire. But I think this misses a little bit of the point of tanha. Of course, desire gets a really bad reputation in Buddhism. I mean, if you were the source of suffering, you'd get a bad reputation too. But not all desire should get tarred with the same brush.

There are all these words in the language of the Buddha that point to unwholesome forms of desire: tanha or craving, lobha or greed, raga or lust, kamachanda or sense desire. These are considered unwholesome forms of desire. But there are also wholesome forms of desire, and this is important to remember. Not all desire is bad.

One of the four bases for spiritual power—the qualities that when cultivated lead to liberation—is a factor called chanda, which literally means desire. It's often translated as zeal in most Western translations, but that kind of glosses over the simple meaning of chanda, which is desire.

The desire for liberation, the desire for freedom and enlightenment, is a potent force that carries us along the path. This is a very wholesome kind of desire. In the Eightfold Path, the second factor, samma-sankappa, is sometimes translated as right aspiration—another form of desire, we could say, of aiming ourselves toward liberation. In the metta phrases, we wish for happiness for others. This is a form of wanting: I want others to be happy. I sincerely do. This is a kind of desire, too. These are all wholesome desires.

But this craving is not. It is the source of suffering. Yet it's also not unidimensional—it's not just about desiring, although in this passage it sounds that way. The text speaks of craving "which is accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight now here and now there." It sounds like it's only about desire, but I think a better way to understand it is that it's the wanting things to be different than they are. The source of suffering is wanting things to be different than they are.

So this craving actually expresses itself not only in the force of wanting the positive, wanting the pleasurable, but also in the force of pushing away the unpleasant, and also in the force of confusion so we don't see those movements of greed and aversion. Basically, I understand craving as equated with greed, aversion, and delusion—the three unwholesome roots in the mind. So it encompasses wanting, fear, anger, sorrow, confusion, all of those kinds of unwholesome states.

The Buddha describes it as finding delight "now here, now there." This is evocative also. Craving picks different objects, but it's always the same force. It's always the same thirst. We tend with our conventional mind to get fixated on the object and to think the object is really important, as though in satisfying or acquiring the object, we will end the longing.

But I think the genius of the Buddha was turning the mind back to look at the force itself—the force of wanting—and seeing that as the problem. When we want something, there's actually, if you look, a storyline underneath that says something like, "If I get that, I'll be happy." There's a kind of promise of lasting happiness in the force of wanting. And of course, when we do experience it, it does satisfy for a while. But as we mentioned, the craving just comes again later.

We usually don't go back to the source, which is the craving. We usually get fascinated all over again by the new object, alighting "now here and now there." When we bring it back to look at the force in the mind, we see it's the same, whatever the external object. And we start to see that craving is something that just springs from our being again and again, clothing itself in all different kinds of masks and disguises—all the hindrances and all the variations on the hindrances—to fool us and trick us. But it's just one movement: wanting things to be different than they are.

And so the power of our practice is when we bring our full awareness in alignment with the way things are in this moment, when the mindfulness and the steadiness of mind are such that the awareness is fully meeting the arising phenomena. The awareness is knowing the dhammas of that moment. They are so close together that there's no room for the oozing out of craving. There's no room for the disturbance of greed or aversion. We are not wanting things to be different because we're exactly with the way things are.

So this is the retraining of the mind and pointing it in the direction of freedom, experiencing the freedom. But what we see is when the mind falls away from that kind of mindfulness and concentration and that real unity of awareness and experience, then almost like a dam has been opened, the deluded mind, the unfree mind, just starts spinning off craving in all its different manifestations.

One of the things that I notice on retreat a lot, one of the cravings that comes for me, is the craving for stillness. I don't know if you've noticed this—particularly after a quiet sitting, a peaceful sitting, you come back and the mind's busy again, and I start to really want to feel that stillness again. And I start to feel it as a strain in my body, that craving for stillness. And then after some time, I rediscover the stillness. It lasts a while, and it's pleasant, and it also passes quickly. And once again, I notice a craving for stillness.

What's the meaning of it all? Just going through that cycle: craving for stillness, having it be satisfied, and then having it pass again. And so sooner or later, we start to learn we actually don't need to crave for the stillness when it's not there. That craving is just an extra distortion in the heart and mind. And we just settle into the restlessness or the sleepiness or the wandering mind, the inability to focus, and have that be okay—just bringing more and more acceptance to the way things are.

Another way to think about this craving is in terms of self-centeredness. What we're craving is almost always our own benefit, our own betterment, our own welfare, our own pleasure. You notice how it's not so hard to put up with other people's problems? We don't usually get that bent out of shape because our neighbor has lost their job. But when we lose a job, it's a big deal.

So this self-centeredness gets activated again and again and again. And this is really the operation of karma. Karma is all the force of our self-centered actions—karma based on greed and aversion and confusion, all of our self-centered actions trying to bring ourselves happiness. But what the Buddha said is this self-centeredness is the source of the suffering.

This is a quotation from Shantideva, a ninth-century Indian teacher: "Whatever sorrow there is in the world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy. Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy." There's a beautiful expression of dana and compassion and metta. And it also points to the power of bodhicitta—that when we can take the welfare of others even a little bit into our heart, it is such a wholesome force, because it starts to undo a little tiny bit of the self-centeredness. And undoing the self-centeredness undoes the craving, and that undoes the suffering.

There's also the beauty of the practice of loving kindness, opening ourselves to caring about others. Even young people kind of get the sense of this course of things. There was a family retreat going on here one year, and one of the teachers came up to a five-year-old boy who'd been kind of rambunctious during the day and asked the child,

"What do you think will happen if you spend your whole life going around just trying to get what you want?" And he said, "Trouble." The thing is, as we grow up, the amount of trouble we can create gets a lot bigger. A lot bigger.

So the Buddha in this passage talked about three kinds of craving. He said the craving for sense pleasures, the craving for existence, and the craving for non-existence. The craving for sense pleasures is kama tanha. This really came home to me on a retreat that Carol and I taught in Italy a little over a year ago. It was early in the retreat, and we were doing one-to-one interviews. This really nice young guy came into the interview—nice-looking guy, good energy. And he said, "I'm having a hard time settling into this retreat." It was only the second day, so I thought that wasn't too unusual. I said, "Well, what's going on?" He said, "I don't want to be here." I said, "Oh, really? Well, why did you come?"

And he said, "Well, I had a choice. This is my vacation time. It's August. And some friends invited me to go to the Caribbean with them and have a vacation in a tropical country. Or I could come on this meditation retreat. I really wanted to go to the Caribbean, but there were no more airplane tickets left. So I came on this meditation retreat instead."

I understood why he didn't want to be here. His mind was full of blue tropical water and warmth... I shouldn't talk about this, should I? You can imagine the kind of pleasant images that were going through his mind. So we just had to talk about how desire works and how the force of desire is obscuring the ability to appreciate the present moment. And when the force of desire is absent, we can appreciate the present moment. And then he settled in and got into the retreat and had a great experience.

But it's like this too when we find ourselves drifting off into pleasant fantasies. And we start to see this connection between suffering and craving. When there's more suffering, there tends to be more craving because we want to get out of the suffering. And when there's less suffering, the craving also goes down often. And then when there's more craving, it tends to generate more suffering. So suffering and craving kind of go in this tightening circle until we can bring some mindful presence to it.

And that kind of cuts through the cycle.

The second kind of craving the Buddha talked about is the craving for existence, bhava tanha, sometimes called the craving for becoming. And in addition to pleasant fantasies, one of the ways that I see my mind go a lot when I'm sitting is into plans. I go into future plans where I'm living in some part of the world or having some particular job or close to some particular community or hanging out with some particular people or doing some particular kind of work, or doing something around home that I really enjoy.

What I'm actually feeding off of is a quest for an identity. I paint this beautiful picture of what life could be like, as though if I got all those externals, I would have a solid identity that I could hang myself from. This is the flavor of the desire for becoming. Let me be this. That will satisfy my insecurity, my confusion, my unhappiness, my unfulfillment.

The Buddha said, again from the Samyutta, "When one intends and plans and has a tendency toward anything, that becomes a basis for future renewed existence." That generates this desire for becoming, which comes to fruition.

The third type of craving is the craving for non-existence, called vibhava tanha. This basically means wanting to get rid of what is unpleasant. This is where the force of aversion gets expressed through tanha. When I talked earlier about having an aversion to life that is conditioned by seeing dukkha, this is really nothing other than a form of vibhava tanha, a desire for non-existence, a not liking of some things that have come into existence—the painful aspects of existence.

So the Buddha said that this noble truth of the origin of suffering, this craving, is to be abandoned. The first noble truth was to be understood. The second noble truth is to be abandoned.

We've all heard this before: to let go. Especially in times of suffering, we know it's a good idea. We're not unintelligent. We would do it if we could. Sometimes we just can't. We know what we ought to do, and sometimes we can, and sometimes we can't.

Again, you might try, when you're caught in that place of knowing that there's a holding and not being able to let go, just noting "craving" or "thirst"—just to connect with that impersonal, universal force that comes into the mind.

This is also a place where the feeling tone might be helpful, vedana. If there's a force of wanting, you might just notice underlying it: What pleasant experience is being wanted? Where's the feeling tone that's creating the sense of pleasantness that we're wanting? If it's not liking, where is the feeling tone creating that unpleasantness that's engaging the pushing away? It can be very helpful for cutting through some of the stickiness.

The third noble truth the Buddha described as the noble truth of the end of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishment of it, the freedom from it. Elsewhere, it's described as the extinction of greed, the extinction of aversion, the extinction of delusion. And it's said that this indeed is called nibbana, or the unconditioned.

This extinction of greed, aversion, delusion is what constituted the awakening of the Buddha under the Bodhi tree—that full enlightenment. I just wanted to read this verse that he is said to have uttered upon awakening. You've probably heard it many times. I love its beauty:

"Through many a birth I wandered in samsara, seeking but not finding the builder of this house. Painful is birth, again and again. O house builder, now you are seen. You shall build no house again. All your rafters are broken. Your ridge pole is shattered too. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving."

This noble truth of the end of suffering is to be realized. How can we realize this in our practice? I think it's helpful to understand that this noble truth can be taken either as a permanent end of suffering—the full enlightenment, full awakening that the Buddha experienced—but it can also be taken as a temporary end of suffering. And that temporary end of suffering gives us a little hint of what the permanent end of suffering is about.

The Buddha often said that peace was the highest happiness. And this peace is available any time that we're willing to let go of craving. Ajahn Chah said, "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace."

If you let go completely, there's complete peace.

So to whatever extent we can let go, we can touch that peace. And in touching that peace, we get a little bit of a taste of the flavor of nibbana, of the unconditioned, the end of suffering.

I think it's very helpful in practice to pay close attention to how it feels when a particular form of suffering or craving ends. You're following a mind state like desire or fear or anger or sorrow. You're following it really closely, being with it, being with it, being with it—mindful, mindful, mindful. And then you notice the moment when it's no longer there. What is the feeling right then? What is that quality in the mind?

There's a feeling of relief, of release, of freedom, of ease, of peace. All these things are pointers to that final peace the Buddha talked about.

This flavor of release or peace is called deathless because it's always present. It's always available in any moment when we're willing or able to let go. It's not something that has to be conjured up. It's not a conditioned thing. It's there in letting go of craving. Ajahn Buddhadasa said that nibbana is a natural condition. It is the cool state of mind without any defilements.

There are really two routes into this kind of peace, this kind of freedom. One is a letting go. This is the way we usually know. We've been caught in some form of craving, some kind of desire or aversion, and we mindfully follow it, let it go, and we feel the change. This is one way in.

But there's another way in, which is without reference to anything else, without reference to conditioned phenomena, to access that peace directly—not referring to what is clung to, not referring to whether there's clinging or not in the moment, but directly putting the mind into a state of freedom or non-clinging. As we become more familiar with the feeling of this state, we are able to just go there, to just put ourselves there.

Sometimes it's available, sometimes it's not. If it's not available, don't get hung up. Then go back to the mindfulness in connection with the difficult state that might be present.

But one of the ways that the Buddha described accessing this directly—this suggestion appears like a meditation instruction in at least a couple of places in the Pali Canon—is to direct one's attention to the deathless element, amatadhatu, the deathless element, which is a synonym for nibbana, or this peace. And the Buddha basically said, let go of everything that's conditioned. Direct your attention to the deathless element thus: "This is the peaceful. This is the sublime. The stilling of all formations. Nibbana."

We become able to access this more and more directly as we get used to abiding in that place of freedom, in that place of not clinging. And at times in our practice, that can be the predominant meditation instruction. That can be the predominant direction in our practice—resting in the peaceful, in the stilling of all formations. Resting in the deathless.

The fourth noble truth is that there is a way to the end of suffering, and that way is this noble eightfold path, which you know well: right understanding, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. The Buddha said that this noble truth of the way leading to the end of suffering is to be developed.

These four noble truths are to be understood, abandoned, realized, and developed for the last one. So I'm not going to go into detail on the Eightfold Path. We've talked about it a lot. More importantly, you're doing it. Every day, every hour, you're really activating that path.

I just wanted to close with a reading where the Buddha described this path. This is also from the Samyutta:

"It is just as if a man wandering through the forest were to see an ancient path, an ancient road, traveled by people of former times. He would follow it, and following it he would see an ancient city, an ancient capital inhabited by people of former times, complete with parks, groves, and ponds, walled and delightful.

"In the same way I saw an ancient path, an ancient road, traveled by the fully self-awakened ones of former times. And what is that ancient path? Just this noble eightfold path of right view and so on. I followed that path. Following it, I came to the direct knowledge of suffering, the direct knowledge of the origin of suffering, the direct knowledge of the end of suffering, and direct knowledge of the way leading to the end of suffering.

"Knowing that directly, I have revealed it to monks, nuns, male lay followers, and female lay followers, so that this holy life has become powerful, rich, detailed, well-populated, widespread, and proclaimed among devas and humans."

Dependent Origination

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive examination of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), which the Buddha considered his most profound insight. Drawing from his experience at Ajahn Buddhadāsa's monastery in Thailand, Armstrong explores the twelve links of the chain: from avijjā (ignorance) through saṅkhāra (formations), viññāṇa (consciousness), nāmarūpa (name and form), the six sense bases, contact, vedanā (feeling), taṇhā (craving), upādāna (clinging), bhava (becoming), jāti (birth), and finally jarāmaraṇa (aging and death).
> Using vivid imagery from the Tibetan Wheel of Life (bhavacakra) as a teaching tool, Armstrong demonstrates how this ancient wisdom applies directly to modern meditation practice. He shows how each moment of experience moves through these links, creating the illusion of a solid self and perpetuating suffering. The teaching emphasizes the crucial space between vedanā and taṇhā—between feeling and craving—where practitioners can apply mindfulness to break free from saṃsāra.
> This dharma talk provides both philosophical depth and practical guidance, showing how understanding dependent origination can transform our relationship to pleasant and unpleasant experiences, leading to the cessation of dukkha through wisdom rather than reactivity.

The subject of the talk this evening is dependent origination.

Before the Buddha became enlightened, it's said in the suttas that he took some time to reflect on the origin of suffering. And he saw that it was, as he said, headed by aging and death. So he asked, where did aging and death come from? He saw that they came from birth. And he asked, where did birth come from? He said it came from becoming. And so he continued to ask those questions and trace the origin all the way back to this quality that he called ignorance. In Pali, the term is avijja. It literally means not knowing or not wisdom.

This chain that he discovered upon reflection, he called the chain of dependent arising and used it many, many times to describe how suffering is born—and how it is born not just once, but over and over again, moment after moment. So you could say that this teaching on dependent origination really was the elaboration of the second noble truth at an incredible level of detail. But it also expresses the third noble truth, the way to liberation, because by undoing the factor of avijja, the whole chain of suffering comes falling down. So it is both the teaching of suffering and the end of suffering.

In Pali, the term for this is paticca-samuppada. I once asked Andy Olenski, who's the director at the study center, what's the etymology of this term. And he said, well, it means something like things coming up together dependent on one another. This has a nice sense. It sort of has the sense in the broader meaning of everything arising in a kind of co-dependent way. And Joanna Macy, who's a great environmental activist, says that she bases her whole philosophy of interconnectedness and care for the environment on this teaching of dependent co-arising.

The most general form of the teaching the Buddha put like this: when this exists, that comes to be. With the arising of this, that arises. When this does not exist, that does not come to be. With the cessation of this, that ceases. It's basically the teaching that everything that comes into existence comes into existence based on earlier conditions and causes. And then those new things that have come into existence then become the ground for other things coming into existence. So it's also a pointing into the emptiness of everything. Nothing exists by itself. None of us exist by ourself. We came out of the world and being in the world we affect it and then we'll pass out of the world as well.

The Buddha regarded dependent origination as his most profound insight. And at one point in the suttas it says that one who sees dependent origination sees the Dharma. One who sees the Dharma sees dependent origination.

Ananda, who was his cousin and attendant for many years, once was reflecting on dependent origination and came to the Buddha proud of his insight, as he often did. He said to the Buddha in his very cheerful way, "This dependent arising seems very clear and plain to me." And the Buddha said, as he often did, "Don't say that, Ananda"—kind of always having to tamp down Ananda's cheerful, blithe happiness. And he said, "This teaching is profound and it appears profound." So the message was, don't forget it.

For me, this teaching is awesome. It's dazzling, and it has a lot of drama. It's one of my favorite areas of the Buddha's whole teachings. It touches things like the vastness of life, the vastness of the cosmos, and how we have wandered through it and continue to wander through it by taking birth through the working of karma. It talks about this mysterious way that the body and consciousness get brought together. And it's this fusing that makes for what we call a human being, this mysterious fusing. It's a clear explanation of suffering in its end, an amplification of the Four Noble Truths.

And it also describes how we take our intrinsic freedom and create bondage out of it. How we are basically in the middle of this completely open and unobstructed situation of phenomena arising and passing and being known—completely an unproblematic situation—and how out of that we generate an illusory sense of self and all the contraction and limitation and unhappiness that comes out of it.

I was practicing in Thailand. I was a monk at Wat Suan Mok, which was the monastery created by Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of the great masters of the last fifty years. One of the things I really appreciated about Ajahn Buddhadasa was how eclectic he was. He was a true iconoclast. And for many years, the general opinion of him in Thailand was that he was too far out to really be a respectable Buddhist. And so for a lot of years, he was sort of in the public doghouse, as it were. And it was only late in life that people really came to appreciate what a gem he was.

As an example of his iconoclastic nature, people would come to him as they did to many great abbots and they would offer to donate large sums of money if the abbots would tell them a good lottery number. And Ajahn Buddhadasa just refused to participate on that level. And one time he told a potential donor, he said, "Go ask the dog by the gate. He is as good a source as I am."

A lot of gifts didn't get donated to Ajahn Buddhadasa. He would not allow a Buddha image on the grounds of the monastery. In the place where the monks gathered, which was an outdoor setting, all he had to represent the image of the Buddha were three stones piled on top of each other—a big one, a medium-sized one, and a small one—simply representing the image of a person sitting in meditation.

I was fairly new at Wat Suan Mok when another monk offered to give me a tour of the place. He took me into a building near the front of the monastery called the Spiritual Theater. That name in itself was fantastic—I thought I was stepping into Steppenwolf. We entered this room, which was basically an empty building with four walls, an upstairs and a downstairs. All the walls were painted with replicas of spiritual art: some Theravadan creations, some replicas of Zen paintings, and some replicas of Tibetan art.

One whole wall that went from floor to ceiling, about eight feet tall, displayed a huge reproduction of a Tibetan piece of art known as the Wheel of Life. The Sanskrit term is bhava chakra. I'd never seen this particular piece of art before, and it was fascinating. Being eight feet tall, it was overwhelming.

The central feature is a huge, fearsome being holding a circle filled with life that represents existence itself. This being has big fangs for teeth, and his hands and feet, which extend around the edges of the circle, end in sharp claws. The being wears an ornament of skulls as a necklace across his head. All of life circulates within this center that the being holds.

This picture, my friend explained, represents the chain of dependent origination—a graphic illustration of pratītyasamutpāda. At the center of the circle are three animals: a pig, a snake, and a chicken. These represent the roots of the unwholesome. The pig is greed, the snake is aversion, and the chicken is delusion. If you've ever lived with chickens, you know how accurate that representation is—they are absolutely untrainable.

When I was living in the forest at that monastery, I would put my leftover rice on a little ledge on a tree for the squirrels. But before the squirrels could get there, the wild chickens of the forest would fly up and take the rice first. Every day I'd throw water at them or sticks to drive them off. Did they ever learn? Never. The next day they'd be right back, completely untrainable.

These, according to the picture, are the roots of the wheel of life. The wheel of existence is kept in motion by the central forces in the mind: greed, aversion, and confusion.

In a bigger circle around those are images of the different beings who take birth based on these forces. In Theravadan cosmology, there are actually thirty-one realms of beings—thirty-one levels of birth that one can enter in the cosmos through rebirth, ranging from the extreme suffering of the hell realms to the very great heights of bliss and equanimity of the Brahma realms.

This outer circle depicted those different realms: the heavenly beings of devas and brahmas who have no pain in life apart from having to die—and at that point, they're abandoned by their friends because they're not such good playmates anymore, and then they suffer. The realm of the asuras, who are known as jealous demons or angry demons, always said to be at war. They're quite powerful figures, but they're always fighting. I think of them like captains of industry—like Bill Gates and Scott McNeely going at one another.

The realm of animals, whose creatures are beautiful beings, but the realm is characterized by delusion because, as beautiful as the creatures are, they don't have the capacity to understand their own nature. They don't have the capacity to become free in that particular form.

The realm of hungry ghosts, where desire predominates. These are depicted as beings with very long, thin necks, tiny mouths, and great big bellies that can never be filled because not enough food can come through.

The hell realms of very intense suffering driven by aversion.

And finally, the human realm—our realm. One of the characteristics of the human realm is that our psyche is open enough and fluid enough that it can experience the quality of mind of any of the thirty-one realms, from the hell realms up to the highest Brahma realms. It's said that it's the only realm that has that capability, that kind of fluidity.

Of course, you don't have to believe in this whole cosmological picture and the notion of rebirth to make sense of it, because these realms can be understood as states of mind that arise in life and in meditation. There are the heavenly times in practice when everything's flowing easily. You're present without much effort. Things are seen clearly, arising and passing.

And there's a great sense of ease and relaxation. It's like the heaven realm.

Then sometimes we get to taking it for granted. We get a little overconfident. We get a little arrogant and we topple into the asura realm. And soon we start to struggle with it because our very thoughts about it have taken away some of that beautiful presence. So we're in conflict with ourselves.

And then we might fall into an animal spell of practice where we're just plodding along and there doesn't seem to be very much happening. It's all we can do to put one foot in front of the other. There's not much wisdom, but we just keep going.

When we fall a little further, we hanker so much to have that heaven realm back. Our minds are filled with yearning and desire. And occasionally we fall into the hell realms where the suffering is intense from very strong states of fear or anger.

The last circle in the wheel of life is an image of the 12 links—actually 12 images of the links of dependent origination. I'll talk about those as we go through the chain.

The first of the links is ignorance. The sense is that, as we've talked about before, we don't see things in life the way they really are. Classically, it's said we don't see the four noble truths. We don't see suffering, its cause, its end, and the way to its end. Because we don't see suffering, we're bound over and over. It's also expressed as not seeing the truth of karma. In not seeing the truth of karma, maybe we believe that nothing matters, that we can get away with things.

Ruth Dennison had a very beautiful statement on karma that you've probably heard. She explained it by saying that karma means you don't get away with nothing, darling. But at times we don't believe that. We think we can get away with things.

Perhaps the fundamental sense of ignorance—or the way that I like to remember it in a simple way—is the belief in an abiding self, not seeing the truth of anatta, a belief in ourselves as an abiding and enduring I. The Buddha said that this is as fundamental a source for suffering as we can find. You can't find anything before the sense of ignorance. But he also made an interesting comment that no beginning can be found for ignorance, such as before this point there was no ignorance, but then it arose. So ignorance has a kind of beginningless or timeless quality to it in the past.

The second of the links is formations or sankharas. It's the same term that we ran into in the aggregates, the fourth of the aggregates, sometimes translated as volitional formations or, as Joseph called it the other morning, conditioned tendencies of mind.

The image of ignorance in this piece of art is of a blind person walking along with great difficulty, not being able to see. The image of formations is of a potter making clay pots. This is what we do with our tendencies of mind. We fashion them over and over again, and then they have a power that we give them.

You could say that these karmic formations are the impulses from our mind driven by volition or intention that we express through our thoughts, our speech, and our actions. If we look around the world, there are so many different personality types. You can see some people are driven largely by fear—that's the sort of predominant formation that comes. Some by desire, some by anger, some by confusion. These tendencies tend to govern or express themselves through our thoughts, speech, and actions.

As we develop on the path, we see in ourselves growing tendencies of generosity or renunciation—the opposite of greed—or of loving kindness or compassion, or of wisdom. All these forces, in whatever balance they are in our personality, create habits in the mind. They sort of wear grooves in the mind, and then our mind easily falls into that pattern because of the force of habit.

If we are someone who has often acted out of anger, anger becomes stronger in our mind. If we've acted out of loving-kindness, loving-kindness becomes stronger and we access it more easily. All these habits create tendencies in the mind, and in meditation we find that if we just leave the mind alone, it often tends to fall into this particular groove or this particular habit.

We strengthen them by believing in them, buying in, and going along with them for another ride. The habit maybe appears out of the force of past inclination, but we can strengthen it by buying in one more time, believing in it, encouraging it, furthering it, whether it's wholesome or unwholesome.

The connection between these first two is that ignorance conditions formations. Or conditioned by ignorance, formations arise. Basically what this means is when ignorance leaves us with this sense of self, the burden of self, we act out of that mistaken view of self, out of that need to protect, maintain, defend, feed, inflate, aggrandize the I. We undertake various actions based on tendencies of wanting, or fearing, anger, or confusion. If we look at the world, this is the history of the world.

It's a mass of actions based on the passions that arise around the false sense of self, of being self-centered in an unwholesome way.

Ajahn Sumedho has this beautiful line to explain this connection. He said, "Ignorance complicates everything." When we don't see clearly, life becomes complicated. It's the sense of self that gives rise to our struggle and our sense of agenda, our resistance and our pushing forward.

There's a story of a bank robbery that illustrates this factor perfectly. The bank robber handed the teller a stick-up note that said, "I have a gun. Turn over the money in your drawer or I'm going to shoot somebody." So the teller did what tellers are trained to do and handed over the money. The bank robber walked out with a bag of cash, drove home, and when he got there, the police were waiting for him. He said, "How did you find me so quickly?" And the police said, "Well, unfortunately, you wrote your stick-up note on the back of your deposit slip. We just had to read your name and address."

This seems like a silly story, but when we act out of desire or hatred, we're doing the same thing. We're injuring the world in some way, but we're leaving our return address in the form of karmic impressions, and it comes back to haunt us.

Sylvia Boorstein, who also teaches at Spirit Rock, has a lovely phrase about this. She said, very simply, "When we see clearly, we act impeccably." When we see clearly, we act impeccably. But when we don't see clearly, when ignorance is present, our actions are confused, and this leads to unhappiness.

The third link is consciousness. Again, our old friend from the aggregates, the Pali term is vijñāna. This is the knowing faculty, the faculty of mind that receives impressions through the five physical senses and through the mind. The image in the art is one that I particularly like—a monkey swinging from branch to branch. You really get the sense with that picture of how consciousness is quite flighty. It lights on a sound, then on the breath, then on a thought, on a feeling, then on a body sensation. Consciousness is moving very rapidly from one thing to another.

Here, though, the particular sense in the classical understanding of dependent origination is consciousness as rebirth consciousness. That is, a being has died, but because impulses—volitional formations—are still continuing, there's a consciousness that continues beyond the death of the body. It carries the force of the unfinished cravings of that former life. So the rebirth consciousness is conditioned by the volitional impulses that still continue in us at the time of death—the self-centeredness that has not been exhausted at the time of death.

The next link is called name and form. The Pali is nāma-rūpa. Nāma basically means the cognitive mind. If you want to be technical, it's the factors of feeling, perception, volition, contact, and attention—the factors of mind that let us make sense of the world, to name the world. You can just think of it as the naming faculty of mind. Form in this context is the body.

The image is of two people in a rowboat. It's really a sweet image because the two people represent the cognitive mind and the body, which are joined at birth. They're in a rowboat together on a sea. They're going to be together for the whole journey across this ocean of existence.

This is for those of you who've ever wondered how you got here. It reminds me of my first three-month retreat, when someone who was sitting the course came up to Joseph with those kind of wide eyes that only a yogi near the end of three months has, and said, "Joseph, why are we here?" And Joseph said, "Do you mean at this retreat?" And she said, "No, why are we here alive?" And Joseph said, "Well, you're here because you wanted to see and smell and taste and touch and feel."

This is the sense of the volitional impulses connecting through consciousness with the new body. If we have more wanting at the end of one life, there's no way to satisfy it except to join with a body. The body is what opens the window onto the phenomena of the existent world. So this is the sense in the classical interpretation of the origin of our mind and body.

The Buddha actually said that if consciousness were not to come into the mother's womb, mind and body would not develop there. In another passage he said that conception depends on three things: the union of the parents, what he called the mother's season, and the third factor—the being to be reborn. This rebirth consciousness that, in the Buddhist view of things, joins with the sperm and egg at the moment of conception to form the new being, the mind and body of the new being.

And it said, as you probably know, that when one is fully liberated, as the Buddha was, there are no more volitional impulses to propel the rebirth consciousness forward. So there is no more birth for one who is fully awakened. The cycle of rebirth is said to stop for the Buddha or for the arhant.

Having joined consciousness with name and form, then the body is born and is endowed with the six sense bases. These are the internal bases of eye, ear, nose, tongue, and touch, and the mind—the cognitive mind, the six senses, and their objects. The image here is of a house that has six windows. Sometimes in the image, inside the house is the monkey, which is consciousness. It's like consciousness is in a house, and there are six windows that it can look out through to connect with the world.

Because of the six sense bases, then we have the next link in the chain, which is contact. We experience the phenomenal world of the five physical senses and the mind. Contact basically means our sense experience. Technically, it's made up of the organ, the external object, and the appropriate sense consciousness. There are six types of contact. The image in the pictures is of two people lying down in a passionate embrace. This is a really evocative image because it describes how we're so closely and intimately married to the world of experience through this phenomenon of contact—the inner and the outer coming together, again in this dependently arisen way, to generate the world of appearances.

At contact, we really enter the heart of this chain for the meditator. If you're not interested in rebirth, you can sort of drop the stuff up to now. Don't drop ignorance, though. That's important. But a lot of this is considered to be karmic result. The rebirth consciousness, name and form arising, the six sense bases—that's just happening automatically. It's on autopilot. There's nothing we can do.

But now the chain starts to get interesting for the meditator because contact brings along the phenomena that we have trouble with, the phenomena that cause suffering. Simple example: You're sitting and there's a strong burning sensation in the back. This is contact through the sense door of touch, the sense organ of the body.

The next link in the chain is feeling, or vedana, one that we've talked about a lot. Sometimes we call it feeling tone. It just refers to the fact that all contact has a quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither. There are six kinds of feeling connected with the six senses. The image here from the art is of a person with an arrow in the eye. This is kind of gruesome. But I don't know if you've experienced this yet, but sometimes when the mind gets quite still and the awareness is subtle and refined, the experience of any kind of contact feels stressful. Sometimes in meditation, one just wishes that there were not this constant impinging of arisings and passings, arisings and passings. This inherently difficult nature of contact is symbolized by that image.

So in our simple example, there's a burning sensation in the back. The feeling tone of it is considered to be unpleasant—still out of our control. These are karmic results.

The next link in the chain is craving. This is the same as the tanha that we talked about in the second noble truth, the source of suffering. There are six types of craving in relation to the six sense bases. The image here is of a wealthy man counting his treasures of gold. You have the sense of the hoarding or the delighting in the richness of possible sense experience, pleasurable sense experience.

With craving, the volitional part of our being comes back into the picture. We get reinvested in the process. For a while, we were just riding on results. We weren't doing anything. But with craving, we get active again. This suggests this is a place that we really ought to look very closely.

There's a very curious thing that happens with craving. That curious thing is that we separate out one appearance from the multitude that are arising in the moment and we bend the mind toward it. Why do we do that? There's this basic experience of great openness, great vastness, in which all the appearances are coming and going and being known by consciousness. Why don't we leave it like that?

But we don't. So in craving, the mind starts to bend or incline toward one of the experiences out of an underlying motive that's some combination of greed and delusion, or aversion and delusion. Remembering that craving includes both liking and disliking, craving is really for things to be different than they are.

At this point, the basic nature of our consciousness is starting to get distorted. Its basic nature has been called an empty knowing or a mirror-like awareness that simply reflects what is. But now we're bending it toward something that has some element of fascination, either due to its pleasant nature or its unpleasant nature. This is the initial distortion of mind—moving the inclination toward or away from. The delusion means that we don't see it. If we saw it clearly, we wouldn't do it because it's not happening out of wisdom. This inclination is the start of the slide to suffering.

So, for example, we've noticed that there's a burning sensation in the back. There's an unpleasant quality to the feeling. The movement of craving is that we start to bend away from it. We start to pull back from it.

The next link in the chain is clinging. The Pali is upādāna. In clinging, we actually take hold of what we have started to incline to—whatever aspect of experience is drawing us with its pleasant or unpleasant nature. So we're becoming more determined about our focus. Craving singles something out and inclines to it. Clinging really grasps onto it to the exclusion of everything else. It really comes to dominate our attention.

The image is of a monkey in a tree grabbing a piece of fruit—latching on to one object. It could be translated as clinging, grasping. Sometimes it's translated as fixation. I think this is a nice term because it implies how the mind gets narrowed around the particular thing that we've singled out. In a way, you could say that what we're doing with this fixation is we're trying to stop impermanence. It's as though all this flow of changing appearances doesn't do it for us. The impermanence gives too much space, and we want to pull something out of that changing flow and freeze it. That's what the grasping or the fixation does.

One of my teachers commented that if you're in touch with impermanence in a moment of meditation, it's a kind of good check that you're not clinging. This is an interesting thing to look at—to see how the perception of impermanence in a moment relates to clinging.

So once we have started to incline the mind to the back pain, we cling by really narrowing our focus, latching onto it as a very unpleasant object that we don't want to experience. We start to define our relationship by either pushing it away or pulling back. In that, what we're doing is creating a distance between the subject and the object based on the aversion. We think that will make us secure. So the clinging gives more and more solidity to that impermanent thing. It doesn't seem so likely to pass now because we've fastened onto it.

The next link is called becoming—sometimes translated as existence, but let's call it becoming. The Pali is bhava. In becoming, we start to generate the I thoughts about what we've grabbed hold of. The image in the art is of a pregnant woman.

So we start to attach the sense of I to what we have just grasped. Remember that the grasping is underlain by greed or aversion, some kind of liking or disliking. Then the thoughts come in: I hurt, or I have a pain in my back, or my back hurts, or this pain is killing me—something like that. The arising of the I thoughts in relation to the unpleasant.

We see in this movement of becoming that the sense of I has popped into being out of this vast openness because we've narrowed our attention to one appearance that's fascinated us by its pleasant or unpleasant nature. The sense of self is arising out of nothing through this clinging, through this grabbing and taking hold of.

This is a really interesting thing to look at in your practice. Does the sense of I ever arise just by itself? Or does it always arise in relation to a sense impression? A pain in the knee and we think, "My knee." A feeling of happiness and we think, "I'm happy." The sight of a tree and we think, "I see the tree." A clear awareness of the breath and we think, "I see clearly."

Sometimes the I comes up around a craving for becoming, finding an identity, finding a place to fasten on and make some sense of security or some sense of delight. Sometimes identity is just about delight.

I'm a big fan of tennis. I love to play it, and I also like to watch. And the player that I've most enjoyed over the last ten years is Pete Sampras. He just, to my mind, has the most beautiful game possible. So one Christmas, my wife came up with one of her more inspired ideas for a Christmas present. Sampras had won the U.S. Open that year, and she bought me a pair of tennis shorts—the exact model he was wearing. I mean, not the same pair, but that would have been too much.

So I'd go out to play tennis in them, and I'd look down at my shorts and think, "Pete Sampras." It was like I was channeling him. It was like I had found my new identity being Pete Sampras. And I swear I could hit more aces when I was wearing those shorts.

Sometimes the becoming looks very golden. We have these great insights as we sit, and we think about sharing our dharma views with our friends or our partners or our family. We might think about co-teaching with the Dalai Lama somewhere. And there's such a beautiful feeling about who we would become if we could do that.

All these things can bring a sense of identity. It's kind of fun living in California because you see the proliferation of identity around money. There's this guy named Jim Clark who was one of the founders of Netscape in Mountain View. When he got into business, he was described in a book recently, his goal was to make ten million dollars—which is quite ambitious. But when he got to ten million dollars, that wasn't enough. Then he wanted a hundred million. And then he got to a hundred million, and that wasn't enough. He wanted a billion. And then he got there, and that wasn't enough. At the time the book was written, he had three billion dollars. But it still wasn't enough. He said what he wanted then was to have more money than Larry Ellison, another industry leader who had nine billion dollars.

So these kinds of things just become stepping stones for identity. We think that there's some security there. But they're just more becoming.

Becoming then leads to the next link, which is birth. In Pali, the term is jāti. This is where the I-thoughts have grown and coagulated, and we really have a sense of ourselves as being that person for a short period of time. The image in the art is that the pregnant woman has given birth. So the new baby is on the scene.

This happens very quickly—this movement from craving to clinging to becoming to birth can happen in the space of a few seconds, ten seconds. And we take on this new identity based on what we've identified with, based on what we've clung to.

So you can take a look back over the last couple of days and see how many different selves have arisen in your experience. Maybe there was the self at lunch yesterday who wanted two pieces of chocolate instead of just one. There was the self in the late afternoon who got really thrilled by the wind, or maybe stirred up by the wind and found an identity in that. The self who didn't want to get out of bed this morning. The self who was the vegetable chopper or the toilet cleaner. The self who became the good meditator by having a really clear sitting after breakfast. The self who's the owner of the bad knees that hurt after thirty minutes. The self who really enjoyed the beautiful sunset this evening.

Throughout the day we become all these different identities. We become the meditator or the owner or the doer or the thinker or the observer or the experiencer through the coagulation of I.

But where are all these selves now? All these selves that have existed over the last couple of days—what happened to them? They arose, and then they also passed, didn't they?

And that's the next link in the chain, which is aging and death. Everything that is of the nature to arise, including identity, also is of the nature to pass away. Aging and death is really used in the Buddhist terminology as a shorthand for suffering. It's not so pleasant to have our identities dissolving all the time.

when an identity dies, because we've constructed it out of a need for security. Often we're not willing to let go of it until there's another one to grasp. So even if the identity hasn't been a pleasant one, sometimes there's a satisfaction in the familiar knowing of who we are, and it becomes difficult to release.

This is the last link in the chain—the twelfth link of aging and death, or as we can understand it, suffering in all its different forms. But of course the chain doesn't stop with suffering, because typically, if we don't see with wisdom, suffering leads to or conditions further ignorance.

Suffering tends to strengthen our sense of self. It tends to lead to more wanting or more fear, more insecurity, more clinging. For most people, suffering actually strengthens ignorance rather than weakening it. It makes the sense of self stronger rather than less. And so we enter the chain again at ignorance and cycle through it all one more time.

This is bondage. Bondage is when we are tied to this cycle again and again, over and over, just walking through, living through the round of suffering, and it doesn't lead anywhere. Sometimes from a New Age perspective we have the idea that suffering is ennobling or must be leading in the right direction. The Buddha said this is not necessarily so. For many beings there is just a wandering over and over through suffering with no learning, no growth, no purpose.

This is the cycle of samsara. Being on this wheel, not understanding how we got on it or how to get off, but just rotating through all the different forms of suffering. Always changing, no resting place, but always underneath some sense of unsatisfactoriness, some sense of longing, of wanting, of fear, some form of craving that never quite gets quenched.

Whether you understand it as rebirth in the literal physical sense, or whether you understand it as rebirth of cycling through different forms of identity one after another, it really doesn't matter. The mechanism of samsara is the same. We create the sense of I and mine over and over through clinging, and the clinging involves suffering. We don't know where we'll take birth next. We don't know whether it's going to be one of the heavenly realms of easy, awake, effortless practice, or whether we're going to be dropped into one of the hellish realms of suffering, of being tormented by very strong and unpleasant mental states that we didn't ask for. But the cycle continues as long as ignorance is active.

But there's good news too. The good news is the chain is not deterministic. It's not fixed. And that's why the Buddha could teach a path. There is a way out.

So where do we find freedom in this chain? The key is to see the difference between our experience, which is presented to us, and how we respond to it, which is where we have a growing ability to choose. The experience is presented to us through contact and the feeling of that contact—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We don't have any choice about that. Even the Buddha had pleasant and unpleasant and neutral experiences throughout his life after awakening.

But the link between feeling and craving is where we have a choice. We can either resist the feeling and move into greed or aversion, or we can open to that feeling with acceptance.

This is from the Majjhima Nikaya: "On seeing a form with the eye, one does not lust after it if it is pleasing. One does not dislike it if it is unpleasing. One abides with mindfulness of the body established, and one understands as it actually is the liberation of mind, wherein those unwholesome states cease without remainder. Having thus abandoned favoring and opposing, whatever feeling one feels, whether painful or pleasant or neither, one does not delight in that feeling or remain holding to it. As one does not do so, delight in feelings ceases. With the cessation of delight comes cessation of clinging. With the cessation of clinging, cessation of becoming. Such is the cessation of this entire mass of suffering."

The Buddha is basically saying whether we meet something pleasant or unpleasant or neither, if we don't respond with desire or aversion, we're basically free in that moment. The mind abides in a state of liberation.

One of the hardest areas to see this in is in thoughts or feelings about ourselves. I don't know if Ajahn Sumedho has hit this point yet in the Saturday tapes that you're listening to, but he talks about these judgments about ourselves as being a kind of personality view. When a view comes along like "I'm not a lovable person," or "I'm a really bad meditator," or "Everybody else is doing it so much better than I am"—these are some of the hardest things not to react to with conditioned greed or aversion.

But these are exactly the place where we can also find the greatest freedom through looking at this space between feeling and craving. These patterns are strong because we've believed in them over and over and over again, usually for years upon years. And because of that invested belief, they have this great power to grab us and to become very sticky, to make us believe one more time in what they're saying.

If we can see this pattern, though, without buying in, we start to weaken it. By seeing it mindfully, we're actually starting to poke holes in it.

We aerate it. This could be a thought or self-judgment. It could be one of the particular tendencies of mind that come again and again. For me, it was fear. Fear came many times in my practice and caught me. I didn't like it. I was afraid of it. I reacted to it. I couldn't be easily with it. But after enough times of opening to it in the body and in the mind and through the thoughts, I started to make a friendlier relation with fear.

I went through long periods in practice where fear could come and I was completely equanimous. If it was there, it was fine. If it wasn't there, it was fine. When I was able to meet it with that kind of mindfulness, it really started to take the power away from the fear. It lost its punch. It lost its fascination.

When we do this over and over—puncturing the mind state or the personality view with clear seeing, without the reactivity—it starts to collapse. It starts to fall apart. The Tibetans talk about how the whole ego is built on these personality views stacked one on top of another, and as we puncture them one after another, at some point the entire ego collapses. The false sense of self-image altogether crumbles because there's no real foundation in it. The whole thing just comes tumbling down like a house of cards.

And then we see the truth that we are just in this vast openness with everything coming and going. And if we don't cling, nothing is a problem. Nothing is a problem. Pleasant and unpleasant physical sensations can come and go. Pleasant and unpleasant states of mind can come and go. If we simply allow them to, there's no friction, there's no holding.

There's a quotation from Reginald Ray, a Tibetan teacher, who says that the entire Tibetan Buddhist path consists in nothing more nor less than learning to rest in the gap between feeling and craving ever more deeply and subtly. When we rest in this space, we're accepting our experience. We're not interfering with it out of struggle or agenda. We're not creating more new karma. We're not adding to the bondage. As we do this, the old karma weakens. It still passes through, but it's weakening as we do it. This is the influence of wisdom. This is what weakens ignorance.

We can add wisdom at any point along the chain. Anytime we become clearly aware of the movement. But for meditators, the particular place of interest is contact, feeling, craving, and clinging. Contact, feeling, craving, and clinging. Over and over and over again.

The good news is that wisdom eventually can uproot ignorance. But ignorance can't uproot wisdom. So basically the strength is on the side of freedom. And then as the Buddha said, with the cessation of ignorance, there is a cessation of formations. With the cessation of formations, the cessation of consciousness, on and on through the chain to the cessation of suffering.

I'll close with this quotation from an Indian teacher named Sri Nisargadatta Maharaj, who said that the essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever may be the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it is painful. And a questioner who was in the room at that point said, "But pain is not acceptable." And Maharaj said, "Why not? Did you ever try? Do try and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield, for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self by its very nature is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self with its desires and fears enables you to return to your real nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

CHAPTER 237

Faith and Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the aspect of faith that comes from taking refuge in our truest nature - what the Buddha called nibbāna. Drawing primarily from Thai forest tradition masters like Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and Ajahn Mahābuā, Armstrong explores how letting go of our strategies of control (greed, aversion, delusion) leads to the peace the Buddha described as "the stilling of all formations, the relinquishment of all attachments."
> The talk distinguishes between consciousness (viññāṇa) - the bare knowing of experience that arises and passes with objects - and a deeper awareness that illuminates all arisings without itself changing. Armstrong suggests this unchanging awareness may be connected to our Buddha nature or what Zen master Banke called "the unborn." Using the metaphor of sunlight pervading space that becomes visible only when reflected by objects, he points to how the unconditioned forms the background of all experience.
> Through practical meditation guidance and contemplative exercises, Armstrong invites practitioners to recognize moments when the demands of "I and mine" are weak, allowing us to rest in natural awareness. This "voidness of I and mine," as Ajahn Buddhadāsa called it, reveals degrees of the peaceful state of nibbāna available in each moment of letting go.

Last night James talked on the topic of faith and touched on many different aspects of faith. Tonight I want to take up one of the aspects that he touched on and go into it in more detail: the aspect of faith found by taking refuge in our deepest nature, our truest nature.

The Buddha encouraged us over and over again to find the true security in life in the state that he called nibbana, that dimension of our being. Even the far-reaching doctrines that he taught, like the three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self, were only useful tools or skillful means—pointers to coming upon this dimension of nibbana, which he really saw as the ultimate truth.

These are some of the synonyms that he used for this state: the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the shelter, the refuge. So I want to talk about where in our practice we can look for this kind of refuge that's beyond change, this kind of peace that is everlasting and deathless.

I have one warning about this talk. Before the Buddha began his teaching after his enlightenment, he almost didn't teach. He thought about what he'd discovered and thought, "I'm going to teach this and nobody's going to get it. I don't think I'll teach." In fact, what he said was, "This Dhamma that I have discovered, this truth that I've discovered is profound, subtle, and hard to understand." He decided he wouldn't teach because nobody would get it and that would be a bother to him. Actually, the word that's translated in the suttas is "vexation"—this would be vexatious for him.

So he wasn't going to teach, and then this heavenly being came down, a god, and said, "Oh, but there are some people in the world with very little dust in their eyes. Please teach for their benefit." And so he said, "Okay, okay." But he believed that it was profound, subtle, and hard to understand.

I can't claim that this talk is going to be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. I just want to set your expectations accordingly, so you won't worry about that. Really, the way to listen to this talk is just take it in, and don't try to figure it out as we go—and you don't have to try to figure it out later either. I'm being quite honest here: just kind of open your ears and open your mind and see what resonates, and if it doesn't resonate, let it go.

The other thing I want to say is, because I'll be talking about a view or an understanding of the unconditioned, don't take it as the gospel truth. There are many different views of the unconditioned. As the discussion this morning about God pointed to, there's one truth but there are many descriptions. The version that I'll be presenting tonight comes from the Thai forest tradition and is pretty uniformly embraced by that tradition, but not by other Buddhist traditions necessarily. So there are a lot of opinions on this topic and this is one view—if it helps you, use it as a skillful means and no need to cling to it.

A couple of years ago, Sally and I were up in Yosemite. We were hanging out in the valley, and it's always interesting to be in Yosemite Valley. There's a lot of wildlife. We saw coyotes and deer. We'd get up in the morning, and there would be bear prints on our car where they'd gone through the parking lot looking for food. The cars next to us had had their windows ripped out because they'd probably left a candy wrapper or some peanuts on the seat.

But almost as interesting as the wildlife is the human life in the valley. Everybody comes to the valley. The tour buses come through and all the tourists pile off with their shorts and their video cameras. Then at the other end of the spectrum you've got the backpackers who are coming in from a week in the high country and they haven't shaved or washed the whole time they've been out there. And then you have the climbers who are setting up their base camp because they're about to go up El Capitan, three thousand feet straight up. You tune into their culture and it's kind of like the U.S. Marines meets the Grateful Dead. It's really a fascinating culture.

So we'd seen a lot of different characters in Yosemite, but I hadn't seen this one before. There was a circle of people who stood in the parking lot. One person from the group of about ten would get in the middle of the circle, and then someone else would stand behind them. The person who was standing in the middle of the circle would just throw their arms up and fall back, trusting that the person who was standing behind them would catch them—which they did, as we saw. It'd be kind of a dirty trick if they didn't. Then it might be a deep teaching on impermanence.

This is one of those trust exercises, a team-building exercise, so you know that your team is really there for you. But it kind of reminded me of our meditation practice. I kind of feel like in our meditation practice we're always doing this—we're kind of throwing our arms up and falling down. But the curious thing is that something is always there to catch us. Something's always there to hold us.

And this is really, I think, one of the lessons we learn about trust and faith in the Dharma: if we're willing to let go and take that step, we get held by something.

So I want to talk a little bit about what it is that holds us. And what does it really mean to let go?

Somebody said in an interview, "I really want to be with the breath, but thoughts are so seductive." And they really are, aren't they? We have the greatest intention to be with the breath in a sitting, but the thoughts come along and they just invite us away. They invite us to be somewhere else.

When we start to look at what's so fascinating about our thoughts, we find that they express a lot of our hopes and fears. They express a lot of our desires and likes and dislikes in terms of the world. And in a way you could say what we discover through our thoughts is that we have a tendency through our thoughts and those intentions born of thought to want to control our experience or control the world.

We want to set things up so that the pleasant things come our way and stay as long as possible and the unpleasant things are kept at bay and don't come anywhere near us. That's basically what our thoughts are expressing. It's these twin strategies of desire, of pulling to us the pleasant, and aversion, pushing away the unpleasant. And they're means of control. These are the basic strategies with which we try to control our experience and the world.

What we're invited to do in our meditation practice is to stop trying to control, to open ourselves up to the moment in whatever form it's presenting itself and just let that experience be felt in the body, in the emotions, in the thoughts, in the sounds. And basically we're being asked moment after moment to give up control, to surrender.

Ajahn Chah put it this way: if you let go a little, there's a little bit of peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace. So this is the opportunity to touch that really deep peace, but it's also kind of threatening to let go of the sense of control. Not that the control has ever worked particularly well. That doesn't seem to be the point. But it's a very deeply conditioned strategy.

And the Buddha's shorthand for it was: it is the strategy of greed, aversion, and delusion. Letting go of this strategy leads to peace. This is really the challenge, the peace that the Buddha called the stilling of all formations, the relinquishment of all attachments. That is nibbana. So he more or less uses this word nibbana as synonymous with this deep peace that comes from letting go completely.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of the great masters of the Thai forest tradition this last fifty years, said that this peace really comes from letting go of I and mine. Anytime you see the activity of I and mine in your thoughts, you're blocking the peace, if there's a clinging to it. But when you're willing to let that go, your mind is empty of I and mine. And he called that a state of voidness of I and mine. And he said, you touch that peace.

And he said, "If there is some voidness of I and mine, and I merely use the word some, it doesn't have to be completely or unchangeably void, then you are dwelling within the sphere of nibbana. Even though it is not absolute or perfect nibbana, it is nibbana just the same."

So he's talking about degrees of peacefulness and equating that peacefulness with nibbana. As we let go of these strategies of control, we are actually performing a real act of trust and faith. We're surrendering to the universe and we're trusting that we're going to be okay. We're actually very vulnerable at that point. We're very exposed. We're very open. We've dropped our defenses. But something in us is encouraged to try it. And then we find more and more that it's trustworthy, that space.

So how does it feel when you let go in that way? How does it feel when you're not clinging? And you can try it in this moment. You're not clinging to the body. You're not clinging to any particular thoughts. You're not clinging to any particular mood. You're not even clinging to the words that you're hearing. There's just a state of presence and openness.

Sometimes when you let go in that way, if you really let go completely, there's kind of a rush of energy. The energy is as though released from being held. Some people have said that at times it feels like they're floating or flying. As we practice it, it can feel quite calm, quite ordinary. Nonetheless, there's a sense of release, as though our center of gravity has shifted a little, away from the objects that have been clung to, into a sense of spaciousness.

But there's still an awareness at work. And this awareness kind of reveals our basic situation.

Our basic situation is one of vast openness.

When we're not holding on, we see that there's this awareness and there are all the appearances of the world, inner and outer, that are just coming and going. It's a little bit like we're sitting in a movie theater and there's a bright screen up front and all the objects of the world are kind of being tossed up in front of the screen. You know, mother, body, death, fear, joy, school, career, income tax, Britney Spears, in-breath, sounds.

Now if we leave our mind in its natural state, we sit in the movie theater, all those things that go up also go down and just pass away. But if we get preoccupied, we'll tend to reach out. It's like a hand comes out from a seat in the front row and grabs mom, body, career. And then there's grasping.

Once we've grasped, things get solid. We lose that vast openness that's really our natural state. And the focus starts to shrink down because we formed an "I" through the holding. Something has become of tremendous concern to us, and in that latching on, we shrink our experience from this vast oceanic mind state to a narrow, confined sense of self.

So the natural state of mind is just to allow the appearances to come and go and not be moved by them. Then the mind stays balanced and centered. But when an appearance comes along that has a certain charge on it, the mind inclines toward it, either out of desire or aversion, fixes on it, and solidifies a sense of "I" around it. This distorts the mind's natural peace and freedom. And it's only through the action of reaching out and grasping.

So in our practice we have this choice, moment after moment. We can rest in that natural freedom in which everything is coming and going, or we can give in to the self-centeredness and try to hold on and grab a hold of something.

This kind of natural state of freedom takes some recognition. It's not obvious to us from our upbringing. It takes some familiarity in getting pointed out. But I think when you look at really great spiritual beings, you can see they've kind of released into this. They've really come to trust this state and they've really let go into it. And out of that then there's a real spontaneity in their being.

There was a fantastic photo in the newspaper a couple of years ago. There was a gathering in a university in West Virginia of Nobel Peace Prize laureates. They got together to discuss the world situation and how to contribute to more peace in the world. So it was people like the Dalai Lama and Bishop Desmond Tutu and Rigoberta Menchú from Central America. All these really well-respected peace workers were gathered in one place and at the end of their conference there was a photo opportunity.

They were all lined up on a couple of platforms, and the photographer was there to snap the photo to be released to all the national media. The Dalai Lama happened to be standing right behind Bishop Desmond Tutu, who I think of as a fairly august personage. And just as the photo was about to be snapped, the Dalai Lama leaned down and pulled Desmond Tutu's cap off his head.

The photographer caught the moment. The cap was being lifted up, and the Dalai Lama was just laughing this huge belly laugh. And Desmond Tutu was in the spirit too. He sort of saw his hat going, and he started cracking up.

That's trust. That's trust. Just to kind of let it rip, and at an assembly of Nobel Peace laureates.

So in our practice too, we start to feel this kind of effortless quality that awareness has, that we don't have to do anything special in it. We can relax into it. And if we just rest and we're not really pulled away with grasping, the awareness happens all by itself.

We try to point to this in the instructions on sounds—that just have the sense of resting in your sitting, opening to sounds. The sounds just come and go quite easily. And when we're not distracted, we can relax into that without a lot of effort. And the awareness happens spontaneously.

Now I'm using the word awareness, and I said a couple of nights ago that I wanted to talk about these three words—awareness, consciousness, and mindfulness—and what the differences are between them. So I want to go into that a little bit right now.

First thing to say is that there's no word in Pali, in the Buddhist language, that we need to translate by awareness. There's no word from the Buddha that we have to use the word awareness for. He basically used the words mindfulness and consciousness, sati and vijñāna.

So let's start with consciousness. Consciousness or vijñāna just means the bare knowing of experience. And it's a very ordinary use of the term in a way. Because we're sentient beings or we're conscious beings, we have an experience of phenomena.

And just that simplest receiving of the impressions of the world, inner and outer, is done by consciousness. When the sound of the bell arises in your mind and you just hear the sound, there's consciousness knowing it. If you were a trunk of a tree, presumably you wouldn't know that sound. Well, let's not get into that debate. If you're the back wall, you probably don't know that sound. But because you're a conscious being, that sound registers.

Now, before any words come into play, before you interpret it, before you think "bell" or even you think "sound," there's just that hearing. It's consciousness that knows that, that receives that sound. It's just a very bare and simple sense experience. It's quite automatic. Bell rings, we hear. Can't do anything about it. It's almost mechanical. Doesn't have any particular intelligence in it. It's just that receiving.

Then the other term the Buddha talked about was mindfulness. Mindfulness is the knowing of our experience but in a more conceptual and intelligent way. In other words, when the bell rings, if you're mindful, you'll know "hearing." So you'll recognize that your experience in this moment is one of hearing a sound. At least that.

So there's an intelligence at work that is kind of commenting on your experience. "Oh, now I'm hearing a sound. Now I'm feeling an in-breath. Now a thought is arising. Now I feel a mood of peace." This is the function of mindfulness, this knowing in a more intelligent way. This is why the noting practice is powerful. It really draws out this knowing quality.

And one other thing I'll mention is that the Buddha always used the term mindfulness in reference to a particular object. Mindfulness of body, mindfulness of mind, mindfulness of feeling, and so on.

So awareness is a word that we kind of use in a slippery way. It kind of glides between consciousness and mindfulness. In other words, we can make it mean whatever we want it to mean. Sometimes we use it to mean mindfulness, sometimes consciousness, sometimes a blend of both.

Because awareness, when you think about it, when you're aware of your experience, it has the kind of spontaneous quality like consciousness does. Just easily aware. But it also has this intelligent aspect that mindfulness does. I know what I'm experiencing. So it's kind of a nice word to use when you want to look at that combination. There's a spontaneity and there's also an intelligence together. This is more or less the connotation in the word awareness.

Sometimes this quality of spontaneity and intelligence is what's called our Buddha nature. This is from Ajahn Mahaboowa, also a Thai forest master: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of the three characteristics—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and doesn't die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration."

"The natural power of the mind is that it knows and doesn't die."

Maybe this is what we can trust in. Maybe this is what holds us. Can we look a little closer into it through our practice?

So when I get to really profound topics, I like to consult one of my masters, and that is Calvin and Hobbes. This is a strip from Calvin and Hobbes. It's around Christmas time. And Calvin is saying to Hobbes, "This whole Santa Claus thing just doesn't make sense. Why all the secrecy? Why all the mystery? If the guy exists, why doesn't he ever show himself and prove it? And if he doesn't exist, what's the meaning of all this?"

Hobbes responds, "I don't know. Isn't this a religious holiday?" And Calvin replies, "Yeah, but actually I've got the same questions about God. Why doesn't he ever show himself?"

This exchange touches something profound. We all, I think, can resonate with that trust on some deep level—that the universe is safe, or we can put ourselves in the hands of God or the Dharma. But what do we mean by that? What do we mean by God or the Dharma? Have we touched them? Do we know that clearly for ourselves?

I think it's really the point of practice to discover this for ourselves in our own experience—that it is possible to know this firsthand. And I think that's what our practice leads us toward.

Calvin asks why God doesn't show himself. Well, actually, when you think about it, it has to be that way. If God or the Dharma was something that could be touched or seen with our eyes or heard with our ears, it would be of the nature to arise and pass away.

All phenomena that have the nature of arising at the sense door also have the nature to pass away. So the unconditioned can't be one of those things, or it wouldn't be deathless. It would have the properties of being born and dying.

Therefore, the unconditioned has to be invisible. It has to be intangible, and it has to be silent.

This is from Angelus Silesius, a Christian contemplative mystic: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear."

Let me read that again: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear."

I like this because in a very pithy statement, in four lines he's pointed to two fundamental things. One is that trust is connected with relaxation. "The less you reach for it, the more it will appear." It's about non-doing, non-grasping. The second is that the ultimate isn't separate from the present moment. It's concealed in now and here. It's not apart from this.

Suzuki Roshi put it this way: "It is necessary to trust in something that has no form or color, but is always ready to take on form and color." Something that has no form and color, but is ready to take on form and color.

Just as a side note, in Buddhist terminology, "form and color" is shorthand for the visual world. Every object of sight has form or shape and color. That's really all it is. So this is shorthand for all created phenomena.

This is interesting. It's not of form and color, but it takes on form and color. So it's not in the world, but it's not apart from the world either, this unconditioned thing.

I used to think—this puzzled me for a long time—I used to think it meant something like raw matter, atoms or nuclei or quarks or something like that. They didn't have form, but they could take on any form. But you realize, no, even atoms and quarks have form. They're somewhat locatable. They're somewhere there in space.

So I started to realize that what Suzuki Roshi was pointing to was not something from that side, but something from this side—something from the side that's seeing, something from the side of consciousness. Because consciousness doesn't have form or color, but it's always ready to take on form and color. It can take on any form and color.

So we're back to this term consciousness, or vijñāna. In the Buddha's teachings this has a very specific meaning. As I mentioned, it's what holds a sense experience. But it's considered to arise with the sense experience and pass away with it. And that means that consciousness, as the Buddha talks about it, is arising and passing. It's one of the five aggregates. And like the other aggregates, it arises and passes. It arises with the object.

It passes as the object passes.

So what could be unchanging? Because our refuge needs to be unchanging.

Well, in our practice, we change the instructions every day. We talk about sounds, body, breath, thoughts, emotions, intentions, and so forth. But there's one aspect that doesn't change. Have you noticed that? What's the common thread that's linking all these different pieces of the instructions?

Mindfulness. Yes.

This quality of paying attention, or we could say in a way awareness, is the common thread, or you could say the constant thread in all of it. It's a string that connects all these moments of beads together.

So could the deathless somehow be connected with awareness? I don't want to say right now that it is awareness, but maybe it's closely related.

Someone came to the Buddha and asked him, "Venerable sir, I know there are these five physical senses. Where do they come together? What is their resort?"

The Buddha said, "The resort of the five senses is the mind. Chitta."

The questioner said, "Okay. What's the resort or the abode of the mind?"

And the Buddha said, "Awareness."

"Okay. What's the resort of awareness?"

He said, "Liberation."

"And what's the resort of liberation?"

The Buddha said, "Nibbana."

"Okay. What's the resort of nibbana?"

And the Buddha said, "That's going too far. You can't answer that question."

So awareness is kind of the link between the physical senses and nibbana, the unconditioned.

This is from an Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj: "I met my guru when I was thirty-four and realized by thirty-seven." That's kind of nice, isn't it? Good path. "Pleasure and pain lost their sway over me. I was free from desire and fear. I found myself full, needing nothing. I saw that in the ocean of pure awareness, the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside beginninglessly and endlessly. There's a mysterious power that looks after them. That power is awareness, life, God, whatever name you give it. It's the foundation and ultimate support of all that is, as gold is the basis for all jewelry."

Awareness is the ultimate support of all that is. It's not just human beings that have this nature. All sentient beings share in this.

This is the Zen master Huang Po whom James quoted last night: "Buddhas and bodhisattvas, together with all wriggling things possessed of life, share in this great nirvanic nature."

We share that nature with all wriggling things possessed of life. So nothing to be proud about. We all have this.

So this basic nature of awareness holds all the arisings and passings. This is from Ajahn Mahabua again: "There's no escaping this truth. Whatever arises has to vanish. Whatever is true, whatever is a natural principle in and of itself, won't vanish. In other words, the pure mind won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind. All that remains is simple awareness, utterly pure."

So the Buddha said that consciousness was impermanent, and Mahabua is saying that what knows the comings and goings is lasting. How do we reconcile those two?

If you'll humor me, I'd like to lead you into a little thought experiment. I studied physics in college and it was accepted as a valid principle that if you could describe an experiment through thought and prove something would result from it, that was as valid a form of proof as mathematical or experimental, physical experimental proof. The name given to this is a gedanken experiment, thought experiment. So I'd like to do a little gedanken experiment with this quality of awareness.

I want you to imagine that you're in outer space. You're somewhere out there in the solar system, and you're facing away from the sun. And let's just make it interesting—let's say you're looking into an area of the sky where there are no stars. What do you see? You're facing away from the sun. You're looking into outer space. There are no stars in front of you. What do you see? This is not a trick question.

Nothing. Right. You see nothing. There's just blackness, isn't there? Is that blackness completely empty or is it filled with light? The sun's behind you. There's sunlight streaming through the empty space. So is that blackness empty or is it full of light? It's full of light, isn't it? But you don't see it.

Now, suppose a meteor comes from below and whizzes across your field of vision. Will you see it? So you see it. And when you see the meteor, what are you actually seeing? You're seeing reflected sunlight, aren't you? The light hits the meteor, bounces off it, and comes into our eyes. So if you turned around at that point, you would see the radiance of the sun directly. But when you turn away from it, you don't know it's there until something comes in to reflect it.

What I'd like to suggest is that this sunlight pervading empty space is the unconditioned. This is what's ever present. This is the quality of pure awareness. But we don't see it. When something arises in the field of our experience, it's illuminated by this pure awareness and reflects into our eyes. That's consciousness.

So I want to suggest that the unconditioned forms the background of our experience. And it is what illuminates the arisings when they're there. When they're not there, it's simply dormant. It's latent. And we don't see it until some moment, perhaps, when the mind turns around back to the source and touches it directly, knows it directly.

This latent quality of the unconditioned was described by a Zen master called Bankei, who taught in the late 1600s in Japan. He described it as the unborn. And his primary meditation instruction, which he repeated over and over and over again, was "live in the unborn nature of things." In the unborn, all things are perfectly resolved. Live in the unborn. This is an interesting instruction. I find this a very provocative instruction.

What happens to me when I hear that instruction is that my attention naturally releases its grip on the limited and temporary, expanding outward to touch this vastness. Then if we slip back into striving or grasping, we contract again and leave that unborn state. As Banke says, "If you harbor the slightest inclination to seek something, you are turning your back on the unborn." This is like grabbing at the images appearing on the movie screen instead of recognizing the screen itself.

How can we touch this quality of the unborn in our practice? We begin to sense it in those moments when the demands of the "I" are weak. You can learn to notice when the ego is insistent—or as Sylvia mentioned in an earlier talk, when it's "aggrieved"—when it's strong and demanding or complaining. Correspondingly, you can develop sensitivity to when it's quiet, when it's not so demanding or agenda-driven. In those moments, there's a sense of clearer seeing. You can trust more deeply the seeing that emerges from that spacious awareness.

This awareness illuminates everything, yet itself is empty. Nothing is fixed about it because all temporary phenomena can arise and pass within it without obstruction. It's often compared to vast space—open, unlimited, boundless, empty in that same sense. But the crucial difference is that this vastness of awareness possesses a knowing quality. Physical space doesn't have this intelligence; it simply holds physical objects. This vastness of mind, however, has intelligence inherent within it.

What we are most truly and deeply is this empty space that is unchanging, that knows all the temporary arisings and passings. We are not the temporary arisings and passings themselves, though we become confused and mistake ourselves for them. What we really are is this empty space that also has the capacity of knowing.

This is called in some traditions the nature of mind, or our Buddha nature. This nature has always been like this. It is now. It will always be like this. It exists beyond change, beyond coming and going.

This awareness also possesses a perfectly reflective quality, like a mirror that reflects absolutely accurately anything arising before it. This awareness reflects the painful and the pleasant, the beautiful and the ugly, movement and stillness. It reflects impurities of heart like greed and aversion, as well as beautiful states like loving-kindness and compassion. It reflects all of them, yet notice—a mirror isn't changed by any of its reflections. The nature of the mirror remains constant regardless of what it reflects. This Buddha nature is the same.

It cannot be harmed by appearances. Its fundamental nature remains unchanged no matter what has happened to us or in us. This nature therefore has a quality of freedom, of remaining uncorrupted by any arisings. When we realize that this is who we are, we discover that fundamentally we are free. We have been free from the beginning. We have never actually been bound, but we haven't recognized this freedom, so we keep grasping. When we stop grasping, the freedom is immediately present again.

This is from Rumi: "Live in the nowhere that you came from"—notice the echo to the unborn—"even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere, and you have eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops, and you run back and forth."

Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, always getting smaller—checkmate this way, checkmate that way. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free swimming fish.

We are that free-swimming fish.

This emptiness, this empty knowing, is pregnant with wholesome qualities. As we develop the capacity to touch it again and again, the wholesome qualities just flower out of it spontaneously. It contains love and compassion and wisdom and patience and acceptance and faith and joy and peace. Different ones appear as the situation requires. When this empty, knowing heart is faced with suffering, compassion comes out. When it meets happiness in someone else, a resonant joy comes out.

So in our practice, can we start to tune to this kind of clarity? This kind of purity of knowing, starting by noticing when our mindfulness is clear, when it's strong, when the reactions of self are not so insistent. Then if we have the capacity, we can just rest in this knowing, sometimes called resting in awareness.

But the awareness is not a separate place. It's not like another destination apart from appearances. It's actually right there with the appearances. So maybe a better way to say it is we're resting with awareness. If you have the feeling that you've touched an awareness that's not holding appearances, that's delusion. Awareness is always of the arisings. The arisings and the awareness always come together. So look again and see what is being known in resting with awareness.

So this awareness is there. We're clearly in touch with the arisings and the passings. The appearances keep being illuminated. They keep being known. But we also recognize that the mind is in its natural state. It's not clinging anywhere, so it's not being distorted out of self-interest. It's not trying to hold on to anything. And we are in this state of the unborn.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa again: "The voidness of I and mine is self-existent. Nothing can touch it, concoct it, or improve it. This voidness is the eternal state, for it knows neither birth nor death. This is the unborn, the Buddha nature, the Dhamma itself."

Ajahn Mun, also from the Thai forest tradition, put it this way: "The Dhamma stays as the Dhamma. The appearances stay as the appearances."

As we recognize the nature of the unborn, the fundamental state of mind, we're actually tuning our being to the unconditioned. We're tuning our being to nibbana, to the safety, to the peaceful, to the refuge. This can become its own path. And we can simply, at a certain point in practice, recognize if we're in that natural state, which is freedom, or if we have moved out of self-interest to try to take hold of something, out of desire or aversion. So we recognize when the mind is in the state of freedom, and we recognize the movements that constitute grasping. This can actually become our practice. And as we just trust more and more in that resting in freedom, it draws us down the path.

I'll just close with this quotation from the Sutta Nipata. The Buddha was talking to a bhikkhu whose name was Pingiya. He said, "Pingiya, other people have freed themselves by this power of trust. Vakali, Bhadravuda and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore, beyond the draw of death."

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Other people have freed themselves by the power of trust. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the furthest shore beyond the draw of death.

Thank you for your attention.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 238

Since Feeling Is First: The Role of the Brahmavihāras

Drawing inspiration from E.E. Cummings' poem "Since Feeling is First," Guy Armstrong presents a compelling case for the heart practices of the brahmavihāras as essential companions to vipassanā meditation. He explores how mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (sympathetic joy), and upekkhā (equanimity) address the fundamental truth that "feeling is first" in our spiritual journey.

Armstrong shares vivid stories contrasting teachers who embody different qualities of realization - from a accomplished but emotionally distant Asian monk to the radiant joy of Ajahn Jamnian and the Dalai Lama's infectious warmth. He addresses common skepticism among vipassanā practitioners about heart practices, explaining how loving-kindness fills the "emptiness" of insight with warmth, creating what he calls "juiciness" in our practice.

The talk provides practical guidance for mettā meditation, emphasizing the importance of genuine intention behind the phrases rather than mechanical repetition. Armstrong explores how these practices naturally unfold into compassion when meeting suffering, sympathetic joy when encountering happiness, and equanimity as the balancing foundation. He concludes with Tibetan formulations of the four immeasurables and Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World" as a musical meditation on the brahmavihāras, demonstrating how these ancient practices remain vibrantly relevant for cultivating wisdom and love in daily life.

The subject of tonight's talk is "Since Feeling Is First: The Role of the Brahmavihāras." The title comes from a poem by E.E. Cummings called "Since Feeling Is First," and I'd like to read a portion of it:

Since feeling is first, who pays any attention to the syntax of things will never wholly kiss you. Wholly to be a fool while spring is in the world, my heart approves. Don't cry. The best gesture of my brain is less than your eyelids flutter, which says, we are for each other. Then laugh, leaning back in my arms, for life's not a paragraph, and death, I think, is no parenthesis.

I appreciate this emphasis: "since feeling is first." I think this is true in a very deep way. When you examine the first noble truth, it's really about feeling the truth of suffering. The noble truths are fundamentally about our feelings of sadness, sorrow, pain, and distress. The entire path is a statement that there is a way for the heart to find its way out of misery—a misery that's basically brought about because of our ability to feel, to feel deeply.

This brings us to a second question: Is insight enough? Since feeling is first, is insight sufficient to find our way through suffering? Certainly we place the most emphasis on our insight practice. Vipassana is really the practice of wisdom in our tradition—the practice of seeing things as they are. It's said that when we see things as they really are, we are freed.

So what role does the heart play in this? I once asked one of my early teachers this very question: "Do you think that the wisdom practice is enough?" He replied, "Yes. Love is the child of freedom." We can touch this in our practice. When we feel in a space of being free and the heart being unburdened, it's easy to feel love, to feel metta, to feel connected. For some people, this may be enough—opening to freedom also opens the door of the heart.

But for other people, I don't think it's enough. In my case, it wasn't enough.

I was on staff at IMS in the late 1970s when we had a visit from a very renowned Asian monk. He was well-known, had established many centers in Asia, and trained many teachers. We'd been looking forward to his visit for a long time—it was one of the first major Asian teachings we had hosted at IMS.

Being on staff, I went to the airport to meet the monks as they flew in, since he came with a small retinue. We waited at the gate where he was supposed to arrive. The plane from Burma landed, and all the passengers poured off. No monks. We thought, could we have missed them? I didn't think so. In those days especially, there weren't many men with shaved heads wearing orange robes.

We stood and waited a little longer. Finally, after everybody had filed off the plane, very slowly and mindfully walking out of the gateway were five monks, each carrying a fan made for this occasion. The fans bore the name of the head monk and read "World Tour 1979." It was rather like greeting a rock band arriving in a foreign country.

They walked very mindfully down to the luggage area, we shepherded them to our cars, and drove them back to the center. They stayed for about two weeks and led a ten-day meditation retreat in the style we've just completed.

Being on staff, I got to spend time both "backstage" with this monk and practicing in the hall, both of which were very revealing. As I observed him in his informal moments, I was surprised by one thing: in all the time I watched him, I never saw him smile or laugh or show any signs of joy.

I truly believe that he was very well developed spiritually. He had done extensive practice, reached deep insight, and as far as I could tell, there wasn't any more suffering going on in him. But I didn't feel any spark of joy from him. As a result, speaking personally, I wasn't very inspired to seek him out for future practice.

One of my friends who was also on staff at the time and had the opportunity to serve him said that for her, it was like his metta was there, but it was like distant starlight.

It wasn't the kind of warmth that you can feel from some teachers where it's like a blast of the sun. It's like distant starlight. It's present but a little bit faint.

So the way that his personality was expressing didn't touch me particularly and didn't inspire my practice.

On the other hand, I practiced in recent years with another teacher who I feel has a lot of heart quality. At the end of one retreat recently, he was giving kind of pith instructions to his students. And he said, "When you leave the retreat, I want you to go out in the world and I want you to be normal. Don't go around being weird. People think Buddhism is weird enough already. So just be normal. Be wise. Don't go around messing up. Be kind to other people. Be kind to yourself. Manifest wisdom in the world." And the last thing he said was, "Be juicy."

Be juicy. I think this is the quality of heart that touches other people when we manifest our own juice. Then people really see, oh, that practice has something that can touch me. That practice has a heart quality that I can really resonate with and enjoy.

So maybe this quality of juice in our practice, the kind of sweetness of heart, maybe it's not even so much for ourselves. As I said, this monk was very, very cooled out, very peaceful, and not in a place of suffering. I really think he had completed his practice in a certain way. But maybe the quality of juice is for those who are interested in taking their practice really into the world and in small or large ways transforming the world through their work. Then developing these qualities of heart are the most straightforward ways to spread the qualities of kindness and love and wisdom, the most direct route.

So maybe if you consider your path to be the bodhisattva path of taking the great heart back into the world and changing the world, then maybe these heart qualities are a really integral part of what needs to be developed.

So I'm very grateful that there are in our tradition specific practices that open the heart, that bring about this quality of juiciness and sweetness. We've talked, I think, a lot over the retreat of the kinds of qualities that can come out of faith, devotion, surrender, loving-kindness, compassion, joy, happiness, contentment. All these qualities, fortunately, are also amenable to development. They are part of our heritage. They're part of our nature that unfolds as we unfold the whole path. But we can accelerate their growth, accelerate their relationship.

In our tradition, the fundamental practice is loving-kindness, metta. That's our primary heart practice and the one we spend the most time on. In Tibetan and Zen traditions, they emphasize more the Brahmavihara, the divine abode of compassion. But you shouldn't get too sectarian about this. I hope this doesn't become a dividing line—well, we're the metta team, and you're the compassion team, so we have to fight you.

Because actually, these two are the same flavor of heart. Somebody asked the Dalai Lama about this: What does this mean? Is compassion a really kind of gloomy quality? You're always harping about suffering. Is compassion a really gloomy quality? He says, "No, no, no. It's just a basic movement of caring in the heart. Basic human warmth." That's what we mean by compassion.

So this is really the same sense as our loving-kindness. When loving-kindness looks on suffering, it comes forth as compassion. But in their heart, they're the same.

This development of the heart is sometimes a hard sell to vipassana meditators. A lot of vipassana meditators are very skeptical about this stuff. You know, it's a little too touchy-feely, or they have real philosophical reservations about it. One way somebody expressed it in an interview, they said, "Well, it seems contradictory to me. Vipassana is letting go of everything. And with metta, you're trying to bring something in. Isn't that a contradiction?"

And I don't think it is. I think it's a complementary relationship.

The way I understand it is that our Vipassana practice opens up emptiness through the letting go, again and again and again. It opens up this great expanse of spaciousness or openness or emptiness. But for some of us, if we just left it there, it could be a kind of cold emptiness—a vacant, isolating, stark or bleak kind of emptiness.

So the role of metta is to come in and fill that empty space with warmth. When we open up to spaciousness, it's not a cold or dark experience. It's a spaciousness that's filled with the warmth of the heart. I think where our practice of loving kindness and our practice of mindfulness come together is in this quality of a warm attention that can hold all the arisings, including our other beloved sisters and brothers, in the space of friendliness—all arisings within the space of friendliness.

Another criticism that people sometimes make from a wisdom point of view is this: they say, "I think these phrases of metta practice are really deluded. May I be happy? May you be happy? There is no I. There is no you. What do you mean? This doesn't even make sense from a Vipassana point of view. They're just empty phenomena rolling on. You can't be happy. I can't be happy. There's no I there."

So I have an alternate phrase for you who have this philosophical reservation. You may do your metta practice using the following phrase. If I were doing it for Sally, for instance, I could say, "May this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena known as Sally experience the factor of happiness on an ever more frequent basis."

It's a little bit more long-winded, but it has the advantage of being philosophically impeccable. That might be important for some of you. So I want to really justify it on a philosophical level. But of course, that isn't really what's important.

The important thing is what you feel when you meet somebody who's really developed this heart quality. I love to reflect on the Dalai Lama in this regard. He was in this very hall—I'm sure a lot of you know this. He was sitting here in the hall for a couple of days last year. We had a teacher's conference of about 220 Buddhist teachers from Asia and from the West, and the Dalai Lama joined us for about two days of that.

He was sitting here giving teachings and engaging in discussion, and it was just wonderful to be with him. He said something at the time that I really think is true. He said, "I'm not interested in propagating Buddhism," which kind of surprised me because he's the best Buddhist ambassador that we have today. He said, "I'm interested in propagating human values." What he really wants to propagate is the heart qualities of kindness and care and compassion. And he touches people so directly.

Because he was here as a head of state, we had to have fairly tight security. At one point, the Secret Service was talking about putting riflemen up on the ridges and on horseback. There were bomb-sniffing dogs on the property. All of us had to come through a metal detector to come in to the property every day. It was staffed by State Department, United States government, State Department security guards. These are not the people who inspect bags at the airport. These are heavy-duty professionals, and they are no-nonsense people. They have also provided security for people like Yasser Arafat. They know what they're doing.

So they manned the metal detectors with a pistol on one hip and a nightstick on the other. You did not mess with these people. You didn't joke with them. They were not there to joke. But after they got to know us, they did talk to us a little bit, telling us some of the other jobs that they'd done and how intense it can be.

But I thought what was most interesting is when the two days of teachings were over and the Dalai Lama was going to depart that day, all the State Department security guards asked to have their photograph taken with him. Because even just in their casual contact with him, they had felt something of his love. And they were touched by it.

So they took a photograph of the Dalai Lama with all the security guards with their guns and sticks. They all got to take that home with them.

So this is the domain of the Brahma-viharas, the qualities of loving-kindness, of compassion, of joy and equanimity. We really understand metta as the foundation for the other three—by developing metta we naturally sensitize the heart. The heart becomes responsive to the world, to the circumstances in the world. Then we don't have to specially sensitize it again for compassion. When the sensitive heart looks on suffering, compassion comes out. When it looks on happiness, sympathetic joy comes out. When it just rests in its own nature, then it holds the world in a balance of equanimity.

This really is part of our true nature, but because it's gotten covered over, it takes some encouragement for it to come out. It takes some development, which is why we do the practice. And it can feel fabricated at first. Some people feel it's a little bit phony, like we're trying to push something. Some people have a resistance to the phrases and the images and the formal practice, but they like the feeling of just touching in to the quality of loving-kindness and abiding with that.

What I'd say is that this really is the essence of the practice. That's the direction we're aiming in. But I've found, and a lot of people have found, that the phrases become a stable and dependable way in to that feeling. So as you practice with the formal practice of metta—working with the phrases over time and working with the images—then you can turn your attention to the phrases and to the image, and in a very short period of time, the feeling of loving kindness will start to come through in one of its flavors.

It's not always overwhelming. It's not always a grandiose thing of unbounded, unconditional love. Sometimes it's just friendliness. Sometimes it's patience. Sometimes it's acceptance. Sometimes it's trust. All of these are different flavors of metta. So the phrases provide a way to elicit that feeling in a reliable kind of way, just as the breath provides the channel to bring out the mindfulness quality in vipassana practice. But ultimately, love is not a fabricated thing. It becomes more spontaneous.

I remember that one of the most loving people in my life was my grandmother. She was born in the countryside in North Carolina around 1890 and lived a hard life. She married my grandfather, for one thing, and he was one of the orneriest men that I've ever known. He was very prickly, not somebody you could get close to, strong aversive type. But despite that, she just manifested this sweetness her whole life, all the time I knew her.

We would go to my grandparents to visit in the summer. As soon as the three of us kids would come in, she'd immediately lean down and give us a hug. She'd put her lips right in this hollow of our neck by our shoulder and kind of nuzzle around in there, and she'd say, "I'm going to steal your sugar. I'm looking for your sugar." That's my feeling memory of my grandmother—she was looking for our sugar. She hadn't done any Buddhist training whatsoever. She hadn't even done psychotherapy. And yet there she was with this very great loving heart and quality of patience in the midst of a difficult life.

So we say that the love is intrinsic, but it needs to be uncovered. It needs to be encouraged out, a little bit like a shy animal, like the chipmunks or squirrels that run when a person gets too close.

We do the practice of loving-kindness, directing our thoughts toward others as well as to ourselves. Sometimes we wonder, am I really changing the other person? As I send my wishes, is the other person being affected? Can they feel it? Will it help them in their life? The classical texts say that it can. But of course, that depends on the purity of the transmitter and the purity of the receiver for those channels to be open. They say that it certainly can happen that way.

What we do know for sure—because we may never know the answer to that question—what we do know for sure is that it affects us and changes us. This is really the primary reason that we do the metta practice. It's really to open our own hearts. We come to see through doing the loving-kindness that the real source of happiness is in a purified heart.

It's not in external conditions. It's not in being adored by others or admired, or by being famous or wealthy. Happiness comes when the heart is pure. You can experience this through loving-kindness. You can experience it through the freedom of vipassana practice. When the heart is free of self-centeredness, there's a natural quality of contentment and happiness. This is a great blessing of the loving-kindness practice.

The Buddha said that the result of wholesome actions in the world—like generosity and service and morality—are not one-sixteenth the power of the blessing of metta. Not one-sixteenth the power of metta.

Someone else who really communicates this quality for me is Ajahn Jamnian. I imagine a number of you have met him. He comes here every year in May. He's a Thai monk, about sixty-six now. When he was young, he was very handsome, and people from all around would come to practice with him because they'd basically fallen in love with him. Not only did he have a really pleasing face, but he also had this great heart. Today, as he's aged and put on a little bit of weight, you can still see the handsomeness in him. But the heart has gotten even bigger.

He has such amazing energy. He always seems to be happy. I've never seen him unhappy for a second in all the time that he's been here. He also has incredible energy.

Ajahn Jamnian did a lot of loving-kindness practice when he was young. He was sort of a meditation prodigy. He fell into a trance when he was about three or four years old, and his parents couldn't communicate with him for about twenty-four hours. He just sat down and went inside and was gone for about a day. But then he came out. He was fine. His parents said, "This guy has some talent." So they took him to the village shaman and he was trained in shamanic powers. They took him to the village monk and he was trained in meditation from an early age. He did a lot of loving-kindness practice, and now he just radiates that kind of happiness and joy.

What we'll do often is have him down in the lower meditation hall for about five days, and he'll just give teachings from about nine in the morning till about five in the afternoon. If we didn't interrupt him for lunch, I think those would be continuous teachings. He can talk from all that energy.

We'll say to him, "Ajahn Jamnian, would you like to see San Francisco today? Would you like to go on a drive and see some of the nature around here?" And he says, "Well, I'm happy whatever you'd like me to do. If you'd like to take me on a drive, I'm happy to do that. If you'd like me to teach, I'm happy to do that. Are there people who'd like to hear the Dharma? If there are people who'd like to hear the Dharma, I'd really like to talk the Dharma to them. But I'm happy whatever you'd like me to do." And he really is like that. He's always happy.

He doesn't know a lot of English, but his favorite kind of instruction combines vipassana and metta. He goes, "Happy, happy. Empty, empty. Happy, happy." That's his transmission, his heart transmission.

One of the things I really appreciate about the practice of the brahmaviharas is that it opens our practice up to all of life. We can take our vipassana practice and use it in a self-centered way. It's not meant to go that way, but it can. We can focus on my pain, my problems, my neurosis, my healing, my progress, my liberation.

But with a metta practice, you can't stay self-centered. It takes you out to connect with all of life, all beings. This is from Shantideva, a ninth-century Indian teacher, who said, "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

So when we open out in this way of caring for others, we actually find, as James alluded last night in that Tagore quote on service, that this is the path to happiness—the path to happiness is in caring for other people as well as ourselves.

In doing the metta practice, the core of it is the simple intention with which we send the wish to someone. These phrases—it's not like a mantric practice where you just have to say the words over and over and over again and it creates some kind of sense that does the work. With the metta practice, the meaning needs to be there so that the words are somehow coming out of your heart, coming out of your caring.

So as you connect with the person that you're about to send to, if you can just feel for a moment that little bit of caring—just something like, "I hope you're happy." You don't have to say it like that. But as you connect with the person, just have that feeling: "Oh, I hope things are good for you. I hope you're well. I hope you're happy." Then let the phrase carry that intention. That's what gives the metta its power. That's what does the work.

So as you do the practice, see if you can connect with that little bit of intention each time you send a phrase. And if you do, that's what creates the juice. That's what makes it unfold. And it will all unfold from there. There's not a lot else you need to do.

So that's planting the seeds. It may take a while for the seeds to sprout. We can't control that. But our work is just to plant those seeds, which are the intentions of caring. And we plant them over and over and over again. And sooner or later, the metta grows up.

And when the metta comes, it brings with it some really lovely qualities. One is a sense of contentment. When we're in that place of friendliness, feeling that we're in a friendly relationship with the world, we can kind of stop struggling so much. In a way you could say there's no better place to be than that. So in a way it feels like we've come home when we come into that field of metta. And then we can really rest. There's nothing more beautiful to look for. There's a Tibetan phrase that says, "There is nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face." This is the feeling of resting in loving kindness. The search can come to an end.

Metta is also a concentration practice. Because you're coming back to the phrases again and again, it brings the mind together around that object. So it unifies the mind, as any concentration practice does. But what's so powerful about metta as a concentration practice is that love is also a very unifying force in the mind. Love binds things together. Love binds us together.

So under the integrating power of love as it gets developed, the different fragments of our personality that we may have pushed aside as too painful or too unbeautiful to own start to come back together again. And in that, we find our wholeness through this quality of acceptance and friendliness to ourselves. This unification of mind is really healing. And love has that healing property. It holds every part of ourselves in a large and wholesome container. It's not that it makes the difficulties go away, but it simply finds a big container, a big heart to hold them in. And they also get viewed with that kind of friendliness.

There's a really lovely poem that expresses this by an American poet named Galway Kinnell. It's called "St. Francis and the Sow." The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower. For everything flowers from within of self-blessing. Though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness.

To put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing. As St. Francis put his hand on the creased forehead of the sow and told her in words and in touch, blessings of earth on the sow, and the sow began remembering all down her thick length, from the earthen snout all the way through the fodder and slops to the spiritual curl of the tail, from the hard spininess spiked out from the spine down through the great broken heart to the sheer blue milk and dreaminess spurting and shuddering from the fourteen teats into the fourteen mouths, sucking and blowing beneath them—the long, perfect loveliness of sow.

So that's the first of the brahmaviharas, the foundation of loving-kindness, the appreciation of ourselves and others. And that opens the door to the flowering of compassion.

This is such a big question. When we look out and start to explore the noble truths, when we look out with the eyes of the noble truths, we see how much suffering there is in the world. And it's really immense. Even the suffering in one human life is hard to conceive of. I don't really think it's conceivable to hold it in our minds at one time. Then how do we relate to suffering in a wise way?

There are so many ways that we relate unwisely. When I started to think about it, I thought of so many ways that I haven't been skillful in relating to suffering. I've often tried to avoid it or deny it, say it wasn't there, or turn away. Or I'd try to fix it to make it go away. Or I'd judge it and say it shouldn't be happening. I'd judge myself and say I'm wrong for having it happen to me. Or I'd try to find something pleasurable to take its place in my experience. Or I'd try to rationalize it—try to figure out where it came from, if it was something karmic that I'd done three lifetimes ago.

This response of compassion is maybe an unusual one in the world. But compassion really has the quality to just open to suffering and again hold it in this large space of acceptance. As we get more capacity to do that, what happens is that our hearts get bigger and bigger to be able to accommodate the suffering. And I'm not sure there's anything but suffering that can really enlarge the heart, that can stretch it in that way.

So by opening to our own suffering, we find we grow our ability to be with other people's suffering. And that's a really beautiful and rare gift in the world. How rare it is to have a friend or an acquaintance who you can go to in the hardest of situations and know that they'll just have you as you are and not try to fix you, not look down on you, not judge you, but just open their heart to what you're going through too. It's a really beautiful thing to bring into the world.

The near enemy of compassion has a couple of forms. One of the main forms, the classical expression, is pity. The near enemy of compassion is said to be pity. And what that means is that we look down on someone who's suffering. We feel sorry for them. But it kind of comes from a place where we're up higher and they're down below. There's a kind of condescension in the sense of pity.

But the state of compassion, on the other hand, knows that we're in the same boat together, that they're not weird for having suffering, because we know our own suffering. And we know how it really joins us with the world.

This is a poem from Palestinian-American poet Naomi Shihab Nye called "Kindness":

Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things, feel the future dissolve in a moment like salt in a weakened broth. What you held in your hand, what you counted and carefully saved, all this must go, so you know how desolate the landscape can be between the regions of kindness. How you ride and ride thinking the bus will never stop, the passengers eating maize and chicken will stare out the window forever.

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive.

Before you know kindness as the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you can see the size of the cloth.

Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore, only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread, only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, it is I you have been looking for, and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend.

So this quality of kindness really connects us to all of life because we acknowledge we all share in this suffering of being alive. That's the size of the cloth. The size of the cloth is everywhere. We're all in this together.

When we can hold that understanding with equanimity, then compassion isn't a state of suffering. The Buddha described it as a really beautiful state. There is a sweetness in it. But because it's contacting sorrow, there can also be a sad quality.

There often is a sad quality in compassion. One of my Tibetan teachers said that the quality of compassion is like the quality at sunset. You're sitting up on a mountainside, and you're watching the sun go down. There's a real beauty to the colors, the softness of the light. But there's also a kind of sadness about the ending of the day. He said that mixture of sweetness and sadness is the flavor of compassion.

Sometimes when we're reflecting on all the suffering in the world, it can seem overwhelming. The heart can actually get shut down because too much suffering is in mind. At that time, it's more skillful not to call all that suffering up, because the important thing is to keep the heart open and keep it light.

The other near enemy of compassion is grief. That's when the heart really gets weighed down with the sense of suffering. When compassion is sliding into its near enemy of grief, it's best to let go of some of the reflections on the suffering in the world, to narrow the lens down a little until you just take in enough suffering that you can accommodate with equanimity. Or drop the reflection on suffering at that point and turn to something wholesome and uplifting—a benefactor in loving kindness, a child, a pet, nature, something beautiful. Give the heart a little bit of uplift. Then if you like, you can come back to the compassion a little later.

Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche had a really lovely description of compassion. He called it our sore spot. He said, "It's as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts." That sore spot on our body is an analogy for compassion. Why? That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. Our heart is tender. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief.

Then he goes on to say that there's also an inner wound called Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound—that is, this sore spot or tender feeling about the world—and the internal wound of Buddha nature begin to meet and communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever.

That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore. This bodhisattva fever is when the heart is really open to all the changing circumstances of the world, of others' lives and our lives. Again we really feel that feeling is first. It all comes down to the feeling of suffering or release, suffering or happiness.

The third of the Brahmaviharas is sympathetic joy or mudita. Again, this is just the result when the sensitive heart looks on happiness. As a practice, it's a very upbeat practice. It's a very happy practice because it's like we get two doses of happiness as we're doing it. We focus on someone's happiness, and then we can feel happy in response to that. We get the hit of their happiness, and we get the hit of our happiness.

I called up a friend who I hadn't talked to for quite some time. I said, "How are you doing? How are you? We haven't talked so long. I've really been curious. How are you doing?" She said, really enthusiastically, "I'm wonderful." As soon as she said that, my heart just lit up. Immediately I said back, "You know, I'm wonderful too." It was just such a delight to be able to exchange that. But it was actually a thrill for me to hear the kind of enthusiasm with which she said, "I'm wonderful." I don't hear that every day.

The Dalai Lama said, "If you can be happy out of other people's happiness, then your odds for happiness go up by six billion to one."

This is indeed a gamble worth taking.

In one tradition, they recommend that we don't practice sympathetic joy for ourselves—they say it's only supposed to be about resonating with others. But I actually don't see it that way. I think it can be very skillful to practice sympathetic joy for ourselves. And what comes through when I do that, for me, is a feeling of gratitude. Sympathetic joy for oneself actually makes us aware of all the beautiful things that are in our life, all the things that we're happy for in our life.

If I could change one thing in the Buddha's teachings, it would be to add gratitude as the fifth brahmavihara, because I think it's a beautiful state of mind that is right up there with the other four. When you think about it, when you're in a state of gratitude, you've cut through both greed and aversion. You've cut through greed because you're so happy about what you have. And you've cut through aversion because you're focusing on the blessings and not the shortcomings in your life.

A friend of mine who's a dharma teacher and a grandmother was talking to one of her granddaughters on Christmas Day, speaking by telephone. The little girl was telling her grandmother about all the great presents that she'd gotten at Christmas. She was really happy about the presents she'd received. And her grandmother said, "Well, when you get lots of presents, does that make you feel thankful for what you have, or do you want more?"

And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, I'd like to have more."

Her grandmother said, "Oh, that's too bad."

The little girl said, "Well, what do you mean? Why is that too bad?"

Her grandmother explained, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, you feel good inside? And when you're wanting more, you don't feel so good inside?"

And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, that's right. That's right."

So she got that lesson about gratitude.

I have another friend—I talked to her at the beginning of the year. I hadn't seen her for a while, and I said, "How are you doing this year?" She's in the financial business, so you can imagine how her year has been with the decline of the stock market. It's been a rotten year in her business. She said, "You know, it's been a really difficult year in some ways. It's the first year I felt like a failure in my business. I couldn't do anything right this year business-wise." But she said, "It's also one of the happiest years of my life."

I said, "Why is that?"

She said, "Because I decided to practice gratitude this year. I've made a conscious practice of gratitude all year. And I just feel so happy about all the things that I have in my life that are going well."

I think this is a great practice. I did this during one retreat. I started on a long retreat, a six-week retreat, and I noticed my mind was getting a little depressed about the winter setting in and the long days of practice ahead. So I wrote down all the things in my life that I was really appreciative of, put them on one piece of paper. Then every morning when I'd get up, the first thing I'd do was read that piece of paper. It really put me in a great frame of mind for the rest of the day. It started that day off on a really terrific note. So I encourage you, if that appeals to you, to take up this practice of gratitude.

One of the other things that the mudita practice really brings out, I think, is the importance of joy. We spend a lot of time talking about dukkha—you may have noticed. But joy is a really essential part of the path, too. In fact, there's one teaching of the Buddha where he expresses the path to liberation in positive terms of joy, rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, and on to liberation. So it's a really important part of the path. And doing the mudita practice tunes us into the joyful elements in life and gives us that uplift.

I'm not going to go much into equanimity tonight. We've talked about it in the guided meditations. It's not as directly tied to the feeling component as the other three, so I'll leave that for another night. But I'll just say that it's a critical component of all the other three.

It keeps the others in balance and keeps them from sliding into their near or far enemies.

The Brahmaviharas have truly become for us a map to wise response to life. The changing conditions of existence are always presenting us with pleasant circumstances and unpleasant circumstances—the potential for going up, the potential for going down. If we're not attentive, we slide into these near and far enemies rather quickly.

When something good happens in our life, we often get elated or over-exuberant about it. We think about it a lot. It's really the thinking that corrupts the happiness, and that's the near enemy of mudita. Or when something unfortunate happens to us, we easily get depressed. We dwell on it again with thoughts, and we sink into a negative space. That's the near enemy of compassion—grief.

But if we keep touching base with the Brahmaviharas, they can guide us back to center. Supported by equanimity, we can open to difficulties with compassion, not with grief. We can open to positive things that happen with a spirit of mudita and not over-exuberance.

We start to realize that all circumstances of life can become grounds for deepening our practice. Everything that happens, positive or negative, can be fuel for growth in the Brahmaviharas, therefore growth in our understanding. Then we begin to see that this intention toward the Brahmaviharas is actually an important karmic factor on the path. As we activate this wise intention, it helps propel us on the journey to liberation.

I want to close with two pieces. One is sharing the Tibetan phrases for the Brahmaviharas that bring out the karmic aspect of the path. Then I want to close with a listening reflection that expresses all the Brahmaviharas together.

The Tibetan tradition calls them the four immeasurables, or boundless states of mind. There are four different phrases for metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity:

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow.

May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Let's sit together in silence for a moment, holding these intentions in our hearts.

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue. May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

CHAPTER 239

The Joy in Renunciation

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this dharma talk from a long retreat at Spirit Rock, Guy Armstrong examines renunciation (nekkhamma) as one of the ten pāramīs—not as deprivation, but as a practice leading to profound joy and freedom. Drawing from the Buddha's own renunciation when Prince Siddhārtha left palace life, Armstrong illustrates how temporary monastic life during retreat creates the conditions for deep insight.
> The talk weaves together stories of great practitioners like Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche and Lama Shabkar, who spent years in solitary retreat, with practical guidance for modern retreatants. Armstrong addresses the challenges of giving up external supports—food preferences, comfortable accommodations, intimate relationships, entertainment—showing how this outer simplification allows consciousness to return to its natural, self-sustaining state.
> Referencing the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's instruction to 'abide independent, not clinging to anything in the world,' Armstrong explains how renunciation reveals the mind's inherent freedom. He addresses the emotional intensity that arises in retreat settings ('yogi mind') and offers practical advice for navigating community living in silence. The talk concludes with the profound teaching that true happiness comes not from accumulation but from letting go, quoting the Dhammapada: 'How very happily we live, we who have nothing. We will feed on rapture like the radiant gods.'

I think there's something about the start of a long retreat that has a different atmosphere than anything else that I know of. For me, this retreat, even though it's only the second day, already feels different than most retreats that I teach. And I think you all bring a different attitude coming in than in most other retreats.

Some people are here for two weeks, and that happens to be longer than any other retreat that we have on the calendar this year. Some of you are here for four weeks, some for six, some for two months. And I just want to say that I really appreciate the degree of commitment that you all are coming in with. It's something that I feel from you, and I feel like it makes us elevate our game also. So I just want to acknowledge that up front, that it's a special time that we're entering. And for me, it's really a privilege to be working with you all who have this degree of commitment. It's great to be here.

The subject of the talk tonight is the joys in renunciation. And it goes along with the commitment that you are making in coming here. In a way it's kind of an echo of what the Buddha did. The young prince Siddhartha Gautama left home when he was 29. This is how he described it in his own words:

"While still young, a black-haired young man endowed with the blessing of youth, in the prime of life, I shaved off my hair and beard, though my mother and father wished otherwise and grieved with tearful faces. And I put on the yellow robe and went forth from the home life into homelessness."

You notice he doesn't say anything about the reaction of his young wife. But I attribute that more to Indian culture of the day than to this particular person.

So this has really been the heart of the life of monks and nuns for the last 2,500 years, this leaving of the home life and going out into homelessness. That's what constituted becoming a monk or a nun. And you all are actually doing the same thing here, because we're basically creating a temporary monastery here for the next two months.

And we give up certain things in entering. We give up using money for the most part. We give up entertainments. We're celibate. Well, you are anyway. You notice we didn't chant that third precept when the retreat started. We're on a different set of vows than you. In our tradition, the monks take—and it used to be the nuns took even more—the monks take 227 vows. The nuns used to take 254 before their order died out. And this is quite a difficult practice in and of itself to keep these vows in a conscientious way.

But I really feel from my own personal experience that what you're engaged in here is harder than that, is more arduous than that. It was easier for me to observe the monkly rules than it is to do the kind of intensive practice that we do here. So I think that you are practicing on the level of renunciation that monks and nuns historically have practiced at.

And in fact, the commentary to the suttas from ancient days says that in the context of mindfulness practice, anyone who sincerely endeavors to accomplish this practice is considered a bhikkhu. Or if you like, a bhikkhuni. That's the old term for a monk or a nun.

So as we read through the suttas during the retreat and you see the word bhikkhu, don't interpret it as a monk or as a nun. Interpret it as a committed practitioner, please, because that's what the commentaries say that is meant by the term. So you qualify for that category.

And in a very real way, you are homeless now. You've left behind the security of your home life. And you've kind of cast yourself upon the mercy, often, of strangers. The cooks, the managers, and the teachers kind of hold your fate in our hands, in a way. And yet you have trusted us to do that. And I hope your trust won't be misplaced. But we'll see how you behave first.

This retreat experience, this renunciate experience, is in a large part powerful because it's a withdrawal from busyness. It's a great simplification of our daily life. It's a time for silence, for slowing down, and for contemplation. This is really honored by all cultures that have a strong spiritual value. And we may think that we don't have enough time today to do this, but just because of that, we need it even more than ever.

This is from a young lama in the Tibetan tradition who's living in Ladakh, India, named Drukchen Rinpoche. He's a modern teacher:

"I was given a Western education for which I am grateful in many ways, but I lost something. I lost the peace of mind that I might have had in another generation. Everyone in our generation lives in a fragmented, complex, and disturbing time in which it is hard to keep one's spiritual balance. It's hard to find the time to build that balance in the first place."

I feel increasingly that I must go into retreat more, must meditate more, must discipline myself more, otherwise I shall be of no use to my people.

This degree of renunciation is solidly within the tradition that we're practicing, beginning from the time of the Buddha. One of the most striking images of his practice career—I'm sure you've seen it—is the emaciated Buddha. During one period in his practice, he had resolved that if he diminished the body enough, the spirit would become free. So he cut down his eating, ultimately to one grain of rice a week. The statues portray him at that time in his life when he had become extremely thin.

This is his own description of that period: "My vertebrae stood out on my spine like beads on a cord. My ribs jutted out as gaunt as the crazy rafters of an old roofless barn. When I touched my belly skin, I could feel my backbone." That was the degree of commitment with which he approached his own practice. I like to reflect on that sometimes when I go down to tea and think there's not enough protein in the meal. I like to remember the emaciated Buddha and that level of renunciation.

Renunciation is one of the ten paramis. These are considered the factors that, when we develop them over time, blossom into liberation. They lead to unqualified freedom. Renunciation in this context is a practice—a practice like mindfulness or concentration, like energy, like generosity, like sila or virtue. You could say that this particular practice is freedom from desire, freedom from wanting. In this way, I think of it as the practice or the manifestation of the Third Noble Truth.

The Third Noble Truth states that the end of suffering is in the end of wanting. The practice of renunciation—of giving up or letting go—is the practice that acts out our trust in that Third Noble Truth, in the giving up of wanting.

Sometimes in our culture, renunciation has a dark tone, something we don't want to get too close to because it seems unpleasant, something being forced on us by some spiritual authority. But that's not meant to be the flavor of it at all. This is from the Dhammapada: "If by renouncing a lesser happiness one attains to a happiness which is greater, then the wise pursue that happiness which is greater."

This is really the spirit of renunciation as a practice. It's letting go of less important things in order to reach the highest kinds of happiness available. So renunciation itself can feel like a beautiful quality, can feel like a natural movement of the heart, and its outcome is happiness.

It's said that the proximate cause—the near cause—of renunciation is spiritual urgency, a sense of wanting to understand. This is expressed over and over in the suttas when the Buddha would say to practitioners, "Look, there are these roots of trees. There are these empty huts. Practice with diligence before it's too late." None of us knows how much time we have left. So that sense of urgency is to really take advantage of this moment, of this opportunity, and to look to the deepest understanding while we still can.

Because this is such a core practice in the Buddhist tradition, I wanted to share a few stories and examples of practitioners over the ages. Someone from this century whom I have tremendous respect for is a Tibetan named Dingo Khyentse Rinpoche. You may have seen photos of him before. He was born in Tibet quite early in this century, and when he was thirteen years old, he resolved that he would leave his worldly life. He was brought up by parents who were fairly well off and was given a good education, but he resolved to leave his worldly life and go off into the wilderness to meditate.

This is from a letter he wrote to his parents when he was thirteen, telling them of his wish:

"My dearest parents, you gave me birth with all the advantages of human life, and you have cared for me with love from my infancy till now. After hearing, thinking about, and meditating on the life of my perfect teacher, I have resolved to slip quietly away from all this life's concerns and roam through empty, uninhabited valleys.

Father and mother, stay in your handsome, lofty house. I, your young son, long instead for empty caves. Thank you for the fine, soft clothes you gave me, yet I don't need them. I would rather dress in plain white felt. I leave my valuable belongings behind. A begging bowl, a staff, and Dharma robes are all I need. I've cast aside this luxury and wealth with no regrets. A handbook of profound advice is all I wish to collect. Although for now your son will hide away in mountain glens, your smiling faces will be with me always."

Nor shall I forget your loving care. And if I reach the peak of experience and realization, I shall repay your kindness. Of that you can be sure.

So he went away into retreat when he was thirteen. When he was fifteen, he entered a cave and spent seven years in retreat, three of them without speaking, from age fifteen to about twenty-two. Then he went into a meditation hut that was several days' walk into the wilderness from where he was brought up. This is the view from that hut, where he spent four years in a tiny little cabin out in the wilderness in solitary practice.

I'm going to put this on the board afterwards as a reminder of the possibilities of dedication that people realize in this life. Altogether, he spent twenty-two years in silent retreat. When he came back to teach, it's said that he had a mind that was so spacious that no one ever saw it ruffled. He could give teachings all day and receive visitors and attend all kinds of meetings, never disturbed from that profound place of rest he had found through his retreat practice.

Another great Tibetan practitioner was Lama Shabkar. He was born in 1781—not that long ago, actually. This was between the Declaration of Independence and the forming of the Constitution of this country. So while we were out on the plains of New England battling, he was engaged in very deep practice.

He went into a five-year retreat on a very remote island on a lake when he was twenty-five. There were some other retreatants meditating on this same island, but they would come over and ask him questions occasionally, and he didn't want to be bothered. So he actually mudded himself up in the cave for about two years, because life was too disturbing otherwise. He did his practice in the cave there.

He wrote about this time: "Throughout the year, my teacher's attendant occasionally brought me goat's milk and curd. In the summer, some vegetables were to be found. By the end of the autumn, however, my supplies were exhausted, and for two months I was reduced to eating only a thin soup of roasted barley." Amazing dedication and commitment.

We actually go through the same kind of thing here. It's only a question of degrees. You all have made tremendous sacrifices to come here. There's the income that you may be losing from your work, and there's the leaving behind of all your connections—your partners, your family, your children and friends, your creative activities, your work relationships, all the entertainments of the world of movies and books and music and television. You've given all those up to be here.

You've also renounced the Super Bowl, which some of you may not be aware you've renounced. It's the best kind of renunciation—effortless renunciation. I know there are always people on retreat who desperately need to know the score. That information is available, but at a price. We will tell you, but you have to listen to the tape of this talk again. Let us know if you want to make that devil's bargain.

So we leave behind all these things, not because there's anything wrong with them. There's nothing wrong with them. But because the problem is that we've gotten used to leaning on them. We are, for the most part, in relationships of some dependency on these fixtures of our daily life. What happens in doing that is that our consciousness actually gets distorted. It gets bent out of that leaning on and clinging relationship to the things, the people, the affairs of daily life.

It doesn't need to be that way. When consciousness gets distorted in that way, it loses some of its innate strength and power. Consciousness is actually quite self-sustaining and doesn't need external supports. When it returns by letting go of the external supports and comes back into its own natural balance, then we rediscover the strength that we actually possess—our birthright, a natural part of us.

But when we're separated from the things we've come to depend on, of course we all feel a kind of loss. The Buddha talked about, in one sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, the six kinds of grief based on the household life. These are the kinds of sadness that come to us when we abandon the six kinds of sense objects—the objects of the six senses, the five physical senses and the mind—in order to live a renunciate life and practice the Dharma. He said such grief as this that comes from that loss is called the grief based on the household life.

Fortunately, though, it's workable. Because in the same sutta the Buddha goes on to talk about the six kinds of joy that are based on renunciation, and how these six kinds of joy based on renunciation offset, abandon, and surmount the six kinds of grief.

Basically what he says is that we come to understand through wisdom the truth of impermanence, and that understanding brings a joy that the objects themselves can't give. When we truly come to understand the changing nature of these outer props and relationships, these external objects, when we see with wisdom clearly that they all have the nature of arising, persisting and passing away—that seeing brings a joy that no outer kind of support can. So these are the six kinds of joy based on renunciation. It's basically the happiness of insight, the freedom of insight.

As we let go of the externals, the mind can come back and rediscover that innate freedom where it supports itself, where it doesn't need to rely on anything outside. And that's why you read in the Satipatthana Sutta on the foundations of mindfulness, the Buddha said over and over: "A practitioner abides independent, not clinging to anything in the world."

This is a great joy—to find that we have this freedom that's already inherent in our mind. It really contributes to a great sense of self-reliance. This joy was really apparent in the time of the Buddha. There's a section in the suttas where the king of Kosala, King Pasenadi, was visiting the Buddha and just remarked on the quality of the Sangha, the practitioners. The king said to the Buddha: "Here I see practitioners smiling and cheerful, sincerely joyful, plainly delighting, their faculties fresh, living at ease, unruffled, subsisting on what others give. I thought, surely these venerable ones have realized states of distinction in the Blessed One's teaching." This is the manifestation of their freedom—this joy and serenity.

So we give up a lot of things to come here. We give up our choice of food—it's a big one in our daily life. Although with the meals we have here, it's not a great deprivation. I mean, I eat better here than at home. I don't know about you.

The food issue really brings out an essential aspect of the renunciate life, and that is an attitude of taking what's given. It's really the foundation for the way that the monks and nuns ate. They went out with their begging bowl in hand, they were offered food, and they subsisted off whatever they were given for that day. So that's very much the spirit that we try to work with as yogis on a retreat like this. We really have the sense of taking what's given. It's been prepared with a lot of thought by the cooks here. It may not always be exactly the meal we wanted at that particular time, but we really approach it with the spirit of: this is what I've been given, this is my practice to accept and work with it.

When I was in Thailand as a monk, this was a big area of practice for me. Mostly I lived in forest monasteries. We only got one meal a day. Not only was there no tea—most monasteries have no dinner because there's no eating after noon for monks and nuns on these precepts—but in most of the monasteries I practiced in, there was also no lunch. So there was one meal a day, and it was served at eight AM. You took your bowl, you ate what was there. That was it for the next twenty-four hours, pretty much. And if you've never feasted on red fish curry at eight in the morning, you really haven't lived. That was a frequent staple of our diet.

Actually, the monastery that I enjoyed the most was Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery in the south of Thailand, Wat Suan Mok. And I have to say—I think now that he's dead, I can safely say this—that monastery had the worst food of any place I have ever eaten. And I think they did it on purpose, actually. The monastery wasn't poor. It was very well supported. He was a very well-known teacher, even then. But I think they felt that if they made it too comfortable, people would stay for the wrong reasons. So they made the food very plain and not very tasty, and then you really had to want to be there in order to stay. And so it worked. There was a great atmosphere there.

In Zen, they have a saying that the mouth of a renunciate should be like a furnace that can burn the finest sandalwood or dried cow dung with equal ease. So I don't think the cooks have any dried cow dung in the fridge for this retreat. Nonetheless, it may not always be exactly what you like. There's been a sign—I don't know if it's still in the kitchen—that is from the cooks. And it says: "When we prepare a delicious meal, that's our practice. When we prepare an undelicious meal, that's your practice."

It's very well said.

As monks, our accommodations weren't always the greatest. We were living out in the forest in really simple conditions. We only had electricity for about two or three hours a day in the evening, and there were all the creatures of the forest that we were sharing it with. Some were lovely—I'd look up in the afternoon and monkeys would be swinging by through the high boughs of the trees overhead. These little deer would come wandering through the clearings during the days.

But there were also some really fiendish insects out there. They had this type of insect I'd never seen before called brocks—basically like a big ant, but their pinchers are kind of like the size of little crabs. They would form long lines that often crossed our walking paths, and we'd be going out for alms round at six in the morning before the sun was up. We couldn't see very well what was on the path in the darkness. You'd cross one of those paths with the brocks on them, and they'd get their pinchers into you. It was very hard to get them out and very painful.

One night I got up in the middle of the night to go to the bathroom—it was outside, a walk down a lane. Foolishly, I didn't take a flashlight, put my hand on the railing of my kuti, and was bitten by a scorpion. So you don't have those same risks here.

Another evening—this happened more than once—I'd be sitting in my kuti about nine o'clock, doing my last meditation before going to sleep. I had a good friend, another Westerner, who had a kuti about fifty yards away from me. I couldn't see him, but I could hear him. All of a sudden I'd hear this pounding—the roofs were metal on our huts—this pounding of a wooden stick very loud against the roof. I'd understand what had happened: a snake had fallen out of a tree and landed on his roof. What the snakes then do is crawl down the edge of the roof, slide around under the eaves, and make their way inside to live in the ceilings of the huts if you let them. So here was a snake looking for a new home, had dropped onto the roof, was preparing to crawl in, and my friend was trying desperately to get it to leave. Generally it worked—they go off with that kind of prodding.

So here, the accommodations are pretty luxurious compared to that. Pretty luxurious, but still it can be difficult. We come and we wanted a single room, but we've got a double room. We wanted one roommate, but we got a different roommate. Or we wanted a really quiet room by the creek, and we got a room by the road right by the stairs, where we can hear people coming and going all night. There's still more renunciation and sacrifice needed to practice in this situation.

Again, I hope that with the same kind of attitude of taking what's given, we can approach it with the sense that the situation is what it is—my reactions are where I establish my dharma practice. I work with the kinds of mind states that come up, with a willingness to go through them as best I can.

In coming on retreat, we may be giving up our intimate relationship partner, and because that's one of the biggest aspects of our outside life, this can be the person we miss the most. I want to talk a little bit about this because I've worked with this over many years.

For those of you who don't know, Sally and I are a couple. We've been married for seventeen years now, together eighteen years. We spent a lot of time in retreat when one of us would go away and the other would be at home. Other times we would both be sitting the same retreat, somewhere between six weeks and three months. We've done that kind of retreat together or apart.

I have to say it's been nothing but strengthening for our relationship. What happens is we find that when we come back from retreat, because we've both gotten more established in our own self-reliance, our own individuality, there's less clinging, less leaning on each other. We actually have more strength in ourselves and therefore more to offer to the relationship. When the other person is having some difficulty or problem, the other is better able to give support.

It's been a very wonderful part of our relationship. Our time apart has been great—she would agree.

If you come on a retreat with your partner, my basic advice to you is pretend they're not here. Let's really pretend they're not even here. We regularly go through six-week retreats together where we're both sitting, and we don't make eye contact for that length of time. We don't communicate by note. We don't try to sit near each other or touch or hold hands or anything like that. It's just like the other person isn't there, and yet we really know that they are.

I always look out to see where she's going to walk, if she's on time for her walking, if it looks like she can still smile. So we're still staying in touch with each other, but there's no outer contact. Nobody would know that we were connected in any way. I feel it really helps support both of our practices and makes the retreat congruent for the other meditators.

Sometimes it's difficult if you're not in a relationship or your partner isn't here to see two people on a retreat who are communicating and keeping up the relationship. I want to really encourage you if you're practicing with a partner at this retreat or another time to do it in a really separated way. It will support your practices best that way.

We also give up a lot of choice around our schedule, our daily schedule. Your time is pretty well accounted for from 5:15 in the morning until 9:40 at night. There aren't too many hours during the day when it's unclear what you're supposed to be doing.

Obviously, we're all adults here, and everybody makes her or his own relationship to the schedule, and that's perfectly appropriate. We're not trying to fit everybody onto a Procrustean bed here. So it's helpful to find what works for you with the schedule. Also I'd suggest if you want to deviate from the schedule, talk with your teachers about it in your interviews. We've worked with people going through a wide range of experience on retreat. We have a lot of flexibility in how we encourage people to work with the schedule. But it's really helpful if you make that a topic for conversation and trust that we can offer some helpful support and guidance in that area.

Our basic feeling is that if you're able to do the schedule, it's really good to do it. If you have basically the fortitude of mind and body to do the schedule as it's written, we really feel that it will deepen your practice the best to do it that way, by and large. Again, the tailoring can be done in the interview.

There are times when you're settling in where you might want to sit a little longer or walk a little longer. That's fine. But the basic concept of moving from a sitting and going fully through a walking period, fully through the next sitting, fully through the next walking—that kind of continuity there is no substitute for. There is no intellectual approach to the Dharma that can get you the kind of insight that comes from that continuity. That is really what will give you the deepening of the mindfulness and concentration that insight is born from.

So I want to encourage you to really be wholehearted in your effort in relation to the schedule. If you find it's not working for you, talk with one of the teachers and we'll help you tailor it for you. It gets so much simpler when you surrender to the schedule. When the bell rings, you sit. When the bell rings, you walk. There's really not much to think about. So a whole layer of conceptualization and decision-making is just taken away. It's just eased.

So where does all this lead? What's the purpose of all this structure and the renunciation and simplicity? It can lead to a lot of joy and happiness, as I mentioned earlier, but it's also really difficult. We know that. We've done these retreats in this way too. We know it's arduous.

It can bring up a lot of different feelings, this level of renunciation—sadness, loss, insecurity from not being in your own home, a sense of loneliness. The loneliness can kind of accentuate a sense of unworthiness. There can be feelings of self-doubt and self-judgment that are heightened through the isolation. All those things are a part of the experience. Sometimes when they're strong, we kind of wonder, well, why did I do this? What have I gotten myself into and what's the point of it?

So I want to say that the first point of the simplicity, the kind of extreme simplicity of life, which Sylvia last night referred to as a Spartan kind of life, which it really is—very extremely simple—is that we become unburdened. As we let go of the outer burdens, what happens is that inwardly we become unburdened too, so that the mind really can be open, be uncluttered.

And in that way, when the mind is really uncluttered, the Dharma can come in so directly and so easily. When the mind isn't distracted by anything else, the insights that you have, the words of the Buddha, the meditations on loving-kindness can come right in as deeply as they can ever go.

This is from an essay in the Audubon magazine from a journalist who had just come back from a backpacking trip and was commenting on this issue of simplicity:

"One moment, while backpacking, I can lay everything I need on the corner of a poncho. The next moment, it seems, I couldn't fit all my furniture into a warehouse. I then vow to purchase nothing that I don't really need, to give away everything that is excess, and to refuse all chores that don't arise from central concerns. The simplicity I seek is not the enforced austerity of the poor. I seek instead the richness of a gathered and deliberate life, which comes from letting one's belongings and commitments be few in number and high in quality."

This is the situation that you all have created for yourselves right now. Your commitments are very few in number—your yogi meditation job, showing up for sittings and walkings, taking care of your body. And apart from that, your only real commitment is to be present. And they're very high in quality. So there's a beautiful opportunity to drink that in.

When the outer kind of distractedness falls away, really what we're left with is the bareness of our own experience. And what we really come to see is the way that the mind works. It's a little bit like in the wintertime when all the leaves fall off the trees—you really see the outline of the branches very clearly. So the outline that we're looking for in this simplicity is how the mind works. That's really why we simplify. We want to understand basically what leads to happiness and what leads to suffering.

And when everything else is stripped away, we're really just left with the mind and our reactions, our relationship to life, to the food, to the accommodations, to the weather, to one another, to the talks, and so on. That's all we're left with. And as Sylvia said, I love that quote from the movie Kundun that she used last night—the Dalai Lama, in rephrasing the second noble truth, expressed it as: "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind."

So this is really the point. When we can start to see that the areas of conflict in this simple situation mostly come from our own habits of mind, then we have a possibility of understanding those habits and, in understanding them, becoming free or freer.

There's a Western teacher who really inspires me named Ani Tenzin Palmo. She ordained in 1964 as a nun in the Tibetan tradition and spent most of the next twelve years practicing in a cave in India. She now teaches and is establishing a center in Assisi, Italy, and did some very serious and long stretches of practice.

She was getting to the end of one three-year retreat where she'd taken a vow of silence. So she'd been on her own, not speaking to anybody for three years, in this cave high up in the mountains. And then that day, she was getting near the end of her retreat, there was a knock on the door. She said, "Who is coming to barge in on my retreat? Everybody knows I've taken a vow of silence." And she opens the door, not knowing who's going to be there, and it's a policeman—an Indian policeman who has come to tell her that her visa has expired, is no longer valid, and she needs to leave the country. Several days before the end of her three-year retreat.

So she has to climb down from the mountain, go to the police station. They won't renew her visa. She has to leave the country. And she just had to deal with it.

When she was here at Spirit Rock a couple of years ago and gave a talk, some of us had lunch with her, and I just expressed to her how much I admired her commitment, doing those long periods of solitary practice. It's way beyond what I felt I could do. And her reply was really instructive. She said, "You know, it was just what I wanted to do." She didn't make any big deal about it. She wasn't laying any claim to fame. "It's just what I wanted to do." That was a beautiful teaching for me.

So a journalist was writing a book about her and said, "Well, aren't you escaping when you go on retreat? Isn't it an escape from the world?" And her reply was, "Not at all. To my mind, worldly life is an escape. When you have a problem, you can turn on the television, phone a friend, or go out for a coffee. In a cave, however, you have no one to turn to but yourself. When problems arise, you have no choice but to go through with them and come out the other side. In a cave, you face your own nature in the raw and you have to find a way of dealing with it."

As the outer activities fall away, the inner life becomes much richer and moves to the forefront. It's like attending a symphony where you're initially captivated by the beauty of the concert hall, the musicians in their elegant black dresses and tuxedos, the gleaming instruments. You find yourself watching the performers as much as listening to the music. But then you decide to close your eyes, shutting off the sense door of sight, and suddenly the music becomes extraordinarily rich—alive in an entirely new way.

The same transformation happens in retreat. As we release our grip on the outer world, the inner realm becomes vivid, colorful, and intensely awake. Sometimes people report having remarkably strong and vivid dreams, especially early in retreat—dreams so disturbing they wake up energized, carrying the full emotional weight of what they experienced in sleep.

Emotional reactions intensify dramatically in this setting. Things that would barely register in daily life—moments we'd simply walk past without a flutter—suddenly seem enormous and can completely overwhelm us. This is the phenomenon we affectionately call "yogi mind"—the remarkable ability to make mountains out of molehills while on retreat.

One manifestation appears as the retreat progresses: teachers and managers begin receiving lengthy notes from yogis about various logistics or format issues that desperately need attention. These notes seem almost reasonable as we read them, almost making sense but not quite. For instance: "Please ask yogis not to unzip the Velcro on their shoes so loudly when leaving the meditation hall."

The classic story comes from a retreat in Southern California where airplanes frequently passed overhead. A yogi wrote to the manager: "Could you please call the airlines and ask them to reroute those flights? They're really disturbing my practice."

As you notice your emotions intensifying throughout the retreat, take time to reflect before acting on them. We especially request that you resist writing notes to other retreatants about how they should be fixed. Like you, your fellow retreatants are experiencing yogi mind and heightened sensitivity.

Living closely together as a community, we inevitably irritate one another. We're human beings, and that's simply what human beings do—we cause problems for each other. It's no different here. You'll notice people who arrive late to every sitting, move around frequently, take your customary seat in the dining hall or your usual walking path, or wear noisy nylon clothing in the meditation hall.

The typical note reads something like: "My dear fellow yogi, didn't you hear the manager say not to wear nylon clothing in the meditation hall? And if you must wear it, please don't move around. Please observe the rules. Signed, Metta." These notes are invariably signed "Metta."

I genuinely believe that people writing such notes often don't realize they're angry. This is how hindrances operate—they're sneak attacks, and we remain unconscious of what we're actually feeling. But a note like this, delivered to someone in such a sensitive state, can be like a depth charge. The recipient might feel their entire being shaken to its core, precisely because we all become so vulnerable and tender during retreat.

So please be really respectful of each other's space and each other's silence. If somebody is really troubling you, write us a note—perhaps write to James, as he's particularly skilled with such matters. But especially, let us handle the communication. Either refrain from writing the note altogether, or inform us first. If there's a communication that needs to happen with another yogi, we'll facilitate it. This way we can truly protect each other's silence and sensitivity, allowing the practice to continue deepening.

All these challenges are simply part and parcel of the experience. You might say that this situation is designed to bring such things up—that's part of why it's structured as it is. When we meditate, we encounter one of two outcomes: we get the meditation object, in which case mindfulness and concentration continue developing, or we get the obstacles to the meditation object. We encounter the karmic knots, the unresolved issues in our lives, the accumulation of tension and pain in our bodies that prevent us from connecting with our chosen object.

Either way, as James said on opening night, is just what we need. Remember he said that when we come here, we get exactly the retreat we need. It's mysterious how that happens, but this is part of how it unfolds. Either we get the object clearly, or we get the obstacle. If there's an obstacle present, wouldn't you really rather know about it than not? Isn't that where we're bound? If we're going to become free, isn't that precisely where we need to bring freedom in order to find freedom?

So either way is actually just fine. We either deepen simply and naturally, or we meet the obstacle. Most often, we deepen simply and naturally until we meet the next obstacle. Then we learn to work with that, to relate to it, and to find our freedom in relation to it. Then we deepen simply and naturally again until we encounter the next obstacle. This is really how the practice moves through these cycles, and both sides of the cycle are equally important, equally valuable. Because in the long run, this practice only leads in one direction—the direction of freedom, of liberation.

The outer renunciation is an important piece. We truly ask that you please try to stay closely with the form of the precepts we took together, the noble silence, the respect for one another, your wholehearted commitment to your own practice. The Buddha put it this way: discipline is for the sake of restraint, restraint is for the sake of freedom from remorse, freedom from remorse is for the sake of gladness of mind. All these forms of discipline—the precepts and all the rest—are really for the sake of greater happiness. They lead in that direction, so the outer discipline is important.

The inner renunciation is also really key. You could say that in a way, the deepest letting go is the letting go of our own desires and aversions, our own likes and dislikes, our hopes and fears, our views and opinions. When we let go in that inward way, it brings great spaciousness to mind. We can let life unfold and accommodate our own reactions to life, to our relationships.

This reminds me of a quote from T.S. Eliot that you may have heard many times before, which comes near the end of the Four Quartets: "Quick now, here, now, always—a condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything. And all shall be well, and all manner of thing shall be well." This condition of complete simplicity costing not less than everything is this inner state of renunciation where we've let go of the clinging, the holding, the views that form this concrete notion of self, of who we are.

When we're willing to really let go of those things—those likes and dislikes—we find ourselves in a very open and clear relationship to our experience. This is again the area of the Third Noble Truth. In letting go of craving, letting go of desire and fear, we open ourselves to that deep, deep kind of peace that's very close to nibbāna, to the unconditioned, to very deep realization.

So the combination of outer discipline and inner renunciation is really powerful. A couple of years ago, we had a retreat here led by Sogyal Rinpoche, a teacher of Dzogchen from the Tibetan tradition, and Ajahn Amaro, a Theravadan monk living a couple hours north of here. They had never taught together before, and I'm not sure how long it had been since any Tibetan Lama had ever taught with a Theravadan bhikkhu—perhaps back in the days of Nalanda in India around 1000 AD. These two traditions haven't been exactly close for the last thousand years, so we felt it was a beautiful, historic occasion.

At the end of the retreat, Sogyal Rinpoche paid what I thought was a wonderful compliment to Ajahn Amaro.

He said, "I've never met anyone like this bhikkhu before. He's very strict in his vinaya, his code of discipline for the monks, but inside he's very open." He observed that usually when a monk is very strict in vinaya, he tends to be very tight inwardly. "But this one," he said, "very strict outwardly, but very open inwardly. That's a beautiful way to practice."

That's the kind of spirit that can really make the practice come alive for us here. To have that sense that we're going to be really impeccable in our outward form—with the discipline, with the silence, with the non-communication and respect for others' space, in relation to the schedule as it seems fit to you. But inwardly, we practice with being really loose and free. That's the place where happiness can really flower most beautifully, because it's based on not clinging and leads directly to freedom.

I'll close with this quotation from the Buddha, from the Dhammapada:

"How very happily we live, free from anger among those who are angry. How very happily we live, free from unhappiness among those who are unhappy. How very happily we live, free from busyness among those who are busy. How very happily we live, we who have nothing. We will feed on rapture like the radiant gods."

Let's just sit for a moment together, please.

How very happily we live, we who have nothing. We will feed on rapture like the radiant gods.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 240

Empty Knowing

In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the five khandhas (aggregates) - rūpa (form), vedanā (feeling), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (volitional formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness) - as an alternative way of understanding human experience that is free from the mistaken notion of self. Drawing on the Buddha's statement that "in whatever way they conceive, the truth is ever other than that," Armstrong guides practitioners to empty the mind of preconceptions and investigate what we truly are beyond our constructed sense of identity.

The talk offers practical guidance for working with the aggregates in meditation, particularly when experience simplifies to just body awareness and consciousness. Armstrong explores the nature of consciousness itself - this "empty knowing" that receives all experience - and how we can take refuge in awareness rather than in the fabricated stories of selfhood. He weaves together insights from Thai Forest masters like Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Buddhadāsa with Zen koans and references to the Sutta Nipāta, showing how understanding the aggregates leads naturally to the recognition of anattā (not-self) and the spacious emptiness that is our true nature.

The teaching emphasizes how mettā practice can warm this empty space, making it inviting rather than cold, and how trust in awareness itself can become a complete spiritual path. This is essential guidance for intermediate practitioners ready to investigate the deeper questions of identity and consciousness.

When I talked a week ago about the deepening of practice, I explored how coming to greater depth in practice is really a question of finding out more fundamentally what's true for us in our experience of life as human beings. When I think about this, I find it very helpful to empty the mind so that we can have a fresh look at this question.

I like to recall a quote that Sally mentioned in an earlier talk, a quote of the Buddha's, where he says: "In whatever way they conceive, the truth is ever other than that." One of my teachers who liked to be provocative put it a bit more directly. He said, "Whatever you think is wrong." That brings it to our attention—whatever we think is wrong, mostly about the idea of self. When the Buddha uses the term "conceive" in this sense, he's mostly talking about the way we conceive of ourselves.

It's hard to keep in mind that everything we think is wrong. It sort of cripples our ability to function, doesn't it? If we can't trust our judgments—what time is it now? Is it time for breakfast or lunch?—we have to trust a little bit to function. But we overly trust. We depend and count on our views being correct, which of course they're not.

This is why in practice such good support is what Seungsahn, the Zen teacher, called the "don't know mind"—really having the openness to realize moment after moment we don't know the way things are. If we knew, we'd be free. Because we're not free, it's proof that we don't quite know yet.

I also like this line of Rumi's that I call to mind again and again. In one of his poems he says: "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." That puts the biggest perspective on our life as human beings. We got born into this not knowing—where did we come from and what are we supposed to be doing? That's really the truth of our situation.

This is helpful to keep in mind when we look at ourselves or another person. We may not really know what constitutes a person. We look at one another and say, "there's a person, there's a person, there's a person." But the Buddha didn't see this way. He said somebody who's really studied the mind-body process wouldn't say that. He said that would be like a butcher, a skilled butcher who's been working for years in his trade, cutting up the carcass of a cow, and as he cuts it into different pieces, saying "cow, cow, cow." The butcher doesn't do that. He says sirloin, tenderloin, rump, ribs.

So someone who studied this mind-body process doesn't say "person." What do they say? They say five aggregates, or they say six inner and outer sense bases. Because we talk about the sense bases a lot in relation to our meditation, I want to talk a little more about the aggregates tonight.

Gil mentioned them in an earlier talk, and this is kind of a refresher. I've found this a very helpful model for bringing greater freedom into my life. It's been the main way that I've been reflecting and exploring in dharma terms for the last few years, so I want to share it a little further tonight with you.

Like the concepts of not-self, the aggregates are not something that we can wrap our intellects around in one evening or one day or one retreat. I think they're concepts that we have to hang out with over a period of time. It's like another map. As we get familiar with the terms and apply them to our experience, we start to see what the Buddha was pointing at. More and more our understanding starts to align with his. His was free from suffering. And as we align our understanding with his, our view becomes freer of suffering also.

The main way that he saw was without the deluded notion of self—the false notion of self. So the aggregates is a way of looking at our experience as human beings. It takes in all of our experience. But it's a view that's free from the mistaken notions of self. It sees us without ego.

In Pali, the term is khandha. In Sanskrit, it's skandha. It's usually translated as aggregate.

Another good translation would be component - these are the components of the human personality. But all those sound a little too technical. In the Pali, khanda just means heap or bundle. If you were gathering firewood and you went out and gathered a bunch of twigs, you would call that a khanda of twigs. It's just a bundle. So it's a very ordinary term. Aggregate seems way too technical. Even component seems way too technical. So I think the best translation is: these are the five kinds of stuff. That's the way I think of it. These are the kinds of stuff we're made of. Nothing more, nothing less.

The five aggregates are material form, feeling, perception, volitional formations, and consciousness. Let me run through them briefly so you'll have a sense of what the map is about.

Material form is the whole physical world. It includes this body, but it's not limited to it. The Buddha didn't put a wall around body and say, "This is part of the being, but the rest of our experience isn't." What is body but sight and touch? It's just another form of sense data, just like the sense data of this platform, the bell, the chair. All material form and its interactions - not just the sight of things, but also smells, tastes, touches, and sounds - come under the category of form, material reality. When you hear that sound, for instance, that sound is in the realm of form. This one aggregate covers the whole physical world; the other four deal with the mind.

The first mental aggregate is feeling. This is in the technical sense - the Pali term is vedanā - of the quality of every moment of experience, every sense door, being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. We usually introduce this in the meditation instructions because it provides the lever for grasping to arise. Desire arises around the pleasant, aversion around the unpleasant, ignorance or delusion around the neutral. So it's a key part of our experience. It's the springboard for craving in all its forms.

The sound of the bell that we just heard is usually pleasant in itself because it was manufactured by a venerable old Japanese company who've been making bells probably since before this country started. And also because of its associations. This may be the most pleasant sound on retreat because it means, "Ah, sitting's over. I can get up now." Very pleasant association.

The third aggregate is called perception - saññā in Pali. This is the factor of recognition. When we hear the sound of the bell, we know that it's a sound, we know that it's a bell, and we know that it's the bell that ends the sitting. All those things come out of memory and are aspects of recognition that the mind applies from experience. It interprets experience to this degree. And this is a fine and necessary function of mind. It's not something we need to get rid of. But it is true that perception can be either accurate or inaccurate.

One time I was doing walking meditation on retreat. My mind was quite still and I was walking and listening to the subtle sounds at IMS in Barre. I thought I heard a marching brass band. The meditation center is two miles outside of town, so there aren't too many marching brass bands on the road, but I was sure I was hearing one. So I stood stock still just to listen, and I could definitely hear the drums. I could hear the bugles, maybe a trumpet or two. I was having a great time listening to music, just waiting for it to get close enough so I'd really get into sort of a patriotic fervor about it.

As I listened, it did get closer and closer, but it didn't get much louder. And as it got closer, I realized that it was actually a garden cart fitted out with bicycle wheels being rolled down a gravel track. It was bouncing up and down, and that was making all the metallic, rhythmical sounds I was hearing. There wasn't actually a brass band, although I was sure there was. I was a little disappointed, but then I thought I could turn it into a dharma story, so I made up for it.

But perceptions can be more difficult when they're inaccurate. The Buddha said that a lot of our suffering comes because we think things are permanent when they're actually impermanent, or we perceive self where there's actually no self.

We perceive happiness where there's actually unsatisfactoriness. So we actually do get in trouble through mistaken perception.

Sometimes our preconceptions about things—with labels and names and terms—blind us to seeing the reality of things. Someone commented in an interview recently that the label of "fear" had kept them from just experiencing the simple nature of fear in the body and mind. There was so much baggage associated with the concept, they weren't able, until they saw this, to just feel it directly. When they felt it directly, it was just light. There was no big deal about it.

They play with this a lot in Zen training. Conventionally, if you ask somebody what this is, in this hall they would say, "A bell." But that puts it in terms of an overall cultural context and memory and past and all that. If you just looked at it fresh, couldn't it also be a planter? A flower pot? A bowl for feeding? Couldn't it be, if you turned it upside down, a really cute hat for a big statue? It could be any of these things.

So in Zen, there are lots of these koans where the master says, "What is this? If you call it a stick, I will hit you. If you say it's not a stick, I'll also hit you. What is it?" And you're supposed to manifest your understanding. Koans like that are why I never practiced Zen very much. I just had the feeling I'd wind up getting hit a lot. I could never figure it out.

There's another funny story—a lot of you have heard it, but for the five people in the room who haven't, it's so good I just want to share it. The Zen master Seungsahn, a Korean Zen master, uses these kinds of koans a lot. He was introduced by some students to the great Tibetan master Kalu Rinpoche when they were both still alive. They had a very short meeting, their first meeting. In Asia, great masters from different traditions don't meet each other very often at all. This is kind of a phenomenon from the West.

So there they met, and Seungsahn wanted to check out Kalu's understanding. He picked up the nearest object, which was an orange. They were sitting down having tea together. He picked up an orange, held it out to Kalu, and said in a very strong voice, "What is this?" This is Seungsahn's teaching style. They don't do this in Tibetan practice.

So Kalu just kind of looked at him and kept doing his mala. He was probably thinking, "Om Mani Padme Hum. What is this guy on about? Om Mani Padme Hum." Very cooled out.

Seungsahn didn't get an answer. He wasn't used to this. He was the Zen master. He was used to getting an answer. So he held it out again and in his very strong voice said, "What is this?"

And Kalu was doing his beads and turned to the interpreter and said, "Don't they have oranges in his country?"

So you can get in trouble with this perception thing. But keep checking it out. It's an interesting faculty of mind.

The fourth of the aggregates, the third of the mental aggregates, is called volitional formations or saṅkhāra. This refers basically to the kind of fabrications that we generate out of our impulses, out of our intentions—thoughts, emotions, moods, states of mind, and then actions of speech and body. All coming out of intentions that can be wholesome intentions of generosity and kindness and compassion, or unwholesome intentions of anger or greed or fear or confusion. These are the fabrications of mind that are being created moment after moment.

You can experience this as you sit. It kind of feels sometimes like—in the term that Carol quoted the other night in her talk—the tides of conceiving are sweeping over us.

Or sometimes these are called karmic tides. They are the projections of mind that disturb our essential stillness and peace—something we feel really clearly when we sit down and try simply to be with the breath. These outgoing manifestations of movement come again and again. They're sometimes called karmic formations because the intention with them is a key part of their power. It's the intention that determines the wholesome or unwholesome quality.

Another word I like for these is conditioned tendencies. It's a recognition that the mind can be trained either in an unwholesome direction, out of fear or desire, or a wholesome direction, out of wisdom, mindfulness, understanding, and compassion.

So in hearing the sound of a bell, all of these come into play. There's the perception of the sound. Then there may be an accompanying volitional formation of ease or relaxation. I often notice when the bell rings, I think, "Oh, it's so easy to sit. I could sit for another half hour now." But I get up anyway.

The fifth skanda, in some ways the most interesting, is consciousness. The Pali term is vijñāna. It is basically the aspect of mind that knows experience in a very primitive way—the most primitive kind of knowing, before any words come in, before any perception or interpretation. It's just the receiving of our sense experience.

So now as you look toward the front of the room, you might see the white wall, men and women in different colored clothing, the wood of the floor or the platform. The consciousness that's receiving those shapes and colors, that's just holding that bare sense experience, is the consciousness we're talking about as vijñāna—just that bare knowing, the holding or receiving of the bare sense data.

So in the sound of the bell, there's a mental component to your experience. The sound is a physical thing, but the knowing of it is done by your mind. If you were a corpse, that knowing quality wouldn't be happening. Your body would be here, the ear would be here, but the consciousness wouldn't be present. So the knowing of the sound wouldn't take place. You would no longer be a conscious or sentient being. At this moment, because we're conscious and sentient, we know all this stuff of the six senses. So consciousness is a fundamental part of the aggregates. It's with every other aggregate.

In hearing the sound of the bell, consciousness receives the sound. There's a pleasant feeling, and consciousness holds the pleasant feeling. There's the perception that that's the sound of the bell, and consciousness knows that perception as it arises. And if there's the formation of ease or relaxation or the thought, "I could sit forever," those too are held in consciousness. So consciousness is with each of the other aggregates as it comes in.

As we practice over the days and weeks together, we're instructed to pay attention to what consciousness is receiving—that paying attention is the mindfulness property. But then we're instructed not to hold on to it. Let it arise and let it pass away. And this is what all the aggregates are doing moment after moment. The impact of the physical world is coming and going. Our feelings, perceptions, and formations are coming and going. And consciousness is coming and going as it holds each of them.

The idea is that consciousness arises to meet the object as it arises and passes away as the object passes. So all five aggregates are constantly arising and passing, coming and going, nothing fixed in any of them.

I thought the aggregates was a funny list when I first heard it. It seemed really arbitrary. Why did he put feeling and perception up there with body and consciousness? They just didn't seem that central to me. And over time I realized it really doesn't matter. It is somewhat arbitrary. In another list the Buddha breaks out mind further to note feeling, perception, volition, contact, and attention. It's a list called nāma. It recurs in the suttas quite a bit. So it's broken down more finely.

The degree of fineness isn't important. The important thing is that every aspect of our experience can be slotted into one of the categories, and you can see that they're all impermanent. So that's why it's helpful to play with this model, to check it out against your experience, to verify that—to see if it's true that everything you know and experience is in the aggregates and it's all coming and going. This is the investigation.

Now as we pay attention and let go, pay attention and let go, pay attention and let go, over and over, one of the things that happens is that things start to clear out a little. And in particular, this projective tendency of mind of the sankharas, that starts to quiet down. There's not quite such an insistent train of thought. There may not be quite so much emotional charge around the thoughts that are coming.

This is from Ajahn Chah, the great Thai master: "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace."

One of the things I love about a longer retreat is that as you all come in and talk to us in interviews, we hear more and more of this letting go and peace story. Little peace, lots of peace, really deep peace as the weeks go by, for some. Moments of it for everybody. So whether it's a long-lasting peace or a short-lasting peace, the nature of the peace is the same, and that's what we're concerned about—understanding that peace.

Sometimes when the thoughts are subtle and emotions not so strong, people report, "Oh, there's really not much going on." If we ask them to describe it more closely, basically there's just the sense of the body. Or maybe they'll mention the breath. Or maybe they'll mention sounds. But in that moment anyway, that's about all that's going on.

Let's leave the sounds aside for just a moment, and I want to talk about body and consciousness. This is really a wonderful opportunity for practice when these are the two most obvious elements. When you say there's just the body but you're aware of it, you're also introducing or acknowledging the factor of consciousness—I'm just sitting and I'm with the body and my knowing of it.

It's a very interesting place because these are actually the two most important aspects of the aggregates. If you understand the body and consciousness in the aggregates, you're really getting to the heart of what they're about.

Normally we take this body really personally, don't we? It is as much "I, me, mine" as anything. I look in the mirror and I think, "Oh yeah, that's Guy. I know him." And I associate all the old history and personality and all the stories with this body. I really think that's who I am. And I take pride in it or I'm embarrassed by it, depending on whether I'm looking at the wrinkles and saggy skin or the fact I'm still able to stand upright and am in relatively good health. I have a lot of charge around the way this body appears, and it's as though I have some pride or shame about it.

It's so curious, isn't it? Why should I be proud if I'm attractive? Why should I be embarrassed if I'm not attractive? Why should I be proud if I'm tall? Why should I feel uneasy if I'm short? Did I make this body? Did I have anything to do with the color of my hair or my eyes or my height? I don't think so. I don't remember that. I think it was my father's sperm and my mother's egg coming together and their genes combining in some way that basically produced this body. And then I woke up in it sometime in childhood. My consciousness started looking out. I started to be able to conceptualize. And that's our basic situation.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, the great Thai forest master, said it like this: "This body belongs to nature. It doesn't belong to you. It grew out of nature. It's been sustained by nature, by physical nourishment, and it will go back to nature when it dies. Give it back to nature. It'll be a great relief for you."

It's not ours. It came out of nature just the way a flower comes out of nature, just the way a tree comes out of nature. Do we need to go around and name every flower and say, "Oh, I hope you're having a good life. I hope the other flowers like you a lot and really think you're the cutest flower on this bush"? A flower is just a physical manifestation.

This body is just a physical manifestation. It gets joined with consciousness. Consciousness is even less personal. This knowing quality—I don't know this for a fact, but I assume it's pretty much the same in you as it is in me. I don't think there's anything personal in my knowing.

So we have this impersonal body, which is the fruit of nature. We have this impersonal consciousness, which is another of the building blocks of nature. And from them, we fabricate a personality. This consciousness looks out and takes ownership of the body, of our success and failure in school, of whether we were or were not attractive to the opposite gender or the same gender as the case may be. It looks at our job records. It looks at our level of brightness or not brightness. And it forms all these opinions and conclusions based on the past. And it says that's who we are.

It's all constructed. Fundamentally, there's just this brightness. The consciousness is just a brightness that shines out of every pair of eyes here. That brightness isn't anything to do with the past, isn't anything to do with the future. It's alive here and now. It only has its life here and now. But it has a capacity for memory. And because of that, it builds this long, complicated story about who we are, and we believe in it.

When we see the truth of the aggregates, we see the body is a product of nature, the consciousness is only here and now, there's nothing else there. As someone said in an interview the other day, the whole personality is like a house of cards that's been put together on very shaky ground. Seeing the aggregates in this way kicks out the bottom layer of that house of cards that we call personality, and it can just start to collapse, can start to come undone.

This is a very fruitful place to explore in your meditation when there's just the body and the awareness, just the body and the consciousness. What is that like? What is there in that experience? I sometimes like to ask, what is intrinsically present? A lot of the arisings and passings are kind of accidental. A frog chirps at just the right time. A thought of the past happens to come. A moment of sadness or delight kind of wafts up from the heart center. All those are, if not accidental, at least adventitious. They're just circumstantial. What's intrinsically there beyond change, beyond the accidental comings and goings? That's what's intrinsically you. What doesn't change?

So this is a very interesting point in practice when you have the experience of awareness and a lot of what you might call space or openness. Not feeling crowded in by the pressure of thoughts and difficult emotions, but a certain amount of ease and spaciousness. How do we relate to that?

I want to say that there are a number of meditation techniques that are very good at this point. There's no one right way to practice. You can continue to pay attention to the breath. Absolutely fine. It's part of the body. You can open to the whole body experience as you sit and feel the breath within that. You can make the attention really wide, take in all the sounds, sensations within that, and the breath within that. It's also a very relaxing and spacious way to be. You can be with changing objects, as we've talked about in the instructions. An in-breath, a sensation in the knee, a sound, an out-breath, a thought, a mind state. Just letting the attention move easily from one to the next. Connecting and sustaining with each one. All these are wonderful ways to practice. They're all good.

But before applying any technique, I think it's really helpful to just take a few moments and let yourself feel kind of your existential situation. Right in that moment when there's not much going on, what does that feel like? And what does it tell you?

One of the things that comes through for me is a sense of vulnerability.

I'm just sitting there, completely exposed to everything in the universe—everything outwardly. Someone could come up and hit me or push me or kick me or shout at me. And I'm exposed to everything inwardly. Anything can come up from the mind at any moment.

So I have a feeling of real vulnerability, which is not a bad thing. Actually, it's quite a beautiful thing to be that open. We've let down our defenses because we've stopped the train of thoughts. Defenses are mostly about thought. We're kind of open and kind of bare.

And often we can feel the fragility of our situation. We feel that: what is going to support me in this? What is going to hold me up? Is there anything that's really there for me to rely on in this moment?

This is really the domain of faith, as James talked about. Faith is the knowing of what it is that we place our heart upon. What do we really, in a very gut sense, trust in? Not in a belief kind of way, but is it safe to be this vulnerable? And if it's safe to be that vulnerable, why? What is it that holds us?

There's a great guy who teaches at Spirit Rock named Fred Wapipa. He's a Native American who lives in the East Bay. He does sweat lodges here and teaches often a combination of Native American wisdom with Vipassana meditation in the Buddhist path. I had the opportunity to do a sweat lodge with him one time, and he was explaining the procedure and the feeling tone of being in the sweat lodge where you're basically enclosed in this structure of saplings that have been tied together and covered over with blankets, with hot stones put in the middle.

As he was explaining to us how to approach it, he was talking about connecting with the earth and feeling grounded. And he said something that we ought to know: in his language, in his Indian language, there's no word for hope. He said, "That's because we already know that everything's all right. We already know everything's all right."

I thought that was a fantastic statement from somebody whose whole culture has been destroyed over the last 150 years or so. Everything's all right. So do we have that kind of trust? Can we have that gut sense in ourselves that it's safe to open in that vulnerable way, that it's safe to let go?

Because what's happening when we come into this spaciousness is that we're kind of touching an aspect of emptiness. There's not much there at that time. There's no support for ego in that openness. There's no support for the relational self because there's just this space, this empty space. So there's the sense that the space is empty of I or mine. There's not really a support for I or mine.

Now sometimes I think it's possible to kind of find our way into this space through a lot of effort. Strong concentration, diligent application of attention to the breath, very strong sense of not letting the mind move away from the breath—very firm, strong effort can take us to that place. But it's been manufactured contingent on effort and depends on the effort to sustain it. When the effort is stopped, the space will usually crumble.

There's another way into that space, and it's through relaxation. But for most of us, when we start practice, the way of relaxation is blocked by an obstacle or one or more. And these are called karmic knots. Most of us, when we enter practice, have some accumulation of the past that expresses itself in tension in the body and some storing of emotions and maybe memories in the mind. And as we relax, that's what we tend to hit.

So for example, when I came into practice, I had a lot of fear. It was not very specific. I didn't have specific memories. But every time I'd sit and try to open and be quiet, I'd just be seized with a lot of anxiety. In my early years of practice, it was all about learning how to open to this nearly constant state of anxiety and fear that I would find when I sat.

And I remember one time I was doing standing meditation out of doors. I'd gone over to England to do a retreat, and it was early summer. I think it was May. I was practicing in a retreat center that was in Wiltshire at the time.

And it was one of those beautiful English twilights. I was standing, I think, right before tea time. The air was soft, and the late afternoon light was golden, falling on this beautifully cultivated garden with apple blossoms and flower beds and a lawn that looked like it had been rolled for the last five hundred years.

I was doing standing meditation under a tree with my eyes closed and I was just full of fear. I stood there trying to relate with the fear, getting wound up about why I had all this fear and where it was coming from and how I was going to get through it. At that moment I thought to open my eyes and I looked out on this beautiful English garden with apple blossoms and birds in the trees and that golden light. And I thought, "Hmm, pretty scary place, isn't it?"

I just had to laugh because my reality inside was so different from the true nature of the world around me.

These karmic knots, when we haven't faced this frozen energy, keep us from seeing the world as it is. They keep us from seeing the spaciousness that's really there, that's really our basic situation. For many of us, the first years of practice are occupied with the loosening and releasing of these karmic knots.

They carry with them a very powerful sense of self. I think it's very hard to really understand anatta, the truth of not-self, when these karmic knots are active. There's so much history and emotional charge and usually discomfort around them that we tend to constellate the ego around these knots.

Once these knots are loosened and that energy is released—and when it releases it can be just gone—then it becomes effortless to sit and open to this spaciousness. Years later in my practice, that anxiety has for the most part simply disappeared. At times—not always, but at times—it becomes just effortless. Someone simply intends to let go of thought and that open space is available. Then the sense of anatta comes through much more clearly, much easier to access.

But this work of loosening the karmic knots is honorable work. It's important work that shows us impermanence, not-self, and dukkha. We learn tremendously from doing it. It's a valuable and noble part of the practice cycle for many people.

So in that sense of openness, what do we become aware of? I asked someone the other day who was describing an experience of that kind of openness, and the answer was, "I'm aware of awareness. That's what I'm aware of."

This is an interesting situation, and I don't know if you have turned your attention in this direction, but it's a fascinating avenue to explore. What is awareness? What is consciousness? What are these qualities of mind?

This is tricky ground because consciousness is what holds everything else. Can consciousness see itself? Is consciousness an object that can be known with consciousness? Is it dualistic in that way, that one bit of consciousness holds another bit of consciousness as an object? Or is it more like the eye trying to see itself? Can the eye ever see itself? It can't, can it?

Ajahn Sumedho was talking about this on his retreat last year. He said, "You can look in the mirror, but then you're seeing a reflection of the eye. But the eye can never see itself." So how do you know you have an eye? We know by its functioning. Because there are sights, we know that we have an eye that's working, although the eye can never see itself.

I think it's like that with consciousness. It can't hold itself as an object, but maybe we know it by the fact that we're sentient beings and consciousness is working to receive all the impressions. You know you're not just a bump on a log, right? I hope. Maybe by this point in the talk, half of you are, but hopefully you're not.

This becomes really interesting. You can explore this in your practice as you get intimate with any object, like the breath. Attending to the breath usually means attending to the physical sensations of breath. We feel its qualities of being rough or smooth or hard or fast or slow. But you can also, in that moment of experiencing the breath, start to tune in to the knowing side of the experience.

Like all sense experience, what's happening here involves two dimensions. The physical—in this case, the bodily sensations of breath—and the mental, which is the knowing of it, the consciousness. You are receiving that as a mental experience.

So start to try to intuit what is knowing the breath. What does consciousness feel like for me in this moment? One cautionary note: don't try to locate it in the head. There's no reason to assign consciousness to the head. More likely, look for it right alongside the physical sensation—there with the physical experience of breath. The two arise together and pass together.

When we start to look in this way, we see that every object arising in our experience is conjoined with consciousness, never separate. Another way to say this is that every object that's arising is arising in consciousness. Or simply, it's only an appearance in consciousness.

Normally we take this world as so real. This is the materialistic worldview, the nineteenth-century scientific perspective: a solid external reality within which we're entrapped. This is the ultimate truth of existence—the solidity of this material world. Our consciousness is just an accidental byproduct of evolution, some random mixing of chemicals in the primordial sea.

The Buddhist worldview is different. All that we see is only an arising in consciousness. One of my Tibetan teachers put it like this: "When you see in this way, you see that everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever. It's only an appearance in consciousness."

So the functioning of consciousness comes to be much more central in our view of our situation. Maybe this is more like the center of who we are—this aspect of consciousness.

Then I'll return to an earlier question: Is there anything fixed in that consciousness? Is there any object that's always there? Or is every object—sensation, sound, thought, emotion, breath—coming and going? They're all coming and going, aren't they? Because of that impermanent nature, we say that essentially the space is empty. Our basic situation is that the space is empty.

You might check this out. Just right now as you sit, eyes open or closed—it doesn't matter—take a look back at what your consciousness is like. Take a look at the nature of consciousness itself. Is there anything fixed within it? Or is it basically empty?

As you investigate, you'll probably find there isn't anything fixed. Everything comes and goes, so there's this basic emptiness. But this emptiness isn't a void completely. We're also conscious. And as Gil mentioned in his talk the other night, we don't have to do anything special for this consciousness to happen. It happens by itself.

So maybe our most essential nature is this combination of emptiness—this empty space—and consciousness. Maybe that's mostly who or what we are.

Now if that feels like a cold thing, then it's not going to be very inviting to open to that. This is where metta practice has a great contribution to make. When we practice metta, we warm up that empty space. You might say that the function of vipassana is to show us that emptiness, and the function of metta is to fill it with warmth.

When it gets filled with warmth, it starts to feel really inviting. It starts to feel rich, happy, sweet, juicy. And then we want to open to it. Even though there's vulnerability, we want to open to it more and more.

Ajahn Jumnian is a great Thai teacher who comes here about once a year. He did a lot of metta practice in his youth.

He's done a lot of vipassana practice and has one of the greatest energies I've ever encountered. I encourage you to meet him if you haven't. He's one of the happiest people I've ever known.

He doesn't know many words of English, but he does know two, and he teaches them often. He does this sort of transmission where he points to the space and goes, "Empty, empty, happy, happy, empty, empty, happy, happy." And that's one of his key teachings. This emptiness is so happy when it's pervaded with the warmth of metta, of loving-kindness.

So we could say that there's the emptiness, there's the knowing, and there's the warmth. These three things together make up our essential being. And this is what many of the sages in this tradition have called Buddha nature. This can become our real refuge as we open to that spacious place of knowing within us.

This is from Ajahn Mahabua: "Although all phenomena without exception fall under the laws of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and not-self, the true nature of the mind doesn't fall under these laws. The natural power of the mind itself is that it knows and does not die. This deathlessness is something that lies beyond disintegration." This is our basic goodness.

There's a little bit of a conflict here, because when we talk about consciousness, we talk about it coming and going. And when we talk about this knowing, as Ajahn Mahabua talked about it, he talks about it not dying. How do we resolve that? Can we take refuge in something which is coming and going? Does that make any sense, to take refuge in what is impermanent? Or can we only take refuge in what is lasting, in what doesn't die? Isn't that a better refuge?

I asked Ajahn Sumedho this question when he was here last fall, and I liked the way he answered it. He said, "Well, when I sit down and I turn my attention there, it seems like my awareness is steady. So that works for me." I love this as a skillful means. And we can talk more, if you're interested, about the metaphysical resolution of this dilemma. But for now, I really encourage you to check and see if it feels like that awareness is something steady as you sit. And if it is, to trust in that, at least for the time being. It worked for Ajahn Sumedho, and he came out pretty good. It can work for us.

So trusting in this sense of the effortless knowing that happens within this space of emptiness.

This is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "I met my Guru when I was thirty-four and realized by thirty-seven. Pleasure and pain lost their sway over me. I was free from desire and fear. I found myself full, needing nothing. I saw that in the ocean of pure awareness the numberless waves of the phenomenal worlds arise and subside beginninglessly and endlessly. There is a mysterious power that looks after them. That power is awareness, life, God, whatever name you give it. It is the foundation and ultimate support for all that is."

Trusting in this refuge of awareness is really trusting in not doing. It is trusting that the capacity of this space will bring out the flowering that we need, whether that flowering is in terms of metta, compassion, joy, wisdom, devotion, or warmth—that it will all come out of this openness and trust. This kind of opening and trust can really be a path all of its own.

And I'll close with a quotation from the Sutta Nipata. An unusual quotation from the suttas because the Buddha doesn't point to this a lot. This is almost a devotional path that's being expressed here, but it is found in the suttas. The Buddha's talking to a bhikkhu called Pingiya, and he says, "Pingiya, other people have freed themselves by the power of trust. Vakali, Bhadravuda, and Alavi have all done this. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Let's just sit for a minute together. "Other people have freed themselves by the power of trust. You too should let that strength release you. You too will go to the further shore beyond the draw of death."

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 241

Living in a World of Change

> In this profound dharma talk delivered six months after September 11th, Guy Armstrong examines how we can live skillfully amid life's constant flux. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on the eight vicissitudes of life from the Aṅguttara Nikāya—gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure—Armstrong illustrates how these conditions affect all beings, even the Buddha himself.
> The talk centers on the Brahmāviharas (divine abodes) as a roadmap for responding wisely to changing circumstances. Armstrong explains how mettā provides the foundation of open-hearted caring, how karuṇā naturally arises when the heart meets suffering, how muditā allows us to rejoice in others' happiness, and how upekkhā (equanimity) supports all three with balanced awareness. He shares moving stories, including that of Kisāgotamī and her encounter with death, to demonstrate how grief can transform into compassion when held in the 'empty awareness' that Thai master Ajahn Jumnian describes.
> Through vivid examples from both ancient texts and contemporary life, Armstrong shows how the Brahmāviharas offer alternatives to our habitual reactions of envy, cruelty, elation, and overwhelm. This teaching provides practical guidance for meeting life's storms—both personal and collective—with wisdom and an open heart.

Living in a World of Change

The subject of tonight's talk is living in a world of change. Today marks the six-month anniversary of September 11th, and it has been an intense time for all of us in different ways. We have witnessed countless responses to the events—to the loss of life, to the damage, and now to the war. Obviously there has been a lot of grief, sadness, and a certain amount of anger, along with arguing. But we have also seen incredible bravery, love, understanding, and forgiveness. All these human possibilities have emerged.

There was a very interesting television program last night that was filmed inside Tower One of the World Trade Center on the morning of September 11th. Two young cameramen had been following a particular fire company—Ladder One of the New York City Fire Department—for several months. They said they had gotten great footage of everything except a big fire. On the morning of September 11th, they thought they had really struck pay dirt because there was a big fire. So they followed Ladder One to the World Trade Center.

They were among the first on the scene because their station house was near the center. They went right in with the firemen and were stationed in the lobby where the command post was set up, and they basically ran their video camera for the entire time they could remain in the lobby. It was quite amazing to feel that event from within.

One of the first things you noticed was how the firemen just went up the stairs without any hesitation. There were no elevators operating from the very beginning, but the firemen didn't even think twice. They just threw their hoses over their backs and started up the stairs in what they thought was going to be a big and hopefully successful rescue operation.

As the hour wore on and the cameras continued rolling, the firemen had all gone upstairs and the chiefs were the ones who stayed in the lobby to command the operation. You could see the faces of the chiefs change over the hour—from confidence and engagement and optimism to a look of being stunned. They appeared overwhelmed by the situation they found themselves in and realized it was probably going to be beyond their control. This was quite amazing to see. These were middle-aged firemen who had been doing this kind of work probably all their professional lives, and they were just lost in the enormity of it. Some firemen commented that they actually saw fear in these faces for the first time they had ever known them. Fear was not part of their vocabulary, but they saw it that morning.

Then, partway through the day, off-duty firemen started coming in, totally unprompted and uncalled. One fire chief who had been retired for three years came down, got a suit, and headed right for the World Trade Center, saying that these were his people, his men, and he couldn't leave them alone. That level of bravery and solidarity was present through the whole operation as well. As you know, it continued throughout the day. After the buildings collapsed, the firemen and police worked around the clock to try to find survivors, to try to help anyone they could find.

But I think the most startling part of the whole video was that it filmed the lobby for about an hour. As you remember, people were jumping out of the windows very high up on the buildings because the fires were from about the 80th floor and above. About every ten minutes in the video, there would be this huge slamming noise that took place outside the building—the sound of a body hitting the ground from eighty stories up. You could see every time it happened, the firemen would be startled again and would look around through the windows. The camera never turned to show that, but you could see the impact on the firemen when it was happening. Then another ten minutes would go by and another intense slam would happen.

You could take that sound as a way to go into the suffering of those people, because what kind of terror would prompt someone to jump from eighty stories high? The jumping was a preferable alternative to what they were facing up there.

The cameras continued rolling and showed many people coming down through the stairways and leaving safely from Tower One. They also, of course, showed the collapse of both towers and people running away from the disaster. It was a sobering reminder of something I had seen many minutes of on the day itself but hadn't watched for quite a while. From this perspective, it put me right back into the feelings I had on September 11th. Again, it was very hard to be with.

What it reminded me of at this distance is the enormity of the stakes that we face in living. Sometimes we forget this. Living in a comfortable place like Marin County or Northern California, we tend to forget that life is full of extremes of joy and extremes of sorrow. Seeing video like what was on television last night reminds us of what that potential is for all of us. Life is intense.

In a way, we tend to forget about that intensity as we settle into the routine of a life. We forget that this kind of intensity and the impact it has on us is part and parcel of human life—in fact, all of sentient life.

Thich Nhat Hanh is a Buddhist monk who trained in Vietnam and was exiled because of his protests during the war. He ended up settling in France. From time to time he would still travel back to Asia to check on what he could of his people. He came back from one trip where he had seen the suffering of boat people who were trying to flee Vietnam but who were attacked on the seas by pirates—people who were killed on the seas, who were robbed, who were not admitted to other countries because of asylum policies. After making a trip like that, because he cannot return to Vietnam itself, he came back to Paris. Looking around, he wrote that as he looked around Paris, coming back from this trip, all the suffering there seemed really minor to him.

And we can understand this from our own experience. There are certainly times when we feel centered, when we're able to respond to difficult situations with clarity and compassion rather than reactivity. And there are times when we lose that center completely, when we get swept away by the intensity of what's happening around us.

The difference isn't usually in the circumstances themselves, but in where we're operating from within ourselves. When we're operating from that centered place—what Ajahn Jimnian calls emptiness—we have access to our natural wisdom and our natural capacity for love. When we're operating from a contracted, defended place, we tend to get overwhelmed and lose access to these qualities.

The practice of the Brahmaviharas—loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity—is designed to cultivate this centered place within us. These aren't just nice feelings we're trying to generate. They're actually the natural radiance of an awakened heart, the natural expression of that empty, spacious awareness that Ajahn Jimnian talks about.

When we practice loving-kindness, for instance, we're not just trying to manufacture good feelings toward people. We're actually training ourselves to rest in that place from which love naturally flows. We're learning to find our way back to that centered space again and again, so that even in difficult circumstances, we can respond from wisdom and care rather than from fear or reactivity.

This is why these practices are so practical. They're not just about becoming nicer people, though that might be a side effect. They're about finding a way to meet the intensity of life—whether it's the intensity of September 11th or the intensity of our own personal struggles—from a place that's stable and open rather than defensive and closed.

And this is what makes all the difference. When we can find our way to that centered place, even the most difficult experiences can become opportunities for deepening rather than sources of trauma. The waves are still stormy, but we learn to surf them rather than being overwhelmed by them.

It's a nice description. I like to think of it as an empty awareness pervaded with the quality of loving kindness, or metta. Whatever description works for you, we're looking in our practice for both these qualities of seeing clearly and having an open, responsive heart to the conditions of life—the changing conditions of life.

The Brahma Viharas provide a really good roadmap to how the heartfulness side of our practice can express itself. I basically see them as a description of the wise response to the changing conditions of life. We have many responses to the changes of life that are not so skillful, that bring suffering to us immediately and that bring suffering to other people, short-term or long-term. But the Brahma Viharas are particularly there to describe what's a wise way to hold this situation, no matter what it is, and the maps of how we slide off from those wise responses.

We develop metta as the basic foundation of caring. It's an open heart that doesn't tip one way or another. When that open heart confronts suffering, the natural response is compassion—compassion is simply caring in the light of suffering. When that open heart touches on somebody else's happiness, the natural response is this appreciative joy, this quality of becoming happy with somebody else's happiness. The Dalai Lama said that if you can do that, your chance for happiness goes up by six billion to one. So it's a good bet to make.

And then there's the equanimity that holds them all in balance. Remember that equanimity is not about being shut down. It's not closing off and being indifferent. We feel the other person's happiness. We feel their difficulties. But we hold all of that within a balanced mind so that we ourselves are not suffering on account of their situation.

You can see how equanimity really becomes the foundation for the other three. It holds metta because it lets the open heart rest. It holds compassion so that we don't become too weighed down by the suffering we're feeling. And it actually holds joy in a sane way so that we don't float off like a balloon with the uplifting energy.

The beauty is that it describes how to relate to different circumstances—basically circumstances of joy and sorrow. And the fact is that these circumstances are changing for everybody all the time. They're not just changing for you and me; they change for every being in the world, the ones who are free as well as the ones who are still struggling and working.

Even the Buddha, you'll be happy to know, had lots of back pain. Even after he was enlightened, he would sometimes say, "Ananda, my back is really killing me tonight. You give the Dharma talk. I'm going to go lie down for the evening." So the Buddha was not immune to pleasure and pain even after his awakening. He still went through the same cycles that we do.

There's one sutta I want to read a little bit from. This is from the Pali Canon, the record of the teachings of the Buddha, which were written down 500 years after his death and constitute about twenty volumes in English translation today. This is from the Anguttara Nikaya, and it's called "The Vicissitudes of Life." The Buddha is speaking:

"These eight worldly conditions, O monks, keep the world turning around. And the world turns around these eight worldly conditions. What eight? Gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure."

I'll just read those eight again: gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, success and failure.

These eight conditions alternated for the Buddha also. You might think that after he was enlightened he had a really easy life. But it wasn't like that. There were lots of people who didn't like his teachings. There were other teachers whose words he threatened because he disagreed with them. There were power struggles within his community. His cousin was a monk and thought that he should be at the head of the community. So he actually tried to kill the Buddha and one time sent a mad elephant charging down an alleyway trying to trample the Buddha in its path. It's said that the Buddha stopped the elephant by the force of his loving kindness.

So these eight conditions change for all of us. We're always going through ups and downs of all these different factors. If we're holding on tight, we go up and down with them. If we can learn to rest in more of a place of equanimity, then we don't get so tied to the changing fortunes.

Equanimity—the word in Pali is upeka, and the literal meaning of it, etymologically, is "looking on." We develop this faculty for looking on, even on the events of our own life.

And then that gives us the strength to look on at the events of others' lives as well.

So these fluctuating conditions happen all the time for all of us. These are the stormy waves of life, and they are also the grounds for developing the brahmaviharas. They are the very conditions that can evoke the states of metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity. So we can actually train the heart around these changing circumstances.

We have many different conditioned ways of reacting, but if we come back to the brahmaviharas, they can show us a skillful way to respond. And as we find more choice in our life, that makes a huge difference in freedom. Freedom is really about choosing how we might respond to an outer situation. Often we can't change the outer circumstances—they simply come together through various factors. We have to let that be. We have to accept that in many, many situations.

But what we do have the potential to affect is our response to the outer situation. This is where we build our practice. This is where we uncover our own freedom.

I'll share a quick example from a month-long retreat I was teaching in February. Someone came into an interview who had been sitting for a few weeks at that point. If you've observed this, when people go on retreat for a while, they get really slowed down—though it still seems like they're moving fast to them.

This meditator told me that one day she was going through the lunch line, moving really slowly. She was approaching the serving dish, just reaching out her hand very slowly and mindfully for the serving spoon, when somebody else who wasn't quite as concentrated bolted up on the other side of the table, snatched the serving spoon, and started dishing onto their plate as her hand was still moving toward it.

In just that moment, she said, this huge bolt of rage came up in her. She was so angry that somebody would overlook her practice, her mindfulness, her slowness, and just cut in front of her in line. But also because she was quite slowed down, she saw it immediately. She knew, "Oh, that's rage." And she just dropped it right on the spot. Just like that, she let it go.

That's the choice that real awareness and freedom can offer us. I often find myself driving down the freeway when somebody cuts in front of me. I haven't been going slowly or mindfully, and I spin out for a few cycles with that. So I was really inspired by this story—seeing it that clearly really opened up her choice with the situation.

We could take a look at the first of these worldly conditions—the conditions of gain and loss—and examine how we might relate from habit and how we might relate through the brahmaviharas.

Let's take loss as a beginning. How do we usually react if we suffer a loss? My older sister died several years ago. I was pretty close with her, and her death put me into a period of depression for about two months. I felt a lot of loss and sadness after she died. It was quite unexpected—I wasn't expecting her to die at all. She hadn't been particularly ill.

I practiced every day as I do now, sitting for an hour in the morning. The interesting thing was that the practice and mindfulness didn't seem to touch the grief very much. Day after day I would sit with it, and it didn't seem to be wearing down particularly. I just kept sitting with it. It would go through some ups and downs of intensity. Then after about two months, it kind of lifted.

It was a really interesting thing for me to watch because the way it felt is that the loss or grief had its own expression that it was going to make regardless of what I wanted it to do. It had its own life to live. I think this is not uncommon—when any of us lose something, we tend to respond with grief and depression.

There are also stories from the time of the Buddha that illustrate this in an even more dramatic way. There's a famous story of a woman during his life whose name was Kisa Gotami. She was actually a cousin of his who came from the same village that he had grown up in.

She had gotten married through an arranged marriage and had not gotten on well with her in-laws. Coming in as the wife in that society, you moved into the husband's house, but the husband's parents ran the house. If they didn't like you, you were the low person on the totem pole, and your life could be miserable—and hers was.

So she was quite unhappy, but then she bore a son. Bearing a son in that culture at that time raised the woman's status tremendously, so she got some degree of satisfaction in her household life.

But then her son died.

The loss of her son when he was still young—let's say a toddler, probably three or four—drove her crazy, drove her mad with grief. She clutched her son and started going from person to person in the village asking them for medicine. "Do you have medicine that can save my son?" She wouldn't listen to any of their replies.

Finally some kindly person suggested that she go talk to the Buddha. So she went and talked to the Buddha, and he said, "I can make a medicine for your son. What I need is for you to bring me a white mustard seed from a house that hasn't known any death."

She said, "Thank goodness. My son's going to be able to be cured." So she started to go from house to house in the village asking for a white mustard seed if they hadn't known death. And of course, what happened? Every house she went to had known death. "We lost my mother two years ago." "My daughter died last year." "We lost my sister this year." Every house she went to had known death.

Having gone to all the houses in the village, she finally understood. She buried her son in the forest. She came to the Buddha and said, "I see my son was not alone. I am not alone. Death is a condition that all of us face as people." Then, as the story went on, she ordained as a nun, practiced seriously, and came to liberation. It's the way those stories always go.

I find a couple of things interesting about this story. When she went to the Buddha and told him about her problem, he didn't give her wisdom teachings. He didn't say, "All conditioned things are impermanent. The way your son has gone is the way we're all going to go. Get with the program." He didn't say that because she couldn't have heard that at that time.

At first, I think what his teaching did was it didn't take away her grief, but it took away her madness. In this newsletter, Sylvia has a lead article that has a really lovely line. She's talking also about September 11th. She said, "Wisdom statements don't work in the middle of heartbreak. Heartbreak requires silence."

Wisdom statements don't work. Heartbreak requires silence. I think that's a beautiful pointing. When we are in the midst of heartbreak, of our loss, are we able to find that degree of silence? Because if we are, then some other movement might come out of that silence.

Particularly, I think, when we can touch that silent place—again, it's Ajahn Jumnian's awakened space—in the midst of difficulty, the flavor that naturally comes from the heart is compassion. We start to see that our thinking about the difficulty somehow often can't hold it. When things are really difficult, like September 11th, if you've lost a partner, if you've lost a child, you're having real conflict in your relationship, our thoughts about the situation can't hold that much pain. I actually think if any of us were to try to reflect on all the pain in one human life—our own human life—we couldn't hold all of that.

But the magic thing is that the silence can hold it. You could say that emptiness can hold it. Or you could say that compassion can hold it. So we discover that there's another possible response to pain, whether it's our loss or another's loss, and that is the response of compassion.

When I found the compassion practice, just as we did it tonight, I took it up quite seriously. I did actually a ten-day retreat of compassion practice, doing nothing but that from five in the morning until ten at night. It was very powerful finding that it was a new relationship to pain. Compassion, for me, brought in with it a kind of equanimity that was able to hold the pain without being disturbed by it.

Interestingly enough, compassion itself is not a suffering state. Even though the pain can be strong, when compassion starts to come out of the heart in response to the pain, there's a sweetness to compassion and it is not a state of suffering. When you look at the half-smile on the Buddha, the Buddha was deeply in touch with suffering. But that half smile is the equanimity that let him hold the suffering in a skillful way so that he was able to respond to someone like Kisagotami and able to help and say the right thing, say the appropriate thing to her in the midst of her suffering.

One of my teachers offered a beautiful image for understanding the feeling of compassion. He likened it to sitting on a mountainside at twilight, watching the sun slowly set in the west. In that moment, there is profound beauty unfolding before you, and yet there is also a tinge of sadness—the gentle melancholy that comes with the ending of the day, the passing away of what was. He said compassion carries this same quality: there is beauty and sweetness within it, and it's perfectly natural for it to hold a touch of sadness, since it is touching suffering. But compassion itself need not become suffering.

This is the essential distinction. Compassion offers us a way of looking upon suffering without being consumed by it ourselves. Grief, like what I experienced for my sister, is itself a state of suffering that requires the support of equanimity to transform into compassion. Sometimes it's said that grief is the "near enemy" of compassion—meaning the heart slides into grief when it lacks sufficient strength, support, or equanimity to hold pain with pure compassion.

This brings us to the other side of the equation: how do we relate to gain? Let me offer a less dramatic example. When the Buddha spoke of gain and loss, he often referred to material fortune. Cast your mind back to the ancient history of internet time—two years ago, when the stock market bubble was soaring. Did you know people who were getting rich during that period? I knew a few who were riding that wave of prosperity.

How did it feel to witness their good fortune? Were you able to feel completely happy and joyful about their happiness, even when you hadn't made the same investments? Or was there perhaps a small tinge of disgruntlement? A quiet voice saying, "I wish it weren't going quite so well for them. I wouldn't mind if their stock had risen fifty percent, but tripling?"

The Brahmaviharas invite us to feel genuinely happy with another's happiness—and we're not asked to judge whether that happiness makes sense to us. We're called to tune into their joy, not our version of what should bring joy. If they feel happy because their investments have flourished, can we simply connect with that happiness and enjoy it alongside them? This is mudita, appreciative joy, the third of the Brahmaviharas.

But often the heart slides into that subtle disgruntlement, which the Buddha called envy—the far enemy of appreciative joy. This happens when someone experiences happiness that feels like "too much," as though their abundance somehow diminishes our own potential for joy. It's as if happiness were a limited resource, and their having more means there's less available for us.

So when a friend experiences gain—a new relationship, a better job, material fortune, whatever form it takes—can we genuinely celebrate with them? The classical commentaries note that appreciative joy is often the most difficult of the four Brahmaviharas to practice, precisely because of envy's persistent influence.

But consider what happened when the bubble burst and your friend lost that fortune. What arose in your heart then? Was it pure compassion? Or was there perhaps a touch of satisfaction, a sense that "this is justice—those gains never should have been so high in the first place"? Did you find yourself, even slightly, enjoying their downfall?

This tendency toward satisfaction in another's suffering, however subtle, is what's called cruelty. Cruelty is the heart's capacity to take pleasure in another person's pain, whether great or small. It is the far enemy of compassion—its direct opposite.

As we learn to witness loss, can we hold compassion as our gold standard? Whether the loss belongs to us or another, whether the pain is ours or theirs, can we meet it with compassion? And can we develop sensitivity to those moments when the heart begins sliding either into grief unsupported by equanimity, or into cruelty?

Cruelty is a harsh word, and none of us wants to be seen as cruel, yet I believe we all carry this tendency. Notice how often in media reports over these past months there has been a kind of reveling in military operations from all sides. "Hundreds were killed today in our action in Afghanistan"—delivered with a tone of satisfaction. Or from opposing voices: "Thank goodness we finally got some American servicemen—it's what they deserved." This taking pleasure in death and destruction is another manifestation of cruelty.

This is true whether one supports the war or not. This is still cruelty—enjoying the suffering of another.

With delight, the delight of happiness and gain, the far enemy is envy. The near enemy is becoming overexcited. We can see this with our own gain very easily. Do you notice when something good comes into your life, it's very hard to just hang out with that in silence? Sometimes it's harder to hang out with happiness in silence than it is with difficulty.

What happens, I think, is our minds tend to latch on to the happiness as a possession and then build on what we're going to do with life now that we have this possession. This mental interference of thought with happiness corrupts it. It undermines the happiness because we start to spin out in our thoughts about it and we can't just feel the pure joy of the thing. This is called elation—the English translation of the Buddha's term. Elation is the near enemy of appreciative joy, and it really undermines the impact of the joy itself.

So these are the roadmaps offered by the Brahmavihāras for these changing alternations of pleasure and pain, of gain and loss, of praise and blame, of success and failure. When we encounter pain, can we meet it with compassion? When we encounter joy, can we hold it with an appreciation that resonates with that joy? And can we look for these slides away that move into grief or cruelty, or the sliding away that moves into elation or into envy?

Because all the Brahmavihāras are supported by equanimity, as we find our home in them more and more, we really come to a greater balance with all the change that's in the world. Like Ajahn Jemini, we're not so moved by it. We don't have to reach out and get entangled with it as much. But our heart is still very responsive. It's not that we're turned off or cold, but the entanglement with it really tends to get cut down.

As we're not getting so entangled in the ups and downs, our motivation can really shift from getting to giving. I think this is really the start of the bodhisattva path, the path where our practice, where our life really starts to have a dimension of not just being for ourselves, but being for the benefit of all beings. That moves from being a cliché to being an actual motivating reality for us.

I'll close with this quotation from Śāntideva, an Indian Buddhist teacher of the 8th century, one of the Dalai Lama's favorite quotations: "For as long as space endures and as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the unhappiness of this world."

We have about ten minutes left. If you have any reflections, comments, discussion, or questions, I'll open it up.

"After 9/11 happened, our president used the word justice. And with everything we've talked about, how does justice and the word justice play a part in this? Is it justice to take another's life?"

How can we understand justice in light of the emphasis on compassion and non-harming in the Buddha's teachings?

First, I think the Buddha was very dedicated to a life of non-violence. You can get a sense of how that might show up in the world today by the Dalai Lama and the way that he speaks and teaches.

This is from the newsletter and fits here. At the end of a talk, someone from the audience asked the Dalai Lama, "Why didn't you fight back against the Chinese?"—because this also could be a form of justice, to fight back against an invader. The Dalai Lama looked down, swung his feet just a bit, then looked back up at us and said with a gentle smile, "Well, war is obsolete, you know." Then after a few moments, his face grave, he said, "Of course the mind can rationalize fighting back, but the heart, the heart would never understand. Then you would be divided in yourself, the heart and the mind, and the war would be inside you."

I think that might be taken as a fairly accurate pointer to the way that the Buddha might answer the question if he were here today. The Buddha felt justice was appropriate. In the rules he set up for the community of monks and nuns, there were offenses described against those rules, with specific punishments for each offense proportional to the transgression. Some involved being excommunicated from the order altogether. Others involved lesser penances.

So the idea of justice is in the Buddha's teachings, but I think he would look very long and hard to find nonviolent ways of coming to justice. I obviously don't have any easy answer for what that would mean in terms of the world situation today or Afghanistan.

But I do have the feeling that the leaders of our country and the world have not put as much time into exploring nonviolent alternatives and tend to move rather quickly to violent alternatives.

"Any other comments, questions? Yes, please."

"I have a question that's a little off the topic. It's about non-harming. And I always have a problem with refraining from killing when it gets to a level of insects. And it sounds funny, but we had termites in our house, and I couldn't justify selling the house to someone else and I couldn't justify to myself leaving the shelter for my family either, and yet I felt guilty about killing them. How do you decide when what you're doing is really rational or when you're fooling yourself?"

The question is about the precept on not killing and the attitude of non-harming and what to do with insects in the house with termites, for example. It's a real question for serious Buddhists.

I'll tell you a little story. The Minneapolis Zen Center years ago had cockroaches, and they were infesting the meditation hall. New people didn't want to come in and practice because cockroaches would run over their legs. So the senior students thought, well, we'll ask the Zen master. He must know what to do about this. So they went up to see the Zen master who was Katagiri Roshi and explained the situation and said, "Roshi, what should we do?" And he said, "I'm not going to tell you."

So what the senior students decided to do was to have the meditation hall exterminated. They killed the cockroaches so that meditators would come and practice. And they felt that was the right alternative. I think many other people who are good, sincere Buddhists come to a similar kind of decision.

What I think is that there are times when killing insects may be the right option for any one of us. It may be the option we choose. And it doesn't take away from the fact that we're breaking the precept. And in breaking the precept, there's a certain amount of unskillful action going on and we'll have repercussions in our life. I believe that happens.

So I hold the precepts not as an absolute commandment, but as a guideline to use in skillfully choosing your own route in this situation.

One other thing I wanted to say—this gets back to the first question also—I think there are Buddhists who have different views on pacifism. I think there are responsible Buddhists who would say that the Tibetans should have defended their country against the Chinese. And there were certainly Tibetan fighters who wanted to do that. The Dalai Lama did not encourage them or would not support them. But I think that one can be a conscientious Buddhist and believe that at times war might be the right response. World War II certainly comes closer to that situation than today's war.

But what I also want to add is along with the situation with insects, I think the situation with killing humans is the same. I think there are huge karmic repercussions from the taking of human life. And those are not dismissed because one believes that it's the right course and it's justified.

"One last comment, please."

I've heard of that sutra too. The story that I heard went that there was a pirate on board a ship who was going to kill all 500 people on the ship. And one person on the ship killed the pirate, thereby taking one life but saving 500 lives. The scripture, which is from the Mahayana—so it means it didn't come out of the mouth of the Buddha, but came out of very enlightened beings centuries later—the scripture goes on to say that that being did suffer the karmic consequence of taking a life, which was that he spent one moment in hell. But then he was immediately reborn after that one moment in a very happy life.

The Buddha also said that the workings of karma are one of the four things that can drive you crazy if you think about them too much. So I would encourage us to take the messages from the suttas and kind of leave it there.

So I'd like to just close the evening. We've come to 9:15 with this dedication of merit from the Tibetan, having the sense that we want to take whatever goodness has come out of our time together this evening and have that goodness be shared with all beings everywhere for their welfare, for their happiness, for their freedom.

Through the merit of this practice, may all come to awakening. Overcoming the obstacle of my own misconduct, may I free all beings from the ocean of existence with its stormy waves of birth, old age, sickness, and death. May all beings be freed.

CHAPTER 242

Faith as a Spiritual Faculty

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines saddhā (faith) as the first of the five spiritual faculties (pañca indriya) that support spiritual development. Beginning with reflections on world events and uncertainty, he explores how some people respond to difficulty with despair while others use it to deepen their spiritual practice. Armstrong explains faith not as blind belief, but as placing one's heart upon something trustworthy—the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha as sources of refuge. He describes Buddha-nature as our essential awareness beyond change, and discusses how bright faith develops through inspiring examples, leading to verified faith through personal experience. The talk emphasizes faith as the foundation for spiritual vulnerability and openness, enabling the heart qualities of loving-kindness and compassion to emerge. Drawing from the Third Zen Patriarch's "Verses on the Faith Mind," Armstrong shows how deep trust allows us to accommodate life's imperfections without anxiety, supporting both meditation practice and engaged response to world suffering.

You all tuned into the news this morning, but I did, and I sort of wished that I hadn't. When I tune into the news these days, there was a fragile peace starting to establish itself in the Middle East, and then yesterday and today there were two suicide bombings of Israelis. Sharon returned from Washington from peace talks vowing retribution, and I also heard there was a suicide bombing in Pakistan today. Of course it brings up for me the events of last September and what the repercussions of all of that are going to be.

I read something in the news the other day that really shocked me and was kind of a wake-up call. Warren Buffett is the second richest man in the United States. He's mostly an investor, but his core holdings are insurance companies. So he got very interested in the ramifications of September 11th and how to look at insurance in a new light because his companies had something like $3.5 billion in charges relating to the events of September. He's also a pretty smart guy.

His comment was, after looking at this whole situation, he came out and said that a nuclear attack on the United States is a certainty. He said this is not just something that might happen—it's virtually certain that this will happen. Because with the proliferation of the technology of how to make nuclear bombs, and the increasing anger directed at the United States and the rest of the world, he said this is not a question of if, it's only a question of when. It could be within the next 10 years, it could be within the next 50 years. He said most likely it would be New York or Washington.

I don't know about you, but I'd sort of settled back in since September 11th to feeling more comfortable and like maybe we were over the worst of it. And then someone as smart and obviously wary of the risks as Warren Buffett says something like that, and we have to think again. So it's kind of a wake-up call that the world is an unpredictable place. It's a place that's fraught with insecurity for our bodies and minds and hearts. The possibility of loss is huge for all of us, and the events of last September woke that up as well.

Then I started to think: you can take this kind of understanding about the precarious situation that we're all in in one of two directions. You can get really depressed about it. There's a lot of sadness that accompanies this, and you can just spiral down in that weight of depression and despair. Or there's also the possibility to take that information and use it to actually awaken our spiritual life—to crystallize a sense of urgency and caring and compassion and to use it to deepen our spiritual qualities.

So I wanted to toss out for your reflection the question: what is it that sends some of us in one direction, just kind of being bowed down in despair at the situation, and that allows other people actually to grow from that kind of insight, that kind of awakening? What makes the difference? When you look around yourself and your friends, you probably can see people who are going in two different directions with all this news and these changes. What's the capacity or what is it that lets people respond differently, either to grow and open or to basically close down further?

One response was that it can resolve grief and trauma—that people rely somewhat on practice, so carryover from the past that hasn't been examined or opened to gets re-stimulated.

Another perspective: "I think the people that I see who are able to have it—at the end of the day it's the balance—but the people that I see that are holding it in a way that I really admire, they live their life that way. It's like they walk that path. And so when it comes, if they have the balance to be with the pain and to also hold it in some way, it's really a magnificent thing to see. But I think this practice is the path, for me. I'm taking baby steps on that path. But when you see people that have practiced for a long time, I think they do have it."

So it really has to do with the amount of preparation that people have put in their lives to finding that kind of balance through their practice.

Another insight: the person who goes forward is often the person who is willing to take that risk to go forward, doesn't know what's going to happen, but is willing to leave the comfort zone. The relationship to change, the willingness to let go, the ability to be flexible and adapt.

And finally, coming from a belief that we are a part of something much bigger.

Thank you. Connection to nature, to pets, to the bigger picture of life once again. Faith in people, faith in humankind. And then there was this beautiful insight about the skill of listening—listening interpersonally, listening globally, and listening to the pain within our own bodies, the stored trauma and unresolved grief. Meditation really can be described as the art of listening, both inwardly and outwardly.

I appreciate all those comments. There's profound wisdom in every single one of them, and they really help bring focus to what I wanted to explore with you. My own reflection brought me to a similar place. I felt that it comes down to whether one is able to meet the events of the moment with a balanced mind that also holds compassion and understanding. This kind of ability often emerges from having practiced it. It's difficult to suddenly find this capacity on September 11th if we haven't discovered how to cultivate it beforehand.

Sometimes in meditation it seems like we offer many different instructions. This morning I probably gave five instructions, and that was brief. I could easily give a hundred different meditation instructions. There's working with sounds, with space, with the body, with thoughts and emotions. We can become particular about body sensations, focus solely on the breath, get precise about the in-breath and out-breath, practice sweeping attention through the body, or meditate on no object at all. The list goes on and on. This technology has been refined for 2500 years, so there are countless techniques.

But I believe it all comes down to one basic instruction: Get as good an approximation as you can of what the awakened state of mind is, and put yourself there.

What the Buddha was trying to convey through all his words and teachings was to share with us what he had discovered. The discovery is, in one way, fairly simple. It's a way of looking at the world, a way of experiencing the world that is awake and peaceful. These are two fundamental qualities of the awakened state—awake and peaceful.

When we can rest in that place, different aspects shine out spontaneously. The doors open for all the beautiful qualities of heart and mind to express themselves naturally. We don't have to call them forth; they're already there when we're established in that awakened place.

So our job as meditators is to discover for ourselves what that awakened place feels like, as best we can. This is a gradual path, so we're not Buddhas yet. We don't see the world as clearly as the Buddha did. But to the extent that we can intuit where he was pointing, can we place ourselves there, moment after moment?

In our meditation first of all—that's our training ground. Suzuki Roshi said that meditation is like learning to bake bread. You just keep putting it in the oven. You mix the dough and put it in the oven again and again until you discover what makes a perfect loaf of bread. This is what we're doing in meditation—trying moment after moment to find that awakened place within us.

There are many different ways to describe this state. At the end of our February retreat here, someone asked the teachers to sum up the essence of what we're looking for, what we're aspiring toward. We each had our own expression. Sylvia's was something like "the mind is clear and the heart is open." My summary was "an empty awareness pervaded by loving-kindness."

Different people had other variations on the theme, but you can get the flavor. There's this one kind of taste of awakeness, and within it, many beautiful qualities can emerge. That's why I wanted to check in—when you touch this place of being awake and settled, what do you find?

To refresh, some of the qualities you mentioned were peaceful, pleasant, relaxed, spacious, with boundaries between self and other dissolving, heightened senses, contentment, and a sense of wholeness through the body. These actually map quite beautifully onto a framework that the Buddha described.

The Buddha had different ways of describing this awakened state. One concept cannot capture it—it's a felt sense, a non-verbal experience. So it gets described from different angles. In the Tibetan tradition, they speak of it being like a diamond. Twirl the diamond one way and you see certain facets; twirl it another way and other facets appear. We need to become familiar with all the facets of this diamond that is our awakened nature.

One of my favorite groupings of these qualities is what the Buddha called the five spiritual faculties: faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. These are essentially five aspects of this diamond. Let me connect them to your observations this morning.

The faith aspect was echoed in comments about belief in something greater, connection beyond ourselves, faith in humankind. Energy appeared in Joe's mention of dedication to doing this work over years and years, building up this strength of mind. Many of you spoke to the mindfulness aspect—heightened senses, awareness touching every aspect of experience. Concentration showed up in the stillness you mentioned, the peace and relaxation, and especially that sense of wholeness through the body. This wholeness is actually a sign of what we call unification of mind—everything coming together. And wisdom emerged when Lynn spoke of seeing change and impermanence, understanding the non-separation between ourselves and the world—what came through in comments about merging, connection to something greater.

I want to explore each of these five qualities in more detail, but please keep in mind that you've already been touching on them all. This isn't foreign territory—we're simply drawing out different aspects of a state you're already familiar with.

Faith is really crucial. The Buddha placed it first. He understood these five qualities both sequentially and circularly—faith leading to energy, energy to mindfulness, mindfulness to concentration, concentration to wisdom. Yet they also work circularly: as we develop wisdom, faith deepens, which strengthens our commitment and energy, and so forth.

Faith serves as a real beginning point in Buddhism. You all had to have some faith to sit down and try meditation for the first time. Someone told you this was worthwhile, or you read something that convinced you to give it a try.

Just last week on retreat in Colorado, during an interview, someone came to me saying, "I have a really important question and I'm not going to be able to keep from crying when I ask you." Then she said, "I look around and the world is such a mess. What can one have faith in?" And she did start crying. "What can I have faith in?"

This connects back to listening to the daily news. Without some kind of greater faith, it becomes truly depressing. What can we place our faith in?

I want to make one comment about keeping faith in touch with the world. Sometimes we all become overburdened by what's happening globally. You can focus on the destruction of the earth, the death and poverty and starvation, the ongoing wars, torture as state policy in many places, the oppression of women, the neglect of children—the list is endless.

And sometimes in looking at all that, we can get really a sense of it being too much to hold. One of my teachers who's an activist said something I thought was kind of wise. He said, when there's that sense that it's too much to handle, narrow your focus of seeing. Don't send your imagination and your thoughts out that far. Because it's really important that we maintain our own inner balance.

I'd say especially in doing work of an activist nature, if you're really looking to change the world and you care a lot about it, one of the greatest things I think we can bring to the world is our own sanity, our own balance. I often wonder, does the world need more anger? Does it need more frustration? Does it need more blame? Does it need more name-calling? I'm not sure. But I know that it needs our love, our kindness, our own inner balance. And if, in an activist role, that can start to come through, that's a beautiful way to change the dialogue. The Dalai Lama is a great example of that, working with the Chinese government.

This is from a young Tibetan Lama. He's living in Ladakh, a practitioner of Tibetan Buddhism. He was talking about his own situation. Born outside of Tibet and having grown up since the devastation happened, he said, "I was given a Western education for which I am grateful in many ways, but I lost something. I lost the peace of mind that I might have had in another generation. Everyone in our generation lives in a fragmented, complex, disturbing time in which it is hard to keep one's spiritual balance, hard to find the time to build that balance in the first place. I feel increasingly that I must go into retreat more, must meditate more, must discipline myself more. Otherwise, I shall be of no use to my people."

This is in Ladakh. It's too busy in Ladakh. It's too crazy in Ladakh. So what does that say about North America in the 21st century? How much time do we need? How much balance do we have to work to find?

This quality of faith in Buddhism is a translation of the Pali term saddhā. Pali is the ancient Indian language that the teachings came down in. Saddhā literally means, the etymology is to place one's heart upon. I think this is a nice reflection because in Buddhism faith isn't about belief. It's not about "I hold this set of principles to be true, this is the only truth and everybody else is crazy so I'm ready to fight with you." It's not particularly an intellectual thing. It's more a heart sense of trust, or you could say confidence.

So another interesting reflection is where do we put our trust or confidence? Because we all put it somewhere. It's interesting, if you look around the world, everybody has their own philosophy of life. Everybody's a philosopher. Everybody puts their trust in something, believes in something. Where is ours? And is it in a place that can hold it effectively?

If we didn't have faith, if we didn't have that kind of trust, we'd be in a panic right now. So there's something that we all have placed our hearts upon. One of the things the Buddha said is it's wise to place your heart on something that's beyond change. Because the things that are subject to change, when they do change, your faith can crumble.

So before he started his practice, he was 29 years old, and he said, "I saw that I was subject to aging, and I saw the pain in what is subject to aging." He said, "Seeing that, I gave up the vanity of youth. I saw that I was subject to illness. I saw the pain in what is subject to illness, and seeing that, I gave up the vanity of health. I saw that I was subject to death. I saw the pain in what is subject to death. And seeing that, I gave up the vanity of life."

This is pretty amazing insight from somebody who's 29 years old. I think most of us, when we're young, tend to put our faith in our youth, in our health, and in life. But sooner or later, all those things will be taken away from us. And then what do we have to put our faith in when that happens?

Fred Wahpepah is a beautiful Native American teacher who teaches at Spirit Rock from time to time, and we built a sweat lodge just over the creek for Fred to use when he comes. He usually leads sweats as part of his teaching here. So one time, it was the first time I did a sweat with him. The stones were brought in and he had just sealed the flap and was starting to talk about the philosophy of the sweat, how to hold it.

One of the first things he said to us was, "You know, in our Indian language, we don't have any word for hope. There's no word for hope. That's because we know that everything's all right."

I thought that was an amazing expression for somebody whose whole culture had been mostly destroyed over the last 150 years. "We know everything's all right." That's that quality of real faith, the heartfelt faith. Despite all the change, despite the suffering that goes on in the world, somehow the sense that everything's all right. That's beautiful.

In every spiritual tradition, there is some pointing to this perfection of things, even in the midst of imperfection. The way Suzuki Roshi put it—he's a great Zen teacher—he said, "The world is perfect and there's a lot of room for improvement." But can we see both those sides? Can we see the perfection and the beauty of the world and at the same time not blind ourselves to seeing the shortcomings, what can still be improved?

I think nature is a good pointer to that, physical nature. The beauty of the physical world in its natural state is a reminder to us of the presence of beauty, the presence of goodness in the world that our hearts can connect with and touch. But physical nature alone isn't enough. It's not the end-all and the be-all. It's not the core of a spiritual path in Buddhist terms. But it can be a pointer to that kind of perfection.

In Buddhism it's more pointing us back to our own hearts, that we take nature as a reminder or a cue or a demonstration of the native goodness of the universe that's also in our own hearts.

I'm just going to share one cartoon with you, one because Sylvia turned me on to it, so it's a way of bringing her into the class, but also because it kind of illustrates this concept of trust seeping into the mainstream. The cartoon is this: There are two policemen in an urban setting, and they've got a guy spread-eagled against a car. They're reading him his Miranda rights. And so the caption is, "You have the right to remain silent. You have the right to an attorney. Anything you say can and will be used against you. Whether you understand it or not, you are a child of the universe and everything is unfolding just the way it should." If I have to be arrested, I'd love to have the cop read me that. Unfolding just the way it should.

So what can we as practitioners find that offers that kind of faith? What can we put our trust in?

"No matter what happens, love will still arise in the human heart," someone offered.

Yes, faith and love surviving in the human heart.

Rose shared, "My definition of faith for a long time was just the absence of fear. Having that absence, I can relax and be okay in a way that I couldn't before." So faith is the absence of fear and a returning to that knowing, that understanding.

Sam reflected, "I remember where this really sank in. All of a sudden I understood that the 10,000 sorrows do not negate the 10,000 joys. The 10,000 joys are always here, they're always there. And so that's been phenomenal for me. They're right here." Yes, not losing touch with the joys and beauty of existence also.

Another student said, "For me, it's sitting and being present. Being with what is right now. Not what I'm cramming into my future, but allowing me to be present." So faith in being with what is in the moment. You could say being with the truth of things.

"For me," someone shared, "after decades of practice, there's this experience of being able to have access to something within, just below. I don't have any blindness about it, yet I can still have access to it, and I can open up to it so it can come through."

The pain, confusion, and suffering I've experienced have been profound gifts. They've slowly carved out an avenue within me, because I wouldn't know how else—how I or anybody—could learn to stay present with such intensity.

Using the suffering of life to spur one toward discovering what can possibly hold it or resolve it, and then trusting in what you discover through that process.

In this part of my life, I find myself deeply drawn to working in a Zen hospice setting. What I witness there comes without my asking, without effort on my part. Just yesterday, I saw a man smoking outside—someone whose leg had been amputated, leaving one shorter than the other. I allowed myself to really look at him and take in his presence. The experience I had was of incredible wholeness radiating from him.

He caught me looking at him and smiled, beginning to engage me in conversation. I realized that this sense of completeness, this peace I witnessed, had nothing to do with me at all. It was simply manifesting through itself, creating genuine contact between us.

This brings us to the classical teachings on faith. The Buddha taught that practitioners can place their faith in the three gems: the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. These are traditionally the three sources of refuge, of trust, of confidence that we can come to know for ourselves.

The Buddha died twenty-five hundred years ago. He's not here anymore. How can we have faith in someone who is dead? There are a couple of ways to understand this.

We can understand the Buddha in terms of that awakened state of mind. There's a beautiful story about a monk who was completely smitten with the Buddha, following him around like a puppy dog wherever he went. When the Buddha would turn around, this devoted monk would be right there, trying to absorb his presence, sitting and gazing at him in complete adoration.

Finally, the Buddha turned to him and said, "No, no, go off and practice. You don't need to hang around me. Seeing me isn't going to do you much good. The one who sees the Dharma truly sees the Buddha. One who sees the Dharma sees the Buddha."

So one who really understands the deepest truth has seen the real nature of the Buddha. In this way, the Buddha can be alive for each of us today. The closer we get to this awakened state, the more we sense for ourselves what the Buddha is—what the Buddha is in our own heart, our own potential for Buddhahood, because we all have that.

In the Mahayana traditions, this is often described through three aspects of our essential nature—who we truly are beyond change. We're not really this body. All spiritual traditions tell us this. It's the mistake of identifying ourselves with this body that creates the root of our limited sense of self, this constricted and contracted self-centeredness that causes all unhappiness.

Who we really are in our essence is empty space. Our nature is basically this empty space that, secondly, has the quality of awareness. When you opened up earlier and listened to sounds, could you sense that your awareness extends on and on forever? That there are no boundaries to your awareness?

As far away as the sounds reach, your awareness can go there and receive them. As distant as the sun, your awareness can touch. As remote as the stars, our senses can maintain some connection. The sense is that awareness pervades that space—not as two separate things, but as one unified reality.

What we really are is this empty space of knowing.

These two qualities also include a third quality—that awareness is ceaselessly responsive. This means that out of that empty awareness manifest all the beautiful qualities of heart and mind: wisdom, compassion, listening, understanding, gratitude, faith, insight. All these arise naturally from that space.

When you think about yourself in terms of the Buddha or what to have trust in, this is what is sometimes called Buddha nature. It's said to be most deeply what we are. It's unchanging—this is our nature beyond change. Different facets will manifest, different qualities of this diamond will radiate at different times. But this essential nature of empty space pervaded with awareness is what we most deeply are.

As we come to trust in that, we come to that which is within us but is not of us, as you were saying. It's something that's in us, but it's not personal. It's not mine or yours because we all have it. This also lets us feel the true inner connection when we realize that we share this with everything that lives. One of the Chinese Zen masters said, "All human beings, and in fact all wriggling things, are possessed of this great nirvanic nature." It's a nature like nirvana—unchanging in that way.

The Dharma are the teachings of the Buddha or the truth, the instructions that point us to this discovery. In the ultimate sense, Dharma is used for this nature that we discover as well. So we have faith in the teachings, and often that's our first source of faith. It was mine.

I was sixteen years old, living in Webster Groves, Missouri, in the dark ages, let me tell you. This was about 1964. I wandered into a bookstore that I frequented from time to time—I had a kind of reflective state of mind back then. I saw this book on the shelf called The Way of Zen by Alan Watts. There was this Buddha image on the cover, and I don't know why, but I bought it. I didn't read it right away. I kept it on my shelf, and a couple of years later I picked it up and started reading it. That was my first connection to anything really spiritual. I'd been brought up Protestant, which is about as remote from real spirituality as I know of. Sorry. That was my Midwestern experience—I don't mean to make a blanket statement about that. There are many beautiful Christians from Protestant denominations in the world as well. That was just my experience.

This really awakened me to another way of looking and the possibility of freedom. Freedom from all suffering? You mean my teenage neuroses could be liberated? That was pretty attractive to me.

So it could be a book, could be a Dharma talk, somebody sharing their understanding. The other avenue for many of us is the Sangha. We run into somebody who embodies some of these qualities, these beautiful qualities of heart or mind, and we're just struck that such a human being is possible.

The first retreat I went to was led by Joseph Goldstein, among others. I liked Joseph from the very beginning. He's so light. I'd never met anybody who carried himself and viewed his life with such a feeling of lightness. His mind just didn't seem to get hooked or caught anywhere, and he always had this happiness about him. So I spent a lot of time with Joseph over many years. That was 1976, and this is twenty-six years later. I've come to know him as a teacher, spending much time just learning from him.

I've come to know him as a colleague. We've worked together on three-month courses in other places, and as a friend. We hang out and do things together. Over the years, seeing Joseph in all these different modes, I'm even more impressed than I was at the beginning. He really does have that kind of freedom in almost every area of his life. There are still a couple of places where he can get hooked and caught up, but not many. Not many. I tell you, he's pretty amazing.

When we see somebody who inspires us like that, who manifests these qualities, and we recognize that it's a possibility, this is the beginning of what's called in the tradition "bright faith." There's a quality of wonder to it. It lights us up. We get a hit off that person, off that possibility, and our eyes brighten thinking, "That's really possible for human beings?" Someone like the Dalai Lama is great at evoking that quality of bright faith in people. You really see the human potential.

The Buddha talked extensively about how important this is—to be around people who inspire us. Ananda was his cousin and attendant for twenty-five years, the last twenty-five years of his life. Ananda was a very beautiful, giving, kind, and generous person, but the Buddha always had to correct Ananda's understanding. Half the suttas involve the Buddha correcting Ananda's understanding.

In one case, Ananda comes up and says to the Buddha, "Venerable One, I've been thinking. I believe that spiritual friendship—that is, association with wise people—is a full half of the holy life." And the Buddha said, "Say not so, Ananda," as he always did. "Association with spiritual friends is the whole of the holy life."

He went on to explain why. It's not just because it's pleasant to spend time with people who are peaceful. It is pleasant to be around peaceful people, but that's not really what it's about in its essence. The Buddha continued: "For when one associates with spiritual friends, one can be expected to develop and pursue the Noble Eightfold Path."

Good spiritual friends accept us as we are, but also challenge us to grow. They motivate us, they encourage us, they challenge us to develop those highest qualities within ourselves. Associating with such people, we can't escape that encouragement and stimulation and inspiration. So it's not just because it's wonderful to be around them, but also because they foster our own development. A good spiritual friend will actually encourage our development in that way.

We see that faith in this context has another implication for us as practitioners, for us as Buddhists: it ought to lead to effort. Faith is a beautiful quality in itself. It opens us up in that way of trusting, that absence of fear that was mentioned, but it needs to go further. It needs to say, "Look, you've seen what's possible. You've seen these qualities manifest in someone else. You can develop those in yourself. What's holding you back?"

The faith needs to spur us to make the next step, which is effort or energy. As we begin to make that effort, then we investigate the teachings, we explore the qualities of the path, and when we find that they can indeed develop, we move to the next level of faith, which is called "verified faith."

So the movement is bright faith, effort, and then verified faith. We verify it through our own experience. That's how I think of this path. To me, it's like the science of the mind. Science is about universal laws that can be repeated under proper laboratory conditions. We create the proper laboratory conditions when we sit down and look at our own minds and bodies, and from that we can repeat the same results that the Buddha found.

Attention brings calm. Calm brings concentration. When the mind is steady, we can understand. Life is change. If you cling, you suffer. We can repeat those experiments and verify them. Then it's the level of verified faith.

I want to talk a little about this quality of opening that a couple of people touched on, and look at what's involved in that. When you come to that place of stillness and presence in your meditation practice, have you ever gotten nervous?

When we settle into that place of stillness in meditation, it's remarkable how many people experience nervousness. This is actually quite natural and understandable. In stillness, we've dropped our usual defenses—we're not carrying our life history or personal story into the moment. We're not bringing our relationships, our worries about finances, our familiar identities. We've simply dropped everything, allowing our attention to meet the bare facts of life directly.

In this state, we are utterly exposed, vulnerable, open. Our attention meets life itself—unmediated, raw, immediate. This directness can feel unsettling. It takes real courage to release the security of past and future, to drop our carefully constructed personality, and simply touch the moment without buffers.

This willingness to be present without protection—this absence of fear—is essential to the practice. As we grow more familiar with this vulnerability, we discover it's not actually dangerous. Being open and exposed begins to feel natural, even though initially it may seem far too raw.

Chögyam Trungpa, the Tibetan teacher, offers a beautiful analogy for this tender openness. He suggests imagining a very sore spot on our body—so sensitive that we avoid rubbing or scratching it. In the shower, we're careful not to soap it too vigorously because it hurts. This sore spot represents compassion. Even when we're caught in aggression, insensitivity, or laziness, we always have this soft place somewhere within us—a point we can cultivate.

He elaborates: "A more vivid analogy might be of an opened wound, which is always there. That opened wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough, we would like to come on strong, but there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time."

What relief this brings—to realize we don't have to be perpetually armored!

This vulnerability becomes the very place where our heart opens and can be touched. When the heart is accessible, it becomes the doorway through which all the heart qualities can emerge. In our tradition, we call these the Brahma-viharas: loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity. That tender, vulnerable space allows these qualities to flow forth naturally. The world can touch us, and we can touch the world through this sensitive, open heart.

Trungpa continues with even deeper insight: "There's also an inner wound or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the inner wound and the outer wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever."

In this understanding, vulnerability itself becomes compassion. We no longer have any way to defend ourselves—nor do we need to. Faith creates the pathway to this tender openness, and this openness becomes the gateway through which loving-kindness and compassion naturally extend into the world.

There's a beautiful passage from "Verses on the Faith Mind," a classic Zen text by the Third Zen ancestor, that speaks directly to this. You can find it in Jack Kornfield's excellent collection, "Teachings of the Buddha"—a wonderful reference if you're looking for a single book sampling the Buddha's teachings.

Near the end of this text, we find these verses:

"For the unified mind in accord with the way, all self-centered striving ceases. Doubts and irresolution vanish, and life in true faith is possible. To live with this realization is to be without anxiety about non-perfection. To live in this faith is the road to non-duality, for the non-dual is one with the trusting mind."

When doubts and irresolution vanish, life in true faith becomes possible. Living with this realization means we can release our anxiety about being imperfect. This faith itself becomes the path to non-duality—for the non-dual mind and the trusting mind are one and the same.

So we come back to this deep sense of trust in the basic goodness of life, of ourselves, and that gives us the ability to accommodate without so much anxiety all the things that are wrong, all the things in the world that aren't right, that aren't perfect. We can open to them because of this really deep-seated trust that's more basic.

We only explored one of the spiritual faculties today, but we talk about the others most of the time—mindfulness and concentration and wisdom and energy. I wanted to speak about faith because it's one that we don't tend to verbalize very much, so I wanted to touch on it today.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 243

The Three Characteristics

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's fundamental teaching on the three characteristics of existence - impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Drawing from personal retreat experiences and stories from the tradition, Armstrong illustrates how all conditioned phenomena are subject to constant change, from the gross level of aging and death to the subtle moment-to-moment arising and passing of sensations, thoughts, and mental states.
> The talk explores how our attempts to find lasting security in impermanent things inevitably leads to dukkha - suffering, unsatisfactoriness, and unreliability. Armstrong discusses the three types of suffering: the suffering of pain (dukkha-dukkha), the suffering of change (viparināma-dukkha), and the suffering of conditioned existence (saṅkhāra-dukkha). He emphasizes how understanding impermanence can actually be liberating, as it means no difficult state lasts forever.
> The exploration of not-self (anattā) forms the heart of the teaching, questioning our conventional sense of identity and inviting direct investigation into the nature of the 'I'. Referencing the Bāhiya Sutta, Armstrong points toward the possibility of pure perception without a perceiver, leading to the recognition of awareness itself as our deepest nature - that which knows the coming and going of all phenomena but itself remains unchanged.

I asked somebody in an interview today, "How's the retreat going for you?"

They looked really perplexed. I could see the wheels stirring as they went back over the events of the day. Finally, they said, "That's a really hard question to answer. It's kind of been going every which way."

I could really relate to that. I want to pass on a tip: when you get home, you're going to get this question a lot. How was your retreat? You can imagine the wheels stirring as you prepare to speak to people at home. So I have an insider piece of advice—you just say, "It was great." That's all people want to know, and you can go on to the next topic about what's been happening for them.

The reason it's so hard to answer is that it's always changing. Our experience is always changing. It's one of the most striking things about a retreat and something we see early on. It's actually one of our first insights in practice, which is good because this is called insight meditation. You feel you ought to be having some insights or you wouldn't be getting your money's worth. At least you get that insight out of this.

The Buddha talked a lot about this aspect of change. He actually said, "Foremost among footprints is the elephant's. Foremost among reflections is that on impermanence." It was a really key part of his teaching. He came back to it again and again. He often combined it with two other aspects that he called the three characteristics of existence: impermanence, unsatisfactoriness—sometimes called suffering—and not-self, or selflessness.

In tonight's talk, I'd like to go into these three areas of the Buddha's teachings in more detail. I sort of think of these as the facts of life for grown-ups. They're sometimes a little hard to take in, but if we want to be an adult in this world, it's really important that we understand these facts. The Buddha stressed them again and again.

I think we all grow up with a sense of vulnerability. We look at the world and see the turmoil in it. Every human being, from adolescence on, is plagued with a sense of some insecurity. Where in all this confusion am I going to find lasting happiness? How is this going to work for me? What will we find that lasts?

Of course, the culture gives us a set of answers: lots of money, good job, handsome or attractive partner, big car, lots of gadgets—the latest of all that. I think all of us are here because we already know that doesn't really do it. We may have tried it, but I think all of us know that's not where it's at.

I think we often still look outside ourselves—I know I have. One of the areas we look to a lot is an intimate relationship. There's a tendency to put a lot of eggs in that basket.

I didn't really realize this until I was on a long retreat. It was a long time ago in a galaxy far, far away. I went away on a two-month retreat and left my girlfriend at our home. When I got to the retreat, I thought, "That relationship is so solid. I know I can completely count on that relationship. I don't have a single worry as I go into this retreat."

That should have been the tip-off, but I did not heed that call.

I went into the retreat and practiced for two months. I got quite still, quite open, quite raw. I came out at the end of the retreat and called my girlfriend as soon as we could talk again. I found out that she'd gotten involved while I was away in a spiritual scene where the guru basically broke up every single relationship that came into the scene. In hindsight, what I suspect—what I believe—is that this guru couldn't allow students to have a love relationship with anyone else. It was too divided.

I saw the handwriting on the wall as soon as she told me that, and I just felt the bottom fall out of my world.

And all the time that I was reflecting on this particular attachment, I kept thinking about how the meditator's path is often a progression from one attachment to another until we see through the whole process.

My stomach just went empty and hollow. And I'd been in retreat for two months, so you can imagine how sensitive we become when we sit for extended periods. The next few weeks were filled with turmoil and spinning and insecurity. What it revealed was the depth of attachment I had to that relationship at that point. It was a crystal clear lesson. It's not that I shouldn't have been in the relationship, but I didn't realize how much I had invested in it until the bottom fell out.

In case you're interested in how the story unfolds, we did reconcile. Essentially, she left that scene, which I believe was the only way our relationship could move beyond that hurdle. But for me, it felt like deprogramming. There was something occult-like about the atmosphere in that particular spiritual community. So there was considerable turmoil as everything got sorted out. That was a long, long time ago. Sometimes we learn the hard way.

Another place where we easily invest our sense of security is in this body. Many years ago, I started to go gray. When I was in my early thirties, I began to develop gray hair. At one gathering with a friend, somebody turned to him and asked—I couldn't hear clearly—"Who's that middle-aged man you're with?" I was genuinely offended and shocked. The aging process was happening, but I hadn't quite caught up with the reality of it yet.

Now, as this baby boomer generation advances, we were discussing in an interview today all the bad knees and bad backs and bad hips. A good friend of mine had hip replacement surgery last year. It's becoming increasingly apparent that we witness this nature of the body—change, impermanence, aging, and illness.

One of the most compelling stories in the tradition of someone who had everything and yet wasn't satisfied is King Asoka. He ruled in India about two hundred years after the Buddha's death. He had inherited his kingdom from his grandfather, who was an emperor. Asoka was an extremely warlike king whose aim was to conquer all the surrounding territories.

He had engaged in one particularly bloody battle with a neighboring kingdom and emerged victorious. The day after the battle, he was walking around the battlefield, surveying the terrain he had conquered. He was appalled by the death and carnage and the bloody bodies strewn across the battlefield. This scene led him to reflect on all the greed that had spurred his conquests and how it had left him feeling.

As he stood in the middle of this misery, a Buddhist monk walked across the battlefield. The monk possessed such serenity and radiance, even amidst all the carnage, that the king was completely struck by his presence and taken with his appearance. Asoka said to himself, "How is it that I have everything and I'm miserable, while this monk has nothing and he's so happy, so radiant, so serene?"

At that moment, Asoka converted to Buddhism. In embracing the dharma, he genuinely adopted dharmic principles and attempted to rule his kingdom in accordance with them. He stopped the animal sacrifices, began tolerating all the religions present at that time, supported the sangha of monks and nuns, and ceased making war. He encouraged charity throughout his kingdom—for the people, for religious mendicants. His reign is remembered as one of the golden ages in Indian history, this rule of righteousness by someone who had possessed everything material yet remained miserable.

In Tibetan Buddhism, they teach that impermanence has four inevitable conclusions: The end of accumulating is dispersing. The end of building is destruction. The end of gathering is separation. The end of living is death.

This is, of course, inevitable. The Buddha strongly recommended a daily reflection on the fact of our own death. We have such a pronounced tendency to deny this reality, especially in our culture.

But worldwide, it's a human tendency not to believe in our own death. So one of the monks' reflections, ten daily reflections, goes like this: "I reflect that I am of the nature to die. I have not gone beyond death. I will eventually be parted from all that is dear and beloved to me."

We see this here as we get close to nature, too. Sometimes we see the death of lizards or frogs or insects on the ground. We had a dramatic one a couple of years ago. James and I were teaching here in November, and I happened to be giving the talk one evening at about this time. In the middle of the talk, there was this blood-curdling scream from outside. I didn't know what it was, but everybody in the hall sort of sat bolt upright. What's going on? It sounded like a young child screaming at the top of their lungs. So a couple of the staff people went out to see. After the talk, we went out also to see.

What had happened is a deer had gotten killed. Apparently, it had been attacked by a couple of dogs because they had attacked it at the neck and broken its neck. It was a small deer, not even a year old, just over by Mudita, the third residence hall. By the time we got there, it was already dead. So we did some loving kindness practice for it and tried to ease its passage, if that's possible. These things, of course, happen in nature. Being in the middle of nature, these things happen around us.

We called the SPCA, and they said they would come and take the body away. The caretakers actually dragged it down to the front of the property so the SPCA could take it, but they never came. What was very interesting is that that carcass was down there for the next week. Every day, it looked different. Every day, a little more of it was gone because the vultures and the coyotes would come and eat at it. In about a week, there wasn't much left that was recognizable as a deer. There were some flaps of hide and the bones, but all the flesh had been picked clean by the visitors who feed on that.

It was a really impactful reflection and meditation because it was a reminder of what will happen to our bodies also. That same state is what these bodies will come to at some time in the future. As the Buddha said, the fact of that is for certain, but the time of it is completely unknown. It could be tomorrow. It could be ten, twenty, thirty years from now. But it will happen for all of us.

We encourage this reflection not in order to get depressed or get morbid, but because this reflection can be a real waking up to our limited time period. Our time on this earth is really quite short. Especially as I get older, I notice how quickly each new year goes. I don't have that much time left. So it's an incentive to spend it wisely.

But something else the Buddha said I find very interesting. He said that there are people who fear death. He said someone who fears death does so for one of four reasons: they either have a strong desire for sense pleasures, they have a craving for this body, they have not done good deeds in this life, or they have doubt about the Dharma, about the truth of things.

Conversely, he said, people who don't have those four qualities do not fear death. Those who do not strongly desire sense pleasures, who don't have a craving for the body, who have done good acts, and who have confidence in the Dharma, he said, don't fear death and have no need to fear death.

I take this as an interesting point because in our culture we often think death is something horrible. When we look from a spiritual view, it's a part of life. How could birth be great and death be bad? They're both integral to life. If we think life is OK, that means birth is OK and death is OK.

So we see that life consists of these moments of sense experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought, emotion. Does it really matter if we have one more moment or 100,000 more moments? In any case, death is going to be there at some point.

So we come to meditation as another way to deal with this kind of existential crisis of life. This is a real dilemma. We realize that external things can't ultimately bring happiness. And I think as we come to meditation, most of us—I know I was—are looking for some lasting state of mind that would bring happiness. There must be a way to get a permanent kind of euphoria from this practice, a permanent kind of exhilaration, a permanent up, a permanent high. This was really, when I look back, more my expectation in the beginning than the goal of freedom.

But of course, as we practice, our intention and understanding changes. And we start to see that what really brings happiness of the deepest kind, as Sharda mentioned the other evening, is a purified heart. It's not outer experiences. It's also not a particular inner experience. But when the heart becomes free of the forces of greed, of hatred, and of confusion, then that itself is a happy state, a contented state, a peaceful state.

So we come into the retreat situation, and we come upon this fact of change, this constancy of change, just like in our outside life. Retreat is just a microcosm of that life. Sounds are coming and going. The breath is coming and going. Thoughts arise and persist and pass. And then we start to investigate the change in the body.

This is a really interesting point in practice. We see that the sensations change. Sometimes the body's comfortable, and sometimes it's not. Can you control that? Can you come into a sitting and say, "Body, be comfortable. Body, be free of pain." We really can't, can we? The change is going on, but it's not under our jurisdiction. It's not under our control.

I tried to do this a lot in my early years in practice. It sounds silly, but I did. I spent many, many hours on the cushion trying to make my body comfortable. And you've probably seen that as you generate some awareness, you can loosen up the energy in a part of the body. So if I felt tense or tight, I'd put the attention there and I'd try to loosen up the energies, get it flowing and become unblocked. My ideal was to become unblocked, completely free-flowing sensation.

So I'd spend most of the day becoming unblocked. And I'd have about thirty minutes of this free-flowing sensation. I'd go out to walk. I'd come back. And it all would have contracted up again. So I'd start the process all over, working on unblocking, working to get comfortable in the body. It was a waste of time. It was a waste of time.

I wasn't practicing mindfulness. I was practicing greed and aversion. I don't like the way the body feels now. I want it to feel differently. I'm going to make it happen. I would have been much, much better off if I'd just let the mind settle in some kind of equanimity in relation to the discomfort. The mind has the capacity to bear physical discomfort. Finally, after years, I found that out. I could have saved myself a lot of wrong effort. That's why I'm sharing it with you—if I can spare you some of those hours.

And we start to investigate more closely. We can't control pain. We can't control pleasure. So we look into the nature of sensations more closely. And the question at some point becomes really interesting: Is there anything solid in this whole field of physical experience?

As we get in touch with the actual nature of sensations in the body, despite all the anatomy textbooks we may have seen—we may have seen that you open it up and there's solid stuff in there, there's bones and liver and intestines and spleen and and all that stuff. But apart from all the pictures, as awareness penetrates the body and becomes as intimate as we can with the body, take a look and see. Is it solid? Is there anything solid? You can take a look right now in your experience. Or is there only the quality of flickering, pulsation, vibration, tingling, coming and going, pulsing on and off?

We look at the leg, and it seems like a solid thing. But when we send the awareness there, we can feel just this play, this dance of sensations that's always changing. Somebody today mentioned in an interview that their body had basically gone away during part of the meditation. Couldn't feel the body. The mindfulness was strong. The concentration was strong. The sense of the body just was not there for them. Is it a solid thing? Or is it just flickers of sensing?

We start to investigate the mind, and we see too how changeable all the patterns of mind are. James talked about the different weather patterns that move through. One sitting, we're calm and present. The next sitting, it's very stormy, and we can't settle for more than a few seconds on any object. The next sitting, it might be dull. The next sitting, there might be a lot of happiness.

The Buddha actually said, if you're going to identify with anything, it's much better to identify with the body than the mind, because at least the body stays more constant. He said the mind changes so fast, don't try to make a constancy out of that. No point.

And with the mind states, are they controllable? Can you come in and decide to have a concentrated sitting? Can you come in and decide to be present with the breath for ten minutes? Can you come in and decide to experience joy? Can you come in and decide not to feel restless? The mind also is ungovernable due to this fact of constant change.

One great teaching of this lesson, as Sharda mentioned also, is proximity to nature. Because you see this message carried out again and again in nature. The death of the deer was one example. The changing weather patterns are another example. If you're outside, you're almost always aware of change. Changing sounds, change in the wind or the breeze, change of light and shadow. So the Buddha always advised the meditators to go out, sit at the foot of a tree, sit in a cave, sit in a clearing, in a grove, and feel that change of nature.

I spent the better part of a year in forest monasteries in Thailand, living very close to nature, living out in a very small and not particularly well-insulated hut. And living in that kind of proximity, you really feel this in your bones, how nature's always changing. Sometimes even these beautiful natural settings change due to nature.

I was doing a three-month retreat recently in a little hut in the north of Thailand. And I was right by a beautiful little creek that went down the middle of this canyon. It's at the base of a high canyon with walls on both sides covered with tropical foliage and trees. And it was a very beautiful sound from this little stream.

But I'd committed to go to another monastery and leave the one I was in. And I was really getting settled in, and I thought, this is really a mistake. I shouldn't be leaving such a good situation. The food is good. It's quiet. I have the best hut in the place. The brook is beautiful. The cliffs are fantastic. I got really agitated. I shouldn't be leaving.

And then the rainy season hit. And all of a sudden, my quiet little brook started to fill up with water. And it became this roaring river all day and all night. The sound was deafening.

So my tranquility was taken away due to the change of nature. That itself wouldn't have been so bad, but then the stream started to play an old Bob Dylan song. All I could hear in the sound of the stream was "Subterranean Homesick Blues." And I discovered that I actually remembered every single verse of the song—and I'm going to spare you from the recital of them. But at that point, it was time to go to the other monastery. The conditions had changed.

This teaching of impermanence through nature is a really powerful one. I encourage you sometime in your sitting career to try sitting outside and get that feeling. You can sit outside on a bench, on the ground, eyes closed or eyes open—it doesn't really matter. Connect with your usual meditation object, connect with the breath, and then open your senses to nature and see what comes through, because the teaching is really there.

One of my teachers said a really good way to check if you're in touch with reality is: Can you tune into impermanence in that moment? Are you aware of change in that moment? If you are, then you're in touch with the truth of the moment. You can check that out.

So as we look really deeply with this steady mind that the retreat can bring, we start to see that every aspect of our experience is changing—not just from one sitting to another, but really changing in each moment. Moment after moment, things are arising and passing away. This is one of the most important areas in practice to investigate. Given the kind of stillness and steadiness of attention that you can find here, turn it to investigate in that direction. Start to look at what James mentioned this morning, and I think coming at something Sharda had said: look at the beginnings of things, look at the endings of things. Breath, sounds, thoughts, emotions, body sensations. Start to become aware of that play of life.

One of the forest monasteries where I was staying, the teacher was Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was one of the great Thai masters of the last fifty years. He's now dead. Franz also spent quite a bit of time at that monastery. While I was there, we were lucky that we were able to have teachings every week for one period, one part of the retreat, directly from Ajahn Buddhadasa, who spoke good English. He'd give us a different theme every week and then a new one. One week was our last meeting with him, and he gave us a theme that I think could last probably the rest of our lives.

So here's the teaching that he said to investigate. It's a little complicated, so I want to take a little time, but I hope you'll stay with me.

If we look at a sense like the sense of sight, the Buddha said there are three pieces to seeing. He said the eye has to be working—there has to be a good sense organ. There has to be an object out there for us to see. And there has to be consciousness that can receive that sight. A corpse can't see. Someone who's blind can't see because the sense organ isn't working. A corpse can't see because the factor of consciousness has gone. If it's dark in the room, you can't see because the object isn't illuminated. So sight depends on the organ, the object, and the consciousness. There are these three elements for the sense of seeing.

As people, we have six senses in the Buddhist view: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and the mind is considered the sixth sense—the qualities of thought, emotion, ideas, and so on. So with these six senses and three elements in each sense, there are eighteen different elements. Is that clear so far? Six times three. I know you're slowed down, but I just want to make this clear. Eighteen elements called dhatus. In the Pali, the term is dhatu.

So Ajahn Buddhadasa said for each of these elements, every time you contact it, investigate five things about it: its arising, its passing, its pleasure or potential for pleasure, its potential for suffering, and how to be free in relation to it—the possibility of freedom in relation to it. So the arising, the passing, potential for pleasure, potential for suffering, and potential for freedom. Eighteen times five is ninety.

So we essentially have ninety different ways to investigate impermanence and, within impermanence, the possibility of suffering or freedom in relation to each of them. This is a practice that could occupy you for the rest of the retreat, probably for a lot longer than that. You don't have to take it on, but I mention it as one of the possibilities—to see impermanence on that steady or constant level with every aspect of our experience.

So we start to see that nothing in our experience is exempt from this process of arising and passing moment by moment. And we start to see that there's nothing really fixed in this whole world. Everything is coming and going, every part of our experience.

When we first start to get a sense for this, this can feel a little unsettling. It's a little bit like the rug's been pulled out from under us, because we like security, we like constancy. So is this a good thing or a bad thing, this impermanence?

One of our friends is married to another practitioner, and they had a daughter who's one of these precocious, beautiful Dharma kids. When she got to be about fourteen, she'd been hanging out around Dharma language for a long time. And one day she came to her mother and she said, "Mom, is dukkha good or bad?" We could say the same thing about impermanence. Is it good or bad? Or maybe it doesn't fall in those categories.

In relation to the hindrances, impermanence is pretty wonderful, isn't it? Do you notice that when greed comes, it doesn't stay? When anger comes, it doesn't stay? When fear comes, it doesn't stay? When sadness comes, it doesn't stay? None of the emotions last, and that's really why we can feel them. That's why it's safe to open to any state of mind. There is ultimately no harm in any state of mind if we meet it with mindfulness, because none of them will stick around.

I want to read this passage from Rainer Maria Rilke from a poem in a really lovely book called The Book of Hours, recently translated by Joanna Macy and Anita Barrows, who are both Buddhists. And in this poem, Rilke was going through a very Christian phase. He'd been to Russia and visited a lot of churches that inspired him. A lot of these poems are written to God. In fact, it's subtitled Love Poems to God. So in this one, he imagines that God is making the human being and then giving advice before sending the human being out into life. So that's the setting for the poem.

"God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You'll know it by its seriousness. Now, give me your hand."

Let yourself feel everything, the beauty and the terror. No feeling is final. Impermanence is our safety net, an opening to any experience that comes.

But there's another side to it. This is a difficult truth to take in because we have a really deep longing for security. All forms of life have a very deep longing to be secure. All the phrases that we say in the metta practice apply to all living things. We want to be safe. We want to have mental happiness. We want to have physical happiness. We want to live with ease. This deep longing for security can't be found in the middle of impermanent things.

This insight cannot be found from impermanent things. Anything we grasp from that deep longing for security is bound to change, and as it changes, we suffer. This brings us to the second fundamental characteristic of existence that the Buddha called dukkha. While usually translated as suffering, dukkha encompasses a broader range of meaning—it includes suffering, but also unsatisfactoriness and unreliability. Because things are constantly changing, they simply cannot be relied upon. This is not that kind of world.

The nature of our world was beautifully described by the Buddha in a dialogue with Ananda, and to fully appreciate this teaching, it helps to understand the wordplay in the Pali language. When Ananda, the Buddha's cousin and attendant, asked what he meant by "the world," the Buddha replied with elegant simplicity. The Pali term for world is "loka," and the Buddha answered, "It disintegrates. Therefore, it's called the world." The word for disintegrate is "paloka." Why is it called loka? Because it palokas. This is why it's called the world.

The world disintegrates moment after moment. This is the very nature of reality. We yearn for something solid to grasp, but such solidity doesn't exist over long periods of time—it doesn't even exist from moment to moment. This is where your meditation practice can reveal truths that no amount of conceptual reflection can uncover. When you have the direct experience of every aspect of phenomena arising and passing away, you can no longer believe in that kind of solidity, a solidity that extends beyond a single moment.

The Buddha offered a vivid metaphor for our struggle in this disintegrating world. He said that trying to hold on in such a world is like someone being swept down a river with a swift current. As the person is carried along, they keep reaching out desperately for something on the bank to grasp, something to stop the flow downstream. But all they find are grasses. They grab one type of grass and it's simply pulled out of the bank, leaving them to be swept along. They reach for another kind and grab it, but it too is uprooted from the bank, and they continue downstream. This is the image of beings struggling within the river of change, seeking something concrete to stabilize them.

The Buddha described three different kinds of suffering that range from the more gross to the increasingly subtle. James and I, along with some friends, attended teachings about a year ago with the Dalai Lama in Mountain View. Some of you may have been at those sessions at Shoreline Amphitheater. It was like a dharma festival—absolutely magnificent. The Dalai Lama was on a large stage in this concert setting, and behind the stage, where you'd normally see racks of amplifiers and speakers, was painted an enormous mural of the Potala Palace in Lhasa, his former home, rendered in beautiful twilight light as though it were late afternoon.

Sharing the stage with him were about one hundred and fifty monks and nuns from all three traditions. Tibetans sat on one side—a whole sea of red robes—while on the other side were Theravadan, Korean, and other Zen monastics. The sight was simply delightful. It was sunny, with something like six thousand people in attendance. I thought to myself, "Well, I didn't get to go to Woodstock, but this might be even better." We basked in that dharma glow for three days.

The Dalai Lama explained a text on emptiness, and as he spoke about the world's nature of dissolving, he said—being a bodhisattva who encourages the bodhisattva path—"If you really want to help beings emerge from their suffering, you must understand all the ways in which they suffer, from the gross to the subtle."

He explained these three levels of suffering that the Buddha also taught. The first is called "the suffering of pain"—dukkha dukkha in Pali, like a double shot of suffering. This refers to unpleasant experiences in mind and body: when the body aches, when we're sick, when the mind experiences difficult states.

When we experience sadness and grief and longing and fear, this is straight dukkha.

The second kind is called viparinama dukkha, and it's translated as the suffering of alternation. This means that if we are enjoying something pleasant—because if it's conditional, if it's a phenomenon of the six senses, and it changes, which it will in time—if we're holding on, we experience pain in its loss at that time of change. This is the pain of alternation. The pleasant will eventually turn into unpleasant, and when that happens, it hurts.

Ajahn Chah talked often about these two kinds of pain. He said it's like if you grab a snake—either end is problematic. If you grab its head, it can bite you, and that's dukkha dukkha. You're directly bitten and hurt. If you grab it by the tail, the other end, and you're holding on tight, the head will swing around and bite you. And that's the pain of clinging to the pleasant. Either way, eventually, one gets bitten if you're holding on.

The third is called sankhara dukkha, and this means the suffering—or you could really say the unsatisfactoriness—of conditioned formations. This is the sense in which we can't take hold of anything, we can't find security because of the dissolving nature of all our experience. Everything that is conditioned, everything that arises based on prior conditions—this means anything in the senses—has this disillusioning quality to it. And as we try to find our security in the middle of it, we can't. And yet as human beings we have a deep longing for security. All of us do. So this is our situation. This is our dilemma. We see there's no way to guarantee a lasting kind of happiness by holding on to what is going to change.

This is from Suzuki Roshi: "Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure. But unfortunately, although it is true, it is difficult for us to accept it. Because we cannot accept the truth of transience, we suffer. So the cause of suffering is our non-acceptance of this truth. The teaching of the cause of suffering and the teaching that everything changes are two sides of one coin. Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure."

The corollary is that if we can accept the fact that everything changes, there's the possibility of finding perfect composure. This is a really interesting statement to me. Although the world is unstable, there is the possibility of finding composure within it. What's the key? Where does the avenue lie to that?

And to look at this, I want to talk a little bit about the third characteristic, which is the teaching of not-self, or in Pali the term is anatta. In many ways, this is the central question in meditation: Who am I? Or what am I?

Stephen and Martine Batchelor were just here. I don't know if any of you got a chance to listen to them. Martine spent ten years in a Korean Zen monastery where the meditation technique was to sit down, watch the breath in, watch the breath out, and ask the question, "What is this?" Watch the breath in, watch the breath out, ask the question, "What is this?" For ten years. This is the same question. Who am I? What am I? What is this? It's all the same question.

So as human beings, we have a sense of a self. And in our current situation, most of our life revolves around it. Most of our activities and thoughts and plans and hopes and dreams and worries revolve around this self. It's where we put most of our energy. But what's curious is that we generally haven't taken a very close look at it.

And so I wonder if in your meditation you've ever tried to find this I. Where is this I located? Have you ever looked?

Where is this I? The Dalai Lama said that if you just think about it, it seems obvious that there is an I. Who would question it? It's the most self-evident fact of life. Obviously there's an I. But when you look closely, you can't find the thing. Is it in the head? Is it behind the eyes? Is it somewhere in the middle of the heart? William James, the Western philosopher, said when he looked for the location of the I, the closest he could get was a little tickle in the back of his throat. That's as close as anyone can get, probably. Our concept of I hasn't been examined, and if it's examined, it doesn't stand up very well.

Let me ask you two simple questions—they're not trick questions. How tall are you? And what color are your eyes? Is everybody able to answer those? Pretty simple, right?

I would say I am 5 feet 10 inches tall. Now when I stop to think about that, I really have to wonder, is that an accurate representation of I? Are my thoughts 5 feet 10 inches tall? Is my metta 5 feet 10 inches tall? Are my other emotions 5 feet 10 inches tall? We really mean the body, don't we? Here, when we say I, we mean the body. So we're saying I am the body.

Now I asked, what color are your eyes? I would say my eyes are brown. Well, this is curious. Now I'm not the body. I'm the person who owns the body. These are my eyes. Oh, really? Who? My. I own these eyes. They're mine. Well, that doesn't fit. A moment before we were the body and now we're the owner of the body who's standing separate from it.

You could do the same thing with the mind. You could say at one point, I am happy, and then we are the mind. We are the state of happiness. The next moment you talk about my sadness, my grief, my longing. And then we're the owner of the emotion who stands separate from it.

Maybe even more fundamental, after we get past those two, there's a sense that we are an observer and it's almost like we live behind our eyes and we look out at the world through those eyes, taking in all the experience, and it's all happening to me who am located somewhere inside here. This doesn't hang together. It really doesn't make sense.

The more you investigate the sense of I—which is encouraged, the delusion is encouraged through our language—the more you'll see it doesn't make sense.

I want to ask another question to explore this. Does the sense of I ever come up by itself? Take a look in your practice and see. Or does it only come up in relationship to something that's happening at one of the sense doors? For instance, we notice that there's a pain here in the knee, and we might think then, I have a pain, or there's a pain in my knee. The I is forming in relationship to an experience of a bodily sensation. We might look out and see a baby deer. The deer doesn't really involve us, but very often we'll think to ourselves, I see the deer.

So we create an owner of the sight or an agent of the seeing in relationship to that sight. Maybe that's the only place the "I" comes from—connecting with an experience.

Take a look and see if you can feel this self emerging. And if you can, what's happening? What's the feeling in the body of that formation? See if there's a kind of sense energetically of a contraction around the emergence of that "I"—a kind of solidification and narrowing down around the sense of self.

This "I" limits us. We construct a kind of constant, ongoing entity that maybe doesn't really exist, not in that ongoing way. We have the feeling—obviously we have the feeling there's an "I"—but when we look for it, it gets more and more elusive.

There's a sutta of the Buddha's called the Bahiya Sutta, and he was asked to give his pith instructions to someone who came for teaching. And he said, "I'll tell you in a nutshell: In the seeing, let there be just the seen. In the hearing, let there be just the heard. In the sensing, let there be just the sensed. In the cognizing, let there be just the cognized. This—just this—is the end of suffering."

What's missing in this formulation is the seer, the hearer, the sensor, the cognizer. Experiment with this in your practice. Can there be a moment of experience where there is only the seeing, no one claiming it? Only the hearing, no one claiming it? And see if in a moment of that kind of pure perception, there isn't a quality of expansiveness, of peace—in fact, of freedom. The "I"-making experience narrows our experience, contracts us over and over and over again.

And it also builds up this quality, which is really the heart of the problem: self-cherishing. We become so fixated on my wants and needs and hopes and plans and fears and schemes and worries that we lose touch with the situation for the rest of the world. As we undo this contraction and open up to this spacious awareness that we really are, that we deeply are, as the knot of "I" starts to unravel just a little bit, we have the space to connect with the rest of the world's situation.

And we see everybody is in the same boat. Every human being is dealing with this problem of a longing for security where it's not to be found. And we can tune in on all those levels of insecurity that everyone faces. And when we see that clearly, there's really only one response, and that's compassion.

So this process of looking into the nature of the "I" is not just an intellectual exercise. It's not just a Buddhist mind game that philosophers play because they got tired of counting the number of angels on the head of a pin. It is to undo our self-centeredness and open in compassion to the rest of life. And I think this is really strongly supported with the practice of the Brahmaviharas—of metta and the other divine abidings.

As we open in this expansive way, we start to see that what we most deeply are is this awareness. This awareness that holds all the comings and goings, all the changing phenomena called the dhammas—things, phenomena, appearances—all the comings and goings of the momentary flashings into existence and passing out of existence are held within this vast spaciousness.

But curiously, this vastness of mind doesn't seem to come and go. Do you notice how it's always there—always illuminating, always functioning? This seems to be more of a constant in our experience. It seems to be the nature, really, of who we are.

As we shift our ground of being from grasping the particulars and let it expand into this vast awareness that holds all of life, out of which compassion flowers, we find the possibility of not clinging. We find the possibility of not generating that restriction of "I." And of course, we will continue many, many, many more times to grasp and form that "I." But we've seen the possibility. We've seen the doorway to freedom through letting go of what changes.

I just want to close with a quotation from Ajahn Mahabua, who's a master in the Thai Forest tradition, a dharma brother of Ajahn Chah, who put it this way: "There's no escaping this truth. Whatever arises has to vanish. Whatever is true, whatever is a natural principle in and of itself, won't vanish. In other words, the pure mind of awareness won't vanish. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind. All that remains is simple awareness, utterly pure."

So let's just sit for a minute together. This vanishes, that vanishes, but that which knows they're vanishing doesn't vanish. This is what's called the pure mind.

Transcendent Dependent Origination

In this inspiring retreat talk, Guy Armstrong presents the Buddha's teaching on transcendent dependent origination (lokuttara-paṭiccasamuppāda) from the Upanisa Sutta (SN 12.23), sometimes called the "radiant wheel" or "wheel of awakening." Unlike the traditional twelve-link chain that traces suffering's arising from ignorance, this positive formulation shows the path from suffering to liberation through twelve uplifting stages: suffering, faith (saddhā), joy (pāmojja), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi), knowing and seeing things as they are, disenchantment (nibbidā), dispassion (virāga), liberation (vimutti), and knowledge of the destruction of the taints.

Armstrong skillfully weaves together personal stories—including powerful accounts from teaching meditation in juvenile detention and Ajahn Chah's transformative encounter with fear at a charnel ground—to illustrate how suffering can become the catalyst for spiritual awakening when met with awareness and genuine teachings. He emphasizes that joy and happiness are not merely byproducts but essential factors in the path to freedom, explaining how each stage naturally conditions the next in an organic unfolding toward liberation.

This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners a refreshing perspective on Buddhist practice, showing how the cultivation of positive mental factors like joy, tranquility, and concentration creates the foundation for liberating insight. Armstrong's accessible presentation makes profound Dharma principles immediately relevant to meditation practice and daily life.

The subject of tonight's talk is transcendent dependent origination. Having said that, I must admit that's the hardest part about the talk—it's all easy from here on.

First, I wanted to check in with you all as this is the last night of the retreat. Does it feel a little different than the first night of the retreat? Have you gone through some change in these seven days? Are you feeling happy? Ready to go home? A little mixed? Yes, I can see it's a little mixed.

In tonight's talk, I want to discuss the development and role of happiness and joy in the practice. One of the Buddha's most famous teachings is called Dependent Origination, in which he traces the arising of suffering based on ignorance through a chain of twelve links. At its heart lies the arising of craving and clinging as the main causative factors in suffering. This teaching shows the way to freedom by the undoing of those twelve links, beginning with the undoing of ignorance and leading to the undoing of suffering.

The teaching I want to explore this evening is another chain, also in twelve links, but one where the Buddha describes the journey to liberation in positive terms. I find this a really inspiring way to look at the practice because it frames everything in terms that I personally find truly uplifting.

This sequence is based on a discourse that appears in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Upanisa Sutta. It's sometimes called the radiant wheel because of its uplifting quality, and sometimes called the wheel of awakening. The commentaries call it transcendent because it describes the journey that transcends suffering, that overcomes suffering.

I can't resist slipping in a riddle at this point: Why did the yogi refuse novocaine? Because they wanted to transcend dental medication. Yes, it's bad—that's the low point of the talk, no more like that.

This chain begins where the other one left off. While the traditional Dependent Origination traces the journey from ignorance to suffering, this one starts at suffering and traces the journey to liberation. Let me first mention the twelve links, then we'll go through them in more detail.

It's said that suffering leads to faith, and faith leads to joy, which leads to rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, knowing and seeing things as they are, disenchantment, dispassion, liberation, and knowledge of the extinction of the taints. This is the sequence I'd like to explore this evening.

The first two links state that suffering is the cause for the arising of faith. This is quite surprising when you stop to think about it, because when we look out into the world, there's a lot of suffering going on, yet not a lot of liberation happening. Somewhere this chain isn't getting completed in normal life.

Generally, suffering conditions deeper ignorance. Suffering usually causes us to respond with more craving, with more greed and aversion, and this thickens the sense of self, which prevents us from seeing the way things really are. The Buddha said that suffering has one of two outcomes: it results either in bewilderment—we could say confusion—or in search.

So here, if suffering is going to lead to faith, something is running counter to the tendencies of samsara, of the pain of cyclic existence that governs most of the world. This tradition teaches that there are two conditions for suffering to turn into faith. First, there must be an awareness that we're suffering, so that we're no longer in denial about this basic fact. Second, we must hear true teachings—teachings that truly have the power to liberate that suffering.

When I look back into my own life and the way I came into practice, I can really relate to this teaching that suffering is the cause for the arising of faith. At a certain point in my life, I went through a very unhappy period and was strongly motivated to find an answer to it. I was strongly motivated toward that search. In a way, the suffering becomes like the sand, the friction in the oyster that by rubbing over and over again creates the pearl. This is one of the ways that suffering can work in a spiritual life. We become truly open to looking at things in a new way when we're suffering, in a way that we're not when we're just gliding along complacently.

This really came home to me a few years ago when a friend and I received an invitation from the juvenile hall in San Mateo to teach meditation to a group of young people who were incarcerated there. We accepted and went into the maximum security wing of the building.

For those unfamiliar with this feature of our justice system, juvenile hall is where young people under eighteen who have been arrested for crimes are held before trial. In the maximum security wing, there were fifteen-, sixteen-, and seventeen-year-old young men who had been arrested for serious offenses—murder, attempted murder, armed robbery, assault—but had not yet appeared before a judge or gone to trial.

They were locked in their cells for most of the day—probably eighteen hours—with only some common time in the shared room. You can imagine the fear and insecurity they carried about their lives. They didn't know whether, in the coming months when they went to trial, they would be imprisoned for years, perhaps for the majority of their remaining lives. Being sixteen or seventeen years old, they had no tools to cope with this situation of fear and uncertainty.

In the common room where they spent their waking hours, they were surrounded by others who had experienced difficult upbringings. The atmosphere was violent and angry—there wasn't a great deal of loving-kindness, that's for sure. Then they would return from that environment to be locked in their cells, bouncing off the walls with all the emotions, uncertainty, and insecurity churning inside them.

We came into this setting to share some meditation tools, having no idea whether they would be relevant. We knew nobody who had tried this before, and we had no inside experience of what these young people were going through. It was probably the most nervous I've ever been teaching—I had no idea if this would connect. I felt like a fool several times, but that was okay.

We thought we'd better not call it meditation, and especially not Buddhism, because that would seem too soft. These young men weren't going to show up for that kind of class. So we billed it as "mind power"—something they could relate to. "Come and get some training in mind power."

We started teaching them the same techniques we've been exploring this week: beginning with the breath, opening to body sensations. But here's where it got interesting, and where we ended up spending most of our time—teaching them how to deal with their fear and anger. We gave the same instructions we've given here: go ahead and feel it in the body, don't try to do anything with it or make it go away, but simply let yourself experience it. See that it's just another emotion, that you can be with it, that it will come and then go.

Some of these young men turned out to be among the most motivated meditators I've encountered, because they desperately needed a way to work with what was happening inside them. Nobody had given them any tools for this. From that dire situation, some really took these practices to heart and worked diligently during all those hours lying on their bunks. They would return each week to share their experiences.

I remember one young man talking about using the breath to help him fall asleep. I asked him to investigate and report back: "Do you fall asleep on an in-breath or an out-breath?" The following week, when I asked what he'd discovered, he said, "I haven't figured it out yet, but I'm going to keep looking."

That was beautiful—seeing how, when we're in difficulty, we can dig deeply within ourselves and find strength we didn't know we possessed. This is something we hear in interviews every day. People say things like, "I was able to be still and accepting with strong physical pain," or "I watched an emotion arise without feeling so attached to it—I could observe its coming and going."

Sometimes when we're pressed to our limits, we discover something new, or something new emerges through us from that very friction of suffering. This is why we don't hesitate to place you in a fairly rigorous schedule here. I know for those new to retreat, sitting still for forty-five minutes hour after hour, with only walking meditation in between, is demanding. But the difficulty this brings up becomes the sand in the oyster that creates the pearl of wisdom.

Sometimes practice brings us to an extremity of suffering where something genuinely new breaks through. I want to share a story from the life of Ajahn Chah that illustrates this. Ajahn Chah was one of Thailand's great masters of the past fifty years. He died about ten years ago and was Jack Kornfield's first teacher.

When he was a young monk progressing in meditation, he felt he needed to face his deepest fears. In Thai culture, there's considerable fear of ghosts. When someone has recently died, people feel nervous about being near the body because the spirit is believed to wander for a while, and these spirits can be mischievous if not outright malicious. There's a general cultural anxiety about this, and Ajahn Chah acknowledged having this fear as well.

Deciding to confront it directly, he chose to meditate by a charnel ground. In Thai villages of that time, most people were cremated, as they still are today. There was a particular area near his village where bodies were burned. Knowing there would be a cremation on a certain day, he decided to arrive at dusk and sit all night beside the funeral pyre.

He arrived as the sun was setting. The body burned that day was a small child. The fire was dying down as he took his seat near the pyre. As he began to sit, fear arose. He thought, "Well, this is what I came for."

I'm not going to run away now. So he just kept sitting. And the fear was strong for him. But his determination was also strong, and so he just sat through the night, and he made it. No real problem. He came to the morning, and he said, "Time for my alms round." He collected his food, took some rest during the day, and he thought, "Well, that wasn't so bad. I think I'll do it again tonight."

And so he went to the charnel ground again that evening, but on this day, an adult man had been cremated. And that's a little scarier because the spirit is thought to be a little stronger. So he took his seat. The pyre was still burning. And the body hadn't been completely consumed at that point. So he took his seat with his back to the fire. It was dusk, getting dark. And as he sat and began his meditation, he could hear the flames licking and the sizzling of the body as it was still burning behind him.

And he said, then the fear really started to come. It was dark. And he knew that the body was very freshly burned. He said as he sat there, he started to get very afraid, more afraid than the night before. But he was determined. He just sat. As he was sitting with his eyes closed, from the direction of the pyre, he started to hear footsteps crinkling on the leaves, one after another, moving in his direction. Hadn't heard anybody approach. Just heard these footsteps.

So he resolved he was not going to open his eyes. The footsteps came closer and closer and they started to walk around him. And they walked around and stopped right in front of him. And he said at that point the fear was just rising all the time, every moment, just getting bigger and bigger. And when they stopped in front of him, he said the fear filled his whole body. It was just like somebody had poured a pitcher of water into a vessel and the fear was filling every corner of his body. He'd never been so afraid in his life.

And he sat there just scared out of his mind. He said, "I didn't even have the wits to meditate anymore. I couldn't think. I couldn't think what to do in meditation. All I could do was remain sitting there and be full of this intense fear." And finally, the idea came into his mind: what's the worst thing that could happen? And he thought, "The worst thing that could happen is I could die right here tonight." And he thought, "Well, I have to die someday. I might as well die meditating. It's a better way to go than almost anything else. If I have to die, I have to die."

And in that moment of accepting the worst that could happen, he said all this intense fear energy that was filling his body just in one second turned into bliss. His body was just full of this strong, blissful energy. And he said at that point, it just filled him up, and he sat through the night with no problem at all. Just in one moment, that changed. And then his body felt light, obviously still energized. And at that point, the footsteps just walked away. And he never did open his eyes. He never did find out what they were from.

But he sat through the night, and he said later, looking back on that point in his practice, that he really felt he had turned a major corner in his practice because he had faced his strongest fear and it had transformed for him. He said he was never really bothered by fear again after that.

So sometimes even the things that sound like the worst experience we could have in practice turn out to be the moments of greatest understanding and in a way greatest freedom. And so we shouldn't necessarily hold ourselves back from going up against something that is very scary or very difficult to feel. But often a strength comes through that we didn't know we had. And it's that kind of understanding, that kind of insight that leads to the second link, which is faith.

The Pali term is saddha. The etymology of the term is "to place one's heart upon." So faith in Buddhism is not about subscribing to a series of beliefs—"I believe X, Y, and Z, therefore I have faith." Rather, faith is truly a heartfelt quality. A synonym for it is trust. Another synonym is confidence. So it's really looking inside your own heart and seeing what you trust in life. What can you place your heart upon that you feel can support you, can help you?

Traditionally in Buddhism, it's said that one feels this faith toward the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. But I think rather than accepting some rote formula, it's more important to feel the growth of trust in yourself—the kind of trust that lets you open in a moment of full awareness and presence without holding anything back. We resonate with the teachings to the extent that we think, "Yes, that sounds true." We hear the teachings and something in us recognizes their validity. Once we put the teachings into practice, we carry them out and see that they work. We see that they have the potential of freeing us from some of our suffering. On that experience, faith is built.

So faith really grows from experience, from taking the teachings, applying them, and testing them. And then we start to have a faith that we can walk the path, that we can do this ourselves—that this is not just about the Buddha, not just about other people, but really about us, that we have the potential to walk the path that frees us from suffering.

So we make an effort, and you all have made tremendous effort over this week. It's been beautiful to see. And in that effort, even though there's been much difficulty, we come to discover that along this path of awakening, there's really a great deal of joy, too. And this is the third link—the link of joy or gladness.

It's incredibly helpful, as Christina was pointing to in a talk the other night, to recognize these moments of joy and to cultivate this as part of your path and part of your life. We hear much in the Dharma about dukkha, dukkha, dukkha—about the suffering side of life. Sometimes we don't talk as much about the joyful side. One of the things I appreciate about this particular discourse is that it really shows how central joy and happiness are in the path. It's integral. It's necessary. And it can be developed.

Basically, we develop it like we develop mindfulness—by tuning in to it when it's there, appreciating it when it's there, really letting ourselves feel the joy that comes. When we turn the mind in this way, it helps support us. It brings about a cheerfulness because we keep inclining the mind toward that beautiful quality, that beautiful possibility.

The Buddha said that a practitioner is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm himself with suffering. I don't know if you've ever felt at times that you were overwhelming yourself with suffering, but it's not a recommended part of the procedure. So we tune into joy where we can, where we find it.

On retreat, we notice that it's in the simple pleasures—waking up and having a warm shower, coming into the dining hall and finding a beautiful meal before us, the simple pleasure of when you're tired, just being able to rest your body for sleep at night. All these simple pleasures we can tune into every day. Some of these simple pleasures, because we become so sensitive on retreat, become really heightened.

I remember times in the early days on retreat when what we had for evening tea was a cup of herbal tea, about five peanuts—they were rationed—and a piece of fruit. But I have to say that an orange and a cup of herbal tea tasted much better than many expensive restaurant meals I've had. It was like gourmet dining, just that piece of fruit and the tea.

The Buddha mentioned something like this too. He said that robes, alms food, and a small hut will seem rich and luxurious to one who has renounced, because the senses become so alive.

In a setting like this, there's also the joy of nature, and we can open to that almost any time. Seeing the sun for the first time in about three days brings such joy. It reminds me of one of the periods when I was practicing in Thailand. I'd recently been ordained as a monk and first went up to practice in a really small monastery in the north of Thailand, outside of Chiang Mai—about forty miles outside of Chiang Mai. This monastery was like a little gem, tucked down at the bottom of a deep canyon, with a river that ran through the middle of it.

The monastery was truly remarkable in its equality—the only place I encountered in Thailand where facilities for men and women were genuinely equitable. The nuns' kutis, or huts, were situated on one side of the creek, while the monks' quarters occupied the other, both provided with excellent amenities.

With their characteristic hospitality toward foreigners, the Thai community graciously offered me the finest hut in the entire monastery—the one positioned furthest up the canyon. From this secluded perch, I couldn't see any other dwellings, creating an atmosphere of complete privacy and seclusion that proved ideal for meditation practice.

The natural setting was breathtaking. We were nestled at the base of a steep canyon with walls rising dramatically on both sides. The sun would appear relatively early each day but would also set early, creating a rhythm of light and shadow. A river flowed constantly beside my dwelling, offering me the choice of sitting outside by the water or retreating indoors to escape the mosquitoes. It was an extraordinarily beautiful environment for practice.

Yet simultaneously, this period marked a challenging phase in my spiritual journey. Having recently ordained, I was still adjusting to monastic life, learning to embody the role of a new monk. For three months, I practiced under a teacher who spoke no English while I knew no Thai. This meant not only the absence of evening dharma talks, but no interviews whatsoever.

My interactions with the ajahn were minimal and rather amusing. He would occasionally bring visitors to observe the foreign monk in meditation. They would peer through my screen windows, and fortunately, I was always engaged in practice. I could hear the ajahn exclaiming, "Oh, di, di!"—"good, good"—indicating to his guests that I was indeed practicing diligently. Then they would depart, and I wouldn't see them for another week or so.

This situation demanded tremendous self-reliance. I experienced periods of profound loneliness and considerable physical discomfort during meditation. The isolation was palpable—there was no other Western practitioner with whom I could discuss my practice or share the challenges I was facing.

Despite these difficulties, I look back on that time with deep fondness because I felt profoundly sustained by the natural beauty surrounding me. The river, the rocks, the magnificent canyon itself provided such supportive energy that it literally kept me going through the challenging moments.

One particular memory remains vivid: a large mango tree grew directly outside my kuti. Each morning I would walk beneath its branches to breakfast and return the same way. It happened to be mango season, so ripe fruit was constantly falling to the ground, splitting open and releasing the most intoxicating fragrance as I passed. Unfortunately, monastic rules prevented me from collecting even fallen fruit—we may only accept food offered directly from another person's hands. All I could do was inhale that delicious aroma. It was a kind of exquisite frustration.

Opening to the beauty of the natural world provides tremendous support for our practice. There is profound joy and retreat available in the peace, stillness, and concentration that meditation offers. Someone mentioned in an interview recently, "I don't think my mind has ever been this quiet before in my life." This resonates deeply with my own experience.

When I reflect on those early years, I realize how delicious it was to experience such mental quietude, to touch that profound stillness. In many ways, this is what drew me back to meditation retreats repeatedly. I would think, "If the mind can become this still, how much deeper can this stillness go? What else becomes possible within this silence?"

The silence does continue to deepen, and insights continue to blossom from that stillness like flowers emerging from fertile ground.

There is also genuine joy in encountering truth, even when that truth proves difficult to accept—as it often does in retreat practice. Our colleague Ruth Dennison, a deeply respected teacher of German origin, had a wonderfully direct way of expressing this: "You know, darling, self-knowledge is never good news."

This observation rings true. Self-knowledge rarely arrives as pleasant news. Even our insights can be challenging to accept, sometimes difficult to fully absorb. We might recognize deeply conditioned patterns of inadequacy, fear, loneliness, or the desperate need for approval that have perhaps driven much of our lives. These realizations can be quite hard to bear.

Yet if you look closely, you'll discover there is genuine delight even in seeing these difficult patterns. In the very act of witnessing them clearly, we recognize the possibility of liberation. There emerges the potential for freedom from these habitual ways of being, opening us to entirely different ways of living. Even within the most challenging insights lies this seed of transformation and hope.

Joy is really intrinsic to the nature of things—intrinsic to our own life, as Christina mentioned, and intrinsic in existence itself. You can feel this in nature, just opening up to the lushness of this midsummer growth in Massachusetts, the play of sunlight on the leaves in the late afternoon. You can feel the delight in all of that.

Hinduism has this expression they use to refer to the nature of reality: Sat Chit Ananda—being, consciousness, bliss. These are understood as the three aspects of reality. And you can tune into this any time you want to open your eyes to it. I often use the play of light to tune into that—the radiance of life outside or the reflections of light inside. It reminds me of the sparkle of that bliss in existence. When the mind gets relaxed and you can start to tune into this, the amount of joy in a moment can be huge, really huge.

This is from Thomas Merton: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fountain of action and of joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created beings." It's really always there.

This quality of joy then intensifies into the next link in the chain, which is called rapture. The Pali for this is pīti. The understanding of rapture is that it's the intensification of joy as we bring it into our meditation subject. So we take that gladness and delight that we feel perhaps externally, and we find a way to activate it or transfer it into the domain of meditation.

Rapture is really about an interest and delight in what we're experiencing. In this way, a good synonym for it is rapt attention. So subjects like the breath at times become really fascinating and delightful. The level of detail that we start to find in taking a step in walking meditation becomes a real subject of interest and joy for us. Another good synonym for this kind of rapture is joyful interest—when you find that your mind is delighted in the process of being with your experience, being closely with it, experiencing it intimately.

The quality of rapture is highly thought of in the teachings. It's one of the jhanic factors associated with strong concentration, and it's also one of the seven factors of enlightenment. This particular quality is a factor of mind, but it's often accompanied by a lot of bodily energy. So it's said that rapture has physical manifestations like goosebumps, jolts of energy, uplifting energy, where the body starts to feel very light. And it's said the intensification of this can lead to levitation. So beware—you might find yourself bouncing around the room.

We often first notice this quality in a heightened sense of physical energy. The physical energy can come up really strongly in rapture and actually be quite turbulent. It seems like we might be going backwards in the meditation, but when the factor of rapture in the mind is there, it's not the case. It's a new deepening process.

But this rapture, because it has at times a turbulent quality, can be softened, can be mellowed. And that's done through the next step in the chain, which is tranquility. As the rapture intensifies in the mind, the mind's delight tends to start calming down the bodily energy. So the experience of tranquility comes in. You could also call it relaxation or ease or serenity. And that starts to bring a calmness also in the body. What this allows us to do is really settle into the moment in an easy way, in a calm and relaxed way.

That then leads to the next factor on the path, which is often translated as happiness. The Pali word for this is sukha. I like this Pali word because it sounds like the same root as sugar. In French, sugar is sucre, which sounds a lot like sukha. And sukha has this kind of sweetness to it—it's like a very sweet state of mind. It is also one of the jhanic factors, one of the strong factors of concentration.

When the Buddha put his teachings together, he talked a lot about suffering and the end of suffering. But you know, this could all be expressed in a little different way. In California, for instance, talking a lot about suffering doesn't go down so well. Because the response is: "California, suffering? Suffering? Dude, I'm out of here."

I'm going to go surf today.

So, in California, rather than talking about the first noble truth being the truth of suffering, I think if the Buddha were alive today, he might say something like, "Well, the first noble truth is there are many opportunities for growth in life." Something like that. And the third noble truth—a Californian would never describe it as the end of suffering. They'd describe it as the development of happiness.

This is actually not too bad. When suffering goes away, obviously what's in its place is happiness. And you may have noticed that the Dalai Lama's most popular book so far was called The Art of Happiness. It was on the bestseller list in the Bay Area for over a year. If it had been titled The End of Suffering, I don't think it would have gotten there.

So happiness really is the outgrowth of the path. It's intended to be the outgrowth of the path. In this way of looking, it's a deeper kind of flowering than the gladness—the kind of momentary gladness that arises with conditions of nature or inner discovery. It's considered to be more stable, and so maybe a more accurate term for it is contentment. It has qualities of acceptance and peace.

There's a real settledness in this kind of happiness because it's joy that's been intensified to rapture but then mellowed out through tranquility. So it's a fuller kind of blooming. We could say that the momentary arisings of joy depend on some condition to be triggered, but happiness doesn't. This kind of happiness doesn't depend on external conditions. It becomes a more stable quality of heart and mind. But it's still impermanent. It's not completely stable, but it's a little more stable.

I think part of the happiness is the quality of coming home—that feeling of arriving in the present moment, feeling integrated, feeling balanced, and really being fully present, being able to have our whole heart and mind in touch with the present moment. I often feel if I could just always live with that attitude of fullness of heart and mind, anything could happen and life would be okay. I could meet anything in life from that kind of place.

This reminds me of a poem from Rumi. When Rumi says "you" in a poem, he usually means the divine, whatever form that means to you. But in this, I think of that basic sanity as another way that this "you" could be understood—this basic centeredness and wholeheartedness.

"Come to the orchard in spring. There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers. If you do not come, these do not matter. If you do come, these do not matter."

We find ourselves back with ourselves, really connected with ourselves in a deep way through this kind of stability. I think it's one of the most satisfying aspects of dharma practice.

Sometimes we misunderstand happiness and think that in order to be happy, we have to make it permanent. But happiness can't be secured into the future. If we think about just finding happiness in this one moment, that's really all we can do, and that's a lot easier. It becomes much more accessible if we think about it as a momentary arising. As we say in dharma language: take care of this moment and you take care of all time.

What's interesting is that the practice doesn't stop here. Even though we've arrived at this quality of happiness in the unfolding, there's still more. Many times in my practice I would have been quite happy to roll up the mat at this point. But there's more. That's one of the things the Buddha said. He said, "Two things I never lost track of in my practice. One was not to be lazy in my effort. The second was not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind"—not to settle just for wholesome states of mind, but to remember that what we're really walking the path for is unconditional freedom.

So happiness continues the deepening process. The next step in the link is concentration, or samadhi. We usually believe that concentration is the result of a lot of effort—that we have to work really hard to bring concentration about. But what this teaching shows, and it's stated explicitly in a number of places, is that the proximate cause of concentration is happiness.

I find that really interesting to reflect on. The immediate cause of concentration is happiness.

And you can get a sense of that when there's happiness—the mind is quite content to settle into the present moment, really settle fully into the present moment. It doesn't need to go looking outside itself through the movements of desire or aversion. It's really that external searching that creates the distraction that takes us away from this basic wholeheartedness.

So as we settle more and more with happiness, the mind just collects, becomes unified. And as it becomes unified, it gets that strength back. We've given away that strength through a lot of distracted thinking. As it comes back together, the strength returns to us, and that's where you have the feeling of stability, of steadiness, of stillness in your sitting.

Concentration also is not an end goal, although it's very pleasant, but it's considered the base for insight. So the next step in the chain is knowing and seeing things as they are. When the mind is still, we can see reality the way it is. When the mind is spinning, we really can't. It's kind of like we're on a merry-go-round. We've hopped on one of the horses, the merry-go-round's gotten cranked up, and it's just going round and round and round. This is the mind before this practice.

One of our friends walks up to the edge of the merry-go-round and is holding today's newspaper. They hold it up in front of us as we go round and round and round. But we can't read the headlines because we're going too fast. Every time we go by, it's just a blur. Then the merry-go-round slows down, and we come to rest in front of our friend, and then we can read the headlines: Everything's changing. Hold on and you'll suffer. Freedom is found through letting go. I get it.

So concentration or stillness of mind is the foundation for insight. This seeing things as they are really refers to seeing the impermanent nature of everything, of how everything that we can contact through our senses is just arising and passing. And if we try to hold on to it, we'll suffer. It won't bring lasting happiness.

As that seeing deepens, it leads to the next link, which is disenchantment. Christina mentioned this in her talk last night, this factor of mind. Disenchantment is really a recognition that none of the phenomena of the sensory world are going to do it for us. Our quest for security, for freedom, for lasting peace aren't going to be found by holding on to anything that comes out of the senses because every one of those is subject to passing. As that sinks in more and more, it cuts down our tendency to grasp and to look for happiness outside of ourselves or through special states inside of ourselves.

This disenchantment doesn't mean that the world all of a sudden looks ugly or that we think it's dreadful that we're here. I don't think it's that way at all. Somebody asked one of my teachers, a Tibetan teacher on a retreat, "All this talk about suffering, doesn't it keep you from enjoying the beauty of the world?" The teacher replied, "It's only the yogins and yoginis who are free from attachment who are truly able to appreciate the beauty of this world."

I think this is really true, and I think you can see it yourself in your experience in meditation. At times when you feel really present and clear and free, that's when the world really lights up. That's when you see the beauty of other people, of nature, of all these appearances. The Buddha said something similar: "The beauty of this world remains the same, but the wise do not cling to it."

As this disenchantment develops, it really affects a fundamental shift in our relationship to the world. We lose the motivation to be in the world for all the great things we can get out of it. As that tendency to grasp goes away, we start to be in the world more and more out of a sense of what can I offer back to it. You could say it's the awakening of a bodhisattva spirit, of a spirit of really wanting to be in the world to be of benefit to others, to be of service to others.

As this disenchantment deepens, it opens to the next link in the chain, which is called dispassion. The Pali term is viraga, and the literal meaning is "without lust." This is the state where the heart has really moved away from craving and aversion so strongly and abides in a place of deep peace. In actual fact, this term viraga or dispassion is a synonym in the texts for nibbana, which the Buddha described in this way: "Insofar as the practitioner has abandoned greed, aversion, and confusion, insofar is nibbana realizable, immediate, inviting, and attractive."

This direct realization of nibbana, the state of unconditioned peace and freedom, then is the precursor to the next link, which is liberation. The Pali term is vimutti. At this stage, the liberation that's talked about is irreversible. It's sometimes called in the suttas the "unshakable deliverance of mind." After someone has come to this level of realization, there's a standard phrase that's used to describe their situation. They often say, "Done is what had to be done."

Lived is the holy life. There is no more coming to any renewed state of being. The journey has been accomplished. The path has been walked to its completion.

Then there is one final step in this chain, which is called knowing the destruction of the taints. After liberation, it is said that the awakened one realizes that all the impurities—the deepest impurities of ignorance, sense desire, and desire for becoming—have all been lifted and removed from their heart.

So this is the state of the journey, the description of the journey itself: founded and beginning on suffering, moving through faith and the opening to joy and happiness, then that deepening sense of being that with insight sees things the way they are. It's presented as a linear chain, but in actual fact, I think we go through most of these steps over and over and over again.

I suspect that in the week you've been here, you've been through most of the early steps along this way. You've experienced moments of suffering and moments of faith, moments of joy and moments of tranquility, moments of happiness and moments of insight that lead to letting go, that lead to disenchantment. We circle through these stages many, many times on the path at deeper and deeper levels until hopefully liberation accompanies them.

I remember when I was on an early retreat here at IMS, and I heard a talk that spoke about the positive unfolding of the path, and I became very desirous. I got very impatient about reaching the end, and I think that's one of the risks of lending an ear to this kind of talk. I went to the teacher the very next day for an interview. The teacher had given the talk, and I walked in, and I really wanted to shake him by the shoulders and say, "Richard, when's it going to happen for me?" That was really what I wanted to know. When is this going to happen for me? This is really what I want. How long is it going to take?

He said, of course, being an honest person, "I don't know." And who does know? But the beauty of this kind of description is that happiness is not only possible as we continue the journey—it's really inevitable. It's such an intrinsic part of the whole journey that it does have to come in time. We just don't know when. We don't know the pace. We can't set the pace of our own unfolding.

The Buddha said something like this: "A practitioner doesn't know how much of the fetters are wearing away every day, but he does know they wear away." And then he went on to say that the fetters of the mind, the things that hold us in bondage, rot away in meditation the way that the sails of an ocean-going ship will rot away when the ship is beached and left to the elements of wind and salt air and sun and rain. The fetters of the mind rot away in meditation like the sails of an ocean-going ship rot in the elements.

So we know that this path is a path of purification. What we don't know is the rate at which it's going to unfold for any of us. We can't control it. We can't force it. Even if we devote all of our time to formal mindfulness practice, there's a certain point beyond which we can't accelerate the process. It's really out of our control. It rests on our past karma and on our current effort.

So the best thing is just to relax with that faith and trust that the Dharma will carry you there. You can relax into the stream of Dharma practice as you make your effort, and know it only leads in one direction. It leads in this direction of freedom.

This is from Ajahn Chah: "As a result of his experience, the Buddha taught that the practice has to develop naturally, according to conditions. You allow things to develop according to your accumulated wholesome karma and paramis, which means your virtues. This doesn't mean you stop putting effort into the practice, but you continue with the understanding that whether you progress swiftly or slowly, it's not something you can force. It's like planting a tree. It knows by itself the appropriate pace to grow at. If you crave to get quick results, see that as delusion. Even if you want it to grow slowly, see that as delusion."

So we really do just surrender into the stream of the Dharma. We trust and we let it carry us.

I'll close with one other quotation from the Buddha. Someone came and asked him, "How did you cross the flood?" What this means in Dharma language is, how did you cross the flood of existence, of becoming, of samsara? It basically asks, how did you become liberated?

This was the Buddha's reply: "I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying."

When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away.

This profound teaching captures the essence of the Middle Way—neither clinging nor pushing, neither forcing nor resisting. The Buddha's words point to that delicate balance where we move with the natural flow of awakening, neither holding back in fear nor rushing ahead in impatience.

When we tarry—when we hesitate, doubt, or cling to our familiar ways of being—we sink beneath the waters of confusion and suffering. When we hurry—when we grasp for quick results or try to force our spiritual unfolding—we are swept away by the very current we're trying to navigate.

The path of liberation asks us to find that middle ground, that place of dynamic equilibrium where we can move with wisdom and grace. We learn to neither resist the current of change nor be overwhelmed by it. We discover how to be present with what is arising while remaining open to what wants to emerge.

This is the art of crossing the flood—meeting each moment with awareness, allowing the Dharma to guide us naturally toward freedom. In this way, we learn to trust the process of awakening itself, surrendering our need to control while remaining fully engaged with the journey.

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

[A moment of shared silence]

CHAPTER 245

The Power of Mettā: Is Insight Enough?

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the relationship between insight meditation and mettā (loving-kindness) practice, asking whether intellectual understanding alone is sufficient for spiritual development. Drawing on the Buddha's teachings and personal experience, he explores five key ways that mettā enhances our practice: making the heart more responsive and tender, purifying unwholesome mental states, building concentration (samādhi), connecting us more deeply to life, and bringing genuine happiness.
> Armstrong addresses common reservations vipassanā practitioners may have about mettā practice, explaining how loving-kindness serves as a powerful complement to insight meditation rather than a contradiction. He shares stories illustrating the transformative power of cultivating heart qualities, including encounters with the Dalai Lama and Thai meditation master Ajahn Jumnian. The talk emphasizes how mettā practice can soften rigid mental patterns, integrate what insight meditation deconstructs, and provide the warmth that fills the emptiness revealed through wisdom practice.
> This teaching offers practical guidance for balancing wisdom and compassion on the spiritual path, showing how the cultivation of loving-kindness can make our dharma practice more complete and our liberation more beneficial to all beings. Armstrong draws from both Theravāda and Mahāyāna perspectives, demonstrating the universal importance of heart cultivation in Buddhist practice.

The Power of Mettā: Is Insight Enough?

I want to begin tonight with a quotation from one of my favorite romantic poets from the last century, E.E. Cummings. This is from a poem titled "Since Feeling is First":

"Since feeling is first, who pays any attention to the syntax of things will never wholly kiss you."

What I really love about this poem is that first line: "Since feeling is first." Feeling is first in the Dharma in a very important way. The Dharma is not about intellectual gymnastics or clever understanding. The Dharma is taught and practiced in order to heal our feelings of sadness, grief, despair, and fear. This is why the Buddha taught, and it's why we practice. It's really on the feeling level that the Dharma makes sense.

I believe that on this feeling level, the influence of loving-kindness—the practice of mettā—has a profound contribution to make for those who wish to take it up. There are five ways that mettā can influence our practice and our lives that I'd like to explore this evening.

First, loving-kindness has the potential to make the heart more responsive, or we could say to make the heart tender. Second, it purifies the heart of the unwholesome and develops the wholesome. Third, the practice of loving-kindness builds concentration. Fourth, it connects us to life. And fifth, it brings great happiness.

Let me begin with the quality of making the heart more responsive and tender. In our tradition, Vipassana is our wisdom practice. Seeing things as they are is the way to understanding and the way to freedom. This is the foundation of what we're doing, and it's in this context that we practice loving-kindness. From the point of view of the Buddha's teachings, loving-kindness doesn't stand as a complete teaching on its own, but in the context of the wisdom teaching of Vipassana, it's a very powerful tool.

Joseph mentioned in his talk last week that compassion and emptiness have a very close relationship. As we begin to touch the true quality of emptiness through our practice, compassion—or you could equally say loving-kindness—unfolds from that. So you could say that mettā unfolds naturally from the practice of Vipassana. One of my teachers put it this way: "Love is the child of freedom."

For some, I think that really may be enough. People who have very soft natures and tend to be emotional by temperament often find the emotions unfolding very nicely just through the practice of Vipassana. For myself, it was a little different, and I want to share a story.

I was on staff here in the late 1970s, and we had a visit from a famous Asian teacher—somebody we'd been planning and preparing for months. We were really looking forward to his visit. Because I was on staff, I both got to sit part of the retreat and hang out backstage as this teacher had contact with staff. So I got to see him both in his teaching role and his non-teaching role.

In the whole two weeks that I observed him, I didn't see a smile. I didn't see a laugh. I didn't see a sign of joy. And I didn't feel a kind of human warmth of connection with him. The way I felt afterward was that the teachings didn't inspire me very much because this quality that was really important to me at that time was not present. Other friends were very inspired and went to Asia to practice with this teacher.

I also didn't feel that this teacher was suffering. He had a very peaceful mind, very cooled out, very much at ease. So I didn't think there was any particular suffering going on in his being. One of my friends said they felt there was a quality of mettā there, but it felt like distant starlight—unlike, say, a teacher like Dīpamā, whose loving-kindness comes across more like the warmth of the sun.

So it wasn't that there wasn't mettā there, or that there wasn't compassion there, but somehow it didn't touch me, it didn't move me. In my own practice, because I'm more of a thinking type of person than an emotional type, the Vipassana practice didn't unfold quite so easily for me into the realm of beautiful feelings. So I tried to balance this development of character in myself by doing quite a lot of brahmavihāra practice. Over about a five or six year period, I did a number of brahmavihāra retreats.

And those retreats, I felt, did really awaken that tender part of myself. I felt they truly had the capacity to bring it out.

At the end of one of my retreats with a Tibetan teacher, Sogyal Rinpoche, he was giving sort of parting instructions to his students. You can think of these parting instructions that a teacher gives you as pith instructions for how to conduct yourself, how to live your life. What he told his students at the end of this retreat, he summed up like this.

He said, "When you go back into your life, I want you to follow three things. Number one, be normal. There are already enough strange people in the spiritual world. If you go back and be really strange, people are going to think Buddhism is like that, and they aren't going to be interested in it. So please go home and be normal."

Then he said, "Be wise. Don't make a lot of mistakes in your life. Do what's sensible. Take care of yourself. Take care of other people. Act with wisdom."

And the third thing he said was, "Be juicy. When you go back into your daily life, be juicy." By juicy, he meant let these sweet qualities of the heart come out of you and manifest in your life. Let them come out and touch people.

The juice in our practice, or the qualities that we awaken, tend to be associated with the heart: love, reverence, awe, compassion, devotion, humility, kindness, faith, and humor. These qualities, when they're alive in our practice, alive in our being, they really make life a sweeter experience, a much sweeter place to be.

But I wouldn't say that it's absolutely necessary to develop them to great strength along the spiritual path. I think there's a little bit of a choice here. The task of developing these qualities strongly may appeal to some people and may not appeal to everyone. And I think that's okay. One can, as that teacher did, develop a great deal of freedom and peace without activating these qualities so strongly, and that's fine.

So to some extent, it's a matter of personal taste—whether insight is enough for you, or whether you feel you would like to develop these other qualities of heart that really bring the juice to life.

But perhaps the most important thing about these qualities is that they're the way we can touch other people. They're the way that when we go back into our daily life, other people feel the fruits of our practice. Other people can know that something has shifted in us as a result of dharma practice. And in that, maybe they're the best advertisement for dharma practice.

In a way, I think that if you take up seriously the motivation of bodhicitta in your path—that you are cultivating the heart and mind in order to benefit all sentient beings—then these qualities become of particular interest to you. Because it's really through the development of these qualities that, to a large extent, you can touch other people and perhaps bring them a little bit closer to the dharma, to the truth, and perhaps help set someone on the path to liberation.

I think this is why the heart quality of compassion, or you could call it loving-kindness, became so important in the Mahayana expression of Buddhism. As we direct our attention outward to take in all beings, it's these heart qualities that can touch them and bring them in.

And of course the Buddha had developed the quality of loving-kindness to an extraordinary degree. I have to believe that his personal magnetism was immense. Someone who could deliver a dharma talk and have 500 people enlightened at the end of it had an amazing transmission quality—part of which I think was emptiness, but part of which I do believe was loving-kindness.

There's a story from the later part of his life. The commentaries say that he was probably 72 when this happened, when his cousin Devadatta tried to kill him. You may know about this story. His cousin became very jealous and wanted to take over the sangha. So he made one attempt on the Buddha's life himself and failed. Then he decided to kill the Buddha a different way.

He went to the elephant handlers, the mahouts of the king at the time, and asked them if there wasn't a mad elephant, a very savage elephant known as a man-killer—an elephant that had already killed human beings—that could be turned loose against the Buddha. And the king's elephant handlers agreed to this.

At one time the Buddha was walking into the town, and Devadatta alerted the elephant handlers and got them to turn this savage elephant out onto the road. It began to charge toward the Buddha as he was walking into town. Devadatta gleefully rubbed his hands together and thought, "This will be the end of that recluse Gautama."

But as this great elephant charged directly toward the path of the Buddha, the Buddha's followers were saying, "Please step out of the way, Venerable One. Please don't let the Blessed One stand in the path of this charging elephant."

The Buddha said, "A Buddha never dies by violence. Don't worry."

And as the elephant came toward him, he encompassed the elephant with his force of loving-kindness. It's said that the charging elephant slowed down under the force of that loving-kindness and came to a rest just in front of the Buddha and bowed down in front of him so that the Buddha could stroke his forehead. Then the elephant, after being stroked, picked up some dust from the road and dropped it on the head of the Buddha.

And from that point on, this elephant was said to be tamed. He had been tamed by the force of the Buddha's loving-kindness.

One of the great blessings in our lineage is that we have heart practices—a variety of heart practices designed to bring these qualities to fruition in us, the primary one being loving-kindness. In the Mahayana traditions, compassion is usually discussed as the primary emotion. In our lineage, we speak of metta, though we shouldn't draw too rigid a line between these two. The Dalai Lama once explained that what he meant by compassion was simply basic human caring. This is really the same thing we mean by metta. They're just slightly different modalities of the same quality, both based on this simple sense of caring for ourselves and for others.

The seeds of metta and compassion are in everyone. It's what Trungpa Rinpoche called our "soft spot." I'd like to read this passage from Chögyam Trungpa:

It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for compassion. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate. A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief.

What Rinpoche is saying here is that in every human being, however much they have tried to armor themselves, there is always this tender avenue in. There is always a point that can be cultivated, a way into the heart.

He continues: There's also an inner wound called Tathagatagarbha, or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. That is called bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore.

If you have an inclination to dive into bodhisattva fever, metta is our avenue.

Some Vipassana practitioners have a philosophical reservation about the metta practice. I don't know if this is true for anyone here, so I may be addressing a non-issue, but some feel that the insight practice is so elegant, so impeccable, so pure—just being aware of what is. That's it. It's so clean. The metta practice, on the other hand, seems a little suspicious, somewhat contrived, perhaps even new-agey. It's like we're trying to put something on. Are we doing affirmations? Is it somehow fake?

Someone once said in an interview, "Vipassana is letting go of everything and metta is bringing something in. Aren't these contradictory?"

I think it's helpful to remember the Buddhist definition of right effort. Right effort is about developing the wholesome states of mind and abandoning the unwholesome states of mind. Whatever serves to do that embodies the primary sense of right effort. As loving-kindness develops the wholesome quality of metta, it is directly in alignment with the Buddhist definition of right effort.

These are different practices, but I feel they really come together. Down the road, along the track of our meditation practice, the practice of insight and the practice of loving-kindness can converge. Where they converge is in a present moment attention that's filled with warmth—in the generation of this quality of warm attention which we can bring to every experience we have.

Sometimes people complain that metta seems diluted: "We say, 'may I be happy,' but there is no I. What do you mean? This is delusion practice."

So, for those of you who have that concern, I have a reformulation of the metta phrase. This is for the Vipassana purists in the audience. Instead of saying something like, "May Kamala be happy," you could say it like this: "In this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena, conventionally designated as Kamala, may the mind state of happiness arise on an ever more frequent basis." So there we have a statement that I think even the Abhidhamma scholars could get behind, and that I hope you may also.

It is extraordinary when we meet someone who has developed the heart qualities, and the person that comes to my mind again and again is the Dalai Lama, who has said —and I don't think he's kidding—"My religion is kindness." He was at a conference, a teachers' conference at Spirit Rock a couple of years ago. It was a gathering of about 220 Buddhist teachers from around the world, from Asia and from the West. And he was with us for about a day and a half, answering our questions, listening to our concerns, and sharing from his point of view.

One of the things that he said struck me a lot. He said, "I'm not interested in propagating Buddhism. I'm interested in propagating human values." I think that's how deep his caring is. It's beyond all kinds of sectarian divisions or thinking. "I'm interested in propagating human values." And this kind of attitude is so contagious.

Because he's the head of the government in exile, the United States State Department had to provide really high levels of security for his visit to Spirit Rock. For example, the meditation facility at Spirit Rock is nestled at the base of high hills that are about 700 or 800 feet tall. The Secret Service part of the State Department asked to borrow horses so that their marksmen could ride up onto the top of the hills with rifles and look down and guard the meditation halls.

Every day at 7:30 at breakfast time, all the residence buildings had to be evacuated, and the rooms were searched with dogs one by one for explosives. And before we could enter into the grounds every day, we had to go through metal detectors that were staffed by security guards from the State Department.

These security guards were not lightweight. If you think United States airports are getting intense, you should have seen these guys. They had a pistol on one hip and a nightstick on the other and were bristling with walkie-talkies and cell phones and such. You didn't joke with these people. It was very clear as you were going in, you were not going to make fun with this crew.

I got to talk to one of them a little bit about their career. They traveled all around the world providing protection and provided protection for visiting dignitaries in this country under even more extreme security situations. So they were very heavy duty in their profession.

At the end of the conference, all of these tough State Department security guards packing their pistols asked if they could be photographed with the Dalai Lama. So of course he agreed and gathered for a photograph with all of them. His heart just touches people.

This quality of loving kindness is really within each of us. It's part of our nature. We've all known it, certainly when we were children. We've all known this. For me, a lot of the draw of spiritual life has always been to rediscover this quality of love in my life, to have it available, to have it accessible, to live in it more and more. So for me, it's felt like the pull of the whole path is my heart pulling me home. That's really been my deepest motivation all along.

And of course what we find is that this love can't be stabilized unless it's supported by wisdom. It can only flare up temporarily, kind of erratically, and in a way that we can't understand, much less control. But as we cultivate love and wisdom together, the wisdom provides the stability through non-clinging so that the love can flower and be accessible.

So sometimes this practice may look a little contrived, the practice of loving kindness. It is fabricated in the beginning. But then it kind of catches fire, and it can take off on its own. And remember that it is a natural quality of heart.

I think back to my grandmother, my father's mother, who's one of the most loving people that I've ever known. She was born in the countryside in North Carolina around 1890. And she was married to my grandfather, who was one of the orneriest, most aversive men that I've ever known. And yet she maintained the sweetness of her disposition all through her married life.

When we kids came to visit them, we would just be showered with her love. She would put her lips into the hollow of our neck and sort of nuzzle around in our neck, saying that she was going to steal our sugar. That was just the way that she related to us.

My grandmother had no formal training in Buddhism. She hadn't even done any psychotherapy. And yet, the love just flowed out of her. So it really is an intrinsic quality in us, but sometimes it needs a little encouragement to come out. It needs a little help in being uncovered.

So we get into the second aspect of the power of loving kindness, and that is the aspect of purification.

Metta is a strong purifier of the heart. All the work of purification begins with this simple intention—the wish for the welfare of ourselves or another. That's where all the power comes from. Whether the happiness of another actually comes about isn't so much our concern. In our metta practice, it's not about focusing on the results or the outcome for someone else.

In our practice, we think, "I hope you're happy"—whoever we're directing it to, we think, "I hope you're happy." And we try to be sincere in this wish. If we are, that's really the driving force of the metta practice: the sincerity of that intention for someone's happiness. If you can feel that with each phrase, the practice will develop. It will have the power.

The phrases don't work like a mantra, where you can just say them mindlessly again and again and expect the magic to happen. The phrases need this wish accompanying them. The wish is really expressed through the phrase. But when you marry the phrase with this wish, that is the seed that makes the practice go, that makes it happen.

You really can trust in this seed. You don't need to force the feeling or fabricate or manufacture any particular feeling. Our job is just planting the seed again and again, watering it again and again. It's not our job, once we've planted the seed, to make the plant grow up. Only nature can do that. It's our job to plant the seed and trust that nature knows how to grow the flower once we've planted the seed.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, thinking this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled."

In Vipassana practice, we understand this to mean the cultivation of mindfulness. The gradual falling of raindrops is the moment-by-moment development of mindfulness. Over time, that creates a huge power, a huge force in the mind.

In the loving-kindness practice, it is the moment-by-moment development of this wish for someone's happiness. That's the gradual falling of the raindrops that in time fills the jar.

As we direct these thoughts of good wishes toward ourselves, this can be a difficult part of the practice. Because as we direct the mind to love for ourselves, it brings up all the ways inside us that aren't loving. It can bring up feelings of self-judgment, of unworthiness, of self-hatred, of fear, of shame, of regret, of remorse. Sometimes we think, "I'm doing it wrong. Something's gone off track. This doesn't feel like loving kindness. It's the opposite."

But in fact, because the metta practice is so purifying, sometimes these feelings are the very sign that it is working, that it is doing exactly what it's meant to do. Because metta will go straight for the heart. It goes directly there. And it will bring out anything that's not of its nature.

It's as though loving kindness is this positive pole of a very strong magnet. We're holding this magnet against our body, running it up close to our heart center. What that positively charged magnet will do is draw out toward it anything that's of the opposite polarity. Anything that's still in us that's not resonant with the positive force of metta will come to the surface.

This can be one of the most difficult times in the practice of metta, but it's also so valuable because those parts of ourselves—if the tendencies are still there—have been operating subconsciously, but we haven't been able to contact them perhaps. So this is a way of bringing them into the light of awareness, into that warm attention that metta provides. In the light of awareness, the healing can take place. The release can take place. The liberation can take place.

The Buddha often talked in the suttas of loving kindness as the main antidote for the force of hatred or aversion in the mind. This is another reason that metta was such a powerful practice for me. As someone in practice whose primary hindrance has been fear—a form of aversion—metta was a beautiful antidote to that fear. I recommend it really highly to all my brothers and sisters who are also aversive types. It is a really good fit for our temperament. It is the antidote to aversion, especially if pain has been a feature of life for a long time.

If pain has been with us for a long time, then we tend to develop a kind of chronic habit of aversion because of just not being able to open to it, not being able to accommodate it. And metta is strong enough, is powerful enough to get in and touch that chronic state of aversion or fear.

Because this can be a difficult part of the journey in loving kindness for self, it's why it's often helpful to bring in someone that you really can like quite easily—a benefactor or a friend—so that you alternate your practice at times, if it seems sensible, between yourself and a benefactor or friend. And then you can kind of generate the loving kindness with the benefactor and borrow some of that love and bring it back to yourself. And use that warmth to soothe your feelings for yourself, to stoke the fires of love for yourself.

As the metta grows, it really has a strong unifying effect in the mind. Love unifies. It brings together. It is the attractive force, you might say, in the spiritual universe. It's interesting because in a lot of ways, vipassana takes us apart. The vipassana practice is a very analytic meditation. I'm sure you've noticed this. It sort of takes the human being apart either into the six sense bases or into the five aggregates. It deconstructs us.

It's very helpful that it deconstructs us because we've, coming into the practice out of unawareness, not understanding, we've come together around a false center—around self-centeredness or the false sense of self or craving or whatever you want to call it. That false collection needs to be dismantled so that it can come together around a true center. It could be the center of emptiness, as Joseph mentioned in his talk the other night. But metta is a beautiful glue that as we open to this quality of emptiness, the true center, is able to reconstruct the personality on a wholesome and wise basis and integrate what has been taken apart.

We've talked about how in doing the loving-kindness practice, if you run into a hindrance—that the suggestion is to leave the hindrance in the background. It could be fear, it could be sadness, it could be anger. Leave the hindrance in the background and continue doing the practice of metta. The inclination in vipassana is to turn to what's predominant, but in metta that's not the instruction. Leave it in the background and continue doing the metta practice.

And what's interesting about this, as you start to work with the hindrances in this way, is that you see that fear or anger or sadness can still be there, or desire, and you can still generate caring. And as you do that, what you find is that the metta starts to pervade even the hindrances. Or another way to say it is even these hindering energies sort of get wrapped up in the embrace of loving-kindness. And this is part of the integrating power, so that we don't have to push them out of the mind, but all of a sudden we start to be able to accept those parts of ourselves, those really difficult parts, in the spirit of kindness, in the spirit of acceptance, an aspect of metta. And this is very healing.

I'd like to read this poem from Galway Kinnell, which I'm sure a lot of you have heard before, but it says it so beautifully. It's called "St. Francis and the Sow."

The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower. For everything flowers from within of self-blessing, though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness. To put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch. It is lovely. Until it flowers again from within of self-blessing. As St. Francis put his hand on the creased forehead of the sow and told her in words and in touch, "Blessings of earth on the sow." And the sow began remembering all down her thick length, from the earthen snout all the way through the fodder and slops to the spiritual curl of the tail. From the hard spininess spiked out from the spine, down through the great broken heart, to the sheer blue milk and dreaminess spurting and shuddering from the fourteen teats into the fourteen mouths sucking and blowing beneath them, the long perfect loveliness of sow.

Everything flowers again from within with self-blessing.

One of the things that surprised me when I was doing the metta practice over an extended time is the way it affected my fear. I'd done a lot of vipassana practice by this time and had worked with fear a lot and had seen a huge change in my relationship to fear. And over the years, the fear had just gotten smaller, smaller, smaller, smaller through the force of equanimity, acceptance, spaciousness, non-identification. The fear could arise and it just wasn't that much of an event most of the time. But when the mind tipped off balance, it would still tip into fear. That was sort of its conditioning. It was its habit. That was the way it went.

After doing the metta practice, what I noticed is that the fear started to actually be displaced by loving kindness. The metta started to actually take the place of fear in the mind. So when it moved in a particular direction, it started to move in the direction of metta. And that was really interesting to me, but in my case it was true. The vipassana hadn't changed my conditioning very much. It had just worn it away more and more. But the metta practice actually put something different in its place and shifted the conditioning.

This is the second factor of purification of the metta practice. The third factor is concentration. And I think we've talked before about how the practice of loving kindness is a concentration practice in the way that we do it.

Concentration itself is a unification of mind. And as we've discussed, metta is also a powerful unifier of the mind. This is why the two go so well together. Both of them really bring the mind to a point. So the combination is so powerful because each one supports the other.

Someone once asked Deepa Ma, struck by her presence, "What's in your mind? What are the factors that are there?" And she said, "I only have three things in my mind: peace, metta, and concentration." What a mind.

As I was talking about this aspect in one retreat, somebody gave me a reading from a Russian saint from the 19th century named Theophan the Recluse, who was in the Russian Orthodox lineage. He has a passage that sounds like it could have been written about metta as a concentration practice. It's so unusual that I thought I would share it with you:

"For so long as the mind remains in the head, where thoughts jostle one another, it has no time to concentrate on one thing. But when attention descends into the heart, it attracts all the powers of the soul and body into one point there. This concentration of all human life in one place is immediately reflected in the heart by a special sensation that is the beginning of future warmth. This sensation, faint at the beginning, becomes gradually stronger, firmer, deeper. At first only tepid, it grows into warm feeling and concentrates the attention upon itself. And so it comes about that whereas in the initial stages the attention is kept in the heart by an effort of will, in due course this attention, by its own vigor, gives birth to warmth in the heart. This warmth then holds the attention without special effort. From this, the two go on supporting one another, the warmth and the attention. They must remain inseparable because dispersion of attention cools the warmth and diminishing warmth weakens attention."

The fourth aspect of loving kindness that I wanted to talk about was connection—that it really connects us to life. It opens our practice to all of life. Vipassana practice can do this too, but we can also stay in Vipassana in a kind of self-centered way for a long time. We can use Vipassana to focus on my pain, my problems, my neuroses, my path, my progress, my healing, my peace, and my liberation. This emphasis is quite appropriate for the first stage of the journey in Vipassana, but at some point it needs to be let go of, this solitary emphasis.

Metta kind of forces us into a broader view of practice. This is from Shantideva: "Whatever joy there is in this world all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

The Dalai Lama said that once we expand our concept of happiness to take in others, our odds for success go up by six billion to one. So if you're a gambler, this is a good bet.

You could say that the neutral person is really the turning point in opening our connection to all of life—someone that we don't particularly care about and we find that we can care about just because they're a being, because they're a being like us. And we start to get the sense of how metta is like this gentle rain that falls everywhere without discrimination. This is one of the aspects of the immeasurable nature of loving kindness.

And the Buddha said something pretty amazing. In the Samyutta Nikaya, he said, "It's not easy to find a being who has not been your mother or your father or your brother or your sister or your son or your daughter in some previous life."

What would that be like if we remembered that? Now, even as you're looking around the hall tonight, what if you thought that everyone here had been an intimate member of your family in some previous life, that our connections go that deep? Well, that may depend on how you feel about your family. But allowing for the possibility of happy connection—this is an amazing reflection. What if we could relate to everybody in this world from a place of love? What a place this would be to live. And there are people who seem to be able to do that, for whom that's a reality.

The last aspect I want to talk about is the happiness through loving kindness. One of the people who always strikes me this way is Ajahn Jumnian, the Thai meditation master who I mentioned the other night in a talk. Ajahn Jumnian is in Jack Kornfield's book, formerly called Living Buddhist Masters. But since most of them have died, we thought it really should be retitled Recently Deceased Buddhist Masters. But I guess the publisher thought that wasn't very commercially viable. So it's been re-released as Living Dharma.

Ajahn Jumnian is one of the few teachers from that book who's still alive. He has a monastery in the south of Thailand, near the town of Krabi. And he visits Spirit Rock once a year, usually in May. He is one of the happiest people that I've ever met. He's just kind of bubbling with energy most of the time. So, for instance, we'll ask him to give a teaching and people will come to the meditation hall.

He can start at 9 o'clock and teach pretty much through until lunch without a break. And then he'll take a break for lunch and come back in the afternoon to teach through the entire afternoon without a break. He has this boundless energy and tremendous delight in what he's doing.

Some days we might say to him, "Well, Ajahn Jumdian, would you like to go out somewhere today? We could take you to Point Reyes and you could see the Pacific Ocean. Or we could drive across the Golden Gate Bridge and you could see San Francisco." And he says, "Are there people who'd like to hear the Dharma? If there are people who'd like to hear the Dharma, I'd like to teach the Dharma. But if there's no one there, I'm happy to go to Point Reyes or San Francisco. That's all right. But also, if you just want me to sit here, I'm very happy just sitting here also." Whatever he does, he is simply happy.

He has done long, long stretches, both of vipassana practice and of metta practice. One really feels both the concentration, the settledness and the stillness in his body, and the happiness that comes from the metta practice. He gives a short transmission in English of his teachings. He doesn't know very much English, but he will break into it for this special transmission, which is his pointing. He'll sort of just touch the air and say, "Empty, empty, happy, happy. Empty, empty, happy, happy." That's his energy.

In our loving-kindness practice, I think that this quality of happiness can come through in a really beautiful way, perhaps through our benefactor. And there's a certain amount of wisdom in choosing a benefactor who embodies these beautiful qualities of heart and mind.

When I did my first metta retreat, I worked with my benefactor for half the retreat, the first three weeks. So I had a lot of time to hang out with them. I picked someone who inspired me greatly in both wisdom and in heart qualities. Over time, I started to feel that as I hung out with them, I was soaking up their qualities of heart and mind. They were starting to pervade my being because I was with them eighteen hours a day.

This is why some people like to use for their benefactor beings who really inspire them—people like Dipa Ma or the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh. There's one practice tradition that has a central practice called union with the teacher, or guru yoga. In it, one is meant to visualize the teacher so strongly that one feels the teacher's being and one's own being becoming identical—that one sees that essentially one's nature is just like the teacher's nature. This is the kind of feeling that we can get from the benefactor practice.

There is a real merging that can go on so that the wisdom, the compassion, the joy, the freedom, the love of great spiritual beings can come to resonate with those qualities within us. This is really the purpose of developing metta for a benefactor—one of the purposes of that practice.

I think I've mentioned two of the Tibetan teachers that I've connected with: Sogyal Rinpoche, and in an earlier talk, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, where there's amazing transmission of emptiness. Sogyal Rinpoche has also practiced with Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche.

One time after a period of practice when Sogyal Rinpoche was leaving to go back to his home, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche gave him a parting transmission of pith instruction. And the pith instruction was, "Love me. Love me."

This was not said out of any egotistical, grandiose, self-flattering inclination. It was so that the student's heart could be full of love by connecting with a beloved teacher.

When these qualities start to take real root in our heart—these juicy qualities that are awakened by the tenderizing of metta—they bring a really deep sense of contentment. We have the sense that we've come home, that in some ways the kinds of satisfaction that we've been looking for, we're starting to find within our own hearts and minds.

One Buddhist poem puts it like this: "There is nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face." We really have the feeling that we can just rest in that contentment of metta, of love. In a way, as the Buddha said, it is a deliverance. It is a liberation of the heart.

The vipassana practice reveals the quality of emptiness, and metta is what fills it with warmth. It's metta that transforms what could be this kind of cold, lonely voidness into something filled with the spirit of friendliness, of connection, of love. So it makes this space inviting and rich and welcoming and kind of cozy in its way.

In one tradition, they talk about this as the avenue that opens up the treasure chest of the heart and mind. Each of our hearts is a treasure chest, and it's only waiting for the right key to let all that beauty out. In our tradition, loving kindness is that key so that we can begin to trust in this treasure that is in us. We can open to it. We can surrender to it. And we understand that this really is our own true nature.

And a sense of unworthiness or self-judgment or fear of insufficiency that we may have felt as we started the practice starts to evaporate as we just trust more and more that love really is our nature and that this warm, friendly quality is accessible to us, that we can touch it and rest in it. We really have the deep sense that our own nature is basically good.

And then as that becomes an area of faith and trust and confidence, then it becomes a joy to share it. It becomes a joy to open it up and allow it to go out into the world and allow the possibility that others can be touched by it.

I just want to close with another quotation from Shantideva. This is one of the favorites of His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and I think it really expresses his own aspiration as the incarnation, as the embodiment of compassion, as a bearer of this treasure chest of love:

"For as long as space endures and as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the misery of this world."

So let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 246

Purity and Purification

Guy Armstrong · 52 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses a common confusion in Buddhist practice: Are we supposed to accept ourselves as we are, or work to improve ourselves? He explores this through the Buddha's teaching of two truths - conventional truth (sammuti-sacca) and ultimate truth (paramattha-sacca). Armstrong explains how conventional truth operates through concepts and language, where we do indeed develop qualities like patience and wisdom over time. Ultimate truth, however, is the reality experienced beyond words and concepts - characterized by purity, acceptance, and freedom from conflict.
> The talk delves deeply into working with difficult emotions like sadness, fear, and anger that arise in meditation practice. Armstrong introduces the helpful acronym RAIN (Recognition, Acceptance, Interest, Non-identification) developed by Michele McDonald-Smith for skillfully relating to challenging mind states. He emphasizes that these emotions are part of our conditioned tendencies rooted in greed, aversion, and delusion, but they need not define us or cause suffering when met with mindful awareness.
> Drawing from the Majjhima Nikāya and referencing the Buddha's teaching on heartwood, Armstrong concludes that while healing, concentration, and insight are valuable fruits of practice, the ultimate goal is "unshakable deliverance of mind." This talk offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners essential guidance on navigating the apparent paradox between acceptance and spiritual development in Buddhist meditation.

The subject of tonight's talk is purity and purification.

At the last retreat I was teaching at Spirit Rock, somebody asked a question that went something like this: "Sometimes you all talk to us about just accepting ourselves and just accepting the moment—just the way the moment is, just the way we are. And other times you talk about all these great qualities we're supposed to be developing, like love and compassion and wisdom and concentration. I'm confused. What is it I'm supposed to be doing here? Am I supposed to be accepting myself or am I supposed to be improving myself?"

Of course, asking this in a Buddhist context is always a little risky, because improving the self when there isn't supposed to be one is kind of a risky project to spend a lot of time on. But I thought this was an interesting question because it actually goes to what I think is the heart of the Buddha's teachings as expressed in a concept known as the two truths—two different ways of looking at the world, both of which are important, but that seemingly contradict one another.

These two truths in the tradition are talked about as the conventional truth and the ultimate truth. We might say for the purpose of understanding it tonight that conventional truth is the way we see the world when we look with language, with words. It's the way we usually look at the world.

Looking really conventionally, we'd look this evening and we'd say, well, it's 7:30 p.m. and we're in the meditation hall. Looking around, we see a woman, a man, zafu, chair, floor, you, me, and so forth. That all makes really good sense. All these distinctions make a lot of sense, and it's very useful for socially relating. Because with distinctions like this, at the end of the retreat, I don't get into your car and drive away—and I hope you appreciate that. And at the end of the day today, you're not going to come into my room to go to sleep in my bed—and I will appreciate that. So these are very useful distinctions, this conventional truth.

Time is an aspect of conventional truth. Time is a concept. Past and future, seven o'clock, tomorrow, yesterday, 30 years old, 60 years old—these are all concepts. So when we talk about, as we do, how with our Dharma practice we develop over time through practice, we're in the conventional realm. We're in the language of concepts. And we do, over time, develop in qualities like a little more equanimity, a little more patience, a little more kindness, a little more wisdom. These are truths about Dharma practice, and this is not to deny the development of these qualities as they take place over time. This is absolutely true.

So we could say that self-improvement is a truth within Dharma teachings, within Dharma practice, or probably the way we prefer to say it is growth in the Dhamma—that we grow in the teachings, we grow in the truth. But it's an aspect of conventional truth.

Now an interesting thing about conventional truth is that it's from the Pali term sammuti-sacca. Sacca means truth. Sammuti has a really interesting etymology. The term literally means "all-concealing." So the implication is that the world of concepts is a truth, but it's a concealing truth. It conceals a more fundamental and more important truth from our eyes. So when all we see is the world of language and concepts, the conventional reality, we're blinded from seeing something more truthful, more underlying.

This more underlying truth is called the ultimate truth. In Pali, the term is paramattha-sacca. Paramattha means literally "highest meaning truth." So the conventional truth is a truth, but it's not the truth with the highest meaning. To get to the truth with the highest meaning, we have to see beneath the obscuring truth of concepts and words.

Let's just say that the ultimate truth is the truth we see when we look at the world without any language, without any words, without any concepts.

Now when we say reality in a Buddhist context, we mean something a little different than in a Western context. In a Western context, normally when people say reality, they mean the outside world, the physical world. But in a Buddhist context, when we say reality, we mean the reality of human experience.

So I'd like to ask you to take a look. What is the nature of your human experience when it's not touched by language? Just in this moment, take a look. Open your senses.

Open your awareness. What is the nature of your experience when no words intrude or shape or mold it? That means we can't be thinking about "me" or "you" because these are concepts. We can't move into past and future because those are concepts. What are we left with?

Can you describe it? Kind of tricky, isn't it? How do you describe something where words can't find a hold? You can't grasp it while you're experiencing it because if you grasp it and make any image of it, then words are coming in. So you almost have to enter it, abandon the words, and know you're in a territory that can't be described. And then as you come back out of that into the world of concepts and language, you may have a little memory of what that was like. And so then language may come in again.

So it's said that the ultimate truth is not describable. It's not describable. But that doesn't stop us from trying. Some of the words that people have used, that practitioners have used, that you may be able to relate to, are words like being, now, arising, passing, vastness, still, empty, free, beauty, love. You might say that these are words that kind of point to the nature of reality, or as Suzuki Roshi said in his beautifully fractured English, "the nature of things as it is."

This is the realm of the ultimate truth. One aspect of this truth is that we're not in conflict with it—that there's a quality in this coming beyond words, a real quality of acceptance, of a radical kind of acceptance that doesn't have any kind of friction, as Rodney said last night, any struggle, any sense of disturbance with what is.

So this movement of acceptance is a movement in the direction of an ultimate truth of things as they are. And as we start to contact that more and more, we also find that there's a purity in the nature of reality. The nature of things just as they are—there's an incredible purity. When we open to this purity, we can connect with a sense of freedom in the here and now because of this lack of friction, lack of struggle, lack of conflict.

As we open to that freedom that is the way things are, it doesn't stop there, but it furthers the journey. And it's really contact with this purity that provides the motive force that carries us along the path. So we might say that the sense of self-improvement grows directly out of our ability to accept. The more deeply we can accept and open to things as it is, the more the journey unfolds for us spontaneously. And we make the first step on that journey when we turn to mindfulness, because mindfulness is an aspect of this purity, of this ultimate kind of nature.

So we could say that what our practice is about is understanding this ultimate nature and also the conventional nature of things. In a way you could say it's like understanding the impersonal quality of reality, but also not denying the personal.

Dostoevsky has this famous line—I think it's at the start of Anna Karenina—where he says that every happy family is very much alike, and every unhappy family is different in its own way. This is that juxtaposition of the impersonal and the personal. The ultimate reality is all alike. Your ultimate reality can't really be any different than my ultimate reality, or we wouldn't be communicating about it. So the ultimate nature for you and for me is probably no different. This is all happy families. This is the purity.

But the way that the conventional world springs up, there are differences. One of the ways that we see these differences are in the ways that we suffer. The unhappy families are all different. And we could say that when we look at our suffering, we're all different in that way. We have different tendencies. We get caught in different ways.

This innate purity of mind in some traditions in Buddhism is called the Buddha nature. And it's described as basically having three aspects. It's awake, it's peaceful, and it's friendly. These are the three key pieces of our Buddha nature. And we activate it—we start to wake it up and touch it as we develop mindfulness. And it's really the activation of this Buddha nature that takes us down the path.

As we touch it and activate it, it starts to wake up and it has its own momentum. It will grow, it will deepen, it will expand all by itself. And it tends to do that as soon as we start waking it up with mindful attention—until it hits an obstacle, which it always will. For us, as beginners on the path, it will hit an obstacle. The obstacles we could talk about as the five hindrances that Rodney talked about this morning. We could talk about various kinds of distracting thoughts that take us away from the present moment in one of those directions. We get entangled in some kind of unhappiness, and we lose touch with the basic purity of our nature.

And when we lose touch with that, the whole mass of suffering arises because we have forgotten how to contact that purity. We've lost touch with our innate nature.

So now we're in the territory of suffering, in the territory of confusion, in the territory of unhappiness. And in order to be free, we have to understand this side of things as well. We have to understand it clearly so that we're not trapped by it anymore.

So I want to talk about this aspect of mind that engages us in suffering. These hindrances are deeply conditioned tendencies of mind, and I was reminded of this this afternoon. I was sitting at a table in the kitchen where I'm staying and looking out the window into the woods. There was a tree that had fallen over and was leaning up at about a forty-five-degree angle, sticking about ten feet into the air.

I saw a big bird fly down to the ground and pick up what looked like a little snake about a foot long, then fly up and perch on top of this fallen tree. As it sat there—I could see it was a hawk—it trapped what looked like this snake under its claws. It would reach down and take a bite out of the snake with its beak, chew it for a while, and swallow it. Then it would lean its head down, take another bite, shake a piece off, and swallow it until the snake was all gone. Afterwards, it just sat on that fallen tree for about forty-five minutes in the sunshine, relaxing and enjoying this beautiful afternoon with a full stomach. I thought, that's just what we tend to do after a good meal.

But this really pointed up the depths of the conditioned tendencies of mind. In the Buddhist tradition, we talk about these tendencies as greed, aversion, and delusion. Greed is so closely connected with the desire for survival and food. If we don't have food, we don't live very long as an embodied being. At the same time, as in the animal realm, they need to eat other beings. So every animal wishes most deeply not to be eaten by another animal. That's a source of fear and aversion—we don't want to surrender our life to become somebody else's meal. On the basic animal level, that's the reality in that realm.

As animals ourselves, we've inherited all those responses. We've inherited this insecurity about bodily existence, this desire to continue, this fear of being terminated. Because we don't understand these forces clearly, because we can't see them with wisdom very clearly, they drive us, they compel us. These are the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion that the Buddha talked about again and again as the roots of our suffering. These are the very forces in the mind that inevitably bring us back to suffering. Until they're understood, until they're released, we are going to suffer.

Greed is the tendency to reach out for the pleasant—the compulsive tendency to reach for the pleasant. Aversion is the conditioned tendency to push away what's unpleasant. Delusion is the cloud in the mind that doesn't see the operation of greed and aversion. So greed or aversion are always accompanied by delusion. Why? Because if we could see them, we wouldn't do it. Nobody wants to be greedy. Nobody wants to be aversive. Nobody wants to be dominated by fear or aggression. But because they operate unconsciously, we don't see it. And so we're taken over and compelled, driven by these forces.

In the most deeply conditioned sense, it is these age-old forces of greed, aversion, and delusion that bring us into suffering, bring us into confusion over and over.

Now there's another way that these manifest, especially in the retreat environment, and it has to do with a developmental and psychological process. As we have grown up, we have encountered painful situations many times in our life—from the time that we were just born, to being infants, to being children, to being teenagers and being adults. We've encountered painful situations that have brought up really difficult emotions: levels of fear or anxiety or betrayal or guilt or shame or hatred or wanting that we couldn't cope with, that overwhelmed our ability to understand.

Not being able to cope with them, being frightened by the strength of our emotions, at some time or another we've closed down on them because they were just too much for us at that young age. So we tried to find a way to escape from them, to push them down under and to put our minds somewhere else—often into thinking, again as Rodney said last night.

Over the course of a lifetime, we have stored up these unresolved emotions. They've settled in our muscles, in our tissues, they've formed contractions, and they've taken our mental energy to hold them. Through years of unconscious living, deluded living, we've become contracted, and in that contraction more armored, more defended, and less alive in our bodies and in our minds.

As awareness starts to penetrate the mind-body system through the practice of mindfulness, we start to uncover these layers of holding.

When sadness arises during this process, sometimes tears will come. That's absolutely natural and fine. Tears are simply a physical expression of the emotional release that's happening. The body has its own wisdom for processing these stored energies, and crying can be part of that natural healing process.

Now, the tricky part is the thoughts. When we're feeling sad, certain kinds of thoughts tend to arise. Sometimes they're memories of losses we've experienced. Sometimes they're thoughts about what's missing in our life, what we wish we had, what we've never had. Sometimes they're thoughts about how unfair life is, or how much pain there is in the world.

These thoughts aren't wrong, but we need to be skillful with them. If we get caught up in thinking about the sadness, we move away from the direct experience of it. We go into our heads and lose touch with what's actually happening in our body and heart in this moment.

So when thoughts arise, simply notice them. You might note "thinking" or "memory" or "story." Then gently return your attention to the direct experience—the sensations in your chest, the quality of the mood itself.

The key instruction here is: Stay close. Don't push the sadness away, and don't get lost in the thoughts about it. Rest right at the edge of the emotion itself. Let yourself feel it fully without drowning in stories about it.

Often what happens is that if we can stay present with the emotion in this way—connected to the body sensations, aware of the mental mood, noting the thoughts without getting caught in them—the emotion will naturally transform. It might intensify for a while, but then it begins to move and change. Sometimes it shifts into something else entirely. Sometimes it simply dissolves.

This is the paradox of emotions in meditation practice. The very thing we're afraid will overwhelm us, when we meet it with awareness and presence, often turns out to be quite manageable. It's our resistance to feeling it, our fear of being overwhelmed, that actually creates more suffering than the emotion itself.

The same approach applies to all the difficult emotions that arise in practice. With anger, you might feel heat and tension in your body, perhaps in your jaw or shoulders or belly. The storyline might be about how someone has wronged you, or how things should be different. With fear, there might be a tight, contracted feeling, perhaps a sense of shakiness or vulnerability. The story might be about some danger, real or imagined.

With each emotion, the practice is the same: Find where it lives in the body. Notice the particular quality of the mental state. See the thoughts that arise without getting lost in them. Stay present and allow the natural intelligence of awareness to do its work.

This takes courage. It takes a willingness to feel what we've been avoiding, sometimes for many years. But this is how we begin to free up all that energy that's been locked away in our bodies and minds. This is how we start to live more fully and authentically.

Now, a lot of thoughts may be coming and going around the sadness. It may be the belief, "Oh, I can't go into it, it's too much." It may be memories of specific losses, specific people, specific times in your life. As far as possible, just let the thoughts come and go. Don't get too involved in pursuing them. Notice that they're there—they'll have a certain flavor—but try not to get involved going down that track. So mostly go back and forth between the physical sensation and the mental tone or the mood of that emotion.

Now the attitude is really important. We're not trying to change anything in our awareness of the sadness. We're not trying to make it go away. We're not trying to make it get smaller. We're also not trying to open it up and make a project out of it. Because we can do that with emotions—emotions can become a long-term project in meditation. A lot of people come to meditation with the motivation to heal their emotional life. I did myself. But I found out there are some problems with healing as a motivation in meditation.

The first one is: how do you know when you're done? How do you know when you're done with healing? Do you just need to heal back to the level of a normal, neurotic person? And once you're normal again, can the healing stop and you can go on with your life?

Suzuki Roshi, a great Zen master, once opened a dharma talk like this. He said, "The difficulties you're experiencing now..." and he just stopped. Long pause. Everybody's attention was riveted on him. And then he continued: "The difficulties you're experiencing now will be with you for a very long time."

Now how do we hear that? That could be kind of depressing. "Jeez, I thought I was getting rid of this stuff." But the way he really intended it, and the way you can take it if you think about it, it's really liberating. It means that the way to freedom is not that we have to get rid of these emotions.

We all have the whole package. The whole human package includes sadness and fear and doubt and self-judgment and anger and disappointment and sorrow and blame and wanting and joy and happiness and compassion and love and calm and peace. We all know all of these things. So it's not about—in the beginning stages of the path, intermediate stages of the path, quite advanced stages of the path—it's not about getting rid of these things. According to the traditional teachings, none of these emotions go away until the third stage of enlightenment, which is a very high level of freedom. It's the stage before full liberation. So we accept the fact that these states of mind will be visiting us for a long time.

So what does healing mean? It doesn't mean that we get rid of them.

The second problem with healing as a motivation is it won't take us all the way. If that's our sole motivation for coming into dharma practice, it won't take us to liberation. Well, it can take us partway, but it won't take us all the way.

And there's a third problem with healing, and this is probably the most interesting from my point of view. If we think we need to heal, there's an underlying belief that we usually associate with that, and that is the belief that we're broken. "I have to heal" means there's something wrong with me as I am. That I'm broken. I've gone wrong in some way. And this is a crippling kind of view to take up if we really believe that we're broken.

And I don't understand the range of mind that's usually described as psychosis. I haven't gone into it. I haven't studied it. I don't know about that. But I will say for everybody in this room: you are not broken. You have not been broken. Short of psychosis, which I just don't know about, even the suffering that we are exposed to...

is a lawful suffering. It has its causes and conditions. It comes because of certain reasons. We don't understand them all—we may never understand them all—but it's not coming because there's something wrong with us. We are simply operating, developing, and unfolding along the natural laws of cause and effect, operating in this world, operating in this universe. We never got broken.

And because of that, we don't need to be put back together. So there is a lot of healing that happens in meditation, but that view is, in a way, an incomplete one. It's a noble motivation in coming to meditation, but it's not a complete one.

As these conditioned tendencies, as these accumulations come to mind and we touch them with mindfulness, we can find a lot of freedom in relation to them. As you practice with them, you'll discover this freedom little by little.

I want to suggest a mnemonic that, as far as I know, was invented by a colleague of ours, Michele McDonald-Smith, who teaches here at IMS. I've found it a really helpful reminder of how to work with difficult emotions. The mnemonic is RAIN—R-A-I-N—and it stands for recognition, acceptance, interest, and non-identification.

Let's say a difficult emotion is coming, like sadness. The first step is to recognize it and just say, "Oh, this is sadness." Naming it is very helpful. Even if you don't use noting throughout the day, in your sittings, in your walkings, in your in-between times, it's very helpful to use a soft note in connection with these emotions. There's something about getting the right name for what we're feeling that loosens the fixation of it. There's a way in which once we recognize it, awareness and wisdom hold it in a different way. So finding out what you're feeling is a very fruitful investigation. Come close to that mental state and see what the best name you can find for it is. Recognize it.

The second step is acceptance. This actually doesn't mean we have to do something special or something positive. It really means just that we drop our resistance to it. We drop the sense: "This shouldn't be happening. I don't want it here. When can it go away? It better be gone by tomorrow or I'm leaving the retreat. I really didn't come here to experience this in the first place. Something's going wrong with my meditation. I was peaceful yesterday and now I'm not." We drop all those judgments and just let ourselves feel directly the energy of sadness. We just open to it and accept it to the extent we can.

The third factor that really helps the acceptance is the quality of interest. If we can get curious about it—what does sadness feel like? How does it feel in the body? How does it feel in the mind? What kind of thoughts come when it's there? What does it make me feel about myself? How do I see the world when I'm in this place of sadness? Once we can get interested, that brings a wholesome quality to our relationship to it, and it perks up the whole situation.

And the last is non-identification. This means we don't take it as I or me or mine. We don't say it's my sadness. We don't say I'm sad. We just say sadness is present. It's just another of the pieces of the human package. It's arisen in this moment. It will last for a while. It will pass away. Just part of the changing weather.

It's this quality of passing that makes all the emotions safe to go into. If you open to any emotion, you'll find it'll be there for a while. It may not be pleasant, but in time it will go away. Is there any emotion that's lasted since this retreat started? Has anybody seen one that hasn't gone yet? They all come and they all go. And this is why we can basically trust them. It's why it's safe to open to these feelings. We can let them come, they'll last for a while, and on their own, without our trying to push them away, each one in its own time will go.

Because they're impermanent, they really can't hurt us. It was the fear of them that made us close down on them and store them in the body that has caused all the havoc. And to see a really kind of enlightened way of relating with emotions—half-enlightened, I should say—

Look at children. When children feel happy, they're completely happy. They dive fully into that experience of joy. When they feel scared, they're genuinely terrified. They don't hold anything back. If they're angry about something, they let you know with their whole being. Children have this fearless way of going completely into whatever emotion arises, and then perhaps five or ten minutes later, they're entirely out of it.

This is the kind of emotional fluency we can cultivate. What children don't possess, however, is the wisdom not to act unskillfully on their emotions. They do tend to spread their suffering around somewhat. We can learn not to spread it around while maintaining that same openness—being unafraid to go directly into the emotion and feel it one hundred percent.

When people discuss equanimity and the qualities that develop through meditation practice, sometimes they imagine that all emotions simply disappear. Some think this might not be such a bad thing, while others recoil at the thought. But from what I understand of the path thus far, this doesn't happen. We don't experience some kind of emotional lobotomy where all sources of pain are removed and we walk around like emotionless beings.

Rather, equanimity develops in relationship to emotions—we become okay with feeling the full range of them. The emotions no longer disturb us as much, just as they don't truly disturb children. Children can move right into their feelings and emerge again naturally. We're rediscovering that same quality—allowing ourselves to feel fully while trusting that the emotion will pass on its own.

As we touch the emotion of sadness deeply, opening to it as completely as possible, we hold no intention of changing it, making it disappear, or creating a project around releasing it. What's remarkable is that this complete acceptance returns us to the neighborhood of purity. It brings us back to ultimate truth because we've relaxed all our doing and strategizing. We've released all our concepts about the emotion and simply entered into this fully awake relationship with what is.

The purity doesn't deny the emotion. We discover this purity right in the heart of strong emotions. You might say the purity surrounds the emotion. This is truly miraculous—a miracle of practice. In ordinary daily life, we know only how to perpetuate emotions and wait for them to run their course. But in practice, we find that in the middle of intense emotion, we can rediscover our innate purity of mind, which is naturally awake, peaceful, and friendly.

When we make this connection with our deepest nature, the emotion begins to dissolve into that purity. There's a great Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj who taught in Bombay in the 1970s and 80s. He worked through dialogue. Once, a Westerner approached him saying, "I'm having difficulty with some pain." Maharaj replied, "You need to accept it." The Westerner protested, "But pain is unacceptable. I can't accept it." Maharaj asked, "Why not? Did you ever really try? Do try, and you will find in pain a joy that pleasure cannot yield, for the simple reason that pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does. The personal self by its very nature is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self with its hopes and fears returns you to your true nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

This is the beautiful mingling of ultimate truth and conventional truth. The conventional truth is that I, as a particular person with a specific history, accumulated disappointment that is now being touched by this force of purity. This story isn't untrue—there's genuine truth in this narrative. But freedom comes through a deeper dimension than the story reveals. This freedom emerges by moving beyond concepts to the ultimate layer beneath.

The ultimate truth asks: What's happening in this very moment? What occurs when awareness meets the experience of sadness right now? There are bodily sensations connected with the feeling. There's a mental tone of sadness, and thoughts arise and pass away. The breath, too, comes and goes.

Sounds are arising and passing. Other sensations in the body are coming and going. This is what's really happening in the moment. This, in a way, is the truth—the real truth of this moment. Not the story. This is the real truth of this moment.

And when we start to see in this way, we're starting to see a little bit of emptiness. We're starting to see without the fixed center of things, the owner, the self, the project of healing that's coagulated around the experience of sadness. This is very freeing. This is where the freedom lies in relationship to the sadness. It's not that the sadness has to go away; it's that it gets held by this purity of awareness, of steadiness, of friendliness, of acceptance.

This ultimate truth, which we talked about as our Buddha nature, is quite impersonal. It's pretty much the same for every one of us. But the conventional truth is quite personal. The reason my sadness got lodged there may have been because I lost something very precious when I was six years old and I was never allowed to cry about it fully at the time. That's a really personal story.

And the way that the practice unfolds often is this impersonal force of purity starts to expand and grow until it hits these personal pockets of holding. And as the personal is held by the impersonal, the personal gets released. And as it does that, a lot of the old holding and even the story and the personality get loosened up. And that's why when you see masters, meditation masters, there's very little sense of past for them.

You know, the Buddha didn't go out and teach once he was awakened and say, "What you want to know about me is I was born a prince in a kingdom in northern India, and I had a lot of fun when I was a kid, and my guardians taught me archery." That's not what the Buddha was interested in talking about. He talked about the way things are, the nature of things. But the personal is also significant.

Bringing the flower in tonight reminds me of the story you may have heard before of what's called the flower sermon, which was supposedly the start of the Zen tradition. And the story is that the Buddha held up a flower in front of a whole assembly of monks and nuns and practitioners, held up a flower and didn't say a word. And nobody got it except one person, who was Mahakashyapa. And Mahakashyapa got it and just acknowledged to the Buddha that he'd gotten it. And that was the end of the flower sermon and the start of the Zen tradition.

As soon as I heard that story, I knew I was going to have some trouble with Zen—which I think is why I ended up in Vipassana. But I think that teaching is really a pointer to the union of the conventional and the ultimate that is symbolized by the flower.

In one way, this flower is not different from any other flower. It's got a stem, it's got leaves, it's got petals, it's got stamen and pistils to propagate itself. There's the reproduction theme again. It's not different from any other flower. And yet, as you look at it—I think this is a carnation, it's not a rose—it's like a rose in a lot of ways, but it's not a rose. If you look at the beauty of this flower, it's very individual. It's really unique. And this personal uniqueness of its expression is what's called in tradition its suchness. But at the same time, you know that that suchness is underlain by its emptiness. Its individuality is just made up of different arrangements of common components.

So that's like that with each one of us. Someone is a rose, someone's a carnation, someone's a gardenia. We all have different fragrances and scents and individual beauties. In that way, the path, the unfolding is quite personal. But the components that we're all made up of are the same. Sadness, fear, joy, happiness, compassion, equanimity.

So it's not really quite right to say that we're the same person, because a rose isn't the same as a carnation. But it's also not quite right to say we're really different, because we're basically the same package, just little variations in the mix. So maybe the terms "same" and "different" don't apply between you and me. Maybe our relationship is in some other dimension than that. We're not the same, we're not different. This is not just idle philosophical mind play.

But when you really start to get the sense that we're not different, you get in touch with this poem by Rumi's master, who was a Sufi called Shams of Tabriz. Not many poems have come down from Rumi's teacher, but this is one:

I, you, he, she, we.
In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions.

In the garden of clear seeing, these are not true distinctions either. So the insight into the emptiness of things, the ultimate truth of things, takes away the barriers. It takes away the differences that concepts have created. And we understand that our basic nature, the nature of reality for you, is exactly the same as the nature of reality for me. But at the same time, we're different flowers. And there's an individuality that's also true, the level of conventional truth.

As we connect with this sadness and we reestablish the contact with purity, then it's really important not to lose our mindfulness. And this often happens. As people start to experience the purity, the mindfulness goes blank. And it's actually a lot easier to be mindful with difficulty than it is with ease. Because what happens is we start to think, "Oh, this is the way it's supposed to be. Now I'm back in purity. Oh, this is what's supposed to be happening." And then we take it for granted.

Instead of seeing, "Oh, this is the wholesome state of mind. This is mindfulness. This is peace. This is equanimity. This is ease." So as you touch these cycles of purity in your practice, it's really, really important to notice those states of mind just as much as you notice the difficult. Because if you don't notice that they're there, you're going to think your practice is all about the difficult.

In fact, these moments of peace are coming in many, many times during the day. All we have to do is wake up and notice them. But if we're not alert, if we're going to sleep because we take them for granted, we won't ever notice that they're there.

Also this idea, "this is the way things are supposed to be," is delusional. There is no way things are supposed to be. There's only the way things are. Things are the way they are because of past causes and conditions. There's no other way they could be. So this idea that there's some way they're supposed to be is a fiction. There is no way that things are supposed to be.

The Buddha's reference point was emptiness. It wasn't a concept of how things are supposed to be. Emptiness really means the understanding that nothing is there from the beginning. Nothing is there all the time. No state of mind is intrinsically and always present. So anything that appears is interesting. Anything that appears is different from emptiness, different from nothing there from the beginning.

So we notice the wholesome, we notice the positive, and we trust in that. And the more we can relax and trust in this positivity, the more we have the engine that carries the journey and can carry it all the way, all the way to liberation. Many beautiful unfoldings along the way. Healing happens. Concentration happens. Insight happens. Extraordinary openings. Joy and love come along the path. But the Buddha said, don't stop at any of those.

I just want to close with this quote from a sutta called The Simile of the Heartwood from the Majjhima Nikaya, that describes the Buddha's view of the purpose of this unfolding:

This holy life does not have gain, honor, and renown for its end. It doesn't have virtue for its end. It doesn't have concentration for its end. It doesn't have knowledge and vision for its end.

But it is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the purpose of this holy life, its end and its completion.

This unshakable deliverance of mind—this is what we're really after. Not the pleasant states along the way, not even the profound insights or the deep peace, but this complete freedom that cannot be touched by the changing conditions of life. This is liberation itself.

The path unfolds naturally when we understand this distinction. We can enjoy the jhanas, appreciate the insights, feel gratitude for the peace and clarity that come with practice. But we don't mistake these for the destination. They are like beautiful rest stops on a journey—wonderful to experience, but not where we're ultimately headed.

When we grasp after these intermediate experiences, when we try to possess them or make them permanent, we create suffering. But when we recognize them as part of the unfolding toward complete freedom, we can receive them with appreciation while remaining unattached.

This unshakable deliverance of mind is available to each of us. It's not reserved for special people or those with particular gifts. It's the natural result of following this path with patience, consistency, and understanding. The Buddha's teaching points directly to this possibility—not as something to believe in, but as something to discover for ourselves.

Let's just sit for a minute in the silence that points toward this freedom.

Relating With Emotions; Plus Mindfulness, Consciousness And Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 1h04

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses two essential aspects of meditation practice. First, he explores how to skillfully relate with difficult emotions, drawing from both Vipassana and Dzogchen approaches. Armstrong discusses the purification process common in silent retreats, where stored karmic patterns surface and can be released through non-reactive awareness. He outlines three methods for working with emotions: resting in mind essence (Rigpa), mindful observation of the emotion itself, and applying antidotes when necessary. The second part examines the often-confusing relationships between mindfulness (sati), consciousness (viññāṇa), and awareness. Armstrong offers a creative analogy of sunlight pervading space to reconcile how consciousness can be impermanent (arising and passing with objects) while the underlying clarity of awareness remains continuous. This illuminating metaphor helps bridge Theravada and Dzogchen understandings of mind's nature. Throughout, Armstrong emphasizes that emotional purification is not peripheral but integral to realizing emptiness, as accumulated tensions in the subtle body create a sense of solid selfhood that must be released for deeper realization to unfold.

There are so many topics to explore, so tonight I want to cover two things. I want to talk about relating with emotions, and then I want to discuss a question we've been putting off for a few nights regarding the relationship between mindfulness, consciousness, and awareness. So our evening will have two parts.

I want to read you something from a classical Dzogchen text about thoughts and emotions: "Without following thoughts, in the moment of their arising, relax naturally and rest in the state of mind itself. Without a doubt, thoughts will vanish spontaneously."

Has that been your experience? You just rest in the state of mind and thoughts spontaneously vanish? Not always. I would say probably for most of us, not usually is it that simple. But sometimes you can get the idea from these texts that it should be that simple. But if it doesn't happen like that for you, then what should you do?

A friend of mine, Carol Wilson, whom many of you know, was teaching in Burma last year. She was teaching with Steve Smith and also a Burmese teacher, Sayadaw Ulakana. It was a retreat for Westerners, taught by this mix of Western and Burmese teachers. Some Burmese were also sitting in—the translator and some assistants.

One of the Burmese meditators came up to Carol at the end of the retreat and said, "Wow, it's so interesting for us to hear you talk about how to work with these emotions, because our teachers never talk to us like that." As you probably know, Vipassana has very detailed instructions about how to relate with the experience of difficult emotions. This really isn't done in Asia—it's not done in any Asian tradition that I know of. I think it's a little bit the influence of Western psychology in Vipassana teaching.

"So we really appreciate hearing you talk in detail about how to work with these difficult emotions like anger. Because our teacher tells us, 'Oh, note it three times and it will go away. Note anger once, note anger twice, note anger three times and it will go away.'"

Carol said, "Well, that wouldn't work well for most Westerners. It just doesn't happen like that for Westerners."

And the Burmese meditator said, "Oh, but you see, our anger doesn't go away then either."

And Carol said, "Well, then what do you do?"

He said, "Well, we just say, 'Oh, well, never mind.'"

I think that's a beautiful tribute to the equanimity of the Burmese people. But with Westerners, we're usually not so happy to just say, "Oh, well, never mind." There's a lot of anger here. I'm burning up with it. Oh, well, never mind.

So even though in the practice of Dzogchen we are turning to the innate purity and abiding in that innate purity, other aspects of mind will also arise. So I want to talk a little bit about how to relate to them.

In Vipassana retreats, one of the most distinctive patterns that we see in the silent retreat practice is the purification process of difficult emotions. It follows a similar pattern: over the first several days of the retreat, people's minds will start to calm down and quiet, day by day. You see the slow deepening of the effect of the silence and sustained awareness. Then after a few days, people have often reached some new level of calm or peace and feel the meditation is going fairly well.

And then the very next day, there might be a big explosion. It doesn't happen like this for everybody, but it's a common enough pattern that we've seen it hundreds of times. Every Vipassana teacher has seen this hundreds of times with students. This big explosion could be something related to outside life situations. It could just be the arising of stored energies, memories, the accumulated karmic patterns. It can come from different sources.

But at that point, the meditator often feels that they've gone off track because everything was deepening quite nicely and then it got bombed. They feel like an explosion was thrown in the middle of their practice. The next couple of days might be very chaotic—lots of thought energy, no calm at all, lots of strong energy in the body, sometimes strong emotions accompanying it, no ability to focus or concentrate on even the simplest object. They feel their practice has fallen apart.

But at that point, hopefully they talk to a teacher, and the teacher always says, "No, this is just part of the process. Just stay with what's happening and don't be concerned about it." And then, sure enough, in another day or so, the calm will start to come back in. If the meditator can just stay non-reactive and untroubled by the chaos, then it all just settles back out.

And then the meditator goes to a deeper level of peacefulness and calm than they had been in before. This is part of the purification. There have been a number of questions about old karmic patterns coming up—when we experience them without reactivity, that depletes the karmic bank. And this is the obvious expression of that process within the context of the silent retreat.

So I was curious to see if, in doing Dzogchen practice, the same kind of thing would happen or not. Some years ago, I was practicing at Angela Center with Rinpoche. I was in the middle of doing my work meditation in the kitchen and still connecting with mind essence as I was doing it. Right in the middle of my kitchen job, something in my chest just loosened up and came up and out. It wasn't particularly painful, and it was coming out of a period of calm, so I trusted in it. But there was just some deep release. It didn't come with any memories or words particularly from my chest—it just rose into consciousness and passed out. Then I was left feeling much freer and lighter.

I happened to see Rinpoche a little bit later, and I told him about that. Then I told him how it had evolved. I said, "But the funny thing was, the next day I had all sorts of chaotic thoughts and feelings, and I couldn't focus really on rigpa. My meditation was just all over the map that particular day." I was very familiar with the pattern from Vipassana practice.

What was interesting to me is that his response was, "Yeah, that's exactly how it is. It's exactly how it is when these releases happen in doing rigpa practice—there's a great sense of openness, and then chaos tends to come in and fill the void." That's when I really trusted that this practice also does this deep work of purification of the emotional life, because I experienced it myself.

This kind of purification, I think, is an absolutely essential part of the meditative process, whether through Vipassana meditation or through Dzogchen meditation. Not only does it relieve suffering of old accumulations, but I've also come to feel that it's really necessary for the realization of emptiness—that one cannot possibly perceive the true extent of emptiness without releasing these old karmic accumulations.

Why is that? Because I think these karmic accumulations create a very strong sense of self or ego. They do this both through the body and through the mind. When we have a lot of these stored memories, pains, old hurts that are stored up in the body, number one, the body has layers of tension that make it uncomfortable. But we carry around the history with us through the body. Because those things have been stored and not released, the mind is always a little bit keeping a lid on the unruly bodily energy. So there's a sense of a little bit of tension between mind and body. It also gives more of a sense of solidity in the body because of the tension.

This is experienced, I think, in what Rinpoche has been calling the subtle body. This is a term that we don't use in Vipassana practice, so I just wanted to mention the way I understand the subtle body. The gross body is what doctors know from anatomy charts, what you see if you dissect a human body—that's the gross body. The subtle body, as I understand it, is the experience of the physical body through awareness. In other words, when you close your eyes and you just relax into your felt sense of the body sensations, I believe that's what's called the subtle body.

So in these felt sensations, we don't normally experience the length of the bones, for instance, because I don't think that there are nerves all along there. The subtle body is the way we experience the flow of energy as bodily sensations. Anyone who's meditated for a long time and paid close attention in this way will see there are lots of patterns in the subtle body—patterns of energy movement, repeated ways that we feel the same in different parts of the body again and again. When I was paying a lot of attention to the body, I felt I could have mapped out energy patterns that probably corresponded to acupuncture meridians or something like that. As the consciousness gets very subtly attuned, you can really feel a lot of detail in the energy in the body. And it also includes, of course, the channels and the winds that Rinpoche has talked about a number of times.

The subtle body is strongly affected by the accumulations—the stored tensions, memories, hurts, traumas, pains that we haven't allowed to come through our system. It gets all jammed up there. So first we feel this sense of self through the body, through its lack of flexibility and freedom and ease.

The second place is in the mind. When these accumulations are there, the mind responds in very habitual patterns because these underlying emotions are exerting a strong subconscious force. So the mind tends to respond in habitual and conditioned ways.

The combination of these two—the stuckness in the body and the habitual patterns in the mind—create a strong sense of personality. They make a sense that this is who we are because it's so repeatable. It seems so repeatable and predictable and ongoing, day by day, month by month, year by year. And so we get the sense this is who we are, that our personality gets stuck in that particular rut. Both these are expressions of being tied to the past.

We're tied to the past because we haven't yet learned how to release it.

So one of the big developments in meditation practice—whether awareness practice, mindfulness, or Rigpa—is that the awareness starts to penetrate these stored accumulations and bring them into consciousness. It's making the unconscious conscious. As it does that, if we can be with them without reactivity, they have the opportunity to move through and truly get released. Truly gone from the system, as though they had never been there to begin with.

When this happens, the mind becomes much more open. Every time one of these releases occurs, the mind regains a little bit of its original space. And with that space come the qualities of the third aspect of Rigpa. Remember that the first is empty essence. The second is nature clarity. The third is that the indivisible union of the two is unceasing compassionate activity.

When the mind gets released from its old habits, that's what opens the door for the third qualities to start flowing out. And when you see somebody like Rinpoche, you can really get a sense. The creativity, the playfulness, the groundedness, the confidence, the trust—all those qualities can flow out once the prison or the bondage of the old karmic patterns aren't confining us so much.

This came home to me in a retreat with Rinpoche some years ago, again at Angela Center. I'd had a lot of insights into what in our tradition, the Vipassana tradition, we call anatta, or not-self, over the years, but most of them had been out of very deep states of samadhi, of concentration, and they'd been rather intense experiences where things had been changing, dissolving, arising and passing quite rapidly, so much so that I could see there was nothing fixed in the mind-body system.

In the middle of this retreat with Rinpoche, I just noticed that there was so much openness and so much space that there couldn't possibly have been a self within it. Couldn't possibly have been a self. It was all just way too open. I looked for something, and it was clear there was just nothing there. It's one aspect of emptiness. But I don't think this could have happened until a certain amount of that karmic purification had taken place. Because earlier in my meditation career, I looked in and there was stuff jammed up. There was a strong feeling of self or personality that was continuing.

So this experience was quite lovely. It felt freeing. It also felt kind of ordinary. It wasn't accompanied by particularly strong samadhi. It was just in a week-long retreat with a schedule just like this one. But for me it was a different flavor of anatta than I'd had before, yet it was just as meaningful. And that's the kind of openness that can come in the personality when it's not confined by the old patterns.

I should mention that in Tibetan practices, there are specific methods for releasing these old obscurations. The ngöndro, and particularly the preliminary practices of Tibetan Buddhism, are intended to work on this level. And one of the key figures in this is a Yidam, a deity known as Vajrasattva. This statue just to my right of Rinpoche's throne, your left, is a statue of Vajrasattva, the principal deity in the Dzogchen practices. There's also a thangka at the back of the room which depicts Vajrasattva. Usually during Rinpoche's retreats, he either gives instructions in Vajrasattva visualization and mantra practice, but this retreat, for whatever reason, he hasn't. So we haven't been working with it, but I just wanted, especially the Vipassana practitioners, to know that there are a number of tools in Tibetan practices that are specifically designed for purifying the obscurations.

I think it really is an important part. The emotional purification that goes on is not just a sideshow of the practice. It's a really integral and important part of the purification of heart and mind.

So how to work as the emotions come up, if they do come up? Rinpoche talked at the end this afternoon about a few different levels of approach, and I think it would be helpful to review those.

The first approach to take if you're doing Dzogchen practice is just to recognize mind essence even while the difficult emotion is there, and see what happens. Sometimes the thoughts will vanish. Sometimes the emotion will either dissolve or be accommodated within the view so that the sense of conflict with it goes out. Maybe the whole grasping will go out at once, which is one of the possibilities he mentioned. I think he talked about the energy of anger remaining, but the hook of anger going out. So that's a possibility that the clinging really is undercut. Sometimes there's just a weakening of the force. There's still clearly clinging in it, but there's a weakening of the force.

But other times, as you turn to mind essence, if the emotion is really strong and the Rigpa is just not strong enough, you may not feel much impact or loosening or de-identification. The ego clinging in relation to the emotion may still be quite strong.

If that's the case and there's no sense of loosening of the grasping to it, then it's helpful to try a different approach. Rinpoche would call it shamatha with support. We would call it, in the Vipassana style, mindfulness of the emotion.

In Vipassana practice, we spend a lot of time talking about how to relate directly with the emotion that's coming. So to know it for what it is, to open to it without any sense of pushing away or aversion, and to feel it directly in the body and mind with no holding back. So it's not to analyze it, it's not to judge it, it's not to try to make it go away. The central point in this kind of mindfulness approach is to open completely to it and feel it completely just as it is.

So it's leaving it alone. It's not applying an antidote either. It's leaving it alone and letting it express its nature. And what we see when it expresses its nature is that its nature is impermanent. All these mind states that we've trapped out of fear, that we've held onto, all they ever wanted to do was to come out on the stage, dance and sing for a while, and then exit stage right. That's their only agenda.

But because of our fear, we never let them do that. They'd get up on the stage, and they'd give a few kicks. And we'd say, "Nope, I'm going to bring down the curtain on this one. I'm not comfortable with it." And that's how they got trapped. All we have to do to let them pass through is to give them the full stage.

So in a way, this is really what I meant when I talked about the approach of mindfulness. The liberation of the emotions is based in the object. It's not particularly about turning to mind essence, but we trust the emotion itself to live its life, do its thing, and then manifest its impermanence.

So in a way, you could say it's seeing the emptiness of the object. Impermanence is closely linked with emptiness. When we see that things come and go, we know that their nature is not permanent, is not fixed. So they are empty. So essentially, in the approach of mindfulness, we are allowing the emotion to demonstrate its own emptiness. And then it's not our problem. We don't have to actually do anything with it, but let it come, express itself, and go.

The third approach is what Rinpoche mentioned as the antidote. And there are lots of these within the Vipassana tradition. He mentioned a few of the most common ones for greed, aversion, and delusion. But I just want to also mention—sometimes I hear from Vajrayana teachers that an antidote is the main approach of the Hinayana. And I just want to clarify that it's not the main approach for Vipassana practitioners. Mindfulness and seeing the emptiness of the emotion is the primary approach for Vipassana practitioners. Antidotes are applied only if that doesn't work.

So the main practices that we should apply are—I'm talking specifically to the Vipassana practitioners actually—first, to rest in mind essence and see if that will loosen the identification. This is beautiful if it works. Because one does get the sense, even though Rinpoche said this is a very advanced practice, of the thief entering the empty house. When you see the emptiness of self, there's nothing for the emotion to be in conflict with. There's nobody pushing against it. So even if it lingers for a little bit, it's just dancing in empty space, and there's no danger.

And the second one, mindfulness of emotion, is what you all are mostly familiar with. Both these approaches have a great strength, and I'd say a potential limitation.

I want to talk about why mindfulness of emotions is such a great strength. There's a Burmese story of a hunter who was a great and skilled hunter and knew how to trap all the animals and kill all the animals to provide food. And then one day, somebody came along and said, "Oh, yeah, there are many animals in the forest. I know you've gotten most of them. But you know, there's one really rare bird. And I don't think you've found that." And he described the bird to the hunter. And the hunter said, "No, I haven't."

I've never seen that bird, much less trapped it or shot it. Can you tell me where it is?

And the person said, "Well, it hangs out most of the time in that part of the forest. Go look for it there."

So the hunter knew the forest very well. He went and waited in that corner of the forest, waited a long time, very patiently. No rare bird. But he hung out there for a long time. Then he thought, "No, it's not there. I better go over to this other part of the forest. I'll wait there and see if it comes there."

So he hung out in this part of the forest, day after day, observing the clouds and the light and the other animals and the creatures who came, the way the trees changed with the light, dawn and nightfall. Not there either.

So he kept checking out all the different parts of the forest for this rare bird. Never did find it. But what he said when he finished the quest—when he gave up on the quest—was: "I never did find that bird, but you know, I came to know that forest really well, because I'd spent so much time in every single corner of it."

So the analogy is, the rare bird, you might say, is enlightenment. Maybe we'll get there. Maybe we'll find it. Maybe we won't. But as the hunter did, if we investigate every corner of the forest—which is this mind—in search of enlightenment, we get to know that forest really well.

That's one of the things I really appreciate about mindfulness with emotions. We really come to know very well what anger feels like, what desire feels like, what confusion, restlessness, dullness, pride, jealousy—and then loving-kindness, compassion, joy, equanimity, calm, concentration, and so forth. We come to know all the corners of the mind really, really well.

And there's something freeing in that. It may not be the ultimate freedom—may not be enlightenment—but we know the terrain so that, as Rinpoche has said, we don't have to be afraid of ourselves. We've investigated all those corners, all the dark, scary corners. We've been there. We've seen what they hold, and we don't have to worry about it anymore.

I think that's a strength of mindfulness of emotions.

There's a limitation to this practice. There can be, and it's that we may, in doing this, put too much emphasis on the emotion and think that the emotions are really the heart of meditation or even the heart of the release of suffering—that if we know all the emotions well enough, that will in itself be liberating. This is the danger in mindfulness practice. Mindfulness is always associated with objects, and we can get focused too much on the object and forget that the emphasis is in the awareness.

Particularly when the mindfulness is coupled with charged things like emotions, the tendency for that to happen is greater. So the meditator may develop a habit of ascribing more importance to the emotions than they actually contain and centering the practice around the emotions. That's only a potential danger.

The strength of the approach of mind essence is that it puts the emphasis in the right place, which is the ultimate nature of things. This is really the source of liberation. One of the things I think that comes from this directly is a lot of equanimity—a lot of equanimity, because it takes the focus away from the changing appearances. All the emotions are just kind of transient visitors. The refuge is awareness.

So this takes the spotlight off the transient visitors and puts it back into awareness, which really emphasizes the refuge of awareness, which is steady through all the arisings and passings. In a way, this is a sane emphasis. This is the right emphasis. This is really where freedom comes from—where equanimity comes from.

And as we can rest more and more and trust in the refuge of awareness, we don't care so much about the passing show. Emotions come and go. If we don't latch onto them, they're actually not problematic.

This approach puts us more in touch with that truth. But there's a possible limitation here also. And again, I say possible, not necessary. The reason is that this approach may not always be the one that will loosen the clinging in that moment. But because it's such an elegant approach, we may think it's the only good approach. Or we may think this is the best approach. Or we may think this approach has such a superior view that we won't condescend to use any of the other approaches because they're really kind of lower-class meditations. And so we develop a kind of intellectual superiority that ties us to one particular approach.

The best approach for you in a given moment is the one that will loosen ego clinging—not A, B, or C. And it may change. So I think it's really important to be open to looking at which technique is best right now. And so be willing to try them all, including "stupid shamatha" with a beer, if that's the one that really does it for you.

So I just really wanted to encourage you to give emotions proper respect. They are a really important part of this practice. And just learn to relate to them in a few different ways so that you feel free to choose the way that will free you best, that will work for you in that moment.

Any questions or comments so far?

Someone asked about using the antidote. Rinpoche gave the classical examples. If we're caught in desire—say it's sexual desire—a typical antidote to sexual desire is visualizing the body aging, dying, and then the corpse decaying. So you start to think: well, I may have what I want today, but in twenty years, what will it look like? In general, this is called contemplation of the unbeautiful aspects.

The typical antidote to anger is loving-kindness. So one can actually turn directly to a meditation of loving-kindness. And the typical antidote to delusion is wisdom—reflection on dharma points. I think Rinpoche mentioned the chain of dependent origination.

Another question: in the Sutta on the Foundations of Mindfulness, the Buddha doesn't talk about the subtle body. The subtle body is not a term that's used anywhere in Theravada literature, as far as I know. So I think it came out of the tantras. I don't think it's in Mahayana either. But I think it's implicitly there in some of its aspects when he talks about body sensations. Body sensations are basically the part of the subtle body that we can connect with directly.

I think generally the idea is that the subtle body only exists when consciousness is functioning within the gross body. So my understanding is that at death, the subtle body moves on or ends and arises again with the new birth—one or the other.

Someone asked about the possible drawback of the looking practice, whether it might encourage people to further repress emotions. No, I didn't say that, and I don't see that as a problem. Because if you really do connect with mind essence, you're not going to overlook appearances. You're not going to overlook emotions.

Another question about whether the subtle body is connected with the Vipassana technique of sweeping...

The question is whether the subtle body is connected with the Vipassana technique of sweeping, and definitely that is what is getting experienced through the sweeping practice. The question is why the sweeping practice isn't more integrated for us. I used to teach sweeping on Vipassana retreats, and it's a great technique for some people. For those who don't know, sweeping is the systematic scanning of the attention through the body, experiencing all the sensations that one encounters. But over time, I've just come to trust in the power of one particular technique and kind of following it through for most people. And the people who are interested in sweeping usually will go and find a Goenka retreat somewhere.

I think we clarified the question about whether Rinpoche said that karma was neither created nor exhausted in doing mindfulness practice. We worked through the question and clarified it to the extent that he agreed that that particular karmic pattern was getting depleted if it came up and was experienced without reactivity. So that particular pattern becomes depleted. In the Theravadan tradition, it's not considered that all karma gets depleted through mindfulness. But the Buddha does say that the Eightfold Path, which includes mindfulness—the way he describes it is, it's action that is neither bright nor dark, leading to the end of karma. So it's pretty clear in the text that the Eightfold Path leads to the end of karma, but that's considered at the level of an arhat, that it's ended.

The question was, what version of Ngöndro does Rinpoche do? And I don't know the answer to that.

So, I want to move into part two of the talk. Have people still got a little energy? I want to talk about these terms mindfulness, consciousness, and awareness. And first I want to introduce why they became so interesting for me.

I think I mentioned the other night that rigpa kind of connects in two directions in the Vipassana system. Because it has the nature of cognizance, it connects with what is called consciousness in the Theravada system. Cognizance, consciousness—almost synonyms. Because its nature is unchanging, and it's beyond arising and ceasing, it also connects to the quality of nibbana. In the Theravadan system or the Pali suttas, there's only one unchanging Dhamma, and that is nibbana. So if the nature of mind is of this unchanging nature, then it also links to nibbana. So it links to consciousness on the one hand and nibbana on the other.

Now this is really confusing for Theravadan students, because the Buddha talked about consciousness as something that's impermanent. And I just want to emphasize why that is so.

Consciousness in the Pali suttas is considered to be the bare knowing of an object before any words come in. Just the ability to hold the sense datum. When you hear a sound, just the kind of musical tone of that sound as you receive it is being known in consciousness. Before you apply anything like, "that's a bell," much less "that's the end of the sitting, that's C sharp," or anything conceptual like that. Just the bare sound, completely physical experience—the knowing of that is the factor of consciousness.

And in the Pali suttas, it's taught that the consciousness arises with the object and passes away with the object. So there's currently hearing consciousness happening for us. But as the sound of the bell dies away and no other sound comes in, there's no new hearing consciousness arising. So the consciousness is considered to arise with the object and pass with the object. And that's how it's considered impermanent. And the term for this is vijñāna. Rinpoche has been talking about eight classes of vijñāna. In the Pali system, we have six. All the mind ones are just one consciousness.

So that's the term consciousness. Mindfulness we talked about is the factor—Rinpoche calls it alertness—of knowing our experience. A little intelligence is coming through. So we at least know hearing. There's the physical sound held by consciousness, and as the attention turns to it, we recognize, oh, that's hearing. It's arising at the ear door.

At least that much intelligence is happening—a kind of perception, recognition through the factor of mindfulness. So a little intelligence there. The consciousness doesn't have any intelligence. If you're not asleep and a sound happens, the consciousness will happen. But the mindfulness, not necessarily. For mindfulness, there has to be an awakeness, an alertness, attentiveness. So these are mindfulness and consciousness.

In the Pali suttas, there's no term that needs to be translated by awareness. You can translate the whole Pali canon and not use the term awareness. So let's hold onto awareness for a minute. And just say that the dilemma for somebody who's coming out of the Pali suttas is the concept that Rigpa, with its emptiness and its cognizance, is unceasing. Well, how can cognizance be unceasing when consciousness is coming and going? How can we reconcile those two?

In fact, if you take the Rigpa model to certain Asian teachers, especially in Burma and Sri Lanka, they will reject it flat out. You remember I told that story about asking Mingyur Rinpoche the difference between the Madhyamaka view and the Dzogchen view? He said, basically, the Madhyamaka people—the followers of Nagarjuna—think that the Dzogchen people are making something up that's not really there, which is essentially the cognizant nature as an enduring thing. But Mingyur Rinpoche said that they just don't quite understand it right the way we hold it.

This same dilemma will happen today many times, I think, as the Theravadan teachings and the Dzogchen teachings come into more and more contact. It became a subject of a lot of concern for me. Maybe nobody else cares philosophically, but I did.

It was interesting—Ajahn Sumedho was here teaching, I think it was two years ago now, and he talks very much from a Dzogchen point of view, even though he's in the Thai monastic scene. He has that same take on awareness as the ongoing refuge. And somebody asked him that question: "But the Buddha said consciousness is impermanent and comes and goes." And he basically said, "Yeah, that's true, but this works for me." He was totally unconcerned about the philosophical dilemma.

I just want to point out that's one approach that as practitioners you're welcome to take. That cuts through all the debates.

One way to resolve it is just to say the Rigpa model is a skillful means. If I turn to mind essence, I can always find some cognizance there. And whether it's really permanent or not, it works as a meditation technique. You bypass the philosophical dilemma. And I think that's absolutely honorable. So for those of you who would like, feel free to bypass the philosophical dilemma. But for me, that wasn't enough.

So let me finish this train of thought, and then I'll take questions.

I was teaching a class for senior Vipassana students a few years ago, and we were discussing this question. I couldn't figure out a way to explain it. I went home and went to sleep. In the middle of the night, I woke up, and the resolution came to me. This is the image that I want to share with you tonight.

In Tibetan texts, they often talk about the clarity aspect as sunlight pervading empty space. The emptiness aspect is like the space. The clarity aspect is like the sunlight. And that played a part, I'm sure, in my image.

But this is the image that came: Let's say you're out on the edge of the solar system and you're facing away from the sun. And don't worry about a space suit or helmet or goggles or anything. It's just naked awareness on the edge of the solar system. You're facing away from the sun. Let's say you're looking into a part of the solar system that doesn't have any stars. What do you see?

"Your shadow?"

That was indeed a good thought—a very good thought. This is not a trick question. What do you see? Exactly—it's totally black. But here's the key question: is it the color black that's coming into your eye, or is it simply the absence of light?

You're not seeing any light at all. Yet is there, in fact, light in front of you? The sunlight is pervading that empty space before you, but you're not seeing it.

Now suppose a meteor flashes from below, up in front of your eyes, then passes out above you. Do you see the meteor? Yes—in fact, you see it as a bright flash of light. That light is actually reflected sunlight, and it only comes to your eyes because an object has arisen that can reflect it.

So in this analogy, the sunlight pervading empty space is the nature clarity. The meteor is a phenomenon like a sound. The reflected light is the consciousness that illuminates that appearance. As soon as the meteor is out of sight, do you see any more light? Gone.

The sunlight pervading empty space is always there, but we don't know it until some phenomenon comes along that can reflect it. Then what's reflected is the phenomenon. The knowing of that comes and goes with the phenomenon, because that's the reflected clarity of the sunlight—that's the consciousness aspect.

In this model, consciousness comes and goes, but it's based on the ever-present clarity, which is otherwise invisible. Sometimes I add to this analogy that the sunlight pervading empty space is invisible, but sometimes the meditator can turn back, face the source, and see the light directly.

This is what the sunlight analogy captures beautifully. The light—which is neither a particle nor a wave, having a somewhat in-between existence without mass—is of that nature. There's no object involved. But it's only when the object comes that consciousness can arise, dependent on that underlying cognizance.

Exactly. Consciousness is turning on and off, although the sunlight—the underlying clarity—is always there. We become lost in the reflections of the clarity, you might say.

But how are you going to become aware of its pervasive nature if you don't turn around to see the source? All you would see are the reflections dependent on phenomena. I'm not saying you see anything visually, but you become aware of the awareness.

You become aware of it. I suppose the question could come up: where did that light come from? And then the deduction—it must be ever-present. But all analogies break down at some point, and this may be that point. But I think there is something about turning in the direction of the radiance that's kind of important.

"Right, and I think that's where the analogy breaks down. We've got a dualistic setup in the analogy from the beginning."

Lee raised another question: "I don't think I buy it. What do you mean by 20 years? I don't think so. That's a thing that exists. That's for a thing that exists. But because... it does not fit into either category of existing or not existing. Just like a light particle kind of doesn't have mass."

Again, this is where the analogy breaks down. But the understanding is, I'd say, also the same for nibbana. If you want to go to classical Theravadan view, nibbana also cannot be said to be an existent. And yet you can't say that it's not something. The Buddha clearly said there is this unborn, there is this unproduced, this unmade. Without it, no escape would be possible from what is produced and made. So I think it also transcends the categories of existence and non-existence. And I think the ground has that same ontological status.

Bill asked about the analogy: "I'd be interested in your comment that you said throughout, that the natural clarity recognizes its own emptiness, not the view of life, if I understand that."

Right, right. Again, this is where the analogy breaks down. Because, let's face it—anytime we use physical objects for the analogy, there's no sentience there. But any analogy will only go so far. So I can't put sentience into sunlight. Problem solved, then.

So the way I tend to use awareness now is through the sunlight analogy. The clarity aspect of sunlight pervading empty space is what I tend to call awareness. And you notice that it has within it both the functions of consciousness and also of mindfulness, of recognition. It's got enough wisdom that it recognizes.

So personally, I—and I think Joseph also—use awareness as a word that bridges mindfulness and consciousness. It includes both mindfulness and consciousness. And when you think about the way we use awareness in English, it has both those qualities. It's smart, but it also just keeps happening on its own. Like you don't have to force consciousness of hearing, you don't have to force awareness of hearing. But just like mindfulness has intelligence to know that's a sound, awareness has a sense of intelligence. So that's the way I tend to use it now.

Michael added a footnote: "The word that you're trying to say, like cognitive, literally means 'humanopathy.' So there's some analogy in that."

There is.

Yeah. Thank you for that comment. Could everybody hear that in the back? Yes, I appreciate the linguistic insight. I'm not throwing the analogy out just because it's not perfect—no analogy ever is. I just want us to return to the essence here.

For me, this sun and cloud metaphor beautifully explains how the underlying luminosity of awareness could be enduring while consciousness comes and goes. That's what I want us to take as the essence of the analogy—this understanding of the relationship between the changeless ground of awareness and the fluctuating movements of consciousness.

Jude, you had a question?

I haven't had a chance to explore this with Bhante Gunaratana yet. I actually tried to speak with him last month at the end of April when we were both in Massachusetts. We'd both been sitting in retreat there for some time. At the end of the scheduled retreat period, he wanted to continue sitting for a few more days, and so he declined the invitation to speak with a few of us who were hoping to engage with him about these questions. So I didn't get that opportunity.

But it's interesting to know about his perspective. I've heard he's quite open-minded—he's a Sri Lankan monk with a very receptive approach to these teachings. Yes, he is indeed. I understand he's teaching a retreat here in June, and also offering a daylong program. Our publicity director has more information about that if you're interested.

The website information is available as well. We should probably stop here for this evening.

This talk was given by Guy Armstrong at Spirit Rock Meditation Center on May 11, 2003. It is an offering of the Dharma Seat.

CHAPTER 248

Bodhisattva Path: Plus Rigpa & Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

Guy Armstrong shares his personal journey from Theravada practice focused on the arhat ideal to embracing the bodhisattva path through exposure to Shantideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra and Dzogchen teachings. He discusses how the aspiration of bodhicitta emerges from understanding anattā (not-self) and Buddha nature as the common thread connecting all beings. The second part examines four different Buddhist understandings of nibbāna: as mere cessation of the three poisons, as a transcendent state beyond sense consciousness, as awareness of the unconditioned (Thai Forest tradition), and as primordial awareness itself (Dzogchen). Drawing from Pali suttas including the analogy of unestablished consciousness as sunlight that doesn't land anywhere, Armstrong suggests the original teachings support views that include awareness as intrinsic to the unconditioned. He concludes by exploring how Rigpa practice becomes a path of 'imitating nibbāna' - repeatedly resting in our deepest unconditioned nature as best we can recognize it.

I wanted to talk about two topics tonight: the bodhisattva path and the question of rigpa and nirvana. In discussing the bodhisattva path, I want to speak from my own experience.

For twenty years I was involved exclusively in Theravada practice, where the ideal constantly emphasized is the arhat—the model of working for one's own liberation as quickly as possible. Part of the subtext often attached to this motivation is escaping this dreadful wheel of samsara as swiftly as we can. The arhat model, if taken slightly off course, has built into it an aversion to existence that can color one's approach to both practice and life.

Then I became interested in the Mahayana view of the path and picked up Shantideva's Bodhicaryavatara, which was first translated into English by Stephen Batchelor as "A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life." Reading through it, I found it quite inspiring, though it wasn't easy going. It's rather dense and contains considerable hellfire and brimstone, making it challenging. While I found it inspiring, I must admit it didn't touch me deeply at first.

The main impact was that it changed my marriage. Here I was practicing these grandiose visions of saving all beings, then returning to my relationship and having the same selfish arguments I'd been having for fifteen years. It suddenly dawned on me: if I'm trying to free all beings from suffering, why do I continue inflicting suffering on the being closest to me? I began examining my self-centered desires in this context, which helped purify some of them.

Then I attended several retreats with Rinpoche in the early to mid-nineties. Something about being in retreat space with a quiet mind, doing chants several times daily—especially the bodhicitta chant and dedication of merit we've been doing—began shifting something in me. As you know, it ends: "May we liberate migrators from the ocean of existence with its stormy waves of birth, old age, sickness, and death." Hearing this repeatedly as an important motivation within the retreat context started creating change.

During that same retreat, I began connecting more deeply with rigpa as my deepest nature of mind, realizing that this combination of emptiness and cognizance is not personal. It's not particularly Guy's deepest nature or Justine's deepest nature—this is the deepest nature of all sentient beings. I don't imagine the way it expresses in this mind-body system differs much from how it expresses in others.

I started seeing that the game of spiritual practice wasn't just about clearing obscurations from this particular parcel of awareness—it was about clearing obscurations from awareness wherever it was manifesting. Through the concept of Buddha nature, I had tapped into the common thread joining us all, or rather, that we are all expressions of. Seeing Buddha nature at this level broke down the distinction between self and other that I had maintained throughout my practice career.

This was a beautiful opening. I came to feel that the aspiration of bodhicitta was really the manifestation—or practice—of understanding egolessness. The teachings on anatta or not-self are basic to Theravada and are explored repeatedly. But this was a way of understanding their implications for practice and motivation. If there truly is no separate self, then each person's liberation is as important as anyone else's. This is one of the themes Shantideva emphasizes repeatedly: the equalizing of oneself with others.

This understanding began coming through meaningfully and started shifting my practice motivation. However, I've noticed that when I don't maintain that intention and reinforce it through conscious reflection, the bodhicitta aspiration falls away. I often find the arhat path looking very attractive again—just the concept of reaching the end as soon as possible.

This deeper connection revealed through Buddha nature insights reminded me of a poem by Rumi's teacher, Shams of Tabriz. While Rumi left hundreds, perhaps thousands of poems, his teacher didn't leave many behind. Coleman Barks says his teacher left at least this one poem: "I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

I think the teaching on Buddha nature points to the fact that in the garden of clear seeing, these are not true distinctions either. In some ways, the bodhicitta aspiration emerges from understanding the underlying unity we all share and is simply the manifestation of that insight.

Having opened to the bodhicitta aspiration through these teachings, we should recall that there are two aspects of bodhicitta: relative and ultimate. Ultimate bodhicitta is Buddha nature—something to be realized. Relative bodhicitta is the somewhat fabricated or conceptual aspiration we practice to develop over time.

This has caused me some dilemmas along the way because there are two pieces to this relative bodhicitta: practicing for our own enlightenment, and helping all beings. Which comes first? Which is more important? In our life, we make choices, and different people make different choices. If we look at the Tibetan tradition, we can see different choices being made by leading teaching figures.

There's a stanza toward the end of Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life that the Dalai Lama is very fond of. He associates with it and quotes it again and again. I think it is his guiding principle: "For as long as space endures and as long as living beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the misery of this world." To me, this is an aspiration of the kind of bodhisattva who will postpone their own liberation in order to stay and serve those who are not yet enlightened. This is one beautiful model—the notion that one stays behind until all sentient beings have become enlightened first.

But that's not the only model you find in the Tibetan tradition. One of the greatest Tibetan practitioners of all time is considered to be Milarepa, who attained Buddhahood in one lifetime. Milarepa went up into the mountains, meditated very arduously, and came to that ultimate liberation within one lifetime. He clearly did not postpone his own awakening.

As you play with the bodhisattva model, I think it's helpful to understand that there's no one right way to do it. The combination of your altruistic intention and your drive toward realization may play out differently than your neighbor's. Some people's altruistic intention is so strong they want to go into the inner city and do direct service work—and that can come out of a bodhisattva aspiration. Others may feel their bodhisattva intention falls more on the practice side, and they may go into retreat for twenty years, thirty years, or the rest of their life. That can be their expression.

Someone working in the inner city serving those in real need may look at the one in the cave and say, "Wow, that's really selfish. They really should be doing more to help the world because it's in such a dreadful state." Meanwhile, the one up in the cave meditating may look at the person doing direct service and say, "How can they really hope to help others when their own mind stream isn't purified yet? There are still obscurations and they'll just be spreading them because they're not purified. How can we help another until we've really gotten to the root of our own suffering?"

In these two attitudes, there could be judgment. What I want to say about that is I don't think any of us can judge another person's path. The Buddha said something similar when there was gossip going on between different monks about judging the practice of other monks. The Buddha came along and said, "How do you know?" How do you know where they're at in their attainment, what their motivation is, what their karma is, what their purification is? Only if you know that can you judge. He said, "I know that, so I can judge. But you don't know that, so you can't judge."

So really just a plea that as we look at the inclusion of bodhicitta in our practice, we be open to the fact that it manifests in many different ways. There is no one right model for it. The person practicing in the cave can be doing it out of very strong altruistic intention, and the person practicing in service may have a lot of ego around it. This is a plea for understanding and non-judgment, and also a message that each person's path unfolds differently. Don't take any model as the way you should be living. We will each be called to make choices between outer work and inner work, and to hold them both with this ultimate aspiration.

This leads nicely into the next question: What is the nature of realization? Another way to frame it is: What is the nature of the enlightened mind? I want to talk about it from the viewpoint of rigpa and the viewpoint of nirvana.

I'll start with a quote from a classic Dzogchen text called Self-Liberation:

"The self-originated primordial awareness has not been created by anything. Amazing. It does not experience birth, nor does there exist a cause for its death. Amazing."

In most of the Buddhist tradition, if something is uncreated, unborn, and undying, there's only one thing it can be—and that's nirvana.

So the question is: Is this basic awareness that we talked about last night the same as nirvana or not? Another way to frame this is: Is awareness an intrinsic part of the unconditioned or not?

As we explore this tonight, it may sound like an intellectual or philosophical pursuit, and I'll certainly quote some texts along the way. But what happens is that when your practice gets close to this territory, these questions take on real urgency and real meaning for practitioners. In this group, there are a number of people whose practice is in this ballpark, currently or has been. For some of us, these questions carry real urgency.

So I ask you to listen with an open mind. If it seems too philosophical right now, let it go. But for some people, these are questions of pressing importance.

One reason this matters is that in the Pali suttas, it's said that once one has realized the unconditioned and touched it directly, one has at most seven more lifetimes before full enlightenment. Basically, full enlightenment is guaranteed in at most seven more lifetimes. That's quite an insurance policy.

You can see why there might be ego clinging around this: "Wow, I had the ultimate experience where I wasn't there. I had it." There can be considerable ownership around these moments because of their promise and potential.

In this talk, I want to make a distinction that's somewhat technical but helpful for this group. As I understand it, when nirvana is used in Mahayana and Vajrayana teachings, it points to the end of the path—meaning Buddhahood. Connected with nirvana is the quality of omniscience. In Mahayana or Vajrayana, one doesn't speak of nirvana without associating it with the attainment of Buddhahood and omniscience.

In Theravadan teachings, we often use nirvana as a synonym for the unconditioned. Any realization of it by a practitioner at any stage along the journey is considered a realization of nirvana or the unconditioned. We use the terms synonymously. It doesn't just refer to the culmination of the path—it can be experienced along the way multiple times.

Tonight I want to use it primarily in this second sense, as a synonym for the unconditioned, which can be touched and encountered by practitioners at any stage of the journey.

Used in this sense, there are at least four different ways that nirvana is understood in the Buddhist tradition.

The first is that it has no reality in the realm of being. There's no state as such that we can touch called nirvana. Nirvana is simply understood as the cessation of greed, aversion, and delusion—the complete and total absence of the three poisons. Any moment in which those three are totally absent is considered a moment of nirvana, not a separate destination. It could happen eyes open or eyes closed. More to the point, there is no separate destination called nirvana. It's only a description of a state in which greed, aversion, and delusion are completely absent.

So it's a very purified state of mind, but it has no kind of being whatsoever. In philosophy, they say it has no ontological reality—ontology being the study of being. In this view, the ontological reality of nirvana is denied.

As I understand it, this is essentially the view of the Madhyamakas, the followers of Nagarjuna. Because they cut and cut and cut repeatedly, they also cut out any beingness around nirvana. It's also close to some Theravadan views, though I don't know any individuals who hold it personally. But I've heard it exists in the Theravadan schools.

Let me give an example to illustrate why this could be a reasonable point of view. As we've been introduced to the practice of Dzogchen, we've encountered something characterized by empty essence and natural cognizance. The shorthand for this is "empty knowing"—a descriptive phrase for the practice we've been doing: rest in empty knowing.

We talk about it as "empty knowing"—it's a verb, an activity. But what happens when we give the name Rigpa to that activity? When we make it a noun, the mind tends to take it as a thing.

Just by turning a verb into a noun, we tend to unconsciously ascribe an ontological reality to it. Similarly with nibbana—it could simply be the exhausting of greed, hatred, and delusion, but once we assign a noun to it, it can take on ontological reality. This represents the viewpoint of the first school on nibbana.

The second definition or understanding accords nibbana some ontological reality. It's considered neither to exist nor to not exist—beyond both existence and non-existence. Yet because its existence is not denied, it has some meaning in the realm of being. It's proper to call it a noun. The Buddha called it a dhamma, usually translated as "a thing."

In this view, nibbana is understood to be a state of cessation where the four mental aggregates cease. When one realizes nibbana, there is no feeling, no perception, no mental formations, and no consciousness. The body remains—the yogi's body does not disappear when they enter nibbana. But because consciousness is not there, there is no experience of the body. The form is still present, yet the key characteristic is a state with no sense data and no consciousness, no awareness functioning.

This is the view of a number of schools in Burma and Sri Lanka, particularly those that take their direction from the Abhidhamma and the Visuddhimagga. While I don't know that this is explicitly claimed in the Abhidhamma, I believe it is pointed to in the Visuddhimagga. These two often go together—the Abhidhamma and Visuddhimagga people tend to hang out together.

There is the admission that there's some kind of dimension here that can be realized, that can be touched. But it's entirely separate from ordinary sense reality. The understanding is that if you have your eyes open and you're experiencing sense data, you can't touch this thing. It's somewhere else—a transcendent dimension that can't coexist with sense consciousness. When it is touched, all sense contact goes away and even consciousness goes away.

How does the yogi describe or experience or realize it? Basically, as one emerges from this temporary realization, some little trace of memory might carry over. In some way, one has a feeling of what happened the moment before, just some lingering aroma. That's as close as one can come to a description.

This is very much an altered state, and because it's such an empty state, words really can't come close to it. Words fail when we try to describe this state. It's often talked about as a state of cessation. When you hear the word "cessation" in Visuddhimagga terms, this is usually what's being pointed to, because the four mental aggregates have stopped.

The third understanding or description of nirvana becomes a little more liberal—each of these gets progressively more liberal. In this view, feeling, perception, and formations cease. These three mental aggregates are absent, and the five senses cease. There's no sight, sound, smell, taste, or touch present. But some consciousness may continue—some awareness may continue.

This is the way that enlightenment is commonly described in the Thai forest tradition. What is that awareness aware of? Different people describe it differently. Some say it's just aware of itself. Some say that there's just awareness. Some say that it's aware of the unconditioned. But they're all pointing to a state where basically the only element present is some kind of knowing and something unconditioned.

Ajahn Mahabua has been quite explicit about his experience of this. He's a Thai forest master who's still living, though quite old now. He was a student of Ajahn Man, one of the great Thai forest masters of the last hundred years. He ordained as a monk when he was relatively young, and he said that when he reached his tenth rains retreat —the three-month period where the monks don't go out, usually an intensified period of meditation—

He started to sit up all night. Every night during the rains retreat, he would sit all night long without moving. That's strong motivation. And he said that it was so painful, what he went through, his body was just wracked by pain going through this practice, that he lost his fear of death. Because he felt that nothing could ever again be as painful as what he had gone through, sitting up all night, every night.

And then he said that when he finished this practice, his mind was like a rock. That he had become so concentrated through his determination, his mind was absolutely immovable. Concentration was just steady, like a rock. And he said then he enjoyed that so much, the peace of it, he was stuck there for five years. Imagine if he'd had the pointing out instructions. But no Dzogchen masters.

So he said he started to realize after a while, his teacher helped him realize that he was stuck in that concentration. And then he turned to mindfulness and wisdom. He calls them a pair, satipanya—mindfulness, wisdom. And he said, at that point, things went easily because my concentration was fully prepared. Very prepared.

He said what he turned to was investigating four elements: desire and non-desire, suffering and ease. And he saw that these four states kept cycling. Desire, absence of desire. Suffering, ease. It just kept circling. So that he saw that none of them was it. Because they were all changing. So none of them was what he was looking for. And he said he was interested in those because he was ignorant of the mind's own nature.

That's a pointing out. I was ignorant of the mind's own nature.

So he said he let go of everything but mindfulness and wisdom. This is, in Thai Forest terms, this is a looking back at the mind's own nature—mindfulness and wisdom. And then he said that the mind's own nature became impartial and impassive, not tending to anything.

Isn't this an interesting pointing? When we turn to nature of mind, the instruction is don't fasten on any phenomena. It's another way of saying don't tend to anything. Stay in the mind's own nature. So that's what Mahabua did.

And he said, at that moment, the cosmos in the mind over which ignorance held sway trembled and quaked. Ignorance was thrown down from its throne on the heart. In its place, the pure mind appeared at the same moment that ignorance was toppled and eradicated through the power of mindfulness and wisdom.

When a Thai forest monk says that ignorance was eradicated, this is a declaration of arhantship. The uprooting of ignorance is the end of suffering, the attainment of arhantship. So he said the attainment of arhantship came when the pure mind appeared through the power of mindfulness and wisdom.

So this is typical of the Thai forest tradition—the quality of awareness being central to the enlightenment process.

Then the fourth description, I would say, is basically the description we've been getting over these days of the unchanging nature of mind, as I read in that opening quote: "The self-originated primordial awareness that has not been created by anything, does not experience birth, and does not die."

One of the nice things about this view is that we can experience some aspect of this reality with eyes open, some aspect of this reality without a huge amount of concentration, some aspect of this reality with all the senses open and functioning and going about our daily life. But we understand that this nature is the deathless. So this is the fourth view.

So I got really interested in the disagreements between these schools and to see if I could reconcile them or come to my own understanding. And the answer I came up with is that I don't know. So that's the main opinion I hold at this point. I don't know. And I would love someday for a teacher to come along who's practiced in all these four ways in depth and can tell us from direct experience. So far I haven't met that person, so I don't know.

But I still got interested in the investigation. So another way to say it is: if awareness is an intrinsic part of the mind, then when an enlightened being dies, that awareness should somehow continue. If the awareness ends at death, then that's saying it's somehow not intrinsic. Or it doesn't fit this description of being beyond birth and death.

This would somehow arise with the body and die with the body. But if awareness is intrinsic, it should exist after death.

So I took a look at the texts that I have the most trust in, which are the Pali suttas, to see if I could find any clues, any guidance from them. And it's very interesting because the Buddha was often asked this question: what happens to the enlightened being after death? Does that person exist? The Buddha said, "You can't say that." And they said, "Well, does the person not exist?" He said, "You can't say that. Do they both exist and not exist? You can't say that. Do they neither exist nor not exist? You can't say that." So he would not say in any of those four cases what happened.

But there are some other interesting clues. Clearly the physical aggregate is gone. Then what about consciousness? At one point in the text, he pretty much says that after an arhat dies, there's no consciousness. Well, that seems to seal the argument for at least description number one or two: no consciousness after death, therefore it's not an intrinsic part.

But that's not the end of the story, because in other passages, he says something different. There's a case where a bhikkhu was practicing very seriously during the Buddha's lifetime and attained what's called temporary liberation of mind. There are many ways to do that. It's a state where the mind is really released from the defilements temporarily. But every time he would touch it, he would also fall out of it. Touch it, be delivered, fall out of it, back to defilements. Touch it, fall out of it, back to defilements. And he got so discouraged by this that he said, "I can't do it. I'm going to take my life." And in the jargon of the suttas, it said that bhikkhu used the knife.

So the bhikkhu took his own life. And then the Buddha was talking with a group of other practitioners and said, "Bhikkhus, do you see that dark swirling cloud in the distance? That smoky mass that's moving through the air? That is Mara, searching for the consciousness of the bhikkhu who took his life, the bhikkhu Godika. But Mara is not going to find that consciousness, because that bhikkhu's consciousness is unestablished. The reason is that before he used the knife, the bhikkhu attained final liberation, and his consciousness is now unestablished."

This is very interesting terminology because the Buddha did not say the consciousness is gone. He said his consciousness is now unestablished. Then what does that mean?

There's another sutta where the Buddha describes what it means that a consciousness is unestablished, and this part I'd like to read to you from the text. This is an analogy for the consciousness that is unestablished:

"Suppose, bhikkhus, there was a house with a peaked roof, with windows on the northern, southern, and eastern sides. When the sun rises and a beam of light enters through a window, where would it become established?"

And a bhikkhu replies, "On the western wall, venerable sir."

So sun rises in the east, comes through the window. Where does that sunlight become established? On the western wall.

And the Buddha says, "If there were no western wall, where would it become established?"

The bhikkhu says, "On the earth, venerable sir."

"And if there were no earth, where would it become established?"

"On the water, venerable sir."

If there were no water, where would it become established?

"It would not become established anywhere, venerable sir."

"So too, bhikkhus, if there is no nutriment for consciousness, consciousness does not become established there and come to growth. Where consciousness does not become established and come to growth, I say, that is without sorrow, anguish, and despair."

Does this analogy sound familiar? Sunlight not falling anywhere? You remembered —Samyutta Nikaya, Nidana 12, Sutta 64.

The analogy I shared last night about sunlight falling on a meteorite, sunlight pervading empty space and then encountering an object, actually came to me before I'd heard of this sutta. So there's the Buddha, and then there's Guy Armstrong. That's a joke. But I found it fascinating that unestablished consciousness, which describes the arhat after death, is compared to sunlight that doesn't land anywhere.

To me, not having found any passage more authoritative, this suggests the suttas support views three and four. That's basically my reading of the Pali Canon now—I'm more inclined to believe they support positions three and four rather than one and two.

This is why I mentioned in our first or second evening that although Buddhism has seen many splits over the centuries and millennia, I feel the original Pali texts are not in conflict with any of the schools—not with any of them. From a Dzogchen point of view, one can rely on these texts. From a Theravadan perspective, one can rely on these texts. From a Mahayana standpoint, one can rely on these texts.

The conflicts arise when later commentators, philosophers, and practitioners try to impose more interpretation than the Buddha apparently offered at that time. I found this very encouraging. This is the personal opinion I hold now. Everyone will probably form some opinion—this is the conclusion I've reached.

Someone asked me before tonight's talk if I'd ever simply asked Rinpoche about the relationship between rigpa and nirvana, and I did. I asked him in a retreat several years ago if they were the same thing.

Here the distinction becomes important. In Tibetan terminology, nirvana describes someone who has reached Buddhahood. Rinpoche took his amber mala and separated two beads to show me the string. "This little bit of string is like seeing rigpa," he said. "When all the beads are cleared off, you see the whole string—that's like seeing nirvana."

So nirvana is much greater. I think this refers to the factor of omniscience. "But the essence of nirvana and the essence of rigpa are the same," he continued. "Same string, but you're just not seeing the whole thing."

That is, as I understand it, the Dzogchen understanding. He went on to say, "We don't talk about nirvana for practitioners like here. We only talk about nirvana for Dzogchen yogis in mountain retreat, stabilized in rigpa night and day." It's a high standard.

I want to add something from personal experience and reflection. I believe—and I haven't verified this with Rinpoche, though it would be interesting to ask—that as our rigpa practice deepens and clarifies, as the view becomes purified and developed, at some point it's possible to touch that nirvanic nature so directly that you absolutely know you've encountered the unconditioned. No doubt remains: Is this conditioned? Unconditioned? Is awareness intrinsic or not? One knows one has touched something unconditioned and whether awareness is part of that.

This is my understanding, though I don't know with certainty. It's my intuition.

Once we recognize this connection between the pure state of awareness—call it rigpa or empty knowing—relatively free from the three poisons, we see it becomes the path. In Dzogchen terminology, they're very clear about ground, path, and fruition all being the same thing. I thought this was radical when I first heard it.

Then I discovered this line from the Samyutta Nikaya: "The Eightfold Path has the deathless as its ground and goal." It's the same statement.

The path is based on the ground and fruition. It's the same statement. And that ground is the deathless. The path has the deathless as its ground and goal.

So essentially what I understand we're doing as we're practicing the nature of mind is that we are putting ourselves in the unconditioned as best we're able. As close as each of us knows what the unconditioned nature is, we put our mind there over and over again and let it stay there as long as it will stay. And when it slips out, we put it there again as best we can.

So the whole path becomes essentially the imitation of nirvana, as best we can imitate it. We imitate nirvana in each new moment. And so however big or little a piece of nirvana is apparent to us, that's the nirvana we have for right now.

This is pointed to by a pamphlet from one of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, who wrote a little pamphlet called "Nibbana for Everyone." His whole purpose was to take it out of the abstract realm where it was only going to be accessible to one-tenth of one percent of all meditators, and make it really available for anyone who had the sincere interest through this process of looking into the nature, of knowing when the three poisons are weak, and the purity of the emptiness and the knowing together.

So that's pretty much what I wanted to talk about tonight. Are there any questions?

Ajahn Buddhadasa is also in the Thai forest tradition. It's very clear. He makes it absolutely explicit. He has a beautiful little book called "Heartwood of the Bodhi Tree," where he says that the real truth of things is emptiness, but because it has knowing, we call it satipaññā. So the equation of emptiness with satipaññā is very explicit for him.

And you'll find this throughout the Thai forest tradition. You can find it in Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Mahabua, Ajahn Buddhadasa, and Ajahn Jumnian. Ajahn Jumnian is coming here, I think, at the end of this month. He's a living Thai forest master. And we were talking with him. He said the best way to practice mahasati, great awareness, great mindfulness, is to rest in the pure space of knowing.

And then somebody asked him, "Oh, but isn't that conditioned? Because it's consciousness. Isn't consciousness conditioned, impermanent?" And he said, "Well, consciousness actually has two aspects, one conditioned, one unconditioned." That's a nice way to see it too—that consciousness is kind of what links to the unconditioned, or awareness is the link between ordinary reality and the unconditioned. So he said it very explicitly, and you'll find that again and again in the Thai forest teachers.

I think it's the Burmese tradition that kind of pulls it out of this framework. The Burmese tradition holds the opposite view, and that's true. And again, influenced strongly by Abhidhamma and Visuddhimagga.

It could be a factor of what kind of practice people have done, whether they've done jhāna or not, might lead to different experiences. Certainly a possibility could be the instruction they've been given and what their teachers told them to expect. It's interesting because I think the spiritual model we've given, to some extent, will shape our experience. In other words, meditators will experience what teachers tell them to look for. And so it could be that effect also.

Now, one modern teacher had a really interesting interpretation of these different levels. Let's say Dzogchen practice is kind of realizing nirvana with eyes open. Thai forest tradition is realizing it with eyes closed, just pure awareness. And the Burmese style is experiencing it with no consciousness, but just the emptiness of it.

And he compared it to nirmāṇakāya, saṃbhogakāya, dharmakāya. Nirmāṇakāya being the realm of the manifest; Saṃbhogakāya being the luminous, immaterial nature, which is connected with cognizance; and Dharmakāya being the realm of the empty aspect of reality.

In reality, all three kāyas are united. But we can look at different aspects of reality through one or the other of these descriptions. So he was saying that the different traditions were touching nirvana through its three aspects of the three kāyas. That's an interesting way to look at it. Natural clarity either way.

The first approach I mentioned describes nirvana as a state where there's no particular being who has attained it—simply the absence of greed, hatred, and delusion.

The question concerns the use of the term samadhi, which seems to be employed in different ways across traditions. My understanding is that the meaning remains quite similar between Theravada and Tibetan systems. Samadhi is usually translated as concentration and represents one of the factors of the path. I believe it's also one of the paramis in the Mahayana list of perfections. It refers to that quality of mind capable of achieving single-pointedness, and through this, gaining stability and strength.

Samadhi is often closely associated with shamatha practice. The cultivation of shamatha develops the mental factor of samadhi. In the Theravada tradition, we often develop this quality to the refined levels called absorptions or jhana. But this represents just one end of the spectrum of samadhi.

When the Buddha summarized the Eightfold Path, he spoke of three essential components: sila, samadhi, and *paññ*a—ethical conduct, meditation, and wisdom. It's particularly interesting that when referring to the meditation portion, the word he chose was samadhi. In this context, samadhi becomes almost synonymous with meditation itself throughout the Buddhist tradition.

Regarding the rainbow body and its relationship to Dzogchen practice—I must speak from what I've read rather than direct experience. The teaching states that when a great Dzogchen practitioner reaches the culmination of practice, at the time of death their entire physical form dissolves into what's called rainbow body, a completely insubstantial form. Only their hair and fingernails remain behind. This is considered the definitive sign that a practitioner has reached the absolute pinnacle of what the practice offers.

Rinpoche mentioned today the story of the king who initiated the tantras—that king and his five hundred queens all attained rainbow body. The texts present this as the ultimate culmination of practice. Many stories attest to this achievement throughout history. Namkhai Norbu relates visiting the room of a great master who had passed away and finding only fingernails and hair remaining. This attainment is considered achievable today, with people still reaching this level. We should aim very high indeed.

When I described the second and third types of nirvana where consciousnesses are absent, you might wonder how a person could function if the senses aren't working. In both the Burmese and Thai traditions, the understanding is that the meditator enters this state for only a limited period, making direct contact with the unconditioned. This brief contact proves sufficient to uproot the defilements completely. The defilements leave the mind, then contact with the unconditioned ceases, consciousness and all senses return, and the practitioner continues functioning in the world—but now without any defilements remaining in the mind. Thankfully so!

An excellent point emerges about rainbow body still being part of the bodhisattva path, since a being can continue benefiting others from that sambhogakaya level. This is absolutely true and represents part of the magic, mystery, and wonder of Tibetan Buddhism.

Furthermore, as I understand it, once someone attains Buddhahood and the physical body dies, the imprint of that enlightened consciousness remains in the dharmakaya realm. From there, it becomes possible for what has been established in the dharmakaya to send forth emanations—rebirths in human or other forms that can continue benefiting beings in countless ways.

So even a fully enlightened Buddha can still, if you like, reappear to benefit beings. Great mysteries. I mean, it's mind-boggling.

A participant inquired about the bhikkhu who used the knife, asking whether consciousness was being used synonymously with awareness in that description. In the Pali texts, there's no word that gets translated as awareness—there's just consciousness.

But it is usually associated with objects. So I think the pointing here is that something continues, but because there are no objects to pick up on, it is unestablished. So we could use it as synonymous with awareness.

The question touches on whether the fourth foundation of mindfulness points to awareness. There's certainly a pointing to consciousness in the fourth foundation through the five aggregates. I can't remember how the six sense bases are worded exactly, but consciousness is one of the five aggregates pointed to. So mindfulness of consciousness is included in classical Theravadan teachings.

Another question came up about samadhi and its translation. At previous retreats, I've mentioned that there isn't really an accurate English translation of this word. The translation as "concentration" can be misleading because when we use concentration in English, we usually mean narrowing the attention down. "I want to concentrate on my reading. Don't distract me with that television noise." But samadhi doesn't have that exclusive connotation at all.

The sense is that the mind is concentrated in the sense of coming together. The mind's stuff is concentrated. The mind energy is concentrated by letting go of distraction. Distraction is what robs the mind of energy. When we let go of distraction, the mind regains its original strength and energy and stability. So it's concentrated in the sense of being unified, being joined. Unification of mind is the best translation I can think of.

Another way it's sometimes talked about is one-pointed. But again, you don't want to think of it as necessarily one-pointed in a narrow way. I like the way Ajahn Sumedho describes it. He's a Theravadan monk. He says that it's the one point that includes everything. That lends very well to our practice here. What's the one point that includes everything? The present moment. Empty knowing. So samadhi goes very well with that sense of empty knowing.

Just as a postscript: the more you develop the quality of samadhi through whatever practice you do—whether it develops through rigpa practice as you let go of distractions, where samadhi develops in a very natural and unforced way, or whether you do it through shamatha with single-pointed exclusive focus—you will find great benefit when you turn to mind essence. The stability that you've developed through the shamatha practice will be there when you touch the nature of mind, and it will sustain the rigpa longer.

Rinpoche has been expressing something very similar regarding both shamatha and Rigpa practice.

Let me take one final question. Bonnie?

"In the Dzogchen tradition, are shamatha and vipassana considered preliminary practices?"

I think shamatha is strongly encouraged. Traditionally, it was an absolute requirement to complete the formal preliminary practices of Tibetan Buddhism before receiving Dzogchen instruction. Students were also encouraged to develop proficiency in different styles of shamatha practice.

My understanding is that Dzogchen represents just one approach to vipassana—there are other methodologies for developing insight as well. Traditionally, meditators were expected to gain experience with a number of these approaches before being granted access to the quite secret teachings of Dzogchen.

This seems like a good place to conclude our exploration today. The integration of shamatha and Dzogchen practice offers a profound path for developing both the stability of mind and the recognition of our true nature. Whether we approach this through the gradual cultivation of single-pointed concentration or through the direct pointing-out instructions of Dzogchen, both methods support each other in revealing the luminous awareness that is always already present.

The key insight remains that stability of mind—however it develops—serves to sustain our recognition of Rigpa. When we touch the nature of mind with a foundation of shamatha, that recognition can endure with greater ease and naturalness. This is the beautiful marriage of method and wisdom, of concentration and awareness, that characterizes the most skillful approaches to awakening.

Non-Dual Awareness: Bridging Theravāda and Vajrayāna Understanding

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> Guy Armstrong addresses one of the most contentious topics in Buddhist philosophy: non-dual awareness and its place within traditional Theravāda understanding. Drawing from the Kaccānagotta Sutta (SN 12.15) and the Nakhasikhā Sutta (SN 22.97), he demonstrates how the concept of non-duality is already present in the earliest Pali teachings, despite later Abhidhamma systematization that emphasized separate existence of consciousness and its objects.
> Armstrong explores how consciousness and its object, while analytically distinguishable, are experientially one unified event—like a golden bowl that has both roundness and color as aspects of a single reality. He shows how this understanding bridges the apparent gap between classical Theravāda analysis of the eighteen dhātus and Dzogchen teachings on rigpa. The talk addresses the philosophical implications of dependent origination (paṭicca-samuppāda) and emptiness (suññatā), explaining how even the seeker, path, and goal exist only conventionally while sharing the same ultimate nature as a Buddha. Armstrong concludes with an overview of the four main Tibetan Buddhist schools, providing practical context for understanding different approaches to these profound teachings.

In all the areas of integration of the Dzogchen view into the Vipassana world, I think there's one concept that strikes more fear into the heart of committed Theravādans than any other: the concept of non-duality. As soon as the non-dual teaching started to appear in the West, different Theravādan scholars sprang up to refute the view that non-duality could be a legitimate philosophical perspective in Buddhism.

I've been in some of these conversations myself. Recently, I had a conversation with a Pali scholar about non-duality. I have to say, it's taken me a while to figure out exactly what this word means—I don't know if you've really looked into it. It's used in many different senses in Mahāyāna and Vajrayāna writings. In fact, in the Vimalakīrti Sūtra, one of the Mahāyāna sūtras, there's a whole chapter on non-duality that goes into many of the dualities that are negated by the Mahāyāna view.

During our conversation, the scholar asked, "Well, non-duality doesn't mean they're trying to say that consciousness and its object are one, does it?" Well, unfortunately, that is what is meant. I want to talk about that a little bit and then see how that leads to the other aspects of non-duality.

This is a term that I've puzzled over considerably. You'll hear Rinpoche use it. You'll hear it in Vajrayāna teachings—the concept of a non-dual awareness. One obvious meaning is egolessness: that there's not a separate observer who's standing apart from experience and observing it. This is a view held within the Theravāda—essentially the view of anattā. The observer is not separate.

But in all the Pali texts, as I think we talked about the other night, consciousness is a dhātu, one of the eighteen dhātus or elements of the sense doors, that's separate from phenomena. So there's consciousness of sight, and that's different from the sight itself. The Theravādan view states that sense experience arises—called contact—when three things come together. In the case of the eye: a visible form, a working eye, and the factor of eye consciousness. These are considered to be three distinct things. When those happen, contact arises. That means we see one another, we see a tree or whatever. This is described in the suttas, the original words of the Buddha as recorded in the Pali suttas.

In the Abhidhamma, this concept got strengthened even further. Remember, the Abhidhamma is that piece of the Pali Canon that takes these original sutta concepts and systematizes them, laying them out in a very detailed and consistent map. In the Abhidhamma, things that are directly experienceable were given the name ultimate reality. Anything that's directly experienceable is called an ultimate, and things that aren't are called conventional.

Just as an example, "turkey" is a conventional reality. It's only a conventional designation for that creature. The actual experienceable aspects of turkey are the five aggregates or the six sense bases and their consciousnesses. Those are the discrete elements that make up turkey—or human being, for that matter. But the concept "human being" is a conceptual invention. You can't experience a human being directly. You actually experience their form, their consciousness, their mental formations, and so forth.

In the Abhidhamma, when it classified these things as ultimate reality, it gave them a kind of independent existence. In the literature, this is referred to as "own being" or svabhāva. It had an independent existence all of its own. The elements specifically that the Abhidhamma gave this independent existence to and called ultimate were: form, or matter (rūpa); the factors of mind—all the different mental elements that operate both emotionally and cognitively, including feeling and perception and attention, as well as all the unwholesome emotions, the afflictive emotions of greed, envy, hatred, delusion, as well as the refined and sublime meditative states and qualities that Rinpoche was talking about today—compassion, faith, renunciation, loving-kindness, joy. These are all in a category called cetasikas, or mental factors.

The third of these ultimates in the usual realm is called citta, or consciousness—the thing that knows all the others. Those are in the realm of existence. The fourth ultimate reality is nibbāna.

Matter, mental factors, and consciousness—that's a pretty concise map. I mean, that's a good map for what exists.

But as the Abhidhamma view evolved over time, people really concretized these things until they acquired more importance than they should have. Particularly, this notion of their independent existence became too entrenched, and people lost track of the emptiness truth. Or you could say they lost track of the unifying truth that holds all existence together.

This was the very notion that Nagarjuna attacked in his central work that we've discussed several times: Verses on the Fundamental Middle Way. He showed that all these dhammas—all these different kinds of elements—are dependently arisen, except for nibbana. All the others are dependently arisen and therefore empty. He goes to great lengths to demonstrate that none of them actually has an independent existence. They all depend on other things.

So you could say that Nagarjuna's real motive in writing his central work was to refute the philosophical position that the Abhidhamma had come to occupy in early Buddhism. Remember, this is about 100 CE. The Abhidhamma view had become too concretized, too entrenched. Nagarjuna came along and basically destroyed it as a philosophical view because his logic was so impeccable. That really opened up the gates for emptiness—and also non-duality.

But I want to stress: it's not that this idea of emptiness is absent from the Pali suttas, the original teachings of the Buddha in Pali. I want to read a couple of passages that really draw this out.

This is from a sutta in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Kacchinagotta Sutta. Someone named Kacchinagotta approaches the Buddha and asks, "What do you mean by right view?"—this being the first factor of the Eightfold Path. He's asking the Buddha to explain what constitutes right view.

And this is the Buddha's answer: "This world, Kacchinagotta, for the most part depends upon a duality—upon the notion of existence and the notion of non-existence. But for one who sees the origin of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of non-existence in regard to this world. And for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of existence in regard to this world."

Isn't that beautiful? If you see the arising correctly, you don't cling to the idea of non-existence. In other words, forms, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, thoughts do arise. There is not zero here. There is something. Because there is something, the notion of non-existence is not right—it's one extreme.

"But for one who sees the cessation of the world as it really is with correct wisdom, there is no notion of existence in regard to the world." In other words, if we look closely at our experience in meditation, any object that we think exists—you can take that sound as an example—if we stay with it, we see its disappearance. And when we see its disappearance, we know the world doesn't have a solid or permanent or stable kind of existence. No sense phenomenon does.

So the Buddha continues: "'Everything exists,' Kacchinagotta—this is one extreme. 'Everything does not exist'—this is the second extreme. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata teaches the Dhamma by the middle. With ignorance as condition, volitional formations come to be. With volitional formations as condition, consciousness comes to be..." And he goes into the chain of dependent origination. You can recognize this as the twelve links of dependent origination. "Such is the origin of this whole mass of suffering. But with remainderless fading away and cessation of ignorance comes cessation of formations..." and so forth. "Such is the cessation of this whole mass of suffering."

So the key insight here is this: to hold the view that things really exist is wrong. And you can see this is where the world is caught up. If you go to the person on the street and say, "Does this world exist or not?" they'll say yes. If you say it doesn't, you're likely to get carted off somewhere and administered drugs. So in actual fact, the ordinary worldview is that this physical world is the ultimate reality—this is the ultimate reference point. And that is expressive of the view of solid existence.

But philosophers then came along and said, "No, no, nothing exists." But the Buddha said that's too far. So this is the whole idea of things being dependently arisen and existing in an empty way. You can't say they exist and you can't say they don't exist.

There's another way that this is expressed in another sutta in the Samyutta Nikaya that I really love. The Buddha, again, is denying this idea of permanence. He took up a little bit of soil in his fingernail and said, "Bhikkhus, there is not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, and that will remain the same like eternity itself. If there was this much form that was permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, the living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering could not be discerned."

Isn't that interesting? Liberation would not be possible if there was even a speck of matter that was permanent and enduring. Why? Because the universe would get jammed up with existence and nothing could change enough for us to become liberated. So even the path and our liberation depends on emptiness, depends on nothing being fixed within us.

This is kind of a radical statement. I don't know if you've thought about the implications of this, but what does it do to the conventional idea of God? If you think of God as the old man up in the sky with the gray beard who is ever-existent and has created the rest of this, this makes a clear statement about that kind of understanding of God. So that's why it's said that the Dalai Lama has said that Buddhism is atheistic. It's atheistic in the sense of a permanent creator God having any possibility. So this is the statement in the suttas where the Buddha makes that claim. I find that really interesting.

This is Samyutta 22, Sutta 97, called "The Fingernail." The Blessed One took up a little bit of soil in his fingernail and said to the bhikkhus, "Because there is not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, and that will remain the same just like eternity itself. If there was this much form that was permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, the living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering could not be discerned." Basically it means it could not be found in this world. So the living of the holy life is only possible due to emptiness.

This really prefigures Nagarjuna. Nagarjuna's whole work is very much along these same lines. So I just want to really make clear that this idea of emptiness, of the mode of existence being between the extremes of solidly existing and not existing at all, is in the early texts from the very beginning. Later Mahayana philosophers drew this out and made it central in the teachings, but it was there from the very early days of the Pali suttas.

In the early days this was understood, but I think what happened is that the Abhidhamma somewhat got elevated over the years, and this kind of emptiness was a little bit lost track of. I think this still goes on today. One of the history books that I read said that in some schools, particularly in Burma and Sri Lanka today, the Abhidhamma is elevated above the suttas as an authoritative reference. I found that really interesting.

Again, I've said this before, but what's so beautiful about the Pali suttas is that they can go with all the different schools. They go with the Theravada, they go with the Mahayana, they go with the Vajrayana. And I haven't really found any contradictions from that base.

So let's take a look at this question again of the non-dual awareness and what this means. The suttas do talk about consciousness and its object as two things. But let's investigate that a little further. We talked about consciousness the other night, but let's look at it again.

As you're listening to this sound, the sound is an object in the physical world. It's one of the sense objects. But within you, as you're hearing, there's a hearing consciousness going on. That's a mental activity or function, because you're not dead. If you were a corpse, or if you were fast asleep, there wouldn't be hearing consciousness going on even though the sound was present. Is that clear? Or if you were deaf—if the ear wasn't working.

So consciousness is there along with the sound in every moment. The consciousness is what holds the sound, and that's what reveals the experience. So the question I want to ask is: Is that one experience or two? You're hearing the sound, right? As you pay attention to the sound, you know there's a physical thing there and there's consciousness. Is that one experience or two?

Let's assume the mind is clear, so we won't introduce defilement, ego, and all that. We're just looking at the bare level of sense consciousness. In hearing, how many objects do you hear? Does the majority vote for one? Any that vote for two?

I also experience it as one, and I want to reconcile that with the teachings. I take it as one experience, and I'll use this bowl to illustrate something. Is this bowl round or is it gold?

Good answer. We could make two statements about it, couldn't we? We could say the roundness is different from the goldness. That's true, isn't it? Roundness is one thing and color is another. But how many bowls are there? There's only one bowl.

So what I'd say is that in the hearing, there's only one experience, but we could pull out two different aspects of it. One's mental and one's physical. Just like with the bowl, there are two different aspects, but it's one unity. That's the way I understand it. In fact, it's the way I often talk about it in teaching Vipassana retreats—that sense experience is one experience, but has two aspects: a mental aspect and a physical aspect.

This is the way I understand awareness being non-dual, even in the classic Theravadan view of consciousness of an object. We don't even have to go to the Rigpa understanding of cognizance and emptiness. Just in the simple Theravadan view of consciousness and object, I actually experience it as a lack of duality. But it can be analyzed into two parts if you want to look that way.

This makes sense. It makes sense to talk about roundness and gold. It makes sense to talk about consciousness and sound, but originally they're not two things. So I encourage you to play with this in your practice when you're doing analytical practice—not when you're resting in the view. Just rest. But as you're looking into your experience, take a look and see if you can get a sense of how awareness and its contents are really one thing.

It's not like awareness is in our brain and the objects are out there and somehow they come together. Rather, awareness and the object are one event which has two aspects to it. I think this is part of the understanding of Rigpa. In the tradition, they often say that appearances and emptiness are inseparable. Awareness and emptiness are inseparable. In the same token, awareness and appearances are inseparable. This is really what's meant by cognizance—the unity of the awareness and its contents.

I think this is also, if you look into your experience, the experience pointed to by the Theravadan analysis. So I believe that the term non-dual awareness can be really comfortable for Vipassana practitioners and doesn't have to seem foreign or even all that obscure. It was strange to me for a long time.

Now, once we get into that level of non-duality—the non-dual awareness—other things fall out of that. Let's just do a short exercise. Think back to why you took up the spiritual path.

As you reflect on the origins of your spiritual journey, there was likely some degree of suffering that catalyzed your entry onto the path. Perhaps intellectual curiosity drew you initially, and the suffering revealed itself later. But at some point, if you're still engaged in this work, it's probably because of an encounter with suffering.

That suffering, for most of us, generated a desire or aspiration to be free—to reach a place in life beyond that suffering. This marked the beginning of our entry onto the path, which we have sustained over time, many of us for years, with great effort and diligence. Along the way, we have felt results, experienced changes in ourselves.

This narrative of the seeker entering upon the path, exerting effort over time, and realizing transformation is an integral part of spiritual life. Without that motivation and sense of progression, none of us would be here tonight. So bear this in mind.

Now I'd like to invite you into a moment of rigpa practice. You don't need to change your position. Simply, as you're sitting there, look back at the nature of mind. See the empty essence and the cognizant nature. Feel the openness of this moment.

Where is the seeker? Where is the one who has journeyed along the path for years? Where is the one who has changed, who has realized results? Can they be found?

Good. That's what I hoped you would discover.

In a manner of speaking, we could say that the seeker, the path, progress, and the end of suffering are all conventional truths. When we actually look for the seeker, the progress, and the path, they're not really there in any solid way. These are conventional truths.

If you examine the bare experience of this moment, there is no seeker, no path, no goal. This is stated explicitly in the Dzogchen teachings, which declare that there is no difference between Buddhas and ordinary beings on the level of ultimate nature. We share the same ultimate nature with the Buddha. The difference, the teachings say, is that the Buddha realizes this and we don't. But the ultimate nature itself is identical.

When we look back at this empty essence and luminous clarity, the Buddha sees this. We see this. This is the way things truly are. When we look in this way, we dissolve the duality between an ordinary being entering the path and a fully enlightened one. We dissolve the duality between the path and the goal. Ultimately, we dissolve the duality between samsara and nirvana.

These represent additional significances and meanings of the term non-duality. They emerge naturally from the implications of non-dual awareness and the absence of ego in the present moment.

Of course, this is on the level of ultimate seeing. On the level of conventional truth—and I appreciate how Gendun mentioned that the statues often appear with arms crossed, emphasizing the unity of conventional and ultimate truth, their inseparability—something beautiful occurs.

One aspect I love about the Buddhist path is that ultimate truth does not negate conventional truth. The conventional truth doesn't disappear. We understand that there is a seeker, there is a path, there is progress, there is movement toward the end of suffering on the conventional level. We honor and respect this through our practice, with our body, speech, and mind.

Simultaneously, we recognize on the ultimate level that our fundamental nature is identical to the Buddha's. On the level of ultimate nature, there is no distinction between Buddhas and beings, no distinction between path and goal, no distinction between samsara and nirvana.

This completes the first area I wanted to explore—some reflection on non-duality. What I find particularly meaningful is the genuine congruence between the Pali texts and the Mahayana and Vajrayana teachings on this matter. I don't believe this represents an area of conflict for us as practitioners.

We can pause here for some questions.

"I want to ask about your last point. In the moment of suffering, when the seeker arises, when there is teaching—at the moment of suffering when the seeker appears, then there is a seeker, right?"

Yes, it appears that way. And if we believe completely in that appearance, we tend to perpetuate the suffering.

When we examine this closely, we see that what gives rise to the sense of the seeker is some kind of clinging. What's actually there is grasping and some identification with it that creates the sense of a seeker and the sense of someone who is suffering. But when we look really closely, there's not actually a separate being there—there is grasping, yes, but no separate self.

At such moments there may be the activity of seeking. If there's grasping, there's some form of craving going on. So it would be accurate to say there's the activity of seeking rather than a seeker.

Someone asked about the distinctions between Hindu and Buddhist views, particularly where Vedanta fits into this understanding. The Advaita Vedanta view comes very close to the non-dual perspective found in Dzogchen. My sense is that there may be slightly more investment in the existent nature of the Self with a capital S in Advaita than there is in the quality of Rigpa—perhaps a bit more attribution of inherent beingness to the Self than to Rigpa. But the philosophies and practices are remarkably similar, and I wouldn't be surprised if Advaita developed alongside Mahayana Buddhism historically, as indeed it did. The Dharma may be one, but there is both Hindu non-duality and Buddhist non-duality.

A student shared that she had asked Rinpoche about the difficulty of staying in Rigpa when experiencing physical pain from illness, and he emphasized how important it is to practice this way to prepare for death, which can be a very painful time. Rinpoche has mentioned that he actually likes to practice when he's sick because he wants to discover whether his ability to rest in Rigpa is conditioned by the clarity of his five physical senses. When we're ill, our physical senses become dull, and he wants to ensure that the clarity of Rigpa isn't dependent on the clarity of the five senses in his practice and understanding. This is indeed an important point for practitioners to consider.

Now I'd like to shift our focus to Tibetan Buddhism itself. Having spent about ten years around the edges of these traditions, I've come to feel that you can't tell the players without a scorecard. There are numerous schools and sub-schools, countless different Rinpoches and teachings and deities. So I want to provide you with a simple overview that will help orient you within the landscape of Tibetan Buddhism.

But first, let me share some of the extraordinary stories that fill this tradition—tales of magic and mystery that seem almost incomprehensible. I want to tell you about the founding of the Kagyu lineage, which connects to the life story of Milarepa, one of Tibet's greatest yogis.

In the Kagyu lineage, but the founder was an Indian teacher named Tilopa. Tilopa was born in 988, about a hundred years before the signing of the Magna Carta, when Europe was a mess of chaos plunging into the Dark Ages. Actually, the Mahasiddhas of India were probably at their peak. Buddhism was flourishing in India around this time.

Tilopa was born in a Brahmin family but joined a monastery and took up the monastic Buddhist life when he was relatively young. But in the middle of his monastic life, he was visited by a vision. A dakini came and gave him an initiation or an empowerment and delivered this message: "Speak like a madman, leave the robes, and practice in secret."

He took it to heart—just from the vision of a dakini that appeared to him. So he left the monastery and went out to practice very raw ascetic methods. He became reviled for having cast aside his Brahman heritage and the monastic life. But he continued with these rather ascetic practices for over ten years, just wandering around. But he hadn't yet realized.

Then he decided to retire to a small hut in Bengal and just meditate. While he was living in this small hut in Bengal, he had another vision—this time of Vajradhara. Vajradhara is one of the deities in the Yidam practice. And Vajradhara communicated to Tilopa the essence of reality. At that moment, Tilopa became fully realized and began to teach. This was happening in India, so it hadn't gotten to Tibet yet.

Then a little bit later, Naropa came along. Naropa was born in 1016, so he's about thirty years younger than Tilopa. Naropa was born to a wealthy family, ordained, and became a great scholar. He really fell in love with studying and rose to the position of abbot of Nalanda University, which was the great Buddhist institution in northern India. He continued his course of study.

One day he was sitting out in the courtyard at Nalanda studying a text, just continuing the scholastic track. This old woman appeared next to him. The old woman had a dark blue complexion to her skin. Her eyes were red and really sunken. Her mouth was gaping and her teeth were all rotten. She was leaning on a cane.

She said, "Oh, what text are you studying?"

Of course, Naropa was very polite—she may have had bad breath too, but he didn't recoil. He told her the text that he was studying.

She said, "Do you understand that text?"

He said, "Yes, I understand the written words."

And she started laughing, very happy, joyful. "Oh, he understands the written words!"

Then Naropa wanted to please her even further, so he said, "I also understand the deeper meaning."

Then the old woman started crying. Tears just started rolling down her face. She just started weeping.

He said, "Why are you unhappy? I thought you would be happy that I understand the deeper meaning."

She said, "I was so happy when you told me the truth—that you understand the words. But then you lied. You lied and said you understand the deeper meaning, and you don't. You're just a scholar, and you haven't put these teachings into practice to realize them. You need to find my brother and get him to instruct you. That's my order to you."

And then she disappeared on the spot, vanished. He realized that she was a dakini.

So what do you do if you're the abbot of Nalanda and a strange-looking old woman comes and tells you you don't understand anything and then vanishes? Well, a lesser being would probably have said, "Oh, too much curry for lunch. I better go have a nap." But it's really a testament to Naropa that he didn't. He took her message as real.

So he went and announced to the monastic community that he was going to leave his post as abbot, give up his monk's robes, and wander looking for this brother whose location she never told him. Didn't tell him the name of her brother, didn't tell him the location. And so Naropa did it. All the other monks were saying, "You can't do this. You're going to be considered a fool. You've risen to such a place of eminence. You're the highest monk in this whole district. The patron is going to be extremely disappointed if you do this. He'll take away our grants." But Naropa had such conviction that he did it.

So he went off and wandered to the east. For years he was wandering in the forests, in the jungles, in the mountains, everywhere he could looking for this brother whose name he didn't know, whose location he didn't know. And he had many, many trials, many difficult situations. He didn't see any relevance to them. He thought they were all just obstacles, wastes of time, not learning anything. Later, of course, they all turned out to be really crucial dharma teachings. But he didn't see it at the time. He thought he was just wandering in bad fortune, and he didn't feel he was learning anything.

Finally, he became so despairing that he gave up hope. "I'm never going to learn anything. I'm never going to find a brother. I'm never going to become realized." And he decided to kill himself. Just at that moment, Tilopa appeared.

Tilopa was the "brother" that he had been instructed to find, although he didn't know the name. Tilopa appeared as a blue-black figure, cotton trousers and a topknot, big eyes shot with blood, red eyes. And Tilopa told him that he had actually been accompanying him all the way. He knew that Naropa was actually a practitioner of great capacity and that he shouldn't give up, that he was very capable of realizing the teachings.

So Naropa became Tilopa's disciple and practiced with him for twelve years, went through many, many hardships that were said to be the result of his past karma—physical suffering, emotional suffering, spiritual suffering—awful, for twelve years, not really realizing.

Finally, Naropa came to Tilopa. Tilopa said, "Okay, the time is ripe. I'm going to give you the final teaching, the final oral teaching." So he said, "But first you have to make an offering to me." Naropa said, "I don't have anything but my body." So he cut off his fingers and gave Tilopa his fingers and the blood from his fingers as his offering.

And then Tilopa said, "That'll do." And he picked up a dirty sandal and smacked Naropa in the face with it. At that moment, Naropa lost consciousness. But when he came back into consciousness, he realized. He saw the ultimate truth and his mind was liberated. From then on, he was a great mahasiddha who taught many, many people.

One of the people he taught was a Tibetan named Marpa. Marpa is the one who really brought the lineage into Tibet and established the Kagyu lineage. Marpa became the teacher, the root teacher of Milarepa. And that then is the line of descent for the rest of the Kagyu lineage. But it arose out of the mahasiddha lineage in India.

So these mahasiddhas are wild, wild people. And that wild energy and the mysterious, crazy, irrational, unconventional defying of social conventions—all those things pervade, particularly the Kagyu lineage and the Nyingma lineage of Tibetan Buddhism.

And we can take a couple of questions. Annabelle?

Yes. I don't know whether he knew of the existence of Vajradhara, the deity, or not, but it came to him spontaneously in the vision and transmitted the teaching directly. Vajradhara is a very highly regarded deity in the Tibetan system.

As you receive this overview sheet, notice that across the top are the names of the four primary schools in Tibetan Buddhism. I put this together primarily based on one book that I've really appreciated—Indestructible Truth by Reginald Ray, a professor at Naropa University. We have two faculty members of Naropa here, actually. Would you want to raise your hands so people can find you if they have questions? Here we have the dean and a professor at Naropa.

This is truly a fantastic introduction to Tibetan Buddhism, the best overview I know of. It will be on the book list, highly recommended. Though not all the information came from this book—some is my own research, so any errors are mine.

I've placed the Nyingma school first because it was the earliest chronologically. Padmasambhava is the figure considered to have brought the first teachings into Tibet in the eighth century, so he appears here as the founder. The current lineage head, formerly Dudjom Rinpoche, is now Penor Rinpoche following Dudjom's passing. I did run this chart by both Gerardo and Sokdny Rinpoche to verify its accuracy.

Among the main historical teachers from the Nyingma lineage, you'll encounter Yeshe Tsogyal, who was Padmasambhava's consort; Longchenpa, sometimes called the Omniscient One, who lived in the fourteenth century and wrote many books now available in English translation; and Patrul Rinpoche, whom Rinpoche mentioned the other day as that wandering beggar who humbly referred to himself as "an old dog."

I've also listed some current teachers in the Nyingma lineage. Some of these figures could actually appear under Kagyu as well, as they're sometimes considered non-sectarian or Rime teachers. But I've placed them in the Nyingma category because they primarily teach Dzogchen as their main meditation practice. These are names you might encounter as you explore books and teachings from recent masters. A couple of Western teachers in the Nyingma lineage—Lama Surya Das and Sultrum Allione—are currently active.

Then I've included the central deities, important monasteries connected with this lineage, and the core teachings. In this lineage, Vajrasattva is truly central, as Gerardo explained this afternoon in the Ngondro practice.

Both the Kagyu and Nyingma schools are extremely practice-oriented. As Gerardo mentioned, if you enter these schools, they'll have you meditating very quickly. They also emphasize lay practitioners strongly, so many lamas in these two schools are married. Sokdny Rinpoche, as you know, is married, though his brother Mingyur Rinpoche is monastic. In these two lineages, you'll find both monks and lay people serving as primary teachers.

The two schools are very closely related in their view. The central meditation teaching within Kagyu is called Mahamudra, which includes a component that Kalu Rinpoche says is identical with Dzogchen—called Essence Mahamudra. There are several different Kagyu schools. Sokdny Rinpoche and his father actually belong to the Drukpa Kagyu lineage, but also hold Nyingma transmission, so they maintain both. The Kagyu and Nyingma schools overlap significantly and remain on very friendly terms.

The next school, the Gelug, represents a different approach entirely. I initially thought the Dalai Lama was the lineage head of the Gelug school, but Rinpoche corrected me—the Ganden Tripa, the head of Ganden Monastery, holds that position. Ganden is one of the most important Gelug monasteries. The Dalai Lama, however, is indeed a Gelugpa monk.

In the Gelugpa tradition, the emphasis remains firmly rooted in monasticism, which is why I include the Vinaya as one of their central teachings. In fact, Gerardo mentioned he couldn't think of a single Gelugpa Lama—a traditional Lama—who's married. Virtually all Gelugpa Lamas are monastics, reflecting their very strong emphasis on monastic life.

There's significant adherence to Mahayana teachings. They eventually engage with Tantra, but generally much later in their training. The emphasis falls heavily on Mahayana teachings, on bodhisattva vows, on bodhicitta. While these elements exist within the Nyingma and Kagyu traditions as well, they're more at the heart of the Gelug approach.

Stephen Batchelor shared that he trained in the Gelugpa tradition as a monk under Geshe Rabten for seven or eight years and never learned how to meditate. This is not atypical. In the Gelugpa tradition, you might go twenty years before they actually allow you to sit on a cushion and receive meditation instructions. Stephen felt he had to leave the Gelugpa tradition to learn meditation, which led him to Korea where he became a Zen monk.

There's tremendous emphasis in the Gelugpa tradition on study. Monasticism, study, strict adherence to the Vinaya—these are the defining characteristics. Actually, someone mentioned yesterday that they were with Lama Yeshe at one of his monasteries in England and they were meditating. They definitely have all the tantric practices and they engage with them, but primarily through visualization. Where the Nyingma and Kagyu traditions—with their lay lamas and married lamas—practice through both visualization and actual practice with a consort, the Gelugs maintain their celibate approach.

The Sakya lineage presents an interesting case. It's the least visible of the four schools in this country. None of us could think of any Western teachers from the Sakya lineage, and only Rinpoche could identify contemporary teachers within that tradition. I'm uncertain whether it's simply smaller in this country or just less prominent, but it remains alive and thriving.

I find it helpful when listening to Tibetan teachings to identify which school they originate from, because the flavor changes distinctly with each tradition. This was one of my motivations for covering these differences. As you begin exploring readings from this tradition, notice which school you're engaging with and observe their particular flavors.

Regarding Sakya's characteristics, Gerardo told me it resembles Geluk in emphasizing extensive study before meditation practice. And to answer the question about lineages—Lama Palden, who teaches locally, belongs to the Kagyu tradition.

A lama's consort in these traditions, if they're lay practitioners, is typically their wife. They often marry someone who shares their commitment to practice in that style. There are countless stories of solitary lay practitioners living remotely with consorts who are also dedicated practitioners.

There are also many accounts—I can't recall the specific book—of women Vajrayana practitioners who chose their consorts deliberately. These women lived in remote places and possessed profound spiritual power. The dynamic doesn't flow in just one direction.

"For example, how does the Dalai Lama have such elevated status?" Nancy asks. It's an excellent question. If the chart shows four schools on equal footing, how did the Dalai Lama attain such an exalted position? He serves as both the head of the government in exile and the spiritual head of all schools.

Politics. It was essentially political maneuvering. For many centuries, the Kagyus actually held political leadership in Tibet. Then an alliance between the Gelugs and the Mongolians—I believe it was with Genghis Khan—shifted the balance of power and elevated the first Dalai Lama to overall leadership. This happened during the time of the Fifth Dalai Lama, long ago. Our current Dalai Lama is the Fourteenth.

Power struggles have persisted throughout Tibetan history because Tibet functioned as a theocracy. Tremendous wealth connected with the monasteries and their heads created ongoing conflicts for control of that wealth and power.

This brings us to recent controversies, like the recognition disputes. After the Sixteenth Karmapa died, two candidates were put forward as his reincarnation. The Dalai Lama designated one—the young man who recently escaped from Tibet and is now being trained in Dharamsala. Another candidate was favored by the Sharmapa. This represents an obvious power struggle, because whoever gains recognition as the Karmapa will wield enormous influence—monasteries, donations, students, visibility.

The Dalai Lama's endorsement carries tremendous weight, but supporters of the other candidate remain. Sometimes even the Tibetans themselves are uncertain. The majority of the time, however, the Dalai Lama's recognition proves decisive.

"What does the word tantra refer to?" Lee asks. I think Gerardo touched on this today, and I mentioned it the other night. The tantras are practices that take the awakened state as the basis for the path. All Vajrayana practices are considered tantric practices, with underlying texts called tantras. The practices Gerardo discussed—the ngöndro, visualization, and nature of mind practices—are all part of the tantric tradition.

Vajrayana tradition and encompass the profound methods of working with awakened awareness itself.

The word "tantra" itself carries deep meaning - it refers to the continuity or thread that weaves through all experience, connecting the relative and absolute dimensions of reality. In the context of Buddhist practice, tantra represents those teachings and methods that work directly with the nature of mind as it already is, rather than seeking to purify or transform it into something else.

A student inquired whether tantric practices exist in Buddhist schools other than Vajrayana. While tantra is indeed primarily synonymous with Vajrayana Buddhism, it does appear in the Japanese Shingon school, which is itself considered a form of Vajrayana. However, Shingon maintains only a portion of the full range of Vajrayana practices, primarily focusing on certain deity visualizations rather than the complete spectrum of tantric methods.

It's worth noting that tantra extends beyond the Buddhist context entirely - Hindu tantric traditions also exist, representing their own profound spiritual methodologies and understandings of the sacred dimensions of existence.

The exploration of these various approaches to awakening - whether through the gradual cultivation of the Sutrayana path or the direct recognition methods of the Vajrayana - reveals the extraordinary skillfulness of the Buddha's teaching. Each approach offers its own gateway to liberation, meeting practitioners wherever they are in their spiritual journey and providing the precise methods needed for their particular temperament and capacity.

What remains constant across all these traditions is the fundamental recognition that awakening is our birthright - not something foreign to be attained, but our very nature to be discovered and embodied in each moment of our lives.

Integrating Vipassana & Dzogchen

Guy Armstrong · 48 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong shares his decade-long journey of integrating Vipassana meditation with Dzogchen teachings. Drawing from his background in the Mahasi Sayadaw tradition and Thai forest lineage, he explores how these two approaches complement each other beautifully. Armstrong explains that Vipassana excels at showing how the mind gets trapped through clinging and provides detailed tools for understanding mental formations, while Dzogchen offers precise guidance for recognizing intrinsic freedom available in each moment.
> The talk addresses key concepts including the nature of non-clinging, the innate quality of mindfulness, and practical guidance for when the mind becomes calm in meditation. Armstrong emphasizes how Dzogchen teachings have illuminated aspects already present in the Pali suttas, particularly the effortless approach referenced in the Sutta Nipāta. He provides detailed instructions for combining both practices in formal meditation and daily life, while addressing common obstacles like doubt and the tendency to expect dramatic experiences when looking into the nature of mind.
> This integration honors both the conventional truth of gradual development through effort and the ultimate truth of immediate access to awakened awareness, embodying what Armstrong calls "the gold standard" of complete dharma understanding.

This evening I want to talk particularly about taking the practice home with us, and especially direct comments to Vipassana practitioners about integrating the two practices as you go home and continue with your meditation over many years.

It's interesting as people trickle in from the lobby for the talk this evening, noticing that the effect of ringing the bell did not have the same impact tonight as it did a couple of nights ago. This may bring home to us that the prospect of stabilizing in the view may be a little more formidable task than we had thought before we had a couple of hours of conversation. So welcome. This is a little taste of the world of reality that you'll be entering tomorrow and a little bit of the challenge that's involved in really integrating this practice into every moment of life.

I want to talk tonight about the way my own understanding has changed since I connected with these teachings about ten years ago. To put it in context for those of you who know the Vipassana scene, the dominant paradigm—really the only paradigm that I had to go on at that time—was the Mahasi Sayadaw tradition out of Burma, along with a little of my experience as a monk with the Thai forest tradition. But the dominant paradigm in this scene was out of Burma, this style of mental noting where one would apply a soft label to the predominant experience of every moment and connect with that object firmly with mindfulness. The path was seen as one of gradually weakening the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion through this applied mindfulness and reaching successive stages of the realization of the unconditioned. In that process, some of the elements of bondage would be permanently uprooted. That was the background I was coming from and that most of our scene was in ten years ago when we first encountered these teachings.

I realize that over that time, as my understanding has shifted, that's also been true for a lot of the other teachers in our scene, as well as the IMS community on the East Coast, our sister center. As that has happened, these teachings have been sifting down into the way we've been presenting Vipassana and Dharma practice in general. To some extent, I think we take for granted today some of the central concepts that have actually been infiltrating Vipassana from the Dzogchen view.

Just to mention one example: I was having a conversation with someone this afternoon who said one of the things they thought was pretty unusual was the instruction to turn the awareness back on itself. The comment was that they'd heard that from a Vipassana teacher about ten years ago. But my suspicion is that instruction came either from the Dzogchen teachings or from the Advaita teachings ten years ago, because it wasn't in such common parlance back then. But it is now. We often say things like that on Vipassana retreats now—maybe not in the hall, but to individual yogis. So I think that the integration is starting to happen, and I think it has a long way to go. We will mature as a sangha and as teachers too, I hope.

One of the things that I've appreciated is that the exposure to these teachings has not weakened my faith in what we've been doing. And Rinpoche said something very similar this afternoon. He said, you don't have to change the practice that you've been doing, whether you're coming from Vipassana or Zen or any other Mahayana or aspect of Vajrayana practice—those practices are all still valid. I had some little concern that I would start to think that my practice was an inferior practice or that it wasn't quite up to par. Rather than that, it's actually strengthened my conviction that what we have been presenting through the Vipassana teachings over these years has been right on track. But what it has done is brought out some aspects that I've started to appreciate more than I had before.

Basically, I found that for myself, the two systems of the Vipassana practice and understanding and the Dzogchen practice and understanding are highly complementary. Each tends to fill in an area that the other doesn't. When we put them both together, we get a very beautiful and complete picture of a Dharma path. It's not the only Dharma path—obviously, Vajrayana has its own Dharma path that doesn't particularly rely on our style of Vipassana practice. So it's not necessary. But for me, the Dzogchen view and the Dzogchen practice completed an aspect of Vipassana that had been lacking from my understanding. I'm very, very grateful for that, and I intend to keep respecting it, honoring it, and practicing it for the rest of my life.

Very simply put, I appreciate Vipassana because it's very clear on how we get caught. It provides a really detailed view of the way that the mind can get trapped by clinging in all the different forms. And it gives us excellent tools for looking into those fixations closely enough that we really understand them. I think it's through looking closely to the body—the pain that develops in the body and the reactions of aversion that come out of that pain—that we learn how to release the quality of aversion to unpleasant experience. That's a huge step, a huge movement forward.

Most of the world, if experiencing pain, is stuck in the aversive reaction to it. Through exploring the body so thoroughly, we learn how to liberate that reaction of aversion to unpleasant bodily sensations. That's kind of Vipassana 101. Then moving more into the side of the mind, we become so familiar with all the different mind states that can come and obscure our innate clarity. We become really familiar with the movements of wanting, of grief and sadness, of fear, of self-judgment. All the different manifestations of the neurosis of our day come up and are seen so clearly. It's what we spend a lot of time talking about on Vipassana retreats.

I don't know if you remember that story of the Burmese hunter who was told that there was a rare bird that hung out in a part of the forest, and he was sent out to find the bird. Through looking for the bird, he explored the whole forest and got to know it in intimate detail.

He discovered that in the process of searching for that elusive bird, he had learned every tree, every stream, every path through the forest. Similarly, through our dedicated Vipassana practice, we really come to know the mind and its reactive possibilities so intimately that none of them can trick us anymore. We've seen all the different flowers that can bloom from the garden of craving, and we recognize each one through that careful, moment-to-moment attention to the mind.

To sustain this investigation, we need a foundation of stability. I deeply appreciate the shamatha base that most seasoned Vipassana practitioners develop, which becomes a tremendous asset when moving into Dzogchen practice. This understanding of the body, this familiarity with mental states, this knowing how not to get caught in any of them, along with the basic stability of attention—these are strengths our community has cultivated well.

What Dzogchen offers as a complement is a precise, elegant, and beautiful description of the intrinsic freedom that is right here, available in any moment. This was something that through the first twenty years of my Vipassana practice had not been clear to me. I still thought I had to keep observing objects, connecting with phenomena, slowly building mindfulness little by little. Someday, I imagined, I might have some kind of enlightenment experience and then I would know freedom.

These Dzogchen teachings opened the door to discovering where freedom actually lies—here and now. They showed me how to feel it, how to have it as part of my daily experience. This brought the goal of practice into the present moment, and my dharma practice took on a much greater flavor of contentment. I no longer felt I had to keep striving for something in the future; I could find fulfillment here and now. My practice began to embody the flavor of resting in a contented state.

I'm reminded of that poem by Sogyal Rinpoche where he says, "There's nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural place." This is a beautiful and liberating discovery along the path. When you find this, the path and the goal truly come together. You realize that resting in your natural place is also what furthers the unfolding. This is one of the dualities that resolves when you recognize this intrinsic freedom—when you rest in that freedom, it does the work of the path for you.

I find these two approaches very complementary and together quite complete and satisfying. I want to speak about integrating both the views and the practices. For me, integrating the practice came easily, but integrating the views has taken longer—about ten years.

The view in the Pali suttas is developmental. You start from delusion and defilement, work to build wholesome factors that counter unwholesome qualities of mind, and over time these wholesome factors grow strong enough that the mind gains momentum in a positive direction. All this positivity is viewed as the result of effort, beginning with mindfulness and leading to concentration and insight. The effort to move out of unwholesome states gains momentum and builds into the wholesome.

In this sutra understanding, we don't question concepts like effort, path, goal, progress over time, samsara being different from nirvana, enlightened beings being different from ordinary people, wholesome and unwholesome states. In this way, you could say the Pali suttas present a rather dualistic view of spirituality.

The Mahayana and Vajrayana traditions present the view from the other shore—speaking mostly from the awakened state, describing how things look from having reached the far bank. There's much less emphasis on developmental aspects in their philosophy.

What I greatly appreciate in Dzogchen teachings and Tibetan Buddhism generally is how they honor both sides of these views. The developmental aspect of progress over time, the perseverance that Rinpoche spoke of, with the path as conventional truth—the evolution of spiritual practice through effort. And then the ultimate truth, which is here now, accessible to everyone in this very moment.

The image of the deity with both arms crossed, emphasizing the indivisibility of the developmental and ultimate models, represents for me the height of dharma understanding. What's beautiful is that neither view denies the other. The idea of progress over time doesn't negate the intrinsic freedom to be found here and now. And the intrinsic freedom available in this moment doesn't deny the value of stabilization and practice to realize that freedom fully in each moment.

I feel this unity of conventional and ultimate truths is the gold standard by which any spiritual system can be evaluated. The union of Vipassana and Dzogchen embodies this perfectly.

But it's also a valuable lens through which to examine other systems that claim to emerge from a non-dual perspective. When you encounter non-dual teachings outside the Dzogchen framework, observe carefully: do they genuinely embrace the conventional truth, or do you sense that these teachings use the ultimate view to dismiss, negate, belittle, or even humiliate the conventional perspective? Effort becomes part of this equation. When non-dual teachings diminish the conventional view or dismiss the reality of progress, I consider this an incomplete system—one that fails to honor the unity of conventional and ultimate truth. This integration serves as an excellent standard for evaluation.

I'd like to share more about what I personally discovered and gained from these teachings. While the unity of conventional and ultimate truth forms the heart of this understanding, I want to explore how this principle manifests in practice. Dzogchen illuminates certain crucial aspects of Vipassana understanding—not necessarily introducing entirely new concepts, but bringing forward elements that haven't been emphasized in the tradition from which most of us emerged. These teachings place these elements at the very center, revealing their importance for transforming how we perceive reality, ourselves, and our practice.

The first illumination, which several practitioners have mentioned in personal conversations, concerns the central question in Dharma practice, highlighted through Rigpa meditation: are you clinging or not clinging? This inquiry reveals itself repeatedly in Rigpa practice. When fixation—clinging or grasping—is absent, we rest in the natural state of mind, in the nature of mind itself, in pure awareness. When fixation enters, we lose that natural ease. The entire path unfolds from moments of non-clinging, of non-grasping.

Sometimes my entire practice reduces to this single observation: Am I clinging or not? Is fixation occurring or not? This simplicity brings immediate benefit, because when grasping is present, suffering inevitably follows. This practice returns us continuously to the Four Noble Truths: Are you experiencing the second noble truth—suffering through craving—or resting in the third noble truth—freedom through letting go?

The second revelation concerned the innate quality of mindfulness. I had always understood mindfulness as the result of effort, something to be cultivated and sustained. But these teachings revealed mindfulness as an aspect of natural clarity—what Rinpoche called alertness. This knowing quality of our experience exists continuously when we simply allow it to be present. This understanding connects mindfulness to the unconditioned realm and provides profound reassurance and trust.

Another crucial insight involves how to practice when the mind becomes calm—a common dilemma for Vipassana practitioners. We encounter this situation frequently on retreat. A practitioner progresses through the usual fluctuations of practice, experiencing purification, moments of clarity, but generally finding practice quite unstable. This pattern often continues for the first several years of dedicated practice, through multiple retreats and ongoing daily practice—lots of ups and downs without much stability.

Then one day they arrive at the interview transformed: "I touched a level of peace I've never known before. The mind was simply empty, with very few thoughts arising. There was just tremendous spaciousness. I could rest there effortlessly, with objects naturally arising and passing away. What do I do now? Returning to the breath feels clunky. Continuing to note all the changing phenomena seems awkward when this vast peace fills me for the first time in my life."

We offer several instructions at this juncture: simply rest in the peace, focus on the stillness as an object of meditation, or open to sounds as a way of enhancing the spacious quality.

Continue meditating with the breath because it will deepen that sense of peace. But here we have an option that I feel really makes the most of the situation: take a look into the nature of mind and notice that its very essence is stillness or emptiness and its very nature is awareness, and rest there. This gives a very clear answer to that question.

Of all the techniques, I think that the Dzogchen view offers the best words for how to do this—how to do non-doing most skillfully. Because when you know how to do non-doing most skillfully, you can eliminate some of the unnecessary little doings, and it's easier to really stop doing. I found the instruction so precise, so helpful for really stopping the doing when the mind gets calm.

This non-doing is an important piece. I want to emphasize that Vipassana practice also leads to non-doing, but I just don't feel that our vocabulary is as refined as the vocabulary in the Dzogchen tradition. It was never presented to me in as refined a way, I'll say that.

I'd like to read this from the Sutta Nipata, part of the Pali Suttas. This is from the Buddha, and it changes the emphasis from a lot of his other teachings: "One insight is that effort is the basis of all suffering. The other insight is that by the complete cooling and cessation of effort, no more suffering is produced. Every form of suffering grows out of effort. Eradicate effort and no more suffering is produced. When all effort has been abandoned, there is the freedom of the effortless." This is from the Sutta Nipata, stanzas 743 to 745.

So these effortless teachings are there, right at the base of our lineage, but they're not always articulated quite that clearly.

I have a friend who I mentioned at the beginning of the retreat who did basically two years of intensive practice nonstop in Burma, sleeping one hour a night. Other than that, he was sitting and walking all day except for meals and showers, in silence. Obviously his practice got very, very deep. At one point, his teacher, Sayadaw U Pandita, told him, "Okay, now what you need to do is stop doing this. Stop doing."

Up until then, the teacher had been stressing effort, effort, and more effort. He'd come in for an interview, report what was going on. Teacher would say, "That's okay, but try a little harder. Try harder." Come back the next time, report what was going on. "Okay, but try a little harder." And finally, he came in, reported, and the teacher said, "Stop doing. Stop making effort."

So it's there, but that message has been kind of hidden in our tradition.

Something else connected with this is the importance of relaxation, always stressed in the beginning of Dzogchen instructions: first relax, then open. I want to read this from a Christian contemplative perspective: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear." It has that same quality of relaxation—the less you reach for the ultimate, the more it will appear. Why? Because you are the ultimate. The reaching is a movement away from that nature. So the relaxation is a key piece.

Once you realize that relaxation is moving toward the ultimate, then it also answers the question of where to look for nibbana. This is also not spelled out so clearly in the teachings, and we just hope that someday, like a rare bird in the forest, it's just going to come and land on us—that nirvana is just going to appear. But the Dzogchen teachings really point out: follow awareness to its source. That's where you're likely to find nirvana.

The point of view is that there's another alternative to going through all these different path moments, four different stages of path moments which can seem very remote. There's the possibility of stabilizing in this innate freedom—another alternative, being able to live from a place of real freedom when we can stabilize in the view.

The Importance of Devotion

In the Vajrayana tradition, the relationship to the guru and the practice of guru yoga is central to the unfolding of the heart qualities. We learn love, devotion, and surrender through that openness. In our tradition, this is brought out through the practice of loving-kindness, and particularly loving-kindness with benefactors.

If in your practice of loving-kindness, where you send loving thoughts to different individuals, you pick a benefactor who is very wise, very compassionate, very realized, something remarkable happens. As you hold that person in your heart for eighteen or twenty hours a day, which is what our practice is, you start to have a kind of mind meld with them. Their innate wisdom starts to pervade you, and you realize that this is your nature, too. So I discovered that we actually have a devotional avenue, which is the practice of loving-kindness. And this is coming more and more into our retreats.

There's also devotion to the Buddha himself, which you hear in the monastic traditions. There is a lot of devotional practice—the lighting of candles, the incense, the bowing, the chants, and as Jim said, a lot of emphasis on appreciating the qualities of the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha. We've stripped most of that out from the practice here at Spirit Rock, and the Mahasi tradition has also stripped that out. So the monastics have had it, and we have chosen not to import it in most of the retreats at Spirit Rock.

These are the highlights of the flavors within Vipassana that I have learned to view differently, to hold differently, to appreciate more through the influence of this practice.

Integrating the Two Practices

I'd like to also talk about how to integrate the two practices in formal practice. I really appreciate what Rinpoche said this afternoon, which is that when you go home, feel free to continue with your old practice and just add this practice to it. So you don't have to change anything that you've been doing before, whether you're coming from a Zen background, other Vajrayana practices, or Vipassana. You can add this in as another element.

He also said something interesting once. There are not very many Tibetan teachers who have a great deal of respect for the Theravada and Vipassana practices. I don't know if this is news to you all—I'm sorry if it is, but it happens to be true. And Rinpoche is one of the few who do have respect for what we do, which I think is why he spent a lot of time with us and why he comes here.

In an interview at Tara Mandala, he actually said that he thought Vipassana was the best preliminary practice for Dzogchen compared to ngöndro. He felt Vipassana was a better preliminary practice than the ngöndro. After I'd read that interview, I asked him why. And he said, "Because Vipassana practitioners know really well how to meditate, so it's really easy for them to learn how not to meditate." So again, he really does appreciate what we do.

The two practices are very complementary. I have been combining them over the last ten years and have found it very helpful. But I want to say something first about conversations I've had with people on this retreat about their Dzogchen practice.

Trust Your Experience

My main advice, coming from perhaps fifty percent of the conversations I've had, is this: trust your experience when you look. When you do the technique of looking to see mind essence, trust in what you get. Because so many conversations have been about, "I don't think anything's happening for me. I don't think this is really it. Nothing's happening when I look. I've been doing it for all these days, and I'm not getting it."

And every time I'd talk with the person, they actually were getting it. But they hadn't realized they were getting it. Because, I think, we're expecting something special—some special experience, some fireworks, maybe neon lights, or the Buddha dropping by to announce, "This is it."

And it isn't like that. It's not meant to be like that. It's not a necessary sign of it happening. Really, most of the time, it is quite ordinary. I mentioned that sometimes when people really start looking and getting it, big releases happen. That does happen for some people. I was giving a talk at IMS, our sister center...

And I just dropped in toward the end of the talk on mindfulness the words "rest in awareness." Did I tell this before? Okay, I just dropped in the words "rest in awareness" as an alternative. One of the meditators started to go into convulsions because she, for the first time, dropped her effort. And when she dropped her effort, her body relaxed so much that there was just a huge energy release, just from hearing the words "rest in awareness."

This didn't happen, fortunately, to the rest of the retreat, but it's an exceptional case. But things like that can happen, but that's like one-tenth of one percent of the time. 99.9% of the time when we look, the experience is very ordinary. The difference between it and regular experience or regular meditation is mostly one of perception. It's not that the content changes so much, but we see it differently. And there's just a subtle shift in perception.

So I think the most reliable guide is the one that Rinpoche mentioned. There's a greater sense of openness. There's just some little kind of opening up, or sometimes it could be of more space. Something else that happens, sometimes things just get a little more vivid. They light up a little more.

Someone mentioned that in looking there was a sense of stopping. And that's actually part of what's intended because the practice we've received is actually only half of the Dzogchen meditation practices. It's the beginning half called trekcho, which means cutting through. And there's another half called tögal that we're not going to learn about this retreat. I've never learned about it. Rinpoche does not teach us, so forget about it. Advanced practice.

So the style of Dzogchen that we're doing is only half of the Dzogchen practice called trekcho. Tögal is the Tibetan word for crossing over. We're doing a practice called trekcho, which means cutting through. And essentially what is being cut through is ego-clinging, conceptual thought, however you want to formulate it.

So this sense of stopping is a piece of it. And take a look and see if when you do the looking, there isn't an element of stopping of other fixations. That's part of the intention. But it may not be so dramatic. It may be subtle. You sort of realize, oh, actually in forming the intention to look, I had unhooked from the train of thought. So something had already stopped a little. But just see if there isn't some little bit of stopping connected with looking and seeing.

So that's the subtlest thing to come to, is this sense of openness that's the revealer of emptiness. It's subtle, but just if you can get that little sense, oh, things open up. I can see the space that everything's held in. That's the emptiness aspect. That's the harder of the two to connect with.

Then the other half of it is the knowing. The knowing just means appearances are still happening. This is not subtle. It just means, oh, I'm still seeing, I'm hearing, I'm feeling body sensations, thoughts are going through, I have some emotion. That's all the knowing means.

It's not looking for a state of awareness that's apart from phenomena. You're not trying to divorce yourself from your ordinary experience and find some more refined transcendent state. It's just meeting phenomena clearly, knowing them clearly. It's so ordinary that it's easy to overlook.

But anyway, if you just get that little sense of openness, and then you realize you're still experiencing phenomena, then the knowing is there. That's all. That's all. Whatever form and flavor that takes for you, who knows if this is definitely rigpa or not definitely rigpa or not. That's not actually the key at this point. The key at this point is just to trust and believe that what you've got is the closest you can get to the ground. And so that becomes your basis.

That becomes the basis for your practice. And then you just trust that if you keep doing that, more and more of the ground will be revealed. That's really the heart of it.

And it's so ordinary that we may tend to overlook it. But as you do it again and again, you start to pick out what I'd call the common denominator of the experience. You start to see that there's a flavor that comes in over and over. Regardless of what your phenomenal world experience is, regardless of what emotions are there, or what you're looking at, or what sounds are there, or whether you're moving fast or whether you're moving slow, there's this kind of common thread of openness and awareness that you just start to become more familiar with.

And then you start to gain more conviction—oh yeah, this is what they're talking about. And all you have to do then is rest in that as long as it stays.

It's a little bit like you're walking down the street and you smell a bakery. You're not at the bakery yet, but you've picked up the scent of it. So you just keep following the scent, and you know that if you just follow the scent, it leads you right to the bakery. And that's enough. So just keep following the scent, over and over and over.

The main obstacle that I've seen from the people I've talked to is doubt—just lack of certainty if this is it. And so the antidote is trust. Just trust that what you get when you look is your path. And follow it.

In integrating the two approaches, I'll talk about how I work in retreat and with my practice, how I work in daily life.

In retreat practice, I still spend the first period of time on a shamatha practice with support. What I'm doing these days is either loving-kindness practice, the practice of metta, or meditation on the breath—one or the other. I just finished a month-long retreat in April, a period of silent practice, and I actually spent the first two weeks doing shamatha with support. And then in the last two weeks, I opened up more to choiceless awareness and the Dzogchen practice.

One of the things that was very apparent when I put in that foundation of shamatha is that by the time I opened up to the Dzogchen, the mind was very stable and the response from looking was very strong. As the shamatha collects the mind energy, the response from looking and seeing becomes even more vivid, because the mind has become more powerful. But it's not necessary. Rinpoche said that a number of times—you don't have to have that base of shamatha. You can just start from looking and seeing. So this is not what everybody has to do. It's just what I like to do.

Another question that came up in talking with people was: what's the difference between shamatha without support and Rigpa? So I just wanted to touch on that briefly.

The key thing is that in shamatha without support, we're really focusing, connecting and sustaining with the objects that are arising. That's the point. We're really looking at the object part of the experience in each new moment. In the Rigpa practice, there's a knowing of appearances, but there's also an attention to the knowing, so that there's an understanding that the knowing is taking place and the knowing is empty. So we don't fasten on objects out of any intention—although we will connect, the attention will move to different objects. But what we're mainly tuning into is the emptiness aspect and the knowing aspect.

In daily life, then, you can follow some combination of these two in a similar way. I often follow a similar process. If I don't have a lot of mental stability, I'll do some focus practice first and then I'll open up to the Dzogchen practice. So I might do my breath for the first thirty minutes of a sitting and open up to Dzogchen practice for the last thirty. If I feel I have a bit of mental stability when I sit down, I might go straight away into the Dzogchen practice. And if I really have no mental stability at all, I might just stay with awareness of the breath for the whole time, or whatever shamatha practice you choose.

But again, if you particularly feel drawn to go straight to the Dzogchen practice, that's okay too, whether you have mental stability or not. It's okay anytime. It will build its own stability of mind.

As you move into the more open kinds of attention, there's kind of a continuum—shamatha without support or what we'd call choiceless awareness. And I want to mention one other practice I've worked with that I like a lot. It is shamatha either with support or without support, but instead of focusing on the object, you focus on the consciousness of the object. So when we talked last night about the hearing of the sound, we mentioned that there are two aspects to it. There's the sound, which is physical. There's the consciousness of it, which is mental.

What if in your meditation practice you started to tune into the consciousness side of that unified experience? That becomes very interesting. There is knowing taking place. Can you intuit the knowing as you hear this sound? You know it's not happening to a corpse—you're knowing it. The sound is easy to pick up. Can you intuit the knowing that's going on?

A student shared that when she was eighteen, she was doing a lot of drawing. Instead of drawing objects, she started drawing the space around the objects. This reminded her of the instruction about not focusing on the object, but looking at what holds it, which is the knowing or the consciousness.

This approach is different from the Rigpa practice in that you're actually moving to and focusing on an aspect of your experience. You're making that the focus for the meditation, looking at the knowing in relation to one thing. You're definitely making the intention to connect and sustain with that one thing, but it moves in the direction of more open awareness.

You can do it with samatha with support—focusing on the breath for a whole hour. You can do it samatha without support. The emptiness doesn't come in right away, but the more you practice this way, the more you see that everything's an appearance in consciousness. The emptiness of phenomena really starts to show through, and it becomes a very light practice.

You can do it all day, in walking, in sitting, in work meditation, in eating. Whatever you're experiencing, you look at the knowing side in relation to that particular phenomenon. There's a samatha with support quality there—you're focusing. But you're looking from the knowing side. The emptiness starts to pervade more and more, and it brings about a lot of lightness in the practice.

Finally, there's the last step: having the attention be on the empty nature of mind, the empty knowing. If focusing on the consciousness of objects is a lightness, this is kind of a champagne practice. It's light and bubbly. It's delightful.

The last thing I wanted to say is that, as Rinpoche did, I encourage everyone to give plenty of opportunity for the formal practice to work its magic. This means putting ourselves in the situation—whether it's an hour a day or one retreat a year or a number of retreats a year—to really allow the path the time to do its work of transformation.

I think we're well set up in the Vipassana community for those kinds of retreats. We have a two-month retreat here every February that had over eighty people, either for one month or two months. This year, there's the three-month course at IMS in the fall. We have many opportunities for long practice.

One of the structural problems perhaps with Vajrayana practice right now is that there aren't so many opportunities for those intermediate-length retreats. Many seven-day retreats go on in the Tibetan community, and then there are people who go and do three-year retreats. In between those lengths, the options are more limited, though places like Rocky Mountain Shambhala Center do offer extended retreats.

But if those opportunities start to fill in within the Tibetan community, that would be very beneficial. I believe there are some emerging possibilities, and hopefully there will be more and more as time goes by.

I'd like to close with a quotation from Patrul Rinpoche that beautifully encapsulates this intersection point I believe is valuable for both Vipassana and Dzogchen practitioners. These are the pith instructions from Patrul Rinpoche:

Don't dwell on the past.
Don't invite the future.
Don't alter the innate wakefulness.
Don't fear phenomena.
Apart from that, there's not a damn thing.

Let me repeat these essential teachings:

Don't dwell on the past.
Don't invite the future.
Don't alter the innate wakefulness.
Don't fear phenomena.
Apart from that, there's not a damn thing.

These simple yet profound instructions point directly to the heart of practice, whether we approach it through the methodical awareness of Vipassana or the immediate recognition of Dzogchen. They remind us that our essential nature is already present, already awake, requiring neither addition nor subtraction—only the courage to rest in what is naturally here.

CHAPTER 251

Delighting in the Wholesome: The Power of Mindfulness

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the transformative power of mindfulness (sati) as outlined in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). He explores how present-moment awareness serves as "the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of pain and grief."
> Armstrong skillfully addresses the challenges long-term retreatants face when confronting what he calls the "karmic tide" - the momentum of past actions and mental patterns that arise in meditation. He explains how mindfulness acts as a dam against this flood of thoughts and emotions rooted in our attachments and investments in work, relationships, and identity.
>
> The talk emphasizes cultivating "warm attention" - a quality that merges metta (loving-kindness) with mindfulness, creating an intimate, non-analytical engagement with present-moment experience. Armstrong draws on forest tradition teachings and personal anecdotes to illustrate how consistent practice gradually weakens mental fetters, like sails rotting when exposed to the elements. He concludes by connecting individual liberation to universal compassion, referencing the conversion of King Aśoka and Śāntideva's bodhisattva vows, reminding practitioners that their inner work serves the welfare of all beings.

The talk tonight is called Delighting in the Wholesome.

First I want to say what a pleasure it is to be here, to be able to drop into the retreat at this point, to be teaching with great colleagues and old friends, to share this unfolding that you are all doing. It's really an honor and I'm happy to be with you. I appreciate that it's not an easy thing to do, whether it's six weeks or three months. It requires a lot.

Coming back to IMS, I'm reminded of my early days here. I was on one of the early staffs. Thinking about my first retreat experience here—I did my first Vipassana retreat in 1976, and Joseph was one of my teachers. After that retreat, I was very inspired by the practice. In the time that I could, I went home, packed up my house, put all my belongings into storage, sublet my apartment, and moved to IMS as a yogi.

I did a six-month retreat when I came here, which started with a 30-day self-retreat. At that point, I'd only done one 10-day retreat. That 30-day self-retreat was one of the hardest experiences of my life. I can't believe, looking back, that I did such a stupid thing. But I got through it.

At the end of the retreat, we were going for exit interviews with Joseph, who was in what was the library at that time, what's now the downstairs office. I was sitting outside on a bench and met one of the fellow meditators who happened to be Rodney Smith. Many of you know him—he's a senior teacher here at IMS. I'd just been practicing for one month, but Rodney had been practicing for three or four. So to me, he was a super advanced meditator, God if you will, at that point.

I said in a very humble way to Rodney, "Please tell me, does it get any easier?"

Rodney's reply was, "As far as I know, no."

That was our experience at that time. I'm happy to report, after some years, it has gotten easier. So there is good news in the story.

But still, six weeks or three months, even for long-time meditators, can really take us to the limit of our capacities, can really take us to the edge of our patience, our tolerance, our faith in ourselves, our courage, our endurance. Most of us bump up against a wall somewhere, if not often, in a long retreat like this. So I want to acknowledge the incredible work that you're doing. I know that it's not always easy, even for veteran meditators.

I just talked with a good friend who came out of a long retreat this year. Before they started describing their experiences, they said, "You know, I want you to know this was no small thing. I sat for this number of months. It was no small thing for me." This friend has many years of meditation experience. They said, "I want you to know parts of it were hell." Then they smiled and shrugged. I just smiled with them because I know that sometimes it's like that, even for veteran meditators.

It reminded me of an article I read in the New Yorker not so long ago. I want to share a little bit of it with you. This is by an author named Ian Frazier:

"According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1,200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed by positive logic that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be, given everything it must put up with. Nine out of ten of the respondents stated that they would give up completely if they only knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail. In a personal note in the afterward, researchers stated that statistically speaking, life is, quote, 'just too much,' and as yet they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through with it at all."

I hope you know this is a parody. I thought that this kind of applied to retreat practice as well—that we really don't understand how anyone gets through it at all. The difference is that here you've also given up the hope of something coming through in the mail, so it's even more difficult.

Whether you've been here practicing for one day or for six weeks, sometimes the question arises: what does this have to do with how hard life is? Is it just accentuating how hard life is? Sometimes in the middle of a retreat, we forget why we're here. Often when I start a retreat, I find the doubting mind comes up early on very strongly as I think about all the other things I could be doing with my time. And I wonder, what am I doing here?

So I wanted to talk this evening about the answer to that question in a very simple way—what it is that we're doing here, where it leads, and why we do it.

When the Buddha talked about the Eightfold Path, he talked about three factors related to meditation. I like to think of the Eightfold Path as his description of his awakened mind, but in terms that we can understand. So I like to think of these three meditation factors as very direct pointers to the qualities of an awakened mind. And these three factors are effort, mindfulness, and concentration.

Effort, as we relate to it here, is the willingness to come back again and again. Mindfulness is the quality of connecting with our experience in the moment. And concentration is that unification of mind that lets the mind be sustained in the present moment over a period of time.

I'd like to talk mostly this evening about the quality of mindfulness, the practice of mindfulness. I want to start by reading the end of the Satipatthana Sutta, the Sutta on the Foundations of Mindfulness, the key discourse from the Majjhima Nikaya where this practice is laid out. This is the very last paragraph of the Buddha's words:

"Bhikkhus, this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, and for the realization of nirvana, namely, the foundations of mindfulness."

That paragraph moves me every time I read it—that this simple practice of paying attention in the present moment is the direct path for the disappearance of pain and grief. Not just for the easing of pain and grief, for the disappearance of pain and grief. That's a very powerful statement. How does that work?

We might say that the very heart of the meditative path, the heart of the Buddhist path, is this quality of presence, of being oriented and abiding in the present moment. The sign on the casino wall says you must be present to win. It's true in the casino and it's true in the meditation hall. The Dalai Lama said, "The present moment is the only place that we can experience love."

When we dwell in the present, we avoid a whole host of problems because the present is so simple and is largely not a bad place to be.

Here's another quote from the Buddha: "Let not a person revive the past or on the future build their hopes, for the past has been left behind and the future has not been reached. Instead, with insight, let her see each presently arisen state. Let her know this and be sure of it, invincibly, unshakably. One who dwells thus ardently, unceasingly, by day, by night—it is she who has a very auspicious day."

So this quality of present moment orientation is a quality that lets us see things just the way they are, free from the haze of conceptions. This direct, non-verbal relation to reality lets us see things without choosing, or comparing, or evaluating, or judging, projecting, or interfering. It's such a naked relationship to what is, to reality. Nyanaponika Thera used the term "bare attention" because we aren't adding anything to this present moment experience.

We often say that what we're doing here is practicing the Dharma. I really like to think of it as practicing the truth—practicing being with the truth of things just the way they are, not the way we imagine them to be, want them to be, wish they were, remember them being once, hope they will be in the future—just the way they are exactly in this moment.

Reality is our teacher. Another word for reality is nature. Nature is our teacher, the nature of all things—the internal nature of mind and body, the outer nature of mind and body. My teacher in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, liked that phrase a lot: "Let nature be your teacher." Nature is all around us. We are nature. All we need to do is wake up to nature the way it is, and it will reveal its truths to us.

So we see things freshly. Seeing things freshly, we may see things beyond preconceptions. There's a story of Picasso when he was still a young artist and not yet famous enough to be universally revered. Someone came to him and said, "I don't get this art you're doing. Why don't you paint things that look like real things? That's the kind of art that I like." And Picasso said, "Well, what do you mean? What looks like a real thing?" The man pulled out something from his wallet and said, "Well, look, I want to show you a photograph."

This is something real. And he showed him the photograph—a picture of his wife. Picasso looked at it and said, "Is this what she looks like?" The man replied, "Yes," without thinking twice. Picasso said, "She's very small, isn't she? And also rather flat. This probably doesn't really look like your wife at all."

Sometimes in our meditation experience, we find things that don't look the way we think they should look. But instead of trusting our opinion, it's really better to trust our experience, to trust our direct knowledge of the way things are.

The Buddha said we make four fundamental errors in thinking the world is one way and finding out it's another. We think it's permanent when it's impermanent. We think that it's satisfactory when it's not. We think that it's self when it's not-self. And we think that it's all beautiful when some of it is not beautiful. These are the four errors that we see beyond when we come directly in touch with reality as it is.

So why is this important? I'd like to just ask you to try a little experiment. You don't have to do anything different or change your posture or even open your eyes. But I'd like you to just sit for a minute, simply being present, without any effort or any focus. And I'd like you to just notice how long you can sit like that before the mind starts to drift away from presence.

As it starts to drift away from presence, don't correct it. Let it drift for a bit. And now I'd like to ask you to correct the drift, if you've had any, and come back to presence. Connect again just with what's fresh and real. And whenever you're ready, you can just stop the exercise.

So I want you to just take a look at the quality of the experience from those two modes. Ask yourself, what was the experience like when I was just connecting with presence? Anybody notice any particular qualities?

Open, relaxed, ease, vibrancy or aliveness, soft, intimate, simple. What was it like once you let the drift go on for a little bit? What was the feeling of that experience? Tightens up, agitation, the peace being disturbed, things being stirred up.

You've seen this hundreds of times. I know each of you have seen this hundreds of times in your own practice. I just want to draw it out again as a little microcosm. In a way, this is the essence of the meditative learning—that when we can connect with the present moment, we discover an openness, intimacy, ease, relaxation, softness, simplicity. And as the mind drifts away from that, we wander into these stirred up waters, agitation, unease, all the confusion that comes from the whirlwind of thoughts and feelings. I know this is not news to you, just a reminder.

So in one interview recently, I was talking to someone and the person said, "But the present moment is so pleasant. Why don't we just stay here?" I like that question. Not to think about or speculate about intellectually, but it sort of stops the mind, doesn't it? Asking a question like that can stop the whirlwind for a little bit. Why don't we just stay here in this present moment?

Looking at that question, I think there are a number of answers. One reason is just habit. We've developed the habit for a long, long time of going away, of enjoying the realm of thinking of past and future conceptualization. A lot of the meditative training is retraining that habit of mind so that over time there comes to be a preference, a clear preference from the gut, from the marrow, from the center of our being for presence as opposed to wandering, for simplicity as opposed to complexity.

But there's another reason, I think, for that drift that we experience.

When we retreat from the busy world and sit in meditation, we encounter what we might call the karmic tide of thoughts and feelings. We come into the meditation room and stop the body, but the mind doesn't necessarily stop because the mind has been cranked up over many, many years. When we sit, we experience this movement, this cranked-upness, really directly.

That movement of mind that's been cranked up has been generated by areas where we've invested our emotional energy—areas of life that we've cared about, that we're attached to, if you like that expression, where we put our energy with a certain desire for outcome, desire for result.

As we sit, often those areas of life where we've invested our thoughts and feelings and hopes and fears start to come back into consciousness. It may be around intimate relationship or the absence of it. It could be about family members who we're separated from. It could be about career or livelihood. It could be about money, success.

The investment in all those areas that we've lived out through our daily life—that investment is all part of karma. Karma is essentially action with a motivation, and where we've acted with that investment of energy, we have created our own karma, our own action from a motive. When we get quiet, we experience the momentum of that. It plays out again in our hearts and minds and bodies.

This is one important meaning of the equanimity phrase that you've probably all practiced with, which says, "All beings are heirs to their karma." This is one way we inherit our karma, right here on the cushion, as this tide is made up of our past actions.

The Buddha said, "By whatsoever a person has clung to, by that Mara will track them down." Mara is the mythological figure in the suttas who represents the obstacles to the deepening of the meditation. He's portrayed in the suttas as an actual being, an external figure, can also be understood as a force within our own mind. Whichever way you take it, the meaning is the same: by whatsoever a person has clung to, by that Mara will track them down.

Frankly, as silent retreatants, we are all sitting ducks for Mara. Mara's got a direct bead on us in our quietude. It was really interesting—I was sitting at the Forest Refuge for a month in April. It had just opened and there was a two-month period of teacher retreat. I settled in fine, and the month had its usual ups and downs. But in looking back, I sort of looked back on it at the end of the month, and I saw that I got caught three times in relation to outside life things. The first one was about work. The second one was about relationship. And the third one was about money. It's just like Mara had a checklist on me. "Okay, what are the big areas? Yeah, relationship, work, and money. Okay, I'm going to get him on each of these." So I had my sufferings around those during the retreat.

What we find when we sit is that we're kind of at the mercy of this tide to a large extent, especially in the beginning of practice. We don't have much choice about what comes into the mind. It just comes when it comes. Sometimes it's really pleasant. We might remember something really fun that we've done. We might think about a vacation we're planning. We might bring up a meta-subject, a person that touches us a lot. Sometimes it's not very much fun. Sometimes we remember old conversations, unfinished business, times we got angry, times we hurt other people, times other people hurt us. And it can be really painful. An incident like that comes in the middle of a silent retreat and it impacts us really strongly because we're so open.

Sometimes we invest again and we amplify the karma, we perpetuate it, we build it up again, because we dwell with our thoughts, we have more reactions of hope or fear, liking or disliking, and the karma keeps getting extended.

Someone asked a while ago in an interview, "Well, when these thoughts come up about outside life situations, shouldn't we follow them? Because these are important areas of our outside life. Shouldn't we follow them and use this time in retreat to sort those out?"

This is a good question. I wouldn't just dismiss this question. Outside life and retreat life are not two separate things. It's one life. But I think that the understanding for me is more like this.

Those issues will come up anyway, whether we want them or not, to some extent. When they come, the question that occurs to me is, how do they best get resolved? Is an issue like that best resolved through more thought, or is it resolved best through a quiet intuition? And over years and years of practice, I've come to have a lot of trust that outside issues, life issues in general, get solved best by a quiet intuition.

So the thoughts come, and I try to just let them be on the back burner. I don't try to engage them at all anymore. Sometimes they engage me, but I try not to engage them. And I trust that if there's an important issue there, it will come at the right time. The thoughts will die or pass at the right time. But if it's something ongoing, I let the silence take care of it. And I trust that grounding my being more and more deeply in the silence will develop the place where the intuition can come from, that can really be a creative solution. As I've just found for myself, when I think and think and think about life issues, it never seems to go anywhere. So I trust in that intuition, and I try as far as possible not to engage with those thoughts.

Well in retreat, of course, there's also the same karmic tide. It's not a different mind here and out there. It's the same mind. As retreat, especially a long retreat, starts to become our life, this is where we invest. This is where we start to have our preferences, the events of our days, and the things that we cling to or push away, the things that are hoped for, the things that are not hoped for.

So other questions start to go around. It's not so much after a while. It's not so much about work or relationship anymore. It's more about: was my sitting calm or was it agitated? Was my body comfortable or was it painful? Were my mind states today happy ones or suffering ones? Did I sit enough hours and did I walk enough hours? Was I deepening today or was I going backwards?

Now, these are not in themselves bad questions. As meditators, one of the skills you want to develop is the ability to understand the signs of your practice, particularly around factors like the hindrances and the seven factors of enlightenment or the five spiritual faculties—to understand when they're active and when they're absent, when wholesome states are present and when unwholesome states are present. So asking questions like this is not unskillful.

But as we get invested and this becomes our life, these questions get tinged and we lose the objectivity of dharma reflection and they come to be taken really personally. So rather than the clear dharma look of: how's the factor of mindfulness, how's the factor of energy, how's the factor of concentration, all the questions really start to hinge around one core question: Am I a good meditator? Or am I a terrible meditator? And that question has a deeper hook, which is: what does this mean about me? Am I an okay person? Or am I a really inadequate person? And that generates again the whole karmic tide. And we become attached to the results of meditation, sitting after sitting, day after day. And then these are the thoughts that preoccupy us. These are the thoughts that take us away from just the ability to connect simply and directly with what is.

The moment is so simple when we can come out of this karmic tide of investments in past and future. So this karmic tide is a big deal. It is what carries us away from the present moment. It does reveal our areas of holding, the areas of clinging—the very foundation of self or ego by what we've held on to. And it's a projective power of mind. It's a projection onto the present moment of something that's not intrinsically real. It's mind-made stuff. It's all stuff of thought and projection.

And then mindfulness, as we drop it into this situation, at first doesn't seem like anything. We're mindful for a few moments and it doesn't touch this stream of thinking and feeling, past and future. It doesn't seem to have any impact on the projections. That's really because at that point our mindfulness is like a baby or like a child and these projections are all grown up. We've been doing these projections for a lot of years and we generally don't take breaks from them. We've been doing them pretty non-stop for a lot of years. So they've built up a lot of power and the mindfulness can be fairly new.

But then we start to look. When we are able to connect with the present, when we are able to abide with reality, we discover that different feeling of ease, simplicity, calm, peace. And we start to realize that there is an opening that's happening.

And we realize that mindfulness has stopped that flood. It is the most effective way to stop that karmic tide. It's mindfulness that has done it. It's our connection to the present moment that has halted the advance of that karmic tide.

The Buddha said, actually, mindfulness can dam any flood. Any flood. He used a lot of images of water for our wave of thoughts and feelings. He talked about the tides of conceiving, the ocean of samsara, the flood, the influxes of the taints or asavas.

So every moment of mindfulness is a moment of freedom where this karmic wave has been halted, and we connect with reality. And remember that reality is what we learn from. So it's really important in your practice to get in touch with this feeling of direct presentness, of peace—the peace that's found in that connection. The Buddha said that this peace is the highest happiness.

Please start to recognize when it's there so that you know when mindfulness is strong and you can feel the effect of it. This really is the path to the end of suffering. And all our practice is just about making that mindful space more and more of our life—more and more of your day, more of the sitting, more of the walking, more of the meals.

As we start to get familiar with that peace and ease, we find that there's a warm quality in that attention, in that mindfulness, that it starts to take on some of the tinge from our metta practice. It's not a cold, analytical, detached, scientific observation. It's a full engagement of your being with the present.

When the fullness of your being starts to come together through this factor of concentration, of unification of heart and mind, then your heart is all there with the present moment, as well as your head, your brain, your intelligence. And so the merging of metta and mindfulness is in this quality of connecting to the present with what we might call a warm attention—a warm attention in the present moment.

There's an image that I heard on NPR a few years ago that's just stuck in my mind as the sort of manifestation of this warm attention. You may remember that a few years ago, the Italian actor Roberto Benigni won the Academy Award for the picture Life is Beautiful. He got the Academy Award and he made an over-the-top acceptance speech, as Italian actors are meant to do.

Because of his fame at that point in time, he got to go to the White House and meet the president, who at that time was Bill Clinton. He entered the Oval Office to meet Clinton, and instead of slowly walking over, extending his hand and shaking hands, Benigni ran toward Clinton and leaped up into his arms. Clinton is a big guy, and so he was able to just catch Benigni's legs and hold him. There they were in this embrace where he was just holding Benigni by the legs, and Benigni had his legs and arms wrapped around Clinton's waist and chest. And Benigni said, "I'm so happy to meet you."

Clinton's Secret Service was freaking out on the other side of the room: "What is this guy doing to our president?" But that's always stuck in my mind as a really beautiful symbol of warm attention. Knee pain? I'm very happy to meet you.

So not only does mindfulness have a quality of being really vitalizing and connecting in the present moment, but it's also onward leading. It's not just good in itself, but it has a future. Its power builds. As you've been here over your six weeks, if you've been here that long, as you stay here over the next six weeks, you will feel the incredible power of mindfulness as it builds. It really changes our relationship to life, but it does it one moment at a time.

So we may not know it's doing it while it's happening. It's like when the leaves change. From one day to the next, the color isn't that dramatically different. But after two weeks, it's really different. And by November, it's really different.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, 'This will come to nothing.' By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." That's what we're doing moment after moment. We're filling that jar. And when that jar gets fuller and fuller, it has an incredible power. It can dam any flood. It doesn't matter how old the flood is. It doesn't matter how many years we've invested in that karmic tide.

Sometimes very clear. Sometimes angry, sometimes loving. Sometimes confused, sometimes seeing things distinctly. The whole range of the human experience probably came through you today.

The question we can ask ourselves is: which of these states am I watering? Which am I feeding? Which of these qualities, which of these states of heart and mind, am I investing my time in? Am I investing my interest in? Because the ones we invest in are the ones that grow stronger.

This is why the Buddha taught that we can choose our rebirth. We can actually choose what we become. Because the mind state we die in, the one we're most familiar with, the one we've watered the most—that's the one that has the momentum to carry us forward into the next moment, into the next breath, into the next day, into whatever comes after this life.

So we have tremendous power in this choice of what we water, what we cultivate. If we keep watering the states of aversion and greed and delusion, they get stronger and stronger. They become the karmic tide that sweeps us along. But if we water the states of loving-kindness, of wisdom, of mindfulness, of compassion—these are the ones that grow.

The practice is really this simple: noticing what's arising, and then making the choice about what to water. When anger arises, we can water the anger by thinking about why we have a right to be angry, by rehearsing our grievances, by building our case. Or we can notice the anger with mindfulness, see it clearly, and choose to water the mindfulness instead. We can let the anger be there without feeding it, without giving it the fuel it needs to grow.

When fear arises, we can water the fear by spinning stories about everything that could go wrong, by catastrophizing, by letting our imagination run wild with worst-case scenarios. Or we can notice the fear with gentle awareness and choose to water the qualities that can hold fear with compassion—the mindfulness that sees fear as just another passing mental state, the loving-kindness that can embrace our frightened heart.

This isn't about suppressing anything or pushing anything away. It's about the very simple practice of choosing what to feed. Like drops filling a jar, each moment of mindfulness, each moment of choosing to water the wholesome qualities, adds to our capacity to meet whatever arises with wisdom and love.

Sometimes clear. That's the truth of things. That's the truth we see when we turn on the lens of mindfulness. Experience is always changing, and we don't have to look for a place to land because it will keep changing.

I just came a few days ago from California, and some of you may know—if you've been out in the world—that California had record highs a week ago. It was 92 degrees in San Francisco. Ninety-two degrees! It was pretty nice the first couple of days we were here, and when I saw the sun this morning, I thought, "Oh, this is the way New England fall is supposed to be. This is great. It ought to be like this."

That's a misleading thought, because it wasn't long before it started to cloud up and get colder. As long as I'm stuck on the idea that this is the way things ought to be, then I can't stand the change in weather. As long as we're stuck on the idea that sitting should always be calm, we can't stand the agitation. We think it's wrong because it's supposed to be different.

But mindfulness doesn't have any should-bes. Mindfulness isn't stuck on an ideal. Mindfulness is willing to learn from reality. How are things in this moment? Let me find my freedom in relation to that.

Our moods and all the changing experiences of meditation are just like the weather. If we have an idea it ought to be a certain way, we're going to suffer in the face of change. The refuge in this change is mindfulness itself—finding within ourselves that quality that can make clear connection to the moment, to reality, in whatever form it's expressing itself. This becomes a refuge beyond change: this clear knowing.

The word upekkhā, usually translated as equanimity, has the etymology of "looking on." So equanimity is about looking on without being so moved by the changing conditions of life. Mindfulness can be with any experience.

Ajahn Sumedho, the Thai forest monk of American descent, has a phrase I like a lot for relating to changing conditions. He says, "It's like this." Whatever experience he's having—it's like this. Desire is like this. Non-desire is like this. Ill will is like this. Metta is like this. Suffering is like this. Non-suffering is like this.

There's so much wisdom in this phrase because we all have both sides of these dualities—we'll all experience them during our time here. If we think one way is how it ought to be, then we'll suffer. But wisdom can see them both and understand them both. Suffering is like this. Freedom is like this.

In connecting with this truth again and again, we develop awareness that's less and less preferential, more and more open to things just the way they are.

I want to talk about concentration on another night, and I'm sure we'll talk about effort as the retreat goes on. Because it's the early days for some, midpoint for others, it's also a good time to talk about motivation and intention.

A student said in an interview a few months ago, "I came on this retreat because I'm concerned about how to respond to events in the world. But one doubt that arises for me is: Is this just a self-centered practice? Are we just doing this for ourselves?"

I wonder how each of you responds to that. You're all experienced meditators, and I have confidence you've answered this for yourselves already. So this is really just a reminder—as Steve mentioned last night—that we're doing this for the welfare of all beings. The freedom we hope to discover is not to be kept to ourselves, but to be shared and dedicated to the welfare of all beings.

There's a beautiful story of the conversion of King Ashoka. I don't know if you know this period of Indian history, but a couple of hundred years after the Buddha's death, Buddhism went through a golden age in India. This was about 250 BCE, 250 years before Christ.

And it was due to the conversion of a king who was a very ruthless and warlike ruler. He was standing on a battlefield after a victory his armies had won, surveying the bloody carnage of dead and injured bodies scattered across the field, and he was filled with remorse at the suffering he witnessed.

From one side, he saw a Buddhist monk walking through the dead bodies, through the carnage, crossing the battlefield. At that moment he was struck by the serenity of the monk—he could see the radiance, the peace and luminosity radiating from his face.

In that instant he reflected: "I have everything. I am the richest man in this country, and I am filled with remorse at what I have done. That monk has nothing, and he is radiant. What is going on here?"

Because of that encounter, he began to investigate the teachings of the Buddha. He became converted and completely transformed his kingdom. He stopped all wars and informed neighboring countries that he was no longer interested in invading them. He outlawed animal sacrifices throughout the land so that animals would be protected, and he distributed the wealth of the kingdom equitably so that everyone had enough to eat.

It became not only a golden age for people living there—who felt safe and prosperous universally—but he also became a great patron of the Dharma. There was a tremendous flowering of Buddhist schools and philosophies in that era, around 250 BCE. This was the impact of one person who had practiced to serenity. The influence of one monk walking across a field at the right moment opened up this vast transformation in society.

So I hope that part of your aspiration, as Steve spoke about last night, is returning to your life and being that one monk, that one nun for somebody. We never know where our ripples will reach. We never know who will be touched by whatever degree of freedom, compassion, or love we have cultivated.

I think it's important to remember this in our intention as we practice—that we are not practicing solely for ourselves, but there is a whole world out there that truly needs what you are developing, what you are bringing to fruition.

I want to close with a quotation from Shantideva, a ninth-century master in India. This is something I carry with me when I travel—a small traveling altar made by a member of the Spirit Rock Sangha. It contains a photograph of the Dalai Lama in the center and this quotation from Shantideva on the sides. The Dalai Lama says he is deeply moved by the teachings of Shantideva, so I would like to close with a reading from this passage, which is very close to the Dalai Lama's heart.

"May I be a guard for those who are protectorless, a guide for those who journey on the road. For those who wish to go across the water, may I be a boat, a raft, a bridge. May I be an isle for those who yearn for landfall, and a lamp for those who long for light. For those who need a resting place, a bed. For all who need a servant, may I be a slave.

Like the great earth and the other elements, enduring as the sky itself endures, for the boundless multitude of living beings, may I be the ground and vessel of their life. Thus, for every single thing that lives, in number like the boundless reaches of the sky, may I be their sustenance and nourishment until they pass beyond the bounds of suffering."

Let's sit together for a moment in silence.

For every single thing that lives, in number like the boundless reaches of the sky, may I be their sustenance and nourishment until they pass beyond the bounds of suffering.

CHAPTER 252

Awakening Concentration

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of samādhi (concentration), one of the most important yet least understood aspects of Buddhist meditation. Drawing from the Buddha's own journey with his first two teachers who taught the formless attainments, Armstrong explains why concentration is emphasized throughout the suttas as the culminating factor of the Noble Eightfold Path and a key component of the Seven Factors of Enlightenment.
> The talk clarifies that samādhi is better understood as "unification of mind" rather than exclusive focus, addressing common misconceptions about concentration practice. Armstrong discusses practical methods for developing samādhi, including breath counting techniques and the importance of wholehearted attention. He emphasizes that concentration develops naturally through sustained mindfulness and genuine interest in the meditation object, rather than through striving or craving for particular states.
> Offering both encouragement and realistic expectations, Armstrong shares his own journey from weak concentration to stronger samādhi through dedicated long-term practice. The talk concludes with the Buddha's description of how purified concentration serves the ultimate purpose of liberating insight, making this essential factor accessible to both newcomers and experienced practitioners seeking to deepen their understanding of this crucial aspect of the path.

The subject of the talk tonight is awakening concentration. I wanted to talk about this factor of concentration because it's a very important aspect of meditation practice, but I think it's one of the least understood. Certainly in my own practice it took me a long time to get a sense of what this actually was in my felt experience of Dharma practice. So I want to open up the topic tonight and explore various aspects of concentration.

Concentration has been part of our human experience, I think, as long as there has been human culture. Throughout recorded history in ancient cultures, and today in indigenous cultures, there have been people who have used the technology of concentration to participate in their society. In traditional cultures, these people were known as shamans—men and women who use techniques such as drumming, chanting, singing, and dancing to put themselves into some sort of altered state of mind. Through this altered state of mind, what might be considered a trance state, they were able to contact different energies, sometimes talked of as contacting the spirit world. By contacting those energies they could bring them back and use them for healing, for good or for ill, or for magic. This ability to enter into other worlds through altered states is basically due to the power of concentration, a very old technology.

In the time of the Buddha, this technology had already been developed to a high degree in northern India. When the prince Gautama left his palace and embarked on his quest, he came to his first teacher. The teacher said, "I will teach you my Dhamma." The Buddha spent time with the teacher, learned to meditate, and attained the teacher's same level of accomplishment. He was invited to teach alongside him. The Buddha later described this as the teacher having pointed out to him the plane of nothingness. That was the highest meditative attainment that his teacher could offer him.

When Gautama went into that state, there was no suffering, there was great peace, and at that point he said, "I don't think this is what I'm looking for, because at some point one has to fall away from this attainment. It's not the nibbana, the final liberation that I'm looking for." So he left that teacher and went on and found another teacher.

This teacher taught him his Dhamma. The Buddha undertook it and practiced it, attained the same level of accomplishment as the teacher, and again was invited to teach as an equal. Again, Gautama declined, saying, "I don't think this is the nibbana that I'm looking for because with this also it will fall away at some point. We'll have to pass out of it." The second state that Gautama had been instructed in was a higher state than the first. It's called the plane of neither perception nor non-perception. As you can imagine, that's a subtle place. You're not perceiving and you're not not perceiving. That's pretty mystical. But even at this point, Gautama said, "It's characterized by impermanence. It's not what I'm searching for." So he left that teacher.

It's interesting that he records his journey. The Buddha later described his journey in these terms because we see that in northern India at that time, very high states of concentration were practiced and were taught. These are two of the most refined states of concentration available.

Even today, some of this attainment percolates through in our culture. If you look through collections of cartoons, or if you're a fan of New Yorker magazine, which I am, you'll see cartoons that highlight this. There are a lot of cartoons about gurus. Some emphasize more the wisdom aspect. Some emphasize more the concentration aspect. One that I'm especially fond of came from the New Yorker. It showed a guru on a mountaintop, presumably in the Himalayas, sitting outside a cave, dressed only in a loincloth, long white beard, typical image of the guru. Beside the guru was sitting a Western seeker, dressed in modern clothes, clean-shaven, probably just flown in a few days earlier. The Western seeker had obviously just asked the guru a question, and the caption of the cartoon is the reply to the question. It's the guru saying, "If I knew the meaning of life, do you think I'd be sitting in this cave in my underpants?" This is the wisdom teaching.

But you'll also see in cartoons the concentration aspect of this guru archetype. It's when you see the image of a yogi who's at some distance from worldly life, sitting, probably cross-legged, and wrapped up in a shawl, a meditation shawl. Eyes closed and a sense of being withdrawn from the world. Actually, there are many of these archetypes around our hall. In that archetype, if you tune in to the image that's being portrayed, you get a sense of stillness, a deep sense of stillness, as well as this indrawn quality.

Actually, this meditation hall has a flavor of this kind of stillness. You may not feel it now because you've been here for eight weeks or two weeks, but as someone who comes in from the outside, still involved in daily life, I feel it very tangibly when I come into the hall and sit here. There's a kind of stillness that one can just tap into. I think it's probably the collective vibes of almost thirty years of meditators soaking into the walls.

Some teachers transmit this quality directly. The person who has most impressed me in this way is Thich Nhat Hanh. I don't know if you've had the chance to experience him personally, but he used to come to Spirit Rock once every couple of years to lead an outdoor day of meditation on the land. A thousand people or fifteen hundred people would show up. We built a special platform for Thay to sit on. He would address the people through a sound system, the meditators seated in this kind of bowl-like amphitheater that the land naturally formed. He would give a dharma talk, offer meditation instructions, lead walking meditation. At one time, he led a walking meditation for a thousand people up to the other end of the property and back—it was a really impressive sight.

I sat at one of these day-longs and took in the dharma talk, the instructions, but what most impressed me was the quality of his being. I had never experienced anyone who was that still. The stillness just seemed to radiate from him—through the stillness of his body, through the refinement of his gestures, through the settledness in his voice. I was not the only one who felt it. It was as though, sitting up on that platform, he was casting a spell of concentration over the whole thousand-person audience. It was really something to feel.

I actually felt as I was listening to him—I don't know if this is true or not—I felt that he was so still because he had lost his fear of death. He struck me as someone who had seen so much and gone so deeply within himself, he was no longer moved by the fear of death. That was part of the source of his stillness.

Also within this indrawn stillness in the archetype of the meditator is a sense of bliss. There is a sense of contentment, fulfillment, and satisfaction. These are all aspects of concentration.

Some meditation paths are made up of concentration alone. The purpose, the fruit of the whole path is a state of concentration. This is not true of the Buddhist path, as you well know. The main purpose in the Buddhist path is liberating insight or wisdom. But it includes concentration as a key factor. In fact, it's very hard to overstate the importance of concentration within the Buddhist teachings.

As I've been reading the suttas over the last several years, I've kept coming upon the emphasis on concentration again and again and again. It just pops out at you as you read the Buddha's words. Concentration is the last factor in the Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path is presented as a sequential development—the first factor leading to the second, the second leading to the third, and so forth. Concentration is the final factor, which means that it's in some way a culmination of the path. Then, of course, it leads back into the first factor, which is wisdom. So it becomes a cycle, but it's considered an advanced development.

When the Buddha summarized the Eightfold Path and described it to other people, he described it in three parts. We often talk about this as the foundation of ethics, called sila, the foundation of meditation, and the third part, the foundation of wisdom, or paññā. But when the Buddha described the path, he described it as sila, samadhi, and paññā. For the meditation section of the path, he used the word samadhi.

We often think of ourselves as the mindfulness club. There's a whole outer movement called mindfulness-based stress reduction based on the principles of our meditation practice. So we generally tend to think that when it comes to meditation, the heart of what we do is mindfulness. And there are good reasons to think that—the Satipatthana Sutta, for one. So why didn't the Buddha say, "Sila, sati, paññā," describing the path? But he chose to emphasize samadhi—sila, samadhi, paññā. Concentration is very significant.

Concentration is also in the seven factors of enlightenment. It's the next to last factor. That is also a sequence, so it's a high factor in that list. And it's one of the five spiritual faculties.

For those who are into lists, I want to be exhaustive here and mention the list of the iddhipadas. This is often translated as the basis of spiritual power. The Buddha was asked, how does one progress along the path? What are the engines that develop power along the path? And he named basically four factors, which you may have heard of before: zeal, energy, purity of mind, and investigation. This is normally how the iddhipadas, the bases of power, are talked about.

What is often not talked about is that in the suttas, every single one of these factors is paired with concentration in the Buddha's description. So it's zeal with concentration, energy with concentration, purity of mind with concentration, and investigation with concentration. Concentration is being pointed to as the foundation of the development of spiritual power. What that spiritual power gets directed to, we can talk about later. But concentration is the very base of it.

With all this emphasis on concentration in the words of the Buddha, I started to get curious why it doesn't come up that often as a topic for Dharma talks. Just reflect back on all the retreats you've ever been to. How many Dharma talks have you heard on the topic of concentration? I had never given one until a year ago myself, and I hardly remember ever listening to one.

So I got curious. Why is it that we hardly ever talk about concentration, even though it's so central? Well, I realized one reason might be we don't know anything about it. But another reason that occurred to me is that we're a little bit nervous to talk about it because it's such a powerful factor of mind. When you hear it described, it's very easy to generate gaining ideas or a kind of wanting mind around the attributes of concentration.

I was reluctant to give a talk on concentration at first, but having done it, I think it has been helpful for people, so I'm doing it again in this retreat. I think it's worth the risk because you all are committed meditators, dedicated to understanding. If there's any group who's going to be able to hold this with some balance, I hope it's you. So I'll be listening out for things that are said tomorrow in interviews with your teachers. If I hear too many reports, I may not give it again, but I hope that you will hold it with a sense of balance and recognize that concentration is a factor that develops slowly over the path, just as mindfulness does, and not be impatient about its development.

I want to say one other thing about concentration. I'll be describing in this talk how to develop stronger concentration, what some of the attributes and benefits are, and some people may become interested in pursuing it. But it may also not be so appropriate for other people to pursue as a special project. In particular, I feel if your work at this time is healing—healing from trauma, healing from deep wounds, healing from childhood relationship difficulties—it's not necessary to make a special project of concentration. If you simply stay with the ground that you're involved in now, which is primarily sensations and emotions, that will be enough concentration for the healing work. Don't feel you have to make a special effort in this other direction. What you're doing now is just fine.

So what is concentration? Concentration is the English translation of the Pali term samadhi, but the first thing I have to say is it's not a very good translation. In fact, I think it's a little bit misleading. There's no word in English that adequately translates the word samadhi. It's interesting that that's so. You know how the Eskimos have like a dozen words for snow because they're so intimately acquainted with all the different varieties of snow? What does it mean when in a whole culture there is no word for an important mental state? In fact, I don't know of any European language that has a word for samadhi. What that means is that European culture doesn't understand, doesn't know, doesn't experience this quality directly. They don't have a word for it. It hasn't been perceived accurately.

So that's why as meditators, I think it takes a long time to get a handle on what this factor actually is, how it feels in our practice. It took me a long time to figure out how it was different from mindfulness. It was hard for me to tease those two apart. So that's part of what I want to talk about tonight. What is this thing?

The reason that the word concentration is misleading is that in English, concentration refers to how we focus our attention. We say something like, "I'm trying to pay attention to my book. Please don't distract me with the television." So we're saying that the attention needs to be exclusive and any other phenomena are a distraction, an interruption, something to be avoided. The term samadhi doesn't have any of this connotation of an exclusive attention. That's simply not there in the term samadhi. In English, we're misled into thinking of it in this way.

You can have a very wide open focus of attention and have a great deal of samadhi. You can have a situation where there is no exclusive attention, there's no primary object, and the samadhi can be strong. A better translation—in fact the best translation I can think of for samadhi—is unification of mind. The Buddha himself described it in this way. The mind being unified is what samadhi is about. What does it mean to unify the mind?

When we unify the mind, we reclaim the power that has been dissipated through sending attention off in all different directions—into past and future, into liking and disliking, wanting and not wanting, judging and evaluating. All these movements that take the mind out of its natural relationship to the present are giving away its inherent power, leading to distractedness and fragmentation.

When we reclaim that power through non-distractedness, the mind becomes unified. It becomes concentrated in a way. I like to think of it as being concentrated the way frozen orange juice is concentrated. Have you ever tasted a spoonful of frozen orange juice directly? It's really strong, isn't it? What has happened is that all the excess, all the dross has been squeezed out—the thin water, maybe the pulp, everything that's not essential has been removed, and what's left in that condensation is a very strong kind of essence.

In the same way, when the mind gets unified, it becomes strong. It reclaims all that power we had been giving away. In that strength of mind, one of the first things you feel is stability. For once, the mind is able to stay on the chosen object because in reclaiming its power, it has found its stability. There's a quality of strength and firmness and steadiness that's the first thing you feel with concentration.

This sense of unification also brings peacefulness because we're no longer in conflict with past or future. We're all together in the present and there's no necessary conflict. Other synonyms that describe this state are undistracted, collected, composed, whole, and wholehearted.

I especially like this concept of being wholehearted. This is a really good practice direction. Can we do everything we do in a truly wholehearted way? Can you be with the breath wholeheartedly? Can you be with a step wholeheartedly? Can you be with your work wholeheartedly? And if you're going to think, can you even think wholeheartedly?

Sometimes we try to sneak a little thought in and pretend it's not happening. "No, I didn't do that. I'm with the breath. In, out, in, out..." while thinking about the future. That's what leads to the dissipation of energy. If you're going to think, think wholeheartedly. That means think with your whole heart and mind and body. Bring that same quality into each breath, into each step. That's what brings the mind into unity. That's what collects all that dispersed energy.

So the first important characteristic of concentration is this stability, or you could say a tranquility that comes into the mind. The corollary of that, what flows from that, is the ability to stay attentive to the present moment for some period of time. This stability then leads in the direction of the mind's being unmovable, unshakable, and imperturbable. That's why concentration precedes equanimity in the factors of enlightenment. The state of stability leads into conditions, paves the way for the quality of equanimity.

The stillness that develops from concentration and equanimity is very close to Nibbana, very close to the deathless. There are very few factors that the Buddha described as happening between equanimity and the deathless. It's almost as if this is as close as language takes us to Nibbana—this quality of stillness and equanimity. That's why the factor of concentration is so helpful.

If you feel in life that you're a victim to the forces around you, if you feel that you're being pushed and tugged and forced around by either the events of daily life or your own inner movements of mind, samadhi is the counterpart, the antidote to that. If there's a feeling that life is too much, that meditation practice is too much, that your own mind is too much, samadhi is the factor that gives a steady rudder in the middle of that and lets us move through meditation and through life with a greater sense of groundedness and stability and the inner strength to handle the changes that come.

It's very helpful in meditation practice to get to know the factor of concentration when it's present. How can we recognize it? The first thing to look for is that sense of stability that lets you sustain your attention in the present moment. Start to notice this when it's present. Recognize that this is an aspect of concentration. If you're with a number of breaths in a row, if you're with sounds for an extended period of time, if you're with a body sensation and the mind is not becoming distracted, those are all instances of growing concentration.

There's an exercise that I often do when I sit retreats to develop this quality a little more strongly. I'll mention it to you in case you feel like trying it out. It's a way of counting the breaths—a very classic concentration practice. The way that I tend to do it is to combine it with the noting practice and use a number in place of the touch point. So I'll say something like, "Rise, fall, ten. Rise, fall, nine."

And count downwards to one. Or it could equally be in, out. Doing it backwards from ten makes it a little less likely that you go on autopilot, but you can still go on autopilot, so be careful of that.

Then the rules of the game are: if you miss a breath, you don't get to count another number. You have to go back to ten and start again. In fact, the rule is—the way that I play the game—you have to experience a piece of the in-breath or the out-breath before you can say the next number. If you miss either of them, you go back to the start. But if you can stay with ten breaths in a row and get down to one, then you start again at ten.

If you want to be competitive, you can see how many groups of ten you can put together. I would sometimes count this with my fingers because I got curious. So I would do the ten to one just in my mind, but when I got to a set of ten, I would move a finger apart. Then I would count how many groups of ten I put together.

This is a way of both strengthening your concentration—because you'll find that the counting will let you know pretty quickly when you start to wander. It's a good feedback mechanism. It's also a way of measuring your concentration. So you can try this once or twice a day if you just want to check out where your concentration is at right now. It will be a metric of that.

Don't get judgmental with yourself, please. Use it as an impersonal and objective measurement. Don't beat yourself up about it. It is just what it is. It's not going to change overnight. This is just a way to tell you where it's at.

Another metric is when thoughts come along and you get distracted—how long are you away for? Because as concentration deepens, you will be away for less time when you go away. So it's another thing to look at. Am I away for one breath, three breaths, half a minute, a minute, ten minutes, fifteen minutes? Another way to measure it.

But these two ways—how long we're in the present, how long we're away—are just measurements. They don't give you the actual flavor of concentration. These are like thermometers. If you're melting chocolate and you want to make fudge, you have to stick a candy thermometer in the chocolate so you know when the temperature is right. The little red liquid goes up and hits 350 degrees, and then you know to start working with it. The little red liquid is not the heat itself—it's just a measurement of the heat.

The counting is not the concentration itself. It's just a measurement of the concentration. What you really want to get to know is: how does the concentration feel just in the present moment? What does that feel like?

As you start to measure it and then check into your inner state, you'll get familiar with the sense of stability, of peacefulness, of strength, of firmness of mind that's present. Then you can recognize the samadhi from that. It's very helpful to start to notice when samadhi is present and when it's not.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, under the third foundation of mindfulness, which is citta or mind, the Buddha singled out concentration as one of the states of mind to be aware of. It's a short section. The Third Foundation doesn't list a lot of things to look for. But concentration is one of the states the Buddha said to be aware of. He said the practitioner understands concentrated mind as concentrated mind and unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated mind.

Along with concentration, it's also helpful to monitor your levels of mindfulness and energy. When I'm in retreat, I try to keep an eye on all three of these most of the time. So if somebody just dropped in and said, "How's your mindfulness, how's your energy, how's your concentration?" I could tell them because I would have been tuning into that.

If you look at these three factors, they're really shorthand for the seven factors of enlightenment. Mindfulness is the balancing factor. Energy represents the three arousing factors—it's a placeholder for investigation, energy, and rapture. And then concentration is the representative of the three tranquilizing factors, which are tranquility, concentration, and equanimity.

So by staying in touch with just these three, you're really getting a look at the span of the factors of enlightenment and the balance of the arousing and the pacifying factors within that grouping. You'll start to notice that when these three factors are all strong—mindfulness, energy, and concentration—your sitting will feel a certain way. Actually, it feels pretty darn good.

These are the times that you tend to be clear, connected with the present moment, stable, alert, awake, fresh, connecting. The mindfulness is just kind of there moment after moment.

On the other hand, when these three factors dip down and are low, you'll feel the other end of the meditation spectrum. This is when we feel tired, scattered, vulnerable. It's a time when thoughts easily carry us away. It's a time when the hindrances may be really active and we don't feel we can do anything to corral them or keep the mind in the present. The mind's all over the place.

As you start to pay attention to how these factors go over the course of a day, a week, a whole retreat, you'll start to see they all go through their own ups and downs, quite independent of where you're putting your effort. Quite independent.

Concentration, for instance, manifests its nature of impermanence quite a lot. You may have noticed this. You'll come in and one sitting will be really collected, really still, stable. You'll go out for walking meditation. You'll really be with your walking, but you'll come back in and everything has changed. A lot of thoughts, a lot of emotions, a lot of images, kind of wild energy in the body. It may not be that you did anything wrong at all. Your effort may have been quite steady and on track, but it could just be that concentration has gone through part of its cycle. It's exhausted that lifespan. It's fading away. Then the next aspect of experience comes up, which is more scattered.

So in seeing these factors, the way they do their own lives, their own dances, we learn not to take the changes so personally. It may not be that we did anything wrong at all. It's not our fault. But it's simply the factors coming into fruition, stabilizing for a while, and then passing away.

As we track the changes over time, it gives us more confidence it's not that we did anything wrong. Then we notice, okay, energy's low, concentration's low. Do I give up? That's not going to help. Blame myself, get down on myself, get discouraged? That's not going to bring them back together. Just be steady with the effort. Be patient and be steady with the effort, and then you'll see they'll come back together again. Again, not because you made a super effort this time. Just the steadiness of your effort allowed them to collect again.

So in many ways, with these factors, we're along for the ride. A lot of the meditation journey is being along for the ride, and the factors are out of our control. We make our best effort, moment after moment, but then sit back and enjoy the ride. Just show up, and that's the trip.

So how does concentration develop? Basically, it develops through sustaining our mindfulness. The factors in the Eightfold Path related to meditation are right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. Right effort leads to right mindfulness, right mindfulness leads to right concentration. If we can be wholehearted in our mindfulness, the concentration will develop. So that's why the basic instruction is give full attention to one thing at a time. And as you're mindful with that, the concentration will grow.

There's a Korean Zen teacher named Seung Sahn who made this a very central part of his teaching. He said, do one thing at a time. When you sit, just sit. When you walk, just walk. One thing at a time. He was teaching at a center in Providence, his main center. He was eating breakfast there one day. A student walked into the dining room, and you may have heard this story, but Seung Sahn was eating his breakfast and reading a newspaper. The student was shocked. He came up to the teacher and said, "But teacher, you said to just do one thing at a time, and here you are eating your breakfast and reading a newspaper. How can you do this?" He said, "Yeah, do one thing at a time. When you eat and read, just eat and read."

So whatever you do, be wholehearted. One of the key factors in sustaining attention actually is interest.

When you are interested in what you're paying attention to, the mind naturally comes together around that. That's why if you can develop an interest in the breath or in sounds or in your walking, it will really help strengthen the mindfulness and the concentration.

In that sense, there's nothing different you need to do in what you're already doing. The practice that you're already carrying out of vipassana will develop concentration. There's not some special thing that you have to do differently.

There is one suggestion I'd make. A lot of you at this point in the retreat are working with an open attention where you let the attention move from object to object depending on what's predominant. This can bring a great feeling of ease and relaxation and naturalness to the meditation. But sometimes in that open attention, we neglect a little bit the effort of connecting and sustaining in each new moment. It's really the connecting and sustaining to each new arising that makes the mindfulness really crisp and serves to deepen the concentration.

So as you practice with open attention, the downside can be that you get a little bit too relaxed in that openness. And the connecting and sustaining stop being really crisp. In that, you're kind of missing an opportunity to keep deepening the mindfulness and concentration. So just an encouragement with the open attention particularly—re-energize your commitment to connecting and sustaining with each new arising that comes.

Sometimes, of course, the concentration is going to go away. It'll be going along, it'll be strong, it'll collapse due to various factors, then there's often a very strong desire to get it back. And you can be in the grip of that craving, not even recognizing it, thinking that you're making an effort for a wholesome state of mind, but what's actually happening is that you're striving to have that concentrated state back because it felt so good. This is still craving, even if it's in a wholesome direction. And sometimes we'll try really hard at that point to get the concentration back.

But we may be forgetting one part of the teachings, and that is the proximate cause of concentration. In the texts it says the proximate cause of concentration is not strong effort or undying effort or courageous effort or heroic effort. The proximate cause of concentration is happiness. Isn't that interesting? What brings the mind together? Happiness, contentment, acceptance. It's such a beautiful understanding when you start to see that, because it lets the mind simply settle into its own nature with a sense of relaxation.

So this quality of relaxation is also really key to deepening concentration. The striving, straining, grasping, craving movement is antithetical to concentration.

This came really clear to me in one period of retreat. I was here at IMS, practicing metta for six weeks. For those who are interested, we teach loving-kindness as a way of developing concentration. I'd been in retreat for about ten days and the practice had been deepening. I was feeling calmer and collecting around the phrases. The phrases were getting steadier. Everything seemed to be going okay.

Then something came in from outside and disturbed the flow, disturbed my concentration. I got thrown off. It passed, and I tried to regroup and return to the concentration that I'd had, and it wasn't coming about. So I tried harder. "I've got to get back to that concentration. It felt so good. It was going so well." It wasn't coming back. I tried even harder.

It was about three days into this period of struggle that I went to see Joseph, who was one of my teachers then, and I described the situation. "It seemed to be going along well. Something happened. It fell apart. I can't get back to that concentrated place. Try as hard as I can, I can't get it back. What's wrong? What's going on?"

Joseph just looked at me with a little smile and said, "Guy, we don't do this practice for ourselves. We do it for the other."

And just then, all the craving unhooked. And I saw that I had just been involved in a selfish pursuit to get back to what felt good. And I'd completely lost touch with the fact that the metta practice is about caring for somebody else—or for ourselves, too, but caring for somebody else.

I went back to the simplicity of caring for others, and very shortly everything fell back into place. What it taught me is that my attention had to be innocent—innocent of any ulterior motive. When the ulterior motive was basically selfish, the metta practice did not work for concentration. And of course there wasn't metta there either; there was frustration. When the original intention got reawakened—this practice is about caring for people—then the mind came back together.

In our vipassana practice, the analogy is mindfulness of the object for the object's sake. If we're trying to use the breath to get ourselves into some great feeling state of mind and body, that's selfish intent, and that won't allow the mind to collect in this contentment and ease. But if we can discover that there's a real genuine interest in the object itself, then the mindfulness grows off that. Then the attention is really there in an unforced way, and the concentration can deepen very nicely.

So we need to bring to our vipassana practice an interest in the breath for the sake of the breath, walking for the sake of the walking, a sound for the sake of the sound—not for what I'm going to get out of it. That short-circuits the process. Remember that the sequence has to be interest leading to mindfulness and mindfulness leading to concentration. If you try to go directly to concentration, you'll tie yourself up in a knot. So come back to that original intention of connecting with what is. Find that innocence, and everything will collect around that.

Something else I knew as a yogi but see really clearly as a teacher is that there's huge variation from person to person in ability for concentration or aptitude for concentration. It's a little bit like athletic ability in sports. Some of us have it, some of us don't.

My particular sport obsession is tennis. In that game, I love to watch people like Pete Sampras and Venus and Serena Williams play, because they are, on the male and female sides, the most talented athletes that I've been able to see in the last ten years. Their movements have grace, power, coordination, and a speed that is just native to them. You see other players who practice maybe twice as hard, work a lot harder, and never reach the same level of skill as Sampras or the Williams sisters.

This is a little bit the way it is with concentration. Some people have a really natural ability for this quality. Some don't.

One of the people who I've met who does is a Thai teacher named Ajahn Jemnian. Ajahn Jemnian has a monastery in the south of Thailand near Krabi. He's about sixty-five years old now. He comes to Spirit Rock once a year and teaches in California for a week or two at a time.

One time he recounted his life story to us. He was brought up in a Buddhist household. His parents went regularly to the temple, to the wat, so he was surrounded by the Dharma from an early age. Well, one day when he was about four years old, he sat down on the floor of his house, cross-legged. He closed his eyes, and he went into a trance. His parents talked to him, and he didn't respond. They shook him, and he didn't respond. They shouted at him, and he didn't respond. He was gone.

So his parents naturally were a little bit concerned. What do you do if your four-year-old child sits down and just goes away? They called in the village monk and said, "Our child is in some strange state. Can you help us figure out what's going on? Can you bring him back?"

The monk came over and looked at the young boy, made his determination. He said, "Oh, nothing to worry about. He's gone into an absorption state. You should be very proud of him. Don't worry." And the monk left.

Sure enough, the next day, after twenty-four hours, Ajahn Jemnian popped his eyes open, came back, started moving, walking about, bright-eyed, full of energy. He was absolutely fine. He had just fallen spontaneously into a deep state of absorption.

The village monk recognized that this kid was something special. He had a prodigy on his hands. So from a very early age, Ajahn Jemnian was trained in Buddhist meditation, but also, because this was in Thailand sixty-five years ago, in shamanic practices, because concentration is the doorway to those powers. He received both trainings as he was growing up, and he still lives in both worlds.

He's a very advanced master of both Vipassana and loving kindness. He's done a great deal of metta and has a really joyful expression and energy. He also still works as a shaman.

I was sitting, hearing his teachings one day at Spirit Rock. He'd been talking up in the front of the hall for an hour or so. And he looked out at a woman in the audience and he pointed to her and he said, "Do you have a stomach ache right now?" And she said, "Yeah, as a matter of fact, I do." Ajahn Jimnian also has psychic powers.

So he said, "Come up to the front, please. I have some medicine for you." And he unwrapped his robe to reveal this great vest that he wears. He wears this vest that is stocked with every imaginable item of paraphernalia that a wandering monk could need. It's got Buddhist images. It's got amulets. It's got trinkets. It's got his pens and pads of paper. It's got potions and lotions. It's got his business card. It's got photographs of him that he hands out.

In one pocket of the vest, he had a little bottle of white liquid. So the woman came up to the front and he gave her the bottle of liquid and he said, "Please, please drink this." So she went back to her seat and drank the liquid. About twenty minutes later, as he continued his teachings, he said, "How's your stomach now?" She said, "It's absolutely fine. The pain went completely away."

This is Ajahn Jimnian's magic—Dharma magic and shamanic magic both. He was a meditation prodigy from a very early age based on his strength in concentration.

I, on the other hand, was at the other end of the spectrum. Concentration did not come easily to me at all. Very weak in the early years of my practice in concentration. In fact, I look back at all the friends that I grew up with in the Dharma, and I think that I probably had the weakest concentration of all the people that I knew then, all my Dharma buddies. Mine was the weakest.

I wasn't really aware of how deficient I was in this for quite a long time, and ignorance is bliss in that way. I trundled along quite happily, but at some point I started to realize that my friends were having experiences that I wasn't, and I got kind of interested.

So a little over ten years ago, I just decided I wanted to strengthen the factor of concentration in my own practice. I started coming to IMS in the nineties and doing six-week periods of retreat during the three-month course, oriented to developing stronger concentration. Here we mostly teach it through the Brahma Viharas, first with metta and then with others if people are interested.

I did a number of these retreats in the nineties and it made a significant shift in my concentration level. It really did. It made a quantum leap in that. So I know that if it worked for me, it can work for any of you.

But the other moral of the story I want to pass on is that it took a number of years for that to happen. Making a real improvement in your concentration is not something that's going to happen in the next sitting. It's not something that's going to happen in the next week. It may not be something that's going to happen in the rest of this retreat.

But if you really take it up as a direction for yourself in practice and you apply yourself to it over, let's say, the next five years—both in retreat practice, aiming to cultivate this quality more, and in your daily life, taking practices that emphasize this nature more—you will see a significant shift in your level of concentration.

But I want to emphasize that it's a long-term process so that you don't think that it's something that should happen overnight. And so not to get involved in too much gaining idea about it. It takes a lot of patience, a lot of dedication and effort, but it is well worth the work.

So I highly recommend it for those of you who are drawn in that direction. It really can be developed, and from it we gain all these benefits of inner strength, stability, greater calm, greater sense of abiding in the present moment, and a deeper relaxation really throughout our being. It really calms all the faculties of our human nature. This calming of the faculties is one of the great gifts of concentration.

But in the teachings of the Buddha, it's considered the secondary purpose of concentration. The primary purpose in the Buddha's teachings was for deepening insight. As the mind becomes steadier and calmer and stiller, it becomes more able to see things as they are. And it's seeing things as they are that frees us.

Imagine if you were on a merry-go-round, which is what many sittings feel like for the unconcentrated mind, and you're whirling around and around. You're on a horse, a carousel, going around and around at a pretty good rate of speed. One of your friends has picked up a newspaper and comes over to the merry-go-round and stands by the side of it and holds up this newspaper. You whiz by, but you're going by too fast to read the headlines. So you can't tell what the newspaper says.

But the merry-go-round slows down. Your ticket time is up. You come to rest in front of the newspaper your friend is holding. Ah, then you can read the headlines. And the headlines say: everything changes. The cause of suffering is clinging. The way to release is to let go. That's the freedom. You see that clearly as the mind calms down. So from this place of deep stillness can come the insights that really liberate us from our clinging and from our suffering.

I want to close with a short statement from the Buddha. This is from the Majjhima Nikāya, from the section where he was describing his own enlightenment experience and what happened to him that night under the Bodhi tree. The word "taints" that is used in this passage is another of the lists in Buddhism. It's more or less synonymous with the defilements. So you can think of it as another expression of the defilements.

"When my concentrated mind was thus purified, bright, unblemished, rid of imperfection, malleable, wieldy, steady and attained to imperturbability, I directed it to the knowledge of the destruction of the taints. I directly knew as it actually is: this is suffering. This is the origin of suffering. This is the cessation of suffering. This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering. When I knew and saw thus, my mind was liberated from the taints. I directly knew: birth is destroyed. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more coming to any state of being."

Let's just sit together for a minute, please.

CHAPTER 253

The Power of Mettā

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines whether insight practice alone is sufficient for liberation, or if the cultivation of mettā (loving-kindness) is essential for complete spiritual development. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and exploring the four brahmavihāras, Armstrong presents five transformative aspects of mettā practice: how it softens and tenderizes the heart, purifies difficult emotions through acceptance rather than aversion, develops samādhi (concentration), connects us to all living beings, and brings profound happiness into our lives. He addresses common skepticism among vipassanā practitioners about mettā appearing "contrived" compared to the elegant simplicity of mindfulness practice, explaining how both practices ultimately converge in "warm attention." Through personal stories, teachings from the Dalai Lama, and references to contemplative traditions, Armstrong demonstrates how mettā transforms ill-will into goodwill, creates healing relationships with difficult emotions, and reveals our fundamental interconnectedness with all beings. This talk offers practical guidance for integrating loving-kindness practice with insight meditation for a complete path to liberation.

The talk tonight is called The Power of Metta, or Is Insight Enough?

I wanted to start with the opening of a poem by one of my favorite romantic poets of the last century, E.E. Cummings. This is a poem called "Since Feeling is First":

Since feeling is first, who pays any attention to the syntax of things will never wholly kiss you.

The poem goes on, but I think that's enough. Since feeling is first—feeling is first in a really important way in the Dharma. The Dharma is not about an intellectual understanding, a conceptual take or philosophy. The Dharma is really about the truth of suffering and the truth of freedom. These are feeling elements. This is the way we feel about life. Practice is to bring us out, as the Buddha said in the Satipatthana Sutta, to bring us out of feelings of sorrow, grief, lamentation, and distress.

I feel that the Brahma-vihāra practices are an incredible jewel within our Theravadan tradition. The scope of the four Brahmavihāras, their completeness in describing the life of the heart, is not found anywhere else in any other religious tradition that I'm aware of—not even in other Buddhist traditions. So I want to talk tonight about the first, the foundation, which is the practice of loving-kindness, and what a contribution it can make, especially in the feeling realm, as we deepen our practice on the way to liberation.

I want particularly to talk about five ways in which we feel the benefits of the practice of loving-kindness, and by extension, the other Brahma-vihāras as well.

The first thing that we see in mettā practice is that it makes the heart softer—you could say more tender. In that tenderizing, it makes the heart more responsive to life. The second thing it does is that it purifies the heart, taking the goop of the hindrances and the defilements and finding a way to bring more purity into that area. The third thing it does is that it develops concentration, which as we've talked about is a strongly wholesome quality in itself. The fourth is that it connects us to all of life, to all living beings. And the fifth is that it can bring an incredible amount of happiness into our lives and into our practice.

So I want to talk about all five of these aspects of the mettā practice. First I'll talk about the softening or tenderizing of the heart and whether mettā practice is actually necessary for this.

In our tradition, vipassanā is the wisdom practice. It's through vipassanā that we see things the way they are. And the Buddha said it's seeing things the way they are that frees the mind. So this is our foundation for the whole journey. We say in our tradition that we do loving-kindness practice in the context of vipassanā practice. We acknowledge that vipassanā practice is foremost because it has the ability to completely liberate. Mettā is seen as a supportive practice in this context.

So the question arises: is vipassanā practice sufficient in itself? Will it be the case necessarily that as we journey through insight to the final goal, the heart will open all by itself of loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity?

One of my teachers felt that this was true, and he summarized it by saying that love is the child of freedom. Love is the child of freedom. It's a beautiful image because as the heart gets unburdened, it's more easily able to move into love or compassion. So I believe that for some people, that may be enough. Simply the journey to freedom will unlock the doors of love and compassion.

But I believe that it depends a bit on personality temperament. For myself, who am inclined to the cerebral, I found that vipassanā practice alone wasn't doing everything that I had come into spiritual life looking for. So for me, the adjunct of the Brahma-vihāras, and especially mettā, was very helpful to bring out the direct development of the heart qualities. I'll talk a little more about that as we go along.

Also over the years I've observed the unfolding of practice for people that I've worked with. I've also looked closely at people who are very well established in practice —teachers, renowned teachers of vipassanā. What I see from my observation is that there are people who journey quite far along the track of insight and yet don't have a corresponding opening of the heart or development of loving-kindness. I've met teachers who seem to have that particular mixture of qualities in their being.

I don't believe that they're suffering particularly. So for them, that combination of vipassanā alone may have been just fine. But it wasn't everything that I was looking for in Dharma practice. In a way, I could say that their teaching didn't touch me so deeply because I was looking for that other side. I was looking for that heart side to be an equally important and integral part of my Dharma practice.

But this is a very personal thing. It did not seem like the teachers were suffering. From their side, that was probably a complete practice for them. A friend of mine commented about one of these teachers. The comment was that the teacher's mettā was like distant starlight. It was palpable, but it was a bit faint.

I'll talk about some other teachers as we go whose mettā was stronger than that.

I've been practicing for the last several years also with a Tibetan teacher, a young Tibetan teacher named Sogyal Rinpoche, who's from the Nyingma school and teaches Dzogchen practice. At the end of Tibetan retreats, because they emphasize the heart qualities very strongly, they like to give heart advice to the students as they're departing —sort of a pithy statement that you can take with you, carry back into your daily life.

At the end of the retreat with Sogyal Rinpoche one time, he gave us a piece of parting heart advice. He said, "When you go back into your daily life, I want you to remember three things. First, be normal." He said, "Don't go back and be really weird and flaky because there are already too many strange people in spiritual life. And if you go back and act like that, people are going to think that that's what Buddhism is about. And they're not going to be interested. It's going to turn them off." So he said, "Be normal."

"And be wise. Don't mess up your life. Take care with yourself. Make good choices. Be kind to people. Don't mess up. Live wisely."

And the third thing he said: "When you go back, be juicy. Be juicy. That's the way that people can really tell that something's happened in your Dharma practice. When you go back and there's brightness in your eyes, there's moisture in your eyes, and there's warmth in your heart, then people will really know that something has happened for you."

So juice, which is an old technical Buddhist term, is kind of a summary for all these qualities of heart—such as happiness, contentment, joy, devotion, compassion, faith, trust, kindness, humor. All these things are summarized by the quality of juice. The ten kinds of juice—you've heard that list, haven't you?

One of the features of these qualities is that they really make life sweeter. These are the things that bring into life our experience of the richness and the delight in being alive, in appreciating this precious human birth that we've attained, in appreciating the path, in appreciating the Dharma, in appreciating the Sangha. Not only do they make our life sweeter, they open us up to be touched by life so that we have an immediate heart openness or heart receptivity to receive all that life brings us. And finally, they let us touch other beings in life.

And I think it's this third piece that I particularly want to focus on when we talk about the role of metta.

If your practice includes this aspiration of bodhicitta, which I think Joseph has talked about during this retreat—that we practice in order to help others come out of their suffering, we deepen our own understanding as the best way of helping other beings to come through their suffering—then I believe these heart qualities are one of the best ways of transmitting or carrying out that work. This is really the way that the Dharma can express itself and bring others into the path.

So I believe that if your aspiration inclines to the bodhisattva aspiration, that you're clearly practicing not for yourself alone, but you're on the big boat that wants to gather a lot of beings to the path, these heart qualities make a huge contribution.

I'm very grateful that in our tradition we have specific practices that further the development of the heart, that open up these juicy qualities for us. In our tradition, loving-kindness is the primary practice. It's the foundation. In Mahayana Buddhism, as is found in Tibet, China, Japan, compassion has become the primary heart practice. But I feel that this is just a slight variation in emphasis. So I hope you don't feel that you need to go out from this retreat and argue with the Mahayana practitioners about which is more important. They're so close to identical. They are both just the spirit of caring.

The Dalai Lama said, "Compassion is just basic human warmth." That's all he means by it—basic human warmth. That's also what loving-kindness is. So I don't see a conflict here. They're so close together.

These seeds of caring are there in everyone, absolutely everyone. Trungpa Rinpoche wrote about this in a book called Training the Mind. I want to read a little bit. This is a bit of an extended passage, so please settle back:

"It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for compassion. Why?"

Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate.

A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound, which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would really like to be tough. We would like to come on strong, but there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere, so we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. Such a relief.

So this sore spot is an opening to caring. It's the point at which we are able to let the world touch us. It's there no matter how much armoring has grown up. For everyone, there is this place of accessibility where we're not always strong and tough, but there's a sensitivity that can be developed.

Then Trungpa Rinpoche goes on: "There is also an inner wound called Tathagata Garbha or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore."

So these beautiful qualities really are the opening into bodhisattva fever—this extending of the caring from our open heart to the world's open heart.

There are many beautiful aspects of the loving-kindness practice, but I have to be honest and say that often Vipassana practitioners have some skepticism about metta practice. People who have gotten used to Vipassana practice sometimes have such an appreciation for its purity that metta starts to seem a little bit contrived.

You know, Vipassana is so elegant. It's so clean. It's so unimpeachable. It's impeccable. Just aware of what is. Nothing extra. Wow, it's so elegant. And then along comes this metta practice where we make these kind of hokey, prayer-sounding affirmation things. This doesn't seem elegant at all. Did this come out of the New Age? I can't believe the Buddha actually taught this.

As someone said in an interview, "Vipassana is letting go of everything. Metta is bringing something in. Isn't this contradictory?"

Actually, it's not. The very way that the Buddha defined right effort was in terms of abandoning the unwholesome and developing the wholesome. So there's a clear indication that the cultivation and development and growth of wholesome states of mind are exactly in line with right effort. That's what we're doing with the loving-kindness practice.

But they are different practices, as I'm sure you've experienced over these weeks and months. They are different practices. Hopefully, in our maturation of Dharma practice, they come back and converge. And where they can converge is in a warm attention—that the mindfulness of Vipassana becomes not cold and detached and scientific, but permeated with this care and warmth and connectedness of the loving-kindness practice so that the two blend together as we develop them both.

Sometimes people complain that metta is diluted: "This is really a fuzzy practice. You say, 'may I be happy?' But there is no I. What are you talking about?"

So for Vipassana purists, I want to offer a way to say the metta phrases that is really in line with the Abhidhamma. Here's the metta phrase. If you like, you can say it this way: "In this ever-changing stream... In this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena conventionally designated as Paul... May the state of happiness arise ever more frequently."

This works just fine.

If you like this phrase, feel free to use it in your meditation. If you simply prefer the phrase, "may Paul be happy," stick with that. It's a lot simpler.

It's extraordinary when we meet somebody who's really developed these heart qualities. The person alive today who really comes to mind for me again and again is His Holiness, the Dalai Lama. He consciously has developed these practices. It didn't just happen by accident that his heart is the way it is.

Someone came up to him at a conference—it was a pan-religious conference—and asked him, "What is your religion?" I don't think they'd been paying very close attention to the program. The Dalai Lama said, "My religion is kindness."

He said this again when we had a meeting with him a couple of years ago at Spirit Rock, a meeting with His Holiness and about 225 Buddhist teachers, both Western and Asian. We got to spend a couple of days with him. In the course of it, he said to us, who were all card-carrying Buddhists, "I'm not interested in propagating Buddhism. I'm interested in propagating human values." That's really what touches him—the welfare of people, creatures, the environment. That's what moves him.

People feel this when they come in contact with him. As a visiting head of state, he was on Spirit Rock land for a couple of days. The State Department had to provide security for his visit because he is the head of the government in exile. Before he came, someone from the State Department called my wife, Sally, who's a horse person, and asked, "Do you know where we can rent some horses while the Dalai Lama is visiting? Because we want to put sharpshooters with rifles up on top of the Spirit Rock Hills. We'll send them up there on horseback."

This was the level of security that they intended to provide. Fortunately, they couldn't find any horses, so that didn't happen. But they did, every day, make all of us—all 225 of us—pass through metal detectors before we could go up and meet with His Holiness. Even the people who had been staying in the residence halls had to vacate their rooms at 7 in the morning. The State Department security agents went through with bomb-sniffing dogs to see if there were any explosives tucked away under our zafus.

Then we all had to walk through these metal detectors, which were staffed by the State Department security people. These were heavy-duty security people. They were not the bouncers you see at concerts. They were very, very professional people. They carried a gun on one hip, a nightstick on the other, and a walkie-talkie clipped to their back. You did not want to joke with them. They were heavier duty than the airport guys.

I had to wait one morning while we were getting in and just chatted with them. They had been under some very serious assignments in the past. They had guarded people like Yasser Arafat when he came to this country, the Israeli prime minister, other heads of state. They were not to be messed with. They were real professionals.

At the end of the conference, all these security people got together and asked if they could have their photograph taken with His Holiness. Because they felt something from him. They were also touched by him. And of course he obliged.

He has this beautiful childlike heart that can just make contact on that basic level of caring about someone else. He once was musing about his own fame. He said, "I don't know why people like me so much. I don't think I'm anything special. The only thing that I try to practice is when I meet someone, I try to consider them as more important than myself. I think that's why people love me."

Amazing attitude.

Of course, this quality of love is part of our nature. We've all known love, certainly in our childhood, and mostly at different times in our life.

For me, a lot of the appeal of spiritual life and spiritual practice has been to access the state of love more regularly and to be able to live in that place more of the time. That's really what motivated me in spiritual life. In a way, I feel that pull—it's sort of like the heart is pulling us home. The heart wants to find its resting place, its place of openness and fullness.

From this point of view of how natural love is, the metta practice can seem kind of contrived. And it is a lot of work at first for something that's so natural. Ultimately, it's not something we have to fabricate. But because it's become obscured, we do have to fabricate it a little bit at first. That's what the phrases do—they tend to evoke this quality. But it's clearly part of our deepest nature.

One of the most loving people I've ever known was my grandmother. She was born in the countryside in North Carolina around 1890. She was not highly educated. She was married to my grandfather, who was one of the most aversive personalities that I've ever met, and she maintained this sweetness of temperament all through her life, right to the end.

I remember when we would go visit them—I was a kid—we'd walk into her kitchen, she'd greet us and give us a big hug, and then she would put her lips down in the hollow of our necks and kind of nuzzle around in there and tell us that she was stealing our sugar. She said, "You kids are so sweet, I'm going to steal your sugar." And she'd just kiss us. She had had no Buddhist training and had not even done psychotherapy. So this love really is intrinsic. You can trust in it.

But because it's gotten obscured, we need to make a little bit of effort and incline the mind in that direction. The effort lifts some of the obscurations and then lets it shine through again. So this is the area of tenderizing or softening the heart.

The second area I wanted to talk about is the work of purification that metta accomplishes. The first area we look at is how it changes our intention in a given moment. The practice of loving kindness, as you've been doing it, the other brahmaviharas, is a simple practice of seeing another person and wishing them well. Seeing yourself and wishing yourself well. That's basically it. That's all that's there.

Whether the other person gets happy or well or not isn't in your control. So in our practice we don't worry too much about the result. It's not focused on whether the person actually gets happy. We can't control that. The focus is on our intention in doing the practice.

So you connect with someone, you have the wish, "I hope you're happy." That's the important piece. That sincere wish. Sometimes people say, "Well, I can wish them happiness, but I know they won't always be happy, so this flies in the face of impermanence." Yeah, that's true, but your wish is sincere. Your wish for them to be always happy is sincere. Whether it can be accomplished or not depends on them, but the sincerity of the wish can be true. So that's where we focus on this intention. This is the core of the practice.

As you do the metta practice, a skillful way to do it is to call up the person and let yourself just feel for a moment a nonverbal sense of caring. This is the heart of it. This is what will drive the engine of the metta practice. If you say the phrase and there's really no caring from your side, the practice doesn't go very far. But if you feel this little spark of caring—it's like looking in their eyes and just whispering, "I hope you're well"—and then you say the phrase that expresses that, that's what will make the practice grow. That's really the seed of it.

It seems like such a little thing, but this is the seed that everything else comes from. All the warmth and fire and deepening that can come from loving kindness all comes from this little seed. Because it's a seed, your only job really is planting that seed moment after moment. You can't control when the plant grows up. It's just like if you want to grow tomatoes in the summer.

You put the seed in the ground at a certain depth, prepare the soil in a particular way, and then water it faithfully. You cannot make that tomato plant grow. When it pokes up out of the ground, it looks so tiny and fragile. If you try to take hold of it and force its growth, you'll only rip it up. Only nature can make that plant flourish. Your job as the gardener is simply to plant the seed and tend it with care.

It's the same way in metta practice. Your job is only to plant the seeds of these moments of caring. Then you must trust the dharma, trust nature itself to grow that tender beginning into the full flowering of loving kindness. And it will do exactly that—such is the nature of things.

As the Buddha said, "Do not disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." I mentioned this quote earlier in a talk about mindfulness. In vipassana practice, it's the moments of mindfulness that fill the jar. In metta practice, it's the moments of sincere caring that gradually accumulate. These seemingly small moments can grow into a very strong state of mind.

We usually begin by directing loving kindness toward ourselves. Traditionally, this is done because the self is supposed to be the easiest person to love. You've all felt that, right? Not always. Often for us, the self proves to be the most difficult target of our loving intentions.

The self becomes most difficult because turning loving thoughts inward brings up all the ways we don't feel so great about ourselves. Sometimes when we direct metta toward ourselves, we remember all the unskillful things we've done, all the ways we haven't been loving, all the ways we wish we had been kinder. Sometimes it feels like we're doing something wrong. "I'm inclining my mind toward metta and I'm getting all this self-judgment and remorse and guilt. Something's gone off here."

But that's not true. It's actually the case that metta is doing the work of purification by bringing to light all that accumulated residue that has been hidden—all the difficult material we've been carrying but that hasn't fully entered consciousness. The only way to purify these patterns is to bring them into the light of awareness and learn to relate to them differently. This is one of metta practice's most powerful effects.

Metta practice aims straight for the heart. It goes right in and pulls out whatever's there. If there's pain stored there, that's what it draws forth. If there's joy, it brings that out too. I think of it like a magnet—metta is like a magnet with a really strong positive pole. As we begin saying the phrases, it's like running that magnet up the center of our being. Everything of the opposite charge gets drawn out toward it.

So metta will pull this material up into consciousness. That's why metta practice is not always bliss and light and love and peace. You can hit some very bumpy terrain in metta because of this purification force. But the good thing is that these feelings then become available to be experienced consciously, and we learn a new relationship to them.

It's not that they simply disappear through metta practice. Rather, it's as though we begin to hold them—the shame and guilt and fear, the anxiety, the cravings, the self-judgment—within the greater space of loving kindness. It's this holding them with loving kindness that accomplishes the purification, not their immediate disappearance. They don't vanish instantly, but we create an entirely different relationship to them. The purification happens through changing our fundamental orientation from one of aversion to one of acceptance, or even at times friendliness, toward these difficult states of mind.

The feeling of this process is somewhat different, for me anyway, than the way vipassana works with these same challenging states. My main hindrance over many years of practice has been fear—that's been my predominant difficult tendency of mind. Vipassana practice made a huge difference in how I experienced fear. Over the years, fear kept getting smaller and smaller through vipassana practice, through the growth of qualities like non-identification, spaciousness, equanimity, and the direct seeing of impermanence. All these insights took tremendous power away from fear.

But when my mind would tip in a certain direction, it would still tip toward fear. The same basic conditioning, the same fundamental patterning remained there.

I noticed that after doing a lot of metta practice—I did a few six-week retreats of Brahma Viharas here—that started to change. Often when my mind would tip, it would tip into metta instead of fear. It's as though the loving kindness actually replaced the fear conditioning. It gave a different destination for the mind to go to.

The difficult person is also a great source of learning in purification. I did one metta retreat where there was someone else on the retreat with whom I had had a hard time the year before. We'd had some interpersonal conflict. I was doing metta practice, I started to get quite sensitive, quite still, and then every time that person would go by, I'd start reviewing all the things that had happened that year, and my mind would get really churned up. I'd get really angry again.

So here I am, deep into loving-kindness practice, and I'm spinning out in these fits of anger for thirty minutes, forty-five minutes. I just couldn't bring it back. I was obsessing about this relationship. So I thought, "Well, I have heard of doing metta for the difficult person." Somebody suggested that. But no, that's too hokey. I don't want to have to pretend I like this person. But I was running out of options. Nothing else was working, so I thought, "Okay, I'll try it."

So I started to send loving kindness to them, and I found I actually could wish them well. I could sincerely hold them and think, "I hope you're happy." That wasn't too hard a stretch.

Then something began to dawn on me. The way that anger is usually referred to in the old texts, it's more accurately translated as ill will. This is more accurate translation from the suttas of the mind state they're talking about. And I started to tune into this quality of ill will and realized that when I was angry at the person, I was feeling ill will.

When you think about ill will, what it really means is "I want them to hurt." It's the opposite of goodwill, which is "I want them to be happy." If you look closely at anger, the common garden variety of anger, you'll find within it this piece of ill will. We want someone else to hurt. This is just a step away from cruelty. Cruelty is the enjoyment of somebody else's hurting.

As a good meditator and a good Buddhist, I couldn't be comfortable with the idea of myself as a cruel person. When I looked at anger, I saw I was actually just one step away from cruelty in wanting someone else to suffer. That didn't sit so well with me. It's easy from a Western psychological viewpoint to kind of justify why we should be angry at somebody. But when we actually look at the property of ill will, from a Buddhist point of view, that's pretty hard to justify.

So I became motivated to transform that ill will into goodwill. And that's exactly what the metta practice does. It converts ill will to goodwill. And that's as far as you have to go. And I started to notice that when goodwill was present, the ill will could not arise. The anger could not arise.

I also saw that I still didn't have to like the person. That actually didn't change. But I no longer wished them to suffer, and I could easily turn to goodwill for them. Once I found that out, then every time the anger started to come up, I would turn to metta, and it would just dissolve it. It became a really great refuge for me.

So we see that as this quality of metta grows in us—the quality of friendliness, of affection, of liking—it has a tremendous unifying force in the mind. Aversion pushes people apart. It breaks us apart. When we're averse to our own being, we become fragmented. Love is what unifies. Affection is what pulls together. It's the gravitational pull in the emotional life.

So as the quality of loving kindness develops and all these impure things are brought into the light of day, we start seeing we don't have to feel so badly about our difficult areas—these qualities of fear or anxiety or shame or craving or aversion or self-judgment or sadness. They're held in the light of that friendly eye. They become much, much more acceptable. And we don't have to make them go away.

We just hold them in a different relationship. This is really healing. This is what lets us integrate those fragments that we've cast off, that we've disowned.

I want to read a poem which I know a lot of you already know, but it says it so well that I want to share it again. It's called "St. Francis and the Sow" by Galway Kinnell:

The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower, for everything flowers from within of self-blessing, though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing. As St. Francis put his hand on the creased forehead of the sow and told her in words and in touch, blessings of earth on the sow. And the sow began remembering all down her thick length, from the earthen snout, all the way through the fodder and slops, to the spiritual curl of the tail, from the hard spikiness spiked out from the spine, down through the great broken heart, to the sheer blue milken dreaminess, spurting and shuddering from the fourteen teats into the fourteen mouths, sucking and blowing beneath them, the long, perfect loveliness of sow.

Loving kindness can bring in this sense of self-appreciation, of self-acceptance, of seeing ourself in the context of nature, beautiful creation within nature.

The third of the aspects of metta practice I wanted to mention is concentration. We've talked a lot about concentration on this retreat. This is actually not a bad time in the retreat to remember about concentration. Anybody notice the effect of the last couple of days on your concentration? Thanksgiving is usually deadly to concentration. In the interviews today, a number of people reported, "Wow, that was really a bump. Great food, but it was really a bump in my practice."

So at this point, now that Thanksgiving is over, it's actually a good time to renew our vigor for concentration, to renew that kind of determination to really hold the retreat container very well. There's a temptation as the energy rises to perhaps talk to one another, to be a little more relaxed in one's mindfulness. We still have quite a long time in the retreat to go, and there will be integration time at the end. You don't need to do the integration now. So a really good time, the day after Thanksgiving, to rededicate to this focus of attention and the noble silence, to really hold the container of the retreat well until integration begins.

Metta practice is a very powerful concentration practice. The phrases serve as the object around which the mind collects. We often use it to teach concentration to the level, as I mentioned, of jhanas. Concentration unifies the mind. Metta unifies the mind. That's why these two together are a really powerful combination. The loving-kindness brings the mind together so it doesn't want to stray. As the concentration makes the mind more powerful, the phrases have more impact and the feelings of love come out more strongly. So both of these really reinforce each other.

There's this amazing writing from a Russian Orthodox saint from the 19th century whose name was Theophan the Recluse. Theophan means "face of God" – it's kind of a nice name. And I want to read this. It could have been written by someone who was doing metta as a concentration practice:

For so long as the mind remains in the head, where thoughts jostle one another, it has no time to concentrate on one thing. But when attention descends into the heart, it attracts all the powers of the soul and body into one point there. This concentration of all human life in one place is immediately reflected in the heart by a special sensation that is the beginning of future warmth. This sensation grows into warm feeling and concentrates the attention upon itself. And so it comes about that whereas in the initial stages the attention is kept in the heart by an effort of will, in due course, this attention, by its own vigor, gives birth to warmth in the heart. This warmth then holds the attention without special effort. From this, the two go on supporting one another and must remain inseparable, because dispersion of attention cools the warmth, and diminishing warmth weakens attention.

This beautiful union of concentration and loving kindness, felt in the heart center, felt in a bodily way, could be a description of our practice.

The fourth aspect of loving kindness is that it opens our practice out to all of life. We can use our Vipassana practice in a way that is quite self-centered. It's not meant that way, but it can happen that way. We start from my pain, my problems, my neuroses, and then we move on to my path, my progress, my freedom, my liberation. It can all be done in quite a self-centered way.

This is from Shantideva, a 9th century Indian teacher: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy."

And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy. It is amazing when we can open up to letting our happiness be defined by the happiness of others. The Dalai Lama says this is really a good bet because your odds of success go up by six billion to one. This is the direction of the loving-kindness practice.

The neutral person is really our turning point. The neutral person stands for all the countless beings that we don't know. It's said that metta is like a gentle rain that falls everywhere without discriminating. It has this universal quality. This is one aspect of its boundlessness—that it doesn't pick and choose who it cares for, but it cares for all beings.

Sometimes it's hard to connect with that sense of universality because we have prejudices. We have people we like and people we don't. But the Buddha said a very interesting thing in the Samyutta Nikaya. He said, given that samsara has no discoverable beginning—that this round of births that we've all been on has no apparent beginning—think if that was true. Just as your eyes scan around the hall this evening, think if everyone here had been at some time in the past your mother or father or sister or brother or son or daughter. How would that affect your level of concern for them?

Well, it might depend on your family of origin. I don't want to go too far with this one. But it may be that we're closer than we imagine ourselves to be.

The neutral person actually for some people becomes a kind of secret love. I was teaching a daylong in California on metta, and somebody came up to me and said, "You know, I was practicing with my neutral person being the cashier at the supermarket where I go, and I developed this real love for the person. I went to check out and I got really nervous—it's my neutral person!" It's amazing how strongly we can care for people that we really haven't met or don't know. It's quite mind-boggling.

One of the breakthroughs of insight with the neutral person is we start to see that whoever it is, we all have the same deep wishes. Our deepest aspirations are really all the same. We all want to be safe. We want to be happy. We want to be healthy. We want to live easily and take care of ourselves in the world. As you feel into the depth of this connection, you start to realize that we're basically the same organism. We have the same body shape, the same package of emotions, the same kinds of thoughts. There are distinctions, but I wonder how real they are.

I'm sure you all know Rumi, the medieval poet. His teacher was a fellow named Shams. Shams did not leave behind many poems, but this is one poem that is said to have been written by Shams, the teacher of Rumi:

I, you, he, she, we.
In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions.

What Shams is pointing to is that insight that sees our unity behind all the apparent differences. There are many apparent differences. We have differences in personality, in age, in gender, in race, in class, in fortune, and so forth. But when one from a spiritual level sees through all those distinctions, there's this underlying unity where we are basically the same being. That's what the metta practice can open us up to see—this universal connection with all life.

Finally, metta can lead to a great deal of happiness. I like to think about Ajahn Jumnian as an exemplar of this approach. He said he hasn't had anger in twenty-five years, and I have to say, every time I've seen him, he seems happy. He'll come to Spirit Rock to teach. He's there for about a week, and we often offer to take him out other places. We say, "Would you like to go into San Francisco today or see the Golden Gate Bridge, do some touring?"

And he says, "If you'd like to take me to San Francisco, that's okay. I'd be happy doing that. But is there anybody who'd like to hear the Dharma? If there are people who'd like to hear the Dharma, I'm happy to teach the Dharma. If nobody comes who wants to hear the Dharma, I'm happy to just sit there in the meditation hall. I'll be happy whatever you want me to do."

And he's really like that. He has this really joyful energy. He's done a lot of metta practice and taught a lot of metta practice.

He doesn't know much English, but he has one phrase that he conveys in English. It's the union of vipassana and metta, the essence of his teaching. He'll touch space and say, "Empty, empty." This is the wisdom of vipassana. "Empty, empty." And then he'll say, "Happy, happy. Empty, empty, happy, happy." That's his Dharma transmission.

You can get a sense of some of this happiness from the meditation on the benefactor. If you pick a benefactor who's wise and free and joyful, you'll find that as you connect with them, you start to soak up those qualities. You start to feel their being osmosing into yours. This is why we recommend picking someone for the benefactor who is a strong figure.

In one tradition within Buddhism, there's a practice called union with the teacher. The effect is similar—by hanging out in a meditative way with the teacher, one starts to realize that the teacher's mind and one's own mind, the student's mind, are really essentially one and the same nature. This same understanding can come from our meditation on the benefactor. If we choose someone who embodies those qualities of wisdom and compassion, we start to feel it resonating in our heart. And we couldn't feel that resonance if we didn't already have wisdom and compassion within us.

As the happiness of loving-kindness grows, it brings with it a real sense of contentment. And of course that also helps the settling of concentration, because when loving-kindness is present in a strong way, we just have the sense we can rest in it. There's no more sublime state of being. So we can rest. There's a sense of having come home.

One Tibetan poem says, "There is nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face." This is the feeling of coming home to loving-kindness. The Buddha talked about it as a deliverance of mind, a liberation of mind.

And we start to see the union of vipassana and metta. Vipassana reveals this great, vast emptiness, the insubstantiality of all things extending infinitely. When we first hear about it, it can sound like a cold and lonely kind of void to hang out in. It's not very appealing.

But as metta practice develops, that whole space opened up by vipassana can get pervaded with the warmth of loving-kindness. And then all of a sudden, this vast space of awareness becomes a really inviting place to open to, a really inviting place to hang out in, something that we can trust in and surrender to because it has the emptiness of the Dharma and the warmth of loving-kindness.

As we start to get the intuition of that union, we really see that this is our true nature—this empty space that has the quality of awareness and also the warmth of loving-kindness. When we start to see that that's the way things basically are, we start to see our own nature is basically good, is really good. That's really what offsets the sense of insufficiency or self-judgment. We trust more and more in our own basic goodness.

I want to close this evening with a prayer of Mother Teresa's. It's a little bit off the point, but it is in the metta family, and I really like it. Do you know that part of the metta phrase that says, "May I be free from inner and outer harm"? The outer harm is pretty clear—we don't want to be assaulted or have an accident happen to us, be injured. The inner harm is sometimes not so clear. So this is Mother Teresa's expression, as I read it, of a metta aspiration of being free from inner harm:

"Deliver me, O Jesus, from the desire to be loved, from the desire to be extolled, from the desire to be honored, from the desire to be praised, from the desire to be preferred, from the desire to be consulted, from the desire to be approved, from the desire to be popular. Deliver me from the fear of being humiliated, from the fear of being despised, from the fear of suffering rebukes, from the fear of being slandered, from the fear of being forgotten, from the fear of being wronged, from the fear of being ridiculed, from the fear of being suspected."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 254

Mettā: Purity And Purification

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the two complementary aspects of mettā (loving-kindness) practice: purity and purification. Drawing from retreat observations, he explains how sincere practice alternates between experiencing pure states of love, compassion, and joy, and directly encountering obstacles like aversion, self-judgment, anger, and fear that require purification.
> Armstrong focuses particularly on aversion as one of the three unwholesome roots (greed, aversion, delusion) that Buddhist practice aims to eliminate. He offers practical guidance for working with self-judgment through receiving mettā, transforming anger by recognizing ill-will and cultivating goodwill, and using loving-kindness as protection against fear. Throughout, he emphasizes that obstacles aren't problems to eliminate but opportunities for transformation when held in the space of mettā.
> The talk also explores samādhi (concentration) as the second quality developed in mettā practice, describing how the mind's unification in the present moment naturally supports the heart's opening. Armstrong concludes with reflections on the Mettā Sutta, showing how concentration, loving-kindness, and wisdom work together to establish the "sublime abiding" of boundless love for all beings.

After the round of interviews today, when we went down to lunch, teachers were talking about how the retreat was going. What we all observed today is that you are really cooking—an old Buddhist technical term. At this point in the retreat, the momentum of your practice is really clear, because almost everyone who came in to see me today had something interesting going on, sometimes many interesting things. This was a sign that the practice had become deeply engaged, quite a shift from a few days ago.

At the start of the retreat—I don't know what each of your individual experiences was—but there was a lot of doubt among the people I talked to. What is this practice? Where is it going? Why am I saying these phrases? What's going to happen? At this early stage of the retreat, one really wonders if the practice is going to lift off, achieve that critical mass for takeoff.

This reminded me of a story from a teacher who brought it up on a retreat because we were talking about the subject of faith. He was a calculus teacher in college and had offered a course in beginning calculus. One woman student came up to him on the first day and said, "I'm thinking about taking your class, but I don't know if it will help me or not."

He asked, "What do you want to do?"

She replied, "I'm studying civil engineering and I need some tools that will solve this kind of problem."

He said, "Oh, well, this course will do it for you."

"How do I know that?" she asked.

"I'm telling you, if you take the course, you'll learn the tools to solve that kind of problem."

"But I don't know that for myself," she said. "Therefore, I'm not going to take the course." And she dropped it.

If all of you had said that on the first day, the room would be empty. But I'm glad that you had enough faith to continue.

This was at a retreat actually taught by a Tibetan Lama. When he heard this story, he said, "Good story, but bad ending. Like European movie." So here you all are in an American movie—good story, good ending. It's happening for you all, and I really appreciate that.

I work out at the gym when I'm home, two or three times a week if I can. When I first started going to this gym, there are some pretty hardcore bodybuilders who go there, and I feel quite dwarfed in comparison. I go really just to keep healthy and maintain some muscle tone, but there are some guys there who've been developing their muscles for years. When I first went, I was really impressed by them. I thought, "Wow, that's really something. I don't know if I want to look like that, but I'm impressed that they do."

As time went on, I started to realize that the amount of muscle one had wasn't really the important thing. Because what happens when you build a certain amount of muscle at the gym? You add another weight, and then it gets hard again. Have you noticed that? Just when you get good at one level, you add another weight, and it gets hard again. So in a real sense, you never make any progress.

It's like koan practice, if you've ever encountered that in the Zen tradition. I did a little bit of koan practice with a really great Zen master named Sasaki Roshi. As soon as I solved one koan, he just gave me another one, and then I was back in confusion again. So I never had a sense of making any progress.

What I came to appreciate at the gym is not how many weights somebody can do, but the sincerity of their effort. People come into the gym who are a little out of shape and not very strong, and they don't do many weights, but if they're really putting their hearts into it, then they really work out their whole system. The important thing is not how many weights you can lift, but the quality of your effort. And that really comes from your heart.

That's what I've been appreciating in the interviews today—the fruits of people's effort are really coming through. All the groundwork that you've done in these first four days of practice, I really see paying off.

In our approach to loving-kindness practice, I hope you know that there are two different kinds of good results that happen. One kind of good result that happens from this practice is the presence of mettā.

The other kind of good result that happens is the absence of metta—or you might say, the obstacles to metta. Generally, as you continue in a sincere way, you will get one of these two results. You will either get the blossoming of loving-kindness, or you'll directly encounter those states of mind and heart that are obstructing the development of metta.

Whichever one happens—and actually for most people it's both, an alternation—both of these aspects are really important for our practice and our growth. They work hand in hand together. I think a way to think about them helpfully is that they are the cycles in our practice of purity on the one hand and purification on the other.

As we deepen and contact these pure states of mind—love, compassion and joy—this gives us the faith and confidence that we have these beautiful qualities within ourselves. Not only that we have them, but we're starting to manifest them. We're starting to feel them come alive in our lives. And there's a great source of confidence that we can do this work.

Then the second part of the cycle is purification, when we encounter the difficult aspects of our hearts and minds. These are the states like sadness or longing or fear or resentment. These are so important to find because by and large in our daily life they've been buried. They've been operating, but they've been operating at a repressed level. And because we haven't been able to touch them directly, we haven't been able to release them or free ourselves from their underlying activity.

So as long as we're not able to contact these difficult forces of the mind, they govern our lives. They've been driving us in different ways as long as they've been unconscious. Now that they're in the light of awareness and the light of metta, there's a possibility of transforming them. So these are actually the seeds of our greatest freedom. These are the things whose appearance is really going to transform our life and our practice as we learn to relate with them.

Because metta practice goes right for the heart, the feeling level, the feeling nature of our emotional life comes center stage and is even intensified with the turning of the mind to metta. And because we have on the one hand the purity of love and compassion and joy, and on the other the difficult states of sadness and fear and so on, it's almost like in metta retreat, sometimes we don't find very much equilibrium. Sometimes we're in heaven and sometimes we're in hell.

So the metta retreat often has much more of this alternation of heavenly states and hellish states than a vipassana retreat, where you might find more of an equanimity and kind of a cruising level. So don't be surprised by those strong fluctuations in emotion that can come from the metta practice. It's just part and parcel of this approach. It doesn't mean anything is going wrong. It means that the work is happening. You are happening.

This work of purification has a specific meaning in Buddhism. It means to free the mind from the forces of greed, aversion, and confusion—the three roots of the unwholesome in our experience and in our actions. It is the work of Dharma practice to reduce and eventually eliminate these three forces from our hearts and minds. And that's part of the work that we're involved in here.

Earlier this year, I was preparing a talk on this theme of purification. I was at another center in Massachusetts, sitting at the kitchen table in the apartment where I was staying and looking out the window into the woods that surrounded it. As I was looking out there, a hawk swooped down in this wooded area. It was late winter, so there were no leaves on the trees. Everything was bare. So I could see the hawk flying through the trees and then making a plunge into the leaves on the ground, picking up a snake in its claws.

Then the hawk took the snake and settled on a fallen tree that was resting at an angle, up about seven or eight feet. Sitting in my house, I could almost watch him at eye level. The hawk pinned the snake to the fallen tree and with his beak reached down and tore off pieces of flesh. As I was watching and thinking about the topic of purification, the hawk was ripping the snake apart and eating it bite by bite.

This is life for many creatures on the planet. The snake didn't want to die. The snake's deepest wish was for its own safety and happiness and health and ease. It was tremendously afraid, I imagine, of its death. But the hawk didn't want to die either. The hawk had a strong craving for continued existence, fueled by this fear of perishing and a quest for survival. And the collision of those two was not a totally happy picture.

We also have these deeply conditioned habits because our past is from that realm of animal life. So we have this deeply conditioned quest for survival, this deep fear of elimination and of physical pain.

This is the kind of conditioning that exists in our minds, and the depth of it is what makes it so challenging to purify. These are essentially the sources of craving and fear in our hearts and minds. You can sense, I hope, how deeply they penetrate from that image. This is very difficult work—the overall work of purification. It's absolutely no wonder that we still have these forces of desire and fear very much alive in us.

Tonight, I want to talk first about the purification aspect of our practice, and then spend more time toward the end on the aspect of purity. As I discuss purification, I'll focus on one particular factor: aversion. Among the three primary forces—greed, aversion, and delusion—aversion comes up very often in the retreat situation and is central for many people's practice.

Aversion is a term that encompasses a wide range of mental states. It is the basic experience of negativity or disliking, but manifests through states like anger, resentment, irritation, impatience, and frustration. It also includes fear, anxiety, nervousness, despair, depression, sorrow, and grief. All of these are different aspects of aversion or negativity.

In the texts, metta is presented by the Buddha as the antidote to aversion. So if you can connect to any of these states of mind—any hits out there? There are a few in here—then metta is the medicine for that state of mind. It is the antidote for all these different forms of aversion because it is essentially the opposite of negativity. It's the friendly, warm, welcoming attitude of mind.

One form of negativity that often arises in retreat is self-judgment. As we're alone and lack the company of friends and the reinforcement that social contact brings, we often find ourselves getting in touch with fears about our own being. We encounter a sense of inadequacy—that somehow we're not quite good enough. And because of that not being good enough, we're not really lovable. No one will love us because we're not worthy of being loved. We're not quite good enough to merit being loved.

This was brought up when the Dalai Lama visited the Insight Meditation Society in Massachusetts. It was in the late seventies; the center was just a couple of years old—I think it was three years old at that point. We hadn't really straightened out our relationships with the townspeople very well at all. There were rumors going around that at IMS we held orgies at midnight where we danced around a fire naked. The townies, the boys, would love to drive up the driveway with their horns blaring and shout curses at us in the middle of the night.

But the Dalai Lama came to visit us in 1979. He wasn't as famous then as he is now—he wasn't quite the international figure that he was—but he was still a fairly big deal. The State Department was not providing security for him at that time, so the local chief of police got to provide security for him. This established us in the eyes of the local chief of police. Wow, a foreign dignitary is coming to my town, and I get to run the siren while I drive him up to the center. All of a sudden, we were in with at least part of the townspeople.

The Dalai Lama visited the three-month course toward its end. After he talked, he took questions from the meditators. One young man who was on the retreat raised his hand and said, "I don't feel good about myself. I just have this underlying feeling that I'm not worthy. Can you speak to that? Can you tell me how to work with it?"

The Dalai Lama came back with a very strong answer. He said, "You are wrong." I mean, he's the Bodhisattva of compassion. Most of the time he strokes people. But he said, "You are wrong. That is just not right. Every being that is born is a beautiful addition of creation, a beautiful expression of nature—even animals. Look around here: the deer, the birds, the turkeys, the worms on the pavement. They're all these beautiful expressions of the life of nature. How much more so a human being who has the capacity that you have for kindness and wisdom?"

Each one of you is a very beautiful and precious being. To think that you are unworthy is absolutely wrong and unfounded. And yet we often have this feeling, don't we? We often feel we're not quite good enough.

The metta practice is such a great antidote to this because as we start to connect with that sense of liking and friendliness in our heart, that sense of warmth, we really start to verify our own goodness. It may not be there all the time. It may just be flickering on some of the time. But when we feel it, we know what a beautiful thing it is and what a gift it is to the world.

The world really needs this quality of friendliness. And as it comes alive in our heart, we start to realize this is an important contribution. This is something worthwhile in me that maybe I can learn to bring out into life and into the world. And we start to get a conviction there's something good that's happening inside. And that's a strong antidote to this feeling of not being good enough.

One of the other ways that we can work with the practice to reinforce this lovability —because love really is in the eye of the beholder—is to work with the sending of metta to yourself. Now, I don't know if you've thought about this, but when you send metta to yourself, you're actually playing two roles in that drama. You're the sender and you're the receiver at the same time.

Most of us, I think, find it a lot easier to be the sender. I don't know if you've noticed that. It's kind of easy to give, isn't it? It's often difficult to receive because receiving can trigger that feeling, "I'm not worthy of receiving this gift."

So in the sending of metta to yourself, see if you can feel into being the receiver of the metta—not just being the sender, but what it feels like to receive. One of the ways that you can accentuate this, and something we recommend that you play with: imagine as you're receiving the metta phrases that your dearest friends and family members are seated in a half circle in front of you. All the people you'd really like to hang out with—only people that you want to be there get in that circle. And they're sending the metta phrases to you. The metta phrases are coming out of their hearts to you, and you can be purely in receiving mode and feel what it feels like to receive their love from the people you know do care about you.

Another way that it's fun to play with the metta with this self-judging is to start to listen to the comments of the judge: "You always mess up. You never get it right. Nobody's ever going to really be crazy about you." And you start to notice that this judge kind of has a personality. Not a very warm and fuzzy personality either, but a definite personality.

So you don't have to do a lot of looking through the past to see, "Is this my second-grade teacher? Is this my mother? Is it my father?" You don't have to do that. But what if you were to give a personality to that judge? What if you were to kind of make a funny character out of the judge and give it a name and give it a face and sort of make a person out of it? Who does that judge seem like they are? If they were a cartoon character, who would they be?

One person that I made this suggestion to decided that his judge was Darth Vader. And then every time the judging comment would come in, he'd say, "Hi, Darth. Thanks very much for the suggestion," and go back to the metta practice. But another thing that's very effective to do is send metta to Darth because Darth really needs it. As you tune in, you probably recognize Darth is not a very happy character. Darth could use some metta. So if you make a character out of that judge, direct the metta and see what happens. See what happens to the tone of those judging comments.

Two other things that are helpful in the metta practice in working with this tendency to judge. One is feeling the goodness in ourselves, and you can also reflect on the qualities that you like in yourself or reflect on good things that you've done in the past just to get in touch with the intention, the wholesome motivation behind those actions. So you'll know that kindness is something that you do from time to time from that good intention. You'll feel that goodness in yourself.

And one final thing that can be really helpful is to send metta to yourself as a child. Imagine yourself at a time in your life when you can get in touch with your innocence. It might be four or five, eight or ten, teenage years when you felt that vulnerability and awkwardness. And even have a sense that you can hold that child and be the adult maybe that that child didn't have. And you can give that child the love and caring and affirmation and visibility. You can see what that child had that perhaps no one else at that time was able to see and reflect to you. This can be really healing, and it can really open up the channel of caring for yourself.

Another form of aversion that often arises strongly during metta practice is anger. This might seem contradictory, but sometimes that's precisely what gets evoked.

This came home to me powerfully during a long metta retreat I attended a few years ago. I had been navigating a difficult relationship that year, and as the retreat progressed, I found myself becoming quite quiet and concentrated, feeling genuine metta arising. But then thoughts of this challenging relationship would surface, and I'd begin what Sylvia aptly called "the road to indignation"—traveling down that familiar path, reliving all the reasons my anger seemed justified.

I would spiral into this anger for thirty minutes at a time, and of course it was extremely painful. As we become more sensitive through loving-kindness practice and through stillness, when these difficult emotions arise, they hit much harder. I was truly suffering from this anger, and I think it was only this suffering that finally motivated me to let go. This is why experiencing anger directly during a metta retreat isn't necessarily problematic—it allows us to feel its full impact. We may wish for the other person to suffer, but in that very moment, we ourselves are the ones truly suffering.

I wasn't able to release this anger easily, but I had heard that one could try sending metta to the difficult person. My initial reaction was skeptical—this seemed somewhat contrived. I thought I would have to pretend to like them, and I didn't want to engage in that kind of pretense. But I was desperate, so I decided to try.

I began to reflect on the Pali term vyāpāda, which is sometimes translated simply as "anger." However, the most accurate translation is "ill-will"—the direct opposite of goodwill, which is synonymous with metta. Goodwill means "I want you to do well," while ill-will means "I don't want you to do well. I want you to do badly. I actually want you to hurt."

When I examined my anger closely, I could see this component of ill-will clearly present. From a Western psychological perspective, I could somewhat rationalize being angry at someone. But when I faced the fact that I actually wanted them to suffer, I realized this was dangerously close to cruelty. Cruelty means we take pleasure in someone else's suffering, but wanting someone to suffer is merely one step away from that cruelty.

I couldn't live with seeing myself as a cruel person. I had been able to accept the idea of myself as an angry person, but I couldn't accept the idea of myself as cruel. This recognition powerfully motivated me to examine this aspect of ill-will and to transform it. I simply didn't want to continue down this path.

So I began sending the same metta phrases to this difficult person. After some time, I discovered I could reluctantly wish them well. It didn't come easily or immediately, but with practice, I found I could genuinely wish for their wellbeing. It didn't require that they suffer.

When I was able to feel even a small amount of genuine well-wishing, the ill-will completely disappeared. It was blocked entirely, because we cannot simultaneously wish someone well and wish them ill. The moment I could send even a little metta to this difficult person and feel some goodwill, it stopped the ill-will completely. The anger simply ran out of fuel—it calmed down and essentially ended.

It would resurface again, perhaps the next day or two days later, and I would return to the phrases. I'd cultivate some goodwill, and the ill-will would dissipate once more. This was a profound lesson for me, and I offer it as one skillful approach for working with anger when it arises.

I encourage you to examine your own suffering when anger is present. Look deeply into this element of ill-will, and explore whether there's a possibility of wishing well instead, observing what effect this might have.

It was during this same period of practice that something else occurred that truly awakened me and touched me deeply. Sylvia had spoken about "the road to indignation," and I began to understand where this road ultimately leads.

I was starting to get angry again with my difficult person when suddenly an image arose spontaneously in my mind. I didn't ask for it. I hadn't been trying to create anything. It simply appeared and materialized like an image in a dream.

The vision showed a dark road crossing a barren plain at night, with a tree growing by the roadside. The tree had lost all its leaves, and the wind was howling through its bare branches. If you think of the Legend of Sleepy Hollow and the Headless Horseman, you'll understand the atmosphere of this image. It was cold, barren, dark, desolate, and scary—a very lonely place.

Somehow I intuited that this was the road of anger, the picture representing the road of indignation. Then, without intending it, on the other side of my visual field, I began to notice a yellow light. As I turned my attention to it, it became a sun—a bright sun in the sky. Below it appeared a green earth, and on this earth were seated monks and nuns in meditation posture. One figure was central and seemed like a Buddha image. Flying through the air were beings that looked like Thai art depictions of devas—seated figures traveling through space. The whole scene was bathed in warm yellow sunlight.

The intuition came clearly: this was the destination of metta. The contrast could not have been more vivid—the destination of anger dark, lonely, desolate, barren, and scary; the destination of metta filled with good spiritual friends, warmth, wisdom, and light.

It frightened me. This was such a strong message from my own unconscious about the choices I make. Until that point, I'd had an attitude that I could indulge my anger without consequence. I thought it was okay to be angry, that it wouldn't hurt anyone if I just let my mind run wild for a while. But then I saw there are consequences—consequences for my own heart. Running toward anger leads to one destination; following the path of loving kindness leads to another.

This vision deeply motivated me to make my most sincere effort in the direction of loving kindness.

Authentic spiritual traditions also understand the fruits of anger. The Dalai Lama tells a story of meeting a Tibetan monk in India who had managed to escape from Tibet. The Dalai Lama had known this monk only briefly before 1959, the year he himself escaped Tibet after ten years of Chinese occupation. The monk had then been imprisoned—probably during the Cultural Revolution—for twenty years. His crime was being a monk.

When he finally escaped to India and met with the Dalai Lama, His Holiness asked how his time had been. The monk replied that he had been in danger while in prison. The Dalai Lama said he understood completely—the monk had been tortured and could have been killed at any time.

"Yes, that's true," the monk replied, "but that's not really what I meant. I was in danger of feeling angry at my prison guards."

The Dalai Lama said that after hearing this, his estimation of this monk rose considerably. This is amazing practice—to be concerned about harboring anger toward one's guards and tormentors. This exemplifies the possibility inherent in developing the heart of loving kindness. It's graduate-level work, but it represents what's truly possible for us.

The last form of aversion I want to explore is fear.

Sylvia, I think, mentioned that this practice of loving kindness was originally taught as a protection practice. The story in the commentaries tells of the Buddha instructing a group of monks to sit in a forest grove at night for their meditation. Obediently, they went out together, took their seats among the trees, and began to practice. But they quickly became frightened and ran back to the Buddha, saying, "We can't meditate there. It's too scary. It's dark, and the tree spirits were coming out, making terrible sounds—and worse than that, making really awful smells."

The Buddha responded, "I'm going to give you a protection that you can take back into the forest, and it's the only protection you'll need. I want you to do the practice of loving kindness. Direct loving thoughts all around you to all beings that are anywhere near."

The monks returned to the same grove and began directing thoughts of loving kindness. When they reported back to the Buddha a few days later, everything had changed. "The tree spirits got really friendly to us," they said. "They started doing everything they could to support our practice, and it became a wonderful place to meditate."

What I find fascinating in this story is its kernel of truth: when we change the orientation of the heart to loving kindness, the whole world around us takes on a warmer feeling. It may not have changed externally, but it feels so different to us.

I was teaching a month-long retreat here a couple of years ago, and one participant had to leave halfway through to travel across the country for a family funeral. She was already quite sensitive after two weeks of practice and nervous about this abrupt transition back into the world with no integration time. I suggested that whenever she was around groups of people—in airport lines, waiting lounges, on the plane itself—she practice the loving-kindness phrases continuously.

When she returned three days later, she reported it had been a fantastic practice. She had started to feel nervous, alien, alone, and isolated. But as soon as she began the loving kindness practice, she felt connected to all the people around her, recognizing that their wishes too were for safety, happiness, and health. "It made the whole trip easy," she said.

Fear has been one of my greatest hindrances—probably my greatest single hindrance through years of dharma practice. I spent countless hours on the cushion with vipassana practice, learning to relate to fear, and gained tremendously from that work. I learned to be with fear with some equanimity, to let it arise without being afraid of the fear itself. The whole experience of fear became increasingly workable. I developed qualities of acceptance, spaciousness, and non-identification with it. But in my personality and character, when my mind would go out of balance, it would still tip toward fear.

Then, after many years of this practice, I did a long metta retreat and noticed something remarkable. Although vipassana practice had steadily weakened my fear over the years—making it smaller and smaller—the basic conditioning was still there, the fundamental tendency of mind unchanged. But after some time with metta practice, a new conditioning could step in. When my mind would tend in some direction, it would often move toward metta instead of fear. It gave my mind another place to go.

I found that metta could actually establish new conditioning to replace the conditioning of fear. Vipassana practice tends to reduce our conditioning by helping us step back from it with spaciousness, but it doesn't necessarily put different conditioning in its place. The Brahma Viharas, however, can actually transform the heart so it moves strongly into love, compassion, and joy. This is a great gift.

So loving-kindness practice serves as a terrific antidote for fear—a profound contribution to working with this obstacle. With all these hindrances, it's helpful to understand that we don't have to attack the obstacle directly. We don't need to push anything out. That would be the very antithesis of metta.

Metta is a welcoming, friendly, accepting kind of energy toward whatever is there. So as you're doing the metaphors and connecting with that sense of caring, if one of these obstacles comes up—judgment, anger, fear, sadness, longing, any of these things—recognize that it's there. This is part of touching into the heart center after each phrase. See what emotion is present. Sometimes it will be metta, sometimes it won't. Sometimes it will be one of the obstacles.

Notice if that's there, but continue to connect with the caring and the person and the phrases. Then what happens is these obstacles start to get held in the space of metta. You don't have to make them go away. You don't even have to change them very much. But as they get held in your growing feeling of friendliness and warmth and acceptance, they get included in that.

It's kind of like Sylvia was talking about last night—how your neighbor's habits that irritated you in the beginning of the retreat start to seem cute by the third day. You know, the way somebody clatters their silverware when they're eating in the dining hall. The same thing happens with these difficult states of mind. They start to seem like old friends, a little bit more like old friends.

You just have the sense that you're including this part of yourself. It's not an easy part. It's not the most fun part, but it's a real part. You're including that difficult part of yourself within the metta, and it all just becomes more and more okay. It's okay that those visitors are there. You don't have to make them go away. The more we open to them and accept like that, the more the steam goes out of their sails. They thrive on resistance. The more we open to them, the more they can just relax also. As we relax, they relax. This is really the transformation of those difficult states—through openness, through acceptance, and through non-resistance. That allows them also to relax.

So I wanted to talk also about the growing purity in the practice. Sally said this morning that we're really developing two qualities here strongly. One is metta, the other is concentration. We've talked a lot about the metta, so I don't want to focus on that for the rest of this talk. I want to talk about the other property, which is that of concentration. Sylvia started to talk about it last night when she talked about the influence of this quality of rapture—a kind of joyful interest that comes in practice and how it offsets the tendency of aversion. So I want to talk more about the factor of concentration in practice and the benefits that it brings.

What is it? What is concentration? It took me a long time to figure this out in my practice. I heard the word talked about, but I didn't have a sense of what it meant. This factor is kind of in our consciousness, but it's not very much in our culture. It's an archetypal thing. All these images in the West of yogis on mountaintops in Asia pop up in cartoons all the time. The fact that they pop up in cartoons means that they're deep within our psyche somewhere because they're such a recurrent image.

Some of the cartoons emphasize the wisdom aspect of these gurus on the mountaintops, and I'm going to steal some of Sylvia's material to tell you about one of these cartoons, which she has authorized me to share. We're always trying to borrow, beg, or steal each other's material, so it's a great gift.

There's a cartoon with a guru up on the mountaintop. It's a man with a long beard, just wrapped in a loincloth, sitting at the entrance to a cave with big Himalayan peaks behind him. In front of him is seated this Western person, looks like a Western person dressed in conventional street clothes, sitting cross-legged in front of the guru. The caption is the guru speaking. This is the wisdom transmission. The guru is saying, "If I knew the wisdom of life, do you think I'd be sitting in my underpants in this cave?" That's the wisdom tradition.

So the other cartoons that you see are the concentration tradition. In those, the image is the guru wrapped up in a shawl with the eyes closed and the body perfectly still. You get the sense that the consciousness is very withdrawn into his or her being. This is a strong archetypal image too.

And this image shows basically the manifestation of concentration, or the Pali term is samadhi.

There are three essential qualities we notice in this image. First is its inward nature. The shawl represents that being wrapped up and drawn within, that cocooning. Second is the stillness of the body. Something ceases moving in concentration. Third is the blissful nature. There's a sense that this yogi has found a source of peace and contentment that comes from their own mind. The phrase "happiness comes from within" is really validated in this image of samadhi or concentration.

Samadhi is the state when the mind has come together and become collected. It's this unification that gives it its blissful nature. It also gives it its strength, and that's what develops the stillness. Most of the time, we're giving away this innate strength and contentment by shooting the mind out to the past and future, looking at things with longing or regret, going over and over our worries, our fears, and our hopes. We give away this innate purity.

Much of the purpose of a meditation object is to give a new focus to the mind so that the attention can collect around that object in the present moment and stop this futile wandering into past and future, into hope and fear. This is exactly what the metaphors do. They give an object that hopefully is fairly interesting and has some intrinsic appeal that the mind can collect around. As it does, you start to feel the calming that comes from the diminishing of hope and fear.

The more you collect around those phrases and the person, the more you come into the present moment. The more you come fully into the present moment, the more your whole being gets united, back the way it was when we were kids. Children live so fully in the present, and that's why they're so whole. That's why they're so well integrated. With that kind of integration, they have a trust in themselves where they can flow through strong emotions without getting so concerned about it. You don't see children worrying when they go from laughter to tears. They just pass through the tears and then they're back into laughter again a little bit later. That's the wholeness of heart that comes from the unified mind.

As the attention collects around the object, it's as though there's a merging of our consciousness with the object. This merging is very close to the feeling of metta. You know how love is a kind of merging energy. We want to be united with the love object. Concentration has that same effect. There's a merging of the attention with the object when it is of interest.

In that merging, there's a little bit of a death. There's a death of this person and personality that are based in past and future. So sometimes there's a little bit of fear in concentration. It's like, if I really give myself to the phrases and the person and the feeling of metta, what's going to be left of me? What's going to be left of my personal history, my past, and my future plans? So there can be a little bit of resistance to this concentration even though it's a very wholesome state and very deeply satisfying when we give ourselves to it.

Rumi had a poem that expresses this beautifully. He said, "The way of love is not some subtle argument. The way there is devastation. Birds make great sky circles of their freedom. How do they learn it? They fall. And falling, they're given wings."

In our meditation practice, we are encouraged to fall into our object. Let go of past and future. Let go of personality worries and let your attention fall completely into the person, the phrases and the feeling in the heart. Falling, you're going to be given wings. You're going to discover that concentration and the metta that comes with it will hold you up, that it's really all you need.

Many people come into metta practice with the intention of opening the heart, and that's really all that people are interested in. I'll often be teaching a vipassana retreat and talking about some of the Buddha's teachings on impermanence and selflessness. People will tell me in an interview or sometimes in a question, "I'm not interested in your philosophy. I'm just here to open my heart. Come on, just keep it simple."

The problem is—and this is what I discovered in my life as a young adult—I could contact love quite easily when I was in my late teens and early twenties, but I couldn't stabilize there. I could touch it, but it wasn't repeatable or predictable or sustainable.

So I would fall into these states of love—and I don't just mean romantic love, but really love of nature and life, the cosmos. I would fall into them, and I'd also fall out of them every time. I didn't know how to get it back or how to sustain it.

Through doing Dharma practice, what I've come to believe is that it's very hard to stabilize love without two other factors. The first and really most important is wisdom. We have to have the understanding primarily of non-clinging. That's the only way the heart can stay unburdened—by learning not to cling to the past. When the heart is unburdened, it's more able to love.

But the second factor that really strongly supports that stabilization is samadhi. Because when concentration is firm and the mind isn't wavering, we're not pulled by hope and fear and all the obstacles. When we're really fully in the moment, we rediscover that native capacity, that childlike capacity for opening. There's nothing else we really have to add but the intention for it and the stabilization.

So all the rest of Dharma practice—the wisdom practices of Vipassana, the concentration factor—strongly support this opening into metta.

Start to get familiar in your practice with how concentration feels. The sign of it is that you're able to sustain the phrases and close connection with the phrases for a little bit of time. In the beginning, it might just be thirty seconds. You might just have this feeling: "I really connected with phrase after phrase with no gaps for thirty seconds." And that had a certain feeling. And then as it goes on, it'll be a minute and five minutes. I was talking with someone today who said that in a good sitting today, they'd been able to sustain the phrases for an hour. That's fantastic.

Start to notice when this comes in what your experience is like. What does it feel like when the mind is in that concentrated place where you're able to stay connected to the present moment? Is it painful? Generally not. Generally, it's a really sweet place. Because there's a steadiness of mind, and because of the steady mind, it's not being pulled through hope and fear, there's a sense that we can relax. There's a sense of being able to feel the body relax in those moments.

Tune into that and notice that. As the body relaxes, the mind can have the sense of relaxing into the body, of actually dropping into the body. It's as though one of the dualities that we've kept—of mind as something separate from body, trying to control, manipulate, change—that duality starts to fade and the mind and body come together. Again, a deepening of the unification.

There was one image that came to me as I was doing a period of concentration practice and feeling this settling—and it'll give away my age, but I want to share it because some of you may have seen it too. It's a television commercial from the 1950s. Do you all remember the commercials for Prell shampoo? Some of you? Okay, this is black and white television in my day, but you knew that Prell was a certain color. Prell was green. So there'd be the bottle of the shampoo on the commercial, and then they'd drop something in at the top. Anybody remember what they dropped? Yeah, they'd drop a pearl. A lot of my generation here.

And that pearl would ever so slowly travel down the length of the bottle of Prell and then get to the bottom. And the slowness of its voyage was proof that Prell shampoo was thick and lustrous and good for your hair. You could just feel the viscosity of the shampoo by how slowly the pearl was dropping down.

That is an image for the mind settling into the body in the relaxation of concentration. So you can remember this as the Prell Sutra. This sense of the mind settling easily into the body, the body in a state of deep relaxation, brings a lot of contentment with it. It's a very satisfying experience.

To whatever degree you experience it, start to tune into that contentment. There's a peacefulness when the concentration is present. There's an ease. There's a lack of problem in that.

And then start to notice what happens when you're not so connected with the phrases. What happens when the mind starts getting distracted again to past and future, to things we like and things we don't like? What does that feel like? It's not so peaceful. It's kind of stirred up and jangly and has sharp edges.

These are the hindrances that Sally talked about a couple of nights ago—the forces of desire, aversion, dullness, restlessness, and doubt. Concentration, as it strengthens and deepens, has the power to block off the hindrances. It stops the operations of the hindrances.

For a meditator, you can feel that the hindrances are the things that disturb our peace of mind moment after moment. In fact, in every moment when we're not fully in the present, take a look and see if this isn't so. Unless we're unified in the present moment with our experience, the hindrances are operating in that kind of jangly way. Concentration lets us out of that bondage to the hindrances.

The Buddha compared this process of coming out of the hindrances to five different experiences. When these five hindrances have been abandoned in oneself, one sees that as freedom from debt, health after a long illness, released from prison, freedom from slavery, and a land of safety. That's how important the absence of the hindrances is—like getting out of prison, like being freed from slavery, like being returned to health.

This is a beautiful quality in and of itself, but that's not the end of the benefit of concentration. The most important reason that we develop concentration in Dharma practice is to steady the mind so that we can see into the nature of things more and more clearly. It's seeing into the nature of things with clarity that the Buddha said brings liberation, brings the insight that finally frees the heart.

Concentration in itself is a beautiful place, but it's impermanent. It can decay just as it was built up by factors and circumstances. It will decay in the absence of those factors and circumstances. A lasting peace and a lasting freedom is only possible through deep insight into the nature of things and the nature of the unconditioned.

So concentration, although it can be developed to these depths of absorption called jhanas—providing seclusion from the hindrances and a great sense of well-being and contentment—is not the final step on the journey. The final step is to take that base of steadiness of mind and direct it toward understanding of the nature of life and existence. From that, the freedom, the lasting freedom, can spring.

When these two go together—the stability of concentration, the flowering of metta, supported by insight—then we get a sense of this beautiful abiding that the Buddha talked about in the Metta Sutta. I'll close with a short quote from that:

"So with a boundless heart, one should cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world, spreading upward to the skies and downward to the depths, outward and unbounded, freed from hatred and ill will. Whether standing or walking, seated or lying down, one should sustain this recollection. This is said to be the sublime abiding."

Let's just sit together for a minute, please.

CHAPTER 255

Healing and Freedom

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> Guy Armstrong examines two primary motivations that bring people to dharma practice: the aspiration to heal from life's wounds and restore wholeness, and the deeper aim for complete liberation as the Buddha discovered. Drawing on his personal journey with fear as a primary hindrance, Armstrong illustrates how the healing phase involves working skillfully with difficult emotions through mindful acceptance of their bodily sensations, mental qualities, and thought patterns. He discusses how this phase, while valid and necessary, naturally evolves toward the deeper motivation of ultimate freedom.
> The talk explores the relationship between psychological healing and spiritual liberation, noting that while the practice instructions remain the same, our attitudes and understanding deepen. Armstrong addresses common challenges in the healing phase, including strong preferences for certain mind states, attachment to positive experiences, and the agenda to "fix" ourselves. He emphasizes that true acceptance of difficult emotions—being willing for them to remain indefinitely—paradoxically leads to their dissolution.
> The teaching culminates in exploring the transition from healing to liberation, where practice becomes less about changing our experience and more about meeting whatever arises with mindfulness and acceptance. Armstrong references the Buddha's teaching on finding the "heartwood" of spiritual life, suggesting that while healing, virtue, concentration, and insight are valuable, the ultimate goal is the unshakable deliverance of mind that constitutes true liberation.

James talked a couple of nights ago about this factor of intention in our practice, which is so central to directing us, and I want to carry on from that theme and explore it a little further tonight. I hope I don't repeat a lot of the things he said. I wasn't here to hear his talk, and most of all, I hope I don't end up arguing with him, which sometimes happens, but trust you'll hold it in a big mind.

I was working out at the gym where I work out in Fairfax a few years ago. I'm not, as I've mentioned, a dedicated bodybuilding kind of guy. I just like to stay in reasonably good shape. But one day I was in there and one of the guys who worked regularly at the gym at that time was also there. His name was Lance.

Lance was built. There was a photo of him up at the front of the gym when he had competed at a Mr. America contest. He really had the physique, right there with all the well-known Schwarzeneggers and so on. Every once in a while, he'd come along and give me a tip on how to do the machines or the weights or something and put an arm on his shoulder. It was like touching a stack of bricks. He was so solid. So he was kind of an inspiration to us all in the gym and also a little bit foreboding.

But one day I was in there and there were two young teenage guys working out next to me who were even scrawnier than I am because they haven't aged and put on the little belly yet. I heard them talking and they were talking about Lance in kind of odd tones, describing his abilities. They said, "Did you see Lance the other day? He pressed 515 pounds."

I could see their eyes lighting up like, that is really fantastic. And what I got from that is that they both aspired to be able to do that too. I didn't really. That was way out of my league. I was happy just in the very minor leagues that I was in. But they aspired to that. What I picked up from that is that their trajectory in their weightlifting career was probably going to be a lot higher than mine ever was.

Because what we aspire to becomes a kind of guidepost that we align and direct our practice to. So that was kind of inspiring for me, just to touch into the fact that one can aspire greatly in any discipline, whether it's weights or mastery of a language or a skill like meditation, and that the higher we set our aim, that will influence our whole trajectory as we carry out our career in that.

When I look at the aims that people have coming into dharma practice, I see basically two main aims that people come in with. One is an aim to heal from all the hurts and troubles that life has brought our way and to become whole again, to restore a sense of wholeness, calm, peace, openness of heart, however you'd like to describe it. A kind of balance, coming to a happy balance in life.

The other motivation that I see people come with is the aspiration to be liberated, to be completely free in the same way that the Buddha discovered he could be completely free.

One of my teachers put this kind of succinctly. He said, the dharma does both these things. He said, "First it makes us healthy and then it makes us free."

In the talk tonight, I want to talk about basically these two parts of dharma practice: the part that makes us healthy or heals us and the part that makes us free. I want to start off by saying that I think both of these are really good motivations in practice. They're both valid and noble reasons to be here and to be doing the work that you're doing.

They also constitute, to my mind, to some degree phases in our practice, that we often tend to move from one—the healing or healthy phase—into the other, the phase of aspiration for liberation. The motivations and therefore some of the accompanying attitudes are different in these two phases. So I want to explore what those differences are like.

I want to talk first about using the dharma practice for healing. I think a lot of people come into meditation because they're unhappy. I think this is very, very widespread and very appropriate. When I first came into meditation, this was my motivation. I would have been hard pressed to say exactly what was the problem in life. I remember sort of scratching my head at different times. I was in my early twenties and I thought, what's the problem here?

At one point, I had a friend whose name was True Light. This will give you a sense of the circles I moved in in those years. I had a friend named True Light. We shared many altered states together. At one point, I shared with her that I really wasn't very happy at this point in my life. She said, "Okay, just come into the moment. What are you unhappy about right now?"

And her question really stopped me. I had to say, I don't know. I really couldn't put my finger on what the unhappiness was. I just knew that I hadn't been happy for a long time, and I wasn't happy about that.

This is often the situation when we're young and first come into some kind of spiritual life, some spiritual way of looking at things. There may just be a pervasive sense that life doesn't feel quite right, that we've lost some connection we knew before.

As we start to practice and investigate our experience as the meditation instructions direct, we come to see that the suffering was around particular states of mind that were frequent visitors—unpleasant, uncomfortable visitors. As I started to look into my experience, I found that I had a lot of fear and anxiety. That was the main reason I couldn't feel happy, contented, open, loving, spacious, and connected with life.

But for other people, the particulars will differ. For some, it might be grief or unworthiness or self-judgment, a sense of disappointment. It might be desire, wanting, or insufficiency. It could be anger that disconnects us from other people. Or maybe we just notice our heart's closed and we want to be able to open it. We remember how it felt when we were younger. We've lost something.

These emotions, this closeness of difficult emotions, may have their roots in many different areas. It could be childhood conditioning, could be trauma—either recent or old. Could just be a sense of dissatisfaction with life. But the main thing is that when this is our motivation, when our suffering is around emotions and emotions become the center of our focus, we believe the root and core cause lies in these difficult emotions. They're the ground, the basis, the source of the suffering.

So that's where we tend to focus our practice. We concentrate on the emotions, and at least that's how we conceive of our practice—thinking about focusing on emotions. In fact, there may be a lot of other things going on as we practice, but that's where our conscious interest and intention lies. And then our motivation for practice becomes clearer: we want to find a way to be free in relation to these difficult, painful emotions. We may use the breath to get in touch with them, but the breath is just a tool. Awareness of breath is just a tool.

I should mention that some people don't particularly go through this phase, so this may not be relevant to a number of you here. I ask you to listen from a kind of disinterested place. Many people also come into Dharma practice from a place of pretty good balance and a high degree of contentment. The emotional pain may not be apparent in the beginning, although it usually becomes apparent later on, and then that becomes what keeps us in practice.

I know people who've started practice out of intellectual curiosity. What's this teaching about? Impermanence, selflessness, unsatisfactoriness, the natural mind, Buddha nature, liberation, enlightenment. What's this about? This sounds kind of interesting. They explore from that avenue and then find that emotions actually do play a role.

At this stage, I want to examine some of the attitudes present in this stage of healing. We're really relating to meditation, to the Dharma, as a form of psychotherapy. We could go to therapy training, we could go to many different schools, or we could go to the Buddhist Spirit Rock School of Meditation Therapy—we just end up here for some reason. Whether it's Western psychotherapy or meditation, both seek to alleviate the pain of human existence, and in this stage, the pain of emotional suffering. So meditation is really seen as just another therapy tool at this point.

I checked out a few therapies when I was in my twenties. When I did my first retreat, I became hooked because I felt that of the things I'd sampled—which was a narrow spectrum—this was the one that had the power to go to any level of the mind where the suffering was happening. I felt that in my first retreat. Wherever the source of the conflict, the bind, the attachment, the knot lay in my psyche, I felt this practice had the power to go to that depth. And being able to go to that depth had the potential to release it.

From the very first retreat, I had complete trust in that, and my confidence never wavered. That trust was a great support through years of ups and downs and years of difficulty in practicing.

Some of the views we encounter as we come into Buddhist meditation we find are different than some therapeutic views. The tools are obviously different, but the views may be different also, the assumptions. One of the things we see in Dharma practice is that we don't need to care so much about the past.

I don't know if this has been made clear in the talks, but it's very much our understanding that for the most part, the past isn't really that central to what we're doing here. Obviously, it has influenced us a great deal. It has totally influenced the way the present moment arises. But in our learning to free ourselves, even on this psychological level, we don't need to go back and revive the memories of the past to find that freedom. We simply trust that if we learn how to relate to the emotions as they arise here and now, that will be enough learning to free us.

So there's not the purposeful aim to send the attention back into the past, uncover some seeming source of the suffering and understand that source. We just trust that if the difficulties are arising in the present moment, we can understand it in the here and now.

The other difference in view is that we don't actually have to work all the emotions out. I think sometimes in Western psychological models, we think that we have to get one emotion, trace it back to its causes, and then kind of work it all the way through in the future so that we've really dissolved it at the root. In meditation practice, I talked the other night about how this factor of samadhi allows us to suspend the hindrances. When samadhi is cultivated to a certain depth, the hindrances just don't arise. They don't have room to come in.

In traditional Asian models of meditation development, this is basically the root. You work with a meditation subject until concentration is at such a level that the difficult emotions aren't arising anymore. Whether it's greed or fear or anger or sloth and torpor or restlessness, they're simply not arising. It's not that they've been eliminated from the system. But you've reached a meditative state of poise that doesn't allow them to enter. From that meditative state of poise, you deepen the faculty of insight to such a level that the afflictive emotions can be uprooted. In the traditional Asian model, there's not very much work at all on the psychological level of coming to terms with different emotions.

The other thing that we see that's different in meditation is that the purification of the mind and heart comes through a completely different angle—not through working out the negative, but in bringing up the positive. As we develop day by day the strength of mindfulness, it brings in its wake all the beautiful qualities of mind: faith, tranquility, investigation and interest, devotion, wisdom, concentration, loving-kindness and compassion. So a strong offset to the negative tendencies of mind—the hindrances, the difficult emotions—are all the beautiful qualities that are developing purely through the meditation model without particularly working on any of the negative. These positive factors are great allies, not only in learning to relate with the difficult, but just in purifying and strengthening the mind all on their own.

One of the attitudes that we see if we come with the motivation of healing in meditation is that we actually have an agenda. You've probably heard us say many times, "Be with your experience without struggle and without an agenda." But if we're coming with a motivation of healing what's painful, there's usually a strong agenda at work—sometimes conscious, sometimes unconscious. The agenda is something like this: I have to change the way I feel. I have to change the way these emotions are arising. I have to change the way I am. We basically feel I have to change myself—something's wrong with the way I am, and I have to put it right.

So in this approach from healing, there is a basic kind of non-acceptance of the way things are, a non-acceptance of what is. Something's gone wrong, we have to put it right. This may be a conscious view that we take up and we could just say to somebody, "Yeah, I believe something's wrong and I've got to fix it." It may be an unconscious view, but it's kind of part and parcel of the domain of healing.

This agenda then looks to replace the difficult emotions with more positive states. It could be conceived of as love or happiness or calm or peace or contentment, however you think of it. But often in this agenda, we'll focus on one particular emotion or one area of emotion that we consider the biggest problem. For some it might be wanting, for some it might be fear, for some it might be anger, for some it might be grief, some it might be unworthiness. We focus on that and we think, "That's it. If I can just take care of that, then everything else will be cool."

You may know this line from the Third Zen Patriarch: "The great way is not difficult for those who have no preferences." How does that coincide, how does that coexist with the healing agenda? It doesn't actually coexist very well because with the healing agenda we have really strong preferences. We have preferences for these kinds of mind states and not for these kinds of mind states. We really want to change them.

As the positive mind states start to come in, because of this strong preference, we easily get attached to the positive mind states. For one reason, because we may not have had them for quite a while. We may have been wanting them for a long time and missing them. So when they come, we tend to hang on. Second, because they indicate that the agenda is working. This becomes the indicator of progress or success, that the healing is actually taking place. So it becomes a validator of the work that we're doing.

And it's very painful when these pass, because we're back again in that really unsatisfactory state of affairs, which is the suffering emotions. And we never know when they'll come back again. In the beginning, they're very tentative. They just appear briefly, and they don't have a lot of stability. And we're not sure when they'll come again.

Also at this stage of the practice, we may not be very interested in the teachings of the Buddha. Even if there's kind of an intellectual interest, it may not go very deep.

And we hear teachings like about not-self—there's no self—and we think, oh yeah, give me a break, you know, then who's suffering? We hear teachings on dependent origination and the twelve links of the chain of becoming. We hear talks about concentration and we think, it's all really kind of theoretical. It's like we've joined some university book club, and they're off in some kind of cultish intellectual pursuit.

I've heard many people say, either in questions in the hall or in interviews, "I just came here to open my heart. I'm not interested in all of this Buddhist philosophy." And there's actually another word that wants to go on the end of "Buddhist philosophy," but I don't want to say it right here. All this Buddhist philosophy stuff.

Of course these teachings on not-self, on dependent origination and concentration, these really are the avenues to liberation. But because they don't have much emotional content or much emotional juice, they don't seem to be relevant to the work we're involved in. "I want to open my heart. Don't give me this intellectual stuff."

The problem is that the opening of the heart, as I've experienced it, is only temporary if it's not supported by other factors. When I was in my late teens and early twenties, I had a lot of access to love. And I don't just mean relationship love or sexual love, but I had a lot of openness to life and a lot of love of nature and of being and of the creative arts, people, love of life, really. But it wasn't very stable. It would come and then it would go, and I wouldn't know how to get it back. When I lost that really loving connection to life, I'd get depressed, I'd get despondent, and I didn't know how to find it again.

So I think that the openness and connecting to life, which is what the opening of the heart is about, can't really be stabilized unless it's supported by other factors. And in Buddhism, there are two main factors that support this. The first and most important is wisdom, and it's primarily the wisdom of not clinging. It's clinging that closes the heart. It's clinging that shuts us off in many different forms—clinging to the past, some different expression of clinging to the way things were, clinging to what was. So the wisdom of seeing when we're clinging and how to release it is the central thing. And the second thing that supports that stability of the opening of the heart is samadhi. Samadhi gives the mind a strength, a firmness, and a steadiness that it can withstand the pushes and pulls both of life and of the inner states of the hindrances.

There's another factor that's really important to understand in this healing phase. Jack Engler is a friend of ours who's a long-time Vipassana practitioner, student of Munindraji and Dipama from the India days, and a psychologist who's a professor at Harvard. He has a line that kind of sums up this phase of the practice. He said, "It's really important, before you become nobody, that you be somebody." In other words, we need to develop a healthy sense of self before we can really let go of the sense of self.

So a lot of what this phase of practice is about is coming to stabilize in the positive qualities—in the openness of the heart, in access to happiness and contentment and peace and self-regard. And as those become more and more stable, we start to get a good sense of ourself, replacing the sense of ourself as fragmented or unhappy or broken. Then, from that place, there's the possibility of letting go of self.

I want to talk a little bit about this healing phase in a more personal way, and I want to talk about how my practice evolved with fear, because it was my main hindrance for a number of years in the early years of my practice. It came up a lot for me. Fear is one of our deepest conditionings. Sally mentioned it, I think, the other night, talking about the Third Foundation. It comes up often in interviews. It's a painful state of mind.

Fear has the effect of closing our world in. You can feel that the heart of fear is this contraction in our being—we feel that something really unpleasant is about to happen. There's a sense of impending doom, and it brings with it a darkness that clouds our life, that clouds our time here. It's as though—I remember saying at one point when I was under this influence—I couldn't really touch the sunshine anymore, because I had closed off in some way to it. When fear is present, it really blocks our flowering. It prevents the unfolding of the beautiful qualities of heart and mind.

There's a line that I really like from a science fiction novel from the sixties. I don't know if any of you read Dune by Frank Herbert. It was quite a trip at the time. One of his lines in there—part of the training that the people were undergoing in this culture, which was something of a wisdom culture—was the line, "Fear is the great mind killer." Fear is the great mind killer. When it's present, it really stifles our creativity and our blossoming.

So coming into practice, this was quite strong in my early years, and I realized I had to come to an understanding of it. It became my dominant experience at times. I listened to my teachers talk about working with the emotions, working with the difficult emotions, and I realized I need to investigate what is this thing called fear. So I actually regarded it as a great opportunity when it came up.

Not the first time it came up, but after a while, because it gave me a chance to investigate. This is actually a teaching device used in places, especially in Asia. Ajahn Chah's teacher was a very fierce man named Ajahn Mun. In a way, he kind of re-established the Thai forest tradition in the early part of the last century. He taught Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Mahabua, and a number of other great forest masters of the second half of the century.

Ajahn Mun used to instruct his monks to go off and sit in the forest in areas where they knew tigers to be on the loose. There were a lot of tigers a hundred years ago in the forests of Thailand. They were still really wild—this was before they were all logged. So he would instruct the monks to go sit out there. The monk would go wandering around through the forest, looking for a good place to sit and walk. Sometimes they would come upon a pile of bones of previous inhabitants of the area. There'd be a pile of bones, the begging bowl of the monk, and some scattered robes. And that's where they were encouraged to practice.

That could bring up some fear. But it was considered a good thing because this was a chief hindrance. And if you had the opportunity to practice with it, you might be able to become free of it.

So eventually I came to really appreciate the times when fear came up in my meditation and I could investigate it. It comes up in daily life for us, of course, but often we're so distracted, there are so many things going on, it's hard to connect clearly. Here, when there's nothing else to do, it can be the only thing really happening. And that's a tremendous opportunity to feel into it really clearly.

So I started to look into it, and it manifests in three ways. As far as I know, it manifests in three ways. It manifests in the body. It manifests as a mental state or tone or mood or color. And it manifests through thoughts—certain kinds of thoughts come with fear when fear is present. I looked at it again and again and I couldn't find anything else but these three parts to it. So I started to work on getting comfortable with each of these three aspects.

First I grounded my attention in the body. This is generally the advice for working with strong emotions. I'm going to go through this cycle with fear, but I hope you'll see the extension to any other states of mind that are difficult. Ground the attention in the body.

When I came into my body, I found that what was happening was a sense of shakiness. Fear made my body light and trembling, and it wasn't a pleasant feeling. There was a contraction in the stomach. I would sometimes have sweat under my arms. I would feel too light and ungrounded, like I couldn't put a foot down anywhere. And sometimes my breathing would get really shallow.

So I kept investigating. And sooner or later I came to see that's about all that fear was in the body. It was just this trembling and lightness and contraction. And so I had to ask myself, can I accept this the way it is? And eventually I said, yeah. I mean, not the first time that fear arose, not the second time. But after being with it a number of times, it wasn't a big deal. It was just sensations. So I could open to it on the bodily level.

Then I started to look: well, what's the mood in the mind? What's the mental state? What's that tone or color of fear? And I started to try to feel into that. It's a different color than sadness or happiness or joy or anger. So what is that color? The closest I could get was a kind of wanting to escape. It was like a wanting to move away, wanting to flee. That was what I could pick up as the color in the mind.

And I thought, well, can I come to terms with that? Can I open and accept that part of fear?

And I found that I could.

Then I looked at the thoughts. What kind of thoughts come with fear? Scary thoughts. In fact, I think Sally read something from Krishnamurti the other evening that basically said it's thoughts and the proliferation of them projecting into the future that create fear, that stimulate fear. We might think of something awful that we don't want to have happen. "Oh, I'm going to have to leave the retreat and go home and deal with this work situation." And we get scared in the moment. He summed this all up, Krishnamurti, with this really nice phrase: thought breeds fear. Thought breeds fear. Thought breeds most other suffering too, if you look at it closely.

The way these thoughts work is a little bit like the story of the Chinese artist who was painting a big scroll painting. With bold strokes, he painted a leaping tiger—a beautiful evocation of the tiger. He stepped back from the scroll and looked at the tiger and got scared. "Oh my God, a tiger!" This is the way our thoughts work. We project something fantastic that hasn't happened into the future and then we get scared by the projection.

At one point in my practice, I started to tune into the unreality of that fearful projection. I happened to be in England doing a period of practice at the retreat center before Gaia House was established. It was called East Farmhouse, in Wiltshire. I was practicing there in the summer, and if you've ever been to England in the summer, you know how beautiful the experience can be. Everything's in flower. The English are great gardeners, so there are lots of flowers. The bird life is really rich. The sun doesn't set in midsummer until ten o'clock or so at night. It stays light until eleven. And there can be this really beautiful softness that settles over the landscape around nightfall, around dusk.

So I was out doing standing meditation in the back garden of the retreat center, standing next to a flowering fruit tree—I think it was an apple tree. The scent of the flowers was faint but present in the air. The birds were chirping all around as it was getting darker. This softness was settling on the whole landscape. I was doing standing meditation with my eyes closed, and I was in a fear space, going "fear, fear" and noting it.

Then I just opened my eyes, and I felt this incredibly beautiful, light, soft, warm, birdsong-filled evening of English twilight. I had to laugh because the thought came up: "Yeah, it's a really scary place, isn't it?" The fear was so out of sync with the moment. And that's the way fear usually is. We can be all churned up inside with our eyes closed, sitting in this beautiful hall. Then we might open them for a minute and get a reality check. There's no problem. There's nothing wrong with the moment. It's absolutely safe. Most moments are like that. But when the mind state is active, we can't tune into that. We can't feel that. We're swept into the imaginary environment.

So I could accept the bodily experience, I could accept the mood of fear, and I could accept the thoughts—the projective fantasy of fear. That was it. There was nothing else there. Once I'd come to terms with those three things, I'd come to terms with fear. This sounds like a boast, but it's simple and it's true.

The essence of pleasure is acceptance. Whatever may be the situation, if it is acceptable, it is pleasant. If it is not acceptable, it is painful.

This wisdom from the Indian teacher Nisargadatta Maharaj cuts to the heart of our relationship with experience. When a questioner protested, "But pain is not acceptable," Maharaj simply asked, "Why not? Did you ever try? Do try, and you will find in pain a joy which pleasure cannot yield, for the simple reason that acceptance of pain takes you much deeper than pleasure does."

He continues: "This personal self, by its very nature, is constantly pursuing pleasure and avoiding pain. The ending of this pattern is the ending of the self. The ending of the self, with its desires and fears, enables you to return to your real nature, the source of all happiness and peace."

This work of acceptance is really the key with difficult emotions. It's basically what frees us. We have to dig deep to find that openness of heart with these emotions. It doesn't come easily. Who would think that you can accept fear or grief or sadness or wanting just as it is? Because initially we resist them and we fear them. But we can. We can accept them.

You've got to be a little careful here, because if you accept it in order to make it go away, it knows the difference and it won't go away. Because that's just aversion. So it won't be tricked. You have to genuinely open up and accept.

One way to do this—Sally might have mentioned this—just a skillful means to see if you've got real acceptance, is to ask yourself the question: would it be okay if this emotion was here the rest of my life? Would that be okay? When you come to the point that you can say yes to that, then there's real acceptance happening.

And that is possible. I came into contact with fear over and over and over again, so many times, working with acceptance repeatedly, that I came to that point. I had so much equanimity with fear that I really didn't care if it was there or wasn't there. I really didn't. It didn't make a bit of difference to me. If it wanted to arise in a moment, that was fine.

If it wanted to go away, that was fine. I really didn't care either way. And at that point, fear had lost some kind of hold over me. It wasn't because I'd worked out the source of it. I never saw any memories connected with fear being present. There may have been many things in my life that scared me, but memories never came up with my fears. So it wasn't about working through any particular old thing. Just by relating to the emotion itself, it kind of took the power out. It took the charge out of it.

It doesn't mean I don't still get scared or wouldn't get scared. If I found out tomorrow that Sally was really ill or that I was diagnosed with some illness or our house was swept away in this flood, I'd get scared. But I feel that I have the tools to work with it, and I don't feel afraid to feel the fear anymore.

So that creates a lot of space, not having that fear of the difficult states. It creates a lot of space, a lot of trust and a lot of confidence that we know how to work with the states that come into our mind. We know how to work with the most difficult emotions that come and we've learned something about how to release them. We release them through paying full attention and through opening and accepting.

What starts to happen as we do that, as awareness touches the difficult emotion again and again and again, is kind of like the energy starts going out of the emotion and into the awareness. The awareness gets stronger and as it does that, the emotion gets weaker. We take its power and we put it into mindfulness or awareness.

So after some period of practicing to work on this difficult state of fear, some shifts started to happen. I remember one retreat—it was in the early years of my practice, but I'd touched what I felt was a real depth in my meditation. I felt that I'd come to some kind of depth of really seeing the end of suffering, the temporary end of suffering. I was very excited about it.

I went to see my teachers, and all of them kind of minimized my insight. They did not validate it at all. They all kind of said, "No, it's not what you think, not that important." One of my teachers I remember said to me, "You know, you're not very deep. So-and-so"—who happened to be a really good friend of mine who was on the same retreat with me—"so-and-so is much deeper than you are." I said, "Oh, thanks very much."

Nonetheless, the quality of teaching was not as high then as now. Nonetheless, I had a lot of confidence in my insight. What happened was that having come to the end of that strain of suffering, it's not that it didn't arise again, but I'd come to the end of it once. I knew I could do it again. Conceptually, I'd solved the problem. I'd solved the problem of my emotional suffering. And then the motivation fell away from my practice for a while because I'd done what I'd come into practice to do.

So that was kind of interesting. My motivation went away and it took a while for it to come back. I had to find a different reason to practice, and it did come back.

Then again, some years later—this is kind of another transition point—I was a monk and I was practicing at Wat Suan Mok in Southern Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa's monastery. I remember the afternoon, the actual afternoon that this happened. I was sitting out on my front porch, and it was really hot. Thailand in the retreat season is really hot. I was just wearing basically a singlet and my lower monk's robe, but sweat was just pouring down my abdomen. Mosquitoes were all around, but I kept a mosquito coil lit beside me so that it would keep the mosquitoes away. But that has a really foul smell, a really chemical smell, as you probably know.

So I was sitting there, and there was tension in my body. I wasn't completely comfortable. I had some restlessness in the mind, and a state would come in here or there that wasn't so pleasant. But I suddenly woke up and asked the question: What am I waiting for for happiness? What am I waiting on to be content with things the way they are? Am I waiting till there's no more heat? Am I waiting till there are no more mosquitoes? Am I waiting till there's absolutely no discomfort in the body? Am I waiting till there's not a twitch of movement of mind states in the mind?

I thought, if I'm waiting for that, I'm basically waiting for Arahantship, and that's a long way away. I thought, would it be possible to be content in this moment with some unpleasant conditions still here? And I saw that was absolutely possible and that was absolutely what needed to happen. That became the theme for my practice direction for a while—finding contentment just with what was, even though it wasn't perfect, finding contentment before I found perfection.

And then I realized that some of my assumptions and attitudes about practice from the healing phase of my work didn't fit so well anymore, and that I was going to have to make some shifts in the way that I understood things. I started to realize that there are three curious things about healing as a primary motivation in practice.

The first thing is that it's incomplete. It's not a motivation that can carry us all the way, because the healing can end but we may not be at the end of the path—the end of the Buddhist path at any rate. So it's not a motivation that takes us all the way in spiritual life.

The second thing that was interesting is: how do you know when the healing work is over? Is it when the mind state doesn't appear anymore? I don't think that's realistic. How do you know when to quit the healing work? I'm not just asking this as a rhetorical question. I'm really pointing here to when does a motivation have to fall away?

When does a motivation no longer concern us, grab us, interest us, cause us to do anything in practice? Because as I mentioned before, involved with healing is a kind of basic non-acceptance of what is.

"The great way is not difficult for those who have no preferences," Suzuki Roshi said this at the start of one dharma talk. "The difficulties you're experiencing now..." And then he just stopped. He just gave a long pause. The audience was hanging on the edge of their seats—oh, he's going to tell us how to release them or whatever. And then he finished the sentence: "The difficulties you're experiencing now will be with you for a long time."

Now, originally, if you weren't a practitioner, this could be kind of discouraging. But what he's pointing to is that unhooking of a desire to make things different—that really our practice doesn't depend on making these things go away. These difficult states of mind will be around for a while, but they don't have to block a deep sense of contentment and even a relative sense of freedom. So can we at some point—it's up to each person when that's appropriate—let go of the concern that we still have some afflictive emotions? They'll be around a while.

The third thing is that with healing as a motivation comes some kind of belief that we're broken, that something is fundamentally wrong with us. And I really question this. I really question if fundamentally we are broken. I think it may be possible for a human being to become broken through something like psychosis—I don't know, I don't know enough about that field to know one way or another—but that might be possible. But all of us are not in that situation, and I don't think that any of us are broken.

Broken would mean that something had gone wrong with the universe, something had gone wrong with life, as we're a part of life. And I think that, as Sylvia said the other night, the one thing that's not broken is the lawfulness of suffering. On the level that we all are at, the lawfulness of suffering and freedom all comes from causes and conditions that have brought us to this point in an entirely lawful way. Our suffering or lack of it is entirely due to previous causes and conditions.

I talked about arguing with other teachers. I gave a little bit of this talk a year ago and I made a statement in the dharma talk that we're not broken. Sylvia wasn't there for that talk and she came on the next night and made a statement in her dharma talk: "We're all broken." This caused a few mind movements, but at least we agreed that we were all either one way or the other.

So as we move out of this phase of healing and into a new phase, our motivation has to find a new focus. And for me, it became the focus to be really free—to be ultimately free, finally free, the same kind of freedom that the Buddha had discovered. And in some ways it was like starting over again. It was having a new direction or a new aim. But in other ways it wasn't at all.

Because the interesting thing is our aim may change, and with that some of our views and our attitudes and our beliefs, but one thing that doesn't change is the practice. And I find this so interesting—that whether you're practicing for healing or whether you're practicing for full liberation, the instructions are the same. I think there's a profound truth in that.

I'm going to say it just briefly now and I may come back to it in a later talk. I don't want to spend a lot of time with it. I think the profound truth is that what is freeing us is our unconditioned nature, our Buddha nature that is alive and well in each one of us. Mindfulness practice is simply a way of activating that inner nature—mindfulness wisdom, if you want to think of it like that, this combination that they're always conjoined.

As we activate that nature, that's what does the work. That's what's really at the forefront. And all the healing work that goes on and all the unraveling, all the disentangling is just because this Buddha nature is stepping more and more into the foreground. And it just, in order to do that, it releases everything that's held along the way.

All the places that self has formed a knot through emotions, through views, through various kinds of clinging, all of those eventually get highlighted and released through the power of mindfulness and wisdom. So it happens on a psychological level, it happens on the level of views, it happens on the level of dependent origination and moments of craving. All those different kinds of clinging just get released in this one unitary movement to freedom.

But our attitude does shift with it. In the beginning of practice, when our interest was on disentangling particular emotions, we did have strong preferences. We really wanted this emotion and not that emotion. And when they came, we were really attached to them. This kind of agenda starts to really weaken. And we start to see it as kind of a curious habit of mind.

Somebody said to me at the start of this retreat, something I thought was really wise and really profound. They said, "You know, I don't care what happens in this retreat. I know that the result will be wholesome when I come out at the end of the retreat. So I don't care what happens along the way." This is kind of the pith statement of this intention toward freedom.

Sharon Salzberg put it in a way that kind of shocked me in one Dharma talk. She said, "It doesn't matter what's happening to you." That's a strong statement, isn't it? It doesn't matter what's happening to you. What matters is, can you meet it with mindfulness and acceptance? Because all the happenings, guess what? They come and go. None of them last. But the mindfulness being strengthened is the key to liberation. That's that Buddha nature coming front and center and sweeping its way to the foreground, sweeping away the clingings.

It doesn't matter what's happening. Our practice is really just about different levels of holding getting exposed and then dissolved, exposed and then dissolved, and feeling the greater space that happens with each step in that series.

Upandita Sayadaw, a great Burmese teacher, put it even more directly. Someone came in and was complaining about being uncomfortable in the body as they were sitting and having difficult mental states. And he said, "What, you want different objects to note?" This is the same message. It doesn't really matter what's happening. What matters is can we really be present for it? And as we do, then we find that the mindfulness and wisdom together start to unfold themselves and start to take us on this really unitary movement to greater and greater freedom.

And the Buddha said that mindfulness is a path that goes in one direction only, to the ending of pain and suffering, to the ending of all distress, to liberation, to nibbana. If, when it's appropriate, we put our eye on that end, that goal, everything else will just follow from that—all the clarifying of the emotions, all the growth of the beautiful states of loving-kindness and wisdom and faith and devotion, contentment, happiness and joy, all will come out of aiming in that direction and letting our nature just keep moving us there.

And according to the Buddha, this is the proper aim for spiritual life. He said some people come to spiritual life because they'll acquire gain, honor, and renown in it. This is true. You can see this in spiritual life these days. There are a lot of bestsellers of spiritual books these days. You can get gain, honor, and renown from that. But he said this is like somebody who goes in search of the heartwood of a tree to build a great house or a great temple and comes away with just twigs and leaves and is satisfied with that.

He said you can also develop virtue along the spiritual path. Some people become satisfied just with developing virtue and becoming a kind person. He said that's like somebody looking for heartwood who stops at the outer bark of the tree. But if you're not satisfied there, you continue and you develop concentration, this great sense of harmony and peace and ease of relaxing into one's own nature. He said you can get satisfied and stop there. That's like somebody who peels away the outer bark and takes the inner bark, still searching for heartwood.

He said, but someone can go further. Not satisfied with concentration, they develop knowledge and vision, insight, true insight into the way things are. He said, this is like getting to the sapwood. But if they stop there and they haven't taken the last step, they haven't completed the path.

Someone who is still not satisfied but continues discovers this state of true liberation —a kind of liberation that can't be changed, can't be taken away, can't ever fall into suffering anymore. The Buddha said that is the one who has found the heartwood.

"So this holy life, friends, does not have gain, honor, and renown for its benefit, or the attainment of virtue for its benefit, or the attainment of concentration for its benefit, or knowledge and vision for its benefit. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end."

This is the invitation before us—not to settle for the outer manifestations of spiritual life, however beautiful they may be, but to continue deepening until we reach that which cannot be shaken, that which is truly free. The heartwood of liberation awaits those who are willing to go all the way.

Let's just sit for a minute together in the silence that holds all of this.

CHAPTER 256

Brahmavihāras and the Vicissitudes of Life

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong reflects on the four brahmavihāras—mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity)—as transformative practices for responding wisely to life's inevitable changes. Drawing inspiration from the remarkable presence of Dipa Ma, a revered Bengali meditation master, Armstrong illustrates how sustained practice can cultivate an unshakeable foundation of peace and love.

The talk explores how the Buddha identified eight universal conditions that affect all beings: gain and loss, pleasure and pain, praise and blame, success and failure. Rather than responding with the usual patterns of elation or depression, the brahmavihāras offer an awakened heart's response to these vicissitudes. Armstrong discusses compassion as "the trembling of the open heart in response to suffering," sharing stories of transformation including Emperor Aśoka's conversion after witnessing battlefield carnage. He presents muditā as appreciative joy that can double our happiness through sharing others' joy, while upekkhā provides the balanced awareness that can hold all experiences with wisdom.

Weaving together teachings with poetry from Mary Oliver, Rumi, and Naomi Shihab Nye, Armstrong demonstrates how these practices cultivate not just individual peace but a spirit of inclusion that recognizes our fundamental interconnectedness. The talk concludes with reflections on how insight into anattā (not-self) provides the deepest foundation for equanimity, pointing toward the ultimate freedom that awaits discovery.

I wanted to talk tonight about the Brahmaviharas. It's a funny thing in a metta retreat—you know, in a vipassana retreat, we talk about all these different topics. But if somebody from the outside comes in and asks what are you talking about tonight, we say, "Metta." And if they ask what we're talking about the next night, "Metta." It doesn't vary very much on these retreats. So tonight I'll talk about the Brahmaviharas.

The person I was thinking about as I was getting ready for this talk is an Indian woman, an Eastern Indian woman from Bengal named Dīpamā. I know a number of you have heard of her. It's really interesting—sometimes people just hear her name and have a very strong connection with her. Especially for women, she's a really inspiring figure because she's one of the strongest women teachers to come out of Asia in our lifetimes.

I particularly want to recommend, if you're interested, a book on her life and her teachings called Knee Deep in Grace. It's a beautiful book with accounts of her biography, teaching stories from her, and some great photos. A lot of people use it as a devotional piece on their altar.

She was one of the most amazing yogis and individuals that I've had the chance to spend time with. On her first trip to the States, I got to live with her for a month in a house in the country in Massachusetts. I was cooking and driving her places and helping to look after her in that time. She had an amazing stability of mind, an amazing amount of love, and amazing presence. Her love was, as far as I could tell, unshakable. And she was always just giving it out—in the form of smiles, hugs, and blessings. She would just bless everywhere she went. Even when she got on the plane to come to America, she blessed the plane before it took off from Calcutta.

I never saw her mind waver. I never saw it slide into anything other than peace and kindness. And this was not always easy because she had brought with her to the States her daughter, whose name was Dīpā. Dīpamā just means Dīpā's mother—that's where she got her name, named for her daughter. And she brought Dīpā's five-year-old son named Rishi. Now Rishi at that time was a bit of a hellion. He was full of uncontainable and irresistible energy.

So we would take them out shopping, for example. We'd go into the shopping mall because they wanted to buy sheets and blankets and things to take back to India. Well, Rishi would cut loose from the pack and go running down the aisle, pulling clothes off hangers and reaching up to touch everything. Things would be cascading out into the aisle in his wake. And then Dīpamā would run after him to track him down and bring him back. All the time she was running, her little white robes would be billowing out behind her, and she just always had a little smile on her face. I never saw her get angry or impatient or at all frustrated with Rishi. So I figured if she could do that with a five-year-old, she could do pretty well with adults, too.

Many people were struck by her presence of mind. She's been dead now for about ten years. At one retreat, people asked her, "What's in your mind? What's your experience like from the inside?" And she said, "There are only three things in my mind: peace, concentration, and metta." That's a pretty nice mind.

Meeting people like this is really inspiring because you get a sense of what's possible through practice. And I truly believe that people like Dīpamā get to be the way they are through practice. It's not an accident. I don't think it's because of their gene pool. I think it's because of years—or she would actually say lifetimes—of devotion to practice. She said that she was alive at the time of the Buddha in a past life and could actually remember hearing discourses from the mouth of the Buddha.

This reminded me of a poem by Mary Oliver about Stanley Kunitz, who was a neighbor of hers legendary for his garden. I want to read a bit of this poem:

"I used to imagine him coming from the house like Merlin, strolling with important gestures through the garden where everything grows so thickly, where birds sing, little snakes lie on the boughs, thinking of nothing but their own good lives, where petals float upward, their colors exploding, and trees open their moist pages of thunder. It has happened every summer for years. But now I know more about the great wheel of growth and decay and rebirth, and know my vision for a falsehood. Now I see him coming from the house. I see him on his knees, cutting away the diseased, the superfluous, coaxing the new, knowing that the hour of fulfillment is buried in years of patience, yet willing to labor like that on the mortal wheel. Oh, what good it does the heart to know it isn't magic."

The hour of fulfillment is buried in years of patience. This is our work. One week doesn't get the whole garden built, and one week doesn't get a heart reconstructed either. But hours of patience can.

This is really all that lies between us and someone like Dipa Ma—just doing the work of cultivating these beautiful qualities. I'm very grateful that in our tradition, the Brahmavihāras are our avenue to that kind of heart. We have a path that can take us from here to there.

Along the way, as we develop metta and compassion, it opens up all these beautiful qualities of heart as byproducts—qualities like happiness and joy and devotion and humor, wonder, awe, reverence, and gratitude. All these things are evoked by the different elements of the Brahmavihāra practice. All of them come to flower in us. These are really the qualities that, for me, make life sweet, make life rich and inherently satisfying and joyful.

Rumi said, "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." So I'm very happy to see all of you have run toward the allure of love and happy that we've taken this trip together.

In thinking of going back either into the next stage of this retreat, or a vipassanā retreat, or going back into your daily life, what kinds of things can you take with you? I want to talk about that for just a minute.

First of all, I hope you have found some great tools to take with you. I hope the formal practices that we've done of all the Brahmavihāras as well as forgiveness are things that you've learned how to apply and work with and can take back into your daily life.

The second thing is no less important. It's really the spirit of loving-kindness—this ability to turn your attention anywhere and see that there's another human heart there that's also going through joys and sorrows and to have a sense of caring about that experience. This spirit, for me, has come alive over this week in our group here. I don't know how you felt it. Maybe sitting up front, I'm in a lucky position of getting to watch your faces brighten over the week, which they have. But I felt the temperature in the room kind of warm up over the week. I feel closer to you all, and I imagine you all feel closer to each other after this week.

That's the kind of spirit that you can help to find in the world or help to make in the world—a feeling of trust and openness. For us, I love this turning in the week when we come to the neutral person because that's really the person that opens the door to this. It's stepping beyond the people that we normally like and opening that caring to anyone and hopefully eventually to everyone.

Metta gets compared to, and I believe the word actually derives from, the word for rain in Pali, the ancient Indian language. Metta is said to be like a gentle rain that falls everywhere indiscriminately. It falls on the sidewalks, it falls on the roofs, it falls on the forest, it falls on the flower gardens—it falls everywhere. This is the indication of how our metta should be showered everywhere, indiscriminately falling like the gentle rain. This is the boundless or universal quality of it.

This inclination that we find we can develop can also be helped by some reflection. Here's one that the Buddha suggested we reflect on. This will only make sense if you can relate to the idea of rebirth that the Buddha talked about many times—that we are born over and over again. He said, given the countless lives that all of us have lived from time immemorial, it's not easy to find a being who at one point in those lifetimes has not been your mother, or your father, or your sister, or your brother, or your son, or your daughter.

What if that was true? What if looking around this room, everyone has been a blood kin of ours, a very close blood kin in another life? How would we feel about each other? It may depend how you feel about your family of origin, but nonetheless, I hope you see the potential. That could really change the way we look at people as we walk down the street.

This way of looking, this way of feeling opens our practice to all of life. It brings it all in into our meditation.

As we start to connect with people, we see that everybody basically wants the same things. Everybody wants to be happy and not to suffer. Everybody wants to be safe. Everybody wants their body to be supported well and to be well fed. Everyone wants to live with ease. This is true of non-human beings as much as of human beings.

And then we start to wonder, especially on the human level, are we really so different? We have different external packaging, somewhat, but if you look closely, it's just variations on a theme. Two eyes, a nose, two ears, a mouth, arms and legs, and then there are lots of variations on that in terms of height and size and skin color and color of eyes and things like that. It's just variations on the same theme.

And then you look inside, and yes, there are different personalities. We all have different personalities, but it's just, again, mixes of the same components. Everybody's got love and joy and warmth, and everybody's got greed and dislikes and confusion—just different balance. And you start to realize that we spend so much time thinking about the ways we're different, and we could easily spend just as much time thinking about the ways we're alike. There are just as many ways we're alike, but we just don't turn our attention to that.

This is not just an accident. This is the trick of ego. Every being that lives plays this game in order to become separate. This is how we become separate. We play this game. We fasten on certain characteristics and we say, "Well, I'm attractive, so I'm special. Or I'm not attractive, so I'm special. I'm creative, so I'm special. Or I'm not creative, so I'm special." The ego does this to separate ourselves out.

Metta and the Brahmaviharas undercut this tendency of ego towards separation and focus on bringing into clear relief everything that we share. That's what comes to the forefront through the Brahmaviharas. That's what comes into clear focus and what we can give more attention to. It's actually more skillful to give more attention to that. We've been so focused for so long on the separation, we've gotten blinded by it. And we think that's the fundamental truth of things. In fact, this unity is more fundamental and in a way is more real than the differences.

This is from Rumi's teacher, a man named Shams of Tabriz: "I, you, he, she, we—in the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions." In the garden of the Brahmaviharas, also, these are not real distinctions.

So there are the tools that I hope you've found and will take home. There's the spirit of inclusion and non-separation of loving-kindness. The third thing is that I hope you've gotten a sense of the possibilities of the Brahmaviharas. What the Brahmaviharas really can show us is the way that an awakened heart can respond to life, and that capacity is within each one of us.

So as an example: loving-kindness sets the foundation of connection and caring. When suffering comes, there's the possibility of responding with compassion. When happiness comes, there's the possibility of responding with mudita. And when the heart rests, there's the possibility of holding all of that with balance, with equanimity. And I believe that each one of you has tasted all these flavors in this week and seen that possibility.

So I just want to point out that in the world at large, this is rare. This is not usually the way things go. So instead of the spirit of metta and inclusion, there's more often the sense of withdrawing and separation. When unhappy things happen in our life, we're more apt to respond by getting depressed or discouraged rather than feeling compassion for ourselves. When good things happen in our life, we're more apt to respond by getting kind of carried away in claiming them or owning them or using them to build ourselves up instead of simply enjoying them in the moment, knowing that they'll pass. Mudita recognizes that joys and sorrows come and go and really appreciates joy when it's there.

These changing conditions of life happen for everyone—for fully enlightened beings like the Buddha, for ordinary people like us. In fact, the Buddha said there are eight conditions that come and go in the world all the time that affect us: gain and loss, pleasure and pain, praise and blame, success and failure.

These alternate for everyone, enlightened or unenlightened. The normal person meeting gain, pleasure, praise, or success tends to get puffed up with thinking about it and owning it. The normal person confronted by the others tends to get depressed, downcast. The Buddha said both these responses lose track of impermanence, that the conditions are going to change.

A wiser response is compassion and mudita, and then the equanimity that can hold that change. So I just encourage you to reflect on this as a possibility that you felt this week. There are different ways to respond to life's conditions, and you now know what they are. Putting them in practice, that's the life's work.

But a life's work isn't wasted if that response comes through. You may have heard this story that someone asked a Zen master, "What's the purpose of a lifetime of dharma practice?" The Zen master said, "An appropriate response." That sounds trivial, but that's what it comes down to. If we can make an appropriate response in the moment, that's the culmination of a lifetime of practice. And then do that moment after moment.

So I would just want to fill in a little bit on the other three brahmaviharas that we didn't talk as much about as we talked about metta. Compassion is said to be the trembling of the open heart in response to suffering. So it's interesting that for compassion to come out, there has to be the contact with seeing suffering, our own or another's. It's said in our tradition that suffering is the proximate cause for compassion. It's the trigger that touches it off. Without suffering, no ground for compassion to arise.

But you look around the world, there is a lot of suffering. You look around the world, there's not as much compassion. So somewhere that link isn't happening. Why is that? I think it's because so often all of us have ways of defending ourselves against all the suffering in the world—our own suffering, the suffering of our friends, the suffering of the society, the suffering of the globe. It seems too much for us.

Starting with our personal suffering, we find ways to turn away from it, to avoid feeling it. We escape through sense pleasures. We escape through addictions, whether it's food, alcohol, drugs, sex, work, companionship, whatever. We find ways to go somewhere else when the suffering gets a little too close. Pick up some other source of pleasure. This blocks the connection of our heart with the suffering. And this is really where the problems start.

Freud said that neurosis is the refusal to suffer. So our core mix-up came because we couldn't open to the suffering that we encountered probably quite young in life—the absence of our mother or of our father, the breakdown of love, the feeling of not being connected or people not being there for us. And we turned away when we were really young into other forms.

So in getting back this connected heart, can we open to suffering without defending and without trying to move away from it? If so, that's really what ignites compassion for us. As we do that, we find we can let the heart get big enough to hold the pain. That's really what's happening with the development of compassion. The heart is just growing until it can wrap around a bigger amount of pain and be equanimous with it. That's why the equanimity is such an important factor in the overall development of the brahmaviharas.

Opening to suffering can really change us if we let it. It can transform our relationship. There's a story about the most famous Buddhist ruler in all of Indian history. His name was Asoka. He was a very warlike king who lived about 200 years after the death of the Buddha. He amassed a great army and went around conquering all the neighboring kingdoms, taking over their land, taking their wealth, destroying their armies in the process. He had just conquered a neighboring kingdom and laid waste to the army. The battlefield was just a bloody mass of carnage and dead bodies and blood. He was standing on a hill looking over the scene of the battle where he had won. And he became depressed. He said, "This is so ugly. This is what my life has come to."

This was the result of the culmination of his career. And then, in the middle of the battlefield, there was a Buddhist monk who was walking slowly and mindfully, very present, with an inner glow that somehow communicated itself to Asoka. Even in the midst of all the carnage, there was equanimity and a kind of radiance in the monk's being.

Asoka said, "What is going on? I have everything. I have all these riches, all this land, all these palaces, all the gold I could want, and I'm miserable. Here's someone who has nothing and they're radiant. What's happening?"

So he turned to investigate the teachings of the Dharma, and he came to understand. He became totally transformed as a ruler. He foreswore violence and sent emissaries around to all the neighboring kingdoms telling them he would no longer make war on them. He started to realize the importance of caring for his people, so he began to distribute food equally around the kingdom so that there was no poverty.

It's very interesting. The Buddha, when he talked about ways to rule, said that the start of the decline of society is when some people become poor. That's the very beginning of a society's decline. For a society to be healthy, everyone needs not to be poor. Asoka put that into effect. He stopped animal sacrifices, which was a common custom in India of those days, out of mercy for the lives of the animals. This brought in a golden age of growth of the Dharma in India under the benevolence of his rule. He's always held up as an example of a truly enlightened and noble ruler. This was all touched off by his opening to the suffering that he saw on the battlefield.

This opening can change us. It's not to say that compassion is always easy. I once did a ten-day compassion retreat similar to the seven-day retreat that we've done in loving kindness. It was one of the most difficult retreats I've ever done because my face was just up against suffering all day long for ten days. I spent a lot of time with my suffering person, as you probably did with your first compassion meditation. I was just contacting suffering hour after hour, day after day, for ten days in silence. It was the most difficult kind of practice I've ever done, but it really did sensitize me to the presence of suffering in my life and in others.

So it's not an easy practice, but there's also a kind of sweetness when it's true compassion. One of my teachers said, "Compassion is like the feeling at sunset. You come to the end of a beautiful day, the sun is going down, there's that warm golden light that starts to spread, and there's a little bit of sadness because the beautiful day is ending and the sun and the warmth are going away." That little bit of sadness is part of compassion because the heart's in touch with suffering. But there's also something sublime when the equanimity is there to support it—something sublime about it. This is the balance that you see in the statues of the Buddha and Quan Yin, where the equanimity is there to support the contact with the suffering.

The near enemy of compassion, where it slides into the unwholesome, is sometimes talked about as being pity. Sometimes it's talked about as being grief. The grief is in the sense that the heart's gotten overloaded by the suffering it's in contact with. It's too much to hold, so it gets pushed under. The equanimity is not strong enough to hold it, so the grief overwhelms us.

The pity is from a slightly different take. Pity comes from a place of looking down on the suffering. "Oh, their suffering—I'm glad that's not my problem," as though we're above the problem, or we're better off because we don't have that problem. That's the source of pity. Compassion sees as an equal.

There's a beautiful poem that expresses this sense that compassion is a recognition that we're all in the same boat. We're all subject to pain, emotional and physical. We're all suffering, subject to illness, aging, and death. There's a poem called "Kindness" by Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian-American poet:

"Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things. Feel the future dissolve in a moment, like salt in a weakened broth. What you held in your hand, what you counted and carefully saved, all this must go, so you know how desolate the landscape can be between the regions of kindness. Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive."

Before you know kindness is the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth. Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore, only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread. Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, it is I you have been looking for, and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend.

The phrase in this that really speaks to me is "until your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth." The size of the cloth is the size of life. All life is subject to sorrow. All life is grounds for kindness, for caring.

The practice of mudita is the beautiful complement to the compassion practice, opening to what's joyful in the world. This is a really happy practice, really upbeat. How do we respond to happiness? There's kind of a double dose of it. A friend called me on the phone a while ago, and I asked her, "How are you?" Just immediately, she burst out, "I'm wonderful!" Her tone of voice just picked me up so much that without thinking I said, "I'm wonderful too." I hadn't even thought about saying that, but I felt it in that moment. We can just get off on other people's happiness. Then there are two happinesses, double what there was before.

The Dalai Lama said, "If you can be happy with others' happiness, then your odds for happiness go up by six billion to one." That's a really good bet. I'll take those odds.

Take a look and see every time throughout the day when happiness strikes you—it could be in someone else, it could be yourself. Just here in this simple setting, how many times have you felt happy seeing the deer or the turkeys or the baby swallows? Or the sun coming out when the fog has lifted, or having a warm shower when you get up in the morning, or feeling how comfortable the bed is at night when you get to lie down at the end of a long day. Sometimes nature is a great source of joy.

Shortly after I was ordained, I stopped in at Chiang Mai before going on to a forest monastery where I spent a three-month retreat. I was very alone. There was a teacher there, but he didn't speak English and I didn't speak Thai. So I was practicing intensively, as we have been this week, for three months. I didn't have any dharma talks. I didn't have any interviews. There wasn't anybody else there who spoke English that I could talk to regularly. It was really quite a period of aloneness. It tested my resolve.

But what really sustained me was the beauty of the nature. The monastery was set at the bottom of a gorge between two big cliffs with a river running through it. The monks' huts were on one side, the nuns' huts were on the other. Every hut was beautiful, and because I was a visitor, they gave me the most beautiful hut. It was right up the river. I couldn't see another hut from my place. It was just an idyllic spot for practice, but also kind of lonely. So I had that contrast. The beautiful thing was that nature really was my support, providing access to joy at that time.

Sometimes we have to look for the mudita in the situation. A few years ago, Sally and I got an infestation of skunks under our house. We live in Woodacre, a country town as you can probably tell. The skunks burrowed under the walls and got underneath the house in the winter because they didn't want to be out in the rain. We found out later they started to make a house for themselves by pulling out the insulation of our furnace pipes and building this nice little warm nest. They found the furnace was a good place to hang out, trampolining on it in the middle of the night. They often seemed to choose about two in the morning to spray. I don't know why, but they would spray about two in the morning. We'd be sleeping, and all of a sudden, this aroma would come up into the bedroom—that thick, oily scent of skunk.

And it would just start permeating everything. So it was not a nice situation. But even then, I have to say, I could take a moment and appreciate the dry home they had found for the winter. So I could actually connect with a little bit of mudita for the skunks. That was before we trapped them and relocated them to the state park further down the road where more of their natural home was found.

Mudita is sometimes translated as sympathetic joy. The sense is like the strings of a sitar. If you know what a sitar looks like, there are seven big strings on top and then nineteen little strings on the bottom that you don't pluck very much. You may run a finger across them, but you pluck the big strings. The little strings vibrate when the frequency is the same, and that's what gives the sitar its richness of sound. They're called the sympathetic strings of the sitar. They vibrate when their frequency is in tune with one of the big strings that gets plucked.

This is the way sympathetic joy works. Your string vibrates with happiness and my string resonates when it's on the same frequency. Now in that understanding of sympathetic joy, some teachers say you need the big string to resonate first. You need somebody outside yourself. You can't resonate your own string. So they say you can't practice mudita toward yourself. This is the understanding in the Visuddhimagga, if any of you read that—it's an old fifth century text. But actually the Buddha never said this. He never said mudita shouldn't be directed to ourselves.

So another way to translate it is appreciative joy. I actually prefer this—appreciative joy. Then we can direct the mudita to ourselves and feel that first string vibrate. And for me, the vibration of that first string is gratitude. When we direct the mudita to ourselves and we appreciate all the things that are right in our life, what comes through is the feeling of gratitude. We just become aware of all the blessings that are in our life.

All of us have lots of blessings. All of us here have lots of blessings. I know all of us are struggling with some difficulties also—some smaller, some great. But we also have lots of blessings: the blessing to be generally fed, clothed, and sheltered; the blessing of having heard the Dharma; the blessing of responding to the Dharma, having the leisure time to practice the Dharma and cultivate the heart. These are great blessings that we all share.

When we tune into gratitude, it's a really lovely state of mind. I mean, if it couldn't be connected with mudita, then I think there should be a fifth Brahmavihara, which is gratitude, because it's such an elevated state of mind. When you think about it, when you're grateful, you appreciate all that you have, so you don't feel a need for more. You appreciate all that you have, so it takes you out of aversion. You're not discontent either. So it really forestalls both greed and aversion through the presence of gratitude.

One of our friends is a grandmother. She's quite a wise person and wanted to teach her granddaughter about this quality of gratitude. So she was talking to her granddaughter one Christmas day. The granddaughter was telling her about all the presents she'd gotten for Christmas, very excited. The girl was about six or seven at the time. And then her grandmother, this wise teacher, said, "Well, when you get lots of presents, do you feel thankful for what you have or do you want more?" And the little girl goes, "Oh, Nana, I'd like more."

The grandmother said, "Oh, that's too bad." And it kind of brought the little girl up short. She said, "Well, what do you mean by that?" And the grandmother said, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you feel content with what you've already got, that's a very good feeling? And when you want more, it doesn't feel as good inside." And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, you're right. You're right."

So this is not rocket science.

But we often forget the joy of contentment through gratitude. It's a really beautiful state. It's also, according to the Buddha, a rare state. The Buddha said three persons are rare in this world: one is a Buddha, and one is a person who's thankful and grateful.

At one retreat, I was going into the autumn in New England. The days were getting really short. The weather was turning cold. All the leaves had fallen off the trees. That gray New England, miserable rainy season was starting to set in. And I was starting to get kind of bummed out. I'd come from California. I noticed my mind going into this aversive mode: Oh, I don't want to sit with this. It's too gloomy. I can't handle it.

So to cut off the aversion, I decided to do a gratitude practice on that retreat. I made a list of all the things in my life I was grateful for. It filled up a whole page. Then every morning when I'd wake up, I'd read that list. There were twenty-five things on there, and it just picked me up at the start of every day. It changed my outlook on the day and got me through that winter season. This can be a really wonderful practice—the conscious cultivation of appreciation for all our blessings.

I have a good friend who's in the financial management world. You know how the stock market crashed in 2001 and 2002? These were not good years for financial managers, because nobody was making money and most of them were losing a lot of money for their clients. Their clients were not very happy that year, especially in 2002. She said clients were just railing at her for having lost their money. One client screamed at her, "You've ruined my life!"

So it was an intense year from a work situation. But she said, "You know what? This has been the happiest year of my life."

I said, "Are you kidding? Why?"

She said, "Because I've been practicing gratitude this year. And it's just cheered up every day of my year."

The last of the Brahma Viharas is equanimity, which we've mentioned a few times. It's really that balance of mind that can hold the ups and downs of life without being so disturbed by the changes.

The Dalai Lama is one of the most equanimous people I've ever met. I think I mentioned that he was in this hall teaching a few years ago with a group of Asian and Western teachers of Buddhism. The format—I don't think in the end this was the best format for us to use, but this is what we used—had different Western teachers presenting to him some of the topics and issues they were struggling with in growing the Dharma in the West, that their students were working with, that they were working with as teachers. Then they would ask the Dalai Lama to respond.

He'd get a few presentations and then be asked for a response. Sometimes he'd say a few words, sometimes he'd just bow to the person and not say much of anything. One time he was asked for a response and he said, "Oh, you know, nothing left up here. By the time the third person speaks, all the earlier thoughts are gone." He just laughed at himself.

But then one of the organizers asked him what I thought was a really direct and challenging question. It was the first time I'd heard the Dalai Lama being grilled in this way. This person said, "Your Holiness, a lot of us are concerned these days about the increasing popularity of Buddhism in the culture, with movies like Kundun and Richard Gere getting very famous. We're concerned that the Dharma is going to get watered down as it gets popularized in this culture. And you, Your Holiness, are the biggest popularizer of them all. What do you have to say about that?"

He was just quiet for a moment, reflecting. Then he answered, "Some people, you see, they call me a living Buddha. Other people, they call me the God King."

He said, "No, no, I am none of these. I'm just a simple Buddhist monk." He says this all the time. You may have heard him. And he really means it. "I'm just a simple Buddhist monk. But other people, they call me counter-revolutionary. They call me a wolf in monk's clothing. But you see, I look back at my own intention. And if my intention is sincere, then that's what's important. How I'm perceived is up to others. About that, I don't care."

He said that really emphatically. "I don't care." And I could tell he really meant it.

But here's someone in a great position of visibility, having praise and blame heaped on him all the time on a global scale. The fate of the Tibetan people is resting on his shoulders, almost alone. He is the only person in the world today who has a hope of saving the Tibetan culture within Tibet itself. And he hears stories all the time about people being tortured and killed in that country. And yet, he can still laugh and he can still hold himself lightly and with that kind of balance of mind—an extraordinary capacity, extraordinary.

So developing the equanimity practice involves this challenging phrase in the traditional sense using karma. We've offered some alternatives. I thought of one more alternative tonight. For those of you who just aren't down with that karma thing, here's another equanimity phrase that I like: "Everything arises according to past causes and conditions."

This almost everyone can agree on. We don't have to spell out what the causes and conditions are. Everything arises according to past causes and conditions. That way we can open ourselves to the unfolding the way it's happening, the way it's actually happening, without having to blame it or justify it or question it. And in that, the purpose is we surrender. The equanimity practice is designed to allow us to surrender to the law of nature and to surrender to the Dharma. And it takes the individual kind of control out of it.

Of course, when we can act in the world to improve things, we do that. But when we're simply sitting quietly, can we come back to peace by taking out the individual struggle? And this is where the equanimity leads us.

Sometimes we think that the world is so crazy and complicated today, nobody could have had to deal with a world like this before. But the world was very crazy at the time of the Buddha also. You can read it in the history as it's recorded in these ancient texts.

The Buddha's first royal patron was a king named Bimbisara. He was very taken with the Buddha's teachings. He became a sponsor, gave the community a wonderful grove to spend their rains retreats in, provided them with meals and shelter, offered lots of great things to the Buddha and the community over many years. As his son grew up—who was a prince, his name was Ajatasattu—the prince got very envious to rule the kingdom. And so he started plotting to kill his father.

The father got wind of this and abdicated the throne to his son out of care, out of love for his son. He said, "You want to be ruler? The kingdom is yours." But the son wasn't satisfied. He put his father in a tower, first of all, but then found out his mother was feeding him, bringing him food illicitly. And so he killed his father.

And this is the kingdom the Buddha was living in. A jealous son kills the father who has been the Buddha's main royal supporter for all his years of community life. That's pretty crazy politics.

So what would you do if you're the Buddha in a situation like that? Finally, the son came to him for teachings, and the Buddha gave him Dharma teachings. The son converted and then really regretted the deeds that he had done. So he was able to have an impact, but it took tremendous equanimity just to stay steady through that kind of change of fortune that affected the whole kingdom.

It's said actually that if the son had not killed his father,

When he received the teachings from the Buddha, he could have become enlightened. But because of the heavy weight of the transgression of killing his father, his heart couldn't open to the truth. And so he didn't gain that insight.

The development of equanimity through the Brahmaviharas is a wonderful gift of the practice. But when you think about how the Buddha stayed equanimous, how the Dalai Lama stays equanimous, there's another level happening as well—the level of insight. This is the real profound source of equanimity in our tradition. I just want to allude to it. This really fits more in the terrain of insight than the terrain of loving kindness, but of course, loving kindness opens the heart to insight. So it's not inappropriate to mention it now.

Enlightened people know a secret—one that mostly we don't. The secret is that in the middle of this bundle of suffering, there is no self who's getting impacted by that suffering. This is the teaching of the doctrine of not-self, or anatta, as it's called in the Pali.

There are only the body sensations, the emotions, the thoughts, the sense impressions, and the knowing of them. That's all a human being is. There is no little person in there who's being tormented by these things. The awakened ones say that when we actually see for ourselves the direct truth of this, it kind of takes the sting out of life. There's still pain, there's still pleasure, but seeing this takes the sting and some fundamental kind of fear out of life.

Jack Kornfield was visiting Sri Lanka in the early years shortly after he'd been a monk. He met with an old monk who was very jolly, very cheerful, living very simply in a hut with a simple bed. Jack went in to see him. The monk was sitting on his bed and asked, "What do you understand the essential message of the teachings to be?" And the monk just laughed and said, "No self, no problem. No self, no problem."

This is the secret that waits for us to discover—the freedom of knowing that takes away some big piece of the suffering of life. That's why it says in the Visuddhimagga that the awakened ones understand there is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. There is no one in there who's getting tormented by this suffering. The suffering is misunderstanding, essentially.

This is really the union of wisdom and compassion. The compassion that holds the suffering, but the wisdom to see nothing has fundamentally gone wrong. There's just a misunderstanding taking place. Nothing fundamentally has ever gone wrong. We are all fundamentally still safe. And that secret is just waiting for each of us to discover, to free our hearts even more.

This is the real source of the balance of equanimity and compassion in the Buddha, in Quan Yin, in the bodhisattvas, in all the awakened beings. This is the potential of equanimity.

I'd like to close tonight with another expression of the Brahmaviharas from the Tibetan tradition. They also speak of these states, calling them the four immeasurables because all these states are considered to be boundless. They open our hearts up in a boundless way to all of life. What I appreciate about this expression from the Tibetan tradition is that it emphasizes the karmic nature of the path—that the path unfolds under the operation of the law of karma, that wholesome intentions lead to wholesome results.

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.
May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.
May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow.
May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Let's just sit for a minute, please.

CHAPTER 257

Anicca: A Characteristic of Existence

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of anicca (impermanence), the first of the Buddha's three characteristics of existence. Drawing on teachings from the Samyutta Nikāya and classical Buddhist texts, he examines impermanence on three levels: cosmic (the temporary nature of even stars and planets), personal (the changes within a human lifetime), and momentary (the moment-to-moment dissolution of all sense experiences). Armstrong shares personal retreat stories from Burma and insights from modern psychology research to illustrate how our resistance to seeing impermanence creates suffering. He explains how the Buddha defined the totality of experience through the six sense doors - eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind with their respective objects - and demonstrates how each realm is constantly dissolving. The talk addresses why we cling despite knowing intellectually that everything changes, touching on the illusion (vipalasa) that prevents clear seeing. Armstrong concludes by connecting anicca to the other characteristics of dukkha (unsatisfactoriness) and anattā (not-self), showing how understanding impermanence at the deepest level through vipassanā meditation leads to the peace of letting go and points toward nibbāna.

If we look at the world from some perspective—either historically from the perspective of time or worldwide through many human cultures from the perspective of space—what we see is a great whirlwind of human activity and beings driven by many unconscious forces in the psyche, resulting in some happiness and also a lot of unhappiness for ourselves and for those we interact with. This is driven by stirrings within the human heart and mind, resulting in societal upheavals and cataclysms of revolution and the brutalities of war. If you survey the whole of human history, you don't see a great deal of inner peace on a global scale, on a historical scale.

Why is that?

The Buddha said it's because of the force of ignorance in every human mind. This force of ignorance leads us not to see clearly, and this not seeing clearly leads us into the tangle of self with all the complications of greed, aversion, and confusion that follow from it.

Steve described a few nights ago how our practice of mindfulness leads us into the investigation of our present moment experience in a way that can reveal to us the true nature of existence and lead to these liberating insights in the area known as vipassana or seeing clearly the way things really are.

As we start to see the actual individual characteristics of a phenomenon like the breath, we start to see the actual individual characteristics of a body sensation or a sound or an emotion, we start to understand the composition of the whole universe. Seeing one breath can be seeing the nature of the whole world. This clear seeing, this detailed, precise seeing is the ground from which insight arises.

The Buddha said that there are three key areas that we need to investigate and understand as we start to see the nature of things. These are sometimes described as the three characteristics that apply to all existing things. It's these three characteristics of existence that I want to talk about tonight.

The first is the quality of impermanence. In Pali, the word is anicca. The second is the quality of unsatisfactoriness. In Pali, the word is dukkha. And the third is the quality of not-self or selflessness. In Pali, the word is anatta.

What's curious is that in each of our minds there is a bias against seeing the truth of these things. The Buddha called that bias vipallasa or illusion. Because we are inherently biased against seeing these things, we have to work hard to be able to see them clearly and for that understanding to settle in us.

Our built-in bias leads us to believe and leads us to perceive existence as having the three contrary characteristics: permanence, the capability for lasting happiness, and the presence of a self through the whole world of phenomena.

So let's start by talking a little bit about impermanence. I don't think it's news to anybody here that everything changes. I think you've probably heard this many times before. And because everything changes, we all know that we shouldn't cling. I'm not telling you anything new.

But for some reason, we all still do cling, don't we? It's very curious how we know we shouldn't cling, and yet we still do.

I was comforted by a comment of Ajahn Chah's that Ajahn Amaro relayed. Ajahn Chah was the Thai meditation master who was Jack Kornfield's first teacher. Jack calls him one of the wisest, probably the wisest man he'd met in his life. And Ajahn Chah said that, in his view, eighty percent of spiritual life was knowing that we're clinging and not being able to stop.

You ever run into that on your meditation cushion? The body's a knot of tension. The mind is racing. There's a slight hint there might be some clinging somewhere in this experience. But we just don't know how to release it.

So most of us are probably at that level where we know there is clinging happening and sometimes, maybe eighty percent of the time, it's hard to release. I'm glad Ajahn Chah said that. It made me feel a lot better.

But what this means—when we know we're clinging but we don't know how to release—is that somehow the understanding of impermanence has only penetrated partway into our beings. We know it with our mind. We may know it a little deeper in our gut, but it's like it hasn't gotten into the marrow of our bones yet. It hasn't penetrated all the way. Because if it did, we would know, as the Buddha said, nothing is worth clinging to. Nothing is worth holding onto in the light of impermanence.

But unfortunately, we have this innate resistance to seeing the truth of impermanence. Why? Because it threatens the ego. The ego is the strategy of self that we've constructed to manage the world and our relationship with the world. It is undermined by the truth of impermanence, so we all have blinkers on that prevent us from seeing it, that lead us to want to see permanence.

So I offer these remarks on impermanence tonight just hoping to make a little dent in that barrier we all have against seeing the truth of things. I think that with all three of these characteristics, we need to hear them again and again and again. And each time we hear, they go a little bit deeper.

I think Steve, tomorrow night, is going to talk more on the characteristic of dukkha, so I won't go so deeply into that this evening. I want to go particularly into impermanence and also touch on anatta, not-self, tonight.

We can think of the truth of impermanence on at least three levels, probably more. We can think of it on a cosmic scale, the scale of one human life, and the scale of our momentary experience. I want to talk a little about all three of these.

Living as a human being with just the perspective of fifty or sixty or seventy years or twenty years, we come to think some things are everlasting. We might think that the earth is everlasting, the sun and the sky and the rains and the oceans and the rivers. When you read Native American poetry and literature, that's the implication. There's one line I particularly like from Native American tradition: "The old men say, only the earth endures." This is true from a certain perspective.

But from a scientific perspective, we now know that even the earth isn't permanent. It wasn't always here—I think it's about four and a half billion years old by latest estimates. We also know that someday it won't be here anymore. In another few billion years, the sun will burn out, and in its burning out, its flame will engulf the earth and burn it to a crisp. So even the earth and the sun are temporary. Even space may be temporary. With the collapse of all matter into the Big Bang, even space might be a temporary creation. So even on a cosmic scale, we can see everything that seems solid is subject to passing.

In the span of one human life, we can also see the effects of impermanence. This is an area that I would call the realm of reflective insight. The Buddha encouraged us to reflect again and again and again on the truth of impermanence. And seeing it in the course of one life is something that's easy to do through reflection. He said doing this undermines the game of ego, the game of the self, the strategy of greed, aversion, and delusion.

We tend not to do a lot of reflection in these kinds of retreats. We encourage you to carry on this reflection at home. And when I say reflection, what I mean is the purposeful application of thinking to dharma topics for greater understanding. So it's using thought, but in a way that furthers our insight, our dharma insight. We suggest during retreats like this that you devote your time just to the moment-to-moment development of mindfulness. But when you go home, we hope you'll make this reflective practice a part of your daily life.

So we look at our human life in this Western culture, the Western paradise as we know it, and we see that the message of our culture is about acquiring and always about more. You see this through the TV ads, which are kind of the underbelly of the culture: more money, bigger house, newer car. Now it's better body, thanks to the miracle of modern medicine. The body that you'd like to order can be yours for a price.

All of us here have seen the limitations of this belief, of this—I would almost say religious view—enough to have left it somewhat behind and looked for something else. So we come to a spiritual path, into spiritual life. And we start to understand that real happiness doesn't come from material things, can't come from material things because of this factor of impermanence. So we look in a new direction. We look in the direction of meditation. We start to understand that real happiness comes from a purified heart. When our human heart is free of the forces of greed, aversion, and confusion, then there is true peace. Then there is true happiness. We get an inkling and greater and greater confidence this is the real road to happiness and peace.

But as we work to develop the path and develop those wholesome qualities, we find that we still bring in some of the same mindset of acquisition and holding as in the material culture. So we come into a retreat, we start developing mindfulness, some concentration builds, and we have a peaceful sitting. And we think, "Wow, this is great. This is what I came on retreat for. Now I've got the groove." And then we go out for the next walking period. "I can't wait to get back in the meditation room." And we walk and we come back in. What happened to the peace? Maybe gone.

And often the loss of that peace and concentration is much more discouraging than a drop in our savings account or a dent in our new car, because we've developed the same kind of desire and attachment around the fruits of spiritual practice. So in many ways, the events of spiritual life can come to occupy the same place in our mind as the objects of the material world—just a more refined kind of object.

There was a fascinating article in the New York Times about a year ago called "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness." Some researchers at Harvard and other universities started to explore the connection between what humans wanted that would bring them happiness and what actually happened to them when they got those things. They also studied what happened when people got the things they really didn't want and how both scenarios unfolded over time.

What they found was really interesting. They discovered that by and large, as people, we are very poor predictors of what will bring us happiness or unhappiness, and to what degree. They were focusing mostly on outer things—that was the interest level of their subjects. When people got the new BMW that they craved, they were happier, but for a short time, and then it faded. In fact, they were less happy than they expected to be, and that lower level of happiness wore off more quickly than they expected.

So the good thing that came into their life—this desired object—didn't bring as much happiness as expected, and the happiness didn't last as long. But on the other side of things, they found that events people didn't want to have happen also had less of a negative effect than people had expected. They didn't get as low as they thought they would, and they rebounded more quickly than anticipated.

To sum it up the way the reporter described it: on average, bad events proved less intense and more transient than test participants predicted. Good events also proved less intense and briefer as well.

This has great implications for us as meditators. Things generally don't make us as happy as we expect they will—even the new car or the new relationship, the new line of work, newfound wealth. But also, the things we're afraid of in life generally don't impact us for as long or as deeply as we fear they might. Even the loss of a relationship, the loss of a job, the death of a family member—people are generally surprised at their ability to rebound from those kinds of events.

What this really says is we don't know how, as people, to account for impermanence properly. We don't know how to plan for change, either positively or negatively.

What's interesting in this article is that the key researcher mentioned was kind of ambivalent about these findings. Because what does this point to? We make too much of a fuss about things. Why do we make so much fuss about the ups and downs of our life? In a lot of cases, they just don't matter that much.

So this researcher, a Harvard professor, said, "Hope and fear are enduring features of the human experience, and it is unlikely that people are going to abandon them anytime soon just because some psychologist tells them they should."

And what did the Buddha have to say about hope and fear? I think he said abandoning them was a pretty good idea. That's really what living in the moment is all about. That's what these conclusions are pointing to.

Then the researcher spoke personally: "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations. I don't think I want to learn too much from my research in this sense."

Those egos are tenacious beings, aren't they? Let's hold on to our hopes and fears—it's the juice of life!

What this points to is a willingness to trust more and more in the sense of equanimity as we ride through the ups and downs of retreat life, as we ride through the ups and downs of our daily life. Trust that we will be able to weather the storms that come and that we will be able to stay balanced through the good times also—not to get too head over heels in either direction.

One of the things that we often see on retreat is that when the concentration goes and we fall into one of the storms that come frequently on retreat, we tend to get really upset by the fact that the storm is there. The storm itself may be unpleasant, but it causes what you might call a crisis in confidence in us. We feel we've gone off track—that we're not a good meditator any longer, that maybe we've given up our effort, we've forgotten how to do the practice, we're not good enough, we're not sincere enough, or we've lost the thread and it's never going to come back.

Have you had any of these thoughts in the middle of storms? I have them all the time.

In a way, what we do is take a current moment's experience and project it indefinitely into the future. It's always going to be like this.

This happened to me in Burma. I was recently there sitting for a six-week retreat. I ordained when I was there, which is why my hair is so short—this is about two months' growth, so it's coming back, but slowly. I got there probably at the worst time of year that I could have picked. I arrived in Burma at the very height of the monsoon, and it was in one of the rainiest areas of Asia that I've ever been to. I've been through three or four monsoons in Asia, and Steve and I were talking about what the monsoons are like where we have been.

Usually there will be sun in the morning, and then in the afternoon the sky will just open up and bucket rain, dumping perhaps two inches in an hour before passing through to sunshine again. That's the sort of monsoon I was used to, and I don't mind that.

But this monastery was positioned on the edge of the Andaman Sea, just east of India. The monsoons were blowing right off the sea and slamming into the low mountains where the monastery was located, with no buffer whatsoever. When I arrived, it was truly the height of the monsoon season. For the first three weeks, it rained probably fifteen hours a day. I saw the sun twice in those three weeks as I was adjusting to being in the robes, in a new society, new culture, new food, new teacher, new practice.

With all of that, I confess I found the rain a little gloomy. I was sitting in my kuti feeling very gloomy and thinking, "It's going to be like this for another six weeks. How am I going to stand it? I don't think I can take it." I got more depressed thinking about how gloomy it was going to be than I was just being gloomy in the first place. I weighed myself down with that sense that it's going to be like this forever. Six weeks seems like forever when you're in retreat. It was about three weeks before I could really believe that it was ever going to get sunny again.

But I had brought along a photograph of the Dalai Lama that I keep on my altar, a photograph that Sally gave me. I turned to the Dalai Lama, for whom I have tremendous devotional energy, and said, "Your Holiness, can you give me some good advice?" I heard this voice spoken in his kind of Tibetan-Indian accent saying, "Hmm, stay optimistic, cheerful, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." It came through just like that. Those were the words I heard: stay optimistic, confident, and cheerful.

I really tried to take that advice to heart. Even though it was raining outside, I tried to find that place that was optimistic and confident and cheerful. Sometimes I could do it, sometimes I couldn't. Sometimes I could follow the advice, sometimes I couldn't. But it became clear to me that what I really needed to weather this storm was confidence—confidence that there was going to be another side to it, that I was going to come through and that it was going to be okay again, as it had been okay before the storm.

When those storms come in meditation—when the delightful sitting goes away and the thoughts and emotions get chaotic or depressing or gloomy—I suggest you remember that aspect of confidence. As Kamala spoke about the other night, it's really the quality of faith that we need. If we can have that faith in ourselves, that we can come through this storm, then we really can stay cheerful in the middle of it. We can truly not be bothered by the thoughts, by the emotions, by the worries that come, because we know they too will pass. This is really the heart of equanimity. The basis of our equanimity is this quality of faith, one of the key qualities that develops with spiritual practice. But we have to go through those ups and downs many times before we can really trust that this is just a temporary phase and we'll come out the other side.

Another way we tend to ignore or deny impermanence is through the concept of "getting it all together." One day I'm going to get it all together, whether in life or meditation practice. It's not all together now, but I just have to work a little harder and get all the pieces in place at one time. Then my relationship will be in a good space, I'll be enjoying my work, my body will be fine, that old knee problem will have healed, I'll have enough money, my parents are still doing okay, my kids are not dealing drugs anymore. At one moment, everything will be okay in my life.

But have you ever known many people for whom that's true? It seems like one thing or another is always slipping out of balance. The relationship comes into a really good place, and the job gets screwed up. Or the money comes together, but then the parent's health starts to deteriorate. Joseph Goldstein has this wonderful phrase he suggests we bring to meditation as well as to life: "If it's not one thing, it's another." And it really seems true.

In meditation also, do you ever find yourself wondering when your retreat experience is going to all come together? In my early days, I thought surely if I sit a six-week retreat or a three-month retreat, it will all come together. At some point, all these body disturbances and wandering mind and annoying, afflictive emotions will be figured out and put aside, and I'll really be able to just cruise—to float, really—on this plateau of mindfulness and concentration and equanimity and peace, day after day. That's what my retreat should be like.

I haven't gotten it all together yet. I think we're lucky if we get a day like that.

where all those factors come together and last for 24 hours. That is wonderful if you have a whole day like that. But generally what's happening is that because the factors are not under our control, they have their own lives.

We make our moderate effort, mindfulness starts to build, and out of that concentration builds. When concentration is strong and energy is good, then there's a feeling of peace and alertness. But any of those factors can start to decay. Beyond our control, they can start to decay. Doing the best we can, making our good, steady effort all the way through, the meditation may still fall apart. Other energies may come in—bodily pain, distracting thoughts, restlessness, anything.

Can we be patient with that? Can we realize that we don't have to get it all together on this long, long plateau for insight to develop? Sometimes the best insights come in that falling apart phase. Where else are we going to learn equanimity? When everything's going right in our life, we tend to get attached to the pleasant circumstances and then we actually don't learn very much. It's really when things get shaken up a little bit and we get tested that we tend to learn more. So insight tends to develop to some degree out of difficulty, out of the difficulty of change.

In this way, in spiritual life, you may hear it said that a good situation is not a good situation for spiritual insight. And a difficult situation is a good situation for spiritual insight, for developing equanimity, strength, confidence, faith, understanding.

Another major way, of course, that we deny impermanence is in our relationship to death. Again, the ego has a strong investment in not seeing the truth of our death. Freud said that our entire human neurosis was rooted in our denial of death. So there's a strong force there not letting us see it.

Someone posed a question to a wise person in the Vedas, ancient Indian literature that goes back about 3,000 years in time that predates the Buddha: "What is the greatest miracle on this earth?" And the wise person responded, "The greatest miracle is that every human is surrounded by those dying around him or herself, but doesn't believe that he or she will die."

This is pretty amazing, isn't it? Most of us haven't quite integrated the reality of our own death.

This understanding was actually one of the experiences that prompted the Buddha to begin his quest. It's said that he took a ride into the neighboring village and saw an old person, a sick person, and a corpse. These jarred him so much that he resolved to find a way beyond aging, illness, and death. The fourth person that he saw was a renunciate pursuing a life of spiritual inquiry, and he decided to follow that example.

I want to read one thing that the Buddha said about this understanding that dawned on him: "An uninstructed person seeing a corpse feels repelled and disgusted. But I reflected that I too will die and come to be a corpse someday. So it is not befitting for me to be repelled and disgusted by a corpse. Seeing this, the pride that I took in life, in being alive, entirely vanished." He went on to say that there is also a pride in being young and there's a pride in being healthy. He said he gave up all of these at the start of his quest, realizing that they were all impermanent and bound to pass.

We usually feel death as a threat of some kind, probably the ultimate kind of threat. It certainly is a threat to the ego, the sense of permanent self that we've invested in. But it's interesting—the Buddha said that it's not necessary that human beings fear death. He said some beings do fear death, other beings don't fear death.

He said that we will fear death if, number one, we are greatly attached to sense pleasures and we want to have more pleasant sense experience. Number two, if we're greatly attached to this body, if we love it and delight in it and pamper it and are very attached to it. Third, someone who has done harm to others and has neglected to do virtuous actions fears death, because that person doesn't know what the effect of those unvirtuous actions will be after dying. And the fourth person who fears death is one who does not have faith in the Dhamma, in the truth of things.

So conversely, the Buddha said that it's not necessary to fear death, as long as there is not a great attachment to pleasant sense experiences, a great attachment or delight in this body, one has not neglected virtuous actions and one has not done many harmful actions. In the classical terms, this would be one who has observed sila or morality, virtuous actions to others, and one who has practiced dana or generosity, the doing of charitable actions to others. And finally, the fourth condition is one who has faith in the Dhamma can die without fear of dying.

The Buddha felt that this reflection on death was a very helpful reflection for all his followers, not just for monks and nuns. He had one set of reflections that he encouraged the monks and nuns to do. But here's a set that he encouraged for everybody, lay people as well as monks and nuns.

The Buddha encouraged us to carry five daily reflections in our minds. These fundamental contemplations remind us of our true nature:

I am of the nature to grow old. I have not gone beyond aging.

I am of the nature to become sick. I have not gone beyond illness.

I am of the nature to die. I have not gone beyond death.

At death, I will be separated from all that is dear and beloved to me.

And finally, I am the owner of my actions—my karma. All that I do, for good or for ill, of that I will be the heir.

These five reflections were meant for everyone—lay people as well as monastics. Among them, the contemplation of death holds special power and usefulness for all practitioners.

This brings us to the third dimension of impermanence we must explore: the momentary, instant-by-instant nature of impermanence. Here we enter the realm of meditative insight, where simple reflection no longer suffices. This understanding can only emerge through sustained mindfulness that leads to quietude, concentration, and penetrating insight into the nature of our experience.

Within this moment-to-moment impermanence, we begin to see that change occurs far more rapidly than most people realize. Modern quantum mechanics reveals that electrons pulse on and off continuously—the very fabric of atoms lacks stability. An electron remains essentially unlocatable, described as a probability graph of charge distribution. While we rarely experience reality this way in ordinary consciousness, meditation can reveal the extraordinarily rapid changes occurring moment to moment.

I recall a wonderful presentation by the Dalai Lama that Sally and I attended at Shoreline Amphitheater in Mountain View. It was summertime, and the amphitheater held thousands of people in seats, with many more stretched across the grassy bowl-shaped lawn overlooking the stage. Monks and nuns from various Buddhist traditions flanked the Dalai Lama—Tibetan monastics in bright red robes on one side, Theravadan monks and nuns in brown and yellow on the other, along with Zen practitioners in gray and black, and Korean monastics in brown. The stage presented a colorful array of Buddhist traditions.

Behind the Dalai Lama hung an enormous painting of the Potala Palace—his former residence in Lhasa—depicted at twilight with the last rays of sunset illuminating its walls. It created the beautiful illusion of seeing the Dalai Lama where he belonged, teaching dharma before the Potala. The grassy slope and peaceful atmosphere made it feel like a Buddhist Woodstock—without the drugs, everything wonderfully clean and clear.

The Dalai Lama taught on emptiness that day, and his words proved as transformative as any substance. In exploring impermanence, he emphasized a crucial point: solid objects don't simply persist for a while before suddenly disappearing. Rather, what we perceive as solid objects are actually dissolving and reappearing moment by moment—pulsing on and off, existence itself flickering in and out of being. This understanding aligns perfectly with quantum physics and emerges from the direct insight of yogis who have developed sufficient concentration and clarity of seeing.

In our practice tradition, we must learn to observe our experience with such precision that this momentary dissolution becomes directly apparent. But what exactly is dissolving? What can we actually see and know to be in constant flux?

To answer this question, we must examine the fundamental nature of human experience itself.

This is from the Samyutta Nikaya. In this translation, it's called the Sutta on Totality.

"Monks," the Buddha said, "I will teach you the totality of life. Listen, attend carefully to it, and I will speak. I will teach you the totality of life."

That's a gutsy thing to say, isn't it? Who would have the nerve to teach the totality of life? Not Einstein, not Marx, not Freud. The Buddha said, "I will teach you the totality of life."

"What, monks, is totality? It is just the eye with the objects of sight, the ear with the objects of hearing, the nose with the objects of smell, the body with the objects of touch, and the mind with the objects of cognition. This, monks, is called totality."

In the mind and its objects, primarily we're talking about states of mind—the emotions, moods, and refined meditative states that Sally talked about both in her talk last night and also this morning in the instruction—as well as thoughts. This is primarily what's being pointed to in the objects of mind.

So from our experience: sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, emotions, and thoughts. Is there anything else? Anything else significant in your experience? Is the Buddha leaving anything out in this description of totality?

Isn't it amazing how simple it is? It's such a simple description of life and yet it's so comprehensive. Nothing is left out. We have these six classes of experience—the five physical senses and then mind objects, primarily thoughts and states of mind. That's all there is.

Now, of those six areas in your experience, which are solid? Which are not dissolving?

What about a thought? Does a thought last very long? Not generally. It sort of comes and then it's gone, doesn't it?

What about a sound? It's got a little bit of a decay, but if you listen closely, there's a little bit of modulation. It's kind of changing, being reborn, changing, dying away.

What about body sensations—these objects of touch, the sensations within our body? Are these solid? Look closely in your experience, even as you sit right now. Feel the pressure of your seat on the cushion. Is it one unchanging feeling? Or is it kind of pulsing and throbbing and getting stronger and weaker moment by moment? If you look closely at any body sensation, you'll see that minute change taking place. There's nothing solid within the experience of the body.

Emotions. Has any emotion lasted all day yet? Probably not. Emotions generally don't last so long. And even then, they're kind of being reinforced, aren't they, by your thoughts? Coming and going, waning, getting rebuilt.

What about sights? Opening your eyes and looking around the room at these white walls—that looks pretty solid, doesn't it? Sight is one of the hardest senses to see impermanence in. The light changes, that's right. It looks very different now than it did two hours ago, than it did in the morning.

And even if you want to get more granular than that, remember how sight is generated. Particles of light called photons, many, many per second, fall on a wall, are reflected and bounce into our eye where they strike the retina. It's really a stream of photons that are falling on the retina, triggering signals of electricity through the optic nerve into the brain where somehow, miraculously, consciousness of seeing is created. Stop that stream of photons for one split second, the sight goes away. So this sight, which seems so solid, is actually pulsing on and off many, many times a second, triggered by the impact of these many, many, many photons.

Even this kind of seeing is accessible to yogis. I cannot say that millions of times a second a photon strikes, but the lack of solidity of sight is accessible to yogic insight. So we can verify from our direct experience the statement of the Dalai Lama that everything in our experience is dissolving moment after moment, not lasting more than a part of a second.

And then we have to ask: what is there to cling to? When we see impermanence at this level, we know clinging is not a good idea. But when we see it at this level, we really know there's nothing there to cling to.

The Buddha said nothing should be clung to because it leads to suffering. When we see on this level, we start to see there is nothing to cling to because it's all in the process of fading away, of dissolving.

The Buddha compared it to someone being swept away on the current of a river, someone who had fallen into a fast-running river and was being swept downstream. As the person went downstream, they wanted to gain a steady hold by grabbing onto things on the bank. So they would reach out, but every time they reached, they could only grab hold of a strand of grass, and it came away in their hand. Then they would go a little further and reach out on the other side to grab a clump of grass, but it just pulled out.

This is the state that we're all in with clinging. We hold on to things, but even as we hold, they're becoming unsolid. They're coming unstuck.

The Buddha had an attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life, his cousin named Ananda, who was a very gentle and lovely person. He looked after all the Buddha's needs over that time really dutifully. At one point he asked the Buddha, "What do you mean by the world?" The word for world in Pali is loka. And the Buddha made a pun in reply. He said, "It disintegrates."

The word for disintegrate in Pali is paloka. "It palokas, therefore it is called the world or loka." Why do you call it the world? What do you mean by the world? It disintegrates, therefore it is called the world.

So this world of our six senses is constantly disintegrating, constantly dissolving.

When the yogi touches this kind of insight and this kind of realization in practice, it's usually a little unsettling. I don't know if you can get that flavor or sense of it, but it's as though the ground goes out from underneath one's feet. Because in fact, one realizes that what we take to be the ground—solid and supportive—is only the sensation of hardness. It's just another touch coming through our bodily sense, which is changing all the time. So there really is no ground.

This is the area of insight that the understanding of impermanence opens up for us through practice that is not available to ordinary daily reflection. This kind of insight where we get the truth of impermanence in our marrow is accessible only through meditative deepening.

In the second of the characteristics the Buddha talked about—the area of dukkha or unsatisfactoriness, often translated as suffering—we begin to see that the world cannot give us lasting satisfaction through the six senses because of this dissolving nature. There is nothing there to hang on to. So the impermanence and the unsatisfactoriness are very closely related. When we try to hang on to something that's in the process of dissolving, we won't be satisfied.

This is from Suzuki Roshi: "Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure. But unfortunately, although it is true, it is difficult for us to accept it. Because we cannot accept the truth of transiency, we suffer. So the cause of suffering is our non-acceptance of this truth. The teaching of the cause of suffering and the teaching that everything changes are two sides of one coin."

The third of the characteristics that I mentioned earlier was this teaching about not-self. This is actually one of the most difficult teachings of the Buddha to understand. So we have about five minutes left to cover it. That's probably about right.

I want to say before I make a few remarks about it that you shouldn't aim to understand this topic in one evening anyway, even if it was talked about for an hour. Rather, I have found that this message, this understanding, has come very slowly and very gradually over years of practice. I feel I'm still uncovering new angles to this insight, and that as I do, it continues to expand the area of freedom in my life. For me, this has been one of the central areas for greater freedom within all my dharma practice—understanding this message of anatta or not-self.

To really understand the message of not-self, I think we have to start by understanding what the Buddha meant by self. Or another way to say it is to understand what each of us means when we say "I" or "me," because there are some assumptions hidden in those two words—"I" or "me"—that we normally don't pull out and look at or question. But we really have to pull them out and become conscious of them, or we'll never understand what it means to deny the self through this concept of not-self.

So, what is implicit within our idea of a self or an "I" or a "me"?

One central aspect of our concept of self is that there exists a constant, ongoing entity—here, there, and everywhere throughout time. In some fundamental way, I have been the same entity from the moment I was born until this very day. All the experiences that have unfolded through all my years have happened to me—the same person. This represents the first characteristic of selfhood that we unconsciously accept: one continuous person or entity has moved through all these different experiences of life.

The second aspect inherent in this notion is that this "I" has somehow remained independent of all the experiences that have occurred. That I have been like a small, unchanging core wrapped within this fabric of bodily experience, sight experience, sound experience, emotional experience, and thought experience—all of it impinging upon me. All the different senses are impinging upon some unchanging center within me that truly is me. Everything is happening to me. In some ways, I am a kind of observer of it all, remaining fundamentally unchanged through all these different experiences.

When you combine these elements—constant, ongoing, independent observer—this entity cannot be found. It simply cannot be found, not within this sphere of sense experiences, not within the human realm of experience. There is no entity that matches this description.

This points to one of the important directions in our meditation practice, and I hope you will take it seriously: to look hard for that kind of entity. Only after looking earnestly for it and not finding it will you be convinced that it's not there. Something that satisfies these criteria—being the same since you were born, being independent of your experience while your experience happens to it—simply can't be found. But we each need to look hard enough until we know this for ourselves.

William James said something revealing: "When I look for the self, all I can find is a tickle in the back of my throat." Perhaps that's all any of us can find.

What the Buddha taught is that these sense experiences are not that self. A sight is not that self. A sound is not. A touch is not. A smell is not. A taste is not. An emotion is not. And a thought is not. What's left? Not much.

Interestingly, he didn't actually say there is no self. What he said is that all these experiences we can touch through meditation—those are not self. Those are not this thing called self. Those are not "I" or "me."

When we start to look carefully, we see that this sense of "I" or "me" comes strongly sometimes, especially when we become wound up about something or invested in something, while at other times it is quite weak. Take a look at your experience in one of those moments where there's a lot of calm and spaciousness. How strong is the "I" then? It's not very strong.

What we discover is that this sense of "I" or "me" gets constructed—it grows large and becomes small. When you look again more closely, you'll see that when it's strong, it's because there's holding on to something. There's clinging. The sense of "I" is directly proportional to the strength of clinging. It is nothing else. As the clinging relaxes, you can start to feel the freedom when the sense of "I" is weak or even absent. This becomes a fantastic doorway to peace and happiness.

Once, after a talk like this, during the question period the following morning, someone in the hall raised their hand and asked me: "All this teaching about impermanence that you discussed last night—is this just some bitter pill that I have to swallow? It's not very encouraging."

It's not a bitter pill. It's simply the way things are. It's challenging to accept because we have a bias against seeing it clearly. But it's not intrinsically a problem once we adapt our worldview to accommodate this truth.

The reason impermanence is emphasized so strongly in Dharma practice is that the more we see it, the less we tend to hold on. All the teachings on impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self point us toward not holding on so tightly to our experience—neither to the highs nor to the lows.

As we develop greater and greater capacity to let go, more and more peace comes. As Ajahn Chah said, if you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace.

This complete peace is the doorway to Nibbana—that state which is beyond change, beyond unsatisfactoriness, beyond the limitations of sense experience. This is the real goal of our Dharma practice, and it provides the greatest liberation and freedom for our hearts.

It is in the interest of discovering Nibbana, the direct realization of the unconditioned, that the Buddha encouraged us to let go through the investigation of anicca, dukkha, and anatta—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self.

Let us pause now and reflect on these words from the Diamond Sutra: "Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world: like a star at dawn, like a bubble in a stream, a flickering lamp, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a mirage, and a dream."

In contemplating the three characteristics, we discover not a philosophy of despair, but a pathway to profound peace. Each moment of recognizing impermanence becomes an invitation to soften our grip. Each acknowledgment of unsatisfactoriness becomes a step toward contentment that doesn't depend on conditions. Each glimpse of not-self becomes a doorway to the vast freedom that is our birthright.

This is the gift of the Buddha's teaching—not to burden us with difficult truths, but to liberate us through clear seeing. When we truly understand that holding on brings suffering and letting go brings peace, the choice becomes obvious. The path becomes not a struggle against reality, but a gentle alignment with the way things actually are.

Impermanence

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this comprehensive exploration of anicca (impermanence), Guy Armstrong examines one of the tilakkhana (three characteristics) that the Buddha identified as fundamental to all conditioned existence. Drawing from his recent ordination experience in Burma during monsoon season, Armstrong illustrates how we resist seeing impermanence even in our spiritual practice, wanting lasting happiness from meditation states just as we do from material acquisitions.
> The talk unfolds impermanence across three timeframes: cosmic (the Big Bang to universal dissolution), personal (aging, death, and the changes of a human lifetime), and meditative (moment-to-moment arising and passing of phenomena). Armstrong references recent psychological research showing how poorly humans predict the duration and intensity of both pleasant and unpleasant experiences, echoing the Buddha's teaching that we create unnecessary suffering through our misperceptions.
> The teaching emphasizes how meditative insight reveals the rapid, momentary nature of all sensory and mental phenomena—nothing is solid or graspable. This direct seeing naturally leads to equanimity and non-clinging, potentially opening the mind to touch the unconditioned (nibbana) that lies beyond change. Armstrong concludes with the Tibetan saying about practice: "In the beginning nothing comes, in the middle nothing stays, in the end nothing goes."

Sally talked last night about wise attention and how we can use it in our practice to clear up the misperceptions of things that we often fall into perceiving. I think it's interesting how that issue also relates to the question that was asked in the hall this morning: why is it important to pay attention to the details of the breath if what we really want to do is clear up things in our daily life to live with more wisdom and compassion? I want to talk about both of those aspects tonight.

In the broad scope of things, as Sally said, we pay attention to the breath in order to learn to pay attention. We find that this paying attention steadies the mind and reduces the amount of wayward thinking that comes in. As the mind gets steady, it's able to see more clearly the way things really are, to perceive things the way that they truly are. This is the realm of insight, and it's the area that the Buddha said led to the greatest freedom.

There's a direct connection between seeing the way the breath is and seeing the way the whole world is. You could say that if you train yourself to see the nature of one breath very clearly, then you see the nature of the whole world. There's really no difference between this piece of nature and that whole piece of nature out there.

So then the question comes in: what is it that's important to see about the breath or about the world? What should we be looking at? Or another way to say it is: what is the nature of the breath and what is the nature of the world?

When the Buddha answered this question, he pointed to what he called the three characteristics of everything that exists. He said these are the things that would be helpful to see, and they are: first, that all conditioned things are impermanent.

In letting that statement in, we need to stop and ask: what is a conditioned thing that the Buddha is saying is impermanent? A conditioned thing is anything that arises based on prior conditions. For instance, our bodies are here because at some point our parents joined and a sperm met an egg and the body was nourished in the womb and came out and received food and air and water. So this body is here because of prior conditions.

This building is here because of prior conditions. The trees grew in a forest. The cement came out of the earth. The light fixtures were manufactured by somebody else. Is there anything you can look at in the world that wasn't previously something else? Probably not. This whole thing we call earth came out of dust that collected around the star that we call the sun.

So all conditioned things means everything that we can see with our eyes and touch with our hands, smell and taste. It also refers to the inner life, because when you look at the thoughts you have, they all came out of past causes and conditions, and the emotions we have all come because we're alive and human and contacting the world. All conditioned things means everything that we know. Everything we know is impermanent.

He also said all conditioned things are unsatisfactory. Why is that? All conditioned things are unsatisfactory—you might say ultimately unsatisfying—because if something came out of a prior condition and cause, it itself is going to be a subsequent condition for a later arising. And in that, it's going to decay. Everything that came into being is also going to be of the nature to pass away. In its passing away, it means there's no lasting happiness from it. So all conditioned things are ultimately not going to satisfy us, and that means everything that we see with our eyes and that touches our mind.

The third one was a little different. He said all things are not self. He didn't say all conditioned things. He said all things. So what's the difference between conditioned things and all things? In the teachings of the Buddha, there is one element, one Dhamma, he would say, that is a thing that's not a conditioned thing, and that is the unconditioned thing. The unconditioned thing the Buddha called nibbana. That is not impermanent, it's not unsatisfactory, but it is not self. We'll talk more about that later.

Tonight I want to focus on the first of these three characteristics, the nature of impermanence. All conditioned things are impermanent, unsatisfactory, and all things are not self.

Sometimes this is considered a key teaching of Buddhism, but really, if you put the label Buddhism on it, it makes it sound like a sect or a religious cult or something like that. But really, what the Buddha said is that these three things are true whether or not a Buddha says they are. Whether or not a Buddha arises in this world to say these three things, it's still the way things are. That's why Buddhism is really not—I don't consider it a religion so much as a teaching about the nature of things, just the way things are, free of sectarian observations or bias.

One of the difficulties about the three characteristics is that we have a built-in bias already against seeing them. That's why they're so hard to understand and why the teaching of the Buddha is in effect revolutionary, because the perception of these three qualities goes against the mainstream culture of any time and age, not just our current one, but any time and age. And it's because we as human beings want to find a lasting happiness.

We want the world to offer us the stability of lasting peace and satisfaction. I think we're born out of that longing. I don't think we would be here in this current incarnation if we didn't have that desire very strongly. So I believe from the time we come out of the womb, we're looking for the world to provide us with lasting happiness.

And the problem is that it can't.

That's why spiritual training is helpful. When we want the world to be one way and it's another way, we're going to suffer. So the training is: can we see the world the way it is, and then can we live in harmony with the way it is?

This seeing of the way things are is freeing in itself. To see impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self is deeply freeing for the heart. But it's not the end of the road for freedom, because these particular insights change the mind in such a way that it opens to go beyond conditioned things altogether and to touch that deepest truth of the unconditioned, of nibbana. It's said that the direct touch or direct realization of the unconditioned does the complete work of freeing the mind.

I want to talk particularly about impermanence tonight—about how it frees our mind in a relative sense, and then how it opens the mind to the deeper truth of what is beyond change, what's beyond impermanence.

In looking at change or impermanence, I want to discuss it on three time scales, because the teaching is true for all scales of time. We'll look at it in terms of the cosmic timeframe, in the timeframe of one human life, and then as a ground of meditative insight—how it's true on a moment-to-moment basis and how we can see that.

On the cosmic scale, from a naive point of view, we tend to think of the earth and sky and sun and moon and stars as eternal. Certainly for all the generations of humans, they have appeared that way. In native cultures, they're spoken of in that way. There's a Native American poem that says, "The old men say, the earth alone endures. You spoke truly. You were right."

This is a deep view in the history of humanity. It's only really in the last hundred years that Western science has come to say, "Maybe that's not the way things are." With the theory of the Big Bang, maybe there was a moment when no matter existed at all, some twelve billion years ago. Then all matter came out of that nothing of the Big Bang.

The Earth is about four billion years old, and at some time in the future will not exist anymore. It's said that the sun will burn out, and in its burning up, the heat from it will turn this place to a crisp. So you don't want to be around for that. Finish your work before then. That's a few billion years, but it would be a good time to be in another realm.

Even space may be temporary. There's actually been a debate within the Buddhist tradition: Is space conditioned or unconditioned? That's something scholars have debated for years. But from the Western scientific point of view, even space arose out of the Big Bang and will collapse again if contraction happens into another Big Bang. So we'll see. I'm curious about that myself, but that's what they say.

On a cosmic scale, we can see change on a very vast scale in very vast times. Nothing physical is permanent.

But more interesting to us is the measure of one human life. Within one human life, how do we see impermanence, and how do we refuse to see impermanence? How do we turn away from that understanding?

The message of our culture, the Western paradise as we know it, seems to be that lasting happiness is possible through acquiring. We've seen this again and again: more money, bigger house, newer car, fancier clothes, better body. The options for better bodies are getting incredible now through surgical procedures. You can almost order the body you want. And when they get into tampering with DNA, you might be able to do that in the cells of the embryo. I hope not. But that might be possible—order the body that your parents want for you.

We've all seen that this is a limited kind of satisfaction. It is a kind of satisfaction—let's be real about that. The satisfaction of material things is real, but it's transitory and not so deep.

But it is real. Seeing the limitation of this material satisfaction, we come into spiritual life wanting to discover if there's a possibility of lasting happiness through this territory, through this domain. And we start to understand the source of real happiness—that genuine happiness in life comes from a heart that has been purified. When the heart is pure, happiness is simply a natural result.

In the Buddha's teachings, the pure heart means the heart that has been freed, at least to some extent if not totally, from the forces of wanting, of disliking, and of confusion. Regardless of our material possessions or lack thereof, when the heart is free of these forces, there is deep peace and contentment. We don't need to look outside the heart for that.

But what's interesting is that as we train in this direction of peace and contentment and freedom from wanting and disliking, there are many ups and downs along the way. We come to understand the beauty of freedom, the beauty of peace, the beauty of concentration as we encounter those states through our Dharma practice. Then the acquiring mind, which is a deeply conditioned tendency, tends to get focused on those spiritual acquisitions rather than material ones. But the same kind of gaining mind can come into play.

So we become really pleased when peace appears, when concentration appears, when ease and relaxation come into our sitting, when we're able to be in the present moment for a stretch of time and the body relaxes and we let go of the burden of worries or hoping. Then as we continue to watch, that state of peace falls away, as it will with time. And there can be a strong reaction to that loss, even greater than if our savings account had dropped or somebody had put a dent in our new car. It can be much more alarming.

So even in retreat, we go through the same kind of cycle of wanting, of holding, and suffering when they disappear as we do with events in daily life.

There was a fascinating article a little over a year ago in the New York Times that reported on research being done at Harvard and other universities by psychologists. The title of the article—you'll appreciate this—was "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness." The researchers looked at what happened when we got the things we want in life and what happened when we got the things we didn't want in life, tracking people's experience over time.

The basic conclusion is that we are not very good at predicting whether things are going to make us happy or for how long they're going to make us happy. They examined many different cases—things like a new car, a new job, the right relationship, winning the lottery, becoming wealthy—all those things we want in the outer world, and tracked people's happiness quotient over time.

They found, as we might expect, that getting a new BMW brought a temporary spike in happiness, but not as much as people had expected. And that happiness tended to decay, disappearing more quickly than people had anticipated. So the basic lesson is that the good things that happened in the outer realm didn't make people as happy as they thought they would, or for as long as they thought they would.

They also looked at the difficulties—loss of job, loss of relationship, loss of loved ones through death. And they found the same kind of effect: these losses and disappointments made people unhappy, but not to the degree they'd thought, not as unhappy as they'd expected. People proved resilient, coming back from these losses faster than they'd anticipated.

In other words, we don't know as humans how to predict impermanence in our lives, how to account for it, or what its effect on us is going to be. What was interesting is that the main researcher, Daniel Gilbert from Harvard, was ambivalent about his own conclusions. They basically point out that we make too much drama about everything. As Sally was saying last night, we think we're going to get really high about the ups and really crash with the lows. And it doesn't happen as much as we think.

This researcher said: "Hope and fear are enduring features of the human experience, and it is unlikely that people are going to abandon them anytime soon just because some psychologist tells them they should." The Buddha actually told people to abandon hope and fear and that it was a pretty good thing, but the psychologist was mixed in his message. He continued: "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations. I don't think I want to learn too much from my research in that sense."

This is the bias of the ego—it doesn't want to see the effect of change, wants to hold onto the prospect of lasting happiness. And with that comes the converse: the fear of lasting unhappiness. Because of course, where this study points is toward putting our trust in equanimity—that we're going to be okay through all the ups and downs, that they're not going to affect us as much as we think, that we're going to smoothly sail through those difficulties in some way.

I think it's really interesting to look at this in retreat life as well. We go through the same ups and downs—the development of peace and finding that relative freedom, the ease of concentration and relaxation. And then what happens when we lose it? We often go through a strong reaction to that loss.

Often when concentration goes, it's accompanied by a surge of hindrances—a storm of emotions, agitation, lots of thought energy, lots of agitation in the body. This itself is somewhat unpleasant. But what's even worse are the conclusions we draw from it. I don't know if you've had enough days yet to start going through this cycle, but usually when we hit that downslope, we get really worried: "I've lost it."

I was just getting settled into the meditation. I was just learning how to do it. I had that sitting that was really still and now it's gone. Where is it? What did I do wrong? Am I not a good meditator anymore? How am I going to get it back? Is it ever going to come back? I'm never going to get it back. The rest of the retreat is going to be full of hindrances and agitation. I've really blown it. I may as well leave now. It's never going to come together again.

So in this moment of difficulty, what we can tend really easily to do is take a moment of experience that we find unpleasant—in this case—and project it forever into the future. The whole two months is going to be like this, or the whole month is going to be like this.

I remember when I was a kid, I had measles when I was five years old. I was laid up in bed for a few days, and my mother would bring me the only food I wanted to eat, which was boiled hot dogs with a dab of ketchup. It was my diet to get through the measles for some reason. But I remember she'd also bring a mirror so I could see how my recovery was going. Basically what I remember is that it wasn't going. I'd look at my face in the mirror every day and I'd see the same number of red spots on my face. I was totally convinced they were never going to go away. I knew that those red spots were going to be with me the rest of my life, however long that was.

I still bring the same attitude into my meditation. I saw it recently when I went to Burma. I mentioned the other night that I got to go this past summer and ordained for six weeks. I ordained with a very wonderful monk, a Burmese teacher named Paok Sayadaw. I hope he might be able to come during our retreat and talk to us. I've invited him because he's going to be in Northern California in late February, and I hope he'll be able to come here. He's seventy years old. He's been in robes since he was ten. He's a really kind-hearted man with a lot of loving-kindness and very deep practice, as you can imagine for somebody who spent the last sixty years sitting mostly in remote places.

So I went because I wanted to learn a special style of practice that he teaches on the breath. He teaches a very focused and potentially deep style of concentration practice. I wasn't able to get anywhere near the depth that he was capable of teaching, but nonetheless, I found it very helpful for my concentration and my practice.

But I made one mistake in going to Burma. I arrived at the height of the monsoon. I knew I was going into a rains retreat. Sylvia talked about how February is often our rains retreat. I knew it was a rains retreat, but I've been through a number of rains in Asia, and normally they don't bother me. Sunny in the morning, two inches of rain in the afternoon, and it clears up again. That I don't mind.

But when I got to the monastery, it rained for about the next three weeks solid. So I watched the white mold grow on my belt and my leather suitcase handles, and I smelled the smell of that mildew arising in my hut every day a little stronger. I noticed how it took three days for my robes to dry when I needed to wash them out. And I'm a kind of California guy at this point and I love the sunshine. So I found the atmosphere very gloomy. It was just really difficult for me to adjust to the rain. I got very low.

And at the same time, I was adjusting to being in the robes. I came to the monastery on Tuesday afternoon after a ten-hour bus ride that covered two hundred miles. If you can imagine that, it was brutal. Came to the monastery about six p.m. and was ordained by one p.m. the next day. And adjusting to the climate, the diet, the robes, the teacher and the new practice and the new place all at once while it was raining nonstop.

So I got kind of low in those first few weeks. It was a little more than I had bargained for. And I was convinced that it was going to be like that for the whole six weeks I was there. I was convinced it was going to keep raining.

I was never going to see the sun again. I was going to stay in this depressive mood the whole time, and nothing was going to change. I really believed it without examining it. Six weeks is a long time. If you're here for a month, that can feel like a long time. And two months can feel like forever. Once you get into retreat, it's hard to see beyond the end of two months. So six weeks felt like almost forever. I couldn't see beyond the end of it.

At one point when I was feeling really low, I had a photograph with me of the Dalai Lama—a photo I keep on my altar that Sally gave me, with a very compassionate look on his face. So I turned to the Dalai Lama and said, "Your Holiness, do you have any advice for me? I could really use some good advice."

Immediately came his reply in his accented English, his sort of Indian English. He said, "Yes. Stay optimistic and cheerful and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." And that was all he had to say. A positive attitude is the best support.

So I really tried to work with those teachings. It's possible to put yourself in that optimistic and confident frame of mind at times. Then there were other times when it was not possible to put myself in that optimistic and cheerful frame of mind, and I just had to go through it.

That was almost the most interesting part—going through the difficult time when I didn't feel optimistic or cheerful or confident. Because I had to find out that I could bear those feelings too. That I could bear feeling low and not even imagining a light at the end of that tunnel. And I could keep doing my practice and keep showing up for my meals and interviews and keep putting one foot in front of another in my walking and just bear it.

What grows as I did that—what grew for me and I know what grows for you—is faith. The quality that James talked about the other night as the first of the five spiritual faculties is this quality of faith or trust or confidence that we can weather those storms too. However dark it looks, we can bear it. And then the miracle of impermanence is that it always turns around. If you keep looking, if you keep practicing, if you keep noticing the breath, noticing your step, opening to what is in each moment, those storms always pass in meditation.

So I found that. I found that equanimity could grow, that I could be in that low place and bear it, and also that it would turn around. And then the next time, the sun came out for a while, my spirits lifted, the practice got much easier. You notice that? The practice gets easier when the sun is out. We've been so lucky at the start of this retreat. I keep telling myself, "It's not going to last. It's not going to last. It's not going to last," but I really enjoy it while it's here.

And then the rains would come again, and I'd feel low again. But this time I had more equanimity. I knew that I could come through and come out the other side.

So we learn this trust in impermanence—that our current state, whatever it is, however you want to describe it, isn't going to be with us forever. In fact, that's really why it's safe to open to the emotions. When Howie talked about the hindrances we encounter on retreat and the next morning encouraged us to really feel into them, that is a safe practice.

It doesn't feel that way at first. Sometimes on retreat the strongest and most intense parts of our psyche come forward and we find ourselves in some intense state of fear or sadness or anger or longing. We don't feel we can trust it at first. We don't feel we necessarily have the courage to go into it. But as we start to trust and start to open, we find that it's okay because when we do, they all will also pass.

At first, we fight with them. It's like, "How can I get rid of this thing the quickest possible?" Because we really don't want to feel them. But we see something really interesting, and this is kind of a judo move—that when we resist something, that emotion, we strengthen it. The force of our resistance goes directly into the strength of the emotion and actually sustains it. As long as it comes and we're resisting, pushing against, not wanting, hoping it will go away, bargaining with it, strategizing how to get rid of it, we're actually clinging to it. We've taken hold of it to make it go away, and that will sustain it.

So the judo move is we open with acceptance, and we find then you don't have to do anything to make it go. Its nature is to go. Its nature is to come and its nature is also to go. All you have to do is feel it and then watch it come, watch it go.

The same thing, of course, is true for all the beautiful states that come. The first time I experienced a lot of happiness on retreat, I thought, "Wow, it's going to be so much fun to live my life from this place." I thought of all the people I wanted to talk to and all the things I wanted to do when I was so joyful. And of course, it took about one day before that also evaporated. The energy of that flowered and then passed away.

This is from Rilke. It's a book I really love of his poems called The Book of Hours, subtitled in this translation "Love Poems to God." What's beautiful about this translation is it's done by two Buddhists—Anita Barrows and Joanna Macy—so it feels like it's in the family.

This poem is set imagining that as we are created, each of us is given a little pep talk by God before being launched into life. So this is the conversation God has with us before we're sent into existence:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Now give me your hand.

"Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. No feeling is final. Just keep going." This is the safety of seeing impermanence—how all these things are just visitors to us.

One of the other ways we frequently experience impermanence in a human lifespan is through the phenomenon of aging. It really started to hit me in my early twenties when I looked back at the changes in my body and mind over my late teenage years. I realized this was going on in me, completely out of my control—the body was just doing its thing, whatever process it was. I was acutely aware of my parents, who were then about my current age, being in the same process, but for them it meant their death was closer. So it was very poignant to me.

But sometimes the aging process is beautiful. Howie was saying it's really hard for him now to go away and teach because he has a seventeen-month-old daughter. What's so wrenching, he said, is being away from her. She just happens to be, as her parents will confess, the smartest and most beautiful child in the world—there's a special catch in this case. But what's hard about leaving is that she changes so fast. That miracle of growth and aging and growing up is happening in her so clearly, and he doesn't want to miss a single day of the change.

But then, as we get older, the news of aging is not quite as cheery on first glance. Although actually, there is a lot of beauty in getting older, as I know many of you know. I have a friend who's in her mid to late seventies who tells me she's never been as happy as she is now. This is basically my experience also in my mid-fifties—I get happier every decade. I didn't expect that when I was younger, but I think it's really true for many of us in aging. It's a great gift.

But physically, it's a different story. Perhaps we once looked beautiful or handsome, and that's simply not happening anymore. I had a friend who was losing his hair—he's quite bald now. He said it was really difficult when he washed his face because when he got to his forehead, he didn't know where to stop.

When I was about thirty-five, I started getting gray hair. It came on quite quickly, actually. At one point, Sally and I were at a dharma talk in England. We'd been chatting, I got up and walked away, and somebody said to her, "Who was that man?" She said,

"What man are you talking about?" He said, "That man sitting next to you, that middle-aged man." I was thirty-five. She had the kindness to tell me this story—which I've used many times since—so that I could work with my self-image. I thought, well, thirty-five could be halfway to seventy. I could be gone by seventy. I guess that's middle age. Dealing with aging early on.

One thing many of us complain about as we get older is losing our memory. I see this happening too. Things aren't as easy to bring to mind—words, telephone numbers, people's names, directions. They don't come as quickly as they used to. Most of us bewail this and complain to each other about it. But I have one friend who's actually a dharma teacher who just laughs about it. He said, "Yeah, I can't remember anything anymore, but you know what? It makes life so much simpler." I really appreciate that spirit.

Then practice brings its own changes. We come into practice with one idea of ourselves, one image of our personality or who we are. As we open, that changes. I spoke a little about this the first night, and Sylvia touched on it in her talk on the Four Noble Truths—how as we open to the suffering we encounter, there's an unlayering process that happens. We contact these old habit patterns of personality, patterns of mind and heart, and as we touch them and bring them into awareness, we have the possibility to release them.

When that happens, experientially it feels like there's much more space in the mind, and the body relaxes to a deeper level. In many ways, I think it's fair to say that the whole of our dharma practice is about unlayering this old holding—the accumulation of many years of hurt, emotion, patterns, holding in the muscles, different emotions and tensions, memories. Some would say it goes back not just one lifetime but many lifetimes, the karmic accumulations of perhaps lifetimes of living.

As these things come up to be experienced, they are not easy. When we talk about the hindrances that arise in practice, it's helpful to remember this is an integral part of what we're doing here. It's not accidental. It doesn't mean we've gone off track, that we're doing anything wrong, that we're sloppy meditators, that there's something wrong with us for having hindrances. This is the inevitable uncovering and shedding of old habits and old accumulations. It's really clearing the way for new life, new perspective, for the heart of metta and compassion and clarity and wisdom to be born. This is a beautiful part of the process.

But in the middle of it, it can seem relentless. One teacher described spiritual practice as a relentless process of letting go—letting go, letting go. We're called to do this over and over again at deeper and deeper levels of ourselves. When we see that we're letting go of the past, we're letting go of who we used to be, letting go of memories, definitions, self-image. In a way, then we understand what Krishnamurti meant when he said that living rightly is dying. Living is dying.

As we let go of the accumulation of the past, that stuff can be truly gone. But its gone-ness, its total gone-ness, can open the way for a really new and fresh experience of life.

Of course, death isn't just happening in spiritual terms around us. There's an interesting passage from the Mahabharata, an Indian epic, where a wise person is asked, "What's the most miraculous thing on this earth?"

And the wise person replies, "The most miraculous thing is that all of us humans see death happening all around us and don't believe it will happen to us."

This is another aspect of the ego's bias—not wanting to see that death has personal implications. It's a powerful reminder of impermanence, maybe the most powerful. Freud believed that our whole human neurosis was built out of our refusal to acknowledge our own death, to really get deeply the fact that we will die at some point.

So calling this truth to mind is classically, in the Buddhist tradition, a very powerful motivation for spiritual practice. It was one of the Buddha's heavenly messengers, as James mentioned the other night. The Buddha saw a corpse and was awakened to that reality. As he reflected on it later, he said this: "An uninstructed person seeing a corpse feels repelled and disgusted, but I reflected that I too will die and come to be a corpse someday. So it is not befitting for me to be repelled and disgusted by a corpse. Seeing this, the pride I took in life entirely vanished." He said the same thing in relation to aging and to illness—that he lost the pride of youth and he lost the pride of health.

There's a little bit of the teaching that Sally was pointing to in describing the exhibited body worlds—some of the message that can come from seeing corpses standing next to a human body that used to be alive.

Carlos Castaneda was once asked in a kind of social dinner club setting, "How can I bring more spirituality into my life? I'm looking for something kind of uplifting and pleasant." And he said, "As you go through your day, reflect that every person you meet that day will be dead in 100 years or less. That will turn you onto a spiritual track very quickly."

We usually feel death as a threat. In some ways it's the ultimate threat to the ego—the end of ego, the end of what we take ourselves to be. But actually the Buddha said that we don't have to fear death. It's not necessary to fear death. He said a person fears death under certain conditions: if we're greatly attached to sense pleasures, greatly attached to this body, if we've done harmful things in our life and we've neglected to do helpful things in the area of morality and generosity, and if one does not have faith in the Dhamma, in the teachings or in the truth.

He said, but on the other hand, one who fulfills these four conditions doesn't fear death: one who is not greatly attached to sense pleasures, not greatly attached to the body, who has not done great harm, has done good things, and has faith in the Dhamma. Well, it's still a high bar. It's not going to be easy to reach, but it's possible. That might be humanly possible—not to fear death. That would be amazing.

So the Buddha recommended, because we have this built-in block to seeing the truth of death, to reflect on it daily. He recommended five daily reflections along these lines. I'll just read them and let you take them in:

I am of the nature to grow old. I have not gone beyond aging.
I am of the nature to become sick. I have not gone beyond illness.
I am of the nature to die. I have not gone beyond death.
At death, I will be separated from all that is dear and beloved to me.
I am the owner of my actions—my karma. All that I do, for good or for ill, of that I will be the heir.

So these are a number of ways that in our daily life, as we move through the month or two months of the retreat, we can touch on the truth of impermanence: that states come and go, that we have the equanimity to weather them, that nothing in the emotional realm will last, to reflect on our own passing, to reflect on the process of aging.

The Buddha said, "When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all ignorance and it eliminates the conceit 'I am'—the false belief in self." So this is powerful medicine: eliminating ignorance, eliminating the conceit "I am."

But there's another layer, another level to see impermanence at that's not just part of daily reflection or daily life, that really requires the development of meditative insight that, as far as I know, is not accessible any other way. My feeling is that as we reflect on the aspects of impermanence as it plays out over a human life, it will penetrate to a certain depth in our understanding of life, our relation to life. But I'm not sure that it always gets deeply into the marrow.

As the Buddha enunciated the fullness of developing the perception of impermanence, he also added some other pieces to what that perception involves. And that's what I want to talk about now.

As the attention collects through mindfulness—just through paying attention to what is in the present moment—and the mind gets steady in the quality of concentration, we start to have the mental power to see the world, to see our experience of the world in a new way, a way that we probably haven't seen before.

The fact is that impermanence is taking place in a much more rapid way than we normally think of it as. You probably know the teaching of quantum mechanics, where the scientists understood that matter is not solid, but composed of protons, neutrons, and electrons, which are all in the constant process of flux, actually appearing and disappearing and reappearing.

That an electron is not a solid particle whose position can be found, but rather its relationship to the atom is more like a smear of charge or a probability graph of where it might be. You can't get a hold of an electron. So the scientists found this out, but they didn't integrate it into their understanding. Most scientists still run around thinking the world is just as solid as before.

Through Dharma practice, we can really touch the truth of that lack of solidity.

A few of us went down a couple of years ago to hear teachings from the Dalai Lama. He was teaching at Shoreline Amphitheater in Mountain View, south of San Francisco. It was a really beautiful setting. He was up on a high throne on the stage, and he talked about that throne. He said, "It's not about being a big person. It's about delivering high teachings," which was sweet. It wasn't personal, this throne business.

Behind him, where the speaker set would have been for the Grateful Dead—those floor-to-ceiling racks of speakers—was instead a canvas with a painting of the Potala, the palace in Lhasa where the Dalai Lama used to live, where he grew up, which was considered his personal residence, a thousand-room palace. It was painted at twilight, as sunset colors were reflecting on the windows, with a kind of mauve tone to it. It was beautiful.

On the left of the stage were maybe eighty Tibetan monks, all in their bright red robes. On the right side of the stage were Tibetan nuns, Theravadan monks in their brown robes, Theravadan nuns, Vietnamese Zen monks and nuns. The whole stage was full of Buddhist monastics.

He was teaching on emptiness and the Heart Sutra, which I find really inspiring. In this teaching on emptiness, he said that if you really want to understand how people are caught—because you want to help them come out of suffering—you need to understand all the ways that they're caught. He said one of the ways is in not seeing impermanence clearly.

He said, "Don't imagine that it's just that something goes along that people are holding on to, that we're holding on to something. It goes along and it's really stable and then all of a sudden it changes and goes away. It's not like that." He said, "Things are dissolving all along the way. Constant state of flux. They were never solid in the first place."

Our meditation can bring us into that level of seeing.

I can just invite you right now: take a look at the sensations in your body, wherever you feel sensations in your body. Maybe the touch point, the contact of the sitting bones with the cushion. Is there something solid there? Or can you feel that changing? Can you feel the fluctuations of the pulsation, the vibration of the current of energy arising at your sitting bones?

As your hands are coming into contact with your body or with each other, is that a solid sensation or is it changing a little bit in each moment? Can you feel the pulse and the vibration, the kind of on-off quality of that?

As we tune into these subtle sensations of the body, we discover there's nothing solid in it. And similarly, we can investigate all the other domains of the senses. Sounds which come and go, smells which are so ethereal, tastes which are so transitory. Sight is the hardest—that takes a little more reflection. We'll talk about that another time. Emotions, none of them lasting. Thoughts, just momentary.

By paying close attention, we refine our seeing that this transitory nature of every aspect of experience is inescapable. We just turn the attention there and we see the change. This requires a certain degree of presence and a certain base of concentration before it becomes so obvious.

This is the beauty of paying that detailed attention because we start to see that there is nothing solid in the whole of physical nature. There is nothing solid in the whole of mental phenomena. That we get in our marrow because we've seen it directly for ourselves. There's no point in holding when we see the dissolving happening in each moment that we turn and look.

In fact, in a way, we come to find out there was never an object there in the first place. There are no objects. There is only this transitory process of momentary phenomena arising and passing at the five physical senses and at the sense door of the mind.

Our concepts make them stable. We give concepts like woman and man and chair and floor and wall and sky and tree and earth. But when we look at each of those concepts, we see the concept is stable, and that misleads us into thinking the world is stable, but it's not. When we look underneath the concept to our actual experience, we find nothing is stable.

Everything is in the moment-to-moment process of change, of coming into existence and passing out, coming into existence and passing out.

This is from Rumi: "Think of how phenomena come trooping out of the desert of non-existence into this materiality. Morning and night, they arrive in a long line and take over from each other, saying, 'It's my turn now, get out.' This place of phenomena is a wide exchange of highways with everything going all sorts of different ways. We seem to be sitting still, but we're actually moving. And the fantasies of phenomena are sliding through us like ideas through curtains. Nothing is fixed. We're so much lighter than we think we are."

As we open up this meditative eye, the Dhamma vision, we start to see that the world isn't the way we took it to be. It's always just coming, going, coming, going, coming and going. It's more like a verb than a noun. And when you see it as a verb, you know you can't hold on. You can't hold on to action. It's changing too quickly.

Then the process of meditation becomes that of just settling back and knowing this changing flow of phenomena, knowing the changing stream with less and less inclination to grasp, because we see there is nothing that can be held onto. And as we rest more and more, this equanimity develops of it being okay that it's like this, of a sense of resting as the stream is going, a sense of deep peace, of coming into harmony with the way things truly are, not denying change, but also not being confused or entangled in it through clinging.

It's from this deep kind of peace that there's the possibility then of opening to what is not affected by change, to opening to what's beyond change—the unconditioned, nibbana, that which has been here from the beginning, is present now, will ever be here in the future.

This is also from Rumi: "Be with those who mix with God as honey blends with milk and say, 'Anything that comes and goes, rises and sets, is not what I love most. Live in the one who created the prophets.'" This is Buddha nature. Live in the one who created the Buddha, if you like. "Otherwise, you'll be like a fire left from a caravan, burning out alone beside the road."

So the Tibetans say about practice, our Dharma practice: In the beginning, nothing comes. All the teaching seems so remote and theoretical, and these beautiful states of wisdom and clarity and peace and metta seem so remote, so difficult. In the beginning, nothing comes.

In the middle, nothing stays. There's just the shifting nature of phenomena arising and passing, arising and passing very, very rapidly at times. But this is also just a stage.

Because in the end, nothing goes. Nothing goes. Everything has its existence within this background of peace, the unchanging nature of the unconditioned, the great space of equanimity and awareness in which, as one Zen scripture says, nothing is lacking and nothing is in excess.

Let's just sit for a minute. In the beginning nothing comes, in the middle nothing stays, and in the end nothing goes.

Mettā: Its Near & Far Enemies

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this comprehensive exploration of mettā (loving-kindness) practice, Guy Armstrong draws from both personal experience and Buddhist psychology to illuminate the obstacles that prevent the heart from opening fully. He examines the 'near enemy' of mettā—attachment disguised as love—and the 'far enemy' of aversion, including anger, fear, and self-judgment that commonly arise during practice.
> Armstrong offers practical guidance for working with the four brahmaviharas (divine abodes): mettā, karuṇā (compassion), muditā (sympathetic joy), and upekkhā (equanimity). He provides detailed instructions for deepening loving-kindness meditation through a four-step process: connecting with the recipient, feeling genuine care, sending the phrase with that feeling, and resting in the heart center.
>
> The talk addresses common challenges Western practitioners face, including self-criticism and 'wounded love,' while offering skillful means for transforming difficult emotions through compassion practice and mindfulness. Drawing wisdom from teachers like Nisargadatta Maharaj and the Dalai Lama, Armstrong demonstrates how sincere intention plants seeds of wholesomeness that naturally develop into boundless love and wisdom when supported by non-attachment.

The subject of tonight's talk is metta and its near and far enemies.

I grew up in the center of the country, in a little town called Webster Groves, Missouri, which is a suburb of St. Louis. It's so middle America that the year after I graduated from high school, NBC came into town and made a documentary called "16 in Webster Groves" to show what was happening in middle America. That's how quintessentially suburban it was.

But curiously enough, at the age of 16, in Webster Groves, I bought my first book on Buddhism. This was 1964, not a time when there were many books on Buddhism available. I have no idea why I bought it. Looking back, I have no idea why. But going through my bookshelf tonight, I found it, and it brought back some memories. It's called The Way of Zen by Alan Watts, with a printing date of 1962, though I bought it in 1964. It's been with me all these years.

This was the first book that awakened me to a different possibility of looking at life than the Christian mythology I'd been brought up with, which didn't settle very well with me. I actually became an agnostic also at age 16, reading Mark Twain's Letters from the Earth. So this was quite a revelation to me.

Thinking back about my interest in Buddhism, I got into extensive reading in college. I wasn't majoring in religious studies at all, but I became interested and read the books I could find, which then were largely about Zen—Watts and D.T. Suzuki. I was really inspired by the descriptions of the Buddha's peace and that unshakable calm, and especially how he had gone beyond the fear of dying. I thought it was so amazing that it was possible for a human being not to be afraid of death, because it seemed so scary to me at the time. So I was very inspired by all that.

But when I actually think about the fuel for my spiritual journey, it came from a somewhat different direction. In my late teens and early twenties, I started to open up to some very strong experiences of love. They came into my consciousness with a mystical flavor because there was a strong feeling of oneness connected with them. This could happen through interacting with people, through being in nature, or through exposure to art or music. But this whole new way of relating to the world started to dawn on me about that time.

The thing that was difficult was that those experiences weren't at all stable for me. I would sometimes enter them and they'd be wonderful, then I'd come out and have no idea why they'd happened or how to make them happen again or why they went away. When they were there, they were so fulfilling that the rest of my life seemed shallow by comparison. Then they started to come less and less frequently, and it produced a lot of despair in me because I'd seen what I really wanted in life—what was really satisfying—and it was slipping away.

So I really think, as I look back on my motivation for this path, it was to rediscover that access to love. That's what's been guiding me all along. Rumi puts it this way: "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." I didn't want to walk a road where nothing lived. I really wanted that to be alive for me.

But what I didn't understand is that openness to love and the heart space couldn't survive without the support of wisdom. In the Buddhist tradition, this wisdom is particularly about non-identification with self and non-clinging—not holding onto anything. When the mind is in a state of not holding to anything in the world, then it has the steadiness and the openness to touch that which is greater than our individual personality. This took me a long time to understand: that love had to be supported with wisdom or it couldn't be stable.

One of my favorite dharma writers—really speakers, but I know him through transcriptions of his talks—is a Vedanta teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj who wrote a book called I Am That, which I highly recommend if you haven't encountered it. Ajahn Sumedho, who was just here, was also really influenced by that book and says he considers Advaita another branch of Buddhism. I kind of like that thought too.

Maharaj put it this way: "Love tells me I am everything. Wisdom tells me I am nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows." There we have that fullness in the union of love, and we have the emptiness of non-attachment, of not-self. The two of them together make up the fullness of spiritual life.

In our tradition, vipassana is the doorway to that non-clinging, the non-attachment, the doorway to emptiness, releasing the mind from all its holding, all its burdens, all its clinging. But the counterpart for us is that metta practice is our avenue to that openness of heart and the doorway to love and feelings of union.

Now, I find it quite interesting that the Buddha talked about it as a feeling between beings. Metta or loving-kindness is always described as our approach to other people or other beings. The deer, the lizards, the bluebirds are also included in that feeling of metta.

So I think this is a very interesting skillful means. Why? Because people are always available. We are social beings. We all know people. We all have experienced love with people. So that channel is there for everyone. Not everyone lives close to nature. Not everyone is in touch with beautiful art, transformative art or music. But everyone is in touch with the love of human beings.

So I believe the Buddha chose this path as a way to open the heart. But as it gets open through this human dimension, it also is transformed and opens in that way to the whole world. So I feel that this quality of loving-kindness toward others is just a pathway to this general state of love, this deep part of our nature.

It's extraordinary when you meet somebody who's developed that quality so highly. And for me, the Dalai Lama always exemplifies that capability. He was here in this room, I think it was three years ago. We had a meeting with about 200 Buddhist teachers, mostly Western, but also Asian teachers who are teaching in the West today. And he spent a couple of days with us and engaged in dialogue and was just his natural, amazing self.

One of the things he said at that meeting is, "I'm not interested in propagating Buddhism. I'm interested in propagating human values." And this is really the way I think he approaches everyone he meets. He believes regardless of religion, the human values of care and kindness can transform the world and take away the suffering that we cause one another.

So it was interesting to see his effect on the security guards who were here. Because he's a head of state in exile, the U.S. State Department has to provide security for him when he travels in this country. Every morning, the buildings, the residence halls, had to be vacated. Teachers were staying in them. They had to go out and come back in through metal detectors. Because, you know, we are dangerous people. We often pack guns and explosives.

So they had to check us out, and we all walked through these metal detectors that were staffed by the State Department security guards. These people are another level up from the Transportation Security Administration, whoever it is that you run into at airports. These were heavy-duty guys. They'd have a nightstick on one hip and a pistol on the other and a walkie-talkie radio on their back, and you didn't mess with them. They'd been providing security for Yasser Arafat and Golda Meir and people like that. So you didn't mess with these guys.

But at the end of the two days of the conference, they all asked if they could have their picture taken with the Dalai Lama. And of course he obliged. So somewhere there's this photo of the Dalai Lama and these about eight security guards in their white tops and their nightsticks and pistols. It's quite beautiful how he just reaches out and touches, makes that human connection with people.

So overall, the four Brahmaviharas really give us a complete way to address one another, address the situation in our own life from the heart's point of view, and the good and bad fortune that we meet in life. In our tradition, we use metta as the foundation. Metta is that general openness of the heart that just looks at another and wants for their well-being. It's just sort of looking in another's eyes and going, "I hope you're happy. I hope you're well." So recognizing there's a consciousness in there that feels pleasure and feels pain and sort of going, "I hope things are going well in there for you." That's the foundation.

Now in the Tibetan tradition, you'll hear compassion talked about as the foundation, but don't think that these two are too far apart. I hope you got that sense today as James led the meditation in compassion. The Dalai Lama says compassion is just basic human warmth. That's the same thing we could say about metta, basic human warmth.

So when this basic human warmth turns to somebody who's in suffering, the flavor that comes through is compassion. And when it just rests with a general condition, not knowing if you're happy or unhappy, the flavor is metta. If it finds there's unhappiness, it gets just transformed. It just changes flavor into compassion. So that's the open heart that touches suffering. On the other hand, if someone is happy, then the open heart responds with its own happiness. There's a joy when somebody else is also happy.

Somebody else's happiness, if our heart is open, lights us up too. We just resonate. That's why it's sometimes called sympathetic joy.

And then the fourth of the Brahma Viharas is equanimity. That's what gives the mind the steadiness not to be so moved by the changing conditions of life. We'll talk a little more about this later. But if we fixate on the result of the phrase—we say "may you be happy" to the benefactor, but the benefactor isn't happy—we could feel like, oh, it's not working or I failed. The equanimity lets us support the loving kindness by saying, "that's okay. Everything changes. People go through ups and downs. My mind can still be balanced even if there's unhappiness there."

So these four together give us a way to meet the joys and sorrows of our life and of the lives of other people.

So what supports the development of this open heart? What leads us into this quality of love that's an integral part of our human nature?

It's funny how many analogies there are in spiritual life to gardening. I bet a lot of you have reflected on this. When Sally and I first got together—it was twenty years ago, a little over twenty years ago in England—we were living in this Dharma community which we had started up at the invitation of this very rich philanthropist who was living in Devon. He offered us the top floor of his house, which was this incredible Georgian mansion that was perched up on a hill that overlooked agricultural land—just open rolling green hills around a broad U-bend of the River Dart, about five miles above Dartmouth where it flowed into the English Channel. It was just an incredible spot.

But we'd both been Dharma bums for a few years at that time, and we had no money. We weren't going to get rich living there because to support ourselves in this community, we worked as this philanthropist's gardeners. And he paid us the princely sum of one pound eighty an hour to grow his vegetables and tend the other gardens. So there we were making about twenty-five pounds a week. What's that? Probably about forty dollars a week. That was our wage and we got free rent.

But we were in this Dharma community and we were doing a lot of gardening, and I just kept thinking all the time: this is just like Dharma practice. You cultivate the good soil, you put good compost in, you make it rich with these beautiful qualities, you pull out the weeds, you uproot what's unwholesome, you tend it every day, you take care of it with love, you're very attentive.

So our metta practice is also like a gardening exercise. What we're doing in saying these phrases is really planting seeds in every moment. And the seed that we're planting is a wholesome intention. We can't change the heart overnight, but we can change it one moment at a time by planting these little seeds again and again in it.

Really, the essence of the practice that we're doing is the sincerity that you bring to that wish. Every time you wish "may you be safe, may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you be at ease," the sincerity that you put in that wish is the seed of that wholesome intention. It's your ability to care just in that moment that starts to change the heart.

This is interesting. I think it's a very modest approach. We start with what's real, what's accessible, what we can actually influence just in one moment. And just in that moment, we turn the heart to caring. That's the essence of metta—the spirit of caring. And when we do that over and over and over, little by little we change the direction of the heart.

Somebody mentioned today that when they came and sat down, they started to see how the mind was filled with critical thoughts. And it would run in those tracks. They said, "Oh, that's a habitual tendency of mine to run in critical thinking." But every period that went by, they saw how the metta was starting to just turn that a little bit in a different direction. And that's what these little seeds of intention do. They're not dramatic, but they start to make a shift in the stream of our conditioning.

We can't determine when these little seeds are going to sprout into a big plant—the big plant of strong love or sense of union or anything like that. But we know that that's the direction that they're heading in. And just like if you are planting tomatoes for your summer garden, you put the seed in the right kind of soil at the right kind of depth, and you give it the right kind of sunlight and the right kind of watering—that's all you can do. You can't tell that tomato plant when to come up from the earth.

In fact, if you try to pull it, you break it. And so just like with metta, if you try to force any feeling to be strong, you'll break it. Too much pressure. The heart doesn't respond very well to being squeezed.

But if you just trust it, because this process is just as natural as the sunlight and the rain falling on the seed that's in the right kind of soil, the heart will start to open from these seeds because these are good seeds. You just don't get bad plants from good seeds if the conditions are there. So we learn to trust.

We just have this faith that by coming back to this caring—I hope you're well, I hope you're happy—again and again, the seeds are being planted and they will grow up in time. Nature will determine when. But that's all we have to do. As gardeners, all we have to do is plant the seeds. The Dharma takes care of the rest.

So don't worry if it's not there immediately. Don't worry if it feels like nothing's happening for a while. Just keep trusting in nature and know that the seeds are ripe.

The essence of metta is meaning it—meaning that I hope you're well, meaning that I hope you're healthy and are at ease. If we say the phrase like a mantra, just letting the words go by, it doesn't do it. It's not just the words, it's our giving the words that meaning that makes the practice work.

In a way, if you take a look at what's really happening in a moment where you say the phrase and you mean it, you are being metta in that moment. And you've kind of pulled that, just a little bit of metta, out of nowhere. How did you know how to do that? There's no technique that can make you sincere. But if you find in yourself that sincerity, that's how you strengthen that quality.

This is a general principle in Buddhist practice. If you want to develop any quality of heart and mind in the teachings of the Buddha, you do it not by starting out over here somewhere else. You do it by just putting yourself in that mind state. So if you want to develop the quality of metta, you locate that within yourself. Oh, all I have to do is care. Then I've got the feeling of metta here and now. If you want to develop the quality of compassion, you look on suffering and you just care.

I don't know where that comes from. I mean, I could tell you a word. It comes from your Buddha nature. But that doesn't necessarily mean anything. I could just say it comes from fairyland or neverland. Doesn't really matter. But what's important is that you know that it's there and you start to get better and better at calling it out when you want to.

In vipassana, the equivalent to this is our mindfulness practice. We develop this faculty of learning to pay attention and see clearly in each new moment. And as we do that, it gets easier and easier to see clearly in each new moment.

The practice, as it's said in the tradition, these practices are onward leading. It's not just that there's something beautiful happening in the moment, though there is. That sincere caring is really a beautiful quality. That clear attention is a beautiful quality. But it's also an onward leading quality, which means that as we give ourselves to it again and again, it builds a momentum in us. And at some point, the Buddha said that momentum is unstoppable. It's irreversible. It carries us to awakening. It carries us to liberation.

So really our work as practitioners is just to keep putting ourselves in those little slices of awakened mind and heart over and over and over. And that builds the momentum that takes us all the way to liberation.

The Buddha said, "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, 'This will come to nothing.' By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." So little by little, you're just putting those raindrops in the jar. And little by little, the jar fills up.

I want to talk a bit about how to use the technique of the metta practice to kind of draw out the spirit of caring. So I want to get a little bit technical about the instructions.

It's sort of a refinement of the instruction that I encourage you to play with if it appeals to you. It's not something anybody has to do—it's something I found helpful, and maybe you will too.

When I do the metta phrases in my own practice, I go through four steps with them. The first step is that I connect with the person I'm sending to. Let's say the benefactor. So I'll get a real sense of the benefactor. For me, it works well to do it with an image, so I'll see the image of the benefactor before I say a word. For you, the image may not work so well. So it could be saying the name or just remembering your time with them—whatever works to kind of bring the person alive.

Because there's a real difference between saying a phrase like "May you live with ease" just sort of into the ether as a general kind of wish of goodwill, and saying it really directly to somebody. Like I'm looking at Shelly and I think, "Shelly, I want you to be well." That's a really different flavor. So as you say your phrase to the benefactor, let the benefactor be there so you know it's really for them. So that's the first thing—connect with the person.

The second thing then is to take a moment in the silence to feel whatever you feel for them. And hopefully you care for them. You have affection for them. You like them. There's something sweet there about looking on them. So wordlessly, you just let yourself feel whatever you feel—affection, love, care, interest, concern, whatever it is—just feel that. That's the second step.

The third step then is to let the phrase go out to them carrying that thing that you feel, this expression of affection or care. So you have the sense that the phrase is emanating from you, going toward the person, and it's carrying that feeling that you felt the moment before. "May you be safe from harm."

Fourth step: come back and connect to the heart center. This is not an esoteric, mystical experience. This is just whatever you feel in the center of your chest. The area behind the breastbone. There is supposed to be a chakra there. Don't worry about the chakra—whether it's there or open or closed or filled with light or you're breathing through it. We're just talking about this area behind the breastbone in the center of the chest that we often call the heart center. Come back and rest there.

Feel the physical sensation and also feel whatever emotion you're feeling right then. Could be a feeling of metta. Could be a feeling of affection. Could be a feeling of frustration. Could be a feeling of resentment—you remembered something that the benefactor said that wasn't so helpful. Could be not very much feeling at all. There's no particular feeling there right now. That's fine too.

So we're touching into the feeling level, and the value of that is as the metta feelings grow, that's where you'll connect with them. And so you want to make the metta feeling, whether it's present or absent, not something you care too much about. But when it's present, that's where you want to feel it.

Also, you can take some time there to kind of rest. Sometimes people say, "Oh, this practice is too heady. There are too many words. My brain's getting clogged up. I want to just take a vipassana break." Anybody take a vipassana break today? You probably never wanted to practice vipassana so dearly as when the brain's clogged up with metta phrases.

So here's a way to take a few seconds of vipassana break. You come into the center of the chest, you feel the sensation, you feel the emotion, and you can just rest there for a second, two seconds, and in that, reconnect with the silence. This whole process of the four steps is held in this vast silence. And that's a way that the brain doesn't have to feel clogged up with all the words.

It's really a way to bring in some relief.

So just to review the four steps, if you want to play with it: connect with your person, feel that moment of whatever you feel for them, let the phrase go out to them expressing that feeling, and then come into the heart center and rest and feel whatever the echo of that phrase is, the effect is. This is the way we're actually shaping the heart.

Nisargadatta Maharaj had something to say about this too. He says, "Your own will is the backbone of your destiny." Will is a synonym for intention. It might even be the same word in Sanskrit. And the person he's in dialogue with, the questioner says, "Oh, surely karma has interfered with that." And Maharaj said, "Karma shapes the circumstances, but the attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character."

This is quite a revelation. We actually have the ability to shape our character. And the Brahmaviharas, as well as mindfulness, are a very strong way to do that.

So what obstructs the metta? Why is it with all our good intention—and I know all of you have had hundreds of these moments of good intention over the last couple of days—that our patterns are so difficult to dislodge? They're so tenacious. What are the patterns that block the unfolding of that caring heart?

With every Brahmavihara, James may have talked about this this afternoon, there are two qualities that are associated called the near and far enemy. The near enemy is the quality that looks like it, feels like it, smells like it, but isn't, and is actually kind of an unwholesome imposter masquerading as the true Brahmavihara. The far enemy is the opposite.

So with loving kindness, the opposite of love is hatred. So the far enemy is aversion. The near enemy is said to be affection that has attachment with it. So we see something beautiful. There's this quality like metta, which is kind of a union. There's a warm feeling of union with a person or a thing that's beautiful. But if there's clinging in the air, the clinging actually blocks the metta.

How can you tell which is there? This is an interesting thing to investigate. One of the ways we see this affection with attachment come in is in conditional love. And this may be in friendships, it may be in intimate relationships, but it's the attitude that wants something back from the person. There's an "I'll love you if you'll love me" condition on it.

With a benefactor, we might see this in relating to the benefactor if we feel, "Oh, I have a good connection with a benefactor, but somebody else is actually closer to them." If it's a teacher, you think, "Well, they've got a student they like better than they like me." Or if it's a parent, you think, "Yeah, but I wasn't the favorite daughter in the family." And any kind of that comparing nature will take away some of the openness that we come to the person with.

There's this tendency you hear again and again in pop music where this attached love comes through. The archetypal song in pop music love would go something like, "I want you, I need you, I love you, and I'll kill you if I can't have you." This killing part is not quite metta.

And it's also the reason that we often don't use the word love so often when we talk about metta, because in our culture it's gotten mixed up with this romantic love or this attached love.

So how do we tell the difference? When the attachment is there, one thing that happens is the metta isn't universal, but it's just extended to a few people. There are a few people who get within our circle of caring, and basically everybody else can drop dead because who cares? But metta has a universal flavor that it extends to all beings, to everyone.

The other piece is that if you look at this attached love closely and you see what's really going on, it's not so much concerned about the other's welfare, which really is what metta is about. It's more concerned about my welfare. So we often say in romantic love there's a strong element of narcissism in it, especially in the whole falling in love thing. What really is happening in falling in love is we love the feeling of love and the other person engenders that for us. But generally that's not an altruistic love. That's not a selfless kind of love. We're not in that intimate relationship to be a bodhisattva to our partner generally. We're in it because we're getting high from the experience, the initial experience in that rush of romantic love.

So I believe there is a lot of metta in romantic relationships, but just start to tune into the parts, the moments that come when the mind is not in a metta frame, but is more in a needing frame, a desiring frame.

The far enemy of loving kindness is aversion or disliking or negativity. This comes up a lot in doing metta practice.

If you've been noticing it over these couple of days, you might think something's gone wrong. You know, I came here to feel metta and all of a sudden I'm feeling sad or I'm feeling jealous or I'm feeling angry with people. "Wow, I've really missed the boat." Not at all.

It's as though when we turn our intention to caring and to love, then that brings out all the things that don't align with it. Someone said this in an interview yesterday or today, that just as I turn my wish to happiness for myself, what comes to my mind are all the ways I'm not happy. This is a natural part of the process, and it's actually a valuable part of the process. It is a difficult part, but it's really natural.

We begin the process with ourselves because in some way the self has to be the foundation for love for others. Again, this is from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "Of all the affections, the love of oneself comes first. Your love of the world is the reflection of your love of yourself. A yogi is a person whose goodwill is aligned with wisdom."

So we develop this love for ourselves first, but it doesn't necessarily flow that easily. And in fact, for most Westerners, I think it's the most difficult because it does bring up the ways that we don't feel quite happy or loving toward ourselves. It can bring up self-judgment, self-doubt, self-dislike, can bring up all the recollections of things we've done wrong.

The first time I did a long retreat, I was plagued by these memories of all the worst things that I'd done in my life. These visions just kept coming again and again. And I finally had to write them down to get them a little bit out of my head. And I made a list of the ten worst things I ever did.

One of them that really stuck—I can still feel it—was going on a trip with my father. My father was a great hunter and fisherman. He grew up in the outdoors from the time he was a kid and loved hunting and fishing. I think one of his great disappointments in me as a son is that I didn't connect to that. But I tried.

So I remember one winter morning, we were living in St. Louis, and we got up about 3:30 in the morning. We drove for about an hour to the banks of the Missouri River. It was dead of winter, so it was freezing cold. It was dark. And he had a little rowboat there with an outboard engine on it, and we motored over to this island in the middle of the Missouri. It was freezing cold. We had hand warmers and we were all bundled up. And then we walked for about forty-five minutes to his duck blind, which was on a little pond in the middle of this island. And we just waited there for dawn to come up because you can't start shooting until dawn.

As dawn was approaching and we could start to see some light, there was a songbird singing on a branch not very far away. And my father said, "Why don't you take some target practice?" I was about fifteen years old at the time, and I didn't really listen to myself. I didn't know how to listen to myself. I said, "Oh, dad thinks that's a good thing to do." So I took my shotgun and I pointed at this songbird and I pulled the trigger. And that bird was just gone. A shotgun blast at close range with a songbird doesn't leave very much.

And so that memory came back when I started to meditate. I hadn't thought of it for years. And then living with the precepts, the vow not to kill living beings, this came up for me. And I felt terrible about it. And there wasn't anything I could do about it. There was no way I could get any of that out. But I just had to live with that.

So it played out really strongly in my mind for quite a few days on the retreat, and I just had to keep opening and feeling bad about it. It was also a really instructive learning because I started to see the difference between feeling guilty and feeling remorseful. When things come to mind that we wish we hadn't done, it's actually wholesome to feel remorse about that. If we don't feel remorse, our heart's dead, or our moral sense is gone, one or the other. So feeling remorse is a sign that we're still healthy, and we need to feel that remorse and the grief and the sadness. And then if we can repair it, we should. But sometimes it's beyond repair.

But that's different than guilt because guilt takes that feeling of remorse and lays self-judgment on top of it. And we can just beat ourselves with self-judgment for a long time, and it doesn't help. Self-judgment does not help the heart to open. It doesn't help the heart to feel compassion and it doesn't help the heart to care. Remorse does.

Remorse can put us more deeply in touch with how fragile life is, how sensitive every being around us is, and how much care we need to go through this life and not cause more suffering than is already here. That's a really arduous thing to do—to go through life without adding to the suffering that's already on the planet. Remorse is a good guide in that teaching. Guilt is not so helpful.

So tomorrow we'll do a couple of things related to forgiveness because forgiveness is really helpful to deal with a sense of remorse. We'll do a guided meditation on forgiveness tomorrow afternoon, and James will give a talk tomorrow evening. It's a really important piece. Forgiveness is so essential to be able to open the heart where there's been either guilt or resentment—asking for forgiveness and extending forgiveness. So we'll focus on that quite a bit tomorrow.

Sometimes we don't know exactly what we've done or why we feel judgmental of ourselves, but we can just feel a strong self-critical nature. This culture is expert at that. I don't know how we got into that, but American culture is very good at generating this critical mind.

Sogyal Rinpoche, who I think Sally mentioned the other night—a young Tibetan teacher who is good at working with Westerners—spent the last year in the States to get his green card and had a lot of contact with Westerners. And toward the end of that year, he said, "Oh, I realized something. Westerners have a hurt that Tibetan people don't." And he called it wounded love.

He said, "We have a lot of faults in Tibetan people, Tibetan culture. We have pride, we have envy, we have jealousy, we have anger—we have all those things. But we don't have this wounded love that comes out of a self-critical nature." And so he said that he felt that the practice of loving-kindness was really important for Westerners as a way to heal this self-judgmental attitude.

When I had first ordained in Thailand, I was traveling to practice in a monastery up north near Chiang Mai. And my preceptor, an older Thai monk, asked me to stay at one of his branch monasteries in Chiang Mai for a few days to break up my journey. So I did. I got to Chiang Mai and was well-received at the monastery.

And there was another Western monk practicing there who I hung out with and found him to be a really great guy. He would meditate during the morning. He'd been in robes for a long time, probably twelve, thirteen years at that point. He'd meditate in the morning, and then he'd receive visitors in the afternoon. And Thai people would come to see him. It was mostly Thai people. They'd talk to him about their meditation practice. They'd talk to him about their family problems, about what their children were doing, about their work situation. He spoke fluent Thai. And they'd just talk about their life with him. And he had a lot of metta. Just greeted people with a lot of warmth and acceptance. I really liked him a lot.

We went on alms round the next morning. And we went out—he was a senior monk, I was behind him, and then there were these two samaneras, young novice monks, trailing us. And I thought, why are they coming? They don't usually go on alms round. But I just went along for the ride.

So we go down his usual route. People are just lining up to put things in his bowl. And he had a very big bowl—not quite this big, but kind of close. And the bowl kind of matched his girth. He was also very well fed by the Thai people. So we get out on his alms route, and they're just putting lots of great plastic bags in his bowl. And I can tell people really love him. And so his bowl fills up, my bowl fills up, and then we duck into an alley.

And they go, "What's going on? We need to keep going or go back to the monastery."

In the alley, the samaneras open their robes, and they've got big plastic bags hanging off their left shoulder. So we take all the food out of our bowls, put them in their plastic bags. They cover up. Our bowls are empty. We go down the street, and we fill up again. And we did that another time.

So then we go back to the monastery with these huge plastic bags and two bowls full of food. We take what we want and feed a lot of other people—the samaneras, the nuns, and finally the dogs. Everybody got fed from the love that this Western monk engendered from the Thai people that he was close to. So much metta, and he was well-loved in return.

But as we got to talking, he told me something that I found really striking. He said it wasn't always like this. "Actually, I spent the first nine years that I was in robes working through my self-hatred. Nine years." And yet the change was so apparent. His metta was so strong. He had really done that transformative work of the heart, both through mindfulness and loving-kindness practice.

These are really the first two hindrances that you'll encounter as you do the metta practice. The quality of attachment to your people, especially as we move on to the friend, which we'll do shortly, possibly with the benefactor also. Start to notice when that comes in—the quality of desiring in relationship, wanting something back.

The second one: all these different flavors of negativity or aversion. Anger is another one that can come up strongly. As you hang out with a friend or a benefactor, you may remember something they did that wasn't so helpful, that was hurtful. And these old feelings of resentment can easily surface. Anger can be very strong.

Or you may be with someone who has actually scared you, and fear will come up. You're afraid you're going to be hurt again by this person. So all these different forms of negativity will come into your metta practice.

How to work with them? If they're not too strong, the suggestion is just continue with your metta phrases and the intention. If you can still feel the intention to care, keep doing that. Recognize this other feeling. "Oh, there's fear there. There's anger. There's self-judgment." Just let it be there in the background.

What happens then is it kind of gets brought into the metta as well. As you fill up with metta, these feelings start to get included in the metta, and then they're not so humiliating. When they first come, they're really kind of embarrassing. "I'm doing metta, but I'm feeling angry? This doesn't feel right. I must be doing something wrong." You know, I'm embarrassed about this.

But as you keep doing them, you just see they're a natural part of our human makeup, and the metta flavor just starts to include them as something okay. They're all acceptable. They're all part of every one of us, so no big deal. Metta brings in that accepting quality.

If the feeling's a little stronger, you won't be able to turn to the intention of caring. Strong fear, strong anger, strong self-judgment will actually block any arising of metta or caring. So there's no point then in doing the phrases. If there's no caring, no point.

To stay within the Brahma-vihara family, what can be really skillful then is to turn to compassion. As James directed this afternoon, this is a way to hold the difficult state very directly, touch it with your intention and your meditation, and use one of the phrases that you worked with this afternoon: "May I be free from this suffering. May I be free from this anger."

May I be free from this fear. Or another phrase I find helpful is: may I hold this aversion with compassion. May I hold this negativity with compassion. Whatever phrase resonates with you for compassion practice—keep working with that and notice if the compassion brings a different quality into your relationship with these difficult states.

What compassion generally brings is a way to hold these experiences. It's not about making them disappear. The purpose of metta or compassion is never to eliminate these states, but to discover a new way of relating to them that can include them, because they are part of us. You don't want to reject anything that's a natural part of your human experience.

Both metta and compassion offer skillful ways to hold these difficult energies in a transformed relationship.

The third approach, if compassion doesn't feel quite right or isn't working for you, is to turn to mindfulness practice—provided that's part of your meditation background. Some of you may not have experience with mindfulness of emotions and mind states, and that's perfectly fine. In that case, work with metta and compassion, which are excellent tools.

If you do have vipassana training, then open with mindfulness to what you're feeling. Remember what this means: feel it directly in the body. Don't judge it, don't evaluate it, don't try to make it disappear. Simply pay mindful attention. Open up and surrender to the experience. Let it be felt fully in the body and as a mental state, as a mood.

When you open to difficult emotions this way for some time, you'll generally find that the feeling begins to wash through. You're releasing the clamps, essentially saying, "Okay, go ahead and manifest. Let me feel you completely." The emotion rises, and to some extent, with time, it naturally releases. It weakens.

When it weakens, check if the intention for metta can return, then go back to the metta phrases and the intention of caring. This is the general guideline for working with these difficult energies, whether desire or aversion.

Three other hindrances arise frequently in retreat. Most of you know how to work with these, so I'll mention them briefly.

The first is sleepiness. This comes on very strongly on days one and two. Two people told me they had the sleepiest day of their lives yesterday—and probably more than two felt that way.

With sleepiness, the antidote is energy. Do anything to increase your physical energy: sit up straighter, open your eyes, take several deep breaths. During the next walking period, walk briskly. If you're feeling very sleepy in the meditation hall, stand up. I love seeing people standing during meditation—it shows they're working skillfully with sleepiness.

If you've arrived sleep-deprived, catch up with a nap. Take a walking period and rest. I didn't really say that—consider it a secret oral transmission.

The next hindrance is sleepiness's opposite: restlessness. Sleepiness reflects insufficient energy; restlessness means too much energy. Often the early days of retreat become a pendulum swing between sleepiness and restlessness, never pausing in that middle ground of calm alertness.

With restless energy—racing thoughts, physical agitation, a mind spinning at a hundred miles per hour where you can't even reach one phrase, or if you do, you can't get to the second because there's too much else happening—the antidote is calm.

Focus on the sense of relaxation when possible.

Make the mind really spacious and wide, and maybe have a sense that as you say the phrase, you're going to relax on an exhalation. "May you be safe from harm." And just let it settle all the way through the body.

As you go for a walk, maybe have a sense of relaxing and being really easy in your walking. Don't let yourself feel caged up or bound up with that restless energy.

The last hindrance is doubt. Doubt is a lack of trust in the practice, a lack of trust in yourself, a lack of trust in the teachings, a lack of trust in the teachers. Any of these things can manifest as doubt. It kind of crystallizes in the phrase, "What am I doing here?" which is very frequent also in the first days of retreat. I have it almost every retreat. At least now I recognize it. When it's there, I know that's just the sign of doubt. It doesn't mean anything real. It just means you're tripping out a little bit with skepticism.

One effective response to doubt is to reflect on all the value you've gotten from your dharma practice. Any meditation practice that you've done—reflect on the changes it's brought to your life. That's the real source of faith, which is the antidote to doubt. Reflect on why you came to this retreat, that there's a really noble value that you're following in this opening of the heart and the opening to wisdom. This is actually probably more important than most of the worldly activities that we get enmeshed in—the emails and the work assignments and so forth.

Please also talk to your teacher. If doubts are arising about whether this is of value or how to work with it, please talk to one of us, and we'll provide reflections based on our faith, which tends to be fairly strong at this point. That can be helpful.

Most important thing is to recognize if any of these hindrances are present, to know that they're there.

As we open more and more to the qualities of loving kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity, we find that we start to get connected to life in a really broad way. The mindfulness practice can be a little bit self-centered, but the brahmaviharas open us out in a really boundless way to the extent of life. We can't stay alone.

Then we start to resonate with this phrase of Shantideva, an eighth-century teacher in India: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

Opening up to this beauty of altruistic caring.

The Dalai Lama was interviewed once by Oprah Winfrey for her magazine. The interview came out in August of 2001. In the course of the interview, she asked His Holiness—this is a question I like to ask all my guests—"What do you know for sure from your own experience?" And the Dalai Lama replied, "One thing I know for sure is that compassion and caring are the best way to be happy. It genuinely works."

Let's just sit for a minute, please.

"Whatever joy there is in this world all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

CHAPTER 260

An Appropriate Response

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong reflects on how meditation practice prepares us for life's uncertainties through developing appropriate responses rooted in the Brahmavihāras (divine abodes). Drawing from the teaching that "the value of a lifetime of practice is an appropriate response," he explores how mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity) offer wisdom-based alternatives to our habitual reactions of anger, despair, or overwhelm when facing difficulty, and clinging when experiencing pleasure.
> Armstrong emphasizes that both mettā and vipassanā practices lead toward liberation, describing mettā as "ceto-vimutti" (deliverance of mind). He shares how developed loving-kindness creates a state where unwholesome mental states cannot intrude, offering a composed freedom where thought, image, and emotion align in wholesome ways. The talk weaves together personal anecdotes, stories of the Dalai Lama's responses to suffering, and examples of great compassionate beings like King Aśoka, illustrating how these heart qualities can transform both personal experience and social action. Armstrong concludes with the Tibetan version of the four immeasurables, showing how these practices cultivate our "inner potential" for responding to an unpredictable world with wisdom and love.

I wanted to start this evening by mentioning that a good friend of ours, someone known to many of you, was ordained today as a monk in Burma. Robert Cusick, who has been a manager here on many occasions, received ordination on his sixtieth birthday. In fact, looking over to that side of the room ten days ago, you would have expected to see Robert about where Mary is sitting today.

He was ordained with his teacher, whom he loves deeply, named Pao Sayadaw. When he left, he had the intention that he may be ordaining for the rest of his life. So Robert Cusick is no longer. His new name is Sunyata Gowesika, meaning "a seeker of emptiness." We wish him well. May he find emptiness and make it his home.

As you seek your own emptiness and prepare to go back into your daily life or continue into another retreat, I want to reflect on what you will take with you from this experience.

The first thing that comes to mind is that I hope you will carry the spirit of metta from here back into the world, because the world needs it. Primarily because it will make you happy, but also because we hope to create here at Spirit Rock a culture of loving kindness and generosity, a spirit of metta and dana, so that when people walk into the meditation hall or through the gates, they begin to feel that atmosphere immediately. That can be a seed for taking back into the world. I hope everybody felt that this week.

I've also reflected that life is really unpredictable and changeable. Basically, at any given moment, anything can happen to anyone, anywhere, anytime. This was starkly apparent last December 26th when the tsunami hit without warning. A good friend of ours was on the beach in South India, actually doing qigong, when this huge wave came up and knocked him over. As he was being washed out to sea, he managed to catch hold of a tree trunk, then climbed up on a concrete wall and held on as another big wave came in and out. He survived by hanging on to that tree. But it was terrifying. That was one place where non-clinging would not have been appropriate and would not have resulted in liberation.

Just a week ago, hundreds of people were on their way to work in London when bombs went off in the subway and on buses. Out of nowhere, lives were changed forever—people injured or killed, their families and loved ones devastated. These things come without warning. A simple visit to a doctor can bring a terminal diagnosis. You never know when this might be any of our fate.

Someone once asked a Zen master, "What's the value of a lifetime of practice?" The Zen master replied, "An appropriate response."

When I first heard that story, I thought it was rather wimpy. I was quite disappointed because Zen masters are supposed to say much stronger things. They're supposed to say something like, "After a lifetime of practice, you can run me through with a sword and I won't blink an eye." That's the kind of statement I was looking for. "An appropriate response" sounds very humble.

But the more I've reflected on that statement, the more I feel it embraces the whole of our life and practice. Because what is practice other than finding the appropriate response to this present moment, again and again? That is the challenge practice presents, and that is where we establish these qualities of heart and mind: openness, mindfulness, wisdom, loving kindness, compassion. It's all about how we respond in this new moment.

I think one of the great gifts the Brahma Viharas offer us is a powerful set of tools for how to respond. It's not that through our meditation we stop difficulties from entering our lives. Even the Buddha couldn't do that. People tried to kill him. They sicced an enraged elephant on him in a narrow alleyway. He was poisoned. He faced a schism in the Sangha and a revolt by the bhikkhus. His name was tarnished, his reputation spread as that of a criminal and evil person. He had to deal with all of this difficulty too.

But having these tools means we don't have to feel like passive victims of what happens. We have ways to work with situations, ways to respond that help the mind deal with what's happening. I think this is very empowering.

It basically takes us out of a role of passivity and into a role of activity with wisdom.

So normally in life, I think for most of us, when something painful happens, we tend to get sad or we get angry. When something good happens, we tend to get elated and self-satisfied. And the Buddha said both these responses, both these extremes are not really based in wisdom because they ignore the truth of impermanence, that whatever that condition was, it's eventually going to pass. And in the end, he said, equanimity is a wiser response.

But the Brahmaviharas show us kind of a roadmap of what's possible for the human heart. And I'd say even more exactly, what's possible for the awakened heart. We start with this foundation of loving-kindness, this generalized caring mindset for everyone. And the world will certainly do many things to test that. The events of the larger society, the actions of political leaders, the actions of our own family members. It's going to be testing our ability to stay open again and again.

But I think what the Brahmaviharas say is just because the world is crazy, it doesn't mean that we have to be crazy, and that there's the possibility of staying sane and responding in a sane way, even as the world goes through all of its madness.

So when we start from the foundation of an open heart, from loving-kindness, when suffering arises, there's the possibility not of overwhelm or grief or despair or anger. There's the possibility of compassion—not something that comes easily or very quickly, but as we develop that practice, as we incline the mind in that way, it comes more and more easily and naturally.

When delightful things happen to us, there's the possibility not to cling and get kind of tripped out about them, but to meet them with an appreciative joy. We can appreciate, but we also understand the impermanence of the situation. And when there's nothing particular happening, when the heart can just rest, equanimity can hold all the ups and downs of life.

These are our possibilities, as Sally was pointing to last night.

On the subject of equanimity, somebody asked in a note after we did that meditation yesterday, "Well, what about the role of activism in the world? When we say that we accept this moment just as it is, we accept things just as they are, does that mean there's no role for social change, for righting injustices?"

Not at all.

Just as in our own meditation practice, what we really start to look at, what we focus on is how we respond to what is. The same principle applies in the world. In that first moment of the arising of something difficult—a pain, a grief, a loss, a fear—we can't change that arising. In Sylvia's words, the present moment could not possibly be any different than the way it is with all its complexity. But we have the choice then of how we meet that moment, which creates the next moment of the world.

So in our meditation practice, we put a lot of emphasis on responding to this arising, not with conflict, not with greed, not with aversion, because that destroys our peace and plunges us more into suffering. But learning the responses of mindfulness, of patience, of acceptance, of openness, of wisdom, of being willing to learn, and trying again and again to restore the heart to balance—then the action can be appropriate.

Same thing in the world. If our partner gets angry at us, if we see the desecration of the environment, if we see oppression of people, of cultures, of whole countries—can we stay somewhat composed within ourselves, accepting what is? And if so, I think that can be a wiser base for action than being all stirred up inside and reacting simply with anger, hatred, frustration, blame, and so on. So I think the same principle applies to action in the world as action in our meditation. Right action can come from a place of balance.

Sylvia talked about this retreat—I don't know if you remember because it was years ago now—but she started by talking about the Four Noble Truths and the crux of our whole practice being about suffering and the release from suffering. I want to kind of bring that context back because I think that it's important to hold our loving-kindness practice in that broader container and talk about how metta and mindfulness both work toward that container.

You know, usually vipassana is presented as our path to freedom, the wisdom path that liberates. And it's said that it can lead to a degree of freedom that is unshakable, complete, permanent, the very end of suffering. But this isn't often talked about, but in the texts, in the discourses of the Buddha, metta is also described as a deliverance of mind, or it could be translated as a deliverance of heart. And the word that's used, cetovimutti, translated as deliverance of mind, contains the word vimutti, which really means liberation—that the mind is actually liberated when it is in this very, very developed state of loving-kindness.

So I want just to look back on our time here and see if we can all get a flavor of when our own hearts have been in that place of liberation over the course of this week. It's not a permanent liberation, it's not an unshakable liberation, but nonetheless, the word applied is liberation.

So I want to ask you to reflect back on a time when the three main pieces of your metta practice were sort of all clicking. And the three main pieces are your connection to the person, the phrase was with you, and the feeling—some feeling of metta, of caring, of warmth was there. So just turn in your mind back to some of the sittings or walkings during this week when all three of those experiences kind of came together. And perhaps you were able to sustain it for a little while. Thirty seconds, sixty seconds. What was that experience like?

"Anybody, what was the tone, what was the feeling like of that? Yes."

"The word that comes to mind for me is bliss."

Bliss, yes, thank you. It was what Sylvia was talking about with me the other night when she said we can finally open to wisdom. So openness, wisdom.

How else did it feel? Getting what you're wanting—satisfying, fulfilling, happy. What else?

Peaceful. Yes, the struggle goes out, doesn't it? The conflict goes out. What else?

Deep. There's a profound quality in the mind that has arrived at that kind of place. It's not an ordinary state.

Clear. Yes, you can see things as they are.

Warm and collected. That combines the metta quality and also the collected mind of composure. Denise?

Gratitude and joy. Yes, lovely.

All of you, I trust, have experienced something of this during the week. I want you to appreciate that this is not an ordinary state of mind. This is a very beautiful and noble way to be. It's not something that comes upon most people in their everyday life. It's something you put in a lot of work toward, and I hope you are happy about the fruits.

When you all respond, you are basically describing different aspects of the awakened heart and mind. The peace, the clarity, the bliss, the composure, the openness, the joy, the happiness—these are different aspects of being free. Freedom has a lot of different flavors.

In looking at that experience, I want to point out one thing that's extraordinary about it. When you have the connection to a person, it may take up the field of images—often it's through an image, at least sensing the presence. When the phrases are going, your thoughts are occupied and other thoughts don't come in. Disturbing thoughts don't really intrude. And when the metta feeling is there, disturbing emotions don't really come in. While you're feeling that metta, the accompanying mood is happiness, joy, peace, composure—not anger, guilt, remorse, desire, fear.

See what came together in that moment. The images were stable. The thoughts were of your choosing and wholesome. And the feeling was that beautiful feeling of metta. In that moment you had basically put together thought, image, and emotion from your practice, and it was at that time under your control.

What else is there in the mind? That's it. If you look at mental events, it's basically thought, image, and emotion. And at that time you had put them all together into this total package that was satisfying, fulfilling, and free. Free because the unwholesome states couldn't intrude. It wasn't just an accidental moment. It was actually composed in that way.

This is why the developed state of metta is a kind of liberation. We step out of suffering in a very composed way at that time. Now you know how to do that. It doesn't mean you can do it every time. Still we're grateful and fortunate when they come together like that. Sometimes we just have the phrases. Sometimes we just have the image. Sometimes we just have the feeling. But you know that at times you've experienced that degree of freedom and completeness. That's an extraordinary thing.

This mind that is imbued with loving kindness doesn't tend to harm. It doesn't tend to harm ourselves, and it doesn't tend to harm others. This is a beautiful contribution to the world. People are safe when we're in a space of loving-kindness. We give that safety to the world.

The Buddha talked about this as an act of generosity—that the very ability to be in the world without harming others is an act of great generosity. Beings feel safe and protected in that space. So it's always interesting to wonder: what's the possibility? How far can that non-harming be developed?

I've just finished reading this quite charming little book about the Dalai Lama called The Wisdom of Forgiveness. A reporter hangs out with him and travels with him for a couple of months, then writes up the Dalai Lama's life in a more intimate way than we usually get to hear.

At one point, he had seen the Dalai Lama do this confession that Buddhist monks do every two weeks. Every two weeks they sit down with another bhikkhu and confess the ways they've transgressed the rules in the past two weeks. So the reporter asked him, "Did you also make confessions?" And the Dalai Lama said, "Of course I did."

The reporter said, "What did you confess?"

The Dalai Lama said, "Eating biscuits in the evening. As a Buddhist monk, I'm not supposed to eat anything after my midday meal."

Wouldn't that be nice—to live for two weeks and that was your greatest transgression? That's a really non-harming mind.

I also mentioned the other night that Oprah interviewed His Holiness in 2001, and the interview appeared in O Magazine. This book has a little longer account of the interview. The hour-long interview began well. Oprah started by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect. Hmm. Okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

Oprah continued, "And that's it? In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued: "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life—to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators—even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind—I don't lag too far behind."

That's the Dalai Lama, and then here's us. I figure the only thing that separates us is about sixteen lifetimes of practice, so we're getting there.

It's also said that the mind that's imbued with loving kindness can't easily be harmed. It doesn't harm others, but it's also said it's not easily harmed, because when anger is directed at a mind filled with loving kindness, it doesn't stick. It's said that a mind filled with loving kindness is so spacious that it's like throwing a bucket of paint through space—it doesn't adhere anywhere in the space. So it's not so easy to be harmed with this mind of loving kindness.

We start practicing vipassana practice. Perhaps we start practicing metta and then we take up vipassana, and they seem like they're really different tracks. They seem like they're going in opposite directions. One's very receptive, present-moment oriented. One's very active, focusing on one particular quality of mind. We may think: what do these two have to do with each other?

But I really trust—and I believe from experience—that they come together in us in what I would call a foundation of character that is about having a warm attention. I think what we're trying to develop is a way of being present that's suffused with the warm quality of loving kindness.

Not a way of being present that's just a cold, clinical, detached, scientific observation, but one that's really warm toward the arisings of life, inviting, welcoming, receptive.

Ajahn Jamin is a Thai monk who teaches here, and he's an extraordinary being. He has practiced both Vipassana and loving-kindness to great depth. One of the things he says is that he hasn't had anger in 25 years. When you're around him, he has this joyful quality, and you really can't tell if the absence of anger came from his Vipassana practice and deep insight, or if it came from his metta practice and the openness of his heart. The two have merged in him.

He has one teaching. He doesn't teach in English—he teaches in Thai with a translator—but he has one English teaching that transmits his message. He'll touch the air in front of him and say, "Empty, empty," and then, "Happy, happy. Empty, empty, happy, happy." That's the whole transmission of his being: this union of emptiness where the mind isn't clouded with preoccupations about past or future, and the natural joy that comes from that.

We could say that Vipassana practice opens up spaciousness inside us, revealing the great openness that is our basic nature. Our fundamental nature is open—not jammed up or caught or stuck or clung or obstructed. This great openness is what insight practice reveals.

As we develop the heart, that openness takes on not a cold, vacant, absent, blank quality, but the warmth of loving kindness. This becomes a beautiful place to dwell. That's why these states are called the divine abidings—the Brahma Viharas. The emptiness brings peace; the metta brings that sense of warmth and invitation.

One person who came for an interview today was talking about discovering this combination through this week's practice. I'm sure he wouldn't mind my sharing—he began the week rather skeptical. In early interviews, he expressed a partiality toward Vipassana practice and some doubt about metta. Today he said, "Wow, I've had such great experiences with the metta and the composure of mind that comes from it. I realize it's just another way home."

The Dalai Lama put it beautifully: "Emptiness makes things soft. Compassion gives them a new shape." That's an unusual way to think of emptiness, but it does soften things. When you realize the world isn't as rigid or fixed or solid as you once thought, your eyes relax and everything can go a little blurry. Emptiness makes it soft; compassion gives it a new shape—or let's say a color or texture—and that's that warmth. When the Dalai Lama says compassion, we would say metta; they're more or less interchangeable.

Let's talk about the qualities of compassion and appreciative joy for a bit. I think compassion became central in the Mahayana tradition because of its affinity with the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths, the Buddha's core teaching, are all about suffering and the end of suffering, and compassion relates so closely to suffering. That's why it became so important.

In the Theravada tradition, we view compassion and mudita as complementary—one relating to difficulty, one relating to pleasure—with metta as the envelope that includes them both. It's a slightly different emphasis, that's all.

I think it's a very big question, one I hope won't be answered intellectually but through our own investigation: How do we relate to all the suffering we experience? The suffering in our lives, the suffering in the lives of people we know, the suffering we hear about in the world and read about in the news. How do we relate? Another way of asking: What is our response to that suffering?

I did ten days of compassion practice on one long Brahma Vihara retreat. As you've done seven days of metta practice, I did ten days of intensive compassion, repeating compassion phrases all day long to a range of individuals. I also did ten days of mudita and ten days of equanimity. I found compassion the hardest of all four Brahma Viharas because I was touching into suffering all day, every day. With metta, I could be upbeat about people.

With the mudita, I got very happy about people, and the equanimity was just cooling out. But the compassion required me to keep touching suffering over and over and over again, and there was no escape for ten days. I found that difficult.

Freud, in constructing his theories of the human psyche, said that human neurosis is the refusal to suffer. That all our distortions of personality come from our unwillingness to experience directly and accept our own suffering. That's a really powerful statement. It might be true.

So I started to look at the ways that habitually I tend to relate to suffering. I see that it's not an easy thing to be with, and so I've developed a number of defense mechanisms. I might avoid it. I might deny it. I might try to fix it—this is a common male response. If you read the Mars and Venus material, the women are there to empathize, while the men want to go in with "Oh, you got a problem? Let me tell you how to get rid of that." This comes from our own discomfort with just being with the suffering.

We assign blame: "Oh, well, somebody did that to me. It's somebody else's fault." Or judge it: "I'm wrong for having this suffering," or "Someone else is wrong for having their suffering." We make up stories about it: "Well, that's what happens when you do this," or "It's your karma," or something like that. And getting angry—these are all ways we defend against just experiencing the basic fact of suffering.

Suffering is the proximate cause of compassion. So in order for compassion to wake up in us, we have to be willing to feel the suffering without turning away or defending against it. This is an interesting place to look: How do we respond when we're in the presence of suffering?

When the heart is open and can just be with it without moving into any of these defense mechanisms, compassion is the natural response. It's the natural response of the heart—it's not artificial, it's natural. And as we develop that ability, what happens is—this is the way it feels—the heart has to get bigger in order to hold it. So compassion is actually a great practice for making the heart grow.

I see this through my own meditation practice again and again. The more I'm able to open to my own difficulty with real acceptance—not pushing away, but real acceptance—the more I'm able to open to other people's suffering and the suffering that's in the world. Opening to suffering can change us if we let it. This power of compassion is really transformative.

Again, I feel like a kindergartner in working with this stuff. There was a Tibetan lama in the nineteenth century named Patrul Rinpoche. One day every year in the middle of summer, he would be doing his retreat out in the wilderness in some area of Tibet. In summer, the forests are blooming and the grasses are up, and of course there's lots of wildlife that comes out during the summer. So one day every summer, he would take off all his clothes and go out into the woods and lie down in the forest, staying there all day to let the insects feed on him. He would walk back into the retreat hut or monastery at night with his eyes all puffed up, big red welts all over his body, itching and in pain, could hardly see. That was his compassion for the beings who needed food that day.

That's a little beyond me.

My practice of compassion isn't there yet, but I like to reflect that this is a human potential that someone has achieved. Someone is out there.

There's another beautiful story about a king in India who lived a couple of hundred years after the Buddha—King Asoka. He was one of the greatest kings that ever lived, but he started off as a very violent ruler. He inherited the kingdom from his father and had expansionist aims, so he went around conquering neighboring kingdoms with his strong army, taking over much of India.

One day after a certain battle, he was standing above the battlefield looking down at the carnage—dead bodies everywhere, wounded people with arrows and spears, in various states of being cut up and mutilated. As he was looking over this scene, suddenly his heart responded to it. Not his conquering mind, but something deeper. He thought, "What am I doing?"

As he contemplated this and felt the horror of it, he saw a monk walking across the battlefield—just a Buddhist monk traveling from one part of the country to another who happened to cross the scene. He said the monk was so composed and peaceful, even radiant in the midst of this horrible scene, that his mind shifted within him. He went to seek teachings and converted to Buddhism.

He renounced any warring ambitions. He sent envoys to all the neighboring kingdoms saying, "I'm not going to try and conquer any longer. I'm giving up this tendency of acquisition." He outlawed animal sacrifices within the kingdom, which was a common Hindu practice at the time, and turned mostly to vegetarianism in his own kitchen. He also made it standard policy throughout the kingdom to distribute food, essentially ending poverty within his reign.

This aligns with a teaching you'll read in the Buddha's suttas. When asked what makes a society go bad, the Buddha said it begins when there is poverty in the land. It's the duty of a ruler to ensure that poverty does not happen, because when poverty grows, people in need will turn to crime to satisfy their needs.

Asoka ushered in a golden age, not only for India but also for Buddhism, because he became a devoted patron of the religion. Buddhism came to great flowering under his leadership, all because of this opening of compassion and the sight of a different way to approach life.

I think it's helpful to remember that compassion isn't a state of suffering. When we're in touch with suffering and we ourselves fall into suffering, that's considered a near enemy. Sometimes it's described as grief—I'd describe it as overwhelm. We get overwhelmed by the amount of suffering we're in touch with, and that is a state of suffering. But true compassion can hold that suffering because it's supported by equanimity and doesn't tip into the near enemy.

Another way the near enemy shows up is described as pity. Pity is when we're in communication with someone who's suffering, and we feel ourselves by nature above it, better than that, beyond that. It's like, "Oh, you're so unfortunate that you're suffering, but I'm in a great place—I'm not suffering, and it's intrinsically because I'm a better person." That kind of looking down on suffering is called pity in this tradition, and it's also a near enemy of compassion.

The way to cut through pity—not so much with equanimity—is by realizing we could be in the same boat if circumstances were just turned a little bit.

There's a lovely poem by Naomi Shihab Nye that expresses this. It's called "Kindness":

"Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things. Feel the future dissolve in a moment like salt in a weakened broth. What you held in your hand, what you counted and carefully saved, all this must go so you know how desolate the landscape can be between the regions of kindness.

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you—how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive.

Before you know kindness as the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth.

Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore. Only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread. Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, 'It is I you have been looking for,' and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend."

"You catch the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth." The size of the cloth is everybody, every being. That's the scope for compassion.

When things get really overwhelming in the world, it seems to me compassion is the safest place to land. I feel this every time our country goes to war. I can get roused about that like a lot of us can.

can get upset and blaming, but somehow it never seems to do any good for me or the people I talk to. And a safer resting point for me feels to be compassion. I look at the suffering of the people who are in the war, I look at the suffering of the people who are perpetrating the war, who are the victims as well, and compassion is appropriate all around.

The next of the Brahmaviharas is mudita, sometimes translated as sympathetic joy. I actually like the translation appreciative joy. This can be a very happy practice, and I hope you felt some of that in doing the mudita practice—the response of the heart to happiness and taking joy in somebody else's happiness.

I got a call from a friend a while ago and just said, "How are you?" The friend said, "I'm wonderful." Just as she said that, my heart picked up, and without thinking about it, I said, "I'm wonderful too." Of course, part of it is because I was wonderful because she was wonderful. This is the flavor of mudita, and it's a double hit of happiness. There's the other person's happiness, which is great, and then there's our happiness in response, which is also wonderful. So it's happiness squared.

The happiness doesn't necessarily have to be what makes us happy. Last fall, when the Boston Red Sox were playing in the World Series, one of the cooks on staff here was a guy from Boston, and he wore his Red Sox jacket every day for a month. Then especially after they won for the first time in eighty-six years, he was so happy. I just got a high off of his high.

Sally is a horse lover. When we bought this land, we inherited an old quarter horse named Bob—a good name for an old quarter horse who used to work this land when it was leased for cattle ranching. Bob had herded cattle all up and down these hills. When we bought the property, he was probably twenty-five and was put out to pasture in that front pasture where you see the horses today. Bob's no longer here.

Sally, because of an affinity for horses, sort of took over Bob's care. In winter mornings, she would go down at seven or eight to feed him, and she'd have to break through the ice in the horse trough and tromp through the mud and the muck in that field to bring him his hay and his grain. Every time she'd go out, she'd dress up in her wellingtons and her worst clothes, and she'd come back mucked up. I'd think, "Oh, what a drag." But it didn't seem like it was a drag for her because she actually loved Bob, even though he was a cantankerous, old, hard-to-catch, uncooperative, independent, rebellious spirit.

So it may not be what makes us happy, but it may be what makes somebody else happy. And that's the important thing. But it also is sort of a doorway into our own happiness.

I think about in an environment like this, there are so many moments every day that bring out that kind of happiness. You walk out in the morning and see the first sunlight on the hills. You watch a deer go by with the babies that still have the spots on them. You walk into the dining room at lunch and see that incredible spread, that visual feast and the olfactory feast that the cooks have laid out. Then there's always the wonderful feeling of lying down in bed at night after a day of retreat practice. I don't know if there's anything that matches it. It feels so good. So appreciating all our delights through the day.

The term mudita is sometimes translated as sympathetic joy, and that's because sometimes our happiness arises in sympathy with others. But under that translation, sometimes we're advised not to focus on our own joy because it's only supposed to be about resonating with others. But I like to call it appreciative joy so that you can also appreciate when your joy arises.

When you start to focus on the arising of your joy, part of the flavor that comes through is gratitude. This is a word that I heard a lot today. People were expressing their appreciation for the practice, for what they've learned in this week, for the support that the silence has given them. Gratitude is such a beautiful state to be aware of and even to cultivate. It's beautiful because it avoids the swings of desire and aversion. When you're feeling grateful, you're not in aversion because you're appreciative of what you've got, but you're also not necessarily wanting a lot more because you're appreciating what you've got. So it's really a place of contentment and rest.

Practicing in Burma last summer as a monk, I had the opportunity every day to feel that gratitude. Burma is one of the poorest countries in the world. I don't know how far down the list it is, but it's way down the list. The military dictatorship has ruined the economy. People are really poor. Yet a friend asked me to take some money to give to the monastery as a gift, and I thought it would be nice to offer some meals.

When I arrived at the start of the rains retreat—the traditional three-month retreat during the rainy season—I went to the monastery office before ordaining and said, "I want to offer this money, and I'd like to buy at least one or maybe two lunches. I'd like to feed the whole monastery." The monastery at that time housed 750 people: about 400 monks and a couple hundred nuns.

"I'd like to feed the whole monastery lunch with this donation from a friend in the U.S.," I told them. They replied, "Oh, I'm sorry. All the lunches are already paid for for the next three months." Mostly it was Burmese people who so appreciated the opportunity to support practitioners that they had lined up to offer meals. This wasn't a small amount—I think a lunch cost something like $350 or $400, and they were all spoken for through the entire three-month retreat.

Every day when I'd go down and see these huge piles of food with the donor's name written on a whiteboard above the tables, I'd feel this incredible debt of appreciation. The only way I could repay it was by being a good monk and practicing well. It was really a beautiful part of each day.

If you feel drawn to cultivate this quality of gratitude, I really encourage it. During one retreat, I decided to practice with it specifically. At the start of the retreat, I took out a sheet of paper and wrote down everything in my life I was grateful for. Then every morning when I got up, I read that first thing—before I went out of the room, before I sat, before I did anything. I'd read my gratitude phrases, and it started me off in such a positive way, with such a positive attitude toward the day.

We were discussing gratitude in a senior student class that Sally and I led, and one of the men had developed a beautiful practice with a friend. Every night before bed, he and his friend would email each other one thing they were grateful for that day. He really enjoyed it, and it spread through the class—several other people started doing it too. I think Sylvia was doing that for a while. Still are? Good practice? Lovely practice indeed.

This is a wonderful way into gratitude practice and the cultivation of joy.

These, then, are the possible responses of the awakened heart—the liberated heart, the peaceful heart—to all the changing circumstances of life. Metta is our general approach. Can we approach the whole world with that spirit of trust and openness that we develop here? When difficulties arise, can we think about turning to compassion instead of anger, blame, or despair? And when the happiness of the world presents itself, can we really tune into it and let our hearts light up?

All of this becomes more and more possible as equanimity of mind—the balance of mind—develops and allows us not to feel so disturbed or threatened by life's changes.

I want to return at the end to this question of appropriate response. The Zen master's reply that the value of a lifetime of practice is an appropriate response. The Dalai Lama is usually quite good at appropriate response, so I want to read you a bit more of that interview with Oprah as it continues.

The Dalai Lama had been talking about his meditation practice when Oprah asked, "Would you encourage the rest of the world to meditate?"

"Stupid question," the Dalai Lama replied immediately and unexpectedly. He's nothing if not honest. Oprah's face froze. There was stunned silence in the hotel room. One thought crossed everyone's mind: this was probably the first time anyone had ever said this to Oprah's face.

The Dalai Lama grew thoughtful. "Should people meditate? I think so," he said after a pause. "It is worthwhile for the world to look more inward. We are not doing enough here. I'm not saying that people should be religious-minded. What I'm saying is we should focus more on our inner potential."

"Oh, I believe that," Oprah said, visibly relaxing. "That's why I asked the stupid question."

Everyone in the room cracked up.

"I wanted you to say it, but I certainly believe that." So that was a very gracious response from Oprah to the Dalai Lama's bluntness. I appreciate both of them as appropriate responses.

We should focus more on our inner potential. And I think that's what you all have dedicated this week to. I really appreciate your hard work. And just to say that I believe strongly that this path operates on laws of nature just as fixed as the law of gravity. As you apply yourself to the path and to these good intentions of the Brahmaviharas and presence and wisdom, that will bear beautiful fruit in your life.

I want to close with a reading from the Tibetan version of the four Brahmaviharas. They're called the four immeasurables in that tradition because they're boundless states of mind. So these are the expressions of the Brahmaviharas in Tibetan practice:

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow.

May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

Let's just sit for a moment.

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

CHAPTER 261

The Five Aggregates

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as taught by the Buddha - form (rūpa), feeling tone (vedanā), perception (saññā), volitional formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). Drawing primarily from the 'Mass of Foam' sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya, Armstrong demonstrates how this framework serves as a direct pointer to anattā (not-self) by revealing the empty, insubstantial nature of all experience. He skillfully weaves together practical meditation insights with profound philosophical understanding, explaining how each aggregate functions in our moment-to-moment experience while emphasizing their fundamentally transient and ownerless nature. The talk illuminates how seeing through the aggregates dissolves the fiction of a separate self, leading to the profound realization that 'there is suffering, but there is no one who suffers.' Armstrong concludes by connecting this wisdom to compassion, showing how understanding emptiness (suññatā) naturally opens the heart while maintaining equanimity - the perfect balance embodied by bodhisattvas like Kuan Yin who can hear all the world's cries without being overwhelmed.

The subject of tonight's talk is the five aggregates. The Buddha taught all about suffering and freedom. In a couple of nights, Steve will give a talk on dependent origination, which will trace the origin of suffering in excruciating detail, and also, therefore, the way of freedom.

The beginning of the chain of suffering is this factor in the mind of ignorance—in Pali, avijja. This basically means that we suffer because we don't see things the way they are. We don't see the world the way it is. We don't see ourselves the way we are. We suffer because we live to some extent in an illusion.

The Buddha said, "In whatever way they conceive, the truth is ever other than that." Or as one of my teachers put it even more strikingly, "Everything you think is wrong." That's sort of a wake-up call, isn't it? Everything you think is wrong. You've probably seen that bumper sticker: "Don't believe your thoughts." This is why.

But this is hard to keep in mind. We might have an insight into this, but it's hard to keep reminding ourselves because we want to understand the way things work. We have a deep-rooted need for security, and part of that security is telling ourselves the way things work: the world is like this, that person is like that, I'm like this, and here's how things work. That's the source of clinging to views. We cling to views because we really want to know things are predictable.

This is from Rumi: "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." Does it ever strike you like that in the middle of one of these long days? What am I supposed to be doing here?

One way to investigate this sense of reality and illusion is to explore the question, "What is this mind-body process?" Who am I? Or what am I? This looking directly at the nature of our experience is really the heart of what investigation is about.

Usually when we look at ourselves or somebody else, we see a person. This is common sense. It's conventional understanding. It's a very reasonable thing to think. And yet, the Buddha said that this is not indicative of one who is skillful in investigation.

He says, if you were a skilled butcher and you were cutting up the carcass of a cow, as you cut it up—and you'd done thousands of carcasses before like this—you would not say, "chop, chop, cow, cow, cow." You would say "rump, sirloin, tenderloin, ribs," right? And when you put it out on the market, that's what you would say. You wouldn't say "cow, cow, cow."

So he said, in the same way, one who has really investigated this mind-body process doesn't just look at it and say, "Oh, human being." That's too crude a label. One who has looked at it closely has more refined knowledge than that.

When a Buddha looked at a being, I don't believe that he saw just a person. I think he saw in one of two ways. One way is a way that we've talked about a lot, which basically has to do with seeing our experience as the six sense bases—six internal and external sense bases. So the phenomena of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects, and the corresponding sense organs that receive those things. This is one way to describe the world of human experience. This maps really nicely into our meditation experience because we often are connecting with sounds or sensations or sights or tastes, thoughts, emotions.

But there's another teaching device that the Buddha used—and I would say even more frequently as a pointer to wisdom, to understanding what we truly are—and that is the five aggregates.

As we tune into this way of seeing ourselves, we essentially tune into the way the Buddha sees us and we tune into the enlightened mind. The reason that the five aggregates is a powerful description of our human experience is it's a way of seeing without ego. When we start to see without ego, we take out this false sense of self that we normally tag this experience with. So seeing along the lines of the five aggregates helps us to see without ego. It's really a direct pointer to anatta, to seeing the truth of not-self.

This model of the five aggregates takes a while to get used to, just like the concept of not-self takes a while to get used to. So tonight, if you're hearing about it for the first time or second time or third time, don't expect to have a radical transformation in your understanding. But as you hang out with these concepts over months and years, it really does start to change the way we see things.

Speaking personally, there has been a lot of freedom for me in seeing along these lines. The extent of identification being released has been really striking for me through this understanding. It's not just an intellectual exercise—it has a direct impact in our experience. Be patient and let the concepts take a while to sink in.

This term "aggregate" is a translation from the Pali word khanda. The Sanskrit word is skandha, which you may have also heard. "Aggregate" sounds very technical, like you're paving a road somewhere. The Pali word is not that technical—it just means heap or bundle. If somebody was carrying a heap of sticks on their back, that would be called a khanda. So "aggregate" is a little more technical than I like. We could say components—the components of a human being. But actually the translation I like best is "kinds of stuff." The five aggregates are really just five kinds of stuff that make us up. It's that kind of colloquial.

The five aggregates are material form (or we could just say form), feeling tone (our old friend vedanā), perception, volitional formations, and consciousness. All five of these are present in every moment of experience. This is why it's a nice map to understand. The six sense bases may be present or absent in terms of the sense phenomena—there may or may not be a sound, there may or may not be a thought. But there are always these five aggregates in every moment of experience, so we can always connect to this model.

The first is material form. The Pali word is rūpa. I want to go through the five step by step and lay out what they are, and then we'll talk about them as they appear in a sutta.

Rūpa, or form, is sometimes translated as body, but its meaning is wider than that. It's all matter, all material form. This is from the Buddha: "Any kind of material form whatever, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—this is the material form aggregate."

So it means all matter. It includes the body, but it doesn't stop at the body's boundary, which is an important point. We're not limiting the five aggregates in any way by the boundary of the body. It's both the body and beyond.

The most obvious meaning is sights—this is the way we probably most predominantly experience the world of matter. So sometimes rūpa is used to mean sights, but it also includes all the ways matter interacts. Sounds, tastes, touch sensations, smells are also part of rūpa. When the bell is struck and a sound arises, that sound is the form aggregate, part of rūpa.

The sutta that I want to read from a couple of times tonight is found in the Saṃyutta Nikāya. It's called "A Mass of Foam." I'll just read the first part of it:

"On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great mass of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be empty, hollow, and void of essence. For what essence could there be in a lump of foam?

'So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a bhikkhu inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be empty, hollow, void of essence. For what essence could there be in form?'"

We'll come back to this later.

The second aggregate is our old friend feeling tone—in Pali, vedanā. As you know, because we've talked about it quite a lot, this is the quality that every sense experience has of having a component of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

We've talked about vedanā a lot, and actually it's great because I hear it in your interview reports frequently. People are really working with this quality of vedanā in skillful ways and noticing it often. The reason it's so important, of course, is that it's on the basis of feeling tone that the kilesas spring into action. We develop greed for the pleasant, aversion for the unpleasant, and to the neutral we tend to react with delusion—we don't see it clearly.

So with the sound...

Generally, that's a kind of pleasant feeling tone. We tend to like the sound of the bell. The pleasant quality has to do with the response of our minds. It could be different from person to person. So vedana is considered a mental aggregate. And yet it's not in the sound itself, but it's in the experience—in our experience, the way we hear the sound. So it's kind of integral in there with our hearing of the sound. But it is conditioned, so what some people experience as pleasant, others could experience as unpleasant.

I like this story from a 7-Eleven store, I think in Southern California, which was having problems with people driving up into the parking lot and dealing drugs outside the store. So they decided to find an unusual solution to the problem. They started playing Mantovani music over the loudspeakers in the parking lot. Now, Mantovani was one of my mother's favorites, so I grew up listening. For those of you who don't know it, it's kind of muzak-y, syrupy strings doing rather emotional melodies. And as they started playing this music through the loudspeakers into the parking lot, the drug dealers hated it. My mother quite liked it. But the drug dealers didn't, so they vacated the premises, and that's how they cleaned up the parking lot with Mantovani. I have a feeling if we played it here, the hall would also clear out fairly quickly.

The third of the aggregates is called perception. The Pali word is saññā. And in common English usage, we often use perception to mean the bare sense experience. We might say the sound itself is our perception. But in the way we use it in dharma language, it has a little bit different and a little more subtle sense. It really has to do with recognition or memory. So it's the way that we categorize the experiences that we have.

If your eyes are open at this moment and you're looking around the room, you are probably recognizing things like woman, shawl, cushion, bench, man, zabuton, wall, lamp, door, etc. The recognition of those different elements is the factor of perception in action. Really, if you take another step back with your eyes open, you realize that all there is in the world of sight is just form and color. That's all the visual field is made up of. It's just different patches of form and color. But we've learned how to interpret what those patches are. Now, mostly because we've been doing this for so long, we've forgotten that there's a learned element here. And we think that it's just an aspect of reality. But that's not necessarily true.

Oliver Sacks, the doctor, had a patient who had been blind from a very early age. He had lived a few years with sight and then had gone blind, and a procedure, a medical procedure, was now available to cure his blindness. So Sacks was there when the bandages were unwrapped after the surgery, along with the surgeon, some members of the man's family, and everybody was waiting to see if the operation was a success or not.

So they gently peeled off the bandages from the patient's eyes. "No cry of 'I can see!' burst from Virgil's lips. He seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing at the surgeon who stood before him, still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke, saying, 'Well?' did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face. Virgil told me later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, all meaningless, a blur. Then out of the blur came a voice that said, 'Well?' Then and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face, and indeed the face of his surgeon."

The story goes on—this is from "An Anthropologist on Mars"—the story goes on to say that Virgil's eyesight came back intact, but the circuits in his brain that learned to perceive never really came back together. And he found the visual world constantly overwhelming and confusing, and he was actually much better off with his eyes closed. So he never did regain that ease of perception that we all do so automatically.

So perception is a very powerful and underappreciated part of our relationship to the world. It's how we place the world into familiar categories and therefore how we organize it and then can relate to it. And as we see the world, so we relate back to it. Perceptions are not always reliable.

I remember one fall I was doing walking meditation down below the annex. I was walking down that walkway that goes to the tennis courts. I was almost down to the tennis courts. And I started to hear a marching band.

And it sounded like drums and some bugles were coming down Pleasant Street, moving slowly in our direction. I stopped and thought, "That's really strange. Why would there be a marching band coming down Pleasant Street in front of IMS?" I kept listening to what I was certain were drums and bugles.

Then, continuing to listen, I suddenly realized it was a garden cart with those big bicycle tires being rolled down the gravel path behind me. I had heard it as a band. So my perception was of a band, when in fact it was a garden cart.

Perceptions aren't always trustworthy. Yet many insights come from accurate perception. For instance, when we first start to realize impermanence, we're generally not seeing different things. We may be sitting and seeing the same old sensations, sounds, thoughts, mental states, images we always see. But suddenly—who knows where it comes from—we perceive the impermanence of the passing show. The same show it's always been, but all of a sudden the perception of impermanence is clear.

The objects may not change, but we see them in a new way. We see the pattern differently.

Sometimes we don't see things the way they are because of a label. This is a big teaching technique in some traditions. For instance, this thing is usually considered to be a bell. But if you saw it in a different context, could I convince you that it was a monk's bowl? A good-sized monk's bowl, but quite possibly. Could I convince you that it was a planter or a pot—an expensive one, but a very nice planter? Or could I convince you that it was actually a chapeau for a Russian doll that was statue-sized and fit on the head something like this? Maybe.

When we get caught in the labels, we have a hard time seeing the thing for exactly the way it is—what in Buddhism is called its thusness or its suchness—because the label blocks it out. Zen makes much of this distinction and tries to get people to see through the labels and concepts.

As a Zen master once said, holding up a striker: "What is this? If you call it a striker, I will hit you. But if you say it's not a striker, I will also hit you. What is it?" I didn't do a lot of Zen practice because I had a feeling I was going to get hit frequently—which was, in fact, my experience in the little bit of Zen practice I did.

This is often the basis of koans. There's a story that comes from this. In the late seventies, two great masters happened to be in Boston at the same time: Seungsahn Sunim, a well-known Korean Zen teacher, and Kalu Rinpoche, one of the greatest Tibetan lamas of the last fifty years. People thought it would be fascinating to bring these two supposedly highly enlightened masters together and see what came of their meeting.

They met in a friend's house in Cambridge, with others observing. Speaking through translators, Seungsahn thought he would get right into dialogue in his Zen style. He picked up an orange they were being served, held it out to Kalu Rinpoche and asked, "What is this?"

Kalu was already fairly old at the time, so he just sat back with his sweet smile, doing his mala beads and reciting mantras. He looked at Seungsahn, looked at the orange, and kept doing his beads with that sweet smile.

This wasn't quick enough for Seungsahn, so he held the orange out again: "What is this?"

Rinpoche turned to his translator and asked, "Don't they have oranges in his country?"

Sometimes it's better if spiritual traditions never meet.

Perception is a great subject for investigation—noticing what you're perceiving and how you're making it fit into categories. Now, when we hear this bell, we recognize it quite easily not just as the bell, but as the specific bell that ends the meditation sitting. That's our perception: bell, end of sitting.

The fourth of the aggregates, the third mental aggregate, is called volitional formations. The Pali term is sankhara. This refers primarily to thoughts, emotions, states of mind, mental objects in general. Intentions are included.

For our purposes in meditation, we can focus mostly on mental objects. These are, to some extent, the fabrications of mind. The word sankhara means something that has been put together. These include mind states and thoughts, which get brought up, fabricated and projected, created, formed.

This category includes the beautiful and sublime states like the Brahma-viharas, love and compassion. It includes the really intense and difficult states of mind—fear and anguish, desire. It includes the very refined meditative states of the factors of enlightenment. All the different colorings of mind states from subtle to gross are included in this category of sankharas.

Sometimes the translation here is "karmic formations," which indicates the strong habitual patterning that these formations are subject to, as well as the fact that there is some degree of volition or intention that underlies them. We haven't talked about this in a lot of detail, but as Joseph spoke about volition or intention as the seed of karma the other evening, I hope you get a sense that these wholesome and unwholesome states that come through the mind then form the karmic seed for wholesome or unwholesome consequences in our life.

For example, when we hear the bell, because it's usually at the end of a sitting, we may then feel a sense of ease or relaxation. That's a sankhara. The thought might come at that time: "Oh, I could sit forever." That's also a sankhara. These are the responses to the form and the perception of the sound of the bell.

The last of the aggregates is called consciousness. The Pali word is vijnana. This is the quality we referred to a lot during the retreat as knowing. Just that bare holding of our sense data is the function of consciousness or vijnana—the simple knowing of a moment of sense experience at any of the six sense doors.

So it's consciousness that knows the sound. It knows the pleasant feeling tone. It knows the recognition of that as a bell. It knows the sense of ease in the mind. It recognizes or holds the thought that arises: "Oh, I could sit forever." All are held by consciousness.

All five of these kinds of "stuff" are always present in a moment of waking experience. This is the basic outline.

Now, I thought this was a funny list for a long time. Here you have fundamental things like the body and consciousness, and then you have these slightly abstruse things like perception and feeling tone. I thought, why are those singled out? It didn't quite make sense to me.

As I hung out with this list and did more reading, I found there were other ways to frame it. In the Abhidhamma classification of experience, there are just three categories, not five: rupa, cetasika or mental factors, and citta or consciousness. These five categories could be collapsed into three. If you just toss feeling and perception into sankharas, we could talk about rupa, sankhara, and vijnana. That would be equivalent to the Abhidhamma classification.

At another point in the suttas, the Buddha describes this combination of nama-rupa, which Steve will talk about in Dependent Origination. The nama part is the mental piece of nama-rupa. It includes feeling, perception, as well as volition, contact, and attention. These other three factors could also have been broken out of sankhara, and we could have eight aggregates.

So whether it's three or five or eight, basically it doesn't matter. I hope you get that. It really doesn't matter. The important thing is that every aspect of your experience can be lumped into one of these categories. Everything we experience can find a place in one of these five categories. So it's a workable list. It's a list that we can use to look at our experience, analyze it, and learn from it. That's the most important thing.

As the sutta continues, the Buddha compared these five aggregates to a magic show. So I want to talk about that a little bit. This is the primary sense of this sutta, of a mass of foam—that the aggregates are like a magic show. Why is this important?

I want to tell a little story about one of the great magicians of the last hundred years, who was Harry Houdini. Houdini had this amazing show where he would go outside, get tied up, completely wrapped up in ropes and chains, and then locks would be put on those chains and ropes. His hands would be bound behind him.

And thus tied up, he would be dropped into a box that was kind of like a coffin—dropped into a wooden box, and the lid would be hammered shut with nails. And then that box would be taken and tossed into a nearby river.

So he would do this in European cities. I don't know if he was tossed into the Danube or the Seine or what, but he would be tossed into these rivers, which are usually pretty cold water. And the trick was that he would eventually surface.

So people would be waiting by the side of the river as the current flowed and the water was cold and the box had sunk to the bottom and Houdini was nowhere in sight. And one minute goes by and two minutes go by and three minutes go by. No Houdini. Is he dead? Has he drowned? And then pop. He pops up alive and breathing out of the water.

Incredible. Magic. How did he get out of that contraption? Completely unbelievable. So just imagine yourself as a person there by the side of the river being blown away by this fantastic display. How could this have happened?

Well, the tricks are several. First of all, Houdini had practiced a long time so he could hold his breath underwater. That was the first trick. He could hold his breath for up to three minutes underwater. The second thing is he'd gotten very accustomed to holding his breath and staying under cold, icy waters. So it just didn't bother him mentally, and his body could take it. The third trick is that the rope tying his hands was tied not very tightly. So he was actually able quite easily to loosen his hands. The fourth trick was that he had inside his mouth tiny wrenches that he would pull out and pick the locks. He was an expert lock picker. That was actually his greatest skill.

So in the dark, in the middle of this icy water, he would pick these tiny wrenches out and he would start working the locks that were around the chains and ropes that were tying him in. And he would undo all the locks. And then he was still inside a box, and this is the final trick. One of the sides of the box was kind of a trick side. It was not nailed on tightly at all, and he could easily just push that side out. He didn't push out the top, which had been nailed shut. He pushed out this trick panel, and then he could swim to the surface.

Once you knew the trick, it sort of takes away the wonder of it. I mean, it's a great skill. It's a fantastic skill, but still, it's no longer magic. When you understand the way it's put together, it's not magic anymore. You're not deceived. You're not enchanted the way you were before.

So the Buddha said when we understand the way the aggregates work, we're not enchanted by them any longer. "Suppose, monks, a magician should hold a magic show at the four crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should see it, ponder over it, and reflect on it with wise attention. Even as they see it, ponder over it, and reflect on it with wise attention, they would find it empty, they would find it hollow, they would find it void of essence. What essence, bhikkhus, could there be in a magic show?

"Even so, whatever form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness a bhikkhu sees, they see it, ponder over it, and reflect on it with wise attention. And even as they see it, ponder it, and reflect on it with wise attention, they would find it empty. They would find it hollow. They would find it void of essence. What essence could there be in form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness?"

And then he gives this little verse that kind of sums it up. To understand this verse, you need to understand that the trunk of a banana tree is hollow. A banana tree only grows once, and its trunk has no substance.

"Form is like a mass of foam, and feeling just an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and formations a banana tree. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick entire."

All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun—another name for the Buddha.

This is the sense of emptiness as it's talked about in both Pali suttas and Mahayana sutras. The greatest philosopher in the history of Buddhism is, of course, the Buddha. But the second greatest, I think, is an Indian philosopher around the first century A.D. named Nagarjuna. Nagarjuna wrote a treatise that was his exposition of the teaching of emptiness.

In one retreat I was doing, combining deep study with intensive sitting, I was working through this text by Nagarjuna. Different insights into emptiness kept arising, day after day, and the teaching began to penetrate very deeply, even entering my dreams.

One morning, just before waking, I had a dream where I was standing in front of a full-length mirror, looking at my entire body reflected back at me. As I stood there, I asked the question: "Why is emptiness important?" The answer came from the face in the mirror, which said, "Because it means that you don't exist."

Because it means that you don't exist.

This is the essence of emptiness. It means that we don't exist in the way that we normally think we do. Of course, the five aggregates are here—form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. But there is no self within them. There is no separate self who is the owner or experiencer of these aggregates.

What dissolves when we see this truth of anatta is the sense of a problem within the five aggregates, a problem that we have to solve. Because there's no longer a center of fear or desire.

Jack Kornfield was visiting an old monk in Sri Lanka. The monk was very happy, smiling and laughing as he sat up on his bed. Jack asked, "What's the secret of the Dharma in your words?" The monk laughed and said, "No self, no problem."

That's what dissolves. Emptiness is the taking out of this problematic self. This is the typical meaning of emptiness in the suttas. Most of the time, this word sunyata means empty of self—it's equivalent to anatta.

Then the Mahayana philosophers and writers took this sense of emptiness further, developing the understanding that's pointed to in this sutta: the sense of insubstantiality. The body being like a mass of foam, feelings like a bubble, perceptions like a mirage, and consciousness like a magic show—this recognition of the insubstantial nature of all experience.

We get caught because we don't see how insubstantial the whole world of our experience really is. Because we think it's more real or more solid than it actually is, we tend to hold on to it. So seeing emptiness becomes a great support for letting go, for not clinging, for recognizing that nothing is worth clinging to because it's all so light.

Our usual worldview, at least in the West, is really formed by nineteenth-century science. We consider this physical world to be the ultimate reality—our basis for truth and reality. We see this as the context of what happens: we're born into it, we're trapped in it while alive, and when we die, we go out of it while it continues as the ultimate frame of reference.

But this particular view—the scientific nineteenth-century worldview—ignores a key truth: that our experience of this world is all held in consciousness, this factor of vijnana. All we know of this world is the way it's held in consciousness. There is no "this world" on its own. There is only consciousness and the knowing of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch of the physical world.

What if the truth is that consciousness is more fundamental? I don't want to say definitively that it is, but what if that were the case? What if consciousness was more fundamental than physical matter, and the scientists had it backwards? Maybe there's a path to liberation in taking a look at consciousness.

We begin to explore all this through meditation, and often the first doorway that opens is the body. We start to feel the changing nature. We look closely at the body and see there's nothing but flux there. We investigate sounds and tastes and mind states and thoughts, and we see they too are just coming and going—very light, phantasmagorical.

We begin to understand the title of Milan Kundera's book: The Unbearable Lightness of Being. This quality of existence is so light, it's like a feather.

But there's one place where it's usually hard to see this kind of lightness or emptiness, and that's the world of sight. When we open our eyes, it looks really solid. It looks unchanging. It looks steady.

So let's use science to take a closer look at that experience.

We know from our science classes that we see because particles of light or photons are coming from some light source—right now it's the lamps. They're reflecting off the objects in this room, and those particles are striking our eye and touching the retina. As they touch the retina, they excite a nerve, the optic nerve that transmits a signal up into the brain. And somehow—and this is a total mystery, no idea how this happens—somehow the brain turns this into consciousness and a representation of the visual world. How that happens, nobody knows.

So we see that as we reflect on that, what we're thinking is a solid wall is actually being recreated moment after moment by these millions of photons landing on the retina, sending pulsations of nerve impulses up to the brain where it's being regenerated. The sight is being regenerated hundreds of times a second. This world that we think is solid visual objects is pulsing on and off, maybe hundreds of times a second.

When we stop to think in that way, we realize the wall isn't solid. It's just an appearance. And we don't actually know what is in the wall. We don't know what constitutes wall. All we know is this representation of it that we have through the eye organ that we call wall.

So we're not living in the real physical world, ever. We're living in a representation of reality that's constructed by our five senses and our brain and our human consciousness. That's what we live in. But we forget that. And we think, oh, that's the real physical world. That's a really solid thing. And it's not. We're living in a representation that hangs like a bubble in consciousness. It's much, much lighter than we think.

Sometimes we think, but it really is solid. I can touch it. It really is solid. But that's just the sensation of earth element. That's just the sensation through the touch of the fingertips with hardness, with solidity, with the earth element in matter. Only another sensation.

Sometimes we think that there's a floor, that there's actually a ground, because the earth is solid, the seat is solid, there's a ground below me. We forget that that ground that supports us is also held in consciousness. And consciousness has no ground. What's the ground that supports your consciousness? There's nothing there. This whole thing hangs like a bubble in the void. There is no ground.

So it can be helpful as we start to incorporate this way of looking to realize that we don't see objects, we see appearances. And these appearances are always held in consciousness, which is the lightest of all the aggregates. And that's why the Tibetans call this a magical display. It comes out of nowhere. It has no ground. And yet it has these amazing qualities of consistency and lawfulness, beauty. And that's why the Buddha compares consciousness to a magic show. It whips all this up out of what? I don't know. Nothing.

In that way, it's also like a dream. Our waking life is really like a dream. And when you think about this, is there any real difference between a moment in a dream and a moment in your waking life? You can reflect on that. Reflect on it as you dream.

Now why is that useful? Because if we're in a dream and we know that we're dreaming, do we cling? If we know that we're in a dream, do you have a sense, oh, the people are going to stay forever in my dream? When a monster comes, if you know you're dreaming, do you have to get afraid? No. But we take this dream much more seriously, more seriously than we ought to.

It's also compared, this world of appearances is also compared in the text to a mirage and to a rainbow. When you look at a rainbow in the sky, it looks like something's there, but it's just a play of light.

There's nothing solid there at all. One of my teachers, Sogyal Rinpoche, said it this way: everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever. It is only an appearance. This is the sense of emptiness, the way that it's used particularly in this sutta and in the Mahayana suttas.

Emptiness does not mean a place where nothing's happening. It doesn't mean a blankness, a vacancy, an absence. It means more a sense of transparency, lack of substance, hollowness, transitoriness, openness. This is the way things are, whether we see it or not, in each moment.

In the Heart Sutra, it said: "While practicing deeply the pāramitā of wisdom, the Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was therefore saved from all suffering and distress." Classically, the insight into this truth has deep liberating potential. It is a key to not clinging, to not holding on.

So as you're here, continue to look really closely at your experience for this sense of transitoriness, insubstantiality, briefness, lack of solidity. All these conduce to not holding on.

If it's like this, where does suffering come from? The suffering comes, the Buddha said, because we tend to claim things as "I" or "mine." And particularly we form the view that "I am the body" or "the body is mine."

There's a quite poignant passage from the Aṅguttara Nikāya where the Buddha's talking to Sāriputta, who is one of his chief disciples. He says to Sāriputta, "Oh, Sāriputta, whether I teach the Dhamma briefly or at length, those who understand it are hard to find."

If you've ever been a teacher, you kind of know the sense of that. It's hard to find people who understand what I'm trying to communicate. And there's a poignancy to the Buddha saying that.

Sāriputta replies, "Then, O blessed one, now is the time for it. Now is the time to teach the Dhamma in brief or at length. There will be those who will understand."

"Well then, Sāriputta, this is how the training should be done. Concerning this body with its consciousness, let there be no self-centered imaginings of 'I' and 'mine' and no such bias. With regard to external objects, let there be no self-centered imaginings of 'mine' and no such bias. We shall then abide in the attainment of the heart's liberation and the liberation by wisdom."

It's because we cling to the body as "I" or "mine" that the suffering comes in. The Buddha said many times, it's the fiction of the belief in "I" that causes our suffering, but all the time there isn't any "I" there. There's not an "I" to get rid of because it was never there in the first place. It's just mistaken perception.

One meditator put it like this. They said, "Suffering is just rope burn. Things are going through our hands very quickly and we're trying to hold on, but we can't. And so we get rope burn as they pass. That's all that suffering is."

This is from the Visuddhimagga: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. Empty phenomena roll on. This view alone is right and true." There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. When we see this, this is the source of deep equanimity—the deepest kind of equanimity. There is suffering, but there is no one getting damaged by it because there's only the rope burn of friction.

Some of this came through to me during my time in Thailand. I was very privileged as a monk there to be able to see autopsies. I went into a hospital in the center of Bangkok and sat in the operating theater. First I stood next to one of the dead bodies. I was thirty-two years old at the time and I'd never been next to a dead body. I was able to stand next to this body which had been brought to the autopsy room.

Then I could sit in the operating theater and the coroner did a dissection of the body. This will be an R-rated talk because this is the three-month course. The first incision that the coroner made was from one ear over the top of the head down to the next ear. Then what he did was pull the scalp to the front and to the back and essentially peel the face away from the skull. That was my second contact with a dead body, was seeing the face come off. He sawed the top off the skull to take the brain out in order to weigh it. Then he continued to open up the chest cavity and the abdomen and pull those organs out.

So I watched one autopsy. I watched two autopsies. I think I watched three autopsies that morning. And then I walked back to go on with my life.

I walked back through a crowded park in central Bangkok, a big parade ground. People were walking by—young couples holding hands, dogs crossing the park, people waiting for buses, families hanging out together. Normal life was going on.

As I walked out and saw all this, all I could see were walking corpses. They were all walking corpses. I thought to myself, what do I mean by that, that I was seeing walking corpses? It's just the same body as I saw in the morgue, but these beings still have a brightness, a vitality that shines out through the eyes.

But this brightness shining out through the eyes—I saw really clearly—it doesn't have any past and any future. It's just a present moment brightness, an awakeness, an aliveness, a nowness. Because it has a capacity for memory, it can store up past and project into future and therefore create a sense of personality. But fundamentally, it was just bodies with this brightness. Bodies with this brightness.

We can see in this way through our meditation also. Try it. Look around sometime in the dining hall and imagine that what you're really seeing is bodies with the brightness of consciousness—bodies and consciousness. That's most fundamentally what we are.

When we see this way, we see that we're all in the same boat. We are basically just the same human form with minor variations in this consciousness, which opens us up to the world of senses, which then becomes the ground for all kinds of feelings to come through us. We have the whole human package of feelings.

So we make lots of distinctions about gender and age and race and culture and personality. These are valid distinctions, but they're very secondary to this truth that we are fundamentally just body and consciousness—the same organism, every one of us.

This is from Rumi's teacher, Shams of Tabriz: "You, me, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions." Well, in the garden of vipassana, of clear seeing, these are also not true distinctions. We are one organism. We all face the same situation. We are essentially empty. There's no ground for this consciousness and this brightness.

When you start to see in this way, it's not a cold kind of vision, but it evokes a deep sense of compassion. I want to read a little bit from one of our senior students. When Sally and I were teaching in California, we had a class of senior students who'd been practicing some years, and we got into this theme. I asked people to report on their reflections. This is from one of the students in the class:

"This is spooky. I would look at everything like this Japanese lamp that I love, and I'd see that it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When I went from an object to say it's an appearance to a person and say they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But it's true, and it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile."

This is really our human situation. We have this deep yearning for security and we're alive in this universe whose fundamental nature is empty, where there is no ground. This is our fundamental problem.

Quan Yin is the bodhisattva of compassion in the Chinese tradition who vowed to hear all the cries of the world. She tunes into the ten thousand sorrows and the ten thousand joys that we all experience, and she listens to all of those with her compassionate heart. She tunes into the suffering of the world.

But Quan Yin is not a beginning meditator. Quan Yin is a bodhisattva. She is a deeply realized being. She understands very well that there's suffering, but there's no one who suffers. That's the source of her equanimity.

And that's the source of this beautiful balance of wisdom and compassion that allows the Buddha to sit in tranquility and peace of mind, and still be open to knowing all the suffering that exists in the world. Through seeing emptiness, the heart becomes less burdened. We feel less weight of the solidity of the world, and out of this freedom comes compassion.

I want to close with a quotation that has been attributed to Kuan Yin that beautifully sums this up: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

Let's sit for a moment in silence.

Through compassion, she trembles with sympathy for all beings, but because her compassion is accompanied by wisdom, her heart remains undisturbed. This is the profound teaching of the bodhisattva path—to love fully while understanding deeply the empty nature of all phenomena. In this understanding lies both our greatest freedom and our most authentic capacity to serve.

CHAPTER 262

Mindfulness

Guy Armstrong · 50 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores the nature of sati (mindfulness) as the cornerstone of Buddhist meditation practice. Drawing from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10), he defines mindfulness not merely as bare attention, but as "knowing what our experience is in the present moment." Armstrong provides practical instruction on the meditation techniques of vitakka and vicāra (connecting and sustaining attention), using accessible analogies like picking up a baked potato to illustrate right effort. He addresses common challenges in early retreat practice, including the relationship with thoughts and the cultivation of present-moment awareness. The talk emphasizes that liberation comes not from technical mastery of breathing, but from understanding how the mind creates and releases suffering. Armstrong concludes by pointing toward the deeper insights of anicca, dukkha, and anattā that arise from sustained mindfulness practice, referencing the Buddha's declaration that satipatthāna is "the direct path for the purification of beings... for the realization of nibbāna."

So it was fun this afternoon to hear where everybody is from and just one little thing about them. I especially related to the people who were grooving on the weather and the sunshine down here, because I just came from Massachusetts a few weeks ago, and I was really struck also by the sunshine. It's delightful.

I wanted to share with you all, especially those from the states of Oregon and Washington and the province of B.C., that the reason it's so sunny here today is that the storm we were supposed to get hit the Pacific Northwest instead. That might not be exactly mudita, but it might let you feel a little more gratitude for being here.

The first day of a retreat is often one of the more difficult days in our lives. If you're feeling a little tired or sore or achy or frustrated, that's really par for the course, so not to worry. As James said, there's a detox thing going on, so it's kind of like detoxing and starting up at the gym on the same day. The muscles ache, and you come home sore, and you're really tired, and it does get better.

But I want you to listen to this quotation and see if you recognize the source. It's by a well-known spiritual teacher: "Enter by the narrow gate, for the gate is wide and the way is easy that leads to suffering, and those who go through it are many. But the gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to true life, and those who find it are few."

Any idea who said this? Jesus. Yes, this is from the Gospels. It could just as well have been said by the Buddha. The gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to true life and those who find it are few. So welcome to the hard gate.

On a day like this where it's not always so easy, it can be difficult to remember what we're doing here. If you're out there and you open your eyes and peek, it looks like everybody else in the room is a Buddha. When you open your eyes, people are, for the most part, still. Of course, if you keep them open for a while, then you see what's really happening. Other people are moving just as you are. But in a snapshot, it looks like a room full of Buddhas. And then we take a look around in the slow walking, and we really wonder where we are. What is going on?

Ajahn Chah was Jack Kornfield's first teacher, a wonderful monk from Thailand. The first time he came to lead a retreat in the United States was in 1979. He led a retreat at Insight Meditation Society, our sister center on the East Coast. He teaches a way of practice that's really a way of life. He likes people to come and make at least a five-year commitment to him. They live a simple life in the forest. They do their communal chores, their communal meetings, and they do some meditation. But it's not as intense and silent as it is here. So he thought this was kind of a funny form, but he did it because it was the West.

People were doing their very slow walking meditation out on the grass on the front lawn at IMS. He would go up to them and just say a word in Thai, and he'd give them this big smile. Then he'd move on to the next person, say a short phrase in Thai, and big smile. At the end of the day, someone asked his translator, "What was Ajahn Chah saying to us as he came around and talked to us?" He said, "Oh, Ajahn Chah was saying to each person, 'I hope you get well soon.'" It can kind of look like that in slow walking. So I hope you all get well soon.

Given that it can be a little unclear exactly why it is we're here, I wanted to talk tonight about the basics of our practice, really mostly as a way of reminding all of us of things that we already know. And really, it's kind of a sales pitch for the present moment. I just want to encourage you to come back as often as you can. That's really the purpose of the talk.

As the Dalai Lama said, the present moment is the only place that we can feel love. It's the only place that we really encounter life. So for that alone, it's very, very valuable. But this ability to stay in the present moment is not the way that our mind has been trained. It's not the way our culture thinks or grooms us. Rather, the opposite.

So one of the first insights that people tend to have in an insight meditation retreat is that their mind is out of control.

And this is a simple thing to see if you've been doing the practice for any time at all. But when you think about it, it's a little bit of a rare insight as the world goes. If you went up to the man or woman on the street and said, "Is your mind out of control?" how many people would immediately say, "Of course"? Not that many. So this is a useful insight to know. It's humbling.

There was a cartoon in the New Yorker not long ago that kind of summed this state up. It's really the human condition—the state that we live in most of the time. The cartoon was of a man working on his computer, apparently at his workplace. While he was working on his computer, he was thinking—the thought image over his head was of playing golf. The next frame showed the man out on the golf course, and the thought bubble above his head was being at home, making love to his partner. The third panel showed the man at home making love to his partner, and the thought bubble was being on his computer at work.

No matter where we are, it's never quite enough if we aren't really here, if we aren't really present. So the beauty of this training of our dharma practice is that it gives us an avenue to find our way into the present moment again and again and again. And out of that avenue, we find a whole world of richness, a whole treasure that we didn't see before.

It's a little bit like diving underwater and seeing that there's a whole world—if you have a mask and snorkel, there's a whole world of coral and fish that lives down there that we never knew about before. In our tradition, the avenue to these riches is mindfulness. Mindfulness.

It's kind of a curious word. It's a translation of the Pali word sati, which basically meant simply remembering before the Buddha put this new spin on it, which we call mindfulness. It's a pretty good translation because it doesn't mean a huge amount in English, so we can make it mean what the Buddha meant by it. So I wonder what that is.

Many of us have been practicing mindfulness for years, in some cases many years. Some of you have been practicing for twenty years or longer. And I've been practicing for at least twenty years when I asked myself the question, "What is mindfulness?" And I found that I actually didn't know. I couldn't come up with an answer that would satisfy me about what mindfulness was. So I invite you to just take a moment to reflect on that.

It's become a very common word, certainly in our circles, but even in the culture at large. Mindfulness is getting very broad play, partly because of all the mindfulness-based stress reduction activities that have gone on around the country. It's being incorporated by other religions who have had some contact with it and because of its secular language can take it up and incorporate it in their reflections and contemplations. And there's beginning to be a lot of scientific interest in this factor of mind.

About three weeks ago, I taught a retreat at IMS, this sister center, to a group of scientists who had gotten interested in meditation through their conferences with the Dalai Lama through an institute called the Mind & Life Institute. They had gotten inspired enough by the Dalai Lama that they wanted to take it to the next level to make their understanding practical instead of just theoretical. So we had ninety scientists sitting for a week at IMS with all their intelligence, learnedness, education, and critical faculties. Most of them had not meditated a lot before. Most of them had not done a week's retreat.

So for the first three days, I was really uncertain how it was going to go. The questions in the hall sometimes were quite pointed. When you get intelligent people of a skeptical frame of mind looking at what you do with your mind when you're with the breath, well, that can raise some questions. But it was really wonderful to see because about three days in, there was a whole sea change in the atmosphere, and most of the people started really connecting very well with the practice and starting to feel the benefit of it.

By the end of the retreat, almost everybody had made a strong connection to the dharma, and it was really beautiful to see. We thought this could be a really interesting kind of launch pad. Just to give you an example, one of the scientists on that retreat is about to receive a twenty-five million dollar grant to study mindfulness and its effects and is on the verge of hiring a Spirit Rock teacher for two years to oversee the project from a meditative point of view.

Really, the studies are just beginning to come out to establish scientifically what most of us know experientially—that mindfulness has tremendous health benefits, certainly mentally and also physically. And as these studies are done and these findings come out, I think the health benefits are going to become so compelling that this is going to become even more of a mainstream activity. More and more people will get the benefit, even if it's done in a very secular way. So I think there's some really exciting potential here.

But what is this quality that's so powerful, so potentially transformative, and yet when we start to feel our way into the meditation, so kind of elusive? What is this factor of mindfulness? It's sometimes been described as the quality of bare attention. And this captures an important component of it.

Mindfulness is the quality of connection with our present moment experience. It's definitely grounded in the present moment. The bare part points to an aspect of what's absent from mindfulness—that is, any kind of conceptual overlay. Mindfulness is the ability to connect with our present moment experience without the barriers of judgment, comparison, evaluation, insufficiency, projection, or looking for something other. It's a clear seeing of what is.

It's called bare because it means we don't add anything extra. It's just the bare experience, and our attention is really fully with that. In Tibetan Buddhism, they have a term that's even a little more striking—they call it naked awareness. Tibetans always take things a step further, you've probably noticed that. But it's the same quality, this unadorned quality of being with the experience.

But I think there's more to mindfulness than just bare attention. I think my cat has a lot of bare attention. She is very much with her present moment experience, and I don't think there's a lot of thought going on on top of it most of the time. So is that mindfulness? Is a baby mindful, because it is so present moment oriented before the ego develops and the thoughts start wandering into past and future? I would say not. And I would say the cat is not either. What they have is a beautiful quality of presence, but I don't think it's mindfulness.

The extra quality that's needed to turn it into mindfulness is this—and I would say that this is a reasonable working definition of mindfulness. It may not have the whole picture, but it's a good way to approach it. I want to suggest that mindfulness is knowing what our experience is in the present moment. It's the knowing of the experience that is the important piece.

We find this stated quite clearly in a text of the Buddha's called the Satipatthana Sutta. This is really one of the key texts, probably the key text to meditation practice in our tradition. It comes from a part of the Pali Canon called the Majjhima Nikaya, the middle-length discourses. Every time the Buddha is giving instructions in this sutta on how to be mindful, he basically says it the same way.

I'll read you some examples: "Breathing in long, he knows 'I breathe in long.' Or breathing out long, he knows 'I breathe out long.' Breathing in short, she understands 'I breathe in short.' Or breathing out short, she understands 'I breathe out short.' When walking, he understands 'I am walking.' When standing, he understands 'I am standing.' When feeling a pleasant feeling, she knows 'I am feeling a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, she knows 'I am feeling an unpleasant feeling.'"

So it's this quality of knowing what our experience is as it's happening that is really, I think, the heart of mindfulness. As you start to relate with that factor, you'll see that in a moment of contact with your experience, sometimes this mental factor is present and sometimes it's not. I want to submit that it's this knowing that's the transformative property in our practice.

It's like a culture in yogurt, the acidophilus. You take milk and you add a little bit of acidophilus culture to it, and then it starts to replicate itself through all that milk. It changes the flavor and the usefulness of the milk into yogurt. In the same way, when we drop this mindfulness into our experience, it starts to act like that transformative culture. Little by little, it spreads itself through all of our experience—first through our formal practice, then into our informal practice, into our full daily life, until it touches it all with this flavor of knowing and understanding that brings with it the flavor of the Dharma.

There are two levels of this knowing that I think it's helpful to be familiar with. There's a kind of simple level that's almost a conceptual level, and then there's a more detailed knowing that Carol referred to this morning in the walking instructions. Let's say on the simple level, when we breathe in, we're instructed by the Buddha to know "I'm breathing in." When we breathe out, we're instructed to know "I'm breathing out." So this is a level of mindfulness.

If you simply know "I'm breathing in" and you simply know "I'm breathing out," mindfulness is being established and the strength of this quality starts to work. But there's another level below that.

When Carol was talking about paying attention to a step, she was giving us the instruction to look and see what the sensations were that really made up that contact of the foot with the floor—feelings of hardness or softness, coolness or warmth, tingling or pressure, weight or heaviness. This is a more detailed level of knowing that we can also apply to the breath as well as to walking.

So start to see that your practice can happen on either of these levels. Both of them are good. Even if you just know, "I'm taking a step. I'm taking a step," that's good. That's mindfulness. The practice will go from there.

But as your mindfulness gets more subtle, as it gets more connected to your experience, you'll see that it also starts to reveal the details of what that experience of a step or a breath is like. And as you pay more attention, you'll start to see more and more detail.

It's not that we have to be super detail freaks about our practice. And it's not that the person who sees the most details goes to heaven first or gets enlightened first. The beauty in seeing detail is that it arouses interest. And so as you let your attention really sink into the experience and you see how rich the experience is, you tend to get interested in it. And as you get interested, the strength of that is that it holds your attention there more naturally. Not so much effort is required to be with something that you're really interested in. So this is some of the advantage of connecting strongly on this level of the sense data, the richness of the sense data.

This ability is really enhanced by two factors that we'll talk about probably over and over in this retreat. I want to introduce them tonight and make sure that we come back to them again and again. These are the factors of connecting and sustaining. They're an important part of meditation technique. They're the foundations of concentration. The Pali terms are vitaka and vichara. And for those of you who are a little familiar with this, they're the first two of the five factors of mind that make up the first jhana, a state of strong concentrated absorption. But very practically, they are the ways that we can start to deepen the mindfulness and activate the property of concentration.

So these are very practical instructions to connect and sustain. Let's talk about them in relationship to the breath.

The idea is as an in-breath begins, we want to use that in-breath beginning as a prompt to connect our attention to the experience in our body of breathing in. So that's the sense of connect or vitaka. It's also translated as aiming. So as soon as the in-breath starts, that's your invitation. Aim your attention. Aim it and connect—more or less synonymous—with the experience, your direct experience of an in-breath. So for some of you it'll mean aiming at the belly, for some at the abdomen, for some at the nose, some may be experiencing it in the whole body. The start of the in-breath is your invitation to connect.

Then the instruction is to sustain the attention there with the in-breath just for a half-breath. This is an important point. Sometimes as we start meditating with the breath we think, "I've got to be with every breath for the whole hour." And we soon find we can't do that. And then we think, "Well, maybe I just need to be with every breath for half an hour." And we find we can't do that. So we get a little more modest. "Well, I'm going to be with every breath for the next five minutes, and I'm really going to stay right on top of it so I won't miss any." And then we sort of start leaning heavily, and we think, "I've got to make this last. I've got it. I won't let it go away." And all of a sudden, we're getting really tight, because we're trying to make the sustaining last longer than it wants to, or longer than is realistic.

So what's realistic for us? Half a breath. Half a breath is the right length of time to sustain. Sayadaw U Pandita—a true meditation master, a Burmese master who's taught a number of us—said that you basically won't be able to sustain, truly sustain for more than two breaths.

Don't bother trying to sustain longer than this natural rhythm allows. You'll just tie yourself up in knots if you attempt to force a longer duration. So play with this approach and see if it's helpful for you.

The idea is that we aim at the start of an in-breath and sustain the attention just for the beginning of that in-breath. When the out-breath begins, we aim again, connecting to the start of the out-breath and sustaining for just that half-breath duration. In this way, we're renewing our intention with every half-breath, renewing our intention to be present.

It would be wonderful if we could sit down at the beginning of a meditation period, declare our intention to be present for the entire session, and have it happen automatically. But it mostly won't work like that. However, if you renew your intention again and again throughout the period, you'll find yourself resting in the present much more frequently.

I really encourage you to work with these two concepts of vitakka and vicara—this rhythm of aiming and sustaining. Another way that the sustaining aspect, vicara, is sometimes translated is "rubbing." This offers a particularly intimate way of understanding the practice. As you sustain your attention on the out-breath, for example, cultivate the sense that your awareness is gently rubbing against the sensations of the breath. This creates an intimate relationship between your awareness and the phenomenon of breathing.

There's one way to be with the breath where you're observing from a distance—where there's a fixed sense that the observer is located in the center of the head, somewhere behind the eyes, while the breath is way down in the abdomen. From this perspective, you're looking at the breath from quite a remove. That's one way to meditate, and it's not necessarily wrong.

But there's a gentler, softer, and more immediate approach. In this method, you cultivate the sense that awareness is located right with the object—in this case, with the breath sensations themselves. All you need to do is gently rub those sensations with awareness, and mindfulness will naturally arise from that contact.

I mentioned that when we try to sustain for too long, we can create tension through excessive effort. The opposite extreme involves sitting down, making an intention only at the beginning of the meditation, and then adopting a completely passive attitude: "Okay, it's in your hands, Buddha. I'm going to relax here, and if you choose to connect me with the breath, I'll be available." This is rather like a laid-back California approach to meditation.

While this attitude has a certain appeal, many breaths can pass without much real connection. You might enjoy pleasant fantasies and emerge from the sitting feeling that it was fairly agreeable, but recognize that you didn't actually connect with the breath very much. This represents being a little too relaxed.

On that end of the spectrum, it's helpful to increase the effort. Renew your intention more frequently, and apply slightly more firmness to the contact between attention and object.

There's a wonderful analogy for finding the right degree of contact—really a metaphor for right effort. Picture picking up a baked potato with your fork. We can all relate to this experience. You have this delicious baked potato, perhaps sliced and covered with butter, sour cream, cheese, and other toppings. At some point, you want to pierce it with your fork and bring it to your mouth.

If you strike the potato too forcefully, it can splinter into pieces, making it impossible to pick up. This represents applying too much effort to the meditation object. But if you don't use enough force, the fork will simply bounce off without piercing the potato's flesh at all, and again, you can't pick it up.

You must find the right balance—firm enough to pierce cleanly, but not so forceful that you destroy what you're trying to hold. This same principle applies to connecting your attention with the chosen object, whether breath or another focus. You want to make firm enough contact that it truly connects and can be sustained, but not such a forceful connection that you're pressing, leaning, or creating tension in a way that actually pushes the object away.

Somewhere between being completely laid back and being overly aggressive, you'll discover the right balance of effort. This understanding will guide you in both the connecting and sustaining aspects of practice.

I encourage you to play with this balance. The only way we learn about right effort is through trial and error. Don't be afraid to sometimes be a little too active and at other times a little too relaxed. It's precisely through exploring these extremes that we discover where the middle way lies.

Continue to evaluate how this meditation unfolds. Now often, especially at the end of a sitting, we find ourselves slipping into evaluation: "Oh, this was a good sitting" or "This was a bad sitting." Just remember that a good sitting doesn't necessarily mean a pleasant sitting—these aren't synonymous.

A good sitting, in terms of developing mindfulness, is measured by how present you were with your experience. It's not about whether your experience was pleasant while you were spaced out thinking about something else. Even if you spent most of an hour present with pain in your knee, if you were truly there—that, in our terms, is a good sitting.

What matters is the degree of your connection with your experience and the quality of mindfulness you brought to it, not whether the experience itself was particularly pleasant or unpleasant.

As James mentioned, we can become discouraged, especially in the early days, about being absent for long periods or not staying with many breaths in a row. We judge ourselves harshly for this. Of course, if you look closely, you know you shouldn't. In these early days of retreat, if you're present with two breaths at a time, that's a genuinely good start. At this point in the retreat, two breaths is wonderful.

Sometimes you'll feel frustrated: "Oh, I could only stay with two breaths." But ask yourself—what's the right number of breaths to be present with that would be good enough? What's the magic number that constitutes success? Is it four? Five? Six? Ten?

We simply don't know, yet we judge ourselves about it. Then we drift away—maybe for five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen minutes—and we return with harsh self-criticism: "Oh, what a terrible meditator I am. I'm never going to get this. I'm away so much. What an awful practitioner."

But what's the acceptable length of time to be away? Two minutes? Five minutes? Eight minutes? We don't know that either, do we? Yet we still judge.

So at this point in the retreat, try not to rely on arbitrary standards. Instead, as James suggested, when you wake up from distraction, appreciate that moment of wakefulness. It's like a gift—a spontaneous gift. We can't control when it happens, but it does change over time. The more we connect with the present moment, the more the mind becomes reconditioned, retrained to naturally rest in the present.

Our aspiration is to abide more and more in the present. As the Satipatthana Sutta teaches: "contemplating body in body"—meaning feeling the experience of the body directly. "The practitioner abides fully mindful." Abides. This is actually possible. It comes when it comes—we can't force it through effort alone. But over time, we discover we're present more and more often. This naturally emerges from our willingness to return when we have the choice.

Another pattern that can arise, as James pointed out, is that when we return from distraction, we feel we've done something wrong and need to make up for it somehow. Have you ever wished there was a little rosary you could use to do penance after being away for a while? As if saying a certain number of "Hail Buddhas" could clean the slate and let us start fresh?

But in fact, you don't need to do any penance. We can simply begin again. There's no need to retrace our steps: "Where did I go astray? What thoughts took me away? Where did that thought lead?"

We don't have to walk back the ladder of thinking to see where it diverged. We can simply drop it and start fresh. The moment is always fresh. Always remember it's fine to just start over, start new. Don't carry judgment, frustration, or discouragement. Simply begin again, noticing this next moment. It's always available.

Now I want to talk about our relationship with thoughts, because this is a big part of our meditation in the early days especially. The thoughts come in and they're really seductive, aren't they? They offer so much color and drama in a situation that intrinsically doesn't have a lot. We're sitting here, it's calm. Not much going on externally. Maybe there's a little boredom coming in. And thoughts offer this fantastic channel of amusement—entertainment and escape.

Especially as we get a little bit still, the thoughts get a lot more interesting. There's this quality called vipassana brilliance—as we settle down, the thoughts really wake up. I think it's true that the place of meditation and the place of creativity are very close. It's a quiet place that lets the subconscious do its work.

So how do we relate to those particularly alluring thoughts that come? Because they seem to offer so much promise. It might be the promise of creativity: "Oh, this is going to solve the problem I've been working on at the workplace," or "Now I know what I really want to paint when I get home in front of my canvas." Or we think about the problems in our lives. Problems are really seductive—relationship problems, child-raising problems, money problems, housing problems. "I could spend some time there and maybe I could solve some of them."

I want to share with you one of the mantras I've learned from one of my teachers, Joseph Goldstein, in relation to thoughts. He has this phrase that's good to remember: In the context of meditation, nothing is worth thinking about. This doesn't mean the topic of emptiness—it means nothing's worth thinking about. And this is really true. In the furtherance of mindfulness, thoughts don't really have a great deal to offer.

If you look closely at most of what goes through the mind, there's not much substance there. It's mostly things we've thought many times before, coming up again and again. So we start to have confidence that the problems of our life, the suffering in our life, are not going to be solved by thinking. We start to trust that the solution is going to come from a different level than we think about the problem on.

I really encourage you to reflect on this over the course of the retreat and see if it's true—that the real shifts in our relationship to work, to partners, to money, to all the situations of our daily life don't come so much through thinking over and over, but come from a deeper shift in us that changes our relationship to them in some more fundamental way. More openness, more acceptance, more caring, less reactivity, less anger. These kinds of shifts don't happen as a result of thinking. They come out of silence. They come out of the depth of our contact with the moment, with life. And they come from our intuition.

This place of stillness, creativity, meditation, contact with the present—these are all the ground that insight comes from. Insight both into our personal life, our psychology, as well as insight into the nature of things, the realm of impersonal truths about existence. I think it's from this level that our lives can deeply change and our relationship to the problems in our life and our suffering can deeply shift.

So I really encourage you to reflect on and trust in the power of your intuition. It's a much more potent force than rationality for really making a change in life. This is a quotation from Albert Einstein: "The intuitive mind is a sacred gift and the rational mind is a faithful servant. We've created a society that honors the servant and has forgotten the gift."

Meditation is one way we can really restore that balance. I think it's a very powerful way to reactivate our intuitions, really bring them into our life as a stable, ongoing source of wisdom and understanding. The stillness of mindfulness brings us that channel to access that intuitive place much more reliably over time.

At first, this quality of mindfulness doesn't seem like such a big deal. If I know I'm having a breath, it doesn't seem like it's going to have that much impact. But as we do it, moment after moment after moment, it builds up to a tremendous power. Part of that power is to find this stillness that's out of the flood of thinking—the memories, the fantasies, the future imaginings, the anxieties, the regrets, the remorse, the fears. All that wave of thought activity and all the emotions that get stirred up with it can start to settle just through this moment-to-moment contact.

The way the Buddha expressed this was to say that mindfulness can dam any flood. Mindfulness can stop any flood. When I think about all the changes I've experienced through about thirty years of meditation now, this is one of the most striking as I look at my actual experience. The force of thoughts is so much weaker than it was when I started meditating. It's not that I don't think anymore, but they are not so overpowering. The place of peace and stillness is usually not very far away at all. Usually, most of the time, it's really quite accessible.

This kind of access to peace and this foundation of calm creates a sense of well-being and a lot more space in life, so that we're able to accommodate the bumps that come and hopefully have enough clarity and balance to continue to make wise choices when those bumps come.

One other comment I wanted to make: sometimes the breath can be quite hard to find, and you may feel frustrated in your inability to be with it because maybe the mind has gotten dull, or on the other extreme, maybe the mind's gotten really active. In both those cases, it can be very hard to even find the breath, much less sustain the attention on it. You might think, "Oh, there's no way to be mindful now. I've lost my object. I can't really be present."

If that happens, remember that there is another option than the breath to which you can pay attention. In that case, back up just a step and ask yourself, "Well, what's really going on in my experience?" It's a way of stepping back and taking a broader view of what's going on. In that broader view, just ask, "What's happening now?" Maybe you'll see the mind is dull. Maybe you'll see there's sleepiness or fatigue in the body. Maybe you'll see that there's restlessness or that the mind is very agitated, lots of thoughts and lots of emotions.

Knowing that is also mindfulness. In this moment, my experience is sleepiness, dullness, restlessness, agitation. It doesn't have the fine detail of mindfulness of sensations, but it's also knowing our experience. So when the fine detail isn't available, back up and be with the broad picture. "Oh, this is what's happening now. This is my experience." And the mindfulness will continue to develop.

Because fundamentally—I hope you know, I hope all of you know, you've all done retreats before—mindfulness is not about breathing. Liberation is not just about the breath. Sometimes people who've been meditating for a while get the idea that if they were good Vipassana practitioners, good mindfulness practitioners, they'd be with the breath all the time. When they're not, when they have to be with a body pain or thoughts or some mood, it's because they've really failed and wandered away from where they really should be, which is the breath. This is really a misunderstanding, and I hope that you don't share it.

The point—and I think Carol said this this morning—is not about the breath, it's about awareness. We can find that awareness with any aspect of our experience. We start with the breath because it's fairly neutral and it's mostly accessible for most people, so it's a convenient object to begin with just to develop this quality of presence. But we want to then take it and open it up to all of our experience. We'll do that over the next several days—to other body sensations, to emotions, to thoughts, to feeling tone, to intention—because finally, release from suffering doesn't come from being a good breather. It comes from understanding the mind.

We really want to understand how our minds take us into suffering and how we can release that suffering that's created by the mind. So in the big picture, we want to develop this keen-looking mind, this close moment-to-moment attention, sharpen it on simple objects like breath and body, but we want to include more and more the activities of mind because that's truly where we get caught and that's where we can get released. Without making that pointing to mind, we can just be stuck in some technical feat of meditation that may not release us in the way that we're looking for.

As we open up over the days to come, I hope you'll really understand and appreciate that practice is central, not a distraction from what is central. As we start to expand, as we start to look more closely at the breath and all the other phenomena, we want to really understand the characteristics of what we're experiencing. The quality of rubbing or sustaining does this to a certain extent. As you rub your awareness on whatever phenomenon you're experiencing—the breath, the sensation, an emotion—you will automatically start to pick up the qualities of that experience.

In a sensation, you'll know its qualities of being hot or cold or rough or smooth, hard or soft. As you start to get into emotions, you'll understand the difference between irritation, impatience, anger, hatred, ill will. By rubbing the awareness against those states again and again, you'll understand the distinction between loving-kindness and compassion.

So the individual characteristics will become clear to you, but you'll also start to see the impersonal characteristics—you might say the universal characteristics of all these phenomena. You'll start to see their natures of arising and passing, their natures of disintegration, their natures of insubstantiality, of uncontrollability, of unreliability, of there being no owner or no center to all this experience.

The doorway to this kind of seeing is just from this close moment-to-moment attention to the various phenomena in our experience. And it's that rubbing of the awareness with our direct experience that is the ground for insight—the insight into impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and not-self, that themselves are just the doorway to the opening to the unconditioned, to nibbana. And that contact is said to be the most deeply liberating of all.

And that's why the Buddha closed the discourse on the foundations of mindfulness with this statement: "Friends, this is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, and for the realization of nirvana—namely, the establishment of mindfulness."

When we come to the end of a talk, we like to just sit for maybe a minute in silence together just to let the words settle. So please, we'll just sit comfortably for a few moments now.

This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nirvana—namely, the establishment of mindfulness.

Concentration

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of concentration (samādhi) as a crucial factor in Buddhist practice. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and the traditional structure of sīla, samādhi, and paññā, he explains how samādhi represents the unification of mind rather than narrow focus. Armstrong discusses the development of the five jhānic factors—vitakka (initial application), vicāra (sustained application), pīti (rapture), sukha (happiness), and ekaggatā (one-pointedness)—and their role in countering the hindrances.

The talk covers practical aspects of developing concentration through sustained mindfulness, the importance of wholehearted presence, and various techniques including breath counting and walking meditation. Armstrong addresses common obstacles like discursive thinking and the hindrances, emphasizing that the proximate cause of concentration is happiness arising from acceptance of the present moment. He describes the progression through the jhānas and formless attainments, explaining how these deep states of absorption serve as the foundation for profound insight and the realization of nibbāna. The teaching emphasizes that while concentration feels pleasant in itself, its primary value lies in creating the stability needed for liberating wisdom.

James talked last night on the factor of happiness in our life and our practice. Tonight I want to talk about one of the factors that is most direct in leading to conditioned kinds of happiness and that sets the stage for the highest kind of happiness—the factor of mind that we call concentration. I'll talk tonight about what this factor is, how we experience it, how it develops, what obstructs its development, and some of the deeper facets of its development, including the jhanas.

Concentration has been part of human experience for as long as there have been cultures, as far as I know. When you read of the most ancient cultures that we know of on the planet, they've all had these people called shamans who used their mental powers to access different realms, to provide healing, to get in touch with the animal world and spirits. They accessed these powers through techniques like drumming and dancing and chanting, all of which provide a strong focus for concentration.

At the time that the Bodhisattva Siddhartha Gautama left home to go start on his spiritual quest, he first contacted two teachers in northern India. These two teachers led him to very deep states of concentration. So we know that some very sophisticated kinds of practices were available 2,500 years ago when the Bodhisattva started his quest. He left these teachers because he didn't feel that they brought the final solution to the question of suffering that he was looking for. The states of concentration that he entered with them would always have to pass away. He would have to come out and be confronted again with the situation of aging, illness, and death. So he continued his quest and thankfully found the kind of liberation that he passed on to us. Nonetheless, these very deep states of concentration were being taught 2,500 years ago in India.

Even today, I think there's something in our mindset about this concept, even growing up in the West. One of the ways you see it is that there are lots of cartoons about gurus, particularly gurus on mountaintops in the Himalayas. There was this one cartoon that I quite liked from the New Yorker. It showed obviously a guru in the high Himalayas who had a long white beard and dressed in just a loincloth, sitting on this little platform in front of a cave with the high peaks of the Himalayas rising behind him. Seated in front of him was a Westerner, a relatively young Westerner dressed in clothes like yours and mine, who had obviously just made this arduous trek up to the mountaintop to talk to the guru and ask a profound question. So the caption of the cartoon is the guru's reply, where the guru simply says, "If I knew the meaning of life, do you think I'd be sitting here in this cave in my underpants?"

Some of these cartoons stress the wisdom aspect, and I would put this in that category. Other cartoons stress the concentration aspect of spiritual life. In this, the archetypal image is of the yogi who is secluded from the world, wrapped up in a meditation shawl with their eyes closed and downcast. That image conveys a strong impression to us.

In fact, you may feel that archetypal image every time you walk in this hall at the start of a sitting. You come in early in the morning and there are probably already people sitting here whose image is very similar to that archetypal image of the guru. As you tune into the qualities, I want to draw out some of the qualities that are in that image.

The first is the quality of stillness. The body of such a being is not moving. This is a feeling that you can often contact walking into this hall. I think this hall has something of a quality of stillness, whether people are in it or not. It is a factor that is manifested by certain spiritual teachers. The person who particularly comes to mind around this is Thich Nhat Hanh.

Before we built this meditation hall and the residences, we used to have Thich Nhat Hanh come and lead a daylong at Spirit Rock about once every two years. This hillside was open at that time—just a grassy hillside. So we would put a platform for him on the other side of the creek down there, and the audience would spread out sitting on the ground on this grassy hillside up here. In the middle of the day one year, there were about a thousand people who came to these events. He led everybody on a walking meditation down the walk, which now goes past the residences, across the stream, up the hill, and back to the meadows in the back, which will eventually be the site of a hermitage here at Spirit Rock.

We have a photo of Thich Nhat Hanh leading hundreds of people in walking meditation back to the back of the property. But what I particularly remember about his presence was the degree of stillness that he manifested in speaking, in moving. Everything came from a place of deep, deep stillness in him. He had so much power in that stillness that it affected everyone who listened to him and saw him. A thousand people on the hillside were calmed by this one man's presence. I actually felt he was casting a samadhi spell over the whole hillside through his own stillness. This is one aspect of that yogi in the shawl image.

Another aspect of it is the quality of the attention and the focus being inward, being drawn within. There is a sense that the yogi in secluding herself or himself from the world has left behind the things of the world and is going within to find the richness that the mind contains, potentially, all within itself. So there's a sense of going within to find hidden riches and treasure.

Finally, the other impression that one gets from the image is a sense of bliss—that in this turning inward and connecting with the riches of the mind, there is a sense of deep satisfaction, deeper than the passing sense pleasures of the world can offer, a deep sense of contentment and fulfillment.

These are all aspects of the quality of concentration.

In the Buddha's teaching, it's hard to overstate how important this factor of concentration is. It is the last factor in the Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path is presented as a sequential development, so samadhi is considered the ultimate unfolding of the Eightfold Path. Of course, it then wraps around and lays the basis for wisdom or right view, right attitude as expressed in the first two, but is nonetheless the outcome of the development of the whole path in that sense.

As we practice vipassana, all of our practice is based on the development of mindfulness, as expressed in the Satipatthana Sutta, among others. We could be known—perhaps we should be known—truly as the mindfulness school of Buddhism. This is really our foundation.

But it's very interesting. Even though we consider mindfulness the heart of our practice, when the Buddha summed up the Eightfold Path, he didn't call it conduct, mindfulness, and wisdom. He called it conduct, concentration, and wisdom. The formulation in Pali is sila, samadhi, and panna—the three main divisions of the Eightfold Path. Not mindfulness, but concentration. You can see that in his estimation, mindfulness is simply a tool to develop the quality of concentration, which to some degree is higher along the path of further development from mindfulness.

Concentration is also listed in the seven factors of enlightenment. It's included in the five spiritual faculties. And it's part of the iddipadas—this list of the four bases of spiritual power. Not only mundane powers, but supramundane powers that develop during practice. Concentration is associated with each of the four. So it's a very important factor in the teachings, and I think that generally in the West we have been slow to convey its real importance. It's been somewhat underrated for years as we've brought these teachings into the West.

So what is concentration? It's the usual translation of the Pali word samadhi. In the Eightfold Path, this factor is called samma-samadhi. It's usually translated in English as concentration. It's not actually a very good translation, and in some ways it's quite misleading for Westerners.

Now, I'm not going to toss that word out because it's so universal. I think we should go ahead and use it. But it's important to understand why it's not a good translation of the word samadhi. Unfortunately, there's no word in English that is an accurate translation of the word samadhi. This in itself is an interesting situation. When we have a culture that does not have a word for a central quality of mind, it says something about our culture. By and large, we don't know what this word means. And to be honest, it took me years to figure out what it meant in my own experience.

You know how the Eskimos have seventeen words for snow? When you get familiar as a culture with a factor, it has lots of expressions. And samadhi does not in any European language that I know of.

So why is the word concentration misleading? In concentration in English, the meaning is about attention. When you think about it, it's about where you put your attention. And specifically, it refers to a narrow focus of attention. "I want to concentrate on my homework. Don't bother me with the children or the TV or the stereo or whatever." So the idea is our attention is narrowly focused and we want to exclude everything else.

First of all, samadhi is not primarily about attention. The second thing is that samadhi does not have an exclusive connotation. This gets a little tricky, as I'll go into later, because in some ways we can develop samadhi with a narrow focus, but we don't have to. And that will become clearer as I go along. But basically because samadhi does not have this sense of exclusive or narrow attention, you can have a great deal of samadhi when the attention is wide, wide open. There can be a very expansive attention that's open to sounds, the arising of all phenomena. Samadhi can be present and you're not having a narrow focus of attention.

The best translation for samadhi, although it's a little cumbersome, is unification of mind. Samadhi is the state of mind that has come together, that has collected itself. What happens when we collect the mind is we find that it is actually a very powerful organ.

In our daily life, we lose touch with this native quality of the mind. Sally mentioned this poem of Wordsworth's the other night, where he says, "The world is too much with us. Late and soon, getting and spending, we lay waste our powers." This is a description of our ordinary mind, running to the past, running to the future—fantasies, recollections, imaginations, regret, blame, confusion. Our ordinary mind is all over the map. And as we jump all over the map, we're giving away our native power.

With samadhi, we start to reduce those wanderings. And in that reduction, we collect it into the present moment, usually around a chosen meditation object. And in that collecting, the mind regains its native power. So the first hallmark of the mind that has achieved this kind of unification is that it's strong.

It's in that strength that the mind becomes steady, firm, unyielding, and stable. And this is not the firmness or steadiness of hardness. We can try to make our mind that way by contracting, but rather this unification can happen in a very soft and receptive way.

This unification also brings peace because we've reduced the mind's wanderings. Some other synonyms that bring out different aspects of samadhi are undistracted, collected, composed, and wholehearted. These are all different qualities within concentration.

As the mind gets brought back together, the two most important things you notice are that it's able to maintain its contact with the present moment for extended periods of time—there's this connection with presence that is more than just fleeting—and secondly, there is a sense of tranquility, peacefulness, or settledness that comes.

This leads to the quality of the mind becoming unmoving, unshakable, and imperturbable. This is why in the factors of enlightenment, concentration is the factor immediately before equanimity, and equanimity is the last of the factors. Concentration in its stillness and strength sets the stage for the mind that isn't moved by pleasure and pain, that isn't swayed by changing circumstances.

It's said to be from that unmoving quality that the mind is able to open to the unconditioned, to the direct realization and knowledge of nibbana. In a way, the stillness sets the stage for the immovability, which is the closest mimicking of nibbana that we know in mundane terms.

How do we know when concentration is present? It's very helpful to start recognizing it as we encounter it in our meditation practice. Know that it's a quality that has a wide range—it's not either present or absent, but present to differing degrees all the time.

One of the simplest measures, though not perfect, is to know how long your attention can remain in the present in a more or less unbroken way. This is a crude measure of concentration, but it's a way to get a handle on it and to start knowing when it's there. In the practice we've been doing for the last several days, one way to recognize it would be to know when you are in contact with a number of breaths in a row.

Now, the presence of thought does not mean that concentration has gone away. It's only a loss of concentration if you let yourself get distracted and carried away by the content of thoughts, particularly several in a row. But if a thought arises and is seen clearly with a return to the breath in the present moment, that's not a distraction—that's clear mindfulness. It's when the content goes on over several thoughts and we lose contact with the present that concentration has been interrupted.

One exercise whereby you can start to gauge your own level of concentration is the exercise of counting in relation to the breath. I think James talked about this on the first day of the retreat at the afternoon sit, giving instructions on how to use the counting.

Just to review briefly, one way to do it is to count each breath starting at ten and counting downward to one. The reason to count down is so that it doesn't go on autopilot so easily. If we count up, we can automatically say one, two, three, but we're not really present.

So you might notice an in-breath, an out-breath, and then note ten. An in-breath, an out-breath, and note nine. And so on down to one.

The rules of this particular game are that if you miss a whole breath, you don't get to say the number, and then you have to start again at ten. But if you get any part of a breath—we play by easy rules here—you get to say the number.

So see where you get to. Can you go from ten down to one and be with some part of every breath? If you can, then see if you can do it again and maybe get twenty breaths in a row. It's not easy—twenty breaths in a row is not easy, I have to warn you. But just see where you're at and don't get too high an expectation.

I did this practice a lot when I was in Burma, and I would count the groups of ten on my fingers. As my fingers were sitting on my thighs, I would mark off the groups of ten. Often, if I'm using this technique, I'll try to get up to one hundred breaths before I open up into a choiceless kind of practice or become aware of other things.

This is the technique of counting breaths. It's just one measure of concentration, but it will put you in the ballpark. Then you can notice the variation—some sittings you may get to two breaths.

Other sittings you may get to ten. And then you'll notice it relatively. Oh, that was good. Really, this sort of staying in the moment over time is just a measure of concentration. It's like the thermometer that you stick in chocolate when you're melting it for fudge. It measures the heat. It's not itself the heat, because you don't need time to tell you if the mind is concentrated. Once you get to recognize the feeling of it, the mind-body experience, the felt sense, you'll know when you're concentrated in just a moment. You can just take a look in a moment and know, yes, the quality of concentration is high or not.

So it's very helpful if you can start to notice in your practice where the level of concentration is at. As it says in the Satipatthana Sutta, this is under the third foundation of citta or mind: "The practitioner understands concentrated mind as concentrated mind and unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated mind." This is a direct instruction from the discourse on mindfulness.

In fact, I'd say it's very helpful if you sort of continually monitor this factor and the factor of mindfulness, and one other factor—energy. So if you keep your eye on how's my mindfulness, how's my concentration, and how's my energy, this turns out to be quite insightful. Because in a way, these three stand for the different factors of enlightenment.

What we're really about in developing our meditation practice is strengthening or feeding—as Carol used the word the other night—we're feeding the factors of enlightenment and we're starving the hindrances. In a broad view, that's the purpose of meditation practice. And that's the way the journey to liberation takes place: we're feeding the factors of enlightenment. So you want to find out how fat they're getting. And the way you do that is you notice where's mindfulness, where's energy, and where's concentration. Because these three stand for the whole range of factors.

In the factors of enlightenment, mindfulness is the kicking off factor. It's the one that starts the others growing. And it's also the balancing factor, the one that keeps them all in balance. Energy stands for the three arousing factors. The first three factors of enlightenment are arousing, the last three are pacifying. Energy stands for the arousing factors which are investigation, energy, and rapture. Concentration stands for the last three which are pacifying: tranquility, concentration, and equanimity.

Now you'll start to see that when mindfulness, energy and concentration are all strong, you have a certain kind of experience in meditation. It's not that there's one state only that goes with that—there are many different ways that you can experience reality when these factors are high—but they share certain qualities. There will be a sense of clarity, there will be a sense of ease, and there will be a sense of not being taken over by thought. Because of that steadiness of concentration, thoughts come and go, but you aren't swept away with them.

On the other hand, when all these factors are low, then you have a state where the mind is either very agitated, scattered, restless, or else it's dull and there's not much connection. And then because of the lowness of the factors, you're easily swept away by thoughts, and then all the disturbing emotions that thoughts lead us into and subject us to.

Now what's very interesting about starting to watch these three—mindfulness, energy, concentration—is that you see they will always manifest their own impermanence. Try as hard as we might, we will never arrive at a cozy plateau where all these factors just kind of stay there and we cruise for the rest of the retreat. If you were waiting for that to happen, I'm sorry. These factors are always going to be going through change and manifesting impermanence. Even if your effort stays pretty steady, these factors kind of have their own lifespans and will come and go.

So where's the beauty in that? The beauty is you don't have to take the changes so personally. Concentration might be really strong in one sit. You go out to walk, you're quite inspired, you're connected, you put in good effort, you come back again, you can't wait to get back into that state. Oh, it was so delicious. It was so peaceful. I can tell it's gonna be even stronger next sit. And then you sit down and it's totally shot, and there's all this turmoil of thoughts and emotions and the mind is active and where did it go? What did I do wrong?

You didn't necessarily do anything wrong. It could just be the decay of that factor of concentration.

So as you watch these things go through their changes, you learn not to take it so personally. We're observing, we're making a moderate effort, and the factors build up, come together, have a great experience, and then decay. And then we're in the whirlwind for a while.

Out of that whirlwind, we can get really frustrated and think, "I've done it wrong. I've got to figure out what I was doing right before. Maybe it was the T-shirt I was wearing that morning. Or I'd had just the right amount of oatmeal and then no more. That was the thing that did it." We can get just as superstitious as athletes about these little tricks.

But you start to see that even if our effort is steady, these factors come and go. So then we don't worry about it so much. Because we've watched them fall apart, we also have confidence that they will come back together. Our steady effort at mindfulness is what pulls them back together again. And then we have one of those peak experiences where mindfulness, energy, and concentration are all strong—there's clarity and some ease and some stability.

So just be patient. Just be patient and keep your effort moderate. When you get into the difficult time, don't feel like you've got to do everything in your power and you've got to put it back together. Because you can't put it back together. Mindfulness can put it back together. And you just have to be steady in your effort toward mindfulness.

How does concentration develop? Basically, it is through sustained mindfulness. It is through the accumulation of enough moments, one after another, of presence and attention to what's happening that gives rise to this factor of concentration. So the key is: do one thing at a time and be wholehearted in it.

You see, as you give yourself wholeheartedly to the moment, you're manifesting samadhi. You're putting the mind in that place of wholeness and unification, and then it can build on itself. It has a foundation to grow from. So that wholeheartedness is a key part of mindfulness.

That's why the Korean Zen teacher Soen Sunim put a lot of emphasis on this teaching. He said, "When you sit, just sit. When you walk, just walk. When you eat, just eat. Be whole in everything that you do." He was the master for years and lived at the Providence, Rhode Island Zen Center.

One of the students came down in the morning for breakfast and saw the Zen master sitting there eating his breakfast and reading a newspaper. The student was very disillusioned and said, "But Master, you told us just do one thing at a time, and here you are eating your breakfast and reading a newspaper. How is that helpful?" He said, "And when you eat and read, just eat and read. Nothing else."

One of the other things you get from this wholeheartedness—and I think James mentioned this last night—is that interest is really important in bringing the mind together. Interest is really a support for concentration. Because when you're interested in something, what happens? All your energy goes there.

When that big check arrives from the contract that you just carried out, wow, there's a lot of interest in seeing that. When there's a new person in the Sangha who looks sort of like they're catching your eye, the interest is really there. So when the breath has that same kind of appeal, that interest really holds you there. It can happen. It can be really beautiful.

In order to strengthen concentration, you don't have to do anything different from your present practice. I want to make that really clear. Your present practice in these sustained attempts at mindfulness automatically will give rise to concentration. It will happen directly. So don't feel like you have to change anything. The whole idea is to aim and sustain moment after moment, and concentration will develop.

So what to do when it goes away? Because it will—it will go away. This is where the kind of moderate effort is important, because very often we can get tied up in knots trying to get the concentration back. It goes away and you remember how sweet it was, and you'll do anything to get it back. It's like the one thing that makes this whole experience worthwhile is being in the present moment and being peaceful. Otherwise, it's not really a vacation here. So you may try really hard.

How do I get concentrated? Oh, I've got to really pump it on the breath. I've got to really force it. And that will do it. More effort. That's what's needed. More effort. And so you put a lot of effort in, but it's not really about the breath. It's about feeling good again. It's about getting back to that concentration. And then, strange to say, it doesn't happen. And you find yourself getting more frustrated, and then, oh, I guess it's more effort. And then you just get tighter, and you tie yourself up into a bigger knot.

So in doing this, we forget one key thing about concentration. And it's a very wonderful lesson to learn. The proximate cause of concentration is happiness. Happiness. So what's the source of that happiness? The source of that happiness is our real acceptance of the present moment just the way it is. And you'll start to see this is the avenue to peace and therefore concentration.

So we have to come back into the moment and kind of take it just as it is, just on its own terms, not trying to make it something different or to try to find some personal gain out of it. It's that gaining and striving mind that blocks our access to peace, blocks our access to concentration. And this is part of the right attitude that Carol was talking about. How can we approach the present moment with the right attitude? It's to take it just the way it is. So then the mind can really settle into the way things are. And then the peace happens and then the concentration becomes stronger.

So anytime you're in conflict with the present moment, wanting it to be something different than what it is, not liking it the way it is or looking for something else instead, that will block the peace and the concentration from developing.

This came through to me really strongly when I was doing loving-kindness practice at IMS a few years ago. And I had gotten pretty settled in in the first week of doing the loving-kindness practice intensively. And it is a concentration practice. And the concentration was starting to develop and it felt quite good and the metta was coming through.

And then something external happened that threw off my balance. I lost my connection, my mind got stirred up, and when that passed, I settled back into doing the phrases of loving kindness and my mind wouldn't collect again. And I got very frustrated because I really like that concentration aspect. So I tried harder and I pushed on the phrases and I said them faster and I tried to force some metta to come, and none of it worked.

And then at that point, I had an interview with my teacher, who was Joseph Goldstein, and I went in and told him about the situation. I said, "Joseph, I just can't get back to that concentration. I'm really frustrated." He said, "Guy, the metta practice isn't for ourselves. It's for the other." Bingo.

And then this light went off. I was corrupting the practice. I wasn't caring about the other person. I was just using them as an object so I could feel good. So how much metta is in that? There was zero. So what Joseph was telling me is, look, you've got to go back and care about the other person. "You mean the concentration comes out of the caring?" "Yeah."

So I went back, I gave up my quest, I just got back to simply caring about the other person as I was sending the metta, and then all of a sudden the concentration was back again.

So the same thing with the breath. If you want to use an in-breath just as a springboard to feeling good and getting concentrated, it won't get there. You have to be seriously interested in the breath for the breath's sake. And so what it really requires is this real innocence. No ulterior motives, but just really being interested in the present moment for the sake of the present moment. Being interested in the breath just for the sake of the breath. Or a sensation, or a sound, or an emotion, or a thought. Not to get anything out of it, but just to see it the way it is.

Then the concentration will unfold.

When I was a yogi, I think I knew this, but I see it even more clearly as a teacher, that we all have really different aptitudes in the area of concentration. It's like athletic ability. I'm a tennis fan, and the people that I really enjoy watching are the ones who have this natural athletic ability. So on the men's side, I was a huge fan for years of Pete Sampras, who has this kind of just grace and power and speed and fluidity around the court. And on the women's side of the game, the Williams sisters really have these qualities too. This is natural athleticism that is so fun to watch.

Well, in meditation also, some of us have a natural aptitude for this quality, especially of concentration. And one of those people with this aptitude is a Thai master named Ajahn Jumnian. I don't know how many of you have met Ajahn Jumnian, but he comes to Spirit Rock every year, usually in May, and he is a trip. He has this incredible energy that's one of the byproducts of concentration. He has a lot of joy. And when you listen to him teach, you can just feel the radiation of his energy and his happiness.

So when Ajahn Jumnian was four years old, his parents were both practicing Buddhists in Thailand and I'm sure went regularly to the temples to visit and offer dana. And Ajahn Jumnian had no doubt seen other people meditating. So one day, at the age of four, he sat down on the floor of his house, cross-legged, he closed his eyes, and he went away. And he didn't come out.

And so his parents sort of tapped him and knocked on the door and shook him and called his name. No response. He just sat there, not moving, not responding, somewhere else. So they got worried. So they went to get the local priest and said, "Please, can you come help with our son? He's gone. I don't know what's happened to him. I don't know if he's going to come back."

So the priest comes around and looks at him and says, "Oh, he's just in a state of samadhi. There's nothing to worry about. Just let him be and he'll come back when he's ready."

So sure enough, about 24 hours later, Ajahn Jumnian's eyes popped open and he got up and moved around and he was quite fine and bright and eager and very happy. So at this point, his parents knew they had a prodigy on their hands. So they started training him from the age of four. They took him to the local Buddhist teacher, and they took him to the local shaman, because concentration is the base of the shamanic path. So Ajahn Jumnian, from a very early age, got training in both these streams, and he still has both these talents. It's very interesting.

One day he was teaching a daylong at the lower hall. And in the middle of the daylong, he pointed to one woman who was sitting about halfway back and he said, "How are you feeling?"

And she said, "Well, now that you mentioned it, my stomach is really upset."

And so he said, "Oh, okay, I have something for you." And he opened up this big vest that he has that he carries around with all sorts of trinkets and amulets and potions and lotions. And he took out this bottle of white fluid and he said, "Here, drink this." And he gave her the bottle and she drank it. And he kept on teaching. He came back about 20 minutes later. "How are you now?"

She said, "I'm totally fine."

Powers of mind also come from samadhi. Very interesting.

But my point is, some people have a natural ability in this direction. Some people don't. I was not one of those who did. And I remember being on a retreat at IMS early on. We closed the center down, and the staff were sitting together. Carol was there also at that time. This was about 1979. And we were sitting in a circle. There were only about 10 or 12 of us at this point. And I happened to open my eyes in the middle of a sitting, and I looked at a friend who was sitting nearby. And she was in a posture that was kind of like she was absorbed in some divine communion with some higher realm that I hadn't even a clue about in my practice.

And sympathetic appreciation was not the first mind state that came to my mind. I thought, what am I doing here? She had that capability and I really didn't.

So I had to work really hard at this factor of concentration and I've put in months and months of practice doing particular concentration techniques. And over the years, I've gotten up to a middling level of concentration, but not an exalted level of concentration.

So I want to just recommend for those of you for whom it comes naturally and easily, it's a wonderful quality to enhance and develop. For those of you for whom it doesn't come so easily, it's also a wonderful quality to develop, and it absolutely can be developed. It's really just a question of putting in the time and commitment to bring it out. And it's a very helpful quality, as I'll talk about more.

What blocks concentration are primarily two things. Discursive thinking. And by that I mean not just the passing thought that you can see clearly and let go, but when you get off on a train of thinking. And you kind of jump on that train and you ride it for a while. That's what I mean by this phrase, discursive thinking. You follow a train of thought for a while.

So one thought arising and seen and returned to the present object, your chosen object, not a problem. The thought can be seen clearly as just another arising. Mindfulness is intact. Thoughts are not problems. Our getting lost in the content of thought, however, is a loss of mindfulness and therefore interrupts the development of concentration.

The other thing that disrupts it basically are the hindrances that Howie talked about a few nights ago. When we don't see the hindrance clearly, it takes us on a ride of its own creation. We get lost in the projection of the storyline of what we want or what we don't like or all the restlessness or doubt that comes. When we can turn and see the hindrance directly, we see desire as desire, we see aversion as aversion. Again, mindfulness is established and it can continue to develop the concentration. But hindrances typically lead us astray and we lose, ordinarily, some concentration to them.

So these are what impede it. So now I want to talk in the remainder of the talk about deepening concentration and why we care about it. Why should we care about developing this factor of the path, this factor of samadhi?

The most important reason is to develop concentration as a base for stronger and deeper insight. Yes, concentration feels good in and of itself, but in and of itself it's limited. It doesn't have the power for the complete freedom of mind that the Buddha was looking for, which is why he left his concentration teachers. So similarly for us, the most valuable aspect of concentration is that from its foundation, we really have the ability to develop insight much more strongly and clearly.

The reason for that is concentration in bringing the mind to tranquility wears away or takes away temporarily the forces of greed and aversion that move the mind and keep us agitated. When the mind is under the sway of likes and dislikes, wanting and not wanting, it doesn't see clearly. When those are stilled, the mind sees more clearly. So this is the first and most important factor of concentration. The contribution of it is that it lets us see clearly and insight comes from that.

But secondarily, in and of itself, it makes a great contribution to our sense of ourselves, not only on retreat but in daily life. Concentration brings a tremendous sense of well-being and ease. The access to it is through relaxation, and in its wake come peace and stability. So the concentrated mind becomes the foundation for living in the world with a real sense of inner peace.

This is from the Dalai Lama: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." Samadhi is the doorway to that sense of inner peace. And I actually don't know any way to get there other than the development of samadhi. Insight also delivers it. But again, we need a certain base of samadhi in order to have deep insight.

You often hear talk today of certain practices being concentration practices and other practices being insight practices. In the tradition, these are called the directions or the paths of samatha, or serenity as it's often translated, and vipassana, or insight. And these are often presented to us as dichotomies or opposites. You know, which are you doing? Are you doing a samatha practice or are you doing a vipassana practice?

As far as I know, the Buddha never talked about samatha practices as distinct from vipassana practices. But as I read the suttas, the sense that comes across to me is that as we practice mindfulness, we generate samatha, or serenity, and we generate vipassana, or insight. Both unfold from the practice of mindfulness.

Both are described in the suttas in this way. But the fact is that later practitioners and later commentaries do present certain practices which more strongly develop the quality of samatha or tranquility. And it's these same practices that strengthen more directly the factor of concentration or samadhi.

So the Visuddhimagga, which is a 6th century text from Sri Lanka, lists 40 different objects of meditation that are particularly recommended for developing concentration. These include visual images called kasinas, which are disks or representations of colors or elements; meditation on corpses in various stages of decay; recollections of the three gems—that is the refuges—or the contemplation on death; mindfulness of breath; and the Brahmaviharas.

In our styles of teaching here at Spirit Rock, we primarily teach this strong development of concentration either through the Brahmaviharas or through mindfulness of breathing. These are the two routes that we most often recommend. For people who have done a lot of Vipassana practice in the past and who want to take a month or six weeks to explore concentration in a little more depth, we often will work with you on those practices through the interviews. We tend not to give the instructions up front, but there are people here who are doing metta practice or breath practice regularly, particularly for the development of concentration and the strengthening of concentration. And that's something that we offer when someone has done a certain amount of Vipassana practice in the past.

But concentration will develop naturally in doing your practice as you're doing it. And I want to mention some ways in doing standard Vipassana practice that you can strengthen that factor.

One way is to continue to place an ongoing emphasis on your primary anchor, which may be the breath, could be body sensations, could be sounds. But the one that you keep coming back to again and again, keep making that a primary object for yourself. That will strengthen the quality of concentration.

Use the technique in being with the breath of noting or counting, because both of these help keep the mind from wandering off.

Use the walking periods for formal walking. This is highly recommended as it provides that continuity of mindfulness from the sitting to the walking and back again.

In the informal practice times—meals, work meditation, around your room, showering, and so forth—use continuous noting. Note what activity you're with: eating, lifting, chewing, or if you're brushing your teeth, reaching, touching, lifting, squeezing, brushing, and so on. That continuous noting also keeps you anchored in the present. We might talk more about this in the instructions soon.

Slow down throughout the day. The calming of the body will help to calm the mind.

Guard the sense doors. You don't have to look around for entertainment every time someone passes you by. You don't need to know who that is. Rather, try and keep that focus on your chosen meditation object.

When you sit, have an emphasis on keeping the body still and unmoving. Again, the stillness of body will contribute to stillness of mind.

Once you settle in, if sitting 45 minutes or an hour is comfortable, extend your periods of sitting. Sometimes that will let the mind and body settle to a deeper extent than they had been able to in a shorter sitting.

Be really moderate with your food. Overeating makes you drowsy and you lose that sharpness.

Be moderate in your sleep. As the retreat goes on, people's sleep needs often go down. Don't sleep more than you really need. Don't wake up in the morning, feel refreshed, and then roll over for another dose, but have a thought that you just want to sleep the minimal hours that you really need. As your sleep needs reduce, you can expand your hours of formal practice and basically take the schedule as a starting point and then expand your hours of practice beyond that according to what is comfortable for you.

Now these sound rigorous, and it can be challenging to practice in this way, but don't get the sense that this is like an extraordinary thing to do. This is how all of us were taught, and this is how all of us practiced based on the teachings that we got at that time. So it is really recommended as your standard mode once you settle into a long retreat, if you're able to.

As concentration deepens, the first thing that one encounters are these five jhanic factors, which Howie talked about, and I think James mentioned also last night. Vitakka is connecting, which we've talked about a lot. Vicara is sustaining. We've talked about both of those quite a bit in being with the breath. The third one is piti, often translated as rapture. To me, that's a little bit of an exuberant translation. Sometimes—I'd say most of the time—piti doesn't come with a lot of affect. Piti is simply the kind of pleasure that we have when we connect with the meditation object in an ongoing way. And when piti is strong, it has an impact in the body.

The bodily energy starts to increase as a result of piti, and we may feel that in different ways. It can be goosebumps on the skin, or a sense of jolt of energy that passes through quite quickly, or waves of energy that pass through us like showers, or what's called all-pervading rapture where it more or less fills the body.

The fourth factor is sukha, translated as happiness or comfort, or the translation I like is contentment. Sukha is one of the factors that has the most affect to it. There's usually a sweet and pleasant quality to sukha that is quite fulfilling and therefore lets the mind settle into that quality of contentment. That's where the riches start to be unfolded, and then the mind likes to settle within those riches. This is really the base of deep contentment.

And ekagata—as the mind settles within itself, it becomes really collected, and that's that sense of one-pointedness. Now, one-pointedness suggests a narrow focus of attention, and this is a way to develop samadhi. You can collect the mind around a narrow focus like the breath. When I practiced in Burma a year ago, my teacher told me to focus on the breath as experienced just above the upper lip in an area about the width of a fingertip. That was my focus for six weeks. I came to him and I said, "I've got really strong body pain in a sitting today. Should I pay attention to that?" He said, "No, stay here." That was the only object that I was given. So that does generate strong samadhi.

But another way to generate the one-pointedness is just to collect the mind around whatever is arising. This is called momentary or khanika samadhi. So the mind, the attention is with a sound for a moment. Connect and sustain. The next moment with a sensation in the knee. Connect and sustain. Then a thought. Then an in-breath. Then an emotion. Then another sound. It's moving, but in each moment there's a fullness of attention. So the mindfulness is steady, even though the attention is moving. This will also develop samadhi in this form called khanika or momentary samadhi.

So we don't need to understand the one-pointedness or ekagata as being about a narrow focus. The mind can collect around a broad range of phenomena. Ajahn Sumedho has a really nice way of explaining this. He says that ekagata is the one point that includes everything. So what's the one point that includes everything? How about the present moment? Now. Now is the one point that includes everything. So when the mind collects in the present moment, however wide that is, that is also ekagata.

As the jhanic factors become stronger, they offset the hindrances. This is a wonderful experience. We don't realize how frequently and really incessantly the hindrances are tormenting us until they stop. And when the mind moves into this state where the hindrances are temporarily suspended, it feels just great. It's called access concentration or neighborhood concentration because it's getting close to the jhanas. The Pali word is upacara samadhi.

The Buddha said that for one who has encountered this, when these five hindrances have been abandoned in oneself temporarily, one sees that as freedom from debt, health after a long illness, release from prison, freedom from slavery, and a land of safety. These are very strong comparisons—release from prison and freedom from slavery. This is what it's like to have an extended period without the hindrances being present. This is the ripening of the jhanic factors.

As they continue to become stronger, they culminate in what's called the absorption of the first jhana. And in the first jhana, the mind collects so strongly in itself that it becomes temporarily very stable and unshakable. The hindrances are way left behind, and all the factors have come together in a balanced way that is very strengthening and to a certain degree deeply satisfying.

So we do have people in these month-long retreats who are encountering and practicing the jhanas. This is not something that is done only by monks from 2,500 years ago.

This is happening for people today in this meditation hall on this retreat. But it is basically a retreat practice. Learning the jhanas, in our opinion, takes about a month of dedication to see if there is currently the ability to access them. Some people will be able to, some people may not. That's okay. But anytime you undertake a period of concentration practice, you will still be strengthening the factor of samadhi.

The first jhana has all five of the factors in balance. The Buddha described it like this: rapture and happiness drench, steep, fill, and pervade the body so that there is no part of the body unpervaded by rapture and happiness.

In the second jhana, because the attention then becomes so effortless, the factors of connecting and sustaining actually fall away. They're not needed. We don't need to make the effort to connect and sustain because the mind is naturally so present, so connected. So in the second jhana, there's a refining of the experience, and the second jhana is characterized only by rapture, happiness, and equanimity.

But still in the second jhana, the quality of rapture, this bodily energy, can feel quite intense, so intense that it can have an aspect of not being pleasurable, being a little too stirred up. So the third jhana, there's a falling away of the element of piti or rapture, and the only two factors present are happiness and one-pointedness. Sukha and ekaggata. And it is at this level that the Buddha said, this is a sublime abiding. The third and fourth jhanas are said to be a sublime abiding.

In the fourth jhana, even the factor of happiness drops away. And that jhana is only characterized by the presence of one-pointedness and this deep sense of equanimity.

Above these very deep states of absorption are four other levels called the formless attainments. The mind of infinite space—opening up from the fourth jhana, one opens up to the expansiveness of the experience. The sense of the body has generally fallen away at this point. And one just becomes aware that space is unbounded.

After being with that, one is lifted into the fifth jhana where one starts to tune in: space is unbounded, but there is a knowing of it. And this is called the plane of infinite consciousness. And then that, in its greater refinement, goes to the sixth jhana, which is called the plane of nothingness. One sees that the consciousness is illuminating nothing. There is nothing there. And the seventh jhana is considered even transcending the perception of nothingness. It's a plane of neither perception nor non-perception—almost too subtle to describe or imagine.

So these are the fruits of concentration, then laying the development for that insight that can see beyond all conditioned phenomena for the direct realization of nirvana and the process of enlightenment.

Let's end on that note. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 264

The History of Buddhism in India - Part 1

Guy Armstrong · 44 min

In this illuminating dharma talk, Guy Armstrong begins a comprehensive exploration of Buddhism's historical development in India, from the Buddha's parinibbāna (circa 463 BCE) to the emergence of Dzogchen teachings (8th century CE). Drawing from his own journey between Vipassanā and Dzogchen practice, Armstrong addresses the philosophical questions that arise when encountering different Buddhist traditions.

The talk traces the early centuries after the Buddha's death, beginning with the First Council where Ānanda recited the suttas from memory, through the oral transmission period lasting 400 years. Armstrong examines the first major split around 100 years after the Buddha's death between the Mahāsaṅgikas and the Sthaviras (predecessors to modern Theravāda), exploring disputes over monastic conduct and scriptural authority that continue to resonate today.

The discussion covers the development of the Abhidhamma as Buddhism's "third basket," the influential Sarvāstivādin school's innovations including emphasis on the pāramīs, and King Asoka's pivotal role in Buddhism's spread. Armstrong concludes with the preservation of the Pāli Canon in Sri Lanka and the emergence of Mahāyāna as a mystical response to systematic Abhidhamma teachings, setting the stage for understanding how different Buddhist traditions share common roots while developing distinct approaches to liberation.

I had been practicing for about fifteen years in the Vipassana lineage and was very familiar with the Four Noble Truths, the Eightfold Path, and mindfulness of breathing and body. Then I showed up on this Dzogchen retreat, and within two days I was chanting hundred-syllable mantras for golden-hued deities who had been primordially enlightened beyond space and time. I found myself trying to figure out: what is going on here? What am I doing? Is this the same religion? Is it the same philosophy at all? And what sense could I make of the relationship between these two approaches? It brought up a lot of questions for me.

One of the key questions was this notion that Rinpoche was explaining—that the ground is the inseparable union of emptiness and cognizance, meaning that awareness is somehow connected with what is unconditioned. This was not a teaching I had heard in fifteen years of Theravada practice. Where did that come from? Was it true or wasn't it? Many well-known Theravadan teachers were saying, absolutely not true. The realization of the unconditioned comes with no consciousness, no cognizance present whatsoever. And if there's a trace of cognizance there, it's not the real thing.

What was the connection between the Rigpa practice that Rinpoche was teaching and the mindfulness quality that I had been developing all along, rooted in the four foundations of mindfulness from the Theravada? What was the connection to the deities and the mantras and the mandalas and that whole cosmology that Tibetan Buddhism opened up?

These questions really occupied my interest for a long time, and I had to search deeply within my own experience, talk to many different teachers, and read extensively until I felt I had come to a resolution that felt comfortable for me. I found many points of overlap and some points of potential conflict that took me a while to sort through.

Also, as you'll be finding if you're new to this practice, as Rinpoche unfolds it over the next few days, the practice of Rigpa is a subtle practice—one of the most subtle practices I've come across. It was hard for me to find my footing in that kind of very spacious territory. Again, it took me a while to feel I had my feet on the non-ground, or the groundless ground, that Dzogchen is based upon.

And yet I found these teachings opened up a whole new dimension of my understanding and my practice. They were very valuable for me. Many other Vipassana practitioners have felt the same thing. It's out of this shared experience and a love for these teachings that we've invited Rinpoche to come to Spirit Rock. This is actually the third time he has taught here.

The basic motivation on the part of Spirit Rock as an organization is to be able to share these teachings with the Vipassana community that makes their spiritual home here. Of course, at the same time, Rinpoche has many students of his own in the Bay Area, and we also wanted to open the doors for all of you to come and join us. So we have this rather mixed audience for this week, which is part of what makes it an interesting week. Some people come strictly from a Theravadan background, some from a Vajrayana background, some with a mix. So there's a wide range, and I hope to say something meaningful to everyone in the course of the week. But if I don't, I apologize.

My particular interest really is in helping new practitioners, especially from the Vipassana lineage, be able to make a quick and helpful relationship with the Dzogchen teachings. That's the main reason I'm here and the main role that I want to fulfill in these evening talks—to save you some of the struggles that I went through as I was making my wavering way over a number of years into these teachings. I want to do that on both a theoretical level and a practice level.

Tonight, because Rinpoche is keeping his talks mostly on the conceptual level at the beginning, I'm also going to be on the conceptual level. A couple of days later, as we get into more of the experiential pointings of the Rigpa practice, my talks will also move in a more experiential direction.

What I'd like to talk about tonight is a little bit of the relationship of all the Buddhist practices. When Rinpoche and I were first talking about bringing this retreat to Spirit Rock, we thought, what are we going to call it? We ended up calling it a Dzogchen retreat, which I think is the most honest advertisement. But at one point, we thought of calling it "the Dzogchen view of Vipassana and the Vipassana view of Dzogchen retreat," because I think both traditions have something to offer one another. But we settled for simplicity, which I think was helpful.

In addition to all the questions that were raised in terms of the way the teachings differed, I also felt a lot of overlap as I listened to Rinpoche, and I hope you heard that today. From the Theravadan end of things, there was quite a bit of talk about suffering and ignorance, attachment, clinging, impermanence—all those staples, the three poisons, karma, which are solidly within the Theravadan lineage. There were also elements in his teaching that were more particularly Mahayana: the emphasis on compassion, bodhicitta, and the emphasis on emptiness are more commonly associated with the Mahayana strain. And then as he started to get into a description of Dzogpa Chenpo with ground, path, and fruition, we start to move really into the realm of the Vajrayana teachings.

As I started listening to Rinpoche those years ago, I realized that between the Four Noble Truths and Dzogpa Chenpo, a few other things had happened in between. So what I'd like to do over these next two nights is talk about what happened in between. I'm going to title this "A Short History of Buddhism in India: From Parinirvana to Dzogchen." Basically, what took place between the death of the Buddha, which is around 463 BCE, and the development of these more advanced practices.

and the emergence of Dzogchen, which is placed around the 8th century CE in India.

Now a couple of notes on time frames. The common way of talking about historical time in Western cultures is B.C. and A.D., which is based on the life of Christ. Being Buddhists, we don't necessarily want that to be our milestone, so the scholarly way of talking about it is using the term C.E. to stand for Common Era, though it still starts at year zero of the Christian calendar. So typically I'll use CE for the centuries and dates that we're familiar with. We're currently in 2006 of the Common Era, and BCE means before the Common Era. It's simply de-Christianizing the same calendar that we're currently using.

If we were in Thailand right now, we would be in the year 2549, because that follows the Buddhist era. So really, it would be wonderful as Buddhists to speak in terms of the year 2549, but it would be difficult to relate it to all the other history you know, so I won't do that.

As we explore what happened in India from the early teachings to the Mahayana and the emergence of the Vajrayana, one of the most fascinating aspects is the variety of questions that emerged as the schools split. The splitting of the schools took place not so much by geography, but primarily around philosophical questions. These are the same sorts of philosophical questions that we encounter when we try to blend the classical teachings of the Buddha with the Vajrayana teachings. So as you listen to different streams within the Buddhist tradition, these are questions that may naturally arise for you to contemplate. As we explore the unfolding of this history, I think you'll begin to see the origin of these discussions and questions.

The second thing to mention is that I'm going to be presenting the findings and research of scholars—primarily Western scholars, but also some Asian scholars—who trace the evolution of Buddhism through these different schools in a chronological sequence. You may hear from different Asian teachers that all these teachings were spoken by the historical Buddha, but to different audiences. The research of Western scholars suggests otherwise. I don't want to particularly enter into an argument about that. It's really up to you to decide what your own view is. But I'll simply be presenting the way that Western scholars, for the most part, have outlined it based on their historical research, which is generally quite unbiased.

The reason I'm staying focused on India is because Theravada and Tibetan Buddhism share a common foundation, which is Indian Buddhism. When Buddhism migrated further east to China, particularly, and later to Japan and Korea, it transformed completely into Chan and then Zen and took on a very different flavor. In some ways, if you've ever tried, it's difficult to have a philosophical discussion with a Zen master, because they'll hit you with a stick or something equivalent. But the common thread between Theravadins and Tibetans is that we're all willing to discuss how conceptual mind can understand these teachings. Whereas in the Zen tradition, they will often cut short and disallow dialogue about conventional understanding. This goes back to the nature of Indian Buddhism. India is a very philosophically inclined culture, and that has influenced both the Theravadin school and the Tibetan school. So we, in a way, share a common outlook on the role of the conceptual mind.

One of the other things that arise when one addresses a mixed audience and also talks about different traditions is that there may well be differences in views and opinions. And sometimes friendships diverge on the basis of different views and opinions. You may have noticed that with others of your friends. So I hope that we find the great spaciousness of mind that holds all the different views and opinions while still maintaining the underlying spirit of loving-kindness and friendship.

This is from an early Buddhist text from the Sutta Nipata. This is the Buddha speaking:

"This I do now declare. After investigation, there is nothing among all doctrines that such a one as I would embrace. Seeing misery in philosophical views, without adopting any of them, searching for truth, I discovered inner peace. For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by understanding, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions wander about in the world annoying people."

So with that as a preface, in the spirit of loving-kindness and amity, I want to talk about this unfolding of the history of Buddhism.

The early form of Buddhism we could call classical Buddhism, we could call it Pali Buddhism, or we could call it Nikaya Buddhism, because the teachings have come down to us in the form of Pali language texts and collected into gatherings called the Nikayas. So all of these terms can be used synonymously. It could also just be called early Buddhism. So I'll use one of these terms to refer to that early stage.

This early school of Buddhism is considered to have been alive in an unbroken form and transmitted from teacher to disciple since the death of the Buddha over 2,500 years ago. For about 400 years in India, again according to scholars, this was the only form of Buddhism available. There was nothing but Nikaya Buddhism for about 400 years after the death of the Buddha.

And of course, it's also the foundation for the Mahayana. The Mahayana arose in groups who were already steeped in the classical teachings. The Mahayana flourished for hundreds of years, and the Vajrayana arose based on people who were deeply grounded in the Mahayana. So when we listen to Vajrayana teachings, we have to realize they're layered on top of the Mahayana, which is layered on top of the classical teachings. So the classical teachings really are the foundation for all the later schools.

In fact, the Dalai Lama has often said that what unites all Buddhists is our agreement on the teaching of the Four Noble Truths. In a way, we can think of this as our common foundation: the truth of suffering, the cause of suffering, the end of suffering, and the way leading to the end of suffering.

It's interesting that even when you encounter Mahayana texts that attempt to refute some of the classical teachings, they use the same language. When you listen to the Heart Sutra, for example, what it does is negate the five aggregates, dependent origination, and the Four Noble Truths—which are the very cornerstones of Theravadan teaching. You can imagine, as a practitioner reciting the Heart Sutra every day, you're hearing these basic teachings over and over. In many Zen temples, the Heart Sutra is recited before every meal, so you're constantly hearing about the aggregates, the chain of dependent origination, the Four Noble Truths—letting them really sink into your bones as you go through the ups and downs of intensive meditation practice. Then you hear them negated, and the mind has to make another philosophical turn to understand that. But all these concepts and teachings are living with you all the time in that setting.

After the Buddha died, for about a hundred years, the community lived in considerable harmony. But think realistically—what happens when a charismatic founder dies? If you look back at other spiritual movements, what tends to happen is the followers understand things differently. Disciple A has a different take than disciple B, who differs from disciple C. Eventually they go their separate ways because they want to carve out their own understanding.

A lot of this history is lost, of course. Scholars are still trying to put the pieces together, and how much is lost is unanswerable—but it's a huge amount. One interesting thing about the Tibetan tradition is that it's very literate. Once Buddhism became established in Tibet, detailed records were kept of lineages, teachers, and written teachings. But the Theravadan lineage is just the opposite. For whatever reason, we are not a very literate tradition.

Let me test this with those of you who've had contact with Theravadan Buddhism. Can you name three famous Theravadans who lived after the time of the Buddha and before, say, 1900?

Buddhaghosa. There it ends, right? One literary figure in the whole lineage for 2,500 years. That's pretty astounding. I'll mention a couple of others as we go through, but notice that the Theravadan lineage has been very practice-oriented and not very philosophically oriented. That's just the way it is. If I asked you for Tibetan figures from that same period, you could probably come up with a dozen easily.

So the first hundred years in India were quite harmonious. The followers all got along together, and there was just one school. But let me back up a little. After the death of the Buddha, the first council was called among all the fully enlightened beings who were alive at the time. There were said to be 499 of them, along with the Buddha's attendant from his last 25 years—another bhikkhu named Ananda.

Ananda had followed the Buddha around for the last quarter-century of his life and listened to all his dharma talks. Anytime he missed a teaching, he would ask someone later to repeat what had been said, and he had a fantastic memory. So he was brought to this gathering of 499 arhats, but Ananda was only a stream-enterer—the first stage of enlightenment. He felt very ashamed and embarrassed and didn't know if he should really join the circle.

He thought, "I'd better try really hard. I've got one night before the council meets. Maybe I can become fully enlightened before morning and join them as an arhat." So he practiced intensively all night long—sitting and walking, sitting and walking—but didn't get there. Just before dawn, he gave up. "I can't make it. I'm just going to relax a little bit." As he laid down for a brief rest, thinking "I just can't do it," and just before his head hit the pillow—full enlightenment.

This says something about the value of relaxation in our practice. May it be so for someone here.

So Ananda came to the First Council and recited from memory all the suttas he could remember, then instructed other people in their memorization. These teachings filled about twenty volumes in the first Pali Text Society edition—in romanized text, all recited by one individual. They weren't written down at the time, likely because the technology of writing wasn't available. They were passed on purely as an oral tradition.

Different schools and different monasteries and nunneries were charged with reciting and memorizing different portions of this entire twenty-volume set. In this way, the oral tradition was handed down for about four hundred years. For the first hundred years, everything remained unified—everybody was still practicing together.

But in the western part of India, around what we now know as Delhi, rumors began to arrive about some rebellious monks on the east coast, perhaps around Calcutta. All of this was happening in the Ganges Valley. These monks were reportedly doing scandalous things—they had started handling gold and silver, which was strictly outlawed in the Vinaya, the code of discipline that was also recited after the Buddha's death. Monks were forbidden to touch money. Yet these monks declared it acceptable to use gold and silver, which greatly upset their western counterparts.

The other troubling development was that these monks began to doubt the authority of the Buddha's discourses as they had been collected. "We don't think that's the whole truth," they said. "We trust our own experience as well. We won't rely solely on the authority of those texts, even if they were the word of the Buddha."

This caused a fundamental split between the westerners, who held to the authority of the suttas—the original discourses—and this new group in the east. A second council was called one hundred years after the Buddha's death to see if they could reconcile their differences, but they could not.

The first great schism occurred at that point. The group that split off called themselves the Mahasangikas, which simply means "great assembly"—there must have been quite a few of them on the east coast, this fringe group. The group that remained faithful to the established form of teachings called themselves the Sthaviravadins, which means "elders." In Pali, Sthavira becomes Theravada. This was likely the true origin of the Theravada school as it continues to this day.

These kinds of questions arise today as well. What is the true source of spiritual authority? Is it our own personal experience? Is it a revered text passed down from a great teacher? Is it the word of your particular teacher? When is it safe to debate such matters? What can get you expelled from a community? One very orthodox Theravada practitioner, when I mentioned the value of Dzogchen teachings, said to me, "But that's corrupting the true teachings. That will lead to the decline of the true Dhamma in time." Divisions happen on the basis of views like these.

The next phase in Buddhism's evolution was the development of the Abhidhamma. The Abhidhamma is considered the third basket in the Theravada canon, the Pali canon. The first basket contains the Buddha's discourses, the second contains the Vinaya—the monks' and nuns' code of discipline. The third basket is the Abhidhamma.

The Abhidhamma represents a very analytical approach designed to systematize all the lists the Buddha taught—the five hindrances, the five aggregates, the six sense bases, the Four Noble Truths—collecting them together in one place to create a coherent philosophical system. It's fascinating that this development occurred, because it probably didn't happen during the Buddha's lifetime. The Buddha taught skillful means for the sole purpose of liberating beings. After his death, philosophical questions arose: How can we complete this as a comprehensive system? How can we demonstrate to outsiders the coherence and consistency of our school of thought?

The Abhidhamma apparently began forming not long after the Buddha's death. There were certainly traces of it by about one hundred years later. But the form we have today—another seven volumes—didn't emerge, scholars say, until about three hundred years after the Buddha's death.

Now, if you ask an orthodox Theravadin about the Abhidhamma's origin, he'll tell you it was taught by the Buddha himself. They have an elaborate story to explain this. They say it was too extensive to have been taught in one human setting, yet it had to be delivered in one sitting. So what happened was this: during one rains retreat—you know the Buddha established himself each rainy season so the monks and nuns wouldn't trample the crops—during one particular rainy season, the Buddha went up to Tushita heaven and delivered the Abhidhamma over three months to his mother, who was dwelling in Tushita heaven. In the heaven realm, they explain, one could sit for three months without moving.

Do you believe it? Perhaps not. But the story continues: they say he simultaneously transmitted his psychic body back to earth during the same rains retreat and delivered the Abhidhamma teachings to Sariputta.

So that is how Orthodox Theravadans explain the origin of the Abhidhamma as coming from the mouth of the Buddha.

Scholars, however, say that this is not true. They contend that the Abhidhamma in its current form was only assembled three hundred years later, and they have ways to track its origins with some confidence. We'll see this theme emerge again later, because many later teachings, according to scholars, were developed by anonymous authors and attributed to the Buddha to give them greater credibility. We'll return to this important point.

So the Abhidhamma took its current form about three hundred years after the death of the Buddha.

Another significant inflection point occurred around the year 250 BCE, about two hundred years after the Buddha's passing. At this time, a king named Asoka had come to the throne in northern India. Asoka is one of the most famous kings in both Indian history and Buddhist history.

Initially, he was a warlike, violent conqueror. He had conquered all the neighboring chiefdoms and kingdoms, creating a vast territory under his rule. It's said that after one particularly devastating battle, he stood looking down at the carnage—all the dead soldiers from both his army and the opposing forces—and was stricken with profound guilt that his own ambition had caused such massive death.

In the midst of surveying the battlefield's remnants, he saw a Buddhist monk walking slowly through the bodies. The monk displayed such composure and radiance that something shifted within Asoka. He wondered: "How is it that this monk, who has nothing, is more equanimous and radiant than I, who have everything material?"

It's said that at that moment, his heart turned. He soon thereafter converted to Buddhism and completely transformed his kingdom. He renounced war, sending messages to all neighboring kingdoms that his days of conquest were finished. He wanted to live in peace and harmony. He distributed food and wealth liberally throughout his realm so that people felt secure and confident.

This actually represents one of the few teachings of the Buddha on how an effective government should be organized. The Buddha said that poverty should not exist in a dharmic environment. Asoka began outlawing many forms of animal sacrifice that continued under the Vedic rules followed by the Brahmins. A real sense of peacefulness pervaded his kingdom.

Moreover, he became a great patron of the Dharma, supporting many monasteries and nunneries. The Dharma flourished greatly under Asoka's rule.

Asoka himself convened the Third Council around 250 BCE, likely as a way to bring the Sangha together. However, the result was another split, giving rise to an important school called the Sarvastivadins.

The Sarvastivadins were puzzled by a philosophical question that the Buddha had left unanswered, which Rinpoche alluded to earlier today: Where do karmic effects live? When you perform an action arising from a motivation—whether wholesome or unwholesome—it's said to have a karmic impact that stretches into the future. But how is that effect carried forward? The action, once completed, is done. Whatever mind state was present during the action is impermanent and passes away. Your body moves forward and changes. The other person moves forward and changes. How does karma transmit itself forward?

The Sarvastivadins made the first recorded attempt to answer this question. Their solution seems somewhat risky to me: they decided that past, present, and future all really exist now. The past has never truly gone away, and the future is already here. This was a very radical philosophical stance, but it was their way of addressing the question. They argued that past actions actually still live on, and this is how the past is able to reach in and touch the present.

One of the other innovations from the Sarvastivadins was their emphasis on the paramis. The paramis became a great force in the Mahayana tradition. The Sarvastivadins, who were still within the field of classical Buddhism, were the first to bring them forth and really emphasize them. They're hardly mentioned at all as a list in the Pali Canon—appearing perhaps once, and not from the mouth of the Buddha, but in another volume.

The Mahayana brought the six paramis to the forefront, and Shantideva's guide to the Bodhisattva's way of life crystallized a whole series of teachings around the paramis as a path to enlightenment.

The Sarvastavadins were incredibly influential for several reasons. They tended to migrate to the north and west of India, and their texts and canon were all in Sanskrit. They had their own Abhidharma in Sanskrit as well. As Buddhism spread—and by the way, almost all of Asia was Buddhist at one point or another—it's incredible to look back at the reach of the Buddhist teachings.

Starting in India, Buddhism soon spread to Pakistan, which is said to have been the home of Padmasambhava, who took the Dzogchen teachings into Tibet. It spread into Afghanistan—you probably remember that it was only a few years ago the Taliban knocked down those huge standing Buddhas that had been there for thousands of years. From Afghanistan and Pakistan, it spread into Nepal, where it remains alive today. It traveled into Tibet and China via the Silk Route, which went through Kashmir and then up over the north of Nepal into Tibet. From there it entered China, and later Japan and Korea, transforming into Chan and Zen. Buddhism also spread from India to Sri Lanka and Southeast Asia, down through Indonesia. Essentially all of Asia at certain times was mostly Buddhist.

It's amazing to see this historical reach, and today it's mostly dying. Buddhism is mostly on the decline in Asia. Either communism has gotten it, or what communism hasn't gotten, capitalism is getting. So it's sad from that perspective. We all need to practice hard and hope that it stays alive here.

The Sarvastavadins planted themselves in the northwest and west of India, and therefore it was their teachings that migrated on the Silk Route into Tibet and later China. So it was actually the Sarvastavadan Sanskrit canon that ended up in Tibet, not the Pali Canon. Tibet generally does not have the Pali Canon—it has only survived through being kept alive in Sri Lanka.

What Tibetans know about the early schools, they draw from the Sarvastavadan Canon, which eventually made it into translated Tibetan form. Particularly, they tend to associate the Theravadan schools, which they now call Hinayana, with the Abhidhamma. So a lot of the Tibetans' understanding of what Theravadan practice is about is based on their reading of a Sanskrit Abhidhamma from about 2,000 years ago. There doesn't seem to have been much contact since then. I often find that what Tibetan teachers say about Theravadans doesn't mesh with my experience of what's actually going on in our practice here or in our practice in Asia where we learned it. So I always take it with a grain of salt, and you might want to as well.

The entire Sarvastavadan canon was not preserved in the long run—I don't know whether it fell apart first in India or on the Silk Route—but it is only preserved in part. The only canon that survived in its entirety is the Pali canon, which went down to Sri Lanka first.

Then came another interesting split. The Sarvastavadins were deeply invested in the Abhidhamma—they had modified it from the Pali version, so it was different but had a similar spirit. Another group split off from the Sarvastavadins called the Sautrantikas. The Sautrantikas said, "You're putting way too much emphasis on the Abhidhamma and this analytical definition of how moments of experience arise one after another. You're giving it far too much weight, and in doing so, you're losing the spirit of the Buddha's teachings. The Buddha's teachings have a magnificent, uplifting, expansive, very broad view of spiritual life. The Abhidhamma, because it's so detailed and systematized, takes the heart out of the Buddha's teachings. It's too dry. Considered as a complete system, it doesn't have the juice that the original teachings had."

So the Sautrantikas said, "That's not the essence of the Dharma. You've lost something of the heart of the Dharma. You're relying too much on technicalities. We're going to go back and ground ourselves in the original teachings of the suttas"—or sutras in Sanskrit.

This was another split. The Sautrantikas split off from the Sarvastavadins sometime by the 2nd century of the Common Era. This represents another kind of dispute that is felt today in the Buddhist world between groups that tend to rely on the Abhidhamma as the ultimate authority and those who rely on the classical teachings of the Buddha as final authority.

And for example, when I went to Burma to practice about a year and a half ago, I met one Abhidhamma teacher who told me, "Oh, well, in Burma we regard the Vinaya as the teaching on sīla. We regard the Suttapitaka as the teaching on samādhi, or you could say samatha. And we regard the Abhidhamma as the teaching on paññā, or wisdom." So in their view, the Abhidhamma was the highest of the three books. Of course, we tend to regard the suttas as the source for samādhi and paññā, both. And I trust in the spirit of the suttas more than I do the spirit of the Abhidhamma.

So the next interesting development was King Asoka, in his love of the Dharma, sent missionaries out in many different directions. Most of them didn't really eventually take root. They may have made a temporary inroad, but in the long run they disappeared from the face of Indian Buddhism. But one missionary had a profound effect that lasts to the current day, and that was King Asoka's son, whose name was Mahinda. He sent Mahinda to the island of Sri Lanka.

Mahinda there established a great monastery. It was there about 150 years later that the texts—all the suttas and the vinaya and the abhidhamma—were first written down. Mahinda went to Sri Lanka about 240 BCE, and around another 150 years later, the texts were first written down. They were written down on leaves. Apparently that was the best writing technology that was available at the time.

The amazing thing is that Buddhism was more or less wiped off the face of India. I'll talk about this more tomorrow night, but due to Muslim invasions from the West, Buddhism in India was almost completely obliterated and the texts were destroyed. But the invasion did not reach Sri Lanka, and the Pali texts that were written down 400 years after the death of the Buddha have survived to the present day.

It's quite incredible when you think about it. The twenty-some volumes of words that were spoken 2,500 years ago have come down in a somewhat authentic form. I don't know how authentic, but somewhat authentic because they still liberate people and they're so consistent. In this unbroken and relatively uncorrupted way. It's just mind-boggling to think of the generations of practitioners and scribes and scholars who have done the work to make that available to us today. And now most of that canon is available in pretty well-translated English, pretty readable English today.

So this is the only source for an entire canon from any of the schools of early Buddhism—the Pali texts that were taken to Sri Lanka. Why was it written down in Pali? Scholars are not quite sure. They think either Pali is very close to the language that the Buddha spoke, which was probably Magadhi, but they can't be 100% sure of that. Or one scholar suggested that Pali was the language that Mahinda's mother spoke, and that's why he wrote it down in Pali. But one or another, that's what the text came down in.

It's a near neighbor of Sanskrit, but it's not as elegant as Sanskrit. People who know Sanskrit and then go learn Pali say it's like speaking Sanskrit with marbles in your mouth. So the really elegant language of the Buddhist text was Sanskrit. And some of that has come down, but not very much of it.

So we're up to about 100 BCE. And this is just around the time when the Mahayana starts to arise in India. The origins of the Mahayana are not clear at all. Some scholars say that it originated with groups of lay people. Some scholars say that it originated in the south of India. But the real origins of it are unclear from a scholarly point of view.

One thing that does seem apparent is that it was something of a backlash to the Abhidhamma—to the overly structured, systematic, dry, detailed explanations of the Abhidhamma. And the Mahayana sought to restore the mystic side and the inspiration to Buddhism.

So I think that's where we'll stop tonight, the advent of the Mahayana. Tomorrow we'll talk about the growth of the Mahayana, the arising of the Vajrayana.

CHAPTER 265

The History of Buddhism in India - Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h04

> In this comprehensive historical survey, Guy Armstrong traces the evolution of Buddhism from the 18 early schools to its eventual disappearance from India. He explores the emergence of Mahāyāna around 100 BCE, with its emphasis on the Bodhisattva path and the pāramīs, contrasting the humanness of the Buddha in Pāli suttas with his cosmic portrayal in Mahāyāna literature. The talk examines the Prajñāpāramitā literature and the sectarian tensions that arose, including the pejorative terms Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna.
> Armstrong provides detailed analysis of Nāgārjuna's revolutionary Mūlamadhyamakakārikā (circa 100 CE), describing how this master philosopher systematically demonstrated emptiness not only of phenomena but of the Buddha's teachings themselves, leading to the paradoxical insight that saṃsāra and nibbāna are indistinguishable. He discusses the subsequent Yogācāra (Cittamātra) school's contributions, including Buddha-nature (tathāgatagarbha), the three kāyas, and the ālaya-vijñāna.
> The presentation concludes with the development of Vajrayāna practices, their tantric origins, and the transmission of Dzogchen teachings through Garab Dorje to Padmasambhava. Armstrong traces Buddhism's decline in India through Muslim invasions until its virtual disappearance by the 12th century, noting its modern revival through the Tibetan diaspora.

Tonight I want to continue the history of Buddhism in India that I started last evening. In yesterday's story, we had reached the point about 400 years after the death of the Buddha where there had been significant splintering among the schools of early Buddhism. History relates that there were eighteen different schools formed in these four centuries—the splintering was that great. Of those eighteen schools, only one has survived to today, and that is the Theravada, which traces its lineage back to the very early days of the Sthaviras. All the other schools were basically lost as Buddhism continued to evolve.

Around 100 BCE, the first intimations of the Mahayana came into evidence. You are probably very familiar with the difference in emphasis that the Mahayana offered to the classical teachings. They placed great emphasis on the Bodhisattva path and the paramis as the main foundation for development of the Bodhisattva path. The other primary emphasis was on the concept of emptiness.

The Mahayana claimed that it was a new kind of revelation of emptiness. In the original teachings in the Pali, or rather the Nikayas, there had been pointings to the emptiness of self through the doctrine of anatta, or not-self, but there had not been a clear pointing to the emptiness of objects, the lack of solidity, the lack of inherent existence in the phenomenal world.

In fact, you do find pointings to this in the early texts. In the Pali texts, there's one particularly striking sutta called "A Lump of Foam," in which the whole material world is compared to a mass of foam floating on a river. Other parts of our experience are compared to mirages and juggler's tricks or magic tricks. But these passages are rare, and the emphasis in the early teachings was certainly not on the emptiness of the phenomenal world—it was much more on the emptiness of self.

The qualities of the paramis were discussed in the Nikayas, but they weren't assembled as a list and put together as a primary vehicle to awakening or particularly to Buddhahood. Of course, the concept of the Bodhisattva was in the early texts because the first Bodhisattva in that era was Siddhartha Gautama, who became the Buddha. He talked about his journey over lifetimes.

There are many stories recorded after his death, one of which recounted what is supposedly the moment at which he decided to become a Buddha—the moment at which the bodhisattva aspiration was awakened in that being. It's said that he was an ascetic named Sumedha, who was practicing very diligently and close to full awakening. He caught a glimpse of a Buddha of his era who was called the Buddha Dipankara. He was so impressed by the Buddha's bearing and his majesty and the vision of compassion that he was manifesting in bringing the teaching to an era that didn't have the message of liberation that Sumedha gave up his aspiration to become enlightened and aspired instead to become a Buddha in a future era.

It's said that Dipankara recognized that wish in Sumedha's mind at that moment and validated that he would indeed become a Buddha in some future time. Sumedha went away and meditated: "How can I become a Buddha? What is the path?" He came up with the list—in Theravadan language—of ten paramis and then set out to practice those over something like four aeons in innumerable kalpas to become Siddhartha Gautama, who awakened in our time as the Buddha.

It's interesting, isn't it, that having practiced the path of the Bodhisattva, there is no record in the Nikayas—at any rate, in the early suttas—of the Buddha promoting that as a path to any of his followers. The same path he himself had taken, yet no record of that being promoted or offered or suggested as a path for his followers to take up themselves. That's curious. I don't know why. Perhaps that kind of aspiration, he felt, had to come from deep within one's own volition.

At any rate, when the Mahayana philosophy came along, this was the first recorded instance of the Bodhisattva path being promoted as a general guideline for all dedicated practitioners. This was something really new. But otherwise, many of the elements of the Mahayana can be found in the Pali Canon, just with different emphases. There's not so much that's totally new.

When I speak about the Mahayana, I'm going to quote extensively from Edward Conze. Conze was a British scholar of the last century who did most of the main translations of key Mahayana texts. He's very familiar with the Mahayana and has also studied extensively the earlier schools, with a very good understanding of the history of Buddhism. What Conze says is that the Mahayana placed new emphasis on commonly accepted traditional material—new emphasis, and some of the terminology was definitely new.

The first Mahayana texts that really surfaced were the texts called the Sutras on the Prajnaparamita. These came into evidence somewhere between around 100 BCE and 50 CE—in about a 150-year span, the Prajnaparamita texts were coming into evidence.

Prajna means wisdom in Sanskrit. Paramita means perfection. So the quality of Prajnaparamita means the quality of wisdom that's brought into perfection, or it's sometimes translated as transcendent wisdom. This feature of the mind, transcendent wisdom, is represented in the iconography as a female. There's a statue on the back altar which is the female icon of Prajnaparamita. She is female because she is considered to be the mother of the Buddhas. Buddhas are born by perfecting the quality of prajna or wisdom. This factor of mind which lies within all of us is the factor that gives birth to all the Buddhas.

That's why she is sometimes called the mother of the Buddhas.

The Prajnaparamita Sutras focus almost exclusively on this quality of wisdom in its transcendent aspect. They are essentially statement after statement about this factor of mind which, in their interpretation, has an ultimate quality. As Rinpoche has been describing the ground over the last couple of days—that facet of Buddha nature which is at the basis of our minds—Prajnaparamita is an aspect of that ground. So the sutras point again and again to the transcendent and undying nature of Prajnaparamita, the ultimate nature.

This is from Conze: "The lengthy writings on transcendent wisdom are one long declamation in praise of the Absolute. Everybody knows, of course, that nothing can usefully be said about the absolute. This had prompted the Theravadans to keep silent, or at least nearly silent about it. The Mahayanists, on the other hand, consider everything that might reasonably be said about the absolute and then expressly reject it as untrue and inadequate."

I like the flavor of this. It's quite true. The Theravadans had kept nearly silent about the nature of the Absolute. When you read the Pali Suttas, very little is said about Nibbana, the actual experience of the unconditioned. It's mostly described in negative terms—called the unborn, the undying, the unceasing, the unchanging, the unconditioned. But rarely is it described in anything like positive terms.

I don't think that's because the Buddha was unfamiliar with its qualities. But why did he choose to keep so silent about it? My speculation is that you see this through a lot of his teachings—he uses negative description again and again as a way of expressing teachings that is incontrovertible. No one can argue with a negative expression. Moreover, it's impossible to make a concrete goal out of a negative expression. So in a way, his reluctance to speak in any sort of flowery language about the great mental and heart qualities of the unconditioned acted as a way to keep people from grasping after it and possibly imitating it.

There's this famous story in the Pali texts where the Buddha was walking through a forest with a group of his monks. One of the monks asked a question about some abstruse philosophical doctrine. The Buddha said, "I've chosen not to talk about that." The Buddha picked up a handful of leaves off the forest floor. He said, "Which do you think is greater, O monks, the number of leaves in my hand or the number of leaves on all the trees in this forest?" And the monks were no dummies. They said, "Venerable sir, of course the number of leaves in the forest is far greater than the number of leaves in your hand." He said, "Just so. What I have revealed to you is like this handful of leaves compared to all that the Tathagata knows. The mind of the Tathagata is omniscient and knows many, many things. What I have revealed to you is only this handful of leaves. But this handful of leaves, which I have shared with you, is enough for you to become liberated, to walk the path to freedom."

So that explains a little of why the Buddha was so reticent to talk about these other topics.

The Mahayanists were not, and they haven't stopped talking since. Quite thankfully, actually, because I believe that the Mahayana emphasis on these transcendent qualities was an attempt to correct some of the dryness that had crept into the early schools of Buddhism based on the importance of the Abhidhamma. I think that the schools had gotten too dry and technical and had lost some of the living spark of awakening. That's my guess, and some of the scholars hint at this too.

So the Mahayanists found a way to re-inject that creative vitality into the Buddhist lineage. I find that very inspiring. I love to read these sutras today for their pointing to the magnificent possibilities of the human heart and mind that they come back to again and again and again. I think it really orients our practice in the right direction and the right spirit. I think it was very, very important.

You can also see that as the Mahayana points to the Absolute, which cannot be touched or changed, it provides a striking counterpoint to the developmental model of the early Nikaya teachings. The early Nikaya teachings are all about development from a state of suffering and ignorance through the purification of heart and mind through meditation practice to reach the unstained state of purity. The Mahayanists come in at the unstained state of purity and say fundamentally, "This is all that is."

So there's been a tension and continues to be a tension really throughout spiritual life, through all denominations, between those who look at the pure aspect of our nature—the natural great perfection of the world the way it is—and those who look at the suffering that exists and wish to move out of the suffering and the defilements that cause it toward that purity. There's a tension that exists between the Mahayanists and the Theravadans that exists today in many different schools, and it's the heart of the paradox within true spiritual life.

We talked last night about the Heart Sutra, how it restates the teaching on the five aggregates, dependent origination, and the four noble truths, and then negates every one of them. This is the difference between the ultimate view, which recognizes innate purity, and the conventional view, which is development as progress over time from defilement to purity.

The Heart Sutra is one of the body of Prajnaparamita texts. There are a number of them extant today, and the Heart Sutra is one. So this quality of paradox comes into the Buddhist tradition around this time, and you can see how as this migrated into Zen, they built a dynasty on paradox. Every time a question came up, you couldn't answer it rightly because if you spoke from the conventional view, you'd be hit; if you spoke from the ultimate view, you'd be hit. Your answer had to combine both.

There are, of course, great differences between the expression of the Mahayana and the expression of the Theravada.

In this vast cosmic presentation, such a Buddha will not have a backache. Such a Buddha will not be unable to resolve a quarrel between mere mortals. This is the flavor of the Buddha in the Mahayana sutras—a movement from the human dimension into a very vast cosmological dimension in which the Buddha becomes an archetype, so perfected that he is really removed from the human realm, even from the discomfort of backaches.

One of the other qualities that emerged with the Mahayana sutras—and again, I'm going to quote Conze, so you know this didn't come from me—was an increasing spirit of sectarianism. Another characteristic, as the Mahayana sutras evolved, was this growing sectarian tendency.

This is quite interesting, because one might think that as spiritual teachings develop and mature, they would become more inclusive and embracing. Yet what we see in the evolution of the Mahayana literature is actually the opposite—a growing emphasis on distinguishing the Mahayana path as superior to what they called the Hinayana, or "lesser vehicle." This sectarian quality became woven into the very fabric of many Mahayana texts, creating a kind of spiritual hierarchy that placed the bodhisattva ideal above the arhat ideal of the early teachings.

The irony is profound: here are teachings about universal compassion and the liberation of all beings, yet they're presented in a way that subtly—or sometimes not so subtly—denigrates other approaches to awakening. It's as if the very impulse toward the ultimate and the absolute began to create a kind of spiritual pride, a sense that "our way" is not just different, but inherently superior.

This tension between inclusion and exclusion, between the universal and the particular, runs through much of religious history. Even as the Mahayana proclaimed the emptiness of all phenomena and the interconnectedness of all beings, it simultaneously created new forms of spiritual division. The very teachings that pointed toward the dissolution of all boundaries ended up creating new ones.

And you will find this as you read through the Prajnaparamita Sutras. The early Mahayana Sutras, and the Heart Sutra is no exception, start to cast aspersions on some of the central figures in the Nikaya schools of Buddhism.

The main victim, the chief butt of all the jokes, becomes Sariputta. Sariputta was one of the two chief disciples of the Buddha in the Pali texts, on a par with Moggallana. These were his two main disciples. Moggallana was said to be very advanced in psychic powers, therefore the power of concentration, which gives rise to psychic powers. Sariputta was the most developed of all the disciples in wisdom, in paññā.

But Sariputta's name became associated with the Abhidhamma. I don't know if this is true or not. We don't know historically if Sariputta did have a hand in creating the Abhidhamma, but his name has become linked to it. So as the early Mahayanas wanted to push back against the formalism of the Abhidhamma, they chose Sariputta as their whipping boy. So he who was formerly foremost among all the Buddha's disciples in wisdom becomes the object of scorn in the Prajnaparamita, in the teachings on wisdom sutras.

In these sutras, Sariputta has to get lectured to because he believes that things exist substantially. That's the crime of which he is accused. Things exist substantially. So he has to be lectured to, to be corrected of that deviant view. And this is the criticism that is launched of the later Abhidhamma, that it's too substantialist and that it reifies these phenomena called Dhammas, which it said were the irreducible units of experience. We'll come back to this later.

So, who lectures Sariputta? In the Heart Sutra, and I think other Prajnaparamita sutras too, the lecturing is handed out by Subhuti. Subhuti is also a figure from the Nikaya canons, but he is the disciple of the Buddha who is foremost in loving-kindness. So as the Mahayana elevated the quality of compassion and put it at the center, Subhuti is the ideal spokesperson because he represents the four immeasurable states, the Brahma-viharas—loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity. It is the centrality of compassion for the Mahayana that makes Subhuti the ideal spokesperson to Sariputta.

Also, the sort of pejorative terms emerged around this time. Originally, when the Mahayana came into existence, their name for their school, as it was forming as a new school, was the Bodhisattvayana. This was really the new spirit—that we could all become bodhisattvas. The name for the existing schools was Sravaka Yana. Sravaka means listener. It's a word that the Buddha himself used of his Sangha in the time that he was alive because his disciples were hearing the Dharma through listening to him. So in the Pali you hear the term Sawakasangha, the listener Sangha. This is a term that they were quite comfortable with as applied to themselves.

So we have the early Mahayana as the Bodhisattvayana. We have the classical group as the Sravakayana. Those are not yet pejorative. But very soon thereafter, the term Sravakayana got transformed into Hinayana, which means lesser school, and the Bodhisattvayana got elevated into the term Mahayana, which means the great vehicle. And so those are the terms that have really persisted as defined by the Mahayana.

Just so everybody knows, Theravadans don't particularly appreciate being called Hinayanists. We don't mind the Theravadan term, which means way of the elders. Hinayana doesn't rest so comfortably with us. But of course, the classical schools couldn't resist from name-calling either. So they had a name back for the Mahayanas, which was Vaitulika. Vaitulika means illusionist. I think it's probably because the Mahayanas seemed to be positing this quality of Prajnaparamita as an expression of innate purity that the Buddha himself had not described in that way. So they were called illusionists.

Now, the next very interesting development around this period of time, and it made a great impact on the Mahayana, was the emergence of a person I consider the greatest philosopher in the history of Buddhism after the Buddha himself. That was an Indian teacher named Nagarjuna.

Nagarjuna came in somewhere around 100 CE. The details of his life are not known. The exact time that he lived is not known. Even some of the works that are attributed to him were not necessarily written by him. This comment came from a book written by Stephen Batchelor who translated Nagarjuna's central work and had done a lot of research on his life. But the one work that is attributed to him that we can feel confident he did write was called Mula Madhyamaka Karika. And this means verses on the fundamental middle way. Stephen's book translates it as root verses on the middle way.

This is an incredibly brilliant work. It's hard to describe what an unbelievable piece of writing it is, written close to two thousand years ago. It's been compared in modern times to the work of the philosopher Wittgenstein, but preceded him by about two thousand years.

The Sanskrit form has survived and been translated into numerous languages—Tibetan, Chinese, Japanese—and several good English translations now exist. I find it a mind-blowing work. I believe Nagarjuna's purpose in writing it was precisely to blow our minds—to stop our conceptual thought processes entirely. In this cessation of conceptualization, he seeks to open us to the direct experience of emptiness. I believe that's why he wrote it, and I find that this is exactly how it functions when I read it.

His method involves taking the factor of emptiness and demonstrating it repeatedly, anywhere the reader might be inclined to find a resting point, a secure foothold, a solid place to take a stand. He begins with the usual Buddhist descriptors—the six sense bases, internal and external, the aggregates—and reveals the emptiness of each of these dhammas. The first part of the book clearly refutes the Abhidhamma's tendency to reify these dhammas, these existents as substantial things.

After dismantling these foundational concepts, you might think, "Okay, I can handle this. This is the essential meaning of the lack of solidity within the created world, but I still have the path. I still have the Buddha's teachings to rest upon." Then Nagarjuna does something extraordinarily original: he applies the concept of emptiness to all of the Buddha's teachings themselves.

He applies it to the Four Noble Truths, to dependent origination, even to awakening and nirvana. As you progress through the book's twenty-seven chapters, each one pulls another rug from beneath your feet. By the end, the mind literally has nowhere to take a stand. This is the freedom from view that truly opens us to the experience of emptiness.

The Buddha taught the emptiness of the phenomenal world, but he didn't teach the emptiness of his own teachings. Why would he? Until you had taken refuge, he wouldn't want that rug pulled from underneath you. But once you have committed, there's a tendency to solidify a view around that to which you've committed. This is the rug that Nagarjuna wants to pull away.

His writings are intended for a sophisticated audience—those who have already taken refuge and committed themselves to the path. This becomes a way of opening beyond adherence to any particular view.

Let me share some of the pith statements from Nagarjuna's work. "Emptiness stops conceptual proliferation." When you realize immediately the truth of emptiness, your mind stops wandering. This itself places you in a state of non-clinging to view. If the mind stops wandering, it naturally and completely rests in the present moment.

Another quotation: "That to which language refers is denied." Look around this room at the things language refers to—woman, man, floor, ceiling, painting, statue. What would it mean to deny all of that? Nagarjuna points to the fact that none of these conventional realities exist independently, substantially, or solidly. This is what Rinpoche indicated yesterday when he spoke of even pure perception of phenomena containing an element of illusion. We need to see through the illusion to the lack of solidity.

Here's another: "The unborn and unceasing nature of reality is comparable to nirvana." We normally take reality to be the physical world, characterized by impermanence—arising and passing. But Nagarjuna says the true nature of reality is unborn and unceasing, and because of this, it resembles nirvana, the unconditioned.

How can this be? When you remove the solid, objective nature of things, there's a way of seeing in which no objects ever come into being. There are only momentary flashings of sense experience, not lasting long enough to be considered objects at any sense door. When one sees like this, one perceives that no objects are arising and passing. Therefore, reality is unborn and unceasing—like the unconditioned.

This opens the door to what I consider the strongest statement in the entire work: "Samsara does not have the slightest distinction from nirvana. Nirvana does not have the slightest distinction from samsara."

Once one reaches this unified understanding that samsara and nirvana are one, this marks the beginning of non-duality. When we dissolve the duality between samsara and nirvana, we dissolve the distinction between path and goal, between ordinary beings and enlightened beings, and naturally between subject and object. This lays the groundwork for the later developments in Buddhist philosophy we'll explore next.

But before we leave Nagarjuna, I want to mention something I find quite fascinating. The Mahayanists have claimed Nagarjuna for many centuries because his teachings are such direct pointings to emptiness. Yet the intriguing thing is that all his vocabulary comes from Nikaya Buddhism. The only references he quotes are to early suttas. All his terminology is completely compatible with early Buddhism, and there is not a single mention of the concept of bodhisattva.

So was Nagarjuna a Theravadan, or was he a Mahayanist? I don't know. But what's starting to happen is that the Theravadans are beginning to reclaim him as one of their own, because there is nothing in his language that is out of step with Theravadan understanding.

Nagarjuna laid the foundation for understanding the non-dual. It took some time for a new school to emerge which synthesized the Mahayana teachings with this new school that Nagarjuna had created, called the Madhyamaka school—the middle way school. The group that accomplished this synthesis was the Yogacara school.

The Yogacarins are extraordinarily influential in the history of Buddhist philosophy, though they're often not known by that name. They had several names. Yogacara itself is not very evocative—it simply means "the conduct of union." But the name that better captures their philosophy is Chittamatra, which means "mind-only." So the Yogacarins are also called the mind-only school.

You hear this flavor in Rinpoche's teachings when he speaks of everything proceeding from the mind—even how we perceive objects of the external world depends on having this particular kind of mind with this particular karma.

The Yogacarins were the ones who developed the concept of Buddha nature. Buddha nature is this intrinsic sense of purity. Rinpoche has been describing it as the ground—the union of emptiness and cognizance and compassionate, unceasing activity. But Buddha nature is not actually found in the Mahayana Sutras. This term does not appear in any of the Prajnaparamita texts or other earlier works. It's a very key concept in Buddhism, but it's a later development.

Buddha nature is our English translation of a Sanskrit term that actually means something slightly different. The Sanskrit is Tathagatagarbha. Tathagata is another name for the Buddha. Garbha means womb. So what this is actually called is "the womb of the Buddhas"—very similar to Prajnaparamita. Buddha nature is called the womb of the Buddhas because it is that element from which all awakened beings and all Buddhas spring forth.

The other key doctrine that the Yogacarins introduced was what's called the three kayas. We've read about these in the chant, and I think Rinpoche will discuss them further—the dharmakaya, the sambhogakaya, and the nirmanakaya. These correspond to empty essence, natural clarity, and manifest compassion. These are three aspects that together make up a unity, which is the Tathagatagarbha, the Buddha nature. But the three kayas were first articulated this way in Chittamatra philosophy.

They were also the school that developed the alaya philosophy—the eighth consciousness, the storehouse of karmic imprints or the karmic bank that Rinpoche has discussed. Remember, the Sarvastivadins tried to answer the question of where karmic imprints reside by saying that past, present and future all still exist in the present. The Yogacarins answered that same question with the concept of the storehouse consciousness, or alaya vijnana.

It was also the Yogacarins who coined the term "the third turning of the wheel." They said the first turning of the wheel was the original teaching at the Deer Park of the Four Noble Truths and the Eightfold Path. The second turning of the wheel were the Prajnaparamita Sutras. And the third turning of the wheel were their own teachings on Buddha nature, the three kayas, and so forth.

The Chittamatrins claimed that all these were taught by the historical Buddha, but scholars understand it differently. Scholars say that these teachings evolved in India at different stages—400 years of the classical teachings, then the emergence of the Mahayana. The Chittamatrins arose around 200 to 300 CE, just a few hundred years after the arising of the Mahayana.

So whether you want to say they were all taught by the Buddha or whether you want to understand them as stages of unfolding, these represent three distinct stages of Buddhist philosophy that remain alive today and are profoundly important. It's very helpful to understand what each contributed: the Four Noble Truths and Eightfold Path, the emptiness teachings, and the teachings on Buddha nature.

The Chittamatra view then became the foundation for what migrated into Tibet and became Dzogchen, and also what developed in China as Chan and later Huayan, migrating to Japan as Zen.

The influence of the Chittamatrans peaked around the 4th century. After that, their influence and popularity didn't grow any further. But what I find even more fascinating is that Buddhist philosophy stopped developing after the Chittamatrans. There have been no important developments in Buddhist philosophy since about 500 to 600 CE. That's 1,500 years ago. It's basically been the same since then. This doesn't mean the practices have remained static, but the philosophical foundations have stayed consistent.

The Chittamatrans and the Madhyamakas have some differences of opinion because Nagarjuna's approach was to cut away everything. Wherever you took a stand, he would cut it away, cut it away, cut it away. The Chittamatrans came and postulated this quality called Buddha nature. Well, the Madhyamakas simply wanted to cut, cut, cut that away too. This kind of debate continues today in Tibetan schools.

Let me share a story that illustrates this ongoing philosophical discussion. Mingyur Rinpoche is the younger brother of Sogyal Rinpoche and was visiting Marin for the first time a few years ago. Marianne kindly asked if Sally and I would like to take Mingyur Rinpoche out for an afternoon of touring Marin. We thought it would be wonderful to spend time with him. Perhaps he'd be interested in seeing some of the natural beauty of the county.

So we got in a car with him and Tashi-la, who many of you know. Tashi-la often travels with Sogyal Rinpoche and has helped assist and teach on these retreats many times. Tashi speaks good English. There were four of us in the car, and we thought we would take him to Mount Tamalpais, which is the highest point in Marin County at about 2,400 feet. You get a great view of San Francisco, the ocean, and the shoreline all the way down almost to Santa Cruz. We thought he'd be really impressed.

As we're driving, I'm trying to make polite conversation because I hadn't met the Rinpoche before. So I asked him through Tashi, who was translating, "How do you find the West?" It was his first trip to America. He said, "Square and clean." End of response. And it is. If you come from Kathmandu or India, where he lives, it is very square and clean. That was his impression of the West.

I waited a while and thought I'd better try again to make conversation. I said, "Do you think that Tibetans tend to be happier than Westerners?" He said, "Yes." End of conversation. We drove in silence for a while.

We got to the top of Mount Tam and decided to walk around the peak. There's a path that takes about twenty minutes to circumambulate, and we started to walk it. It was quite silent. I thought, well, I'd like to find a way to connect with him. He's such an esteemed teacher and an incredible yogi. Mingyur Rinpoche had completed two three-year retreats by the time he was nineteen years old.

So I decided to try a different approach. As we were walking around, I asked Tashi to put this question to him: "What's the difference between the Madhyamaka view and the Dzogchen view?" Mingyur Rinpoche's eyes lit up. He said, "Ah! The first thing you have to understand is there are eighteen different kinds of emptiness."

He kept talking, and the first thing he did was plop right down on the path. Now, the path is only wide enough for two people to walk side by side. Mingyur Rinpoche plops right down on the path. So of course, the other three of us also plop down. He talks very excitedly for about five to ten minutes about the differences in these two views.

He summed it up by saying that the Madhyamakas believe that the Dzogchenpas believe something really exists, but "we don't really believe that. It's just a misunderstanding." And that was the end of our conversation.

We picked up and walked again.

So this kind of tension—that the Madhyamakas cut everything away and are only left with emptiness, and the Chittamatrans posit this notion of Buddha nature in the three kayas—that tension still exists today in the Tibetan world. It is also the same kind of tension that will exist between an orthodox Theravadan looking at the view of Dzogchen.

I've had this discussion with many Orthodox Theravadans. I related one of them yesterday who was not inclined to accept the view of Dzogchen. I said, "But this stuff really works." And that didn't sway him.

This is where I think the interesting point about the controversies comes together. The Yogacharans were aware that they were stirring up controversy in the way they presented the Dharma. And what I think is beautiful is they didn't care. Because what they said is, "What does the theory matter anyway? It all dissolves when you come into emptiness. So what helps you come into emptiness?" That's what they cared about.

I think that's a beautiful guideline for us. What helps you come into the state of emptiness? Many different skillful means may help. We don't need to argue about the arcane philosophical points of their existence or non-existence.

Similarly, I think with Theravada, Mahayana, and Tibetan getting along in the world today, there are a lot of opportunities for potential philosophical conflict. But that's a good thing also, because all these schools have different styles and different personalities gravitate to the different styles. That's a good thing because there are more options for each of us.

Actually, one of the riffs I've heard along this theme is that in the West, the artists gravitate to Tibetan, the carpenters gravitate to Zen, and the psychotherapists gravitate to Vipassana. So there's a school for everybody.

Conze said that the real difference between the Theravadans and the Mahayanins is that the Theravadans tend to be rationalists and the Mahayanins tend to be mystics. But he elaborated it a little further. He went on to say, "But the difference is really between the rational mysticism of Mahayana and the mystically tinged rationalism of Theravada." So it's not so opposed. Again, it's just a different emphasis. Both of the schools have both aspects.

Conze went on: "The two schools had much common ground in the middle ranges of the path where the renunciates strove for emancipation in a quite rational and businesslike manner." I love that quote—the renunciate striving for emancipation in a rational and businesslike manner.

Again, when we come down to practice, the philosophical differences fall away. And we realize that as we put our heart and soul and body into our practice, we're all heading in the same direction. In one of the suttas of the Pali Canon, the Buddha says, "All the Dhammas have one taste, just like the ocean has one taste, which is the taste of salt. All the Dhammas have one taste, which is the taste of liberation."

A couple of other small points. I've reached the end of most of the philosophy part, but the bodhisattva tradition is still alive in Theravadan countries. There are bodhisattva practitioners today in Burma, which generally is a pretty orthodox Theravadan country. What they have done in order to be able to live lifetime after lifetime is they have renounced their entry into the first stage of enlightenment. In the Theravadan view, once one attains the first stage of enlightenment called stream entry, one is destined for Arahantship within seven lifetimes. So these practitioners renounce the entry into the stream—as they renounce the realization of nibbana—in order that their rebirths will continue for a long, long time while they're developing all the paramis. This tradition exists also in Theravadan countries.

Another curiosity I came across in my reading is that there was a school in early Sri Lanka called the Mahayana Theravadins. I think this is beautiful because—personal opinion—this is the way that the Dharma is evolving here at Spirit Rock. I think that there's a commitment here to Theravadan practice because it's so simple and down to earth and immediately applicable for people. But the philosophy or the spirit that is accompanying it here has more of a Mahayana flavor than a strict Theravadan flavor. So I think this combination is going to be useful in the West.

The next stage of development was the Vajrayana. The Vajrayana, interestingly enough, according to the histories that I read—including by Tibetan authors—did not represent a new departure philosophically. It rested on the philosophy of all the earlier schools: the Chittamatra, the Mahayana, the Theravada. But what it was was a whole new bag of tricks—a whole new range of meditation techniques that could work on, as one of my friends put it, the technology of consciousness. And the variety, the creativity, the refinement of the Vajrayana methods are amazing, unparalleled in the history of spiritual life that I know of. There's such an incredible range of teachings and practices and options within that tradition.

The term vajrayana, as I understand it—and now I'm not speaking as any kind of expert, I'm just sharing what I've found in my studies—the term vajrayana is more or less synonymous with tantra, as understood in the Buddhist sense. The earliest tantras developed in Hindu practices, so they were borrowed and then elaborated upon originally from the Hindus. So I want to talk a little bit about how they came into being.

This is probably around the 5th or 6th century C.E., when the cult of Shiva was starting to grow. Shiva had been a fertility god in the Indus Valley for a long time, but his influence had lessened because of the Brahmanical influence founded in the Vedas. The earlier fertility gods were more or less put aside. But because of the influence of Buddhism and the rise of Buddhist teachings, the Brahmanical tradition started to decline, and that allowed this earlier fertility cult of Shiva to spring back up.

As adepts began to relate to Shiva, they started to perform sacred dances. In these sacred dances, they would channel the energy, trying to identify their consciousness with the qualities of Shiva or of his consort—particularly Kali. Once they felt they had channeled that energy and put their mind state into the mind state of the god or goddess, they would carry out their sacred dances so that these dances sprang from a divine origin within the practitioners. This started to become widely popular in northern India.

Then some groups began getting another idea about the god and his consort. They decided: if there's a God and his consort and we're in that divine place, what would it feel like actually to have that sexual union taking place? So these practitioners went off in secret and began to have ritual intercourse when both parties had put their minds into the frame of the god or goddess, practicing the union in intercourse of those two beings.

This practice altogether—both the dances and the ritual sexual practices—became known as deva yoga, or union with the god. This was how Buddhist practitioners first developed this concept, according to the history books. Originally it was done as visualization because the practitioners weren't dancing so much, but they could visualize. They would start to visualize different deities, borrowing some from the list of bodhisattvas and some attributes from the Hindu pantheon.

But as the practices of tantra grew in Buddhism, some of the lay practitioners also began enacting ritual intercourse. They would take the tantric visualizations and carry them out in living form. This practice started to spread.

Imagine what the monks thought about this. This was going on alongside well-established monastic communities completely committed to celibacy. You can imagine as well as I—there's not a record of what was actually said, but you can imagine.

Even the monastic communities adopted the visualizations. The visualizations have come down and are practiced today, even by the Reformed sect, the Gelug order within Tibet, of whom the Dalai Lama is the titular head. Those monks also carry out the visualization part. As far as I know, the celibate monks within the Gelug order do not carry out any actual reenactment of the union of deity and consort. But in other lineages—Nyingma and Kagyu, for example, which Rinpoche mentioned today—practitioners do both the visualization and the actual union with the consort in physical form. These practices are still alive and practiced in the world today.

Around the 6th century, different levels of tantra had emerged that worked on different energies within the subtle body, which Rinpoche was talking about today. In time, in the lineage from which Dzogchen came, there came to be six levels of Tantra, of which the highest was Dzogchen, also called Ati Yoga, peak yoga.

The first records of the Dzogchen teachings in India show it emerging about the 6th century AD. The best history I've found on this topic comes from a Western scholar who's a well-known Tibetan translator and practitioner named John Reynolds, in a book called Golden Letters, which is very interesting.

The Dzogchen practice was originally transmitted from Samantabhadra, who is the ultimate Dharmakaya aspect of Buddhahood beyond conception of the finite intellect, being without limitation and all-pervading like infinite space—the archetypal essence of mind that has never departed from the ground. Samantabhadra transmitted the essence of Dzogchen in a mind transmission without words to another pure being named Vajrasattva.

Vajrasattva is the being represented in this statue on the altar, a symbol of purity and intrinsic awakening. Vajrasattva transmitted it to a human being named Garab Dorje, who was the first human holder of the Dzogchen teachings around the 6th century. Garab Dorje has a famous teaching called "The Three Words That Strike the Vital Point," which Rinpoche often talks about in these retreats and may well in the next few days.

Then Garab Dorje passed it on to a few disciples who transmitted it to Padmasambhava, Vairochana, and Vimalamitra. These were the Indian teachers who carried it into Tibet. The Dzogchen teachings were said to come into Tibet in about the 8th century, and the name Padmasambhava is particularly linked with the Dzogchen lineage as it's carried out through the Nyingma school.

This takes us up into the 8th century. In India in the 8th century, Buddhism was on the decline.

By the 8th century in India, Buddhism was beginning its decline while Hinduism experienced a resurgence. Buddhism would survive in its homeland for only a few more centuries, as around this time, Muslim invasions began from the west and northwest. Turkish Muslim forces entered the subcontinent, and from historical accounts, they pursued what can only be described as a scorched earth policy toward other religious traditions.

These invaders first established their dominance in the western and northwestern regions, systematically destroying monasteries and nunneries while burning countless sacred texts. They then advanced steadily eastward across the subcontinent. By the 12th century, they had conquered the entire upper Ganges Valley, and at that point, Buddhism was essentially eradicated from its birthplace.

The great monasteries lay in ruins. Renowned centers of learning like Nalanda University were completely destroyed. Countless precious texts and teachings vanished forever in the flames—we can only imagine the magnitude of wisdom that was lost during this dark period. From the 12th century until roughly the last century, Buddhism remained virtually non-existent in India.

Remarkably, one of the most significant revivals of Buddhism in India today comes through the Tibetan diaspora. The tragic displacement of Tibetan refugees has brought an unexpected blessing to the world—the reestablishment of Buddhist teachings in the very land where they first flourished. Among all the places experiencing a Buddhist renaissance, India may be the most remarkable.

This brings our historical journey to the present day. Tomorrow, we'll shift our focus to the practical aspects of meditation, diving into the actual methods and techniques. But I wanted to establish this historical foundation first, as it will help illuminate the philosophical principles we'll explore over the coming days as we delve into the meditation practice itself.

CHAPTER 266

Practicing Rigpa - Part 1

Guy Armstrong · 54 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong offers practical guidance on the Dzogchen practice of rigpa following pointing-out instructions given during retreat. He explains that rigpa practice represents the trekchö (cutting through) aspect of Dzogchen - one half of the complete system alongside the more esoteric tögal practice. Armstrong discusses the subtle nature of this practice, comparing it to traditional kasina meditations and emphasizing the importance of faith (saddhā) and trust in approaching such refined objects of meditation.
> The talk explores the four-step technique of 'look, see, rest, liberate' and the necessity of dropping effort between the looking and seeing phases. Armstrong addresses common challenges practitioners face, particularly doubt and the need to recognize the union of emptiness (śūnyatā) and cognizance as the fundamental nature of mind. He provides practical advice on investigating emptiness through three avenues: the space analogy, the emptiness of self (anattā), and the emptiness of objects.
> Drawing connections between Dzogchen and Theravāda approaches, Armstrong discusses how this practice takes awakened mind as the vehicle for the path, contrasting it with gradual purification models. He concludes with practical guidance on eyes-open meditation and managing energy levels during practice, emphasizing that whatever glimpse of the view one receives should be trusted as the foundation for further development.

This evening I'd like to talk about specifics of the practice that we were introduced to today. Today was quite a special day in the retreat and perhaps in the history of some of your relationship to the Dzogchen lineage because today Rinpoche gave what are called the pointing out instructions.

I'm just curious, for how many people here was this the first time that you've received the pointing out instructions in Dzogchen? Quite a number. This marks a real turning point in your relationship to the practice and the tradition because it is your formal introduction to the view. And until there's a formal introduction to the view, there's not necessarily a clear understanding of the path, because the path and the view are closely related. I'll come back to that a little later. But this really gives you the experiential basis for all your future practice in this technique, in this part of the Dzogchen instructions.

Just one thing to clarify here. Some people who don't know the Dzogchen practice well might assume that the practice we learned today of rigpa is synonymous with Dzogchen practice. But actually it's just half of Dzogchen practice. What we learned today is a technique called trekchö, which literally means cutting through. The idea is that by recognizing the nature of mind one cuts through conceptual proliferation or grasping.

But there's another whole half to Dzogchen practice overall called tögal, which Rinpoche is not going to teach on this retreat, which is very esoteric, and he won't even answer questions about. So just be aware that the practice that we're doing here is the half of Dzogchen practice called trekchö.

It's actually not easy to get these instructions. Rinpoche will not give them except in a week-long retreat. Many other Dzogchen masters will not give them except in a retreat setting and to practitioners who have completed some degree of preliminary practice, perhaps the ngöndro, perhaps other practices. In Tibet, it used to take years of preliminary practice before a teacher would offer the instructions that Rinpoche gave us today. So we're really fortunate to be able to receive them without such a high prerequisite requirement.

Rinpoche's father, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, was kind of a pioneer in this style. When one would meet with Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, he would basically ask, are you Buddhist and are you committed? And if you met those two requirements, then he would offer you the pointing out. It was considered very generous. But it helped a lot of people. So I think that through the family lineage, Tsoknyi Rinpoche is also inspired to offer them in that way. We're very fortunate to be able to receive them now.

In a way, there's an initiation aspect to what happened for you today. It allows you access to information, teachings, and texts that you might not have had before. This is one text that a number of you are very familiar with, called The Flight of the Garuda. It's from a Dzogchen master from the 1800s named Lama Shabkar. This is from the very first page of the book, from Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche: "It is the opinion of myself and Dudjom Rinpoche that texts such as these should only be shared with people who have received the pointing out transmission from a qualified master."

You have now received the pointing out instruction from a qualified master in the Nyingma lineage. So this opens the possibility for you to receive teachings and read texts that weren't previously available to you. It's a good day.

I want to talk about some of the specifics of doing this practice, but before I do, I just want to say, in my opinion, it is a hard practice because it's such a subtle practice. The more subtle the objects get in meditation, the more difficult it is to know if we're doing it properly or not.

I have a good friend who's also a vipassana teacher named Steve Armstrong. In the 1980s, he spent five years in Burma as a monk and practiced very diligently. I actually don't know of any practitioners in our tradition—Westerners who practiced more diligently than Steve did. At one point, I think he did almost two straight years of intensive practice, quite rigorous intensive practice. So at the peak of his effort, he was sleeping just one hour a night. The rest of the day was sitting and walking, sitting and walking. He said of this time in his practice that he would fall asleep at night, or probably early in the morning, truth to tell, with a thought in his mind. And when he woke up in the morning, the thought would complete itself. That's how little his mind had wandered away during the hour of sleep that he got.

Well, when he was in this cycle of deep practice, he went through a series of concentration shamatha practices that led to the absorptions. And after his teacher had trained him in that through a preliminary means, his teacher recommended that he learn that access through what are called the kasinas.

Kasinas are traditional meditation objects found in the Pali suttas and the Visuddhimagga—essentially representations of elements or colored discs. One might meditate on white kasina or red kasina, yellow kasina, earth kasina. Steve was instructed to meditate on blue kasina, but he didn't have a physical disc to generate the image. His instruction was simply: meditate on blue. That was it. Twenty hours a day, meditate on blue.

This is a subtle object, because you don't necessarily have anything in your field of experience to call up that image. When you close your eyes, you're supposed to see blue, fix it in your mind, and develop one-pointed concentration on that color. That's a hard practice. But in my opinion, the nature of mind is more subtle than the color blue. I say this not to discourage you—I don't want to discourage you—but to give you an appreciation for the challenge that this kind of practice represents. It's not an easy thing to get one's arms around in the beginning. But as Rinpoche says, as we continue to connect again and again, it becomes very, very easy and simple. It's something that really grows over time. It's also, as Rinpoche mentioned, very, very natural.

This is a quote from Suzuki Roshi, who was a great master in the lineage of Soto Zen. Soto Zen is a different practice than Dzogchen, but I think the understanding is somewhat similar. Suzuki Roshi said: "Strictly speaking, for a human being, there is no other practice than this. There is really no other practice than this." This can apply to a range of practices, but I feel that our Dzogchen practice, as we're learning it here, has that quality too.

Remember that Rinpoche mentioned a day or two ago that Dzogchen doesn't just mean a meditation technique. Fundamentally, it is more than that. The term Dzogchenpo means the great completion, or it's sometimes translated as the great perfection. This is a statement about the nature of things—a pointing to the perfect way that things already are. Every spiritual tradition has this pointing to the perfection in the order of everything, but I feel that the Dzogchenpa way of explaining it is a particularly elegant way to describe it.

So why is this important? It means that all we need to do in meditation is rest in the way things are, because the way things are is fundamentally complete, perfect, and all right already. It's not about changing anything about the way things are. It's recognizing that intrinsic perfection, connecting, and then resting there.

This is the deepest part of each of our minds. It is not missing from the mind of any human being, or in fact, any sentient being. There was a great quote from Huang Po, a Zen master from long ago, who said that even frogs and all wriggling things are possessed of this Buddha nature. Naturally, each one of us is possessed of this nature of perfection.

The meditation practice is just an encouragement to drop any other activity and rest in that dimension—that dimension which is really the foundation of everything. This is a quote from a Tibetan teacher named Dudjom Lingpa, in a book whose title I appreciate as much as anything about it: Buddhahood Without Meditation. Isn't that appealing? Wouldn't you love to reach Buddhahood without meditation?

This is just a portion of the quote. He said that this practice "takes the fundamental nature of reality as the unsurpassable ultimate refuge." Let me read that again: Our practice takes the fundamental nature of reality as the unsurpassable ultimate refuge. What could be safer? What could be more reliable? What could we better put our trust in? Or our faith?

This word faith in Pali is saddha. In Sanskrit, it's shraddha.

So in Pali, it's saddha, and in Sanskrit, it's shraddha. The etymological origin of that word is "to place one's heart upon." The source of our faith is what we can really place our heart upon. So this practice is a direct pointing to that which we can really place our heart upon, really rest in—something that will always hold us and always be there for us.

Of course, it's important to understand the meaning of the word "reality" in a Buddhist context, because it's different than the Western scientific context. If you ask somebody on the street, "What is reality?" they'll point to physical reality—the earth, the trees, the sky. That's physical reality, and in the Western view, that's the ultimate reality.

If you think about it, this is true. This is what Westerners assume is the ultimate truth of things: that matter came first in the universe out of the Big Bang, and then matter did different things, and eventually some of it collected, and then some water formed, and then chemicals got struck by lightning, and then there was conscious life. That's the Western view. And the Western view is that we take birth in this physical world and only then do we exist. So it's here and enduring. We come into it and we're part of the reality for a while, but when we die, we're out of it. And really, we don't necessarily continue. That's kind of the Western scientific worldview. So it takes the physical world as reality and ultimate reality.

But what's missing, of course, is the element of consciousness. The physical world is only an appearance in our consciousness. So in Buddhism, reality means our human experience. That's what we're looking at. That's the field we're looking at—our human experience.

So I think that this is largely a practice of faith and trust. Ajahn Sumedho is a great teacher in the Theravadan tradition. He's an American monk who lives in England. He was teaching here a few years ago, and he said, "I think the main problem with Western meditators is not that they don't try hard enough. They try plenty hard. The problem is they don't trust enough." He said, "We don't trust ourselves enough. We don't trust our experience in meditation and in life." The sense of self-doubt or self-judgment is so strong that we don't validate our experience. We criticize it too easily. And then in that way, we kind of pull the rug out from under our own faith and trust.

So this path that was unfolded today is a profound path. Of it, Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche said, "The way to be enlightened is to train in recognizing mind essence and stabilize in the recognition. This is the very way to be enlightened—to train in recognizing mind essence and stabilize in the recognition."

This is very different from the Theravadan model that underlies Vipassana, where you're supposed to have four different moments of enlightenment, where the mind comes into nibbana at different depths, and each time different fetters are uprooted. And when all the fetters are uprooted, then the mind has become purified. So there are clearly different experiences along the way.

But Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche is saying that we can become enlightened through recognizing mind essence and learning to stabilize in it. Now think about that. That's a very appealing prospect. It means that the way is pretty clear for us. It means that there don't necessarily have to be these very unusual kinds of altered experiences, although some of them undoubtedly would come. But it's another model of a way to be free.

And in this model, the freedom comes at the start of the journey. When we connect with mind essence, nature of mind, rigpa, we're connecting with something in us that's already free. And then we're learning to be there more and more of the time.

In fact, this is a quote from Reginald Ray, who's a Western teacher of Tibetan Buddhism. He said, "The tantras in general, the Vajrayana path, takes awakened mind as the vehicle for the path." That's a beautiful concept.

As I mentioned the other day, in the Theravadan we start off looking at the defilements and mustering as many wholesome forces as we can to transform them. But in the tantras of the Vajrayana, the very basis for the path is the awakened mind. Now, what do you do when you're not awakened yet? You imitate it as best you can.

In my opinion, that's essentially what our practice of Rigpa is—our attempt to discover the awakened mind right now and then rest in it.

I want to share some of my own experiences and perceptions in the development of this practice. But before I do, I must offer a significant disclaimer. I'm not a Dzogchen teacher. I'm a Vipassana teacher. I'm not qualified to be a Dzogchen teacher, nor am I authorized to be one. I don't ever plan to become a Dzogchen teacher. However, from early on, when I would sit these retreats with Rinpoche, he encouraged me to share from my experience during the evening sessions when I was a yogi.

So please take this not as any authoritative pronouncement, but simply as sharing from a fellow practitioner. If you find it helpful, wonderful. If you don't find it helpful, you're welcome to discard it. If I say something incorrect, I hope you'll forgive me, because this is not my area of authority or expertise. I'm simply trying to clarify some of the things I've learned along the way.

What I heard Rinpoche say today is that he was introducing to us a new technique for practice that goes beyond shamatha, beyond shamatha without support, and beyond vipassana—the practice of look, see, rest, and liberate. Of these four, the practice of "look," he explained, is clearly a technique. It's clearly fabricated. It involves effort, will, and concept—all those elements that Rigpa ultimately transcends are present in this first step of looking.

What's particularly interesting—and I think he mentioned this as well—is that "look, see, rest, liberate" is about as far as technique goes in this practice. Vipassana yogis, how many breath practices have you received over the years? Twelve? Twenty? Two dozen? That's not even including practices with the body, sounds, and so many other techniques within vipassana. Within this approach, there's essentially one. So you'll be hearing a great deal about it.

Some friends and I went to see Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche in Kathmandu a little over ten years ago, toward the end of his life. I'm very glad we made that journey because he was such a special teacher. We met him at his monastery at that time, Nagi Gompa, outside of Kathmandu. He gave us the Dzogchen teachings and pointing-out instructions over several days of visits—meeting with him for a few hours at a time.

At some point during our time together, he said, "When you come to me for teachings, I'm going to be like a field mouse. You know, when a field mouse runs across the field and makes a sound, it only knows one sound to make, and that is 'squeak.' Every time you see the field mouse, it's always 'squeak, squeak.' So when you come to me, I'm only going to be making one sound." His "squeak" was: recognize mind essence. That was the sole instruction, given over and over again.

You encounter long Dzogchen texts, and they're a bit like the Prajnaparamita Sutras—they find many, many creative ways to say the same thing and point you back to the same direction. But it's this central direction, again and again.

So the "look" is fabricated. Rinpoche offered three ways today to practice the look, and as I remind you of what those were, I'm going to turn off the microphone because this should not be recorded. I'll simply project my voice a bit more. If anyone is listening to the recording, know that there will be some moments of silence.

[Brief pause for unrecorded instruction]

The first pointing-out instruction involved recognition of what's gone. Another was the sense of dropping, letting go and dropping while exhaling. And the third was the hand disappearing up the sleeve. These are all somewhat evocative approaches.

Tomorrow evening I'm going to offer many more different ways to practice "look." You can be creative in how you approach the looking. I'll go through that comprehensive list tomorrow night rather than getting into it now, as it's quite extensive.

But I feel that the more different ways you have to look, the greater potential you'll have to find one that suits you. I find that I'll use one technique for a while and it'll be very evocative, very juicy. I'll apply it and the seeing will be strong - the result of the looking will be strong. But as I keep using it over and over, I use up its magic power a little bit. Then I look again and nothing happens, and I think, "Oh, I'll try another one."

So I'll try another technique and use that for a while, and then it gets juicy again. I'll use that, but then I'll use it up. Then I'll probably go back to the first one, or if I want, I'll go to another one. I usually have about three different ways to do the looking, and I'll just vary them depending on which one is most effective.

One of the things I heard in the group interview today, and I think in here also, is that different individuals found different techniques useful for themselves. For some people, the dropping was useful. For other people, Tsoknyi Rinpoche's method was useful. For others, the third approach was useful. So it's good to have a range so that you can try different things and see what's working for you.

We do this bit of looking in whatever technique we want to use, and the next step is to see. Somewhere in between the look and the see, something has to happen - the effort has to fall away. This doesn't always happen so naturally. As Rinpoche mentioned, if there's hope and fear around it, that'll constitute a form of effort that will block the clear seeing. He used that analogy of trying to create some space by putting something in between the fingers, but then you have to get rid of the something that was in between. That's the effort or the fabrication.

In other retreats, what he said is that between look and see, we need to have a little miracle - the dropping of effort. There's no way to make that happen. But what really helps that little miracle to happen is relaxation and trust. So every time you approach the looking, check that there's that sense of relaxation, and look and see if you're willing to trust. Trust in this case basically means once you look, take what you get. Take what you get as being what you see.

It's very easy in the early stages of doing this practice to get really worried: "Did I get it? Didn't I get it? Did I get the real thing? Did I get the fake thing? Is this an ordinary experience or is this something really extraordinary that I'm looking for? I just don't know what this rigpa stuff is all about." These questions are natural when we start a new meditation practice. I found them when I started vipassana. I found them when I started metta practice. I found them when I started this practice.

But there's a word in our tradition for these kinds of questions when they really bind us up - doubt. It's one of the five hindrances that the Buddha pointed to. The antidote to doubt is faith. When doubt is uppermost in your mind, dominating your mind, it blocks you from actually putting your full conviction into your effort, because you don't know that it will lead anywhere. But you need to proceed as though you are sure it's going to lead somewhere.

Sharon Salzberg went to practice loving-kindness meditation intensively for the first time with Sayadaw U Pandita, a Burmese master in Rangoon. At the start of her session, in one of the early interviews, he asked her, "Are you confident you can do this practice?" What do you say to your teacher at that point? If you say yes, you risk looking a little arrogant, don't you? But if you say no, that indicates some vacillation. I think Sharon said something like, "I think so." And U Pandita said, "You should always be really confident. When you start a new practice, you should always be extremely confident."

That gives you the best chance of success with the practice.

Please recognize that when these kinds of questions arise, if they undermine your confidence, this is the hindrance of doubt. Try to recognize it as doubt. Try to let it go. Try to reestablish your trust and reapply the technique.

Sometimes doubt comes from really good questions. Someone mentioned today in a group interview: "This cognizant quality that is being talked about as the ground—ongoing and unborn and unceasing—I was taught that consciousness is impermanent. It's one of the five aggregates, and all the aggregates are impermanent. So how can this knowing be a lasting quality?"

This is a really good question. This is the question that drove me crazy for a few years until I resolved it to my satisfaction. I'm going to explain that in a few more nights, but I don't want to do it tonight. It's good to let this question challenge you for a while, because it's when we investigate these questions that really mean something to us that we gain our own conviction in our practice. You arrive at your own truth to answer and resolve these kinds of questions. So this is a very good question, and it's an important one to contemplate.

But I want to give a temporary answer to this. Ajahn Sumedho was teaching here a few years ago, and he teaches a Theravadan practice which puts the emphasis on this same quality of awareness as the undying—the empty awareness as the undying. So I raised the same question to Ajahn Sumedho. I said, "You're talking about awareness as the undying, but in the texts, it always talks about consciousness as impermanent. How do you reconcile those two?"

He said, "I don't know." He said, "What I know is that this really worked for me." And that's what I would encourage you to try—this concept that you can always tune into the quality of awareness, that the quality of awareness is ever-present.

That feels true, doesn't it? Because it takes a very subtle awareness in order to see the appearing and disappearing of consciousness. It takes a lot of concentration and a lot of mindfulness to be able to see that. So our ordinary experience is, yes, it really feels like awareness is ongoing. So let yourself connect with that feeling.

We're not saying it's the ultimate truth right now. We'll clarify that maybe in a few days. But we're saying there's a real benefit to trusting in this feeling. Because if nothing else, it gives us a refuge from all the flux of impermanence that's going on around us. Phenomena are coming and going. Thoughts are coming and going. Emotions are coming and going. Grasping is coming and going. Here's something that's not touched by that. Awareness is always present. So at least use that as a temporary refuge while we clarify the philosophy in a few more days and see if it's not helpful as a skillful means.

When you look, the next step is to see, and then it's important to trust what comes when you see. This is a very important point. Rinpoche was demonstrating this today with the palm pilot and the napkin. You won't find these in the ancient texts, but it's a great analogy. So I want to review again these two aspects because he covered it a couple of days ago.

The palm pilot represents the ground. Recall that the ground has three components which are inseparable: the essence, which is empty; the nature, which is cognizance; and the capacity, which is said to be unconfined.

Now this third one he hasn't talked about much. There's more description of all these in Carefree Dignity, which is a transcript of talks from a retreat several years earlier. In those retreats, because the sangha was newer, Rinpoche was giving more detailed descriptions of these basic components of the teachings. So this is a wonderful reference book to have. It has a lot of the material that he will cover in this retreat, explained in a little bit more detail.

If you read about capacity in Carefree Dignity, it basically explains it as the mind's ability to flower with beautiful qualities. Sometimes it's talked about as the mind's ability to be ceaselessly responsive. It's sometimes described as unceasing compassionate activity. This means that when we are resting in the union of essence and nature, which is emptiness and cognizance, that frees the heart in such a way that compassion or wisdom or loving kindness or patience, any of the beautiful qualities can easily flower.

So the capacity when we know the nature and the essence combined is unlimited, this capacity of the mind. That's the way it's described in Carefree Dignity. The capacity is something that is a little more subtle, I think, to intuit. So what I'm going to suggest is that as you play around with the aspects of ground, you look particularly for the first two. Look particularly and make sure you understand clearly the essence, which is empty, and the nature, which is cognizance. Once you have a really good intuitive sense of these two, I think the capacity will be more obvious.

When I first started looking in this way, I would look, and then I was supposed to see, let's just take it as a simple form, emptiness and awareness conjoined, inseparable, indivisible. I hadn't really done the reflection on emptiness that Rinpoche has talked about as being the Vipassana piece of their training. So I got to this quality of emptiness and I was kind of lost. What am I supposed to see when I see emptiness? I didn't get it. Awareness I could get, right? I'm not a bump on a log. Things are happening. I'm not asleep. Right, I got the awareness part. But I didn't get the emptiness for a while.

So I had to do lots of reflection. When I would turn and see, I had to examine, what does emptiness mean? Now as soon as you start examining and reflecting, you're not in rigpa. So I had to give it up at times while I clarified these questions. And you may need to also. If you look and you're not sure what emptiness means in your experience, even though then it's not doing rigpa, I encourage you to investigate until you find out. Maybe it means we do a little vipassana practice on the way to doing true rigpa practice. But until each of us has a real clear sense of what emptiness is and what cognizance is, in a very familiar way, we won't really recognize mind essence.

We need to get to the stage where we've touched these things with our understanding, our intellectual understanding, enough times that when it's there in our experience, we recognize it like an old friend. When you're getting to know somebody for the first time, say somebody's name is Linda. And the first time you meet, you're introduced, this is Linda. And the next time you see Linda, that name may not pop immediately to mind. And you don't know her very well. So you have to remind yourself, oh, that's Linda. I met her a week ago. She works at such and such a place. And the third time you meet her, maybe her name pops to mind immediately, but you don't quite remember all the personality. And then little by little, after seeing Linda a lot of times, when she walks into view, your heart kind of comes out with a recognition and you don't have to say anything. You don't have to say her name or where you met her or all the things you've done together or any of that. It's just you know her.

This is the kind of familiarity we need to get with the union of emptiness and cognizance. We need to touch it enough times and know it intellectually so that soon when we start touching it, we don't have to think at all. We just recognize, oh, that's it. Then the concepts can really go out of C. C doesn't then have to be conceptual.

So, what does emptiness mean in our experience? I would suggest three avenues of investigation if you find you need to investigate to find out what this means for you. One is the analogy that's often used in Dzogchen practice, which is that analogy of awareness or cognizance or the nature of mind as being like vast space. So in that analogy, you get the sense that the vastness of space includes everything. It includes the sun and the moon and the stars and the planet Earth and people and frogs and raindrops. That's all within the vastness of space. Yet it doesn't make space any smaller. It doesn't take away from the nature of space that it has those contents.

So in the same way, our awareness contains all those things. Just as space is empty, and that's the only way it could contain all those things, our awareness is similarly empty. Or it couldn't contain all the arisings of the phenomenal world. So there's a sense that within our awareness, nothing is stuck. Nothing is kind of there from the beginning that never goes out. No thing, no solid thing is there from the beginning. This analogy with space is a good way to get a sense of emptiness.

Now, within that emptiness, there are two other avenues to explore. As I mentioned, I think, in the talk, maybe it was the Mahayana talk,

The understanding of emptiness needs to include two essential aspects. The first is the emptiness of self—what we call anatta in the Theravada teachings or anatman in Sanskrit. This is the absence of any enduring center within this stream of mental and physical phenomena. The second aspect is the emptiness of objects, which points to the insubstantial nature of the phenomenal world. Even though things appear solid, like this wood, they're not truly solid in the way we imagine.

If you haven't explored the emptiness of objects extensively, let me suggest that sounds and body sensations are usually the easiest gateways to first glimpse this emptiness, due to their obviously transitory nature. You can directly perceive that the body is merely a flux of vibrations, and sounds pass through awareness very quickly. The most challenging sense doors through which to recognize emptiness are sight and touch.

Just to offer one small pointer about sight: recall that your visual experience of this room occurs because light particles—photons—strike the retina at the back of your eye. This triggers nerve impulses through the optic nerve that travel to the brain and stimulate certain regions there. That brain activity generates the visual image we perceive before us. We're not actually seeing the wall or the thangka directly. We're seeing a representation our brain has created from the light reflected off those objects. Who knows what's really there? I don't.

This entire world that we inhabit, move through, and feel so familiar with—to which we've assigned countless names—is merely a generation of our nervous system, our sense doors, and our human consciousness. And yet we take it as solid and real. That's the fundamental illusion.

You can explore the sense of touch in a similar way. This table is not truly solid. It is only the experience—the touch sensation of hardness. That's all it is. But even this touch sensation of hardness comes and goes.

You need to become familiar with these pathways to emptiness through all three aspects: recognizing that the nature of mind is like an empty sky, understanding that there is no abiding self within the mind-body process, and seeing that all phenomenal appearances are insubstantial.

Once you've explored these dimensions, what you want to recognize is that awareness and this emptiness are not two separate things. This is one unity. Rinpoche used to ask in his retreats, "What do we mean by mind?" And he would answer, "Mind is that which knows." He meant knowing first at the bare level of sense data. Knowing becomes more sophisticated, but at its foundation it's simply the capacity to register light, sound, smell, taste, and touch.

This mind—this knowing capacity—is what is like empty space, like an empty sky. But unlike space, it possesses this quality of cognizance. Space doesn't have this quality. The space right here is not connected to a nervous system and brain that generate sense impressions. This mind somehow is.

So it's crucial to see that this is one thing. Mind is one thing—or we could say the nature of mind is one thing—but it's not an ordinary kind of thing. It's not the sort of thing that can be grasped or located anywhere in space, because it creates space and time. It's the very context within which space and time arise.

It cannot be grasped in the way ordinary objects are grasped, but what Rinpoche has been pointing to is that it can know itself. Because of its cognizant nature, it is self-knowing. It knows itself as cognizance and emptiness. These are the two aspects we want to recognize clearly.

But remain aware that it's just one thing, not two separate things. It's like this bowl—is it round or is it gold? The answer is yes. It's one thing with two aspects that can be distinguished.

The nature of mind is like that. It's just one thing. There aren't two minds running around, one of which is empty and the other of which is knowing. There's only one mind, and it has these two aspects. That's what we need to become familiar with.

Remember that really it has three aspects. If we say two, that's just shorthand as we're learning. Really, it has three, but in the near term, just focus on the first two. This is the ground—the union of empty essence, natural clarity, and compassionate capacity.

When we drop effort and look toward the nature of mind, toward awareness itself, what comes back, if we're clear, is the view. There's the conceptual view and the non-conceptual view. The conceptual view is the understanding that the nature of mind is these three aspects. The non-conceptual view is your direct experience of this unity. When you look and see that nature, that's the view.

Now, we're not fully enlightened, so we don't see the whole ground. This is the napkin covering the palm pilot. We all have napkins over our palm pilots right now. So even when we try hard to look, we don't see the whole ground. We just see that first edge of it. That edge of the ground is our own experience of the view. That's as much of the view as we get today when we do the looking as best we can. Given our background, our temperament, our paramis, our unfolding up to this point, we get this little bit of the ground. That is the view for us. And that's okay. Just trust in that.

Whatever experience you had when you were told to look, when Rinpoche guided you in the looking, go with that. Trust in that. Put your chips on that. Because that's what's going to take you further into the ground.

The beautiful thing about the practice is that the view develops over time. It's not that the view you reach today is the view that will be with you forever. More and more of the ground gets exposed as the obscurations thin. So the view is an evolving element in practice. Even though non-conceptually it's these three things, the degree to which we actually see it and feel it and know it opens up over the course of our practice.

So don't worry if it seems weak today or if you're not quite sure you see all three aspects or you're not even sure if that's it. Take what you get. Trust in that and it will evolve. It will evolve. This meditation works just like gravity works. When the apple is ripe, it falls from the tree. That's a natural law. As you turn to the ground, whatever bit of it you can see, it purifies the obscurations. And that means the view opens up more and more as you practice.

The last thing I want to say, really practical tip, is about eyes open versus eyes closed. This is a good time for all practitioners, especially Vipassana practitioners, to start working more with opening the eyes. I know this is risky business. Because when we open our eyes as Vipassana practitioners, we risk losing our inner peace. But really, we don't want inner peace to be tied to closed eyes, do we? Because when we go back into the world, we want to be able to have inner peace with eyes open. So this is a good laboratory for exploring inner peace with eyes open.

In doing the Rigpa practice, Rinpoche recommended today to do it with eyes open. What happened for me when I started opening my eyes in doing this practice was I got a big jolt of energy. With my eyes closed, I was much calmer. I felt so good. Then I'd open my eyes and my body would tense up and I'd feel like I was overwhelmed by too much energy.

Rinpoche is not dogmatic on this point. If you feel that you need to calm down a little bit, that the energy is too much, it's okay to close your eyes for a while. It's okay to go back to shamatha with support, shamatha without support, breath meditation, choiceless attention, connect with objects again.

That's perfectly fine. When you feel a little more calm, open your eyes and try the look, see, rest practice again. Feel free to go back and forth between these approaches—Rinpoche emphasized this flexibility today.

You can also experiment with where you place your gaze as you open your eyes. We discussed this in the interview group this afternoon: lowering the gaze brings the energy down a little. If you're feeling tired and want to pick up the energy, raise the gaze somewhat. Play with this as a variable in how much energy you're introducing.

There's a famous statue of Padmasambhava, the founder of the Dzogchen lineage in Tibet, which shows his gaze positioned very high—well above horizontal—with his eyes wide open, almost popping out of the statue. This is considered an excellent gaze for Dzogchen practice. But we may not be ready yet for that amount of energy, so you can approach it gradually.

The beauty of this practice lies in its adaptability. You're not locked into any rigid approach. Instead, you can skillfully work with your energy, your state of mind, and your capacity in each moment. This intelligent flexibility is itself part of the wisdom of Dzogchen—learning to read the conditions of your practice and respond appropriately, always in service of discovering and resting in the natural state of awareness itself.

CHAPTER 267

Practicing Rigpa - Part 2

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> In this second talk on Rigpa practice, Guy Armstrong addresses the crucial relationship between meditation and difficult emotions, emphasizing that encountering challenging mental states is an integral part of deepening practice. Drawing from "The Flight of the Garuda," he explains how emotions can actually facilitate the recognition of Dharmakāya (emptiness aspect of mind), countering the common misconception that emotions obstruct spiritual development.
> Armstrong introduces the RAIN technique (Recognize, Accept, Investigate, Non-identify) as a skillful method for working with difficult emotions before returning to rest in mind essence. He then presents various techniques for the 'looking' step in Rigpa practice, including 'aware of awareness,' questioning 'who is looking?', and the traditional syllable 'phet.' The talk addresses common pitfalls such as identifying with the observer, projecting awareness outside the body, or trying to prolong the Rigpa state through effort.
> The teaching concludes with profound verses from "The Flight of the Garuda" describing mind's nature as "vivid as a flawless piece of crystal, intrinsically empty, naturally radiant, ceaselessly responsive." Armstrong's integration of Dzogchen and Vipassanā perspectives offers practitioners both theoretical understanding and practical guidance for recognizing the groundless, empty cognizance that is our fundamental nature.

Tonight I'd like to talk about more aspects of working with the Rigpa practice as we've been doing over the last couple of days. The first thing I want to explore is the relationship with emotions, particularly difficult emotions.

Today, for the first time in the retreat, people started to share with me about some difficult emotions that were arising. I was quite happy to hear this, because I was getting worried that the retreat wasn't working. Unless it engages some difficult aspect of the mind, I don't feel that it's going deeply enough. One of the most observable characteristics of a proper retreat, in my view, is that it reaches down and brings us to some kind of edge, where we have to find new tools to relate with that edge. This seemed to start happening today, at least for some people, and so I was encouraged.

So what do we do in this practice when working with difficult emotions as they arise? This is from The Flight of the Garuda: "Without following thoughts, relax naturally and rest in the state of mind itself. Without a doubt, thoughts will vanish spontaneously."

Sometimes yes, sometimes no. It doesn't always work like that in practice.

This reminds me of a friend who was teaching a retreat in Burma for Westerners alongside a Burmese Sayadaw. It's something that happens every year in January—a couple of our friends go over and teach. It's a unique opportunity to hear Western teachers side-by-side with Burmese teachers, all in the Vipassana lineage.

Because it's in a Burmese monastery, there are translators around and people who help support the monastery. A number of them come to hear the Dharma talks. So one of the Burmese gentlemen came up to my friend after the retreat and said, "You know, I really enjoyed listening to your Dharma talks while I was on this retreat, because you described so eloquently how to work with anger, how to work with fear, how to work with judgment. It's very helpful. Our teachers don't talk to us about these things."

So my friend said, "Well, what do they tell you to do?"

The Burmese man said, "Well, the Sayadaw says, when anger arises, note it three times and it will go away."

My friend said, "That wouldn't work for Westerners."

He said, "It doesn't work for us either."

She then asked, "What do you do then?"

And he said, "Oh, well then we say, 'Oh, never mind.'"

Which is kind of beautiful. There's a kind of underlying equanimity in that response. The emotion's there. I applied what was supposed to be the antidote. It didn't go away. Oh, well, never mind. There's a great deal of acceptance underlying that.

With Rigpa practice also, we may have the intention to turn to Rigpa and see what the liberating influence will be, or if, as it's sometimes said in this tradition, the thought or the emotion will liberate itself. But that may not always happen.

We can feel discouraged at this point that emotions are coming and perhaps coming strongly. We may feel at times that they block our access to Rigpa or block our development. So I also wanted to read this from The Flight of the Garuda: "It is said in the teachings and life stories of the masters of the past, 'the more emotions and thoughts, the more Dharmakaya.' You should know that this is how it is."

The more emotions and thoughts, the more Dharmakaya. Dharmakaya refers to the emptiness aspect of mind. So they're saying that even if you struggle a lot in the beginning, that's what opens the door for the depth of Dharmakaya later.

So don't be concerned if emotions are coming. It's an integral part of what we're doing here and leads to the deepening of the practice. I've seen this time and time again in Vipassana retreats.

I remember very clearly the first Dzogchen retreat where something like this happened to me. We were a few days into the retreat, four or five days into a nine-day retreat up in Santa Rosa. I was doing my yogi job in the kitchen, washing pots or potatoes or something. I was by a sink.

I was trying to apply the Rigpa practice consistently and touch into the empty awareness, doing it fairly regularly. As I was there at the sink and practicing, I felt this kind of wave of energy start to come up. It hit my chest and made a kind of explosion there.

And it didn't have a lot of emotion with it, but it was just as though some bubble had come up and burst. Rinpoche talked today about the burp—it was a little bit just like this energy coming up from somewhere, coming up and then passing right through me.

Leading up to that moment, my mind had been quite calm and still. Then this energy arose, passed through, and it felt like a big release. There wasn't much emotion attached to it, just this sense of something substantial being let go.

For about the next day and a half, my mind was a complete whirlwind—racing into past and future, caught up in thoughts and plans, greed and aversion. I couldn't settle it, not through connecting with mind essence, not through sustaining mindfulness. The mind was just stirred up.

But having witnessed this pattern countless times, I really wasn't worried. I knew from Vipassana practice that this is simply part of the purification process that happens. When the heart and mind settle to a new level of peace and contentment, it opens the door for whatever else might be stored down there. You may have exhausted the karmic storehouse, but just on the slight chance that you haven't...

What opens the door to the karmic bank is this state of peace and calm. Why? Because the heart feels safe to release what it's been holding.

Sylvia Borstein, who is a good friend and frequent co-teacher, puts it like this: When they want to launch from Cape Kennedy, they don't launch when the sky is cloudy. They launch the spacecraft when the sky is clear.

Similarly, the heart wants to unload its burden when the skies are clear. So when the mind settles into some new level of peace, contentment, and happiness, then the heart says, "Okay, now you can hold this too." That's when the purification begins to come through.

When it comes through and we can be with it with that really accepting attitude—which Rinpoche exemplified with "hug and kiss"—when we don't resist it but really allow it into our awareness, it's that contact, that friendly contact, that allows it to arise and then pass out. That is the delete button for the karmic bank.

One of the beauties of intensive retreats is that they allow the mind to settle enough for this cycle to take place. I like to call this the cycle of purity—the increasing calm and peace—and purification—the release of the difficult stored contents of the heart and mind.

Practicing with that wave of energy and agitation that had been triggered in that retreat, I knew not to interfere with it very much. I knew not to worry about it, not to try to make it go away. So for a couple of days, I was simply in a whirlwind, and that was okay. That's just the way the mind was. After a couple of days, it settled again to a deeper level of peace because there was no longer so much underlying agitation in the mind or body.

These are the cycles that happen in retreat, and the opportunity is there for us to learn to relate to these difficult emotions in a wise way.

So what should we do when they come? There are really two approaches. I'd like to read again from The Flight of the Garuda, Song 13, to illustrate this:

"For beginners, when emotional thought states arise too powerfully, it is beneficial first to analyze and then to rest. These are the oral instructions, so keep them in your heart."

I take this as encouragement first to practice what you could call shamatha, or what you could call mindfulness, with the emotion directly. After doing that for a while, then to rest. In a way, I take this as an encouragement first to do what we would call Vipassana practice. After you've done that for a while—after you've hugged and kissed—then you can rest because some of the charge is out.

In the way that we teach, we have a little formula for how to relate skillfully with an emotion. It's an acronym called RAIN, and it stands for four steps in relating to a difficult emotion using mindfulness.

The first is to recognize it. The second is to accept it. The third is to become interested in it, or investigate—this is the analytical piece. And the N is non-identify: Recognize, accept, be interested, non-identify.

Recognize means we know this emotion for what it is. Accept means we just open ourselves up and feel it completely. A good place to do that is in the body. If you feel a strong emotion, it's going to have an impact in the body somewhere.

Rinpoche has spoken extensively about the connection between the subtle body and our moods and emotions, noting how every emotional state manifests somewhere in our physical form. When you feel a strong emotion arising, allow your attention to settle where you sense it most powerfully in the body and ground yourself there. This grounding creates a bridge of connection—you'll feel the interplay between body and emotion flowing back and forth, each informing the other.

The third step is to become interested. This is our analytical piece, approached as part of that hug and kiss attitude—meeting our experience with genuine curiosity rather than resistance. What is fear, really? What is anger? How does this particular emotion express itself through the body and mind? What kinds of thought patterns does it generate? Here, we're not following the storyline or content of thoughts, but simply observing their patterns and textures.

Finally, we practice non-identification. We don't claim these emotions as "I" or "mine." This anger is not my personality; it's not who I am. I don't become "an angry person" simply because anger is present in this moment. We don't even need to say "my anger"—we need not own it at all. Instead, we recognize emotions as passing clouds: anger arises, persists for a while, and naturally dissolves away.

These steps allow us to cultivate wisdom and awareness around whatever emotions arise. We're making direct, intimate contact with these states while developing the capacity to hold them within mindfulness. Once we've established this spacious relationship with our emotional experience, we can return our attention to mind essence and perhaps find the rest that the Garuda song points toward. The sequence is clear: first analyze, relate, and become intimate with what's arising. Open to it with friendliness. Then see if this creates sufficient space for recognizing mind essence.

This completes what I wanted to share about relating with emotions. Remember that emotional work is an integral part of this practice. You now have two different approaches available—experiment with both and discover which serves you best in different situations.

The second topic I want to explore tonight concerns various techniques for that crucial first step of looking. Rinpoche mentioned again this morning Tolku Urgyen Rinpoche's four-step method: look, see, rest, and liberate. He's also shared three or four different ways to approach the initial looking. As I mentioned yesterday, having a range of techniques proves invaluable. Different methods resonate with different practitioners, and even for the same person, different approaches work at different times. So explore them all and discover which ones create the strongest connection for you.

Rinpoche has already introduced Tolku Urgyen's way of looking, the instruction to "drop" or "let go," and the image of the hand withdrawing into the sleeve. Let me offer some additional techniques.

One approach that often resonates with Western practitioners is "aware of awareness." Essentially, this involves shifting attention away from fixation on objects toward recognizing the knowing mind itself—the very awareness that perceives. This phrase serves as a doorway, helping practitioners make that crucial turn inward. When you're ready, simply drop in this phrase rather than using any visual image or the word "drop," and follow wherever it leads you.

Another technique Rinpoche has mentioned—though perhaps not specifically in this context—involves drawing the eyes toward the back of the head. You cultivate the sensation that your eyes are naturally gravitating backward into the skull, creating that essential sense of pulling away from external fixation.

One subtle form of ego-clinging that commonly arises in the early stages of this practice deserves particular attention. As you settle into that open, empty awareness, there often remains a sense that someone is still looking. A participant mentioned this very issue in today's interview group—the persistent feeling of an observer, a watcher, someone who looks through the eyes and receives visual impressions, hears sounds, and so forth.

This is extra. The sense of "I am the looker, I am the watcher" is something extra. What's actually going on is an identification with the factor of cognizance. Cognizance is happening, but the ego is coming in and laying claim to it. "Oh, that's me. I'm not the body. I'm not the external phenomena. I'm not the thoughts and emotions. Oh, I see what I really am. I really am the one who's looking. I'm the observer."

In a way, this is not a bad intermediate step for the ego to take. Because normally what it's doing is running around and claiming sense impressions as "me" or "mine." It'll claim body, thoughts, and emotions as "me." It'll claim outer things as "mine." And either grab to bring forward or push away. So stepping to awareness can cut through that. If you say "I am awareness," then all this other stuff is just coming and going within you, and you don't have to get involved with it. Awareness doesn't get involved with its contents.

So identifying with awareness has an advantage, but it's not clear-seeing. As an intermediate step or strategy, that's okay. And as a phase of rigpa practice, don't worry about that. Don't worry if that comes in. But there is still a level of unclarity in that the "I" hasn't been seen through because, let's face it, awareness isn't yours or mine. It's not individual. Awareness is just awareness. It's part of Buddha nature, so it's common to all of us. So the "I" is extra.

If you'd like to play around with looking at the "I," then here's another way to look: drop in a question like "Who is watching?" or "Who is looking?" If it feels like it's the thinker, then you could say "Who is thinking?" and see if that takes the emptiness a little bit further. See if that cuts through the identification just a little more.

Another way to say this is "looking at the looker." These two are almost synonymous. Who is looking? Or look at the looker. Or look at the thinker. Now hopefully when you do that—you go to look at the looker—what should you find? Nothing. Nothing. And then you're back in emptiness. You're back at a slightly more complete level of emptiness.

Just a few more. This is a phrase that Joseph Goldstein came up with and shared with me. I don't think he'd mind my sharing it. The phrase is "mind of no clinging." Mind of no clinging. So when you're ready to apply a technique to look, just say that phrase. Drop that phrase in and see what happens. The "mind" part connects with awareness. The "no clinging" part helps cut through fixation or grasping, so it opens up emptiness.

Here's one from the tradition: "Relax and rest loosely." This is from the Dzogchen tradition. Relax and rest loosely. I used this phrase a lot at one point in my practice and I found it really helpful because it's useful independent of conditions. If the mind is peaceful, you say "relax and rest loosely" and you're sort of there. If the mind's agitated and thoughts are up and emotions are up, you say "relax and rest loosely," and it sort of lets you disentangle a bit from it. So you can use it either way—if the mind's calm, if the mind's stirred up.

Another technique that Rinpoche mentioned briefly today is the syllable phat. This is a very traditional method in Dzogchen practice, meant to be applied especially when the yogi's mind is really preoccupied in thoughts. When conceptual thoughts are running and running and you can't find a way to step out of them, it's recommended to say phat in a very loud voice. If you're practicing somewhere in the wilderness, you can really shout it. It's said to cut through the chain of thoughts.

I was sitting in retreat one time with a different Dzogchen teacher, and he liked to have his class use the exclamation phat in a group format. We would be sitting all together, and the teacher would instruct us: "When I count to three, everybody shout at the top of your lungs, phat." The hall would be very still during our sitting meditation, and he would say, "One, two, three." And everybody would shout as loud as they could: "Phat!" The hall would just vibrate. It cut through a lot of conceptual thinking and was very effective.

One of my friends came to the retreat a day late and hadn't heard the initial instruction. She was sitting during an afternoon session when the teacher went, "One, two, three," and the whole room just erupted in "Phat!" I was sitting next to her and could hear her do this little whimper—she almost levitated off her zafu because she was so shocked. But I'm sure it cut through her conceptualization too.

If you're sitting in a meditation hall, you could try just saying it to yourself, imagining you're saying it in a very loud voice. Phat—but don't actually shout it.

Someone asked today whether there always has to be this conscious technique applied to do the looking. Does it always have to be like that? Isn't that a subtle form of grasping, a form of effort and will? What Rinpoche said was that you only do that when you've fallen into distraction, and that means grasping is already present. So one more little bit of effort doesn't really matter.

What I've noticed is that over time, the tools to do the looking get more and more subtle. You just get used to this turning and connecting with mind essence over and over. At first, the tools I used were pretty big, but then over time they could get subtler and subtler because it didn't need much of a nudge to get back to that place. Finally, what I mostly do now is just a very subtle intention to see again. You could just call it the intention to look or the intention to see, and then I'm back. Over time, see if the movement of turning can get lighter.

Someone asked in a retreat once: "In my experience, different techniques lead to different experiences"—and you'll probably find this is somewhat true. Different methods of looking will lead to slightly different effects in the mind and body. They asked, "Which one is right?" The way I understand it is that when different techniques give different experiences, what you want to look for is the common denominator. Look at what they share. What they share over time will converge. All these techniques will converge on authentic rigpa over time. You can just feel free to use whichever ones strike your interest or seem effective for you. Try different ones at different times.

The next question is: what happens when we look? As I mentioned last night, I had a lot of questions in the beginning about whether what I saw was really rigpa or not. I went to Rinpoche with many questions trying to figure this out. I was basically asking him to confirm my experience: "Is it like this? Is it like that? Is this it?"

Is that it?" And he always refused to confirm my experience, just as he has here, because ultimately we have to figure it out for ourselves. He can't tell.

But some of the questions I used to hear were things like, "Oh, when I do the looking technique, I get a buzzing in my ears. Is that Rigpa?" Or "My body tingles. Is that what Rigpa really is?" You've probably heard similar questions and found your own.

The thing is that no particular phenomenon is Rigpa, because Rigpa is empty cognizance. It doesn't have a color or shape or form because it can go with anything. This is what Rinpoche meant when he said this afternoon that it's "a state beyond states." Another way of saying it is you can't really say that it's a state of mind, because it's more like a container for states of mind or a perspective on states of mind—that which holds states of mind.

So it can go with any state of mind. It can go with a buzzing in the ears or silence in the ears. It can go with a body that's light or heavy. Understanding this helped me not look to repeat an experience, because the outcome isn't supposed to be one particular way. There's no way to describe a particular state that's supposed to happen when you look. This let me know I didn't need to hang on to one memory that seemed to work, because the next time it might be different depending on what the state of my mind and body was at that point.

It's like clear water that doesn't have any flavor of its own, but you can add any flavor to it. It can go with anything, so it can reveal anything. If the mind is happy or sad or calm or agitated, Rigpa can be with all of that. It takes on the coloring of whatever the state of mind itself is.

Something else people often report when starting this practice—and I think Rinpoche alluded to this today—is feeling like a lot of energy is coming up as they turn and look or drop. "Is that Rigpa?" In that case, I'd say it's kind of a sign of letting go. It's probably the dropping that has released some of the holding. You know, that dead drop that he was talking about? Sometimes that will release things we've been holding for a while, and so strong energies can come up when we learn better how to let go. Those energies can come whether we're in Rigpa or not, because they're mostly a sign of the letting go.

So again, I'd say it might be a sign that Rigpa is happening, but it's not the thing itself. Over time, as more and more of the held energies get released, when one turns and looks, there's not so much of anything that comes up because there's been a release of what's been held, and there's not an infinite supply of stuff that has to be released. So the experience gets calmer and more ordinary.

The last thing I want to talk about are some near relatives of Rigpa. As we turn to Rigpa, there are often other states that come in that aren't Rigpa but that we might think are Rigpa in the beginning. Don't worry that these things come in—these are not bad things. As you continue to practice, your own understanding will clarify what's exactly Rigpa and what's not. These are just some of the things I went through in the clarification of the view.

One is having a line of subconscious chatter going on and not recognizing it as distraction or as chatter. Thoughts can come and go—if they're seen clearly, it's not a problem. But there can be this line of ongoing chatter, commentary, past, future, that I wasn't really aware of. When there's an ongoing chain, that's moved into discursive thinking, and that takes away a bit from the Rigpa. If that happens, you can turn, if you'd like, just turn the attention to the thoughts for a little while, which is a form of samatha or vipassana. Become aware of those and that will often take some of the frequency out of them. In other words, incorporate them into the awareness.

Another thing I fell into was, once I had looked and seen, then trying to prolong the Rigpa—trying to make it last longer. This is kind of a virtue in mindfulness practice. The first two factors of concentration, as we practice it, are connecting with the object and sustaining the attention on the object. So we're taught that it's wholesome to sustain that attention. But with Rigpa, it's not the right thing to do. If we are in the seeing and then we move into the resting, but we try to make it last longer, we've fallen into fabrication and effort again.

This points to a subtle kind of effort that infiltrates our practice—one we may not notice and that we actually think is wholesome. I used to say something like, "just stay in Rigpa as long as you can," but that's completely the wrong way to express it. A much better way to say it is, "let it stay as long as it stays."

We're not actually involved with how long it stays. That depends on the current strength of Rigpa and our past practice—the accumulated force of our practice determines how long it remains. That's why Rinpoche has said repeatedly, "Don't worry about length, aim for short periods many times."

When he says short periods, he doesn't mean short sitting periods. He doesn't mean come in, sit for five minutes, then go out to walk, come back in for five minutes, go out to walk again. Sit for forty-five minutes—that's fine. But each time you go into Rigpa, don't worry if it doesn't stay long. Let it be a short experience, but let it be a really clear experience. Aim to have that recognition many times within, say, a forty-five minute sitting.

Don't mind how many times you look. When you've looked, seen, rested, and then failed to liberate—meaning distraction has come back in—don't hesitate to apply the technique of looking again. Do that many times, and don't worry how long it lasts.

Another thing I used to do was project that Rigpa was in front of me. Because there's talk of openness, spaciousness, emptiness, I'd project it out in front to get away from what didn't feel spacious—which was tension in my body. I'd look for it to be out there. But in doing that, I was trying to leave behind the body, and that's not helpful.

So check to see if you've taken the body with you when you move into Rigpa. Just take a look back and see if it's come along for the journey, or if you have an idea that Rigpa should only be in front and be a kind of disembodied experience. Then take a look at how Rinpoche sits when he's meditating or when he's teaching. It's not very different. He's very in his body—very grounded, very connected.

Once I got the idea that the body should come with me into Rigpa, then I made another kind of false move, because I had such a strong habit from Vipassana practice of mindfulness of body. So then I practiced what I might call "Rigpa of body"—which is a contradiction in terms. This is not the right way to do it.

But I felt very centered, very grounded. What I thought was Rigpa sustained itself for a long time, and I thought, "Wow, this is so easy now." But what I was actually doing was feeling my body. At that point there was a smooth, harmonious energy arising in the body that I was mistaking for ongoing empty awareness. But I'd actually localized it and fastened it onto an object.

So take a look at this relationship between space and body as you practice, and realize that Rigpa needs to encompass both. It does encompass both.

Because we use this word "empty" and "open" so much, Rigpa often gets identified with space and this quality of mind we call spaciousness. Once in retreat, somebody asked Rinpoche, "Is this practice basically about spaciousness?" You might think about how you would answer that.

Rinpoche's answer was, "No, spaciousness is not the key point. The key point is groundlessness."

Groundlessness, or emptiness. So sometimes the focus may be small. I think someone mentioned when they were working on their computer, or if you're doing your yogi job, the focus may come in. It may not be as panoramic as it is in the meditation hall, but that can be very natural. You can be with Rigpa even when the focus is naturally a little more narrow.

So the key point is groundlessness—which basically means emptiness, the insubstantiality of things.

Another place where I became caught was attributing a ground to my seat. I don't know if you've ever considered this, but the body does rest on something solid. Here, we're not using "ground" in the sense of ground, path, and fruition. We're using ground to mean solid—the antithesis of emptiness, the opposite of emptiness.

So emptiness and groundlessness are synonymous. What we take for ground is usually what we stand on or what we sit on, because that's what supports us physically and what we rest into. But this creates a false sense that there is some ultimate kind of ground—that the earth is an ultimate kind of ground. But it's not. It's not a ground for consciousness or cognizance. Cognizance doesn't have any ground. Cognizance doesn't have an up or a down. It doesn't have a bottom, and there's nothing that it rests on.

So it helped me to uncover another level of groundlessness when I looked at the hardness under my seat as just another sensation. Does that make sense? We don't associate rigpa just with space. We don't associate it just with the body.

Another trap I fell into was imagining that awareness was a separate destination apart from phenomena. Some of the phrasing leads us in this direction. There's this phrase often used in the tradition: "Rest in awareness"—as though awareness is its own destination.

For me, this seemed to be happening kind of out in front. I'd be sitting there and think, "Oh, that's awareness"—something stable, steady, ongoing, with nothing else there. That must be the empty awareness being pointed to. But there's another teaching in the tradition which says that three things are indivisible: emptiness, awareness, and phenomena.

So it's not accurate to think that you're going to find awareness someplace where there aren't phenomena. Awareness and phenomena are also inseparable. We really only know awareness through its illuminating of phenomena—at least in the beginning, until there's real depth in the knowing of rigpa.

I realized that what I was imagining was "awareness by itself" was actually the knowing of physical space. Just become aware that physical space is another object that can be known. You can pay attention to it right now in this room. Think about the space between us.

Ajahn Sumedho said that for a period he was interested in the analogy between nirvana and space, so he did a lot of meditation on physical space. When he would talk to somebody—similar to a comment someone made yesterday about the gaze of the eyes—instead of focusing on the person or becoming aware of the person's body, he would become aware of the space between them and around them. So become aware that space is another phenomenon that can be known through consciousness.

Someone said toward the end of one retreat, "I've really enjoyed your teachings, Rinpoche, and I realize that for me the practice comes down to just being. That's what I've gotten out of this week—just being. And that's how I'm doing it."

Just being is good, but does it always have wisdom in it? Aren't babies pretty good at just being? Aren't cats and dogs pretty good at just being? But would we necessarily say that they were in rigpa? Not necessarily. So remember that the wisdom element is a really important component—this knowing of the empty cognizance.

I think that's all I wanted to talk about tonight. I'll close with another reading from Flight of the Garuda, translated by Stephen Batchelor. He hasn't done the whole book, but he's done little bits of it:

"Now come up close and listen. When you look carefully, you won't find the merest speck of real mind you can put your finger on and say, 'This is it.' And not finding anything is an incredible find."

Friends, to start with, mind doesn't emerge from anything. It's primordially empty. It isn't anywhere. It has no shape or color. In the beginning, mind is not created by causes and finally not destroyed by external conditions. It neither grows nor gets stuck. It's not empty or full. Infusing peace and pain alike, it shows no preference. Ceaselessly, it reveals itself as everything, so you can't say, "here it is." Not being fixed as something, it's beyond presence and absence. It neither comes nor goes, gets born nor dies.

Mind's nature is vivid as a flawless piece of crystal—intrinsically empty, naturally radiant, ceaselessly responsive. Stripped bare of samsaric error, mind itself is surely and always Buddha.

Let me read this one more time:

Now come up close and listen. When you look carefully, you won't find the merest speck of real mind you can put your finger on and say, "this is it." And not finding anything is an incredible find.

Friends, to start with, mind doesn't emerge from anything. It's primordially empty. There's nothing there to hold on to. In the beginning, mind itself is not created by causes, and finally, not destroyed by external conditions. It neither grows nor gets stuck. It's not empty or full. Infusing peace and pain alike, it shows no preference. Ceaselessly it reveals itself as everything, so you can't say, "here it is." Not being fixed as something, it's beyond presence and absence. Thank you for listening.

Rigpa Consciousness and Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 1h14

> Guy Armstrong presents a thoughtful exploration of how Dzogchen teachings on Rigpa relate to classical Theravāda understandings of consciousness and nibbāna. Drawing from his background in both traditions, he examines the apparent contradiction between consciousness as impermanent (one of the five khandhas) and Rigpa's cognizance as unchanging. Through a illuminating analogy of sunlight pervading empty space, Armstrong proposes a model where temporary consciousness arises from an unchanging base of natural clarity.
> The talk systematically examines four different Buddhist understandings of nibbāna: as merely the cessation of defilements without ontological reality; as complete cessation including consciousness; as cessation with consciousness remaining to know the unconditioned; and as realization possible with all senses functioning. Armstrong discusses the ten fetters (saṃyojana) and four stages of enlightenment, referencing teachings from the Thai Forest Tradition including Ajahn Mahā Boowa's account of his realization.
>
> This dharma talk offers valuable perspective for practitioners interested in understanding how different Buddhist philosophical frameworks can complement rather than contradict each other, particularly regarding the nature of awareness and liberation.

Rigpa Consciousness and Nirvāna

When I first encountered these teachings, they provoked a lot of reflection in me. Coming from a Theravadan background and encountering this entirely different dharma model, I found that some points were very consistent and fit well together, while others didn't seem to bear much relationship to each other.

In particular, this concept of rigpa became very intriguing to me. Because of its nature of cognizance, it connects in the direction of mindfulness. I trust you've gotten a sense of that—the cognizance is what knows experience. In vipassana practice, it's mindfulness that plays this role of knowing our experience.

In the other direction, because rigpa doesn't arise or pass—at least the ground doesn't arise and pass, and rigpa is the view of the ground—it also connects to that which is beyond change. In the Pali Canon, the classical teachings of the Buddha, there's only one dhamma that is beyond change. I'm sure you know what that is: the unconditioned, nibbāna in Pali or nirvāna in Sanskrit.

So here we have this piece called rigpa, which on one end of the Theravadan model connects to mindfulness, our basic practice, and on the other end connects to the unconditioned of nirvāna. That's curious, isn't it?

There's one quotation in the texts that points to something similar to this. A questioner came to the Buddha and said, "You've talked about these five physical senses of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. Where do these five physical senses come together? What's the locus, the container or meeting point of the five senses?"

The Buddha said, "The mind."

The questioner thought for a minute and said, "Okay, what's the locus for the mind? What's the container greater than the mind?"

The Buddha said, "Mindfulness."

The man thought for a minute and said, "Well, what's the locus for mindfulness? Where does that come together?"

The Buddha said, "Liberation. Liberation is the locus for mindfulness."

The questioner thought for another minute and said, "What's the locus of liberation?"

The Buddha said, "Nirvāna. Nirvāna, the unconditioned. That which is not subject to coming or going."

The man thought for a moment and said, "What's the locus of nibbāna?"

And the Buddha said, "This is going too far." He refused to answer—one of the few occasions of humor in the Pali Canon.

I hope you get the sense of this connection: the physical senses, the mind, mindfulness, liberation, and nibbāna, each sort of bigger than the one before.

Well, either way you take it, toward mindfulness or toward nirvāna, there are points of controversy between some Theravadan understanding and the Dzogchen understanding.

In the Theravadan understanding, as you go in the direction of contact with objects, mindfulness comes and goes, but even more fundamentally, consciousness comes and goes and is considered impermanent. It's one of the five aggregates. All the aggregates are impermanent, so consciousness is impermanent. Rigpa and the cognizance of rigpa is considered to be stable, ongoing, not subject to change. How do we figure that one out?

And if you go in the other direction, where there's some correlation between rigpa and nirvāna, in some classical understandings, nirvāna doesn't have an element of cognizance to it. We'll get to that later, but typically it's presented as without consciousness in many schools of Theravada. So how does that fit together?

These questions became very interesting for me. More than interesting, they really gripped me. I spent a lot of time trying to understand not only how the languages fit together, but what was true. Really, which one was true? Checking against my experience and other people's experience and reading the texts, which one was I going to believe? What was I going to adopt for myself?

Now, for some of you, this may sound just like philosophical speculation and not very important. But I know there are people here whose practice gets into these realms.

of nibbana, for whom that is not just philosophical talk, but a living actuality, and other people who want to understand the relation of that to the consciousness that meets each moment.

So, at least for some, I know that this is a question of some urgency. Why? One reason is that in the Theravadan understanding, when one has a direct realization of or experience of the unconditioned, that constitutes stream entry. Once one has attained the stage of stream entry, final liberation in terms of arahantship is assured. It says in the text that it will take place in no more than seven lifetimes. And the Buddha makes statements like, once one has attained stream entry, the amount of suffering left in all of one's future lives is very small compared to that which has been undergone before.

So, although this can just be another source for ego clinging—have I or haven't I? You know the dilemma? Have I attained the ultimate state where I didn't exist? These can just be credentials along the way. They can also be very deeply felt issues of concern and things that I feel it's important to resolve within ourselves.

Ajahn Sumedho was practicing—he's told this story publicly, so he won't mind it being shared again—with Ajahn Chah in the early years when he was a bhikkhu in Thailand. Ajahn Chah was his teacher, great enlightened master. He had had an experience and wondered if it was stream entry. So he went to Ajahn Chah to ask. It's kind of a big deal if that happens in your practice career. So he described the experience to Ajahn Chah and asked him to tell him whether it was or wasn't stream entry. And Ajahn Chah replied, "How should I know? I wasn't there."

Which is great. And I think it's the same suggestion as Rinpoche refusing to endorse Rigpa or non-Rigpa for people. So in the end, the only final authority can be our own. But how do we come to make that kind of evaluation? How do we know whether we've deeply touched, accurately touched something that is beyond change?

Because it's said that the actual contact with this element, this unconditioned element, is what allows the bondages in the mind—called fetters in the Theravadan—to be uprooted. Not just temporarily suspended but taken out for good. And in our tradition they are considered to be ten of these sources of bondage and suffering, each of which gets uprooted at a later stage in the development by this contact with the unconditioned element. Because this unconditioned element of nirvana is so free in its nature, it is so completely unbound, that the direct contact, realization of it, experience of it, communicates that quality of unbinding to our individual minds and releases the bondage.

So I want to approach it in both directions—the direction of consciousness on the one hand and nirvana on the other—and talk about how Rigpa is related to each of those.

To do that, I first want to talk about what consciousness is in the classical understanding. I don't think it's different than the Tibetan understanding of the first six consciousnesses, but let's go into it a bit.

Consciousness is the fifth of the five aggregates. They are form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. The body and the physical world and the sense experiences are all part of form. So the whole physical world and sight, sound, smell, taste, touches are all in the first aggregate. The other four are all parts of the mind. When you say mind in Theravadan, in the biggest sense it's these four mental aggregates put together. But they could all be combined down to—three of them could be combined into one. Feeling and perception can also be considered as mental formations. So really we could say that mental formations form the first part of the mind. These are mind states, both emotions, moods, refined states of mind like concentration, tranquility, and so on. All come under the category of mental formations. And then the fifth aggregate is this one of consciousness. The Pali is viññāṇa, the Sanskrit is vijñāna.

So what does consciousness mean? Consciousness is that part of the mind that has the barest experience of sense data. For instance, as your eyes are open and you're looking out and you're seeing patches just of form and color, before you recognize it as patterns like man, chair, woman, carpet, bell, just that knowing of the different shapes and forms that are in front of the eye is said to be visual consciousness. Or when that sound reaches you, just the bare knowing of the sound is said to be hearing consciousness.

This kind of consciousness takes place very automatically if our senses are working and we're awake. If we were a corpse or if our senses weren't working, we wouldn't have this consciousness. But because we're awake and our senses are working and something happens, we all have this consciousness. It comes very automatically. We don't have to do anything about it.

And in fact, you can't stop it. If I tell you not to hear that sound, you don't have any choice. So consciousness functions quite automatically.

Consciousness refers to just the simplest knowing before any concepts come in—before you even think "that's a bell," or even before you think "that's a sound," before there's any categorizing at all. There's the bare physical experience, completely non-conceptual. Consciousness is the mental part of that.

So there's the sound, but somewhere you're knowing it, right? You're not a bump on a log. If you were a bump on a log, you wouldn't be knowing it. But you're not a bump on a log, so you are knowing it. That's what it means to be a conscious being or a sentient being. Consciousness is that part of the mind, that functioning of the mind, that is knowing the sound.

There are said to be six kinds of consciousness in Theravada: the five physical senses plus the mind door. So the mind is knowing thoughts, emotions, intentions, feeling tone, perceptions. I think what happens in Theravada is that we combine the sixth and seventh consciousness that the Tibetans talk about into the sixth. What they talk about as sixth and seventh is all just sixth for us. And we don't have an eighth—just sixth.

Sometimes it's helpful to know this, because if you try to find this thing called consciousness, it's kind of unfindable. You can find all the other aggregates—you can find body, feeling, perception, moods, emotions, and thoughts. But try to find consciousness and it's like the eye trying to see itself, because consciousness is what's doing the experiencing. So how is that going to experience itself?

Rinpoche talks about a non-dual kind of knowing, but this is more particular—this is the knowing of an object in Theravada. So what I want to suggest is the best way to think of consciousness, maybe, is as a verb. It's really about knowing. So don't worry if you can't find a thing called consciousness, but if you can just get in touch that the quality of knowing is happening in your experience—this bare sense knowing—that's consciousness happening.

Now, this is one level of knowing. In Theravada, as in Tibetan, there are different levels of knowing. In our meditation practice, the next level up of knowing is called mindfulness.

Mindfulness, in our tradition, is defined as knowing what our experience is in each moment. If you read the Satipatthana Sutta, it says when the practitioner breathes in, he or she knows "I'm breathing in." When the practitioner breathes out, he or she knows "I'm breathing out." When they breathe in long, they know "I'm breathing in long." When they breathe in short, they know "I'm breathing in short." When the mind is influenced by attraction, it recognizes "attraction is present in me." When it's not influenced by attraction, it recognizes "attraction is not present in me."

So mindfulness is all about knowing what our experience is in this moment. That's a little bit higher level of knowing. In the beginning, it's somewhat conceptual. It takes concept to know "I'm breathing in," "I'm breathing out," "I'm experiencing greed or aversion or sadness or happiness," whatever. So mindfulness is a little bit of intelligent knowing.

Consciousness doesn't take any intelligence. You can't turn it on, you can't turn it off—it's just happening. Mindfulness takes some intelligence, and that's why it's the opening of wisdom.

I think if you look at rigpa also—it might be interesting to ask Rinpoche this—you'll also see two levels of what could be called cognizance. There's the cognizance of the bare sense field that's coming in. It's clarity or cognizance that shows us that. It's also cognizance that knows the nature of emptiness and cognizance combined. So that's a little bit higher level of knowing. It takes wisdom to know that. It doesn't take a lot of wisdom just to know sense data.

That cognizance functions automatically. It takes wisdom to know the union of emptiness and cognizance. So that kind of knowing is also present in Rigpa.

But there's another word we use frequently in dharma discussions—both in Tibetan and Theravada contexts—and that word is awareness. What I found really interesting is that there is no Pali word that needs to be translated as awareness. The entirety of the Buddha's classical teachings can be translated without using the term awareness. Consciousness and mindfulness are the only two translations you really need. For the Pali aficionados, there's one other term—sampajanya—usually translated as clear comprehension, but sometimes translated as full awareness, though it's not necessary. Clear comprehension works fine.

So what do we do with this term awareness, which is so prominently used in the description of Rigpa? I want to return to that question.

But let me say one more thing about consciousness to illustrate the dilemma. It's said to rise with the arising of the sense element. When the bell is struck, hearing consciousness arises, and as the bell fades away, hearing consciousness fades away. This knowing rises with an object and passes with an object.

Someone once asked the Buddha, "Is this the same consciousness that travels to the next birth?" And the Buddha said, "Definitely not. You've misunderstood me." So it's really clear that the aggregate of consciousness is impermanent, arising and passing.

Yet the cognizance of Rigpa is considered to be lasting, not subject to birth or death. So which is true? Is consciousness permanent or impermanent?

You remember when I told the story a few nights ago of asking Mingyur Rinpoche what the difference was between the Madhyamaka view and the Dzogchen view? He said that the Madhyamakas consider that the Dzogchenpas believe in something that doesn't exist. This is the nub of that controversy.

The Madhyamakas would say that the Dzogchenpas believe in the ongoing nature of cognizance when in fact consciousness arises and passes. They would say that's the nub of the confusion or mistake. You'll also find this view in orthodox Theravadan circles. If you try to describe the practice of Rigpa to a very orthodox Theravadan teacher—I'm thinking of Burma especially—they will say, "No, that's wrong view. That's wrong understanding."

You remember also that I asked Ajahn Sumedho about this dilemma. His response was, "I don't know the answer to that, but this idea works for me."

So for those of you who aren't very philosophically inclined and who don't really care about this question, you're welcome to drop it. You can use the notion of Rigpa as skillful means, or you can believe it. Either way.

[A student asks about where the sense of self arises in this model]

The question was, where does the notion of self arise in this level of cognizing? It comes in at an even higher level because it rests on fixation and a form of grasping. There's been some conceptualizing of the object and a singling out of the object and then a latching onto it. So it's even a higher level of concept than mindfulness that just knows what something is. There's been development of some relationship with it as being attractive or unattractive, so the feeling tone is also important.

It arises in the Theravadan model from a mix of a bunch of the aggregates together. And that stickiness isn't seen clearly—the way they function together isn't seen clearly. And that's what creates the mistaken notion of self.

But for those of you who care about these things, how can we resolve it? I was teaching this to a group of senior students a few years ago and couldn't get across the way I was thinking about it or the way I had resolved it for myself. I found myself really turning the question over repeatedly.

That night I went to sleep and woke up in the middle of the night with this image that came to me. This image solved it for me, and this is what I want to share with you. You can consider it a kind of thought experiment, if you like.

When I studied physics in college, we were told that we could prove physical theorems in three ways. One is by physical principles. One is by mathematical proof, tested experimentally in the laboratory. And the third was called a thought experiment, or Gedanken experiment. If you can think it through and there are no inconsistencies, it's valid. So this is a Gedanken experiment.

I want you to imagine something. Picture yourself way out at the edge of the solar system with your back to the sun. Hypothetically, let's say you don't worry about a space suit or getting air—you're just out there, small. And let's say further that you're facing into a part of the sky that doesn't have any stars. So it's just hypothetical: edge of the solar system, looking out from the sun, sky doesn't have any stars where you're looking.

So what do you see? Black, right? You see black, don't you? Is it the black of the color black, or is it the black that's the absence of any light? It's the black that's the absence of any light, right? There's no light coming to the eye, so the eye sees black.

Now, is that space in front of you actually free of light? Or does it have light? Your back is to the sun. The sun's radiating. It's full of light, isn't it? It's pervaded by light, but we don't see it. So it looks black.

Now, let's suppose that a meteor flashes up from below and flies in front of your eyes. Do you see it? What's it like? Light. There's a big flash of light, isn't there? And then it goes and it's dark again, right?

I want to suggest that this is an analogy for the relationship between the unconditioned and consciousness. The analogy is that the sunlight pervading the empty space—the ever-present sunlight—is like the unconditioned nature. But we don't usually see it. When an object, a phenomenal arising, comes into that field, it gets illuminated by the unconditioned nature. And that flash, which is only temporary, is consciousness.

Does that make sense? When you're looking out into the sky with your back to the sun, you see black, but that black is actually pervaded with light. There are photons passing through there streaming from the sun, but we don't notice it. As soon as an object passes in front of us like a meteorite, there's a bright flash of light that reaches our eyes and seeing takes place.

The analogy is that the sunlight pervading the empty space is like the unconditioned nature—it's ever-present. But the flash of seeing that happens when the object comes into the field is consciousness. It's illuminated just temporarily, just momentarily, by the unconditioned, the ever-present nature. But that flashing goes away when the object goes.

"I thought I heard Rinpoche say in response to a question yesterday that actually Buddha nature, the unconditioned, is permanent, and that rigpa is a little bit different, but it is this union of consciousness and Buddha nature. So it's more like what you're describing. When you're saying that rigpa is coming in, I'm a little confused because I thought he said something different. He said it was perception."

Yeah, he said Rigpa is the perception of the ground or a piece of the ground and that comes and goes. So in that sense it's true. But Rigpa is often described in the texts as that which is beyond change. Sometimes the vocabulary is not so clear between Rigpa and Buddha nature. So I could also say Buddha nature throughout this talk. It's pointing to our current word for an unchanging nature. We can substitute Buddha nature and it will work just as well.

This sunlight pervading empty space concept actually occurs in some Tibetan texts. The solar system part doesn't because they didn't have the solar system back then, and the meteorite doesn't. But I had heard that sunlight pervading empty space was used, and that's part of what allowed this image to form. It's actually a classical analogy for the unconditioned nature.

Think about light particles—they don't have any mass. That's one of the curious things about light: it has energy, but it has no weight. And it's everywhere, if you're near a sun.

Someone mentioned dark retreat and how you experience lights even in total darkness. Yes, you experience light. In meditation with eyes closed, we experience a lot of light also. It tends to be a sign of concentration. These inner lights do come in meditation, but it doesn't need sense input. This analogy doesn't require physical light. The physical light is just an analogy for the clarity of mind, and the flashing is just an analogy for the cognizance of objects.

So it could be all inner objects. It could be cognizing an emotion. We don't know it until the natural clarity or cognizance shines on it. That's what illuminates it. It's not physical light that I'm relating to in our experience, but the cognizance of our nature. Light is just a good analogy for that cognizance. Sometimes the word used for this cognizance feature of our nature is clarity or luminosity—it's almost built in.

The term "clear light" that's used in Buddhism relates to this. Sometimes it's talked about as the clear light of the void. I'm not sure whether that's an accurate translation because that term came in a long time ago, and I'm uncertain whether the Tibetans would talk about it that way today. I tend to think that clear light is a slightly imprecise translation of luminosity or clarity, but I'm not an authority on that. It certainly has the sense of unconditioned clarity of our nature.

Here's where the analogy breaks down a little bit, because these things are occurring in physical space.

Here's where the analogy breaks down a little bit, because these things are occurring in physical space. I'm combining the outer phenomena with the consciousness of the individual who's watching. In the real situation, that sunlight pervading empty space is within each of us. It's an integral part of our minds. In fact, to say it's within isn't quite right because it's both within and without.

Here's what I want to suggest: when a phenomenon arises—let's say at one of the five senses—the ground for us to know that is already present within us as this unconditioned clarity. But no phenomenon takes place, no consciousness takes place, no sense experience takes place until that unconditioned clarity meets with a physical phenomenon, which is the sound. In the analogy, the sunlight is the inherent clarity of the mind, but in order for it to be effective or function for us as sentient beings, it needs an object to reflect it. We don't see it. We're not aware of it until an object reflects it back, bounces off of it.

The comment was made that rigpa's not preoccupied with that, and you're absolutely right. If this whole discussion doesn't interest you and isn't necessary, you can drop it.

I guess my experience of vipassana over the years was that I was very confused about the idea of the unconditioned. It really had my knickers in a twist. I had deep experience and understanding, but there was some thorny knot that didn't get untangled there, and that's what drew me to this. In my experience, what's useful about perception theory is that there can be knowing without a knower. I'm not looking at all the details of that, but intuitively, I can at least conceptually grasp that and have a brief experience of that kind of groundlessness, non-positioning. That somehow makes sense, whereas I always felt like I had to annihilate myself.

I can appreciate that because it's very hard to get any kind of conceptual model on what the unconditioned is in the Theravadan view because it's so little talked about. In the later part of the talk, when we get into the nirvana piece, that's actually what I want to go into—there are four different ways of looking at nirvana. I want to unfold those, and whether it comes with knowing or not is an integral part of that question. So we'll get there.

Let me continue a little bit longer before we open up for questions. There are many questions on this topic, and there's some material I want to cover first.

This is the model that for me resolved the dilemma because it illustrated consciousness as being temporary but arising out of a base that was unchanging—a base of cognizance that was unchanging. If you really want to mess the analogy up a little more, you can think—and I'm not going to take questions on this statement; this is just for play—imagine that perhaps the way to perceive the unconditioned nature directly is to turn back to face the source. That's all I'm going to say about that.

Where does awareness come in? In the Tibetan tradition, this aspect of natural clarity, which is not subject to arising and passing—illustrated by the sunlight in the analogy—is often called primordial awareness. Primordial because it's been there from the very beginning and it's not subject to birth and death. I think it could be helpful to capitalize the P and the A in that description, just so you remember that it's an aspect of the unconditioned. It's not an awareness of changing objects, but it's been there forever in this view—forever.

Do you see how this model of consciousness has an element that's conditioned because it depends on the object being present, but it also has an element which is unconditioned, which is a reflection of that underlying luminosity? I was interested to hear when Ajahn Jumnian came one time, someone asked him, "Is consciousness conditioned or unconditioned?" His answer was, "It has both aspects. It has a conditioned aspect and it has an unconditioned aspect." You'll find that the Thai forest tradition is very much in line with this view and this analogy. They're right there.

The other question is, as was asked a minute ago, how does this connect with the unconditioned or nirvana? That's what I'd like to talk about next.

I'll start with a quote from the book I mentioned the other night, Self-Liberation, translated by John Reynolds: "This self-originated primordial awareness has not been created by anything."

Amazing! It does not experience birth, nor does there exist a cause for its death. Amazing!

This makes it clear that the primordial awareness is not subject to coming or going, not subject to birth or death. As I said, in the Theravadan canon, there's only one dhamma, there's only one element that fits that description, and that is nirvana.

So the question is: is awareness an integral part of nirvana or not?

As we get into the territory of nirvana, I want to make one distinction here. When the Tibetans talk about nirvana, as I understand it, they talk about it to mean the mind state of a fully enlightened Buddha. That mind state is characterized by a quality of omniscience that can know anything it turns its attention to.

When the Theravadans talk about nibbana—same word—they use it in two ways. One is the mind state of an arahant who has become fully enlightened where all the defilements have been released, but who may not have omniscience, generally does not have omniscience. It's a liberated mind in either case.

But the other way that nibbana is used is as a synonym for the unconditioned element itself. So we often say that one can realize nibbana, or one does realize nibbana at the stage of stream entry. There's a direct experience or realization of this unconditioned element so that one knows what that is from firsthand experience. So just get the sense that they're a little bit different.

I'll talk about primarily the second sense of the unconditioned element. What is the unconditioned element? How is it understood in different Buddhist traditions? How is that experience described? Because people here—I know meditators here who have had a range of experiences that come close to these descriptions.

The first view is that nibbana has no ontological reality at all. Let me just say what I mean by that. Ontology is the study of being, existence, whether things exist or not. Ontological reality means something has some form of existence. So this term nibbana could or could not have some form of existence.

This school of thought says that nibbana is not a separate place or object at all or element, but it is only the state of mind which is free of greed, aversion, and confusion. Can you appreciate that understanding? It's not a destination. It's not something that is a separate dimension of our reality. It's just a normal state of mind where greed, aversion, and delusion have been completely uprooted, never to arise again. Nothing metaphysical about it at all, nothing transcendent. I mean, it's a very exalted state of mind, but it's not beyond the five senses.

Now, I think that this view is somewhat close to the view of the Madhyamaka school, Nagarjuna's school, who kept cutting out any postulates of existence. I don't know this for a fact, but that's my suspicion.

I also want to relate it to the term rigpa and just raise a point. We talked about rigpa as empty cognizance, or we could say it as a verb: empty cognizing, because we really only know cognizing by its activity, don't we? So when we talk about it as a verb—empty knowing—but then we give it a name, rigpa, it turns it into a noun. Once we've turned a verb into a noun, we tend to ascribe an ontological reality to it. But is it necessarily there?

This is also what's pointed to even by some of the Dzogchen texts which say you can't find it. Remember that section from Shabkar that I read last night? "Look for mind and it isn't to be found. It has no form or color." But I don't want to make a big deal of this. This is just more a kind of interesting question. I actually think—well, I'll get to my opinion later. It's not so important right now.

Here's the second description of the unconditioned element. This is the view of many orthodox Theravadan schools, and I'll ascribe it particularly to the view of the Visuddhimagga, a 6th century text which is very influential in Burma and Sri Lanka, and particularly associated with the school of Mahasi Sayadaw.

So in this view, nibbana has an ontological reality. It exists to some degree. It doesn't exist like ordinary things exist. It exists on another kind of level, a more subtle level—just the way that light exists in a lighter way than mass exists. But it nonetheless has some ontological reality.

And here's a description of it from the Pali Canon. This is from the Samyutta Nikaya.

Bhikkhus, that sphere should be realized where the eye stops and the perception of form fades away. That sphere should be realized where the ear stops and the perception of sound fades, where the nose stops and the perception of odor fades, where the tongue stops and the perception of flavor fades, where the body stops and the perception of tactile sensation fades, where the mind stops and the perception of ideas and phenomena fade. That sphere should be realized.

It's clear that this is talking about the unconditioned. This is a pointer you'll find many places in the Pali Canon to a quality of mind, or you could call it a state called cessation. There are different interpretations of what constitutes cessation, but one way of describing the unconditioned is as a state of cessation.

This was echoed also by a Zen master—I think it was Dogen—who talked about enlightenment as being the dropping off of body and mind.

So it's very clear from the descriptions in these teaching lineages that this is an experience that meditators have. It is, in their view, the goal of meditation practice because it is the contact with this dimension that does the uprooting of the fetters, the forms of bondage. But their description of it is that all five senses are suspended and even consciousness is suspended. So one way of saying it, if you want to say it accurately, is that the four mental aggregates go away, at least for a moment or a few moments.

People who experience this in their meditation practice describe it as a gap. There is knowing, knowing, knowing. And the next thing they know, there's been some interval of time and they start knowing again. But they know that there's been an interval of time. But there is no memory of what happened in that interval of time. Maybe if they're really acute, they can get right on the far edge of that gap coming out of it. They get a little bit of a whiff of a memory of an aroma that existed there. And so they have some little sense of that unconditioned peace and stillness, maybe. But sometimes they come out of the gap and they don't have any memory at all.

In some schools, this is considered an enlightenment experience. In the Theravadan model, there are four levels of enlightenment, so this is not full enlightenment in the Tibetan sense. But it could be an experience of stream entry.

In this state, even consciousness goes away. So there is no direct knowing of this state for the meditator. It's very much an altered state of mind. It's a very unlikely state to happen in daily life. It usually requires a lot of concentration and a lot of mindfulness and a lot of equanimity for the mind to have that experience. So you could say in many ways this is a classical description of enlightenment from an orthodox Theravadan point of view in some schools: that the cessation is of all four mental aggregates. The physical aggregate, of course, is still there. The body doesn't go away. But because consciousness isn't there, there's no experience of the body. So experience just stops for a while. And that is when it's said that the mind opens to the unconditioned.

Now, there's another description that you find in the Theravadan tradition which still has a quality of cessation to it. But in this view, consciousness doesn't cease. So the other three mental aggregates do. Feeling, perception, and mental formations are absent, but consciousness is still present. And in this view, what consciousness takes as its object is the deathless element. There's a direct realization of nibbana, of the unconditioned, in this view. This is commonly the way it's described in the Thai forest tradition.

There's a great story of a teacher who was a contemporary of Ajahn Chah named Ajahn Mahabua. I think he's 93 years old now. He's still teaching in Thailand, but he is old. He was a very, very dedicated practitioner. When he came into, I think it was about his tenth rains retreat—that means the three-month period when the monks don't move around and they usually do more retreat—he'd been a monk for ten years at that time. He decided to make a vow to sit up all night without moving. Every night of the rains retreat. So that's what he did. Every night he'd just sit up in meditation all night long. He said the pain was unbelievable. But he was very determined and he stuck to it. He said that after he did that he lost his fear of death because he knew no pain from dying could be worse than the pain he'd experienced from this period of practice.

These old masters didn't have chicken hearts. They really went for it wholeheartedly.

He said that after that intense period, his concentration was unshakable. "From that point on, I kept making progress until my mind was like rock. In other words, I was skilled enough in the solidity and stability of my concentration that the mind was like a slab of rock. It couldn't be easily affected by anything at all."

Then came an interesting development: "I was stuck on that concentration for five full years." He loved the stillness so much that he didn't want to give it up and didn't think to look for anything greater, anything beyond that stillness because it was so unmoving. Then he realized that he was stuck. It only took him five years to recognize this!

At that point, he realized what he needed to use was what in that tradition is called satipaññā—mindfulness wisdom. It's very similar in its nature to rigpa. It's the combination of cognizance and wisdom.

"At that point, things went easily because my concentration was fully prepared," he said. He began by turning this wisdom way of looking onto four factors: desire and nondesire, suffering and ease. These are basically the four parts of the Four Noble Truths.

So he was investigating the Four Noble Truths non-stop. And then he saw that they were all subject to change. Desire and non-desire kept alternating. Suffering and ease kept alternating. So he decided that wasn't the place to look.

"At that point, I let go of everything else but mindfulness and wisdom. They became impartial and impassive and the mind didn't tend to anything." And then here's the quote of this special moment:

"At that moment, the cosmos in the mind over which ignorance held sway trembled and quaked. Ignorance was thrown down from its throne on the heart. In its place, the pure mind appeared at the same moment that ignorance was toppled and eradicated through the power of mindfulness and wisdom."

When he describes the pure mind, it is this faculty of mindfulness and wisdom combined—the faculty of knowing and intelligence, which is very much like rigpa. So this is a description that meets very well with the Tibetan understanding.

The satipañña he turned on itself.

Here's another reference from the Buddha's words from the Pali Canon: "Consciousness without feature, without end, luminous all around." Sound familiar? "Here water, earth, fire and wind have no footing. Here long and short, coarse and fine, fair and foul, name and form are all brought to an end. With the stopping of consciousness, each is here brought to an end."

So this is another style of cessation. There's cessation of all the sense activities. There's cessation of thought formation, even of the possibility of thought formation. But consciousness remains, and the only thing it's conscious of is the undying, the absolute, unmoving stillness of the unconditioned.

That's the third of these four models of nirvana. That quote was from Digha Nikaya, Sutta 11.

The fourth of these models is that the realization of the unconditioned can take place in a state where all the senses are functioning, but where the poisons—greed, aversion, and confusion—have ceased. So the cessation is of any kind of grasping or misunderstanding, any degree of ignorance or grasping. Everything else is functioning, but there's a clear perception of the deathless. This is more like the view of Dzogchen.

You can also find references in the Pali Canon that support certainly number three, where consciousness is present with the unconditioned.

One interesting way to find out whether awareness is permanent is to ask: what happens when a fully enlightened being dies? Is there any consciousness that continues, or is there not?

Well, it's a little controversial in this room. He said the wisdom stream continues. And I said, "You mean as a specific, particular individual?" He said yes. And he looked and he said, "You're free. You're free to manifest." So, and then he said, "Buddha nature is not alone. Not one big thing. Everyone has their own specific thing." Interesting.

The comment was that what Rinpoche said when the question was asked this afternoon was that you're free—the consciousness does continue, but it's a wisdom mind stream only. And it's not that it merges back into a universal blob of mind, but the mind stream stays individual. And if you want, you can manifest again, meaning presumably take birth or manifest on wordless planes.

Interesting. So in the Pali, that is what I thought from the Tibetan point of view too. In the Pali suttas, this question gets touched on when you ask the question: what happens when an arhat dies?

There's this interesting passage where somebody is very close to liberation, but they can't quite get there. So they're practicing, practicing, practicing. This bhikkhu's name is Godhika. He gets close to liberation, has a temporary liberation, but then falls back into samsara, suffering. Practices, practices, practices, achieves temporary liberation, falls back into samsara and does this a number of times.

Because he's unable to sustain his liberation, he gets discouraged and commits suicide. The euphemism in the canon for committing suicide is that Bhikkhu Godhika used the knife and took his life. He was just practicing out on a mountaintop somewhere on his own.

Then the other bhikkhus came to the Buddha and said, "But Godhika used the knife. Isn't that really bad for him?" Because you know in Buddhism, one isn't supposed to take one's own life. It's still killing a human being, and so it goes against the precepts.

And the Buddha looked with his psychic vision and he said, "No worries. Because just before Godhika died, he attained arahantship. So he was released." Just before the moment of death, even though he had used the knife already.

Then he said, "Did you see near where Godhika was staying—did you see a black cloud swirling around there?" He said that was Mara searching for the consciousness of Godhika. Mara is the one who comes and tempts practitioners away. He was trying to find the consciousness so that he could drag that practitioner, drag their spirit back to a lower realm or away from practice or away from the liberating Dharma or something like that, so he wouldn't be reborn in a good place.

But the Buddha said, "Mara was unable to find Godhika's consciousness. Because he had attained arahantship, his consciousness was unestablished."

So the Buddha didn't say that his consciousness didn't exist anymore. He said that that dead Arahant's consciousness was unestablished.

And there's another great passage that illustrates what unestablished means. And this is what I want to finish with.

Buddha said, "Suppose you have a building and it has an eastern window and of course, four walls. So the sunlight comes in through the eastern window. Where does it land? On the western wall." And sunlight lands on the western wall.

And the Buddha said, "What if there were no western wall there? Where would the sunlight land?" And they said, "On the earth."

"What if there was no earth there, but there was water? Where would it land?" He said, "On the water."

Finally he said, "What if there was no water or earth there?"

Where would it land? And at that point he said it would be unestablished. The sunlight would be unestablished. Sunlight in empty space? Remind you of anything?

So finally tonight I want to describe one meeting I had with Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche, whom Sogyal Rinpoche has mentioned a few times. Nyoshul Khenpo was a teacher of Sogyal Rinpoche and his picture is on the altar if you haven't looked yet. There are photos on this side of Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche and Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, our Rinpoche's father. You might like to take a look.

One year, Sogyal Rinpoche had not been able to come to America and I was missing having contact with him, so I went over to Kathmandu. I spent a few weeks there and would go up to his monastery for teachings and practice in the shrine room. I practiced in my hotel and had some contact with him over a couple of weeks, which was a very wonderful experience.

Then one day, Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche was in town and staying at Rinpoche's monastery outside of Swayambhu. Rinpoche asked, "Would you like to meet Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche?" I said, "Well, I have some dana to offer him." A friend of mine had heard that he was staying there. He was a teacher of hers and she said, "Would you offer Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche some dana on my behalf?"

I said, "I don't need to meet him. I'll just give you the dana and you can offer it to him coming from my friend." Sogyal looked at me like, are you crazy? I just said, "I don't need to meet him." I thought, you know, met one rinpoche.

But then I reconsidered. I said to Sogyal Rinpoche, "You know, I really would like to meet Nyoshul Khen Rinpoche. It would be great if I could go in and present the dana." So he arranged it for me.

I'd heard so many things about this great teacher, great bodhisattva. I was quite nervous going in to meet him. Also, I'd been meditating for a couple of weeks, so I was pretty open at that point.

I went in and we had just a little chit-chat. I was introduced and he was there with his wife who looked after him. Then there came the moment for me to present the offering. I went up and bowed three times prostrate on the ground, then held out the offering to him. He took it and then I looked up into his eyes.

As I said, I was a little nervous. Looking into his eyes was an experience that I will never forget. As I looked into his eyes, he seemed to go into his meditative state. He was a highly accomplished Dzogchen practitioner—he passed away a few years later. His eyes seemed to just widen a little bit, and his gaze was really in the distance. All movement in his mind ended. There was some kind of cessation that happened.

As I looked into his eyes, I felt like I was looking into nirvana. I felt if I had just been able to look into them a little longer, something might have happened. It was so still looking into his eyes that it wasn't right to say that his mind was still. It more felt like there was no mind there to be still or not. There was just an absence of possibility of movement.

In that gaze, I felt so exposed, I got even more nervous. I felt like he was just looking right into the middle of me and seeing my anxiety. At that point, I sort of came out of that little spell, said goodbye, made my bows again, and left. But that gave me the transmission experience.

And the last fetter to be uprooted is ignorance, which is ignorance of the Four Noble Truths and the nature of reality.

So that's the traditional Theravadan understanding of the stages of enlightenment and what gets eliminated at each level. What's particularly interesting to me is that restlessness is considered one of the final fetters. When we experience that fidgeting or mental agitation during meditation, we might dismiss it as a minor irritation. But in this framework, the complete elimination of restlessness is actually a mark of the highest realization.

The progression makes sense when you consider it deeply. The earlier stages address our fundamental relationship to existence itself—our doubts about the path, our belief in a solid self, our attachment to external rituals for purification. Then we work with the grosser forms of attraction and aversion. The later stages address increasingly subtle forms of clinging—to refined spiritual experiences, to any sense of being someone who achieves something, and finally to any remaining ignorance about the true nature of things.

This systematic approach appeals to the analytical mind, but I think it's important to remember that these descriptions are pointing toward something that ultimately transcends conceptual understanding. Whether we frame awakening in terms of the elimination of fetters, the recognition of our primordial nature, or the direct seeing of emptiness, we're always using provisional language to point toward what cannot be fully captured in words.

What matters most is finding the approach that resonates with your temperament and circumstances, then practicing with wholehearted dedication. The various traditions offer different maps, but the territory they're pointing toward is the same fundamental freedom from suffering.

All right, let's take our break here.

All conceiving of self is gone. And the final one is ignorance. Ignorance is completely plucked out of the mind. And at that time, the mind is purified completely of any unwholesome states—greed, aversion, and ignorance.

That's a good place to end. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 269

Taking the Practice Home

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses the essential challenge of maintaining contemplative practice when returning to ordinary life after retreat. He emphasizes that high motivation is crucial for remembering to cultivate awareness throughout the day, sharing the example of Minya Rinpoche's practice of turning to mind-nature 100 times daily. Armstrong discusses the unique suitability of Rigpa practice for daily life, noting its immediacy compared to mindfulness practices that require different objects in different situations.

The talk covers practical recommendations including two hours of daily formal practice when possible, the minimum commitment of simply assuming meditation posture once daily, and the importance of annual silent retreats. Armstrong explores four essential areas of practice competency: choiceless attention (Vipassana), loving-kindness cultivation, samatha concentration including jhāna practice, and non-dual understanding through Dzogchen or Mahamudra.

A significant portion addresses the philosophical sophistication of Dzogchen and Mahamudra teachings, particularly their integration of ultimate truth (the non-dual ground of Rigpa) with conventional developmental practice. Armstrong explains how both perspectives are necessary - the non-dual expressing wisdom that understands emptiness, while the developmental path expresses compassion. He concludes with practical advice for integrating diverse practices and trusting one's own experience as the authentic vehicle for realizing the nature of mind.

Sometimes just a little bit of conversation, half an hour or forty-five minutes, can really get the thought train going again. It can be hard to settle, and the prospect of stabilizing the attention in rigpa starts to seem a little more ambitious than it was before. But tomorrow we'll get the bigger challenge: taking the practice back into our daily life. So that's what I want to talk about tonight.

I think one of the big questions that comes up is around a feature I want to illustrate by a story. I work out at a gym regularly when I'm in town. That may not be apparent from my physique, but I do it just to try to stay healthy, although I've never been into body sculpting particularly.

While I was working out at the gym, there were these two teenage guys who came in. A lot of young men at the gym, and some of them are very, very buff. It seems to be a thing among this generation to look really good. So they were working out, and I was working out on a set of weights near them and I overheard their conversation.

They were scrawnier than I am. I mean, I've put on weight since I was an adolescent. They were more like me when I was an adolescent. But they were supporting each other and spotting each other and really putting a lot of effort into what they were doing.

There was a guy at the gym working there named Lance. Lance was formerly a competitor in the Mr. America contest, and there was a photo of him when he was at his peak of development. He really looked like one of those Arnold Schwarzenegger look-alikes in his peak, really muscled all over, oiled and everything.

These two kids were talking about him. They said, "Wow, did you see Lance the other day in here? He was on the press and he was pressing 515 pounds." I mean, that's extraordinary. I can probably press at my peak like 135 or something. They were watching Lance press 515 pounds and they were totally in awe that that was possible for him.

That's what I tuned into in their discussion: how impressed they were at Lance's level of development. The fact that that's what they aspired to was going to condition their effort. They were going to make the kind of effort that would lead in that direction, even if they never got to a Mr. America contest. They saw that that's where their training could go, and they aimed there. Whether they reached it or not, that's really what inspired them and motivated them to put in a lot more effort than I was putting in.

So I think this question of aim and motivation is really central when we talk about taking the practice back into daily life. Maybe even more than it is when we're actually on a retreat and we don't have so much else to do. Because if our aim is high, that will really fuel the right kind of effort on our part. We could even say the right balance between effort and non-effort on our part. But it will inspire what we do when we get home, when we leave here.

Just as an example, Rinpoche the other day mentioned his brother, Minya Rinpoche, who carries a mala around and makes sure that he turns to the nature of mind a hundred times a day when he's in a daily life situation.

So, for those of you who just went through maybe a little bit of conversation and then tea, any idea how many times you turned? Were you noticing anything?

"I did," Leslie replied. "I stopped counting at a certain point because I had to wash dishes. But it was 108. I only did a short period of time, really. I did the break to silence, though."

Excellent. Gold star. 108 times.

I couldn't really do it while talking. She mentioned it's difficult to do while talking, which I think is true. It's easier to do while listening, so you can start to develop the practice first while listening.

Even in this supportive setting, I'm sure you got a sense of how easy it is for the mind to wander. Even when we've just come out of doing formal practice, it's hard to remember to tune back in to that factor. Are we checking in? So the motivation in daily life needs to be high so that we have this interest in continually checking: Where is nature of mind? Am I in touch with mind essence? Am I in touch with emptiness?

Because mala beads look a little bit odd in daily life in the West, some friends of mine gave Joseph Goldstein—who's a colleague and longtime teacher of mine—a more Western artifact to do the same thing. It's a counter that you use like when you're counting people through a turnstile. You can slip it in your pocket, and every time you turn back to nature of mind, you click it once. At the end of the day, there's your counter.

I think we should probably buy a bunch of these for the bookstore. Office Max has them for about fifteen dollars.

The good thing about rigpa practice is that it's really well suited for daily life. I've been working with it for a number of years, and I've worked with mindfulness for a number of years. They're both excellent. But there's something about rigpa that's more immediate in any situation. It doesn't matter what you're doing. With mindfulness, we can find objects also, but the objects keep changing. If you're sitting, it's one thing. If you're walking, it's another. If you're working at a desk, it might be another. With rigpa, it's just one practice: look and notice the nature of mind. And it works very well in daily situations.

I hope you've been experimenting with this during your time here, because its practice is very well suited for taking back into daily life. The trouble is we have to remember. As someone said, it's not hard to be aware—what's hard is to remember to be aware. This is really true. But as we develop that, the counter can be a very good reminder. You think, "What's that thing in my pocket?" and it will remind you to turn and notice.

Please try to fill in your daily activity with this practice. Also, in your daily life, there really is no substitute for formal practice. There's no substitute for putting your seat on a cushion and just devoting yourself one hundred percent to meditation—or non-meditation, as the case may be—because the intention is not divided in that time, or is not meant to be divided.

Of course, our intentions go in countless directions, but we maintain one primary intention: to notice. With that wholeheartedness, it becomes much easier to cultivate awareness when we transition from formal practice into our daily lives.

How much should we practice? I was recently reading Rinpoche's book, Carefree Dignity, and found it quite interesting that he recommends two hours a day. This aligns with what we would suggest at the end of a Vipassana retreat, if you can manage it.

When I first connected with meditation practice in my twenties, I was single without family obligations, so I could maintain this schedule. I practiced my two hours daily quite religiously for many years—some years even three hours a day. It becomes more challenging as life grows more complex. Many of you are beyond your twenties now, with family responsibilities and other obligations that make such commitment more difficult.

See what's possible for you. Perhaps thirty minutes in the morning and twenty minutes before bed. Maybe forty minutes in the morning and that's it. Do what you can. Every moment helps—none will be wasted.

I often speak with people at retreat's end who have heard this advice many times. They say, "Yes, it sounds wonderful, but I simply can't do it. I lack the discipline for a steady daily practice." When they ask what I suggest, we have one final approach for such situations.

Make a vow that once daily you will assume the meditation posture. There's no excuse not to, because there's no time commitment—not forty minutes or an hour. Simply commit to reaching your cushion before your altar and sitting down once each day. If it's not a suitable moment, you can rise after a minute or five. But I suspect that most times you sit, you'll discover how good it feels and want to remain longer.

The challenge lies in shifting mindset—moving from busyness and the seeming urgency of our tasks into releasing that entire chain of obligations. That's the difficult part. If you can make this shift—and there's no reason you cannot—you'll find yourself in place, and likely you'll stay awhile. This is the vow to take if daily routine proves challenging.

I also strongly encourage everyone to continue silent meditation retreats. There's no substitute for the deepening that emerges through silence and continuous attention. When you examine the great masters of this lineage, you see this pattern clearly.

Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche's biography was recently published as Blazing Splendor—a truly wonderful book. Born in old Tibet, he shares stories of the masters he knew as a young practitioner. They're extraordinary accounts that genuinely capture the magical flavor of Tibet. In the preface, one author noted that Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche had spent half his adult life in retreat. That's what authentic realization requires.

Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, head of the Nyingma lineage along with Dudjom Rinpoche when both were alive, spent twenty-two years in retreat beginning around age thirteen. He left home at thirteen with tremendous motivation for retreat, embarking on years of solitary practice through his teenage years and beyond.

Compared to such dedication, one week yearly might not seem too demanding. I suggest aiming for at least a week of silent retreat annually. If you connect with this practice and find it beneficial, aim for a month. If a week deepens understanding, a month deepens it immeasurably.

Consider this honestly: we spend the first three days of any retreat simply arriving. Only after three days does practice begin to deepen. Then today—when did you start thinking about going home? Probably quite early this morning. So perhaps two days of this retreat found you truly settled. This is my estimation, but it serves as a useful guideline.

In a month-long retreat, subtracting three days at the beginning and perhaps two at the end, you have twenty-five days of settled practice.

The deepening simply continues, making longer retreats highly recommended.

Yesterday someone expressed enthusiasm: "I really do love this Dzogchen practice. Where can I go to do a month-long retreat in this style?" I know that Lama Surya Das offers a month-long Dzogchen retreat on the East Coast each summer. But our primary connection is with Sogyal Rinpoche, and there are other wonderful Dzogchen teachers available.

However, in my experience, most teachers require that you have completed—or at least begun with a firm commitment to complete—the ngöndro, the preliminary practices Gerardo mentioned earlier. These may take four or five years to complete, creating a very high bar for entrance. Sogyal Rinpoche is quite rare in his generosity, offering these teachings to people who haven't completed such prerequisites.

The reality is that there simply aren't many open month-long Dzogchen retreats available. When I asked both Gerardo and Rinpoche about this today at lunch, they both just shrugged.

One option I've pursued—which I mentioned in an earlier talk—was traveling to Kathmandu to practice near Rinpoche's monastery. He now has twenty single rooms for Westerners, so you can actually stay at his monastery. When he's in town, you can meet with him periodically for interviews. This is actually one of the better situations if you want ongoing guidance in this practice. It's difficult to find a qualified guide you can be near for extended periods, especially since the great teachers travel constantly because everyone wants them to come and teach. It's challenging.

For Vipassana practitioners, please don't think, "I'm only going to practice under a qualified Dzogchen master, or I won't practice at all." A month of samatha practice is far more valuable than zero time spent in Dzogchen practice. Please continue using the facilities at Spirit Rock, IMS, and other centers to deepen your practice.

Rinpoche has spoken about—and I would also outline, especially for Vipassana practitioners—four main areas of practice that you should aim to develop some competency in during your lifetime.

First is basic Vipassana practice characterized by choiceless attention, enabling you to be mindful and fully present with any phenomenon arising at any sense door without losing awareness.

Second is developing familiarity with loving-kindness through intensive practice. We offer seven-day and month-long loving-kindness retreats for this purpose.

Third is some degree of samatha practice to discover whether you have the capacity for jhana practice and entering absorptions. This can be accomplished through loving-kindness practice in long retreats or through breath meditation, probably in month-long retreats.

Finally, now that you've had this introduction, some integration of a non-dual perspective. I personally believe Dzogchen or Mahamudra are the finest approaches available. While there are other forms like Advaita, I deeply appreciate the elegance and philosophical foundations of Dzogchen and Mahamudra. I believe they're unparalleled in the entire spiritual universe of non-dual teachings.

What I most appreciate about their understanding is that while they honor the non-dual—the ultimate pointing to ultimate truth, always accessible here and now, not requiring passage through time but available in any moment as you open to the truth of the ground, or rigpa—this is the heart of Dzogchen teaching. Simultaneously, it rests on a foundation that is a developmental path, acknowledging effort and progress over time toward the goal of liberation.

This combination of ultimate truth of the ground and development over time representing the conventional understanding of spiritual practice—the union of these two—is the height of dharma wisdom. Any path that doesn't embrace both is incomplete.

In Zen, they say that once someone achieves satori, they must wait ten years before teaching. This decade allows the practitioner to integrate understanding of the ultimate level with understanding of the conventional level. Until one has fully integrated and merged these two understandings so they're no longer in conflict, one's spirituality isn't mature enough to instruct others in this view.

Some non-dual teachings cling to the non-dual and use it as a platform to discredit the dual—to dismiss notions of development, progress, practice, time, and refinement. But true understanding of the non-dual does not deny dualistic truth. The conventional and ultimate live alongside each other and need each other. Denying either means missing something essential.

It could be said that the dualistic vision of progress over time from defilement to liberation is the expression of compassion. The non-dual is the expression of emptiness—the wisdom that understands emptiness. Emptiness without compassion is cold, while compassion without emptiness remains entangled in samsara.

So we need both. The systems of Dzogchen and Mahamudra, in my view, are the most philosophically sophisticated at explaining that mutual dependence. Because of this, they offer very satisfying views. All the relative practices are encouraged, as you've heard Rinpoche discuss—the development of faith and devotion, the development of love and compassion, the development of shamatha. All these practices form an integral part of the foundation that prepares one for realizing the ground, realizing the ultimate.

For Vipassana practitioners, any cultivation we do in these four main areas is invaluable: the wisdom of relating to all phenomena, the development of the heart through loving-kindness, the deepening of concentration through shamatha practice, and the non-dual understanding of touching the ultimate. All these are areas we each need to develop significantly. None of us have reached the peak of any of these four areas, so any time you spend developing any of them is time really well spent in your maturation as a dharma practitioner.

Which practice calls to you at any given moment depends entirely on your own discernment. Look into your own heart and explore two essential questions. First: What do I really feel drawn by and inspired by? What's pulling my heart? Listen deeply, for different practices will call to you at different times. Second: What does my heart and mind really need at this point? Where is my practice strong? Where is it lacking? As you examine your current life situation, what are the strengths and weaknesses in your mental-emotional makeup right now? What style of practice would best balance these or cultivate what is underdeveloped?

This is primarily something you can discover for yourself, though having a conversation with a teacher to gain their perspective can be invaluable.

You don't need to wait for a month-long Dzogchen retreat to arrive in your area. There's tremendous valuable work to be done in the meantime. If possible, please connect with a local sitting group. The support of like-minded practitioners is invaluable.

Dharma practice goes against the mainstream of this society—the Buddha said this himself. We are swimming against the current. Most of society moves in the direction of acquisition: having more possessions, money, status, reputation. It's always about more, more, more. Dharma practice flows in the opposite direction—toward renunciation, letting go, giving away, becoming less, realizing emptiness.

Without the support of people who share this understanding, it becomes difficult not to get caught up in the acquisition mindset. It's challenging to live in the world without being influenced by worldly values. Contact with like-minded practitioners helps keep our sights clear, keeping us aimed in the right direction.

So please, if you can, connect with a sitting group near you. I know Choknyi Norbu Rinpoche has a group in the Bay Area—Larry Garcia is a contact point. There's a Dzogchen lama in Casadero, near Sebastopol. There's a Mahamudra group in Petaluma with Peter Barth. As most of you know, there are many Vipassana groups throughout the Bay Area and the country. Please try to connect with like-minded people and maintain your orientation toward dharma values.

Now I want to discuss some specific understandings from this retreat that may differ from other practices you've encountered. If you've practiced traditions other than Dzogchen or Mahamudra, some of these emphases will be new.

The concept of Buddha nature—not merely as philosophy, but as direct experience—can transform your practice completely. Someone mentioned to me recently that this gave them an entirely new basis for feeling held and supported. To know that reality isn't limited to the five senses, or even the five senses plus mind, thought, and emotion, but that there's something deeper holding all of this—this changes everything.

Theoretical knowledge of Buddha nature is one thing, but experiential knowledge penetrates far deeper. Being able to touch this in rigpa practice provides a new foundation for faith in life itself. And it's precisely this faith that gives us the capacity to surrender.

It's to surrender into the flow of the Dharma, to let go of egocentric vision and intentions.

Another thing that this practice highlights is the centrality of grasping. After doing the Rigpa practice for a while in my first retreat, I started to notice that what I was turning to again and again wasn't physical phenomena—sound, sight, smell, taste, touch. It wasn't so much moods and emotions. What I was noticing was whether the mind was in a state of grasping or whether it was in a state of freedom.

This is the heart of the Dharma. This is the pointing of the Four Noble Truths: grasping, its cause which is craving, the release from grasping, and the path to it, which is wisdom. So one way to look at this practice is to notice if grasping is present. If it is, the ego is present. Ego and grasping are synonymous. Then notice what happens when you can release. And then there's the dropping into the seeing of Rigpa, and the freedom in that.

Don't get too idealistic about letting go of grasping and think that it should happen easily. Ajahn Chah, who was a great teacher in the Theravadan tradition, said that 70 to 80% of spiritual life is knowing that you're grasping and not being able to let go. So if you feel that moment when you're thinking, "Oh, why can't it happen? Why isn't Rigpa today like it was yesterday?" and you can't just release and be there—know that you're in good company.

Just one little tip: if you find yourself straining toward Rigpa, trying to recreate that experience with your body leaning forward, wanting that experience you had yesterday—of course that will block it. It might be simpler to go back to a simpler practice just to calm the mind for a few minutes. Go to the breath or body, even close your eyes if you like, and just feel a little bit calmer. That might release the grasping, and then when you feel that release, turn to mind nature again.

One of the beauties of this approach is the introduction to non-doing. I think it's a very elegant way to present non-doing, giving it great philosophical support. If you walked up to someone on the street and told them to stop doing, they wouldn't have a clue how to go about it. Even meditators who have practiced for years might not quite know how to approach it. But through this presentation, as you get close to non-doing—and "close" means the mind's oscillations have slowed down quite a bit, not swinging so much into past and future, which means some degree of shamatha is present—you're ready to move into non-doing. This really gives you a very elegant way to do it.

So it suits very well that still time in practice. But it's also important to know that it also tells you when to make an effort. Non-doing is great and non-effort is beautiful when practice is effortless. But this teaching also says when we need to make an effort, and that's when we're in what Rinpoche calls post-meditation, which means that we've fallen out of Rigpa and have gone into distraction or some form of grasping. Then we need to apply effort again, and the effort is just to look. But still, it's a practice of non-effort that also highlights the importance of effort when needed.

Where is effort not needed? When we're in Rigpa. Because any effort within that, as you've been discovering, will just disturb it, including the effort to prolong. So we start to learn this trust and surrender in the meditative state itself. When it's there, we accept it and we don't try to make it last longer than it is. It's really just a way of opening without clinging to that meditative state that comes.

This is really supported, or you could say enabled, by the factor of relaxation. So again, it's a critical component of this whole path. As you start your sitting, as you continue to turn and look, just continue to plant the seed of relaxation in the mind and the body. That's really what enables the Rigpa to open up. It opens up from a place of being relaxed and trusting.

This is a quote from a Christian contemplative named Angelus Silesius: "God is a pure no-thing, concealed in now and here. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear." Could have been a Rigpa practitioner. The less you reach for it, the more it will appear.

Rinpoche's teachings also highlighted for me the importance of devotion. I was a very non-devotional practitioner when I encountered Rinpoche for the first time. I wasn't quite anti-devotional, but nothing in devotion had touched me before. And with him it sort of came alive for me.

Also in those early years we did a lot of Vajrasattva chanting. It's a very beautiful mantra, and the image is very striking too. That became a doorway for me. And then I discovered a doorway within our tradition, which is the loving-kindness practice.

Rinpoche separates out faith and devotion from love and compassion, but there's one particular component of the metta practice I want to mention, and that is loving-kindness directed to the benefactor—which for me has always been a spiritual teacher. As I would do loving-kindness for the benefactor from a concentrated and meditative state of mind, I found that there was a fusing of our natures.

I haven't done guru yoga, so I can't say it's the same thing that happens in the Vajrayana practice, the Tibetan practice of guru yoga, but it was definitely happening for me in the metta practice for the benefactor. This melding of the benefactor's wisdom mind and my mind took place very strongly in that loving-kindness practice.

Someone in an interview mentioned that they like the idea of devotion but don't particularly feel it for any one individual and asked if it was possible to be devoted to the Dharma. Absolutely. Absolutely.

Some of you know the story of James Baraz, who was starting a course with Ram Dass. This was in the mid to late seventies. Ram Dass, of course, is a bhakti. James was coming out of having practiced with Joseph and in the insight mold.

And Ram Dass said, "I don't know if you're going to be enough of a bhakti for me. What do you love? Do you love God?"

"I can't quite say that."

"Do you love Jesus?"

That didn't quite work.

"Krishna?"

"Not really there."

"Well," Ram Dass said, "what about the Dharma? Do you love the Dharma?"

James said, "Yeah, I love the Dharma."

Ram Dass said, "Okay, say it with meaning. I love you, Dharma."

And then Ram Dass said it back to him. "And you're not getting enough feeling in it. Say it again. I love you, Dharma. No, say it some more. It's not quite strong enough yet."

He made James keep saying it until tears started coming out of his eyes, out of his love for the Dharma. So that was his bhakti relationship.

But even before James Baraz, there was the Buddha. In a section of the Pali Canon, the Buddha says after his enlightenment, he was looking around for someone to be devoted to. He said, "I surveyed all the ascetics and Brahmins and wanderers and practitioners of the era, and if there had been someone more developed than me in concentration, I would have lived honoring and respecting them and lived in dependence on them. I would have taken refuge in them and been devoted to them. But I couldn't find anyone.

"I looked to see if there was anyone more developed than I in virtue, in wisdom, in their degree of liberation. And I couldn't find anyone. So there was no one for me to live in that devotional relationship with. So I decided to live honoring, respecting, and in dependence on the Dhamma." That became his devotional focus.

I really appreciate the pointing through the Dzogchen practice of where to look for the unconditioned. This had been a big mystery for many years in my practice. I was always told that it was beyond the six senses, but I had no idea where to look because I didn't know what was beyond the six senses. And to know that it's in the realm of awareness, that's the direction to look in, is a very big clue. It's a big clue.

So that's a great refuge, even to know the direction of the unconditioned.

These are some of the key points that have shifted in my view and understanding of practice through my encounter with these teachings. They've enriched my practice tremendously, and I hope they're among the things you'll be able to take home and continue to develop and work with.

Now, in terms of how to integrate diverse practices—because most of you had some spiritual practice before coming here—the great thing about Dzogchen practice is that it integrates really well with other practices. I think Gerardo may have spoken this afternoon about combining it with visualization.

Early on in retreats, Rinpoche used to describe his tradition's standard format for a practice period. He said it would typically begin with taking refuge—the chants we've done—and acknowledgment of bodhicitta to set the intention for the period. Then it might move into visualization, visualizing a yidam with its mantra. At some point—and I think this is what Gerardo discussed—you dissolve that image into the nature of mind, into emptiness, recognizing that the image is fabricated. After that dissolving, one rests in the nature of mind with the energy of that former practice. Finally, at the conclusion of the sitting, one dedicates the merit.

Throughout all of Rinpoche's teachings I've heard, this has always been presented as one piece alongside other practices. He's very open about recommending that we combine it with our vipassana or samatha practice.

The way I like to think about integration follows very much how we entered this retreat: starting with samatha with support—a simple object like the breath—then moving to samatha without support, basically opening up the field of attention. At that point, with some prior stability, we move into the rigpa practice.

For vipassana practitioners, I think the spectrum of practices that this new approach offers is very complete. We can start with a simple object like the breath to develop stability of attention, move into slightly more expanded attention with an intermediate field like the body, and combine both—stability of attention with understanding of the nature of things through the three characteristics as seen through the body. Then we open further, with greater stability, into the choiceless attention that relates equally with all phenomena. This practice adds one more step in that open direction.

As the stability of mind grows, that becomes an excellent platform for opening into rigpa. So for vipassana practitioners, you can think of it as the fourth step in a spectrum: breath to body to choiceless attention to rigpa practice.

One thing you'll definitely notice—and I'm sure many of you sensed this during the retreat—is how, as your samadhi deepens, the vividness of rigpa becomes much stronger. As you progressed through these days, several people mentioned to me that they weren't feeling much effect early on from the looking, but as the retreat continued and there was greater stability of mind, greater concentration, rigpa really became more evident—easier to connect with and more vivid.

While this may not have been everyone's experience, it has generally been mine that as samadhi strengthens, rigpa really awakens.

On the other side of the spectrum, to prepare you for what might come, as you return home from this retreat, you may find that rigpa is very alive for you immediately after. This was my experience. Then, as I remained in daily life longer and my samadhi gradually decayed—which it will—the vividness of rigpa became less pronounced. The immediate recognition of it became much harder over time.

Be prepared that this might happen. When it did for me, not getting much response from the looking, I returned to vipassana practices. Of course, Rinpoche would probably still recommend continuing with the looking. So experiment with all your practices. See what works for you. Be pragmatic.

I want to touch on one point. Earlier in the retreat, someone asked whether Rinpoche thought people with vipassana practice could open in a significant and deep way to rigpa practice. There was an interview with him in the Tara Mandala newsletter, probably close to ten years ago now, in the late nineties when he was teaching a Dzogchen retreat at that center in Colorado founded by Tsultrim Allione.

In that newsletter, he was asked whether he thought vipassana practice was good preparation for Dzogchen practice. He said he considered it excellent preparation. When the interviewer asked why, his reply was that vipassana meditators know very well how to meditate—they've learned technique really well. So when they come to Dzogchen, they pick up very quickly how not to meditate.

That's an interesting observation. In my experience, Rinpoche doesn't believe there's any prejudice against us as vipassana practitioners, but rather that our background can work very much to our benefit.

The last thing I want to emphasize about what to take home is this factor of trusting your own experience, which I discussed a few nights ago. Whatever you discover when you turn and look, really trust that as your vehicle in rigpa practice and development of the view. Whether it represents the deepest view or the final view or meets some standard of view doesn't matter so much. It's what's closest to your mind right now, and that's what to follow.

It's like if you're walking down the street in a neighborhood and you catch the smell of fresh bread really strongly in the air somewhere, you know that a bakery is not far away. And so if you're looking for the bakery, you can just follow that smell of the fresh bread. It will lead you to the bakery.

So as you turn and look, whatever you get is like the aroma of Rigpa. If it's not the authentic thing, it's the aroma of it. And as you follow that, it will lead you to the deeper experience, the authentic Rigpa, the direct realization—whatever you want to call it, it will lead you there. And again, a few people have expressed how they've seen what I would call development of the view take place even during this retreat. So the important thing is to have confidence in that and follow it.

If you smell the bread but you walk the other direction, you won't reach the bakery. So really have confidence and follow that. That's your view.

I think I just want to close by reading a quotation from the chant book that I don't think we've done yet. It's called "The Four Dharmas of Gampopa" on page three. I think we'll chant it at the sitting tonight. But it really kind of sums up the whole of our endeavor:

Grant your blessing so that concepts turn to Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that Dharma turns into the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path's confusion is dispelled.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

A good one to take with you.

So we have time for just two or three questions maybe. You all have listened to a lot of talk today, so I'll give you an early night.

Someone at the very back asked: "What is Mahamudra?"

Mahamudra is this teaching of Dzogchen. Did you all pick up the little sheets on the overview of Tibetan Buddhism? They were out in the foyer—they are out in the foyer. They have a translation from "Flight of the Garuda" on one side and an overview of Tibetan Buddhism on the other.

The teachings we've been receiving are from the school called the Nyingma, the ancient school. And Dzogchen is integral to that lineage. Mahamudra is something of a practice and philosophy equivalent to the Kagyu school. It's slightly different in that I think it has a little more developmental aspect, but in the non-dual understanding, they're very, very close.

Another question: "Where would you put Ajahn Sumedho's sound of silence in this?"

The question is about Ajahn Sumedho's Sound of Silence. He's a Vipassana teacher who uses this sound—you know, the ringing in the ears that's a kind of steady background noise—uses it as a meditation object in doing Vipassana. I personally put that in the field of sound, in the sense base of sound. So I regard it as using one form of sound. Now, through that, he uses it and accesses emptiness. But as a meditation technique, I would put it in the sense door of sound.

"The experience that I'm having is, you know, when these windows are open and you can hear the stream out here? Since he told me about that, I feel like I have been infected with it. I wake up hearing it. I go to sleep hearing it. I hear it all the time. It's like in the background all the time. It's like I can't not notice it. And so I'm trying not to let it drive me crazy. I swear I hear it all the time. I do wake up hearing it and I go to sleep hearing it."

It could be a useful object. When sounds get to have that irritating quality, it's good to kind of surrender for a while and make them a clear object of mindfulness so that we drop the resistance to them.

And then having opened to them enough, maybe we can take our attention somewhere else. Either that or earplugs.

A question about jhana practices: why do jhana practices if they don't lead to liberation? Saying that they don't lead to liberation isn't quite the right way to express it. It's more accurate to say that one does not achieve liberation within the jhanas themselves. Most people would understand it this way, although there are some passages in the Pali texts that suggest the jhanas can be used to develop insight as well.

Generally, the understanding is that the mind is too absorbed for insight to really flower in those states, and I would agree with that perspective. The main reason for developing the jhanas is to deepen our level of samadhi. Samadhi is one of the factors of the Eightfold Path—it has to do with the unification of mind that makes the mind strong and stable. A strong, stable mind is the best platform for insight, and it's the wisdom that comes through insight that truly liberates us. So the jhanas create a stronger platform for insight and wisdom to arise.

I had a discussion with Rinpoche at the start of the retreat about the jhanas, and he asked me the same question: why practice them? When I explained that it was primarily to develop the platform for insight, he said, "Oh, it's just the same in our system. That's why shamatha practices are undertaken in our system as well."

A question about inquiring into emptiness on the conceptual level so that we actually recognize emptiness: I mentioned in a talk the other night that there's value in conceptual investigation into the quality of emptiness. For practical application, especially in daily life, I suggested three avenues. One was the analogy of the mind as being like vast space. You can do a meditation based on that—when you sit in your daily life, simply have the sense of the mind as being like vast space with all objects arising and passing within it. This unfolds in the direction of emptiness.

Emptiness of self is equivalent to the Theravadan concept of anatta, or not-self. This is difficult to really grasp in daily life—to me, that's more of a retreat understanding. But the emptiness of objects is quite accessible in daily life. This might mean reading some books that explore this topic. Nagarjuna is a wonderful way in, and you can start by simply reflecting on the readings.

It's all about deconstructing the solidity of the five senses especially. I mentioned one way to deconstruct the sense of sight in that same talk. Go through each of the five senses and see how they can be deconstructed to reveal their insubstantial nature. This will give you a good sense of the insubstantiality of the physical world. Thoughts and emotions—perhaps that's more of a retreat practice as well—but be aware that the same kind of flimsiness or mere appearance quality can be found in thoughts and emotions too.

This is something you can truly work with in daily life, and it will bear fruit. It's one of those things that you investigate for a while on the conceptual level, and then at some point in meditation the experience comes and you recognize that's what the texts were pointing to.

This is a good place to stop.

CHAPTER 270

Working with Difficult Mind States: The Third Foundation of Mindfulness

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses the inevitable difficulties that arise in meditation practice and life, focusing on the third foundation of mindfulness from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) - cittānupassanā or mindfulness of mind states. Drawing from the Abhidhamma's classification of 52 mental factors, he explores how to work skillfully with five common difficult emotions: desire, aversion, self-judgment, sadness, and fear.
> Armstrong emphasizes that liberation comes not from eliminating these states but from understanding their structure - the mental quality, bodily sensations, and underlying storylines that sustain them. He introduces the RAIN technique (Recognition, Acceptance, Interest, Non-identification) as a practical method for transforming moments of suffering into moments of awakening. Through personal anecdotes and teachings from masters like the Dalai Lama and Pema Chödrön, he demonstrates how investigating our emotional patterns with mindfulness can lead to genuine freedom.
> The talk concludes with Gampopa's Four Blessings, emphasizing how confusion itself can dawn as wisdom when met with proper understanding and acceptance.

We're coming to the close of the third day of the retreat now, and the feeling in the interview groups today was definitely more one of people settling and arriving, starting to find their rhythm with the retreat. But of course things are never totally easy on retreat, nor are they easy in life. One of the main pointings of the Buddha is to that difficulty.

This is an article from a recent New Yorker magazine that confirms some of that: "According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Years of tests, experiments, and complex computer simulations now provide solid statistical evidence in support of old folk sayings that described life as 'a veil of sorrows,' 'a woeful trial,' and 'a kick in the teeth.' Authors of the 1,200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed by positive logic that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that life is actually worse than most living things can stand. Human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be, given everything it must put up with. In a personal note in the afterward, researchers stated that, statistically speaking, life is 'just too much.' And as yet, they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through it at all."

So at least you're getting through it. You can be happy for that. You're probably in the top one percent of people. An experience like this really does bring the difficulties of living to light and may make us reflect on the difficulties in our outer life. But particularly in retreat, for me, it gets really simple. There are basically three things that are difficult: bodily discomfort; all the ways that the mind doesn't do what I want it to do in terms of meditation—doesn't stay with the object, and I get frustrated when it goes away; and third, the ways that we find pain in the mind itself—painful emotions and states of mind.

That's really what I'd like to talk about tonight: how do we work with the difficulties that come into the mind in terms of our emotions and moods, a major source of pain and difficulty on retreat and in daily life.

When I started practice, I was very keen on the idea of enlightenment. I thought that what enlightenment was going to do was get rid of all these ways in which my mind caused me trouble—the loneliness, the insecurity, the fear, the sadness and so on. I thought that some meditation moment would come along and just pluck them all out. And then afterwards it would be really easy.

I have a different view of enlightenment now. I don't think it works quite that way. Now my understanding is that in order to become enlightened, we have to solve the problem of these states of mind before we can become enlightened. So I think of this as working to understand and resolve these troublesome qualities of mind independent of enlightenment. This is actually doable. The enlightenment thing where they all get plucked up and ended—I'm not so sure about the nearness of that, for myself at least. But I do know that it's really possible to work directly in relating to these difficult states of mind and find a great deal of freedom in relation to them.

I think of this as the process of becoming enlightened before enlightenment. Because if we can learn to work with every state of mind that comes into our experience and not feel bound up in suffering in relation to it, then we have essentially solved a great deal of the problem of living. We will have opened up so much space and freedom that life will be completely transformed. And this is possible for each one of us.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing. There's a lot of encouragement to do this and meditation gives us the method."

In the context of retreat, if you carry on long enough, you will experience, as you have in life, a very, very big range of states of mind. I invite you to think about, over your whole adult life, the most sublime moments that you've known. Just cast your mind back and reflect on what some of those have been—in nature or in relationship, in love, through art. And then also, I'd invite you to reflect on the most difficult and painful states of mind that you've known—states of depression or despair, strong fear or rage, loneliness.

Through that reflection we get an idea of the range that is within this human mind, within each human mind. We have the capability to develop in very beautiful and sublime ways. The mind also has the capability of creating for us tremendous suffering and agony. Most of us have known quite a wide range of these experiences in our life.

What we find happens as we get older is that the mind develops a real fear of going into some of those corners. It seems to me that children don't have so much of that fear when they come into the world, that they're born with a curiosity and a basic trust in life, and whatever happens in the emotional realm, they have the ability to go into and feel without holding back. As we get older, we hold back more and more. But it's possible through this exploration to go into, as Pema Chödrön says, every nook and cranny and feel what's there, open ourselves to it again. When we can do that, we gain a lot of confidence.

Because until we have explored the mind in that way, we get afraid of some parts of it and seal ourselves off from a certain range of our experience. In doing that, we constrict the mind and contain it too much. So we gain a lot of confidence when we can open and relate to any experience that comes along on the level of our mind.

As we expand our capabilities, the mind starts to have fewer and fewer edges, less and less boundary. We can move into more and more of those areas without worry, without holding back. And as one of my teachers said, in the mind of the Buddha, there are no more edges. There is nowhere the mind of the Buddha can't go and find a sense of openness and ease.

In Buddhist psychology, the Abhidhamma core text lists fifty-two states of mind that it says are core factors within us that, when combined in different ways, make up the whole range of our human experience. Some of these are very beautiful states—love and compassion, wisdom, generosity, renunciation, peace, equanimity, mindfulness. Some of them are difficult and painful states—anger and hatred, despair, anxiety, grief, confusion, sorrow. Some are neutral qualities, not particularly wholesome or unwholesome.

As we open up to explore these states, our attitude needs to be one not of trying to get rid of them, because that may not happen for a very long time. And I think that it can't happen as long as we are still living in fear of them and want to hold them away. But what we can do is become more and more comfortable with the presence of these qualities.

This is again from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is at times and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run a hundred miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

So tonight, I want to look at some of this range of states of mind to show how we get trapped in suffering and then how we can find freedom in relation to them.

In the classical Buddhist teachings, this is called the third foundation of mindfulness. The range of the third foundation, the area of it, is called citta. This is a Pali word that is sometimes translated as heart, sometimes translated as mind. A good translation for citta is psyche, because it includes both emotional qualities and thought processes, cognitive qualities.

Just a word on the vocabulary that I'll use. I'll often use the words emotions, moods, and states of mind. All of these are included in citta, this area of meditation which Rodney introduced us to this morning in the instructions.

Emotions are things we feel fairly strongly—joy and happiness, fear, anxiety. I use moods to cover more or less the same range as emotions, but sometimes moods are a little more subtle, not as strongly felt, maybe not as evident, maybe a little more pervasive. We might say that I had a mood of nostalgia looking at some old photos, something like that—not quite as punchy, but still present.

And then states of mind includes emotions, includes moods, but it also refers to the refined meditative states that develop as we practice—qualities like mindfulness, peace, concentration, equanimity, mental energy. These are included in the overall category of states of mind as well. We wouldn't really call these qualities emotions, but we can learn to notice when they're present or when they're absent.

Some of these emotions and states of mind are wholesome and positive. Some are negative and difficult and painful. I don't want to talk too much about the positive ones for now—we'll talk more as we go through the retreat. But just to say a couple of things.

One is what I'm sure you know: not to cling to the positive states of mind. They're attractive, they're pleasant. The tendency is to make them want to last, but when we cling to them, we kill them. There's a beautiful poem from William Blake:

"He who binds to himself a joy
Doth the winged life destroy,
But he who kisses the joy as it flies
Lives in eternity's sunrise."

So if we grasp these states, the very grasping kills the joy or the beauty of them.

But the other important thing to say about positive states of mind is that we often tend to take them for granted and not notice them or really appreciate them. I noticed in myself when I was meditating—if a state of contentment or happiness came along in my early years, I'd go, "Ah, that's what it's supposed to be like." And I didn't stop and reflect, "That's a really positive state." I could see that underneath that, there was this expectation: I should be feeling happy, I should be feeling content. Therefore, when that happened, I didn't make anything of it because it matched my expectation. This expectation is the ego's project.

The ego creates this expectation that we should always feel good, that happiness is our natural birthright. But this isn't seeing things as they truly are. Our mindfulness practice invites us to perceive what's actually present—not what we expect to be there, but simply what is.

When we carry expectations, we introduce bias into our awareness. We become partial, wanting experience to unfold in a particular way. But the Buddha's way of seeing is free from such bias. We could say the bias is zero, or emptiness itself.

With this unbiased awareness, when a pleasant state arises, we can recognize it clearly as pleasant. We appreciate it fully, understanding it as wholesome—a fruit of our practice, a result of the virtue and goodness we've cultivated. We take time to feel genuine gratitude for its presence. And when it naturally passes, we can open ourselves completely to whatever arises next.

This practice of noticing and appreciating wholesome states actually becomes part of the conditions for their return. As we acknowledge and value these positive mind states, they tend to arise more frequently and regularly in our experience.

When working with more challenging emotions—those painful states of mind that create difficulty—two elements are essential.

First, we need a fundamental attitude shift. We must move away from resistance, from the belief that difficult emotions shouldn't be happening, from judging them as wrong and trying to push them away. Instead, we cultivate a quality of allowing. As Rodney mentioned in his morning instructions: relax, observe, and allow.

Second, we need deeper understanding. When we begin to see how these mind states are actually constructed—the mechanisms through which they arise and operate—we're no longer so easily overwhelmed by them. What we truly understand, we can allow without being so deeply troubled. Through careful observation of how emotions are manufactured, sustained, and eventually released, we begin to comprehend the workings of our own minds. And to the degree we understand this process, we're no longer enslaved by it.

The first step in learning from these potentially liberating states of mind is knowing what's present when it's present. We must recognize what emotions are arising as they arise. This isn't always straightforward. As someone asked this morning, it's not always easy to identify what we're feeling with certainty.

Sometimes thoughts provide clues, sometimes bodily sensations point the way. You might find yourself wondering tentatively, "Sadness?" with a question mark, allowing your identification to remain provisional. This uncertainty is perfectly acceptable. This entire exploration will gradually teach you to recognize your emotions as they occur, leading to increasingly clear perception through sustained practice.

This reminds me of an experience from my own retreat here. I was participating in a three-month course, about two weeks in, feeling fairly settled and mindful. When the bell rang ending a sitting period, I rose to begin walking meditation. For those two weeks, I had been walking in the same location every period—down by the parking lot on that grassy area below. I had actually begun wearing a path in the grass from my consistent practice there.

I stepped out the back door, maintaining careful awareness of lifting, moving, and placing with each step. I felt completely present, thoroughly mindful. But when I looked down at my familiar walking path, I discovered someone else occupying it.

I continued lifting, moving, placing, but thoughts began arising: "What are they doing there? Don't they realize that's my walking path?" Lifting, moving, placing. "I've been walking here every hour for two weeks. They must know it's mine." Lifting, moving, placing. "Did I cut in front of them at breakfast this morning? Are they playing mind games with me?" Lifting, moving, placing. "They're not very developed. If they were more aware, they would have noticed this was my walking space." Lifting, moving, placing.

I walked down near that person, maintaining my mindful steps, and found another spot on the grass that proved equally suitable for walking meditation. The rest of the period proceeded without difficulty.

About thirty minutes into the walking period, a thought suddenly arose: "Oh, I'm angry." I had been continuing the blaming story all along, and it took me half an hour of being completely immersed in it to recognize what was actually happening. I had been so identified with the anger while thinking I was being mindful that I couldn't see the main thing that was occurring.

This is how some of these hindering forces work. They sneak up on us like low-flying aircraft, zooming in below our radar. They take root because we get caught in the story. As long as I was telling myself I was right and this person was wrong, and believing it completely, I couldn't really relate to or even see the mental state itself.

This brings to mind Rodney's statement: "Do I want to be righteous or do I want to be free?" Well, at that point, I wanted to be righteous. But as soon as I could name it as anger, I could start to relate to it. I brought it into the field of mindfulness.

This is a crucial step in working with difficult emotions. These emotions try to turn our attention elsewhere—in this case, onto the object of my upset, the person I was angry with. As long as I follow that pointer, I'm lost. But if I can turn the pointer back around to myself and ask, "What am I feeling?" and look directly at the anger, then it becomes workable.

The first step in working with these hindering forces in the mind is to know them for what they are. This means, if you can, naming them. When we don't name them, we're in their grip, and they become a filter through which we look at the whole world. Everything takes on that color.

Once we've named the emotion, the next step is to feel it directly. Our understanding comes into play when we let our awareness connect directly with the experience of that emotion—feeling it in the mind, feeling it in the body.

Tonight I want to talk particularly about five states of mind that I see arising again and again in my life and in the lives of meditators, both in retreat and out of retreat: desire, aversion or anger, self-judgment, sadness, and fear. These are very common states in our lives and retreats. They're oppressive when we don't know how to work with them. They're burdensome and the source of much human suffering.

With each of these states, I want to suggest that there are three areas we need to examine to get a complete view of these emotions.

The first is what I would call the mind factor or the mood—the mental state itself. Each emotion has a particular coloring in the mind, a basic flavor that distinguishes it. Fear feels different from happiness; sadness feels different from compassion. There's a mental tone, a color, a mood in the mind that is the primary characteristic of its existence.

The second aspect is the bodily experience. Whenever one of these emotions is strong, it will also be felt in the body. Look and see where in the body it's expressing itself. If it's fear, there might be a strong contraction in the abdomen. If it's happiness, there might be a light, bubbly energy in the chest rising up.

The third element is the thought or thoughts that accompany the emotion. All difficult mind states will have some kind of thought going along with them. Sometimes the thought triggers the mind state, but then the mind state will also trigger more thoughts. With difficult mind states, there will be some underlying belief—what I would call a storyline. It's usually an unconscious assumption that sustains the emotion. If you take away the storyline, the emotion collapses.

Once you examine the mental quality or color in the mind, the experience in the body, and the thought—especially the storyline—then you have the whole package of that emotion. When we start to understand how these influence each other, how the thoughts support the emotion, we start not to be so deceived by them. We begin to understand their impact on us, and it's really the understanding that frees us. We simply need to observe them and learn from them, and that understanding is transformative. They don't have to be gotten rid of.

As a brief side note, I don't believe that wholesome states of mind need a storyline for their existence. Metta, compassion, joy, love, equanimity can be spontaneous. I don't think they need the influence of thought. By contrast, the negative states, I believe, do.

Let's examine some of these in more detail. Desire is the first I mentioned—a really common experience in life and in retreat. It's reaching out for some pleasant experience in the future, this wanting something pleasant to happen.

On retreat, we often feel desire as a longing for people we're missing, places we'd like to be, certain foods or drinks or activities that aren't available to us here. As you begin to observe how it feels when desire arises, you'll notice it has a distinctly bittersweet quality. On one hand, the mind conjures images of something pleasant—we think about a friend or partner or a place we've enjoyed being, and this has a positive, uplifting tone to it. It's pleasurable.

But simultaneously, there's a frustrating quality, a gap, because we don't have it now. The desire force essentially says, "I want that now." And there's always a gap because what we desire is precisely what's not here. Notice this: we never want what we already have. Have you ever wanted a hand at the end of your arm? Not unless it gets injured. So desire always carries this bittersweet lack of fulfillment.

You may notice that when there's a little boredom or physical discomfort in meditation, the mind often turns to a pleasant fantasy to try to fill that space, as though we want to suck on something pleasurable in that moment. But that pleasurableness is never truly satisfying because of the gap of not having it.

Carol and I were teaching a retreat in Italy a few years ago, which was a wonderful experience. The Italians seemed to be very much as we imagine them—warm, talkative. Silence wasn't held in quite the same way it is here. We had to modify certain aspects of the culture for our retreat. It was held at a Catholic convent that was simply rented for the retreat. We had to put in a special request to the kitchen not to place carafes of wine on the lunch tables, because that's what they would normally have done. Right outside the dining room, there was a Nespresso machine, and after meals people were feeding it coins.

I found the Italian yogis to be very forthcoming about their emotions—quite in touch with how they felt and not shy about sharing this with us. A couple of days into the retreat, I had an interview with a young man, a very nice fellow who was having trouble settling into the retreat. When I asked what was happening, he explained that this was August, their holiday month. A group of his friends were going to the Caribbean and had invited him to join them on vacation. So he'd had a choice: he could go to the Caribbean on vacation with warm waters and golden sandy beaches, or he could come to the meditation retreat.

When I asked why he came here, he said, "Because all the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out."

I could immediately see what was happening. The storyline here was that if he'd been in the Caribbean, he would be happy. If he had what he wanted, he would be happy. But because he didn't have it, he couldn't be.

This is generally how the storyline with desire works: there's an unconscious belief that "if I had that, I would be happy now." Examine whether this is true in your experience. There's this belief that the thing we want will make us happy in this moment, and not having it, we lack that happiness.

The very force of desire brings with it a sense of frustration. It blinds us to looking at the present moment, which is usually fine in and of itself. So I asked him, "What if you looked at the present moment without comparing it to Caribbean beaches? Maybe it would be okay."

He went off to meditate, and when he returned a couple of days later, he'd gotten right into the retreat. When we can let go of the wanting and see the present moment for what it is, often it's not problematic. But the very force of desire makes it seem unfulfilling or troublesome.

As we begin to settle into the retreat, the desire force often shifts into the area of the retreat itself. You may find yourself no longer thinking so much of home, but thinking about your last retreat or a pleasant sitting from earlier in this retreat. The force of desire then becomes "I want to feel that pleasant sitting again, that pleasant state of mind, that stillness, that concentration."

This can be just as much a barrier as desire for something pleasurable in the senses, because it can block our openness to this moment.

As I began to pay closer attention, I noticed something curious happening in my body. When desire was present, there was a distinct quality of leaning forward—a subtle but persistent tension that indicated I was trying to manufacture a particular meditation experience. I was attempting to make stillness happen, to force concentration, to conjure mindfulness through sheer effort.

I started tuning into this slight forward-leaning tension as a reliable indicator that desire was present, even when I couldn't immediately identify what I was wanting. This physical signature became a valuable teacher. If you notice this quality of leaning forward in your own practice, it might be worth investigating. Check whether you're trying to recreate some particular experience from an earlier sit or previous retreat.

The release from this pattern lies in the willingness to settle back into what's actually here. Just this moment, exactly as it is.

A friend of mine belongs to what Buddhist psychology calls the "greed type"—a personality configuration characterized by frequent mind moments of wanting and desire. He's developed a simple but powerful inquiry for working with these states. When desires arise, he asks himself: "Is there anything truly lacking in the present moment?"

Often, when we honestly investigate, we discover there isn't. It's simply the force of desire itself that creates the sense of insufficiency.

On the other side of this spectrum lies aversion—the force of not liking or pushing away our experience. This is our general term for negativity, but it manifests in countless forms: ill will, anger, hatred, impatience, frustration, irritation, fear, sadness, grief, depression, despair, resistance, blame, resentment, and many others. Sound familiar? In retreat, most people encounter quite a range of these mind states.

When aversion occupies the mind, notice how it feels. There's a distinct resistive quality, and the body often contracts strongly. This physical tightening is the signature of resistance—not wanting what's happening, so we armor ourselves against it. The storyline of aversion is fundamentally: "I can't be happy because this is happening." Some particular unpleasant experience is present, therefore happiness is impossible. As this narrative takes hold and we believe it, a negative tone pervades the mind, coloring our entire experience.

The Buddha once walked through a forest with some monks until they came to a clearing. As they stood there, a jackal ran into the open space, paused briefly, then darted into the hollow of a fallen tree trunk where it lay down. Moments later, it emerged and rested in the shade, only to jump up again and disappear back into the forest.

"Monks," the Buddha said, "did you see that jackal? Standing in the clearing, it wasn't content. Lying in the tree hollow, it wasn't content. Resting in the shade, it wasn't content. It blamed its suffering on standing, on lying, on walking. It blamed its suffering on the clearing, on the tree hollow, on the underbrush. But the problem wasn't with any of these places or postures. That jackal had mange."

This illustrates the nature of aversion perfectly. It takes over the mind, making everything unsatisfactory. Nothing is quite good enough. The inquiry that serves aversive types well is: "Is there anything truly wrong with the present moment?"

One of aversion's primary manifestations is anger, as I discovered during my walking meditation. Anger's characteristic storyline runs: "You're wrong and I'm right." This sense of righteousness is integral to anger's structure. Each time we replay those blaming thoughts, the anger intensifies—we're adding fuel to the fire. The physical sensation of anger is typically contracted and burning. When you're truly enraged, you understand why red symbolizes anger; the body literally feels ablaze.

Now, it's possible that our angry thoughts about wrongdoing contain some validity. Perhaps someone did act unskillfully or unethically. But to understand anger completely, we must examine the suffering we carry when we harbor it.

The Dalai Lama tells a story about receiving a visit from a monk he had known in Tibet before fleeing the Chinese occupation in 1959.

This monk had stayed behind and had been imprisoned for a number of years and had finally gotten out of prison and escaped to India. The Dalai Lama received him and asked about his time there. The monk said, "Well, I felt that I had been in danger very often."

The Dalai Lama said, "Well, I can understand that. Do you mean you were in danger of being tortured?"

The monk said, "Oh, well, yes, I was tortured. But what I really mean is I was in danger of becoming angry. That would have been far more serious."

I find the Tibetan monks and nuns incredibly inspiring in their ability to maintain that balance of mind in the midst of really painful situations. The Dalai Lama said afterwards that before, when he lived in Tibet, he had thought this monk was rather ordinary. But now he had to reevaluate his opinion of him because he saw he was quite an advanced practitioner.

As we get angry, the important place to tune in again is what does it feel like in our mind and body, and to feel that quality of suffering that's in anger. I found that I was really only able to let go of anger by tuning into the suffering that it was bringing me. That's what encouraged me to let go of it again and again, and I've gotten better at it as I've practiced more with it.

It's said in the tradition that becoming angry is like drinking poison and expecting the other person to get sick. It doesn't happen. It's also compared to picking up a hot coal to throw at somebody, but we get burned first.

When anger gets directed toward ourselves, it turns into self-judgment. This often comes up on retreat as we start with comparing mind to compare ourselves to others who are here. If you ever open your eyes in the middle of a meditation period, it looks like everybody else is a Buddha. The hall looks so still, and you just think, "Wow, they're having such good meditations. I wish my meditation was like that. I must be the only one here whose mind is all over the place." And of course, it's not true. If somebody looked at you, they'd probably think you were a Buddha. But we often tend to bring up these comparing thoughts when we're in the middle of retreat.

Then the comparing thoughts get a little off-center, a little irrational. I was talking with a student who is a therapist. She was talking about this comparing mind. One of her clients had left her and decided to terminate the therapy sessions. Her first thought was, "I understand that I wasn't the right fit for that person." That was a rational thought and completely acceptable for her. But then the next thought was, "I don't have enough compassion for him." Actually, "I'm not a very warm person," is what it turned into. And then it turned into, "I've actually never loved anyone and no one's ever loved me." By that time, the thought was this huge burden.

Start to notice when these judging or comparing thoughts come that there may be a grain of rational truth in them, but then we tend to blow them up in a way that they're not true anymore. It's the falsehood and the slight belief in the falsehood that really weighs on us.

When we're judging ourselves, the storyline in that is something like, "I'm not good enough" or "I'm not lovable. I'm not good enough to be loved or to deserve to be loved." It's some underlying fear like that. When we believe in that, we kind of crumple in on ourselves. We don't feel we can really come out because we feel what's inside is not very worthy.

This feeling of worthlessness seems to be really widespread in our culture. It seems like an epidemic in the West these days. The Dalai Lama was meeting with a group of Western Buddhist teachers a few years ago in Dharamsala. There were about twenty teachers meeting with His Holiness over a few days. They were asking for his advice on how to work with this problem, and he said, "I don't understand what you mean." The translator went back and forth a number of times and the Dalai Lama couldn't get what this problem was even about, because he said, in Tibet, they don't have this problem.

Finally he went around to each of those twenty Buddhist teachers and he said, "Have you felt this? Do you understand this? Have you felt this?" Every one of them said yes, they had. And yet, from his knowledge, it was not there in Tibetan culture at all. So this is something as Westerners we often have to work with, and it can become stronger.

It can become self-hatred or self-loathing.

Shortly after I ordained in Thailand, many years ago now, I was traveling to practice at a forest center in the countryside near Chiang Mai in northern Thailand. My preceptor, the elder monk who had ordained me, asked me to stop at one of his branch monasteries in the town of Chiang Mai. "It'll be interesting for you to stay there," he said. "It'll break your journey, and you can get to know this other Western monk who's there."

So I stopped there for a few nights and spent time with this Western monk who'd been in robes for about twelve or thirteen years at that point. I came to like him tremendously. He was a big fellow with a big laugh and what I thought was a very big heart—extraordinarily warm-hearted.

The first day I was there, we went out on alms round together, as monks do each morning. He had the biggest begging bowl I've ever seen, with a stomach girth to match it. His bowl was literally probably bigger than this bell. He walked ahead because he was senior, I walked behind him, and then two novice monks followed us. I wondered why the novice monks were coming, since they don't usually participate in alms round, but I kept quiet and followed along.

We walked down the street into a neighborhood where he was very well known. He was beloved in the community because he was such a warm person who received many visitors, counseling people on their practice, their lives, their children. People genuinely loved him in the community.

Lay people lined up on the street as we approached to offer him food. Because I was there, I received food as well. We filled up his bowl fairly quickly, filled up mine, and I thought we'd simply walk back to the monastery. But he slipped down an alley, and the two novice monks came forward, opening their robes to reveal large plastic bags hanging from their shoulders. We took the little plastic bags of food—which is how people offer it—out of our bowls and filled up the novices' plastic bags. They folded up their robes, our bowls were empty, and we hit the streets again.

We filled up again, then filled up the novices again, collected more, and finally took everything back to the monastery. We fed ourselves, we fed other monks, we fed numerous novices and nuns, and finally we fed the temple dogs—all basically from the love and appreciation those people had for this Western monk. He was so well-liked in the community.

I thought to myself, "Wow, he must have had a very fortunate upbringing and pleasant experiences. He's such a warm person."

As we were spending time together and talking, he said to me, "You know, I had to work a lot with this problem of self-hatred. It took me the first nine years in robes to work through my self-hatred."

I was amazed because he radiated so much metta, so much loving-kindness and warmth. But it hadn't been easy for him.

Another difficult state to work with is sadness. I often encounter this in the silence and solitude of retreats. Sometimes we hold back from opening to that sadness or touching it. There's often an underlying fear: "If I open to it, it will take me over and never go away. I could drown in that sadness and never surface again."

The storyline or unconscious belief with sadness is something like: "I can't be happy because I've lost something—a relationship, a part of my life, a way I used to feel, some situation. I can't be happy because of that loss." So we hold back from being able to feel it.

But as long as we keep the sadness at a distance, it's perpetuated. The way that any of these states can be released as chronic states of mind is for us to open to them, so they can pass through.

The reason it's safe to open to all of these states is that they are impermanent, like every other conditioned phenomenon. Everything that arises is also of the nature to pass away—one of the central teachings of the Buddha. Emotions are also impermanent; they're just waiting to manifest.

Much of what it feels like to me is that these feelings we've held back and haven't opened to—all they want to do is come onto center stage, tell their story or sing their song or dance their dance, have us really hear them, and then they'll exit stage left. But as long as we can't give them that space and truly listen to their story, they keep expressing their frustration. It's like a child who has a story to tell, and we won't give them the space to be heard. Then they won't stop talking.

The last of the mind states I wanted to touch on is fear. This can be a powerful one and was for me the strongest hindrance I had to work with in the early years of my meditation practice. But it was therefore also one of the greatest sources of learning for me.

It was just part of my conditioning when I came to practice. There was a certain layer of fear in my mind that I had to work through, so sometimes it would arise quite strongly during retreat. This isn't the experience for everyone—I simply had a particular conditioning toward fear that not everyone shares.

At times, I would be completely gripped by this fear for extended periods. Though I understood the instructions to go into it and feel it fully, and I would follow this guidance again and again, the transformation came slowly. Over years of touching into it, the fear gradually began to diminish, becoming smaller and smaller.

One of the particular difficulties with fear is that when it arises, we're usually more afraid of the fear itself. We feel afraid when it comes, and then the very presence of that fear frightens us even more, creating an escalating cycle. What we need to cultivate is the willingness to simply open and feel it as it is.

For me, the way in was through bodily sensations. When fear arose, I would feel the contraction in my stomach, the fluttery sensations in my chest, perhaps some perspiration under my arms. I would ask myself: Are these sensations bearable? Can I stand this aspect of fear's manifestation? The answer was always that they were indeed bearable—I could tolerate these physical expressions.

Then I would examine the mental quality of fear itself—that particular tone of wanting to move away from experience. Is this bearable too? And I would find that yes, I could bear that as well.

The storyline that accompanies fear is quite simple: this moment is bearable, but the next moment won't be. It's a projection into the future that tends to capture us. Again, when we return to the present moment, we can undercut that narrative completely.

After making this effort to open to fear repeatedly—many, many times over an extended period—it eventually became much easier for me to work with. At a certain point in my practice, I reached such a level of equanimity with fear that I honestly didn't care whether it arose or not. If fear came, that was fine. If it remained, that was also fine. If it departed, that too was perfectly acceptable.

When I reached that level of equanimity with fear, I felt I had solved its fundamental challenge. This doesn't mean fear hasn't arisen again since then or that it doesn't make me uncomfortable when it does. But I now know absolutely how to work with it, how to open to it—at least within the range of experiences I've encountered so far. There could certainly be something even more intense that might test my equanimity, but I feel confident I understand the way to work.

The real key in understanding how to approach all these different states is to trust that they are workable. We have within us the capacity to understand them and to accept them exactly as they are. It's this trust, combined with the willingness to touch into them directly, that transforms our experience and truly gives us freedom from their grip.

Originally, I thought the way to transform these states would be to eliminate them entirely and replace them with awakened states. I believed that's what had to happen. But what I discovered is that I could wake up in the middle of those very states. Right in the midst of desire, sadness, or fear, I could bring forth an awakened quality of mind. I could bring mindfulness, interest, curiosity, and intimate awareness to whatever was arising. That's what began to transform the entire experience.

I'd like to offer you a simple acronym for approaching these difficult mind states in an awakened way. It was developed by a colleague of ours, and the acronym is RAIN—R-A-I-N—representing four essential steps.

The R stands for Recognition. The first step in relating skillfully with any of these states is to recognize what we're actually feeling. This is crucial because accurate perception of the emotion creates space around it in some important way. When we can clearly identify—oh, this is anger, or this is fear, or this is unhappiness—it unsticks the experience and creates some breathing room.

If you're uncertain about what you're experiencing, name it with a question mark. Make your best approximation. Over time, this recognition will become increasingly clear and effortless.

The A stands for acceptance. Some people prefer the word allowing. It essentially means not that you have to actively do something, but that you stop resisting. We drop our tendency to push the experience away and simply allow it to be as it is.

This is profoundly challenging. With states that are difficult to bear, this acceptance won't come the first time, or perhaps even the second or third. But if you move in that direction again and again, that acceptance will gradually emerge.

There's a way to discern whether you've truly accepted a state: ask yourself, "Would it be okay with me if this state lasted the rest of my life?" If the answer is no, then deeper acceptance is possible. With my fear, I eventually reached that place where I could genuinely answer yes to that question. That's when I felt my equanimity with the fear was adequately developed. Acceptance is truly a key turning point.

The I stands for interest or investigation. When we can become genuinely interested in a difficult experience, it completely shifts our relationship to it. Interest energizes us, gives us confidence, and expresses our willingness to learn. This curiosity opens our mind.

We begin to explore: When anger is present, where do I feel it in my body? What's that sensation like? Is it burning? Is it contraction? How far does it extend through my body? What kinds of thoughts arise when I'm angry? Do I feel blaming? If I'm blaming someone else for being wrong, how does that make me feel? This investigation opens the wisdom, the learning, the understanding of how these states actually function.

The final letter, N, stands for non-identification. This means removing the "I" or "my"—taking out the sense of self or ownership of the emotion. When we notice anger, we might typically say, "That's my anger," or "I'm really angry." Instead, we can simply observe: "Anger is present." Just note "anger." The "I" and "my" are extra additions that aren't needed and generally add layers of confusion and burden. Try experiencing these states without claiming them as "I" or "mine."

Carol has mentioned a beautiful phrase from Ajahn Sumedho: "Wanting is like this," or "Anger is like this." This simple phrase actually encapsulates all four points of the RAIN practice.

Consider the phrase "Anger is like this." The word "anger" represents recognition—naming the experience for what it is. The word "is" expresses allowing—this is what's true in this moment, what we need to open to and accept. "Like this" invites investigation: What is anger actually like? Let me feel it, see it, observe it. Notice that in this phrase—"Anger is like this"—there's no "I" or "my," so we also have non-identification.

Either approach can cultivate this awakened relationship to difficult states. This awakening begins to release and transform their hold on us. When we see these experiences in this way, we discover that we're transforming moments of suffering into moments of awakening. We bring forth the awakened qualities of mindfulness, energy, investigation, confidence, friendliness, allowing, acceptance.

Moment after moment, we learn to transform our suffering into awakening. In that transformation, we discover freedom. We find this freedom not by trying to eliminate these states—which frankly doesn't work ninety-eight percent of the time—but by coming into full awareness right in the midst of these difficulties.

So I want to close with a quotation from the Tibetan tradition—The Four Blessings of Gampopa. Gampopa was a disciple of Milarepa, a great yogi in Tibet. These are expressed as a supplication or a prayer. You can think of this prayer as being offered to the universe, to the Dharma, to the teacher, to the Buddha, to whoever you would like.

These are the four prayers or blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's just sit for a moment together, please.

Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma, so that my practice becomes the path, so that the path clarifies confusion, so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 271

The Practice of Joy and Gratitude

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive teaching on mudita, the third of the four brahmavihāras (divine abodes), exploring how appreciative joy and gratitude form essential elements of Buddhist practice. Drawing from his own retreat experiences in Burma and Thailand, Armstrong demonstrates how joy serves not merely as a pleasant state but as a crucial factor supporting concentration and liberating insight.
>
> The talk examines multiple levels of happiness available to practitioners: the happiness of sense pleasures, the bliss of blamelessness through ethical conduct (sīla), the peace found in concentration, and the joy discovered through appreciating beauty in nature and relationships. Armstrong references the Upanisa Sutta's teaching on transcendent dependent origination, showing how gladness (pāmojja) leads to rapture (pīti), then tranquility, happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi), and finally liberating wisdom.
>
> Through personal anecdotes and teachings from the Dalai Lama, Armstrong illustrates how mudita practice involves both celebrating others' happiness and cultivating gratitude for our own blessings. He emphasizes how this practice counters the mind's tendency toward negativity, offering the practical instruction "may your happiness and good fortune continue" as a way to develop sympathetic joy. The teaching concludes by positioning joy as an accelerating factor toward the Buddha's ultimate goal: "the unshakable deliverance of mind."

The talk tonight is on practicing joy and gratitude.

Someone once asked a Zen master, "What's the purpose of a lifetime of practice?" And the Zen master answered, "An appropriate response."

When I first heard that quotation, I was very disappointed, because I thought Zen masters were supposed to be a lot more dramatic than that. This seemed to me kind of a wimpy response. I thought the purpose of a lifetime of Zen practice was so that when you were close to dying, you could sit in the full lotus, spontaneously compose a beautiful haiku, and then pass out. And that would be the measure of a real Zen master. So this "appropriate response"—I thought that's a little weak.

But the more I thought about it, the more I thought that is a great answer. Because what it means is that moment after moment, when we meet the changing conditions of life, the right thing comes out of our hearts and minds and actions. And it takes a lifetime of practice in order to be able to make that possible. So I thought this was really a pretty wise and practical answer for us to think about.

In our tradition, there's a roadmap that shows the appropriate response for us to the changing conditions of life. This roadmap is called the Brahmaviharas—the divine abidings, which include metta, which we've been practicing, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity as the other three.

So I want to explain a little about how that roadmap works. We've been practicing metta, which cultivates this quality of openheartedness and caring. We practice it with ourselves, we practice it with others, so that eventually when we encounter someone, we can tune into how is life for you. I hope things are well for you. I hope your body is well. I hope your heart is well. I hope there's happiness in your life. We can develop this as a habit so that our heart approaches new people with this friendly wish, the wish for their welfare.

Then when that open heart, which is connected to people's well-being, meets someone who's suffering, the natural response that comes out of it is compassion. Compassion can be defined as the trembling of the open heart in response to suffering.

When that open heart meets someone who is having a lot of happiness in their life, then the natural response to that is called appreciative joy, the third of the Brahmaviharas. So their happiness becomes contagious when our heart is open and their happiness picks us up. This is the quality that I want to talk about primarily tonight, this quality of appreciative joy which is known in Pali as mudita.

The fourth of the Brahmaviharas is equanimity and its function is to support the other three so that the mind can stay in balance as it encounters the whole range of joys and sorrows in our life and in the lives of everyone we meet and as we hear about the events of the world. Without equanimity, our mind can collapse with the grief of the world, or it can get too exuberant, can get overexcited with transitory happiness. So equanimity keeps our mind steady as we see all the variations of joy and sorrow that can come.

Together, these show us a way that the awakened heart can relate to the world and give us a roadmap of a clear mind and clear heart's way of responding to the changes in life.

I want to focus particularly on this third quality of appreciative joy or mudita. I won't talk a lot about the practice tonight. I want to focus on the spirit of this quality. Of all the Brahmaviharas, this has the potential for being the happiest. It can become a very upbeat practice because it focuses on happiness. It arises due to happiness. And in cultivating it, we tune the mind into happiness, the happiness that already exists. It can be in our life. It can be in someone else's life.

I was calling a friend whom I hadn't talked to for a while on the phone, somebody who lives on the other side of the country. And she answered the phone and I said, "How are you?" And without a moment's hesitation, she said, "I'm wonderful." And hearing the happiness in her voice, without a moment's thought, I said back, "I'm wonderful too." And that's kind of the flavor of this appreciative joy. Her happiness triggered my happiness.

So with the practice of this appreciative joy, you have a double hit of happiness. The other person's happiness can ignite your happiness. And then they combine.

Sometimes it's called sympathetic joy because we resonate in sympathy with someone. I like this term. It reminds me of the sitar, the Indian musical instrument. If you've ever seen a sitar up close, it's got—the model I had, had seven main strings which are running across large frets down the neck. And then underneath that there are twelve what are called sympathetic strings. They're smaller. These sympathetic strings resonate when a frequency of one of the plucked strings, the top strings, is close to it.

Then it harmonizes with it. It's triggered by it. And it's these sympathetic strings that give all those rich, singing, metallic overtones to the sound of the sitar. These are called sympathetic strings because they resonate in sympathy with the main strings. And that's what this experience of appreciative joy or sympathetic joy is like. When we feel the resonance of happiness and our heart is open, we can resonate with it. And it strikes that happiness in us.

The Dalai Lama said this is a really good practice to become familiar with, because if you can be happy with somebody else's happiness, your chances of happiness go up by six billion to one. Those are good odds.

This is from Shantideva, who was a teacher and writer in India about the 8th century A.D.: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

So there is a long tradition of this kind of practice and this approach as a way to our own happiness. It's a very helpful thing to develop as part of your overall meditation practice, just as the loving-kindness practice is that we've been doing. You discover that joy is actually an integral part of the Buddhist path, an essential part. I'll talk more later in this talk about exactly how that works.

But sometimes Buddhism is portrayed as focusing so much on suffering that you think the Buddha has forgotten about joy. In fact, that's just not true. There are many words in the Buddha's language that point to this factor and the role that it plays in the overall path.

This practice of turning the mind to joy can be very helpful. It comes under what the Buddha talked about as the four right efforts. One of the right efforts that he pointed to was keeping the mind in a positive or wholesome state of being. The development of joy is one of the ways to carry out that right effort.

I think there's also a real thirst in our culture today, maybe in our whole world today, for the presence of this quality in our lives. It seems to be something that's lacking in the modern world, something that we long for and that the world itself really needs. It needs this quality of joy for us to feel good about the work that we're doing, the family that we're in, the way we're living. It changes everything.

A friend of ours has been offering classes in the Bay Area on developing this factor of joy. I think he's in about his third or fourth class series now. Each one of them has lasted about six months. The last time he offered the series in the fall, he had some people present teaching the classes in Berkeley. He had some people sign up by email. In all, he had 450 people signed up for the course. This time around, he has 685. And the people who are doing it say that they really love it, that it is making a real difference in their life.

The most important element in this practice is to notice the qualities of contentment and joy and happiness when they arise. As we get familiar with them, then the mind knows them better and knows how to go there and knows how to access them more and more easily. So the first instruction is really just to notice joy when it comes.

And then if you are interested in carrying on the practice of mudita, which is another practice just like metta, you can develop it as a way of bringing that noticing in more and more regularly. And this is a very helpful thing to do too, because in a way, this paying particular attention to the appearance of happiness is a way just to offset the mind's normal inclination, which is to dwell on the negative.

So often, if you look at the content of your thoughts as you're sitting in meditation, they will focus on what's difficult in life: regret or resentment about the past, hope and fear about the future. So often our thoughts go between those areas, and those have the tendency to make us feel burdened and weighted and foster the perception of difficulty and pain in our life. So this deliberate noticing of happiness is a way to correct that balance.

As I said in my first talk, in the mind of the Buddha, there is no bias toward the negative. The mind of the Buddha is as interested and as open to what's beautiful and positive as it is to what's difficult. So we want to find that balance in our own minds also. And the practice of joy can be a very good way to do that.

This is a quotation from the Buddha: "What one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind." So we develop our own habits of mind. We wear grooves in our mind based upon our habitual thought patterns. If they habitually run to the negative, then what naturally comes up is the negative. If they run to the positive, then what comes up is the positive.

The effect of the practice of turning the mind to happiness can be quite striking. Toward the end of the fall last year, Carol and I taught a weekend here on the practice of mudita, appreciative joy. Part of the reason I wanted to do it was that I hadn't taught it before as a whole retreat, and I thought it'd be interesting to see what happened.

Now, a two-day retreat—if you think back to the first two days you were here—I sort of think of as just time enough to get through a little bit of sleepiness. But people came just for those two days. Because their time was short, I think they really dove in.

At the end of that weekend, we asked the group: What was your experience like? How was it practicing this way for two days? I remember one woman said to the group that after these two days of practice, she felt happier than she had felt in years—just after two days of reminding ourselves of happiness. I was quite taken by the effects of that weekend on the people who were practicing.

Since that time, I've been doing quite a lot of this practice in my own meditation, and I've noticed that my mind just naturally now turns more and more to what is positive, to what is happy in my experience and in others' experience.

If you're interested in playing with this practice a little bit, there's a phrase for mudita just the way there is for metta. The phrase we often recommend is simply: "May your happiness and good fortune continue." As you connect with a friend or a benefactor, you just bring to mind the things that are going well in their life, and the phrase you send them is: "May your happiness and good fortune continue." This keeps the mind turning back to these positive things in their life or in your life.

This quality of mudita—joy or happiness—can be a great ally when things get difficult. A couple of years ago, I went to Burma to practice with a meditation master there whom I'd heard of and was very interested in his technique. He's a concentration master and a vipassana master. I spent six weeks at his monastery. His name is Pauk Sayadaw, and he's in the southeast of Burma.

While I was there, it was the start of the annual rains retreat when many Burmese people take robes and enter into a three-month practice period. I asked him if I could perhaps take robes also, and he allowed me to do that. So I ordained for the second time as a monk at the beginning of that six-week practice period, and I approached it with tremendous enthusiasm and eagerness. Ever since I had been a monk twenty-some years ago in Thailand, I'd had a wish to take robes again. I had the opportunity and did so. I was very happy to be ordained and to start practicing.

Then very soon in my time there, I encountered a lot of difficulties, particularly with the external situation. The day I started was basically the start of the monsoon season in that part of Burma. Here I was wearing the robes again for the first time in twenty-some years, and I'd sort of forgotten how to tie them. If you don't know how to tie your robes, they fall off one shoulder or the other. I'd be going down to the food-serving hall, holding my umbrella in one hand and my bowl in the other. I'd fill my bowl and then walk back to my hut—my kuti—with the umbrella in one hand and the full bowl in the other, the robe sliding off my shoulder, mud spattering around my feet, and the Burmese laypeople standing by, watching how this new Western monk was going to cope with their culture and the customs of being ordained there. That was one of my challenges.

Another challenge was that the schedule was more demanding than I was used to. The shortest sitting was an hour and a half; the longest sitting was two hours. That was a stretch for me. I was used to hour-long sittings the way we do here, so being told to sit for an hour and a half was not easy. There was a fair amount of body pain that I was experiencing.

I had interviews with the teacher every day in which I had to report how long I was able to stay with the breath continuously, so I was being checked in a very precise and quantitative way. To reach the teacher's cottage, I had to go out again with my umbrella, through the rain, and walk up a very big hill to his cottage. All of these things were starting to weigh on me.

Then there was the food. In the monastery, for me it was one meal a day—all vegetarian, which I really appreciated because I'd been a vegetarian for many years and was grateful to find a monastery with vegetarian food. But it was quite simple: basically white rice and stir-fried vegetables for one meal a day. There's only so much white rice and stir-fried vegetables I could eat at my one meal. Although I enjoyed the taste of the food, I found myself gradually getting thinner and thinner. In the course of six weeks, I ended up losing about half a pound a day while I was there.

All this was going on, and the rain just kept coming down, bucketing down, because the monsoon winds were blowing off the Indian Ocean and slamming into the southeast coast of Burma. We were getting about three inches of rain a day, and it continued for about two weeks without any letup.

I was starting to wonder why I had gone there. I imagine you can relate to that feeling and question.

One day I was feeling particularly discouraged. I'd carried with me, for inspiration—because I love him—a photograph of the Dalai Lama, and it was sitting on my little altar in my cottage. I turned to this picture of His Holiness and said, "Your Holiness, I'm in a hard place right now. Do you have any advice for me?"

And quite amazingly, immediately, his voice came into my head with his lovely Indian-accented English. And he said, "Remain cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support."

That was all he said. So I had to take that as my meditation instruction: remain optimistic, cheerful, and confident. But how to do that? I found that if I could remember what being cheerful felt like, I could sometimes put myself into that frame of mind. And when I did, it brightened things up tremendously. Sometimes I couldn't access that feeling, and then I would just work with the breath. But when I could find that place in me that knows the quality of cheerfulness and confidence, it was tremendously helpful.

Looking at the Dalai Lama, you see an incredibly happy person. He's someone I often reflect upon when I want to be reminded of what that quality is. He's been meeting over the last ten years with groups of scientists through the Mind and Life Institute, bringing together understandings from Buddhism and the neurosciences, the discoveries they're making in studying the brain and how it operates.

During one of these meetings in Dharamsala, about twenty scientists were visiting His Holiness at his home. In a break in the proceedings, one of the Western scientists went up and, making casual conversation, asked him, "Your Holiness, what was the happiest time in your life?"

That's a very interesting question to ask someone who is a refugee in exile from his homeland, someone who has been in exile now for almost fifty years. I expected the Dalai Lama would say something like, "Oh, it was when I was living in the Potala Palace, installed as the Dalai Lama, when all the people in Tibet were able to support the practice of the Dharma." Or perhaps, "Oh, it was when I was a small child living with my family in a small village in eastern Tibet."

But he didn't say either of those things. When asked about the happiest time in his life, he said, "I think right now."

That's so beautiful because he doesn't get lost in nostalgia. Here and now—that's the place for happiness. This practice of turning the mind to joy helps us discover that happiness can be alive here and now for us. Just as the metta meditation is a meditation on happiness, on the sources and causes of happiness, so is the mudita practice. As we tune to what's happy in our life and others' lives, we start understanding what makes for happiness.

In the Buddha's teachings, there are several different levels of happiness possible to us. One is the happiness of sense pleasures. As lay people, we have access to a wide range of pleasurable experiences, particularly of the five physical senses. We can have pleasant food, pleasant sounds through music and recordings, pleasant sights through many media or works of art, pleasant touch through massage or sexuality, pleasant tastes and drinks. All the options in the lay life are open to us.

If we start to look at our experience, we find that having something pleasurable at one of the senses does pick us up. It is a kind of happiness. An important part of the Buddha's teaching is that it's temporary, often quite brief, and the satisfaction it can bring is limited. But it is a real kind of happiness.

You can see how a world that doesn't understand the happiness of meditation and the inner journey becomes very fixated on these kinds of happiness—how the happiness of sense pleasures becomes, in a way, the be-all and end-all. The quest for more money to buy more of them becomes a driving force in most cultures. And of course, one of the big areas of pleasure, especially for men, is the area of sexuality.

When I started to reflect on this, I noticed that I have a very different relationship to sexuality now than I did when I was in my twenties. Looking back to my life then, as a young man, I can see that in some ways I was kind of obsessed with sexuality—every day there was something important going on in my mind on that topic, thinking about it, feeling into it, seeking it, seeking for that satisfaction. In a way, it kind of dominated me back then.

For me, one of the great pleasures about growing up and growing up in the Dharma is that that force has become much less powerful. Part of it is simply to do with age, and I think part of it is to do with greater understanding. Now when I feel into the area of sexuality, there's much more spaciousness and a much greater sense of relief that the urgency is not so pressing. It almost feels like coming out of a fever—no longer being so captivated by the compelling nature of that wanting. Because when I was younger, especially in my twenties, the compelling nature of that wanting led me to do really stupid things.

It led me to do things that hurt other people and that then ended up hurting myself.

And it was just a great blessing to come into the Dharma and hear about the precepts—to understand that one needed to have right conduct around sexuality which was non-harming. As soon as I heard that and understood that and started to practice that, a lot of the harm went out of my sexual relationships. But nonetheless, the fever was still quite strong.

What I see looking back now is that I didn't quite understand its source or its roots. Really, as I see it now, it is this deep and pervasive biological urge. I'll speak particularly for men because I know that area better—this force that was strong, compelling, dominating. But when I was under its influence so strongly, I couldn't see the universal quality of it. I thought it was my personal choice. I thought I had a personal interest in this area, like I was discovering it for myself and like nobody else knew about it. It wasn't quite like that, but I took it very individually.

Now, looking back, I can just see: wow, that's a big movement through at least the male half of the species in order for the species to propagate itself. And I was simply at the effect of it for all those years, not really understanding the conditioned nature, but very enthralled by it. So now I can understand better the huge force of conditioning that was just living through me as a male human—just a movement that goes through all of us as men.

I wish I could speak on sexuality for women, but I don't understand it yet. So I'm still learning in that area, and I'll wait for Carol to solve that one.

At any rate, it's just to acknowledge the power that this has and the power that sense pleasures in general have. The Buddha referred to this many, many times, and often when he used the word sense pleasures in his discourses, this is really code language for sexuality. He pointed to this as the strongest sort of force that at least men were subject to. And I think as a layperson thinking about making the move into a monastic life, for men it's the biggest single area of renunciation, the biggest single area that makes it difficult to commit to a monastic life for the whole of one's life.

Then in addition to these major sense pleasures, there are just the simple pleasures that we can experience every day. And I really encourage you while you're on retreat here to start to tune into these because there are generally many, many moments of these that unfold over the course of every day.

The simple thing like the joy of waking up and being able to have a hot shower. It feels so good just to wake up into that warmth and encompassing nature. To come down to the dining room in the morning and have a warm cup of tea if you're feeling cold and warm your hands around that warm mug. To wake up and be able to see the beauty of what the snowstorm left—the ice on all the trees and on every pine needle out there. Seeing the blue sky after so many days of rain. I wasn't sure it was going to come back, but it came back again.

And then that wonderful feeling—one of the most delicious moments of every retreat day—lying down to go to sleep. Sometimes I wait for that moment many, many hours. And then it comes: lie down. The only trouble is it's so short, because often on retreat I lie down, I have about two minutes of consciousness, and the next thing I know my alarm's going off for the morning and it's time to start again. The Groundhog Day scenario: it's six o'clock, it's time to go again. The day happens over and over.

And because we're in a renunciate kind of lifestyle here, and our lives are so simple, all these pleasures get heightened. The Buddha talked about this too. He said that robes, alms food, a hut, and a straw seat will seem rich and luxurious to one who has renounced. I really find that true here. Some of my favorite meals in all my life have been a simple tea here with fruit, some peanuts, and a cup of tea. I just remember how rich the taste of an orange has been at times when I've been so present with it.

One of the other areas of happiness that the Buddha talked about quite a bit is the happiness of having wholesome conduct—of what's called virtue. When we're careful with our interactions with one another, we're mindful of the precepts, we don't harm other people, we don't harm other beings, we can look back on our conduct and feel really good about the way we've lived, even if it's for a period of time. We can feel that we've really related to the world in a way that hasn't harmed other beings.

In a way, what we're doing when we're practicing with this non-harming is we're giving others the gift of fearlessness. Not killing, not harming, not stealing, not lying, not engaging in sexual misconduct. The Buddha said there are many pleasures in lay life, but they don't add up to one-sixteenth of this, which he called the greatest pleasure in lay life. He said it is the bliss of blamelessness—the joy of knowing that we haven't been harming others. A great delight.

Again, the Dalai Lama is pretty amazing in this way. A few years ago, Oprah Winfrey did an interview with him. This seems a little bit of an unlikely pairing, but I really appreciate how Oprah has brought so many wholesome ideas and very spiritual people into the mainstream through her TV show and through her magazine. This is an interview for her magazine, O.

So she started off by asking the Dalai Lama a personal question. She said, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

And this was his reply: "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said.

"An insect," Oprah repeated, processing this unexpected answer. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued with characteristic honesty: "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued: "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life. That's a great life to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama explained, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in mountain retreat, I don't lag too far behind."

So that's the bliss of blamelessness carried to a beautiful, beautiful quality.

Another reliable source of joy is nature. We're so fortunate in a situation like this to be surrounded by it—just to be able to walk outside, open our eyes, and feel that delight, that beauty.

Shortly after I was ordained in Thailand the first time I was a monk, I went to practice at a remote monastery about forty miles outside of Chiang Mai, right out in the countryside. It was a small monastery and quite isolated. I did a three-month retreat there, and the conditions were not easy. There was a teacher, but he didn't speak any English and I didn't speak any Thai. So for my three months of practice, which was as intensive as this retreat, maybe a little more intensive, I didn't have any dharma talks and I didn't have any interviews. I was very much on my own. There was nobody there that I could have a conversation with, that I could feel free to speak English with.

The teacher would come up and check on me from time to time. Sometimes he'd bring visitors up to see the Western monk and watch him meditate. I usually would be meditating when they came up. So the Ajahn and the visitor would look in through the windows of my kuti, and I'd be just sitting there quietly, and I could hear my Ajahn go, "Dee, dee," which means "good, good," meaning, "Oh, he's meditating. That's good. He's not wasting his time."

But as I say, it was quite isolated. And I think what really sustained me in that situation was the beauty of the nature.

This monastery was laid out along a river that ran through a deep mountain gorge. The women's kutis—the nuns—were on one side of the river and the monks' kutis were on the other. The Thai people are so generous and hospitable, they gave me the best kuti in the monastery. It was the one furthest upstream and quite separated from all the others. So I was at the base of this canyon with a river running right by my kuti, well protected from any interference, very much on my own.

But because it was so isolated, the nourishment that I got, the support I got, really was from the beauty of the nature—the cliffs, the trees, the stream. And there was one mango tree that I would walk underneath as I went to the front of the monastery for my meals. I was there in mango season, so the ripe mangoes were falling off the tree onto the path, filling the air with that beautiful smell.

Unfortunately, the monks' discipline is that we cannot pick up food that has fallen as fruit from a tree. The only food that bhikkhus and bhikkhunis are allowed to take is that which is handed to them by another person. So while all these mangoes were falling on the ground and I was smelling that delightful fragrance, I couldn't touch them. I couldn't taste them. But I could enjoy the smell and remember how good they were.

This access to nature is always an inspiration to practice. Somebody who's very good at expressing that, of course, is the poet Mary Oliver. This is the opening of one of her recent poems called "Messenger":

My work is loving the world.
Here the sunflowers, there the hummingbird—
equal seekers of sweetness.
Here the quickening yeast, there the blue plums,
here the clam deep in the speckled sand.

Are my boots old?
Is my coat torn?
Am I no longer young and still not half perfect?
Let me keep my mind on what matters,
which is my work,
which is mostly standing still and learning to be astonished.

So that can be our work too.

Sitting still and learning to be astonished with the nature within and the nature without.

One of the other great sources of joy in meditation practice is the joy of peace—of stillness, of concentration. These states come to us spontaneously in our practice where we feel the mind really collecting into the present moment, where we feel that full and complete attention to just what is in this moment. This is such a gift.

As you start to experience that more, as it opens up to you, begin to explore the qualities of this state of mind—the concentrated, very present mind. One of the things that is most striking is the absence of the afflictive emotions or the hindrances, if you're familiar with that terminology. For some period of time, these constant movements of wanting and not wanting, of hope and fear, of regret and resentment, have just stopped with that fullness of attention in this moment.

When those hindrances aren't arising, there's an incredible joy in that release. The Buddha said that being even momentarily free of these forces is like how someone feels after they've been released from prison or after they've regained health after a long illness. There's a very deep relief and joy in that process.

The Buddha actually described peace as the highest happiness. Peace is the highest happiness. That's a radical notion, because if that's true, then we can't attain our highest happiness by going out and rushing about to make all kinds of outer things happen. But our highest happiness opens when we look within and release ourselves from the forces of wanting and not wanting. This letting go, he said, is the root to the highest kind of happiness that we can know.

I'll say that for me personally, one of the things that awakened my passion and deepening interest in the Dharma was discovering peace from the retreat experience and feeling how every retreat I did, I seemed to touch a new level, a new depth in the quality of the peace. And then that inspired me to come back for more and more and keep touching that depth of peacefulness.

These are ways that we can tune into the joy in our own life. The practice also is about tuning into the joy in the lives of others. So it's delightful to take a friend, think about the things that are going well in their life, and then just say that phrase: "May your happiness and good fortune continue."

Recently, one of our good friends, who's also a Dharma teacher, kind of reached a milestone with his son. His son is twenty years old and just attended his first month-long meditation retreat. I don't know how that would feel to you, but for our friend, it was kind of like the crowning reward of twenty years of child raising—to be able to introduce his son to the Dharma in such a committed way and have his son appreciate it so deeply. As a Dharma parent, I can't think of anything I would want more for my child than to have that blessing, especially at the age of twenty. So he was rapturous for the whole month that his son was sitting.

Another beautiful practice is extending that appreciation to all beings. This is kind of a challenge, but a very illuminating undertaking. Sometimes you get hits of the widespread nature of joy. Sometimes we just don't open our eyes to it. You notice how often you turn your mind to all the suffering that's in the world? How often do you turn your mind to all the joy that's in the world? Usually we turn that way much less often. But I believe that it's just as prevalent as the suffering when we learn to tune into it.

Sometimes the internet reveals these things. Somebody sent me a link to a video on YouTube that was called "Free Hugs." Have you seen this video? So Free Hugs started in a shopping mall in Sydney, Australia, with this one young guy who just got the idea, and he made a sign. It was about three feet by three feet, and it just had handwritten big letters that said "Free Hugs."

So he went down to a shopping mall and he held up this sign: Free Hugs. And first people would walk by and go, "What? Is this guy crazy? Or is he some kind of creep that you don't really want to get too close to because he might be a little bit weird?" But eventually some people started to break through the barrier and the suspicion, and they went up and they just hugged him. And then they'd come away smiling. And then more people saw that happening, so they went up and hugged him and would come away smiling. And pretty soon all these people were coming up and getting free hugs.

So this started to gain some momentum. It was happening a lot. He'd go back to the shopping mall, and they started to make a video of all the people who were coming to get these free hugs. And they posted that on an Australian site. And then this Australian rock group decided to dedicate one of their songs to this experience. So they put his video to music and edited it further and posted this music video, which is now up on YouTube and has had 1.6 million views as of about a month ago.

So when you get back, go to YouTube, look up Free Hugs, and you'll get a hit of real mudita. It's just so fun to see all these people in a shopping mall being surprised at the possibility they could hug somebody they don't know, and it just tickles them.

And now it's spread. People are offering free hugs in Japan, Israel, Europe, and all over the world. It's a beautiful example of mudita for all beings.

What I discovered when I began practicing loving-kindness for a truly wide range of beings is that everyone I could think of had some happiness in their life. I don't want to make an absolute pronouncement that every human being has happiness—I don't know that to be universally true. But all the people I could bring to mind had some measure of joy or contentment.

I had this observation confirmed during a metta retreat I was teaching at Spirit Rock. One participant was from Manchester, England. If you know Manchester, it's probably not among the world's happiest places—one of those northern industrial cities with old urban architecture, gloomy weather, cold and rainy. You get the picture.

Her work there involved helping women seeking political refuge in England, generally from developing countries. Reflect for a moment on what this means. These were women who had gained asylum in Britain because they faced threats of murder, assault, or violence if they remained in their home countries. They had to leave everything familiar—their homeland, culture, warm climate, family, friends, religion—for their very survival, transplanting themselves to this cold, gray, rainy northern industrial town. Imagine that adjustment.

She told me the most remarkable thing about working with these women was their level of cheerfulness. Despite everything they'd endured and lost, they possessed such resilient spirits, such optimism and courage. I think about this whenever I consider how happiness appears in the most unexpected places.

When we begin to encounter the areas of happiness in our own lives, gratitude often arises naturally. And gratitude is a truly beautiful quality of heart and mind. When this quality is present and we appreciate what already exists in our life, it's a wonderful place to dwell.

Notice how gratitude counteracts both wanting and aversion. We're not greedy for our life to be different because we appreciate the riches already present, so it offsets desire. We're also not resisting our circumstances because we're appreciating the blessings we have, so it offsets aversion. Instead, we recognize and cherish the positive aspects of our experience.

A wise friend of mine, a grandmother, once called her seven-year-old granddaughter on Christmas Day. The child was bubbling with excitement about all the presents she'd received. The grandmother asked, "When you get lots of presents, does that make you thankful or do you want more?"

"Oh, Nana, I want more!" the little girl replied.

"Oh, that's too bad," her grandmother said gently.

The child paused. "What do you mean?"

"Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, it feels good? And when you're wanting more, it doesn't feel as good?"

The little girl stopped completely. "Oh, Nana, you're right."

This is such a beautiful and simple teaching about gratitude. All of us have countless things to be grateful for if we turn our minds in that direction.

A friend of mine worked in refugee camps in Thailand, receiving Cambodians fleeing the killing fields after so many had died in their country. He was working with Thai teachers to train these refugees for emigration to other countries—many came to the United States, and there's now quite a large Hmong population in Fresno, California, many of whom came through these very camps.

Among the refugees was a young Hmong girl from a village in the hills. As part of her training—which included learning for the first time how to use money, operate a washing machine, read a bus schedule, and understand what a toaster was—she was asked: "What are the most important things in life?"

Her answer was immediate: "The most important things in life are fire, rice, and water."

This is profoundly worth reflecting upon, because if we couldn't take those things for granted, they would be the most important things in our lives too. But we have all these necessities in such abundance that we easily forget much of the world doesn't. We have as much food as we want. Here, on this cold and perhaps windy night, we sit warm and dry inside.

If we became sick, each of us would have access to pretty good health care. So many people in the world lack adequate food, adequate shelter, adequate clothing, and adequate medicine. These the Buddha called the requisites of human life. For the most part, we have all these.

In addition, all of us enjoy what the Tibetans call a precious human birth. This means a birth that, beyond these basic requisites, has some other qualities. It basically means we have the ability to awaken, or you could say to come to the true end of suffering. Each of us has that possibility.

We've heard about it as a possibility, we've understood it to some extent, and so that is within our reach. That is very rare. We're born as human beings. Our minds and bodies work reasonably well. We're at a time when there are authentic teachings still alive on the earth of how to walk the path to come to the end of suffering. This is not always true in every period upon the earth, but somehow all of us have met up with these teachings in an authentic way and understood authentic instructions on how to walk that path and how to practice for the very end of suffering, should we want to do that.

In addition, you and I have the leisure time to spend some time carrying out these teachings. When you look across the whole population of six billion people on the earth, it's a fairly small percentage that have all those conditions that make up the precious birth that we have.

Some people at this point in the retreat start to mention this feeling of gratitude. Someone mentioned it today and said, "But in an approach where there's not considered to be a God, who do you offer this gratitude to?" And personally, I feel it toward the Dharma. I feel so grateful to have had the teachings in my life.

When I reflect back on what my life was before I knew about these teachings, it was a lot of confusion because suffering and happiness seemed to happen in this really random way. I knew I wanted to be happy, but I had no idea how to make that possible. It was just a time of bewilderment and kind of groping in the dark for something. And to know for ourselves the way to happiness—for me, it's been an incredible gift, the best gift in my life.

So I said that I would talk a little about how this quality of joy fits into the path. Let me finish by describing the progression. This is described in more detail if you're interested in a text in one of the books of the Buddha's teachings called the Upanisa Sutta. This teaching is sometimes called Transcendent Dependent Origination, but it's not as forbidding as the title.

One of the early qualities is this quality of gladness that we were talking about—when just in a moment you tune into an aspect of your experience that awakens this kind of delight, the delight of the warm shower or the warm cup of tea or the beautiful sight of nature. You let that fill your heart. You take time to feel the gladness of mind that that brings.

Then as you bring that quality of gladness into the meditation, you find that there starts to be a delight in your connection to the meditation subject. Whether that's breath or body or sounds, there's a delight in being with that. This is called, in the Pali word, pīti.

This delight starts to calm our mind because in some ways this level of delight and interest is what we've been looking for. So the mind starts to settle a little bit, comes to peace out of that sense of delight and engagement.

Then this peaceful and engaged feeling leads to a new level of happiness. The Pali term here is sukha. This is a happiness that's not so much dependent on outer conditions, but we've in a way found it within ourselves in this combination of peacefulness and interest in our experience.

So a contentment starts to grow in us that's not dependent on outer conditions. This is a wonderful thing to discover. As one of my teachers said, it was in this phase of practice that he truly learned that happiness comes from within. Because we feel how clearly its source is inner, not related to outer events at all. It's sort of like the happiness of coming home or being at home.

Then as that tranquil contentment settles, the mind is just able to collect very deeply because it's no longer pulled out to externals. It's not searching for this and that. The restless groping for satisfaction stops temporarily, and the mind collects in this deep state of concentration.

And from this deep state of concentration, then there is the opening, the potential for the opening into liberating understanding. It's the insight, the wisdom, that truly liberates.

So the role that joy plays is the kind of awakening of the delight. Then it mellows through tranquility, settles into our being, into deep contentment, but doesn't stop there. One of the things the Buddha said is that he reminded himself all along his practice career not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind. This in itself is a radical pointing—not to settle just for wholesome states of mind, but to continue to let that wholesomeness deepen into concentration and then allow the liberating insight truly to free the mind into that deepest kind of security, which is the knowledge, as the Buddha said, "Suffering can never return to this mind."

Can you imagine what that would feel like? To know that there was no possibility any longer of suffering ever arising again. This is considered to be the fullness of freedom.

As the Buddha said in the simile of the heartwood, it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end. Joy is an incredibly important accelerating factor toward that end.

I'll close with a reflection from Rumi: "Today, like every other day, we wake up empty and frightened. Don't open the door to the study and begin reading. Take down a musical instrument. Let the beauty we love be what we do. There are hundreds of ways to kneel and kiss the ground."

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

It is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end.

CHAPTER 272

The Benefits of Mettā

Guy Armstrong · 53 min

In this dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses the challenges and profound benefits of loving-kindness meditation. Drawing on the traditional framework of the four brahmavihāras (divine abodes) - mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity) - he explains how mettā practice transforms our hearts and minds through five key developments.

Armstrong discusses how mettā makes the heart more responsive and "juicy," purifies mental states by replacing negativity with wholesome intentions, develops concentration through sustained focus on the phrases, connects us to all living beings through recognizing our fundamental sameness, and cultivates lasting happiness. He emphasizes that mettā is not mere positive thinking but a systematic cultivation of our innate capacity for love through sincere intention and repetition.

The talk includes inspiring stories of transformation, references to teachers like the Dalai Lama and Ajahn Jimnian, and practical guidance on working with the traditional phrases: "May I be safe, may I be happy, may I be healthy, may I live with ease." Armstrong addresses common difficulties practitioners face, explaining how mettā practice naturally brings up memories and emotions for healing, while establishing a foundation of self-love that extends naturally to others.

We come to the end of the first day of the metta retreat together, and I'm happy to see—really happy—that most of you are still here, because beginnings of retreats are always difficult, and metta retreats even more so. This really came out in the interview groups this afternoon. This is hard work. You know, you have to keep cranking out those phrases. It's kind of like trying to get an old Model T to start, and you just have to keep cranking and cranking. At first, it doesn't catch automatically, and it really takes a lot of work.

A number of people in the groups were talking about how tiring it was. Somebody said that she was suffering from "phrases fatigue," and she said, "All I want to do is sit quietly." You may have felt that today. Some people ask, "Can I take a vipassana break, please?" I think vipassana never looks so inviting as in the middle of an early day of a metta retreat.

If you need to take a vipassana break and sit quietly to regain your energy, it's fine to do that on the early days. But it is amazing that people are already really starting to engage with the practice. Despite all the difficulties and the mind swinging between extreme sleepiness and extreme restlessness in the early days, people are working and already connecting well with the practice. Anushka was sitting in on one of the groups this afternoon, and she just said, "It's amazing how sincerely people are doing this practice without a lot of reward as yet." The reward will come later, but I want to appreciate the sincerity of your work today.

Just in case there are any doubts about whether this really works or how it works, in tonight's talk I want to discuss what the metta practice does for us and how it does it—the mechanics of how repeating these phrases over and over again can actually transform our hearts and minds.

Rumi, the great poet from Persia, said, "One who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." I'm really happy that we all are running toward the allure of love, because for me it has always been one of the most motivating aspects of the spiritual path.

When I was in my early twenties, I developed a lot of access to love, but I didn't know how to stabilize it. It came and went seemingly at random, and it was tremendously satisfying—some of the most satisfying experiences I'd had in my life—but I didn't know how to access it with any regularity. For me, a lot of the pull of the whole spiritual path was trying to find out how to make that access to love more enduring and more ongoing. In our tradition, the metta practice is one of the key ways to do that, one of the most central ways.

I want to talk tonight about five benefits of the metta practice, how it affects us and shapes us. The first is that it makes the heart more responsive, or you could say more tender. We allow life to touch us more, and then we're also more able to touch life. It purifies the heart—that is, it cleans it, scrubs it, brightens it up and makes it shine. It develops this quality of concentration, which I think we've mentioned once or twice today. It connects us to the whole breadth of life and really all living things in a very unique way. And it has the possibility of bringing a lot of happiness. These are the five developments that I want to cover this evening.

First, let me talk about the way it makes the heart more responsive, makes it more alive to life.

The main practice that we do here at Spirit Rock is called Insight Meditation or vipassana. It uses the tool of mindfulness primarily in a clear relationship with what's happening in the present moment. We think of vipassana as our wisdom practice. Wisdom is ultimately what liberates the heart and mind. So for us, we do the loving-kindness practice in the context of the wisdom practice of vipassana. Nonetheless, metta has some really unique qualities to add to our spiritual development.

I was sitting a retreat with a Tibetan teacher. At the end of retreats, often in Tibetan practice, when the student is about to go away, the teacher gives a few words of heart advice—pith instructions that the student is meant to take away and live by. At the end of our retreat, the teacher offered us these words of heart advice.

He said, "When you go back into the world, remember three things. First, I want you to be natural. Just be a good-natured, down-to-earth, easy-going person. Don't go back and act like you're on some weird spiritual trip, because if you do that, you'll go into the world, people will think that's what Buddhism is about, and they won't want to take part. So be natural."

The second thing he said is be wise. He said, take care of yourself, take care of the people around you, make good choices in your life.

And the third thing he said is, when you go back, be juicy. And he used that when he would talk about the eyes welling up with moisture when they were touched by beauty or compassion. When you go back to your life, be juicy.

This is an ancient Buddhist technical term. I want you to understand this term, juice. It refers to a whole range of feelings that are sometimes called the devotional end of practice. So it's qualities like love, reverence, joy, devotion, compassion, humor, faith, trust, kindness, humility, awe—this range of our possible emotions is what we call technically juice.

The metta practice in our tradition is the direct avenue to cultivating this juicy quality in life. Because if you think about it, these are the range of qualities that make life sweet, that make life really enjoyable. They're also the qualities I think that touch other people and perhaps awaken in them an interest in spiritual life.

When you think about the teachers who have touched you over the course of your spiritual path, take a look and see if some of these qualities of love and compassion and joy and humor aren't the ones that sort of caught your interest and made you want to have a little bit of what that person had. So these are the qualities by which we can touch the world also.

Alice Walker, the noted author and novelist who wrote The Color Purple, said, "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness." The metta practice is the direct way in our tradition that we bring this about. And to me, it's amazing and beautiful that there are specific practices that lead in this direction. When I was young, I had no idea that there were practices that I could do that could cultivate my openness to love. I thought it was just random. And in the technology of the Buddhist teachings, there are definitely these qualities and they work.

To put it in its context, metta is one of four qualities that are called the Brahma-viharas. Brahma means divine or heavenly. Vihara means home or resting place. So these qualities are called the divine abodes. And the four are metta, or loving-kindness; compassion, or karuna; joy, or mudita; and equanimity, or upekkha.

You'll notice these are the names that we gave to the four residence buildings when we built the retreat center. We thought about calling them the Four Noble Truths, but we didn't think you'd want to stay in suffering and craving, so we decided this is a little more appealing than that.

The four of these really work together with metta as the foundation. Metta is the quality that opens our heart in a very general kind of way. We use these four phrases because they lead us into a very interesting reflection, investigation, and then ultimately analysis of what makes for human happiness.

When you contemplate, as you will do over the next five days, what's involved in an authentic sense of well-being, of welfare for yourself and all those that you bring in to the metta, I think you'll see that every living being wants to be safe. We look at the situation in Iraq now and imagine what it would be like to try to live a daily life where you and your family had no guarantee of surviving from the morning until the evening every day of your life. It's really not possible to feel a sense of secure happiness in an environment where we're not at least physically safe.

Then mental happiness—you know, we know what it's like when mental happiness isn't there, when we're plunged into anger or depression, despair, anxiety, and we lose touch with that ability to touch the feeling of uplift of mental happiness. And we know what happens when our health isn't available, when the body energy is low, when there's a lot of pain in the body. It really saps our ability to have the energy to be uplifted, to be happy.

The fourth of the phrases is sometimes a little bit cryptic, this living with ease. What does it mean to live with ease? Really the sense here in the traditional phrase you'll see in the translation this evening is to take care of yourself happily. It means that you can provide for yourself, your family, your responsibilities through your work in the external world. So it means that your livelihood and your relationships go well and smoothly. That's the intent of the fourth and final phrase.

And you see that when all of these come together in a human life, this is what really makes for a sense of happiness, a sense of peace, contentment, and settledness. It's when these four are available. Now obviously there are ways to practice to do without one or another of them, but when the four come together, we're lucky, we're fortunate.

Reflecting on this for ourselves and then for other people who we'll bring in trains us to see the world through the eyes of caring. It's like with each being that we bring to mind, we go, how is it for you? How is your safety, your happiness, and your health, and your ease? How's it going? It trains us to see the world through the eyes of others, and that's a big part of what awakens this tender heart.

We're always thinking about—I know what my life's like now. What is it for you? Because we recognize in each being there's another whole universe of feeling and joys and sorrows. And we want that to go well as we start to tune in to the possibility.

The way this transforms people was brought home to me recently in a really kind of sweet story.

Someone who practices here frequently and has joined us for the month-long retreats in February was recently attending a retreat on the East Coast. You know how at meal cleanup you scrape your leftovers into the compost bin by the dishwashing station? This retreat center had a similar setup, but there was a sign that read: "Please don't put any staples from tea bags in the compost because the compost is going to feed pigs."

When my friend saw this sign, he wondered where those pigs were ultimately going. He happens to be a committed vegan, motivated by deep concern for the welfare of animals—creatures who have no voice of their own, cannot speak for themselves, and enjoy almost no rights in our culture.

So he approached the cooks and asked, "The compost goes to the pigs, but what happens to the pigs afterward?" He explained that if they were being raised for slaughter, he didn't want the retreat center to be part of that chain. It didn't feel congruent with Buddhist values to participate in that process.

The cook admitted she didn't know what happened to the pigs but promised to find out. She called the neighbor who regularly collected the compost and asked about the pigs' fate.

The neighbor replied with quite an interesting story. He explained that the pigs had indeed been destined for slaughter. Last December, they had taken them to the slaughterhouse, expecting they would be processed within a day or two. But the day after they dropped off the pigs, the slaughterhouse burned to the ground.

Is that karmic or what?

The neighbor continued: his daughters had been distraught because they had spent so much time with these pigs since they were young, and the thought of them dying painfully in the fire was devastating. Assuming the worst had happened, he checked with the farmer.

To his surprise, the farmer revealed that the pigs had actually escaped the slaughterhouse and were running wild in the surrounding woods. Initially, they feared the pigs were lost—surviving a Massachusetts winter is no easy feat for creatures unaccustomed to such conditions.

So the neighbor took his daughters in the truck and drove to the site of the burned slaughterhouse. They searched the woods and found both pigs alive. They brought them home, and now they're being raised as beloved pets—his daughters are completely smitten with them. The compost scraps from the retreat center now nourish these pet pigs, whose names, incidentally, are Thelma and Louise.

What a beautiful story emerging from someone whose heart had been awakened partly through loving-kindness practice to care deeply about animal welfare. Who knows what karmic forces that compost set in motion to liberate those two pigs.

The other three brahmaviharas naturally grow from this foundation of an open heart. As we attune to the lived experience of beings—ourselves and others—we begin recognizing different primary experiences.

When life becomes difficult and we encounter suffering, the open heart looking upon that suffering transforms metta into compassion. That's the essence of compassion—the open heart witnessing suffering, whether our own or another's.

Metta and compassion are intimately connected. Don't be misled by the different terminology. Some Buddhist schools, including Tibetan and Zen traditions, emphasize compassion as primary. In our tradition, we prioritize metta, but they're very closely related. The Dalai Lama describes compassion as basic human warmth, which is precisely what we're cultivating here.

When the open heart observes a being experiencing happiness and joy, the response is what we call appreciative joy or sympathetic joy—we feel happy witnessing their happiness. This constitutes the third brahmavihara.

When the open heart can simply rest, it abides in equanimity—that balance of mind not easily disturbed by life's changing faces of pleasure and pain. Equanimity supports the other three practices, as we'll explore further.

As we delve into metta practice, some people from a vipassana background sometimes have philosophical concerns. Vipassana is so elegant, so impeccable—just aware of what is. It's absolutely clean. Metta can seem a bit too New Age, perhaps like Hallmark greeting cards or affirmations. What is this about?

I wanted to address this perspective. One of the Buddha's primary instructions regarding right effort is to cultivate wholesome qualities of mind. In metta practice, and all the brahmaviharas, we're directly cultivating very wholesome mental qualities. This perfectly aligns with what the Buddha described as right effort.

Some people find metta practice sounds deluded: "May I be happy?" But you told me on the last retreat there was no self. You also said happiness was impermanent, yet now I'm constantly wishing for it. Isn't this contradictory?

For the vipassana purists in the audience, I have a phrase you might prefer as your metta. You can use this if you like: "In this ever-changing stream of mental and physical phenomena, conventionally designated as James, may the mind-state of happiness arise on an ever more frequent basis."

If you prefer that formulation, feel free to use it. Or if you simply want to say, "May you be happy, James," that works perfectly well too.

They mean the same thing.

But it is extraordinary when we meet somebody who has developed their heart in this way. Mostly, I think, growing up in this culture, I didn't have any idea of what kind of development was possible for the human heart. And then when we meet people who have done this work for many years or possibly lifetimes, it's mind-blowing.

The person I always reflect on when I think about this possibility is the Dalai Lama. As James said, he often says that his religion is kindness, and he really practices it. I think he's practiced it for a long time. Oprah Winfrey did an interview with the Dalai Lama for her magazine O, and I really appreciate Oprah for bringing a wide range of beautiful teachings into a mainstream audience. That's something she's done really brilliantly. She uses a lot of the teachers from our community—Sharon Salzberg has been in O, Jack, Joseph Goldstein. A lot of our teachers appear there.

So she was interviewing the Dalai Lama for an article. The interview began when Oprah asked the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect? Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

And that's it. Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, looking out the window. She fell silent. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued, "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life—to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

That's an amazing heart. And of course, all that separates us from that is about seventeen lifetimes of practice. We're on our way.

Of course, the only reason that the loving-kindness practice works for us is that this quality of metta is part of our nature. It's an intrinsic part of us. It's not something we have to fabricate—it's already there in each of us, and it's just a matter of inclining our mind and bringing it forward.

One of the most loving people in my life was my grandmother. She was born in the countryside in North Carolina around 1890, and there was not a strong Buddhist presence in North Carolina in 1890. She grew up without the benefit of these teachings or psychotherapy, and yet she managed to have one of the most loving hearts that I've ever known, even though she was married to my grandfather, who was a particularly ornery character. So this is a natural quality in us, and we're trying to remind ourselves of it and incline our mind in that direction.

What you'll see as the practice goes on is that the phrase is just a skillful means to help us incline the mind that way. The way Buddhist practices all work is if you want to develop quality X, you put yourself in quality X. There's no quality Y that's needed to get to quality X. You put yourself in quality X. So if you want to be mindful and in the present, you come into the present. If you want to develop the quality of loving-kindness, you put yourself in loving-kindness as best you can in this moment. And the phrases are there, the image is there, the person is there to help evoke that feeling as far as possible.

This putting ourselves there over and over is really what carries out the second benefit of loving-kindness, which is the quality of purification or cleaning the heart. Sharda alluded to this last night. Instead of being lost in some mind states of ill will, judgment, or criticism, or craving, we substitute the metta phrases and the metta inclination for those. And so moment by moment, the mind is brought out of its habitual patterns of negativity, which bring suffering to us, and those patterns are replaced by the inclination of loving-kindness. So in a way, it's really simple.

The heart of the practice is profoundly simple: can you see yourself and sincerely wish yourself well? Can you see another and sincerely wish that other person well? There's no way to manufacture the sincere part of this. Simply saying the phrase alone doesn't accomplish it. What transforms the heart is saying the phrase and meaning it—bringing as much real caring to that moment as you can.

The metta phrases aren't used like a mantra practice. Mantra practices are wonderful; they have a beautifully calming effect on the mind and body, quieting the mind and leading us into stillness and relaxation. The metta phrases aren't meant to be used in that way. It's not just the repetition of the phrase that accomplishes the work—it's the sincere caring that we bring to the phrase that is the real engine of this practice.

When we can bring up a person or ourselves and really care, even if it's just a little bit of caring, that's what begins to transform the heart. What we're taking hold of—and Sharda mentioned this in her opening—is the factor of intention. We are inclining our minds in that direction of caring, and intention is the powerful transforming element of dharma practice. Whether it's intending to be in the present moment through mindfulness or intending to be caring through the practice of loving-kindness, intention is the lever that begins to shift our life.

The very simple way of thinking of each phrase is that it's like saying to yourself or somebody else, "I hope you're happy." That's all it is—"I hope you're happy." Try to say it with some meaning, and everything flows from that. It's this simple intention that generates the power of loving-kindness. When we offer it moment after moment after moment, hour after hour and day after day, that power begins to build.

Those of you who have sat vipassana retreats will recognize this pattern from the cultivation of mindfulness. We pay attention to the present moment, moment after moment, and it develops incredible momentum as we sustain it. Here, that momentum is generated simply by the intention of caring or well-wishing. That takes the place of the intention of mindfulness in vipassana practice.

You can think of every one of these phrases as like planting a seed—a seed of intention. Our job is that we are the farmers. We plant the seeds and we take care of them with continuity, with patience, with diligence. But we're not the ones who can make the seeds sprout, and we're not the ones who can make the seeds grow into flourishing plants. That's nature. So our job is only to plant the seed of this simple caring. When it grows up and flowers into loving-kindness, that's the work of nature—or you could say the dharma.

As you plant the seeds, let the planting be enough. Plant with all your wholehearted intention, but you don't have to try to manufacture the plant. Take what comes in its own time. Different feelings of metta will arise over these days for you. Trust in that—trust that the planting is enough, that you don't need to make the plant emerge from the soil. The dharma will take care of that. When metta arises is not up to us exactly. We plant the seeds, and then the strengthening of it is accomplished by the dharma.

So what should we look for? What are the signs of this flowering of metta? We've used the word love often as we've been discussing this. In some ways that may be a little too exalted for us—the word love aims really high. There's a transcendent, selfless, merging quality in it. Sometimes metta will manifest in that flavor, but that's a peak experience. It's not the way it's going to appear most of the time.

A step down from that is the way I mostly think of metta—similar to what James shared last night: friendship. Simply having a friendly attitude toward what meets us. That's metta. That's enough. That attitude is more accessible moment by moment, and that attitude can carry us through much of life.

I invite you to think back over all the moments of today. Were there any moments that weren't met with friendliness? When the body ached, when there was noise in the building, when someone wasn't moving through the line properly, when your cushion disappeared after you'd left the hall...

These kind actions reflect something in our heart that we want to love and nourish. When we connect with these moments of goodness, the phrase "may I be happy" begins to feel appropriate and natural. We recognize that this good heart deserves happiness.

Another approach is to reflect on your own deep intentions. Even when we make mistakes, even when we fall short of our ideals, most of us carry fundamental intentions to be helpful, to be kind, to not cause harm. These intentions themselves are beautiful and worthy of love. When we touch this place of good intention within ourselves, metta arises naturally.

Sometimes I suggest people think of themselves as a small child. Can you remember being five or six years old? That innocent, open, curious being—that's still part of who you are. When we see ourselves with this tenderness, the way we might look at any small child, loving kindness flows easily.

The Tibetans have a beautiful practice where they imagine that they have been the beloved child of countless mothers throughout countless lifetimes. They reflect on all the care and tenderness they've received. This creates a sense of being fundamentally loveable, worthy of kindness and care.

You might also reflect on your own struggles and difficulties with compassion. We've all experienced loss, disappointment, physical pain, emotional confusion. When we see our own suffering clearly, often a natural response of tenderness arises. We wouldn't wish this pain on anyone, including ourselves.

However you connect with your own basic goodness, spend some time there. Let it become real. Let yourself feel worthy of love and care. This isn't about inflating the ego or becoming self-absorbed. This is about recognizing the truth of your own good heart and allowing that recognition to flower into genuine self-love.

From this foundation of self-love, everything else becomes possible. We can't give what we don't have. If we're harsh and critical with ourselves, if we're constantly judging our own thoughts and actions, then that's what we'll offer to others. But when we establish a baseline of kindness toward ourselves, we create the conditions for that kindness to radiate outward naturally.

You think about those and you reflect on what was my intention in doing that? And in coming to the intention, you get in touch with that quality of caring. You were caring about somebody. And that's the seed of metta.

So in touch with your own goodness, then directing the phrases to yourself. But even so, loving kindness for ourselves can bring up a lot of different memories and a lot of different feelings. Someone was commenting in a group today that it brought up memories of times when they themselves had acted in ways that weren't so kind. That's one of the common things that happens.

It's like as we turn to kindness and recognize it as a value, then what comes from the other side is, oh, but what about this? And a voice of memory that brings up all the times we weren't so kind. Or we think about safety, and we remember times in our life that we didn't feel safe, that people hurt us or harmed us.

So these feelings will come. In doing metta practice, it's almost like we do a life review. We're kind of looking at our life now through new lenses. It's kind of like somebody puts on these metta glasses and says, who are you now? As you see the world through the eyes of loving kindness, what do you see? And part of it is we look at our own life through the eyes of loving kindness and we see times it wasn't there in our life —maybe from outside or maybe from inside. So there's a kind of reevaluation that takes place because of this practice. This is an integral part of what metta does.

When these memories come, don't think you've gone off the track. It's part of what happens. But also you don't have to make a project out of fixing them. Because what's beautiful is that as the metta grows, it holds the memories in its own friendliness. And that provides all the transformation or you could say the healing that's needed. So don't think you have to go out and fix them. Though we will in a couple of days talk about a practice of forgiveness that can help with this process. But basically trust in the metta to hold these memories and change them.

As we get in touch with our own difficulties, this then becomes a doorway to the further development of love and compassion. It's kind of interesting how that happens. You know, sometimes if life is too easy, we don't develop very much. And it's when we run into a little bit of obstacle that we sort of wake up and grow.

I'm sure you know of the Burmese democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi who's been under house arrest for most of the last fourteen years. The Burmese military dictatorship let her out for part of a year at one point, but she was generating too much interest among the people of Burma. And so they put her back under house arrest and basically she can't go out and no one can see her. She's a very committed Buddhist practitioner because Burma is a very strong Buddhist country. And in fact, she's had practice interviews with some of the teachers that some of us have practiced with.

It's a very interesting situation for them because they can't directly talk about politics with her, because the house is probably bugged, and anything that they say could get them in as much trouble as she is in, so they have to talk in very careful ways. But she's gotten detailed instructions on the practice of loving-kindness, as we're doing it here, because she's been taught by some of the teachers that we learned this practice from.

And here's what she said about loving-kindness: "When I compared notes with my colleagues in the democracy movement in Burma who have suffered long terms of imprisonment, we found that an enhanced appreciation of metta was a common experience. We had known and felt both the effects of loving kindness and the unwholesomeness of nature's lacking in loving kindness." The loving kindness has become a really integral part of her practice and she extends that practice to the military leadership.

So as the metta develops, one of the things we notice about love is that it has this tremendous integrating energy. Love unifies. It pulls people together. It pulls couples together. It pulls nations together, could pull a whole planet together. And it pulls our psyche together. When love comes into being in our psyche, parts of ourselves that we pushed away and rejected become able to be held, embraced, and accepted. So love has this wonderful quality of putting us back together.

I don't know if you've experienced this in your Vipassana practice, but it has the effect of taking us apart. That's very interesting. You know, we look at the six sense bases or the five aggregates and it takes us into our constituent elements. And then love kind of puts all that back together.

And that's a way we can appreciate this famous quote again from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who said that love tells me I'm everything and wisdom tells me I'm nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows. This is the flow of our metta and vipassana practice. Vipassana shows us that we're nothing. Loving kindness shows us that we hold everything. And this is very healing. This really does put our hearts back together.

There's this beautiful poem from Galway Kinnell called "St. Francis and the Sow." He says, "Sometimes it is necessary to re-teach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within, of self-blessing." This is what the loving kindness practice is doing for us. It's re-teaching us our own loveliness because we discover that quality, the beautiful quality of metta within our own hearts.

The third of the powers of loving kindness is the development of concentration. This practice develops two qualities primarily: one is loving kindness and the other is concentration. By coming back to the phrases again and again, we're providing a single focus for the attention, and that unifies the mind. It collects the mind around the phrases. So start to investigate in your practice: what does it feel like when the mind collects around the phrases? What does it feel like when the phrases can go for a few repetitions and they're uninterrupted by other distracting thoughts? This is the factor of concentration coming into play. Begin to investigate what it feels like in your body, what it feels like in your mind when that happens. We'll talk about this more as the retreat goes on, but you can start to explore this already.

The fourth development through loving kindness is connection. Loving kindness practice connects us to all of life. With our vipassana practice, it can open this way—it ought to open this way—but sometimes it can become a little self-enclosed where we focus on my pain, my suffering, my mindfulness, my awakening, my liberation. But metta practice can't let us stay in that narrow view. It has to open us out to the rest of life.

This is from Shantideva, an eighth-century Indian teacher: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy." So loving kindness is where we practice this wanting others to be happy, and we find out there's a tremendous joy in that connection to life.

One of the insights we come to—I think Sharda might have mentioned this too—is we find that we're all very much the same organism. We have all these distinctions that society is based around: gender, age, race, language, culture, religion. But if you look at it, we're all basically a human being with two eyes, a nose, a mouth, two arms, and two legs. We have the same package of emotions. We have the same vulnerability to the sufferings of life. We are basically the same being that's been poured into different vessels. All the distinctions are real because each of them conditions us in a different way—it's not to deny the reality—but when you look more deeply, they're superficial and they don't change that underlying sameness that we all share, the brightness of the light that shines out through each pair of eyes.

So metta reconnects us to that truth. I'd say this is maybe the deepest insight from the brahmavihara practices. They make us realize that very deeply we're more than just connected—we share the same heart.

Both James and Sharda, I think it was in the late 80s or early 90s, traveled to India and had a number of wonderful meetings with an Indian teacher named Poonjaji, sometimes called Papaji, who a number of the teachers in our circle also went to visit and learned a lot from. And this is a beautiful quote from Poonjaji about this underlying unity. He was asked one time about bringing peace into the world and he says, "As long as there are two, there will be war." And what he meant was as long as there are two in our minds, there will be war. And so the real way through conflict is seeing our deep connection, our deep unity.

Finally, I'd just like to talk a little bit about the happiness that comes from loving kindness practice. One of the happiest people I know is a Thai teacher named Ajahn Jimnien who usually comes to Spirit Rock every spring. Unfortunately, this year he had some intestinal difficulty. He had to have surgery and he wasn't able to make the trip. But he is a joyful presence. He's about sixty-five or so years old and has done meditation from the time he was four. He was kind of a prodigy. He was trained in both vipassana and loving kindness practice, and he has the energy and the joy and the friendliness that comes from deep, deep cultivation of loving kindness.

One of the transmissions he offers in his limited English captures the beautiful union of his vipassana and metta understanding. He touches the space around him and says simply, "Empty, empty." Then he touches it again and declares, "Happy, happy, empty, empty, happy, happy." This is his transmission—the profound recognition that emptiness and happiness are not separate, but intimately connected.

When he teaches at Spirit Rock in either the lower or upper hall, someone might ask him what he'd like to do that day. "Would you like to go to San Francisco or visit the ocean?" His response is always the same: "Are there people who'd like to hear the Dharma? If there are people who'd like to hear the Dharma, I'd really be happy to share the Dharma. But if there's nobody who wants to hear the Dharma, I'm happy to go to San Francisco or the ocean. Whatever you would like, I'm always happy."

He tells us that he hasn't experienced anger in twenty-five years. When you meet him, this extraordinary claim becomes completely believable. His very presence radiates the truth of this statement.

As loving-kindness begins to open in our hearts and we feel it as an integral part of ourselves, we recognize it as our own true nature. This recognition brings a deeply reassuring sense that fundamentally, perhaps we're okay after all. Perhaps all the self-judgment we've piled upon ourselves was simply mistaken.

When we can touch this loving heart, we know that goodness is alive within us. This knowledge completely undercuts any sense of inadequacy, failure, or self-criticism. This is one of the great benefits of loving-kindness practice—it brings a sense of inner completeness that we can settle into with confidence.

We no longer need to search for satisfaction outside ourselves. Instead, we feel this loving-kindness as a refuge within us, a place where the mind can drop and rest. Over time, this becomes more and more the natural place where we abide. This is why these qualities are called the brahmavihara—the divine abidings or divine abodes.

As one teacher beautifully expressed it: "There is nothing else to search for. Rest in your natural face." This is the feeling of loving-kindness.

Oprah concluded her interview with the Dalai Lama by posing this question from her magazine column: "In O, I do a feature called 'What I Know for Sure.' So I'd like to ask you—what do you know for sure? The one thing on which you have no doubt."

The Dalai Lama did not hesitate in his response: "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For a happy life and a happy world, there is no doubt."

Let's sit together for a moment in silence, holding these words: Compassion or metta is the best source of happiness—for a happy life and a happy world.

Thank you for your attention and for your practice.

CHAPTER 273

Mudita: Practicing Joy and Gratitude

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of mudita, the third of the four Brahmavihāras (divine abodes). Drawing from his own retreat experiences and the Buddha's teachings, Armstrong explains how mudita—sympathetic or appreciative joy—represents the awakened heart's response to encountering happiness in the world. He discusses how this practice feeds on happiness itself, creating a "double hit" of joy when we resonate with others' good fortune, much like the sympathetic strings of a sitar. Armstrong explores various forms of happiness available to practitioners: sense pleasures, the joy of ethical conduct (the "bliss of blamelessness"), the beauty of nature, and the peace of concentration. He addresses mudita's far enemy (envy) and near enemy (comparing mind), while emphasizing how the practice naturally leads to gratitude when directed toward ourselves. The talk concludes with mudita's crucial role in the Buddha's path to liberation, as described in the Discourse on the Links, where joy serves as an essential foundation leading from faith through concentration to final liberation—what the Buddha called "the unshakable deliverance of mind."

This talk was given to a group of people sitting in silence during a meditation retreat. It is intended for a mind that is quiet and attentive. We invite you to enter into your own mini retreat by sitting quietly and listening wholeheartedly. The teachings you're about to receive were freely offered. If you would like to make a donation to support their continuation, please visit us at dharmaseed.org.

I'm going to start by retelling one of the stories that Sharda told last night. It's a little bit of a cardinal sin among teachers, but I'll do it anyway because it's such a good story. She mentioned that there was a Zen master who was asked about the value of practice. In the version that I heard, the Zen master was asked, "What's the value of a lifetime of practice?" His response was: "Appropriate response."

When I first heard that reply, I thought that was really wimpy for a Zen master. I thought that sounded like something a Vipassana teacher might say, but that a Zen master should be much more of a warrior and say something like: "After a lifetime of practice, a Zen master is able to sit up in full lotus while dying with a perfectly straight back and compose a spontaneous haiku summing up their life's understanding." That's what I was expecting. So this "appropriate response"... I don't know.

But the more I thought about this answer, the more I appreciated it. What it says is we have to have that wakefulness in every single moment. It means that every single moment, life is presenting us with changing conditions and new situations, and we have to have the right response to meet that moment. There's no formula for that. Only the awakeness of—you could say—wisdom or awareness can bring that about. As I thought about it, this is really a beautiful way to describe the fruit of our practice.

For me, the Brahmaviharas have provided one of the best roadmaps of what constitutes an appropriate response to life. They, together with the near and far enemies, give us a whole terminology for understanding the way the heart relates to these changing conditions of life. The Brahmaviharas themselves represent the awakened response. The near and far enemies represent the not-so-awakened responses.

When you think about it, in general, the heart is open and tuning into the well-being of others—that's loving kindness. When it encounters suffering, the awakened heart responds with compassion. When it encounters happiness, the awakened heart responds with sympathetic joy. And when it's not particularly being tested, it can hold all the joys and sorrows in the beautiful balance of equanimity—the practice you did this afternoon.

The near and far enemies map out how we fall into less than awakened responses to the same changing conditions of life, the joys and sorrows. I'll touch on a couple of those as we go. Overall, I think they provide really good groundwork for evaluating our response moment after moment. It's pretty complete.

This evening, I want to talk particularly about the response of joy—appreciative joy or sympathetic joy—that's pointed to by the quality of mudita, the practice we did yesterday afternoon. As I mentioned, this has the potential for being the happiest practice among the Brahmaviharas, and in fact, the happiest practice that I know of, because it feeds on happiness. It is about happiness meeting happiness.

Just a simple example: I got a phone call from a friend I hadn't spoken to for a while. I picked up the phone, happy to hear from her, and said, "How are you?" Immediately, with a great deal of enthusiasm, she said, "I'm wonderful!" And without even thinking, sort of triggered by her voice and tone, I said, "I'm wonderful too!" I didn't even wait for her to ask me. That was the impact of mudita. I just got infused and enthused from her energy, and that's what came out of me.

So it's this beautiful double hit of happiness. It's sometimes called sympathetic joy because we resonate in sympathy with another. If you know the instrument the sitar, it's got seven main strings on top that you pluck, and then seven smaller strings underneath that are usually not plucked. Those are called the sympathetic strings. When you pluck a frequency, the strings underneath that are tuned to that resonate, and they give that rich, metallic, jangly sound that the sitar has. It's like our heart has these sympathetic strings and resonates to the happiness around us.

The Dalai Lama said that if you can be happy because of another's happiness, your odds for happiness go up by six billion to one. That's a lot better than Vegas—put your chips down, this is the bet to make. It's very helpful to cultivate this as part of your practice. Joy is a really integral part of the spiritual path.

I'll talk toward the end about how this fits into the whole Buddhist unfolding toward liberation. Joy is an integral component of the move to liberation. As you develop it, you'll see that the emphasis on joy keeps the mind inclining to what's skillful and what's wholesome. It keeps the mind in a positive and helpful state. In this way, it embodies two of the four right efforts, which are to bring about and then maintain skillful qualities of mind.

James is becoming known as the joy guru in our scene because he's been leading a class for the last couple of years in Berkeley called Awakening Joy. It was really out of generosity that he let me give the joy talk in this retreat because he's starting to own the topic. He's getting a little bit of a copyright on the subject matter, so I'm happy he let me share in it tonight.

James's class started off modestly—maybe a hundred or so the first time around—and each iteration through word of mouth and people getting tremendous benefit, it's steadily grown. So in the current class series, between people who come to Berkeley and are there in person and those participating by email, the number registered is up to 685, I think. And it's probably going to be even bigger in future, but I'll let him tell you about that.

The fact that so many people have responded to this teaching is really a sign that there's a thirst in our community of practitioners for this element. Maybe we spent too much time talking about the Four Noble Truths, suffering and craving over the years, and people want to hear a different tune now. But there is this large welling of interest and appreciation for being able to find ways to bring these qualities more to life in our daily life as well as in our retreat practice.

A big part of this bringing to life is noticing them when they're there. It's funny, but I noticed in the early days of my practice, I would consistently overlook beautiful qualities of mind because when they came, I thought, "Well, this is what I've been expecting all along. Why did you take so long in getting here?"

When you think about it, it really lines up with ego's project. We use ego to refer to this small sense of self, false sense of separate self that's based on self-centered interests. Ego's project is: things should always be happy, things should never be unhappy, not even to the slightest degree. That's the project that ego is about creating. Somehow, it believes that it can do it. Those assumptions crumple under the early days of retreat, usually. Nonetheless, it strives to maintain this fiction.

And so when happy states come, ego goes, "Yeah, that's what I was about to create." So ego is gratified, thinks its work is done, and it goes to sleep. It may only wake up again when things get difficult. The ouch kind of wakes us up and makes us realize something else is going on. So it's very important to notice.

You see, the Buddha wasn't biased in this way. He wasn't biased toward wholesome states of mind or unwholesome states of mind. His bias was on emptiness, or you could say zero. So when a wholesome state came, he recognized, "That's wholesome. That's on the positive side of the meter, helpful for spiritual practice and awakening." When a painful state came, he recognized, "That's not so skillful or helpful. That's on the difficult side of the spectrum." But he always kept his mind in the middle so he could clearly see one or the other.

We need to develop this skill also so that when wholesome states come, when the beautiful states come, we really know: this is loving-kindness. This is contentment. This is joy. The more we recognize them, feel them in the body and in the mind, the more we learn the way back to them. And so the more possible it is that they will visit again. We become familiar and on good terms with them.

As the Buddha put it, "What one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind." So as we turn the mind in this direction, these beautiful states come to visit more often.

I was really struck by the power of mudita last fall. I'd taught a long retreat on the east coast and then after that retreat, I stayed on and with two of my friends taught a weekend retreat—silent retreat—on this theme of mudita practice. A lot of the people who came had never practiced mudita before, and I'd never taught it intensively before. Part of the reason I did it is I wanted to learn about it.

So people were just there for two days, from Friday night to Sunday evening. You know what the first two days of a retreat are like. The first day is all sleepiness, so that's difficult. And the last day, as you probably noticed, starts to be about going home. So you're not much present on the first and last day, and I didn't have many expectations for the weekend, because it was a first day and a last day.

But very curiously, people really applied themselves and got tremendous benefit from just two days of practice with this. At the end of the retreat, we just asked in the hall like this, "What was your experience of these two days?" One woman raised her hand and said, "This is the happiest that I've felt in years based on these two days of practice."

Since that retreat, I started practicing mudita a lot in my daily life, and I noticed that it made a real difference—that my mind started to focus on the beautiful and uplifting qualities of life.

So one evening I sat in front of his photograph and I told him my troubles. I said, "Your Holiness, I'm really struggling here. The conditions are difficult, I'm homesick, and my spirits are quite low. What should I do?"

And as I sat there looking at his photograph, I could almost hear his response. I could imagine him saying, with that characteristic laugh of his, "Well, you have a choice. You can focus on all the difficulties and be miserable, or you can focus on what an extraordinary opportunity this is and be joyful."

And I realized he was absolutely right. Here I was, sitting in a monastery in Burma that very few Westerners ever get to visit, studying with a master teacher, ordained as a monk in the tradition that goes back to the Buddha himself. I was receiving teachings that have been passed down for twenty-five hundred years. What an incredible privilege this was!

So I started practicing mudita more intentionally. I began to focus on my good fortune rather than my difficulties. I felt appreciative joy for the opportunity to be there, for the teachings I was receiving, for the ancient tradition I was participating in. And when I shifted my attention in this way, my whole experience transformed.

The rain didn't stop. The bugs didn't leave. My robes continued to slip. But my relationship to all of this changed completely. Instead of seeing obstacles, I began to see the richness of the experience. The sound of rain on the roof became soothing rather than depressing. The bugs became fascinating creatures to observe. Even struggling with my robes became part of the authentic monastic experience.

This is the power of mudita - it can completely transform our experience by shifting where we place our attention. When we focus on what's difficult and challenging, that's what fills our mind. But when we consciously direct our attention toward what's beautiful, fortunate, and worthy of appreciation, that becomes our reality instead.

So the practice isn't about denying difficulties or pretending everything is wonderful when it's not. It's about recognizing that we have a choice in where we focus our attention, and that this choice has profound consequences for how we experience our lives.

So I turned to the Dalai Lama photograph and spoke directly to him. "I'm having a hard time," I said. "Do you have any advice for me?"

Immediately, he replied. His voice came through in that peculiar Indian-accented English that he had. "Hmm, yes," he said. "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Then the transmission ended.

It was a very clear message, and because it had come from such a good source, I took it as a practice instruction. For the next period of time, I often worked at keeping my mind cheerful, optimistic, and confident—if I could even remember what cheerful felt like, which wasn't so easy. When I could bring these qualities to mind, it made a real shift in the way I was relating to the situation.

The fact is that this cheerfulness, this optimism, this confidence exists in each of us if we can only remember it. Sometimes I could bring it up simply by thinking of it, by turning my mind toward it. When I did, it transformed how I felt in those difficult conditions.

This capacity becomes a tremendous refuge as we develop it. We discover that we can turn our mind to these uplifting qualities, and the mind learns more and more how to go there, how to touch them and bring them alive in the present moment.

The Dalai Lama, of course, is a pretty happy person himself, as you probably know. A friend told me a story about a gathering of scientists that took place in Dharamsala, where he lives. It was sponsored by the Mind and Life Institute—every year, a group of scientists meets with His Holiness to discuss the intersection between Buddhism and science. In recent years, they've been focusing on neuroscience, with fascinating research emerging from that collaboration.

During a tea break between the formal sessions, there was a chance for informal conversation. One of the scientists approached the Dalai Lama with a personal question: "Your Holiness, what was the happiest time of your life?"

It was such an intriguing question to pose to the Dalai Lama, given his varied life. You might think of his childhood, growing up with his parents in a small village in the Tibetan countryside—a very idyllic lifestyle. Or perhaps after he was recognized and brought to Lhasa, installed as the Dalai Lama, living in the Potala while Tibetan Buddhism was still vibrantly alive and flourishing, being tutored and learning deeply.

I was hanging on the edge of my seat for the answer—the happiest period of the Dalai Lama's life. Without any hesitation, my friend said, he answered: "Hmm, I think right now."

That's the right answer. That's absolutely the right answer.

As we cultivate the quality of mudita, we begin to tune into happiness in our life and in the lives of others. We start to become familiar with the different kinds of happiness that are available to us.

One happiness available to us as laypeople is the happiness of sense pleasures—pleasant experiences of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. This encompasses good food and pleasant music, enjoyable drinks and sensuality, movies and the arts, sculpture and painting. All of these form the basis of pleasurable experiences through the five senses.

This is part of our life. As laypeople, the Buddha referred to this reality over and over again. In choosing this life, we open ourselves to pleasant experiences on these levels. If we wanted to cut ourselves off from sense pleasures, we might as well live the life of a renunciate, because in the renunciate life, one deliberately does not seek out pleasures of the physical senses in order to turn the attention more completely inward.

But as laypeople, we are open to the pleasures of the senses. Take a look and see if these experiences don't have an uplifting quality in your life. In spiritual circles, we often dismiss sense pleasures because the truth is that the pleasures of meditation and Dharma practice, of realization, are greater than sense pleasures and more reliable. But this does not negate the happiness that comes from the pleasures of the senses.

Please notice in your life the uplift that pleasurable activities bring into your hearts and minds. This is one of the things we can enjoy. We learn that they're temporary and we learn their happiness is limited, but the happiness nonetheless is real.

Here on retreat, our sense pleasures are much simpler, but they're still present. You know—waking up in the morning when it's a little cool in the residence halls and maybe your window's been open all night, but there's a hot shower waiting for you. Or rolling down the hill for breakfast when it's been raining and it's a little damp and chilly, and there's a hot cup of tea for you. Going down the hill at lunchtime to discover this beautiful meal we had today with all kinds of spices and great flavors.

And then one of the greatest pleasures in retreat life for me was lying down at the end of the day. That was sometimes the moment I looked forward to all day long.

There were days like that. I just couldn't wait to lie down at the end of the day. And the only thing that was really disappointing was how short it lasted. Because I'd be really tired, I'd fall asleep like that, and the next thing I knew I was waking up to start all over again the next morning. But that's a delightful feeling, lying down at the end of a good day of work.

As you get into this lifestyle, this really simple lifestyle, you may have noticed that the senses get even more awake. Simple pleasures bring a lot of delight. Some of my favorite meals on retreats have just been the taste of an orange or a cup of tea after days in retreat, because it tastes so rich. The Buddha mentioned this too. He said that robes, alms food, a hut, and a straw seat will seem rich and luxurious to one who has renounced. I'm appreciating how our senses really wake up in this setting and we're much more open here.

It goes more deeply. Another kind of happiness that we start to tune into is the happiness of good conduct. When we live a life according to the precepts that we talked about at the beginning of the retreat, we enjoy what the Buddha called the bliss of blamelessness. You come in to meditate and you find you don't have as many regrets about your actions as you once did at an earlier time in your life.

James mentioned the list of his ten most awful mistakes. I also had a list in my early retreat. I only aimed for ten, but I filled ten quite easily and went through a lot of remorse about those. As the years go by, and I've worked consciously to practice with non-harming, that list is more remote, a lot shorter. And when I come to sit, there's an easier settling now than there used to be. The Buddha said that of the blessings of the lay life, the bliss of blamelessness is the greatest—to have a good feeling about the way we've acted toward others.

There's the joy of nature. After I ordained as a monk the first time in Thailand, I went to practice in a monastery that was in the north, outside of Chiang Mai. It was right out in the country. It was a beautiful spot. The monastery was set at the base of a river gorge. There was this river running through it and tall hills on both sides, cliffs on both sides. The nuns' kutis were on one side of the river and the monks' kutis were on the other. So no dilly-dallying, for sure.

The Thai people being so hospitable gave me the best hut on the property, which was the one most upstream. From it, I couldn't see or hear any other people. So it was a very beautiful setting, very isolated, very quiet and private.

But there were challenges in that environment. I was there for three months to practice. There was a teacher, but the teacher didn't speak English and I didn't speak Thai. So we had no way to communicate. For three months of intensive practice, I didn't have any interviews and I didn't have any dharma talks. It really was quite self-reliant. The teacher would occasionally come up to bring visitors up to my kuti, and usually I'd be meditating, which was good. They'd stand outside my hut and look in through the windows, and the teacher would see me meditating, and all I'd hear, or all I could understand him saying was, "Dee, dee," which means "good, good" in Thai. So I felt grateful I was meditating at that point in time. But that was about all the confirmation I got around my practice.

What really sustained me and kept my spirits good during that time was the beauty of the nature that I was in. Every day, seeing the sun climb over one of those cliffs and flood the gorge with sunshine, and at the end of the day disappear, and the constant sound of the stream outside my hut. There was also a beautiful mango tree growing near my house. It was mango season, so the ripe mangoes were falling on the ground and that beautiful perfume. Unfortunately, I couldn't eat them. As a monk, you're only allowed to take what a human being has put into your hands. So I couldn't even collect the fallen mangoes, but they smelled great. It was poignant for me too.

Here the nature is so available. I've been in a number of meditation spots around the world and I don't think I've ever been in one that has the combination of architectural beauty and natural beauty that this place has. It makes it a very special place to practice. Of course between the two I would always pick the natural over the architectural. So you can open so wonderfully to the nature around here—the golden hills, the vivid blue sky, those white clouds, the deer who seem so less afraid here than they are anywhere else that I run into them.

This is a poem by Mary Oliver called "The Sun":

Have you ever seen anything in your life more wonderful than the way the sun every evening, relaxed and easy, floats toward the horizon and into the clouds or the hills or the rumpled sea and is gone? And how it slides again out of the blackness every morning on the other side of the world like a red flower streaming upward on its heavenly oils. And have you ever felt for anything such wild love? Do you think there is anywhere in any language a word billowing enough for the pleasure that fills you as the sun reaches out, as it warms you, as you stand there empty-handed? Or have you too turned from this world? Or have you too gone crazy for power, for things?

Here we really have the time, the chance, just to be with nature, just to open to it. And this opening is augmented by another of the joys that comes from retreat: the joy of concentration or stillness. I trust that each of you has found this to some degree during your days here—times when the mind settles just a little from its usual whirl, when you can drop into your heart and feel that metta connection with yourself or another.

These different levels of peace were the hook that kept me coming back on retreat. I'd touch a level that I'd never touched in my daily life. I'd go, "Wow, that is so amazing. If that's possible, I wonder what else is possible." So I'd go back again and see. Then I found an even deeper level of peace. And I would come back again to see what else was possible.

The Buddha said that these levels of peace—basically the delight of them—is that the hindrances have fallen away. The mind is not stirred by liking and disliking, by pushing and pulling. He said being released from the hindrances like this is like being let out of prison after a long term in a cell. It's really a wonderful, joyful feeling.

In the mudita practice, we come again and again to appreciate the joy in a friend's life. When I started doing my practice of mudita over the winter, a good friend was in a five-month retreat on the East Coast—someone for whom retreat is the happiest activity in their life. So as I was sitting in meditation and doing mudita, I would think about them sitting in meditation on the other side of the country, being so fulfilled in their activity, and that would just pick me up. Finding a friend who has something wonderful going on is a great support for joy arising in our own heart.

And then we open to mudita for all beings. This can be quite a trip. I came across a video on YouTube that many of you may have seen, called "Free Hugs." What happened was this guy in Australia got the idea to go into a shopping mall in Sydney with a big sign on which he had written in capital letters: "FREE HUGS." He stood in the middle of the shopping mall and just held the sign up. How much nerve would it take to do something like that? That's not something I would think of doing offhand.

A local rock group got inspired by this and wrote a song and made a music video based on this concept of free hugs. That's what's on YouTube now. In the video, you see many people walking by who look at this guy like he's kind of crazy. "What is this guy doing? Is he a weirdo? Is he a sicko? Something really strange is going on here." They don't want to get too close. They walk around so they don't get near him.

Then some brave souls take the plunge. They take it at face value and go up and hug him, and they laugh afterwards. Because honestly, the idea of hugging a stranger in a shopping mall is kind of weird, isn't it? It really is weird. But once one person starts and takes the plunge, other people come up and do it, and the energy becomes contagious. Pretty soon people are laughing and smiling. There are guys skateboarding by and running into him on their boards, and you just feel the contagious joy of it all.

This movement has taken off and spread. Now there are free hug videos from Japan and Israel and Europe—it's all over the world. There's this international movement now. You don't have to be a shopper in Sydney anymore to have free hugs.

One of the things I like to reflect on—as we talked about a little the other day—is that virtually every human being, whatever their circumstances, whatever their condition, has some happiness in their life. This exploration is very rewarding: checking this out and seeing if it's true with your friends, even the ones who are going through a hard time.

See if there's not something that lifts their heart at different points in their routine, in their days, in their weeks.

I had a vivid example of this on a metta retreat a few years ago. There was a practitioner on the retreat from Manchester, England. Manchester is not one of the happiest cities on the face of the earth—one of those northern industrial cities where the weather is bad, the winters are brutally cold, and the architecture is old and gray.

Yet she was a lovely person, and her job in Manchester was helping to transition refugees who had come from third world countries to England. These refugees had fled their homelands to escape imprisonment, torture, or death—primarily because of their political or social views. Here were women from the third world, mostly warm countries, who had been forced to leave their culture, their families, their familiar lives, and move to this cold gray northern city to adapt to a completely foreign existence. This woman was helping them transition into that new life.

I asked her, "Could you find some mudita in their lives? Could you find joy in their experience?"

"Absolutely," she replied. "That was one of the most amazing things about these women. Their spirits were so resilient. Even in the midst of all the difficulties they were dealing with, they maintained this remarkably optimistic and positive outlook as they created their new lives there."

Reflecting on that sometimes makes me feel a little humble. When I find myself grumbling about not getting enough protein at tea time, I think, "Wow. Things could be a lot tougher than that."

So as you practice mudita, remember you want to tune into what makes the other person happy, not necessarily what would make you happy.

When we first bought the land here at Spirit Rock in 1987, we inherited an old horse who had been a quarter horse on this property, rounding up cattle and running up and down these hills for years. The land had been leased for cattle before we owned it. The previous owner didn't want to take him, so we did. You know where the horse field is now—he lived there for about the first fifteen years that we owned the place. He died about five years ago. His name was Bob. Bob the Quarter Horse.

My wife is a horse person, so she took on the care of looking after him. At that time, there was no other horse in that field—just old Bob, literally out to pasture. She would come down every morning to make sure he had feed and water and was healthy.

In the winter, the horse trough where he got his water would freeze over on cold mornings, so she'd have to break through the ice. Sometimes when it was so wet in winter that the ground would never dry, he'd get abscesses in his foot, and she'd have to lift his foot and soak it in a bucket of hot water with Epsom salts. Getting a horse to stand still while you lift their hind leg into a bucket with Epsom salts is not the easiest maneuver. Sally did it happily every day because she loves horses.

It would not have been my cup of tea. But I could appreciate her connection to nature and to horses while she did that.

A few years later, we had skunks who came into the crawl space underneath our house. It was winter, and they were looking for a dry place to shelter. They particularly enjoyed bouncing up and down on our furnace at about two in the morning—the sound would reverberate through the aluminum casing. Other evenings, around three in the morning, we'd be awakened by this rich, musky smell drifting up through our bedroom, and we'd know the skunks were down there.

Mudita was not exactly my initial response, but I was able to appreciate the fact that they were warm and dry until we could manage to move them on to more natural habitats.

The far enemy of mudita is envy. This occurs when we look at somebody else's happiness and our heart doesn't go into uplift. When I went into the Peace Corps shortly after college, I broke up with my girlfriend in order to go. I was in Malaysia teaching, and a few months after I'd arrived, I got a letter from my best friend telling me that he and my ex-girlfriend had gotten together and were in a relationship.

Joy was not the first emotion that I felt on that occasion.

Similarly, sometimes when we hear reports of friends who are doing really well, it may be difficult to feel that quality of joy for them. Maybe a friend buys a house and we haven't yet been able to do that. Or somebody gets a promotion at work or some kind of recognition that we might have liked to have ourselves. It may not be so easy to feel mudita for a colleague in such circumstances.

Because of this, some teachers say that mudita is the hardest of the brahmaviharas to practice—as though with somebody getting more happiness, there's not enough left over for us. It's like there's a finite pool, and if they get that much...

We don't have enough. But actually what I think is going on underneath that is some kind of comparing mind. If somebody is doing really well, we take that as meaning, oh, they're a better person—or maybe they're better than I am. So instead of simply observing that they're experiencing more good fortune in one area of their life, we frame it as a hierarchical situation: it must mean they're better than I am. But that assumption is simply mistaken. You cannot compare two people based on just one quality.

This same mechanism operates in the near enemy to compassion. The near enemy to compassion is pity. If you consider what pity actually is, it's a way of looking down on somebody. It's like saying, "I'm sorry things are going hard for you, but I don't have that problem." We use it as a way to distance ourselves from the other person, which gives us a sense of superiority based on the fact that things are going better in our life than in theirs.

When we view joy and sorrow through this lens, we can use the comparing mind to position ourselves either up or down. But as the Buddha said, these comparisons are deluded. This is precisely why these are called the enemies of the brahma-vihara states.

As we turn the practice of mudita toward ourselves, what really emerges, in my experience, is the quality of gratitude. Gratitude is a truly beautiful state where we appreciate our own blessings because, first, it doesn't encourage wanting—we become aware of how many gifts we already have. And second, it doesn't encourage disliking because we recognize the abundance that is there. So it's a very skillful state of mind that deflects both desire and aversion.

A friend of ours is a wise teacher and also a grandmother. One Christmas day, she called up her granddaughter, who was probably about five or six at the time, and asked, "Did you get a lot of presents today?" The granddaughter said, "Yeah, it was great!" And the grandmother asked, "Well, when you get lots of presents, does it make you thankful for what you have, or do you want more?" The little girl replied, "Oh, Nana, I want more!" And the grandmother simply said, "Oh, that's too bad."

The little girl was listening and caught something in her tone. She said, "Well, what do you mean?" So the grandmother explained, "Haven't you noticed that when you want more, it doesn't feel so good? And when you're happy with what you've got, it feels really good?" The little girl paused and said, "Oh, Nana, you're right!"

This is a beautifully simple teaching on gratitude. It feels good when we can find that place where we appreciate all the blessings we have. And all of us here have so many things to be grateful for.

A friend of mine worked in a refugee camp in Thailand. He was training teachers who were educating refugees coming from Laos and Cambodia because of the wars, often from the hill tribes of those countries, as they prepared for relocation to the United States. Coming from a very simple hill tribe life, they had to learn things like how to use money, what coins were, how a toaster worked, what a washing machine was, how to read a bus schedule. They were learning these basic Western skills in the camps.

As part of his discussions with people in the camp, my friend once asked a teenage girl, "What are the most important things in life for you?" She replied, "The most important things in life are fire, rice, and water."

Those would be the most important things for us too, if we didn't have them. But because they are so readily available to us, we tend to take them for granted. If we just step back and consider all the human beings on the planet who don't have adequate food, clothing, shelter, or medicine, we begin to realize how fortunate we are that all of us in this room were well-fed today. Most of us, I suspect, have reasonable access to healthcare if we're ill. Probably most of us have a roof over our heads to go home to. These are all basic blessings that I think most of us enjoy.

And beyond this, we also possess something that Tibetans, from a Buddhist perspective, call a precious human birth. This refers to the circumstances and situations that have allowed us to be where we are today. We were born at a time when the teachings of liberation were available, when there were people practicing the authentic teachings of liberation, when there were people sharing them, when our minds were clear enough to open to and appreciate those teachings, and when we have the leisure time to practice toward our own liberation.

When you consider this constellation of circumstances, there are not many people on the planet who have all of these conditions aligned. So there are many, many blessings for every one of us in this hall.

Toward the end of a retreat, gratitude is something that gets mentioned frequently. I heard it several times in the interviews today. I encourage you to turn your mind toward gratitude as it arises over these days. Let that feeling grow within you.

One of the people here tonight started a very beautiful practice of gratitude.

Started it and reported it to a class that we were all doing and then it sort of spread from there and now a number of people have picked it up. And that is at the end of each day, would email one or two things that he was grateful about to a buddy, his gratitude buddy. And the gratitude buddy would do the same. So that at the end of every day, there would be this practice before going to bed, emailing to your buddy one or two things you were grateful for that day, and do it as a daily practice. And so that helps to just turn the mind regularly to the things that we appreciate in our life.

On one retreat, I made a list, because my mind was getting a little bit aversive, I made a list of all the things I was grateful for in my life because I wanted to offset that aversion. So I just took half an hour and just wrote down on one page of paper line after line of the things that I appreciated in my life. And they just kept coming and coming. The more I reflected on it, the more of them came out. And then during that retreat, I'd pick that paper up and read it every morning. And that would kind of set the tone for my day. It's a wonderful thing to do to focus on this quality of gratitude.

One of the things I often feel grateful for, and I know a lot of you do too, is gratitude that this path exists. Grateful that there is a clear way to move from suffering to freedom, and all we need to do is walk it, that the instructions are there. And in thinking about gratefulness, how did you get turned on to this path? Have you ever thought about that? What led you into practice, spiritual life at all? Not necessarily this Buddhist path, but a spiritual path, a spiritual life. Think about the people who kind of helped nudge you that way.

It may seem kind of like chance. Wow, it was just an accident. I saw a sign in the health food store for a meditation class. Or one of my good friends had had an experience and suggested that I come along and check it out. It may seem kind of random.

And in fact, you may know people from a very similar background to you, similar growing up or education or work or something like that, similar temperament, who never found their way into a path. How does that happen?

I don't think it's just random. You know, I think this is part of the movement of what in an earlier age we might have called fate or destiny. But from a Buddhist point of view, I think we could call karma. There's something in our past actions that has predisposed us all in this direction.

This is from the Chippewa Native American tradition: Sometimes I go around pitying myself while all the time I'm being carried across the vast sky by great winds.

We don't know the great winds that are taking care of our lives. We don't know the combination of forces that have brought us here. But we can trust that those forces are at work. And use that as part of our faith and confidence.

Then I want to just close by describing the role of joy in the overall path to liberation. The Buddha described this in a discourse called the Discourse on the Links in the Samyutta Nikaya. He said that difficulty in life leads to our questioning, which leads to faith, and that faith leads to joy. That's an interesting connection, isn't it? That suffering is a link that brings us into joy. As we start to question, we start to get a sense that the path exists. That is a joyful place.

Then this joy starts to bring our interest into the present moment. As the present moment gets inviting and rich, the mind collects in this level of interest and alertness called piti in Pali or rapture in English. And this is another quality that increases the sense of delight, so much so that we learn that we can start to trust in that. And it settles down some of the wandering of the mind.

And this quality of delight in the dharma leads to tranquilizing of our mind and body. And as the tranquilizing happens in mind and body, we come to a different level of a kind of delight called happiness. The Pali word is sukha. Another word is contentment. I like this word sukha because it sounds kind of like sugar. And sukha is a very sweet state of mind.

So this joyful interest has risen into energy, then pacified through tranquility and settled out into this deep state of contentment called sukha or happiness. And in this state of sukha or happiness, the mind starts to find its contentment from within itself. When joy was arising, the mind tended to find its happiness outside. It'd be through the beauty of nature, the faith in the three gems, beauty of beings, qualities of heart. But as it settles into us, the mind finds its peace within itself, finds its contentment in itself and no longer has to reach out, looking outside itself.

That collects the mind to a yet deeper level of what's called concentration, a state of deep stillness, relaxation, ease, peacefulness inside. And as the mind gets so stilled and peaceful in that way, and then it investigates the nature of the mind and body and of life, then from that place, the liberating insights can come through. And from the liberating insights, the heart is freed.

So joy plays a role in a few different places along this path—an energizing role in the beginning of waking us up, tuning us into the beauty of life, collecting the attention in the moment, and then settling out into this deep contentment from which insight arises. As we progress on the path, these qualities all come more and more alive for us, qualities of joy and contentment, and we feel that we're living life from a much richer, more satisfied, more heartfelt, happier place.

The Buddha said something really interesting about this growth of happiness in the path. He said one of the things that he never lost sight of in his whole practice career was not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind. I was kind of shocked when I first heard that, because when I began practice, if I could have found consistent wholesome states of mind, I would have been really happy.

The Buddha said, don't settle just for wholesome states of mind, but use the wholesome states of mind as the foundation for the heart's liberation. Because more is possible. Further development is possible. The complete end of suffering is possible for us.

And he expressed this most clearly in another discourse called The Simile of the Heartwood, where he said that the goal of this holy life is not virtue or fame or the peace of concentration or even insight. But he said it is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end.

This is what our Vipassana practice is aiming for. This is what our metta practice is contributing to. Nothing less than the full liberation of our hearts and minds.

Let's just sit together for a moment in silence, please.

It is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end.

CHAPTER 274

The Five Aggregates Are Empty

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as a direct path to understanding emptiness and liberation from suffering. Drawing from the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta (SN 22.95), "A Mass of Foam," Armstrong explains how the Buddha compared each aggregate to insubstantial phenomena: form like foam, feeling like bubbles, perception like a mirage, formations like a hollow banana tree, and consciousness like a magic show.
>
> The talk systematically explores each of the five khandhas: rūpa (material form), vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (mental formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). Armstrong demonstrates how this analytical framework reveals the absence of any permanent self or "I" within our experience, challenging our ordinary perception of solid, separate existence.
>
> Through vivid personal anecdotes and practical examples, Armstrong illustrates how deep investigation of the aggregates leads to the liberating insight that phenomena are empty of inherent existence—appearing solid but actually insubstantial, like a magical display. He connects this understanding to the Heart Sutra's teaching that perceiving the emptiness of the five aggregates saves us from suffering. This teaching offers both intellectual understanding and practical guidance for meditation, showing how wisdom (paññā) arises through direct investigation of our moment-to-moment experience.

The Five Aggregates Are Empty

The Buddha said many times that he only taught for one purpose: to understand suffering and the end of suffering. All of his teachings were directed to that end, and I hope we can hold tonight's talk in that spirit. The Buddha didn't construct philosophies in order to have intellectual debates with people. Tonight's teaching is meant to be useful in the direction of leading us out of suffering. Because it may get a little technical at points, I hope you will hold it in that spirit, which basically means take what seems useful from it and leave behind what doesn't. You don't have to argue with the Buddha. If you don't agree, you can just leave his thoughts to one side. Take what is useful and leave the rest.

In one of his key teachings called Dependent Origination, the Buddha traced the origin of our suffering back to this condition in the mind called ignorance. He said that because of not understanding things the way they really are—which is the factor of ignorance—we crave. And then craving becomes the direct result of suffering. He expressed their relationship in this way: "Obstructed by ignorance and driven by craving, beings have been wandering in this samsara since beginningless time."

Tonight's talk is going to touch on both these topics of ignorance and craving. Basically, we suffer because we don't understand things the way they really are, and we live in some degree of delusion. The Buddha expressed this in a very pithy way at one point when he said of us as uninstructed beings: "In whatever way they conceive, the truth is ever other than that." One of my teachers put it in a slightly more direct way. He said, "Everything you think is wrong."

So that's what we're going to explore tonight. And that's why this quality of don't-know mind, which was mentioned in the questions this morning, is so helpful. We often think, because of clinging to views—a tendency that we all have—we often think that we know the way things are, and we forget that we don't yet know everything. So it's helpful to remind ourselves that we don't yet know everything. I like this line from a Rumi poem: "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." This is a good spirit in which to approach our meditation.

Wisdom is the faculty that leads us to see clearly the way things truly are. The unfolding of this faculty and the insights that it brings are really the heart of what our meditation is about. So we're encouraged to investigate our experience in this very direct and penetrating way to find out how things really are. We need to keep a fresh and open attitude as we look, understanding that we don't yet know everything, and that's part of the reason for our bondage.

One of the questions for investigation that was also mentioned this morning in the question period was this basic question that can be phrased in a few different ways: Who am I? What am I? The form that I particularly like is: What is this? What is this—meaning the totality of our human experience. What is it really that's going on here? How does it hang together? How does it work? This is really what our practice is leading us to investigate.

Typically, in our current state, when we look at ourselves or someone else, we see a person. But one of our ancient texts, the Visuddhimagga, said this is a very uninformed way to view other beings. They said it's as though a skilled butcher was carving up the carcass of a cow. And in carving it up into different slices of meat, the butcher was saying, "cow, cow, cow," when in fact the butcher carves it up and says, "tenderloin, rump, sirloin, ribs," and like that. So this text says that a person who says "person" is similarly uninformed, and that one who has directly investigated with some depth this mind-body process would not say "person" any longer.

So what would one say? When the Buddha looked at a human being, he saw in one of two ways—at least he described in one of two ways. The first is in terms of the six senses. Let me read you an excerpt from one of the suttas:

"Bhikkhus"—bhikkhu means monk, but it also means anybody who's undertaking serious practice, so all of us for this week come under this heading of bhikkhu —"Bhikkhus, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life."

That's pretty bold, isn't it? I don't recall Marx doing that, Freud doing that, or Einstein doing that.

So here's the Buddha on the totality of life: "It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and touches, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality of life would not be speaking of something they knew about."

This is a profound description, isn't it? It encompasses the six senses and their objects, mapping beautifully onto our human experience and our meditation practice. We've been doing extensive exploration of the senses and their corresponding objects. The Buddha used this model primarily to instruct people in cutting through craving.

For cutting through ignorance, he more often employed the model of the five aggregates. This offers another way to describe the totality of our experience, but sliced differently. As we tune into this framework of the five aggregates, we begin to see the world, see human beings, see our own experience the way the Buddha saw. Understanding and seeing in this way leads toward a liberated mind because it provides a way of perceiving that does not include the I, the ego, or the false sense of self as part of the description. It is a non-ego-centered way of viewing our life.

Though this talk may sound philosophical and intellectual, I want to share that my own investigation and reflections along these lines have been one of the largest sources of freedom in my meditation practice. This is something I've worked with extensively and that has had a profound effect in my life.

The five aggregates—the Pali term we're translating as aggregate is khandha. Many of you may know it by the Sanskrit term, which is skandha. It's simply a common word in Pali and ancient Indian languages meaning heap or bundle. Nothing esoteric or spiritual about it. If you went out to collect twigs for firewood and gathered them up, you'd call that a khandha of twigs or firewood. It means a bundle, a collection, a gathering.

When I hear the word "aggregate," it sounds rather technical to me—something that would be hard to wrap my mind around, requiring long contemplation before understanding. It reminds me of road-building material. The word "components" might be better, though even that feels somewhat technical. The translation I prefer is "kinds of stuff." These are the five kinds of stuff that make up human experience.

To name them: form (or material form), feeling (sometimes called feeling tone to be more specific), perception, mental formations (sometimes just formations), and consciousness.

Let me describe each briefly. Material form translates the Pali word rupa. Sometimes rupa is translated as body, but that's incomplete—it's much broader. For instance, this statue behind me is sometimes called a Buddha rupa, like the body or form of the Buddha. But rupa as it applies to our experience encompasses the whole of physical nature. Sometimes it's described as materiality, the realm of matter, or material form. I'll mostly use the short word "form," but understand what we're pointing to.

Here's the Buddha's definition: "Any kind of material form whatever, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—this is the material form aggregate." It's all of physical nature, including this body, but rupa doesn't divide the physical world into "this" and "everything else." It simply sees all matter as part of the material form aggregate. Notice the phrase "internal or external"—in this categorization, there's no division into this particular part of the physical world we call "my body" and another part we might call "your body." It's all simply part of form.

Beyond sights, rupa includes other kinds of interaction among physical matter—sounds, smells, tastes, and touches. All fall under the aggregate of form. I find it interesting that we take this body for granted as perhaps the most important object in the universe. We've been very close to it for a long time, yet the way we know it is primarily through sight and touch. Of course, we can also smell it, taste it, and sometimes hear it, though most of those experiences aren't particularly pleasant. Nonetheless, they're available to us. But primarily, this thing we call body—which we take so for granted and cherish so deeply—we know because we've seen it and touched it. These are the two main avenues to knowing this form we hold so dear.

I'll use sound as an example throughout the evening to illustrate the other aggregates.

When you hear the sound now, that is an example of form or rupa, and we'll come back to that again with the other aggregates.

So I'd like to read from a sutta in an ancient book of the Buddha's called the Samyutta Nikaya. This teaching is called "A Mass of Foam," where he describes the nature of the aggregates.

This is the opening of the sutta:

"On one occasion, the Blessed One—which is another name for the Buddha—was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There, the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great mass of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a mass of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is—whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a bhikkhu inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?'"

The next of the five aggregates is called feeling, or more often I might say feeling tone. The Pali word is vedanā, and the term feeling here is not used as a synonym for emotion. It's a particular quality of every sense experience we have which has a nature of being either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral in this element called feeling tone.

So when you experience a sensation in the body, a sound that reaches the ear, a sight that you see, an emotion or a thought, each of these will have a feeling tone associated with them which may be pleasant, unpleasant, or neither. This quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neither is what's referred to by feeling tone or vedanā. It accompanies every type of sense experience.

Interestingly, the feeling tone is said to be a mental phenomenon, and all the other four aggregates are mental in nature.

When you hear the sound of the bell—that's a nice tone. Most of us would experience that as pleasant. Now, especially because it comes at the end of a sitting, it becomes really pleasant. So that's a little bit conditioned. Some of our reception of phenomena as being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither is conditional. That's a way of saying it's not intrinsic to the object itself, but it's our mind's relationship to it that creates it. And that's why vedanā is considered a mental quality or factor and not physical.

I'll give you an example of this. There was a 7-Eleven down in Southern California that was having problems with young people hanging around outside in the parking lot and dealing drugs. They were not a particularly welcoming crowd to the customers that the 7-Eleven wanted to draw in, so they were wondering how they could get them to move off their parking lot to somewhere else to do their drug dealing. They tried asking them politely and it didn't work. They tried other forms of harassment, and they didn't work.

So the idea they had was to play some music. The music they chose was Mantovani. Now, my mother brought me up playing Mantovani. You may know the swelling strings often applied to sentimental movie soundtracks. This was the nature of Mantovani's recordings, and she liked it very much. The drug dealers didn't. And so as they cranked up the volume on the Mantovani, the drug dealers found somewhere else to do their business. It was very successful.

So what my mother found as pleasant feeling tone, the drug dealers found as very unpleasant. So this is a mental phenomenon that happens with every sense experience that we encounter.

The third of the aggregates, the second mental aggregate after feeling tone, is called perception. The Pali word is saññā. In Buddhism, this word may be used a little differently than it is in Western language. It's been so long since I've looked at it outside of Buddhist context, I'm not entirely sure. But I have some sense that in Western language, or maybe even Western philosophy, perception will refer to a datum of sense experience. So we might talk about the perception of that sound as being the sound itself.

In Buddhism, the term is used differently, and this is pretty universal across all the schools of Buddhism that I know. The term saññā is almost always translated as perception, but the meaning of it is more like recognition. So that when we hear a sound, we recognize it as a sound—and in fact, the sound of a bell. When a friend walks up to us and we recognize them as being our friend, we know their name—that is a moment of recognition that is called perception.

As you look around the room right now, you may be seeing things as I do, which is perceiving in the space in front of us objects like women, chairs, men, cushions, floor, ceiling, fans, lights. These are acts of perception. Another way to say it is classification or categorization—taking what is essentially just a smear of form and shape and color and organizing it into categories that we recognize and know, which we then call objects.

Now, we've been doing this for so long and it's so habituated that we normally are not even aware that this is taking place. Sometimes, but rarely, we come upon something that we can't perceive and then we realize, oh, the brain is stuck here. I was in a monastery in Burma...

It was the first night I was visiting, and it was a very large monastery. They were feeding about 800 people a day out of the kitchen. I'd come in toward the evening, and they offered me some food, bringing me into the kitchen.

When I walked into this big kitchen with its stone floor, there was a mound of something sitting there. All I could tell was that it was green and it was a mound. Beyond that, I could not place it in any category I knew. I didn't know if it was vegetable or mineral. I presumed it wasn't a living animal, though they have some big frogs over there, so you never know.

I looked at it for a while and finally had to ask somebody, "What is that?" It turned out to be some kind of pea or bean that the laypeople had been shelling to prepare for the next day's lunch, stacking them up in this big pile. But I couldn't tell. I couldn't recognize the peas or beans, couldn't see the shapes of the individual ones. I realized then that my perception had stopped at this point.

Sometimes we don't necessarily perceive things accurately. I was doing a long retreat here one fall, walking meditation down the hill from the meditation hall on the grassy area. As I walked very slowly back and forth, quite present, I started to hear this marching band coming up Pleasant Street. That stopped me. I just stopped and listened, thinking, "Why would a marching brass band be coming up toward IMS in the middle of autumn?" I sat and listened—I could definitely hear drums and brass instruments, and couldn't think what else would be making that sound. It kept getting louder and louder, just as though it was approaching.

Finally I turned around, and one of the staff members was wheeling a garden cart with big bicycle tires down the gravel path. It was the garden cart bouncing, the tires bouncing up and down on the gravel that was making all the sounds I was hearing as a brass band. My perception was not right. It wasn't a brass band.

That wasn't really problematic—I could simply turn around and see it. But the Buddha said where it becomes problematic is that we perceive things as being permanent that in fact are going to change. We perceive things as being a self that in fact don't have a self. Because of these misperceptions, we suffer. We'll talk more about that as we go.

It may be hard to remember a time when we couldn't perceive the world the way we do now. We forget that it's a learned activity. Many of you understand this much better than I do, but there's an interesting story that Oliver Sacks tells about working with a patient who was an adult who had lost his vision as an infant and then had it restored as an adult man through surgery.

When they took the bandages off, everybody thought the patient would exclaim, "Wow, how great to see again!" In fact, he had no idea what he was seeing. After some time of the patient waking up and looking blankly out at what Sacks called "an unimaginable tangle," the surgeon finally spoke to him. Only at that point did he realize that the white blur in front of his eyes must be his surgeon's face, because he recognized the voice. The man never really learned to perceive well again because the circuits couldn't be trained so easily as an adult.

This act of perception—recognizing categories—is very important. It goes on quite automatically, yet it is a central factor in our functioning and in our insight. So when this sound comes, we recognize that it is a bell. We recognize that it is a bell to end the sitting. That's the act of perception taking place.

The fourth of the aggregates, the third of the mental aggregates after feeling tone and perception, is the category called mental formations, sometimes called volitional formations. The Pali term is sankhara. This refers to the whole range of thoughts and emotions that are created in the mind, as well as the more subtle mind states generated from meditation.

A thought is a formation. A reaction of anger or desire or fear or doubt is considered a mental formation. The beautiful emotions that Susan talked about last night—love, compassion, and joy—are mental formations. The refined or more subtle meditative states of tranquility, concentration, equanimity are also considered mental formations. These are all conditioned factors that may be present or can also be absent in any given moment of experience. This is the whole realm of moods, emotions, thoughts, and states of mind that are part of our experience.

For instance, when we hear the bell at the end of a sitting, there are usually a couple of volitional formations that happen after perception. The perception is: it's the bell that ends the sitting. Often the volitional formation that follows is relief—"Oh boy, the sitting's over." Then there's often a sense of ease in the mind and the thought, "Wow, I could sit forever now."

You notice how much easier it gets after that bell rings?

So these are volitional formations accompanying the sound of the bell, the perception of the bell. The last of the mental aggregates is consciousness. This is the feature that Joseph described in his talk on the opening night—this knowing quality of mind. The Pali term is vijñāna. Consciousness is that which, in Buddhist understanding, receives, you could say holds, knows every sense impression. So it's consciousness that is knowing a sound, knowing a sensation, knowing a thought.

In the example of the bell, it is consciousness that has held the sound—which is the form aggregate—that knows the feeling tone, which is pleasant, that registers and holds the perception of bell, and that also knows the sense of ease or the thought, "I could sit forever." So consciousness is there with each of the other aggregates.

The understanding in the teachings of the Buddha is that each of these experiences arises together with consciousness. So it's not that consciousness is there waiting, and then an independent thing comes up and is known. Rather, the understanding is that the sound and the knowing come together, arise together as one unified experience which has two aspects. In this case, the sound is one aspect, the knowing of the sound is another.

So these are the five kinds of stuff that make up our experience in this model: form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. According to the Buddha, this is a complete set. That is, every aspect of our experience can be put in one of these five categories.

Now, why is that interesting? Or why is it liberating? I think the answer is that there is not a need for an I, for a self, either as a separate category or within one of these categories. There are only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. When one has examined the mind-body process closely enough and found that this is all that constitutes experience, then one knows from direct contemplation, direct realization, that there is no other thing called "I" to be found anywhere.

So there's no central self, no ongoing entity at the center of all this to whom it's happening, who is experiencing it all, or who owns any of it. There are only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. We'll come back to this a little later.

Later in the sutta, the Buddha compares this production of the five aggregates to a magic show. What he's saying is that we have been enchanted by a magic show, and that's what creates our clinging to life. But once we understand how the magic show is put together, we aren't tricked anymore.

It's interesting to reflect on this in terms of magic. I was reading a book not long ago about Harry Houdini and how he managed his amazing escapes. I don't know if you've heard his story or seen people do things like this, but Houdini became very famous—I think it was in the teens or twenties of the past century—by these feats of escape. He would let himself be completely tied up. His hands would be bound. Chains would be wrapped around his body, locked with big metal locks. He would then be bundled up and put into a wooden box. The side of the box that was open would be nailed shut, and then the box would be tossed into a river where, of course, it would sink to the bottom. And then, amazingly, a few minutes later, Houdini would swim to the surface, to the acclaim of the viewers and the media and everyone else.

It seemed like magic, but in fact, every element of it was a clever device. Magic tricks are always much more interesting when you don't know the trick, but I'm going to spoil it for you and tell you the tricks.

The first trick is that the person who tied his hands bound them very loosely so he could wriggle his hands free. Even though it looked like they'd been tied well, he could wriggle his hands free. The second trick is that within his mouth, he had a bunch of tiny picks and wrenches. As soon as his hands were free, he could reach into his mouth, get the picks, and undo the locks that were holding the chains together. He was a very talented lock picker. He could do this in the dark, in cold water. Once the locks were off and he'd disentangled all the chains and the ropes that were binding him, he was still in a wooden box, but one side of the box was a false side. It was nailed on only very lightly, so all he had to do was kick it out.

But this whole procedure took about three minutes. So imagine you're on the bottom of a riverbed, there's water rushing over you, and you're under there for three minutes. The very first thing Houdini had to learn was how to hold his breath. He could hold his breath for a full three minutes underwater in a cold river. And then all that was left was for him to swim to the surface and be acclaimed and showered with riches.

So that's a magic trick. If you had known it, then all the individual steps were cool, but it was no longer magical.

The Buddha said it is the same with us in this magic show: "Suppose, bhikkhus, that a magician should hold a magic show at a crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it. It would appear to that person to be void, hollow, insubstantial."

What substance, monks, could there be in a magic show? Even so, whatever form, feeling, perception, formations, or consciousness a person inspects, ponders, and carefully investigates, it would appear to that person to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance could there be in form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness?

Form is like a mass of foam, and feeling just an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and formations like a banana tree. I didn't get this one at first. If you know banana trees, the trunk is hollow. And as soon as the bananas have flowered once, the trunk never grows back again. So it's a hollow tree, unlike most trees that we know. Formations like a banana tree. Consciousness is a magic show, a juggler's trick. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun, another name for the Buddha.

So here there's a pointing to the emptiness, the hollowness, the void, insubstantial nature of all five aggregates. This is a lot to take in all at once and requires some reflection.

During one period of retreat, I decided I wanted to study and look into this quality of emptiness. So I read a book by a wonderful Buddhist author named Nagarjuna. This book was written around 100 to 150 CE. Nagarjuna, for my money, is the greatest Buddhist philosopher after the Buddha. His key book called Root Verses on the Middle Way has been translated into English in several good translations, so it's easy to find translation and commentary on this work.

I was doing quite a lot of formal practice of sitting and walking, and I was also reading this book, which is quite dense and philosophical. It was starting to get under my skin, and I was starting to see what Nagarjuna was pointing to. He has a way of everywhere you want to take a resting point on some ground, of cutting that out from under you. It's really a fascinating book.

One evening I actually had a dream about Nagarjuna, though it was about the book more than about him as a person. In the dream, I was standing in front of a full-length mirror, looking at my image in the mirror, and I asked the question, "Why is emptiness important?" And curiously, it was the image in the mirror that replied. The image in the mirror said, "Because it means you don't exist." End of dream.

That was a great message because, of course, it doesn't mean that form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness don't exist. It means that the owner of those, the bearer of those, the one who has the burden of the aggregates, doesn't exist in that way. There is no self that has to carry this burden. And when the self goes out of the experience of the aggregates, they're felt as much lighter. This doesn't happen in a continuous way, but it happens from time to time and there is a great sense of lightening up when that happens.

Jack Kornfield tells a story where he was in Sri Lanka visiting this old monk—I think he was a patriarch of one of the schools at that time. Visiting the old monk in his bedroom, the monk said, "I hear you teach something about this in America. What's your understanding of Buddhism?"

Jack said, "Oh, my understanding, my deepest understanding is within this whole mind-body process, there is no abiding self."

The old monk just laughed and laughed, and he said, "No self, no problem. No self, no problem." That was his understanding.

But for the most part, we don't quite see things in this way. We have this sticky sense of self that comes in. We don't see the magical nature of the display of the aggregates. How can we tune into that insubstantial quality that the Buddha is pointing to in this discourse?

Partly, I think our culture works against us. Western culture is founded on a pretty materialistic worldview. If I can speak for what I think is the common twentieth or even twenty-first century worldview, I think it's something like this: Physical matter is the ultimate truth of things. It's the ultimate basis for everything else. It is the source of all that arises. It is various chemical combinations that lead to physical matter forming into life, and it is life formed from physical matter that gives rise to consciousness.

When we see in this way that the physical reality is the ultimate reality, then we feel that we have only existed since we've come into this world, that the world is the first thing, and when we die, we go out of the world and it continues. This is only one way of looking. It is, I think, the common Western materialistic way, but it is only one way of looking.

Other Indian schools of philosophy view consciousness as the ultimate reality, the primary stuff of the universe. From that point of view, they see world systems as one of the arisings in consciousness, but with consciousness being more fundamental than matter.

And so appearances arise just like dream images within consciousness.

The Buddha himself took a kind of middle way between these two worldviews. In his teachings, he said that consciousness and matter depended on one another. He compared them to two stalks of twigs that were leaning up against each other. He said, if you take away one, the other will fall over also. That is, if you take away matter, consciousness will fall apart. But if you take away consciousness, matter will fall away.

In our Western materialist view, we tend to forget that to some extent this appearance of the world depends on consciousness. When we take matter as the fundamental reality, we forget that link. So what if we bring that back in a little bit?

A big part of the insight and investigation that comes in practice is the understanding of this transitory nature of our experience. One of the ways that it often first starts to open up to people is in the investigation of form through the direct experience of the body.

When I came into meditation, I thought of the body as something solid. My idea of it was shaped by the anatomy books I'd read. I sort of knew where the organs were and where the bones were, and I really thought that's what the body was as ultimate reality. In meditation, I was encouraged to take a direct look at the experience of the body from within, and what I found there was not solid, but rather everywhere I turned my attention, I encountered change.

The sensations weren't solid when I looked at them closely, but they were more characterized by pulsation, vibration, movement—on, off, weaker, stronger, more painful, less painful. Everywhere I would put my attention, I was only getting a changing sensation. That started to loosen up the idea of solidity that I had had about the body.

We also, of course, are encouraged to explore the other senses. So sounds happen so fast that that's usually an easy area to see this insubstantial nature. Thoughts, as Joseph was describing this morning, just pop up out of nowhere, gone in a few moments. Where was it? When we look at it closely, there's very little weight in a thought.

Emotions can be very strong and compelling, yet if you're asked to meditate directly on them, turn your attention directly to them and be mindful of them, sometimes they just evaporate, just like a cloud when the sunlight shines on it. Tastes and smells also quite light.

But for me, the sense store that was most impenetrable was the sense of sight. I would look out at a setting like this—everything looked unchanging. It looked really solid. So the reflection that I went through was to just inquire a little bit how this sight has gotten created in this consciousness.

And of course, it's just simple kind of seventh grade science. We know that for a sight to appear, there has to be light reflected off the object, traveling to the eye, millions of photons every second, impinging on the retina, stimulating a signal that travels through the optic nerve up to the brain, stimulates a certain region, and then through some really magical process, sight appears.

That sight that we are seeing now is dependent on the millions of photons impacting the retina every second. If those photons stopped coming, the sight would cease, would fall away. So we recognize when we reflect in that way that this sight that seems so solid is actually being regenerated many times a second by the electrical activity of our nervous system and the translation of the brain into consciousness. Very mysterious process, this last step, but something like that seems to be going on. So this sense, too, is insubstantial.

Something else that I used to reflect on and play with: If I asked you the color of this book, I don't think it's a real secret. Most people would say this book is blue. But I started to ask myself, where is blue? Because as you also know from science, this appears blue because the blue is getting bounced back to your eyes. And the book is actually absorbing all the other colors, but the blue is being reflected. So really, when you think about it, if you think about the book itself, it's everything but blue, because the blue is what's coming back at you. So where is blue? It's not really in the book, is it? It's just in consciousness.

So this became really interesting for me because I started to realize that what I had taken to be the real world and the ultimate reality wasn't in the way that I was used to thinking about it. Again, I'm sure you all have reflected on this also, but we tend to forget that it's like this. What we see is just a representation of the world that comes in through our senses and then gets created by some interplay between our nervous system and our brains to come out as consciousness. We're not in touch with what's independent of our senses and nervous systems. It's only a representation of the world filtered through our own system.

But we tend to forget that, and we tend to give it a solidity and an ultimate reality, when in fact it's only held, as you might say, a bubble in consciousness. Even the sense of ground that we so take for granted is

Even the sense of ground that we so take for granted—if you think about that—is only the sensation of hardness underneath our feet or our cushion. But that sense of hardness is also held in consciousness. So although this room has a ground, which is the earth or the floor, consciousness doesn't have a ground. In consciousness, there's nothing underneath that sense of hardness. There's just space.

When we start to see the world in this way, there's some language that can help remind us. And I like to play with the idea, instead of calling things objects of the world, rather to call them appearances. We live in a world of appearances, but we can't actually know what the reality of those objects are independent of our own senses. So we live in a world of appearances, and that's why the Tibetans have this really lovely phrase. They call this a magical display. And this is exactly the same thing that the Buddha is pointing to in calling consciousness a magic show.

How is this created? I don't know. It has its own laws. The physical laws, the chemical laws, the biological laws all still apply. And yet we don't quite know what they apply to. So we have this magical display of appearances that is sometimes compared to a dream.

And really, this is an interesting thing to reflect on, too. Is there any real difference between a moment of experience in a dream and a moment of experience in waking life? The Tibetans have explored this really thoroughly through dream yoga. And they say in meditating, sometimes they get confused. They're in a dream and they don't know if they're in a dream or in waking life. So they say there's a way to find out, the way to check. You pick up a book, you open it to a page, and you read a passage. You close the book up, you put it down, you wait a moment, you pick it up again, you turn to the same page, and you read the same passage. If it reads the same, it's real life. If it reads differently, it's a dream. Just in case you need to know. But that's how close together these experiences are. Accomplished meditators cannot tell the difference sometimes.

So one of my Tibetan teachers put it this way. He said it all has "rangdröl"—and that means no substantial or solid existence. It's all just flickers of our nervous system creating a representation of something. That's why it's also compared, as the Buddha did, to a mirage or a bubble.

The sense of emptiness which lacks the center of I is the way the Buddha usually used the term emptiness in his teachings—the lack of central self. But this insubstantial nature that we're talking about now more has to do with the emptiness of phenomena. Sometimes called emptiness, another word for it is transparency or insubstantiality or openness.

That this is a potent insight is pointed to from the Heart Sutra. If you know the Heart Sutra, near the start of it is this lovely little sentence: "While practicing deeply the paramita of wisdom"—that means the quality or development of wisdom—"the Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was saved from all suffering and distress." So this perception is pointed to in one of the most ancient texts as being the direct avenue to liberation.

So one way that we can understand emptiness is by seeing this insubstantial, transitory quality of phenomena. Why is that so helpful? Because when we understand how fragile and how insubstantial it is, we're less likely to cling. When we understand it completely, we don't cling anymore. But because we forget and we think it's solid again, we cling again. And the other aspect is this absence of self within the whole show.

This is a key misunderstanding. And a simple way to think of it is the way we identify with the body as either being I or mine. This again is from the Buddha. He's talking to one of his chief disciples, Sariputta: "It's hard to find people who can understand this teaching. Those who understand it are hard to find." It's kind of plaintive, isn't it? Those of you who are professors and teachers probably know this feeling.

And Sariputta, who's a great student, replies, "Then, O blessed one, now is the time for it. Now is the time to teach the Dhamma in brief or at length. There will be those who will understand."

So the Buddha continues, "Well then, Sariputta, this is how the training should be done. Concerning this body with its consciousness, let there be no self-centered imaginings of I and mine and no such bias."

With regard to external objects, let there be no self-centered imaginings of mine and no such bias. We shall then abide in the attainment of the heart's liberation and the liberation by wisdom.

This came clear to me at one point in my practice. I was a monk in Thailand, and as a monk, I had the privilege of seeing autopsies. I know some of you are physicians and have had this opportunity many times. I was thirty-two years old and had never been next to a dead body before. I walked into the autopsy theater and immediately stood next to the body of a young woman who had been recently fished out of a canal. She became the first subject for the autopsy that took place.

So I took a seat in the theater and watched. Because you are all scientists, I'll share the unvarnished version of this. The first thing the coroner did was make an incision from one ear over the top of the skull and through the scalp to the other ear. Having made that incision, he pulled down the two pieces of skin that were exposed and in doing so peeled the skin away from the face. Never having seen a dead body before, this was shocking. It was powerful.

Then he took a saw—and in Thailand it was a hand saw—and sawed off the top part of the skull in order to remove it and expose the brain. He went through and opened up the chest cavity and took out the internal organs and weighed them. I then sat through two other autopsies that were performed in a similar way.

Then I walked outside, going back to the monastery. The hospital was near a big parade ground, the central parade ground in Bangkok, where I had to catch my bus. So I walked out—and I was very altered. But I walked out into this sunny day, and I was just watching the people walk across the parade ground. There were mothers with their children. There were couples holding hands. There were old women coming from the market with their shopping carts, all walking by in the sunshine.

I was there in a very present way. And what I said to myself was—all I could see were walking corpses. Everyone looked like the same thing I had just seen on the autopsy table, but they were animated. And then I later thought to myself, what do I mean by a walking corpse? The way I was seeing it was there was just a body, but this body carried a brightness that shined out through the eyes. And that brightness was very alive, was very vital, animating the body.

But that brightness was completely of the present moment. It didn't have any past and it didn't have any future. It was only here now. But because of this peculiar capacity of memory, our thought processes can construct an imaginary past and project it forward into an imaginary future and lose track of this completely present moment experience that is all that we are.

When I saw in that way, I also saw how insubstantial everybody's life was, including my own. All I had was this moment and this very transitory body. So although it sounds like this opening to emptiness might be a cold or clinical vision, what I found for me is that it was very moving. Because I saw that we're all in this same predicament. We're looking for some kind of security. We're craving something to rely on in this world that is only a flickering image constructed by our nervous systems, in a momentary existence where we don't know what's going to happen in the next moment.

And the only way to find peace or freedom in this situation is to let go, is not to cling. And it's so hard to learn to do. And this is our common universal human condition.

In the Buddhist tradition, Kuan Yin is said to be the bodhisattva of compassion. It's said that she hears all the cries of the world, the cries of sorrow and the cries of joy, and is always available for us to call on for her support and her understanding. But you know, Kuan Yin is not a beginning meditator. She's a bodhisattva. So her compassion is very strong, but her wisdom is also very strong. She understands that there is suffering but there is no one who suffers. And so in her understanding and her compassion, she balances this open heart and this imperturbable composure.

I'll just close with this line that is sometimes attributed to her: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

Let's just sit for a moment, please.

CHAPTER 275

Sutta Study Class: The Honeyball Sutta (part 2)

Guy Armstrong · 1h12

> In this second part of his study of the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (MN 18), Guy Armstrong delves deeply into the Buddha's teaching on mental proliferation (papañca) and its relationship to suffering. The talk examines Mahākaccāna's detailed exposition of how sense contact leads through feeling and perception to thinking, and eventually to the problematic process of mental proliferation that 'besets' us with perceptions about past, future, and present.
> Armstrong explains the three types of papañca: craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi), showing how they create suffering through our identification with experience as 'this is mine, this I am, this is myself.' He connects this teaching to dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) and explores practical applications for meditation, emphasizing the importance of recognizing when proliferation begins and choosing not to 'get on that train.' The discussion includes references to the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta and the famous Bāhiya teaching about experiencing sense contacts without constructing a sense of self around them. Armstrong concludes by highlighting the Buddha's eighth thought of a great person: taking delight in non-proliferation (nipapañca) rather than in the endless spinning of conceptual thought.

In examining paragraph 13, we find the bhikkhus expressing their trust in Mahākaccāna's wisdom. They acknowledge that while the Blessed One "knowing knows, seeing sees," and is indeed the Tathāgata himself, they had missed their opportunity to request clarification when the Buddha first spoke. Since the Venerable Mahākaccāna is praised by the teacher and esteemed by his wise companions in the holy life, and since he possesses the capability to expound the detailed meaning of what the Blessed One summarized without elaboration, they request that he explain it without finding it troublesome.

Mahākaccāna accepts their request, saying, "Then listen, friends, and attend closely to what I shall say." The bhikkhus reply, "Yes, friend," and the venerable Mahākaccāna begins his exposition.

In paragraph 15, Mahākaccāna restates the Buddha's summary teaching: "Friends, the Blessed One rose from his seat and went into his dwelling after giving a summary in brief, without expounding the detailed meaning—that is, as to the source through which perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset a person. If nothing is found there to delight in, welcome, and hold to, this is the end of the underlying tendency to lust... Here these evil, unwholesome states cease without remainder. I understand the detailed meaning of this summary to be as follows."

Now we arrive at paragraph 16, which contains the most crucial teaching of the entire sutta. Mahākaccāna begins his detailed analysis: "Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. With what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye."

This sequence bears striking resemblance to the beginning of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda). Mahākaccāna describes the sense base of seeing, where the eye serves as the internal sense base and visual forms constitute the external sense base. When eye consciousness is also present, seeing occurs. This convergence of the three—sense organ, sense object, and sense consciousness—creates what is called contact (phassa).

Contact represents the meeting point where these three elements come together at the sense door. This process occurs continuously through all six sense doors: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. We are constantly receiving streams of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and feelings—a continuous bombardment of sensory experience that forms the foundation of our perceptual world.

No, it's what I would call a sense datum. It's the raw data before perception in Buddhist terms. When the bell is struck, that sound is the sense datum—it has both consciousness and the sound wrapped together. That's contact.

All of human experience consists of these sense contacts coming at us through the six sense doors. The consciousness is the knowing of it. You can feel that as a mental event—it's the knowing of that bare phenomenon. The object—the sound—is what's being known.

It's just one experience. You don't think, "Let me gather the consciousness from back here and send it out to meet that object." It doesn't happen like that. It's the object and the knowing together.

So it's one experience, but you can look at the knowing side or you can look at the sense object side. If this sound were in a room with a corpse, the corpse wouldn't have consciousness, so the sense object would be there, but the sense consciousness wouldn't, and there wouldn't be an experience of hearing. But because we're alive, we have the consciousness and we have the object, so we can hear.

There's one experience—hearing—but there are two aspects we can examine. We can look at our knowing of it, because we're sentient beings knowing all the time in this bare sense data way. Or we can look at the quality of the sound—we could say that's E flat or whatever note it is. That sound has a certain quality and timbre. But it's one experience, two aspects.

How can one experience have two aspects? Is this bowl round or is it gold? There's only one bowl, but I can either look at the roundness or I can look at the color. Same with sense experience—just one experience, but I can look at the knowing side, which is happening only because I'm a sentient being. That sentience is consciousness that can receive and know it. And then there's the sound. Many different sounds exist in the world. They have their own qualities and properties. They arise together.

So the meeting of the three is contact. It's happening to us all the time. And when there's contact, there's feeling. This is straight out of dependent origination—the six sense bases, contact, and then the next step is feeling.

Feeling is very specific here. The word is vedanā in Pali. It's not emotion. It's a quality in every sense contact of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Actually, "neither" is the way it's described, but as shorthand we say neutral.

Every sense contact either has a quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant—which we sometimes shorten as neutral. Those are the three choices. It's happening at six sense doors, so you could say there are eighteen possible feelings. But for now, we'll just say three feelings.

Why is feeling so important in the chain of dependent origination? Why is it such a central link, Flavia?

"Because it can lead to craving."

Yes, it leads to craving. How so? Describe how that happens with the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral.

Yeah, so craving in its aspects of greed, aversion, and delusion is activated through these reactions to the three kinds of feeling. Pleasant feeling tends to stimulate wanting. Unpleasant feeling tends to stimulate aversion. Neutral feeling tends to provoke ignorance. Why? Because we're not interested in it. It doesn't feed the underlying craving, so we tune out.

Is that a strict causal condition? Does every pleasant feeling trigger greed? What makes the difference? When mindfulness is there, we don't react. If it's there and strong, we can be with pleasant feeling but not react with greed. Similarly for aversion, similarly for ignorance.

"Is the mental proliferation of thoughts, images and all that also considered what comes in through the mind-sense door?"

It is. Mental thoughts and emotions, all the meditative states of mind are considered objects of the mind-sense door, even if originally triggered by something like a bell. So it doesn't have to be just originating in the mind to be considered the mind's sense door.

You know, walk down the street, see a beautiful new car. Desire arises based on pleasant contact. The desire is a thing of the mind. Think about, "Oh, I really like that color of Prius. I wonder where the Toyota dealer is located in San Rafael." That's mind-door stuff, even though it's related to an external object.

Even the feeling—let's call it feeling tone so that we're really clear it's vedana, pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral—the feeling tone is a mind-door object. It's not intrinsic in the object itself. So this sound could be experienced as pleasant, but some people might experience it as unpleasant because of past associations, conditioning or whatever. So the sound is one thing. The feeling tone is almost a verb—how are you feeling that tone, that sound arriving? And it's based on our individual natures and conditioning and habits and likes and dislikes. So even the feeling is a mental event.

"I'm just thinking so many times you wake up and you're way down the path of the mental event and you can't even remember what the sense trigger was that originated that thought."

Yes. And the good thing is from a point of view of meditation you don't need to. I mean, sometimes it's fun when your mind's a little still and you find yourself two minutes into a big fantasy to trace each step back and realize where it got started and how we leapfrogged from one to another, but you don't need to do that.

From the point of view of meditation, we don't have to unravel that tangle. That's a temptation, especially from a Western psychological point of view—you want to unravel the tangle and get back to the source, but we don't need to. In meditation, we can just drop the tangle. Just come back to the present moment. What's happening now? Just disengage from the tangle altogether.

So here we're in dependent origination. With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives. Now, this is interesting because in dependent origination, there is no element of perception. But people often ask as they start to investigate their experience and they see the importance of perception, where does it fit into dependent origination? And what's being hinted at or alluded to here is it follows feeling.

Now, I don't remember the Buddha saying that except in this sutta where he confirms later. The perception seems to follow feeling in this outline. So we feel something—there's an impingement, we feel it, and then we notice it.

And then we perceive it by memory. So you know, this seems reasonable. What one feels, that one perceives. Remember, perceiving is not intrinsically problematic. It's this classification thing that goes on, and it's okay.

What one perceives, that one thinks about. Now something is starting to happen here that's a little more active. Notice the very first part of this sequence is totally involuntary. There's contact, which is consciousness. Consciousness is not volitional, and the eye is not volitional, and the object is not volitional. Contact is happening. That's not because we're willing it. And when there's contact, there's feeling. It's based on our past conditioning, but you don't have to think about how to feel something. You just know you like it, or you don't like it, or it's neutral. Not volitional either, really.

Then what one feels that one perceives—this also happens pretty automatically. "Oh, I know, that's a friend. That's someone I don't know. That's a car. That's a salesperson in a store." That happens automatically. Not much will has come in yet.

Now, what one perceives, that one thinks about. So we're starting to get volitional. We're starting to get active. And once we start thinking, we're engaging more of our emotional energy in it. For instance, why do we choose to think about some things and not think about others? Ah, because some things strike us with more charge. Those are the things we tend to fix on and then think about. We don't think about everything we perceive. How much time have you spent thinking about this water pitcher this afternoon, even though you've been perceiving it for quite a while?

So once we start thinking about something, there's starting to be a little investment of emotional energy there. But then it goes on. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. So this is the word papañca. There's actually a verb, papañceti. He proliferates, she proliferates is papañceti. So that's what's being used here. We're mentally proliferating.

Now, is thinking about something inherently problematic? You can think about something and it can be safe, right? So thinking is not inherently a problem. If I look at this, I think, "Oh, I'm really appreciative Sean left me a pitcher of water, and when I need it, I can pour it and drink it in this class." Useful. A thought can be useful.

What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. Are we getting into danger? Yeah. So the leap from thinking, which can be controlled—we can approach thinking in a controlled way if mindfulness is strong. We can think clearly. We can think calmly. We can drop it when the need for it is over. But now we're into proliferating. And this is where the process starts to get out of our control.

Proliferating kind of means we've lost charge of the thought stream and it's running away with itself based on emotions, past associations, conditioning, underlying tendencies, and all of that stuff. With what one has mentally proliferated...

As the source, perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye.

Now we're in trouble. Because at first, it was a pretty organic process—consciousness and objects, things being known, contact occurring, contact bringing feeling and perception. That's all normal. The Buddha experiences this very same process.

Then what one perceives, one thinks about. If there's abundant mindfulness, we can keep that steady. Such thinking can be appropriate, measured, calm, reasonable.

Then we get into proliferating. The focus is still on our activity—we're proliferating. But what we know is also happening is we're losing control. Proliferation usually comes from a loss of control, or let's say a loss of choice about the thought process.

The next step is crucial: we're no longer in control; we're actually at effect. So the focus shifts—not from our own activity or our own volition, but to what besets a person. Now all the proliferation we've engaged in comes back on us like a burden. We've stirred up all these old associations and hopes and fears and regrets and worries and future anxiety. Now it's as though they achieve a life of their own and they're attacking us. They're besetting us.

It's as though the artist painted the tiger and the tiger came to life and ate them. This is what we do with our imagination.

Take anything you've been worried about lately. Can you see—and I have my own things too, I'm not exempting myself from this—can we see that the thought about that situation doesn't have to be frightening? Because it's just a thought. We may be sitting quite safely in our own home, warm, comfortable with friends or family, quite safe. Yet the thought makes us afraid.

So you get a stream of these thoughts coming, each one making us afraid, worried, regretful, ashamed, embarrassed. And then we become the victim of that proliferation.

What Mahākaccāna is pointing to, which the Buddha will confirm, is that proliferation sets off a kind of chain reaction where these thoughts and feelings have a life of their own. And then we become the victim of them.

"In the sequence, does the troublesome thinking begin or arise once following the sensation?"

It's quite possible to have a clear, rational, non-problematic thought about a sensation, even a painful one. I could have a painful sensation in my knee, and I just go, "That's a painful sensation. I'm not going to keep sitting here if it gets a little bit stronger. I'm going to change my posture," and then I drop it.

But if I start to proliferate: "Oh man, I had a friend who sat through a knee pain and it actually injured his ACL where he had had surgery, and I saw him walking around on crutches for the last three days of the retreat, and then I think they had to take him to the hospital. I can't go to the hospital now because I have a big piece of work coming up. If I let this go another minute, I'm probably going to be bound to..." That's where it spins out of reality into imagination. And that's where it becomes problematic.

So you notice that thinking can be related just to the present moment, the way things are—seeing things the way they are. That's a pain. It's happening in the right knee. I may have an old skiing injury there. I should be a little careful of it.

But then these proliferations beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye. All of a sudden it's exploding into past and future. And when we get entangled in past and future, then we're really at risk. Because past and future aren't real. Past and future are only thoughts in the moment. But if we don't see them clearly as thoughts, we take them as real, and they become burdensome.

So it's the proliferation that sets that up. We get lost in past and future. Most people live their lives lost in past and future. As meditators, we step out of that whirlwind from time to time. But to be honest, we live much of our lives in past and future as well.

Sanity is being in the present, seeing a thought arise, seeing it persist, seeing it pass away. That's what the Buddha said was so wonderful and marvelous about his experience.

So, as meditators, we really have our work cut out for us. It is to establish a sane relationship to thinking. And the first step in that is to start to understand this phenomenon of papañca. To be able to recognize it when it happens, know how it's different from useful thought, and to see how it stirs things up that then land on us as problems.

"Sometimes what you just described actually occurs in my thinking process," one student shared. "But sometimes it doesn't, and I have to step back and then I just say 'stop' because I can't reach a place of calmness to be able to let go. So I say into my mind, stop. Just stop. And that sometimes works, sometimes doesn't. But it allows me to then take a breath because it gets, like you said, entangled."

That's very skillful. And it takes quite a bit of meditative background to be able to do that. This is what we sometimes call the sword of discriminating wisdom. When you see that a thought is going and it's starting to go out of control in a way that's not helpful, you recognize this is not going to be helpful. This pattern of thinking is leading me down a road that I'm pretty familiar with, and I know where it goes. It goes into fear or regret or hope or desire, something that isn't going to be helpful. And you say, "Stop it." Sometimes we can do that and it will work, just as you're describing.

That's a very skillful thing to do—just cut it. The sword of wisdom in the Tibetan, actually the Mahayana tradition, is represented by the bodhisattva Manjushri. You'll see him holding that flaming sword. That's one of the functions—that sword is to cut delusion. And one of the forms of delusion is papañca. So when we can see that and we can just stop it, that's very skillful.

Now, can that be misapplied? Yes, because sometimes our thoughts are going and we just think, "I'd rather be calm. I wish I was concentrated in this sitting. Let me see if I can just suppress that thought energy." That doesn't help. That just bottles it up. So when we can see with wisdom that it's not going in a useful direction and we can just cut it, that can be good. But beware of suppressing feelings with it. You want to cut the chain of thought, but you don't want to suppress feelings or emotions that are there.

This is an area that we really want to become very familiar with in our practice. When is the spinning out starting to happen?

I want to read you some of the other words that have been used to translate this word, papañca. Papañca was not well understood when these teachings started coming to the West into English. Early translators looked at it and they didn't know what the heck the Buddha meant by it because it doesn't appear in that many suttas. I mentioned some suttas on the handout—you'll see a short list at the bottom of other suttas where this is described. Actually, you could add to that; there's one more I just found out in the Sutta Nipata, section 5.30, I think it is.

He doesn't give a clear definition of the word anywhere. So translators had to look at all the places it was used and use their intuition about what is being pointed to here. And I feel pretty comfortable now with the rendering as conceptual proliferation or mental proliferation. But I'll give you some of the other translations that were used and some are still being used today: expansion, diffuseness, spreading out, complication, objectification, diversification, fixation, and obsession.

I think conceptual proliferation touches on all of these translations quite well—it captures what's being pointed to. But I want to pull out one other translation to examine more closely: objectification. This is actually the word that Thanissaro Bhikkhu now uses for papañca.

What he's pointing to, I think, is this function that language has of making solid objects out of transitory phenomena. You know how when you examine your direct experience through meditation, you see that everything is just a momentary arising and passing, arising and passing, arising and passing. There's nothing—when you're seeing from that space—that could even be called a solid thing. That's one of the key meditative insights into impermanence: everything's dissolving moment by moment.

What concepts do is fix that momentary flow and reify it, making it look like there's something solid there. Think about the name of your best friend. I bet you have a very good image of what your friend is supposed to be like. Even though you might have seen them in a bunch of different situations and different emotions, I bet you have some kind of solid image of what that person is like. So we take this changing flow and we concretize it, we try to fix it. If we don't understand what we're doing, the blind use of language obscures the transitory nature of things.

So that's another way that papañca gets us into trouble. It creates substance where there isn't any in our experience. This is a universal problem with language—not just a Buddhist problem. But papañca contributes to it, and that's why I think Thanissaro likes this word objectification.

Let me read you Bhikkhu Bodhi's description of this. He says, "The Pali word papañca suggests mental fabrication, obsessive mental constructions, and deluded conceptualization."

Did that give a sense of the weight? I'll read that again: "Papañca suggests mental fabrication, obsessive mental construction, and deluded conceptualization."

The mental fabrication we've been talking about, the obsessive nature of it we've focused on, the fact that it's all constructed—thoughts of past and future are all constructed, they're not here now, they're not real, but we construct them through imagination—and deluded conceptualization. We'll get to this a little further along, but as we expand our time into past and future, generally what comes along is the thought, "I have been existing from the past through the present and will exist into the future."

So we give the self a continuity that it doesn't have. The self isn't continuous. We're all just bundles of changing mental and physical phenomena. But we construct the view that self is continuing from past through the present into the future.

Let's read the second part of verse 16, and then I want to go back and talk in a little more detail about papañca.

"Dependent on the ear and sound... dependent on the nose and odors, dependent on the tongue and flavors, dependent on the body and tangible, dependent on the mind and mind-objects, mind-consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives. What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates. With what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present mind objects cognizable to the mind."

This is basically just taking the same formula that we went through for eye and forms and eye consciousness and applying it equally to the other five senses. So we're covering all six sense bases and showing that they operate in the same way—that we can proliferate about all of them, and then those proliferations come back to beset us, leading to suffering.

So let's talk in a little more detail about papañca. It's said that there are three varieties of papañca. This comes from the commentaries—it's not explicit in the suttas, but it seems like a good list. The three kinds of papañca are papañca based on craving, on conceit, and on views. The Pali is taṇhā-papañca, māna-papañca, and diṭṭhi-papañca.

When you think about this, I think you can see all three of these in your experience.

I certainly can. Craving papancha manifests when I think about what I want in the future. Where am I going to get that new Prius? When am I going to have the money to buy it? This desire force is one example. Fear and anger can also operate in the same way as forms of craving. These strong emotional components lead us into past and future with tremendous intensity and burden, carrying great weight. That's the force of craving.

Mana is where self-judgment enters and the comparing mind takes hold. I'm not good enough. I'm not lovable enough. I'm not going to be good at this job. I'm not going to find a partner. I'm not worthy of a promotion or a raise. I won't find work because I don't know enough. I don't have skills. All these judging thoughts represent one side, while the opposite manifests as pride. I'm much better than they are. I should be getting the raise. Why are they getting promoted when I'm not? That's the pride side. Even claiming that we're equal, in Buddhist understanding, is also conceit. We're still comparing ourselves, trying to find solid ground.

If we look at the motivation underlying mana comparison, it's an attempt to find some ground where we can establish ourselves. Perhaps I'm not as good as that person, but at least I'm this far below them. They look solid and I'm here, so I must be solid too. Or that person's there and I know I'm better than them. We're trying to find some solid ground for self to rest on in the middle of all this insecure impermanence.

Ditthi manifests when we disagree with people. During the campaign—I bet everybody's so glad we're out of the 2012 election season, I certainly am—all the different views you'd hear from right and left, the far right and far left, across that whole spectrum. Everyone was so sure their view was right, with so much heat and passion about it. I spent some hours on the meditation cushion entertaining some of my political views at that time, so I know it's happening in the world. We feel really strongly about those views. We genuinely feel my view is right and their view is wrong, and we can get very heated about this.

I have friends who used to like finding people from the opposition party to try convincing them why their view was wrong. Two different people during the last season who were on the opposite end of the spectrum from me wanted to take me aside and convince me why their view was right. I wouldn't engage because I think that's fruitless, but it was very interesting.

This attachment to views manifests in the political world, in the dharma world—I believe this, you believe that, or if you're a Christian or a Muslim, you're not even on my map. We see it in relationships. We have a view of what our partner should be doing to live up to our ideal of what our partner should be doing. They have a view about us as well, the same thing, or in relation to our parents or friends. They shouldn't have done that to me. They should have done this instead. We can get quite heated in our relationship to them based on those views, and they're only views. The other person in the exchange will have a different view.

These are the things we spin out about: things we want or don't want, ways we judge or compare ourselves, and views and opinions. When you examine what proliferation consists of, I think this is a pretty comprehensive list.

Again, as a matter of self-knowledge, it's really helpful for us to start taking a closer look at our papancha—first knowing when we're proliferating, then seeing what's the content, what's the fuel, and seeing if it falls into one of these three categories, because very often it does. I haven't identified my own papancha as being anything other than these three. Maybe there is some I haven't yet identified, but it's a pretty good list.

This is interesting because although it's not explicit in the suttas, there are references to it. There's this very good sutta in the Majjhima on the five aggregates, which is Majjhima 109. In this sutta, the Buddha is explaining to the bhikkhus...

This is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself.

So seeing with wisdom undercuts the papañca tendencies of craving, conceit, and views. Seeing with proper wisdom, not claiming as I or mine is freeing.

A student raised an important question about this teaching: "This concept of non-self has challenged me for a long time. When I look at adolescent and childhood development in my work, it's so important for children, particularly those from challenging environments, to develop a healthy sense of self. You wouldn't want to undermine that. This idea of moving towards what we're discussing here comes from wisdom - wisdom that arrives because I've developed a sense of self. Hopefully it's a positive sense of self. By arriving at that positive sense of self, it gives me the opportunity to work on letting go of that self. But I don't think you can do this until you've done that. Am I completely off base here?"

This is an excellent observation, and I agree completely. Growing up, there's no way to escape developing a sense of self - there's simply no way around it. And there are healthy senses of who we are and damaging senses of who we are. Our whole educational system - from family through schools through universities - should be constructed around giving people a very healthy sense of self.

How is this communicated? Through the fundamental message: I value you because I love you. Not because you're smart, not because you're pretty, not because you're good at sports, not because you got good grades - but because you exist, because you're here. This unconditional love and acceptance forms the foundation of healthy self-development.

This fundamental truth is elegantly illustrated when the conditions cease to exist. When there is no eye, no form and no eye-consciousness, it is impossible to point out the manifestation of contact. When there is no manifestation of contact, it is impossible to point out the manifestation of feeling. When there is no manifestation of feeling, it is impossible to point out the manifestation of perception. When there is no manifestation of perception, it is impossible to point out the manifestation of thinking. When there is no manifestation of thinking, it is impossible to point out the manifestation of besettement by perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation.

This passage reveals the profound simplicity of dependent origination working in reverse. When any link in the chain is absent, the entire proliferation of mental activity simply cannot arise. It's like removing the foundation stone from an arch—without it, the whole structure cannot stand.

The same principle applies to all the sense doors. When there is no ear and no sound and no ear-consciousness, when there is no nose and no odor and no nose-consciousness, when there is no tongue and no flavor and no tongue-consciousness, when there is no body and no tangible and no body-consciousness, when there is no mind and no mind-object and no mind-consciousness—in each case, it becomes impossible for that familiar cascade of mental elaboration to manifest.

This isn't merely a philosophical point. It points to something we can actually experience in meditation. There are moments when the sense of contact becomes so subtle that the usual chain reaction simply doesn't fire. The mind settles into a profound quiet where perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation have no ground to arise upon.

What we discover is that our suffering isn't inevitable. It depends on conditions, and when those conditions are absent, suffering simply cannot manifest. This recognition can bring tremendous relief and hope to our practice. We begin to see that the very mechanism that creates our entanglement also contains the seeds of our liberation.

And let's finish up 18.

When there is no ear, no sound, and no ear consciousness... This continues for all six sense doors.

Sound a little nihilistic?

Let me say a little bit first. So this is one of those passages that one comes to in the suttas and one reads it and goes, "What on earth is being pointed to here?" It's really quite cryptic, isn't it, at best?

So I want to suggest it's not clear exactly what's being meant by this passage, but if I look at it in the context of the other things that I've read, what I suspect is being pointed to is the condition of the fully enlightened one not taking birth again.

When one is fully liberated according to the Theravadan view, the five aggregates don't reappear, as it's often said. Or more commonly, there is no further birth, there is no next life. Generally, as long as the mind is not fully liberated, when we die, there is some forward momentum from the kilesas, from the asavas, whatever you want to call it—some form of greed, aversion, delusion, some form of craving that's going forward that causes a birth to take place and a new being to arise that carries some of the karma of that past life. That's a traditional Theravadan understanding of rebirth.

I think what's being pointed to here is the ending of that samsaric journey. When one is fully enlightened, as it's said, birth is destroyed. Or as the Buddha uttered after his enlightenment, "House builder you are seen, you will build no house again."

So I think that's what's being pointed to—the no manifestation of contact.

"Do you think it's pointing to emptiness too, like the Heart Sutra? It seems very similar."

It's funny, it sounds a lot like the Heart Sutra, doesn't it? Almost lifted from it.

Another way that it might be understood, and I think this could be similar to the Heart Sutra, is if there is absolutely no clinging or dependency, then one is in a state of... When there's no clinging, there is emptiness. So it could be pointing to that.

My sense, in the context of all the other suttas in the Pali Canon, is it's more likely pointing to what's called nibbana without residue. That means one has attained final nibbana and then passed away. There's no residue in the sense there are no five aggregates continuing. That's my guess, but I don't know.

"Yes, Susan?"

"I think what I wanted to ask is, would the Buddha advise us to stop window shopping? What it sort of spoke to me was that if I couldn't control the papañca, I could go back and control the contact. Or, like, I had more options. Is that okay? I mean, obviously that's not ideal, but if I keep getting on the same train, maybe I need to not walk in the station."

Very good. I think that's the heart of the sutta. If we don't want to go down that ride that the proliferation takes us on, don't step on board a thought. I think that is the practice instruction from this sutta.

So final nibbana might solve the problem completely. Short of that, we get to figure out when papañca is starting and whether we want to go down that road or not. That's the practical lesson for our meditation. Don't hop on that papañca train. Absolutely.

So I want to skip—I want to finish the narrative and then come back and have a few more dharma points, but I want to skip a couple of paragraphs. What are we up to? We're up to 19. I'm going to let you read 19 and 20 on your own. They're kind of interesting, but basically they went and got the Buddha. And they said, "This is what Mahakaccana said when we asked him to explain it in detail. Is that correct?"

And so let's read number 21.

"Mahakaccana is wise because Mahakaccana has great wisdom. If you had asked me the meaning of this, I would have explained it to you in the same way that Mahakaccana has explained it. Such is the meaning of this, and so you should remember it."

So this is the Buddha putting his seal of approval on this discourse, and therefore the tradition holds this text with equal weight as though the Buddha had said it. Whether this is an actual event—that the Buddha actually did come out and say those words—or whether it's a rhetorical device that the editors put in to say "this is authentic Dhamma," I really don't know. But within the tradition, this validates this teaching as the equivalent of having been delivered by the Buddha. We're meant to have as much faith in this text as if the Buddha had said it through his own mouth.

Then let's finish with verse 22. The Venerable Ananda said to the Blessed One, "Venerable Sir, just as if a man exhausted by hunger and weakness came upon a honey ball, wherever he would taste it, he would find a sweet, delectable flavor. So too, Venerable Sir, any able-minded bhikkhu, whenever he might scrutinize with wisdom the meaning of this discourse on the Dhamma, would find satisfaction and delight. Venerable Sir, what is the name of this discourse on the Dhamma?" "As to that Ananda, you may remember this discourse on the Dhamma as the Honeyball Discourse." That is what the Blessed One said. The Venerable Ananda was satisfied and delighted in the Blessed One's words.

So that is why this is called the Honey Ball Sutta—it was Ananda's invention. This term "honey ball," Bhikkhu Bodhi says, can be a mixture of honey and flour and ghee and molasses. So it's not just honey, but something you could really take and eat. Sounds like a gulab jamun or something, doesn't it? An Indian sweet. So this is a very sweet sutta that we've explored together today.

The gist of it is just what Susan said: for us to start becoming aware of proliferation and not get on the train. I want to pull out a couple of other sutta references that bring this point home clearly and strongly.

This is one of the suttas on the handout—Sutta Nipata 4.14. A questioner comes to the Buddha: "I asked the kinsman of the sun"—this is just one of the names he was called by—"the great seer, about seclusion and the state of peace. Seeing in what way is one unbound, clinging to nothing in the world?" This is a great question: How should we see that we're unbound, not caught in bondage, clinging to nothing in the world?

And this is the Buddha's reply: "They should put an entire stop to the root of objectification classifications: 'I am the thinker.'" This is Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation. But what is being translated by "objectification classifications" is papañca plus saṅkhā. So you could say "notions born of proliferation." They should put an entire stop to the root of notions of proliferation based on "I am the thinker."

"I am the thinker" is an interpretation of the phrase "I am." The fundamental conceit is "I am." Thanissaro Bhikkhu is interpreting its meaning as "I'm the thinker." To me that's a little limited—I think "I am" has a bigger sense than that. But his understanding is that "I am the thinker."

This is Thanissaro Bhikkhu's explanation: "The perception 'I am the thinker' lies at the root of these classifications in that it reads into the immediate present a set of distinctions—being and not being, thinker and thought, identity, non-identity—that then can proliferate into mental and physical conflict. The conceit inherent in this perception thus forms a fetter on the mind. To become unbound, one must learn to examine these distinctions, which we all take for granted, to see that they are simply assumptions that are not inherent in experience and that we would be better off to be able to drop them."

We'd be better off. So it's dropping basically the distinction of duality. This reminds me very much of the Bahiya Sutta in the Udana.

Remember that story? There's this teacher living in the south of India who believes he's fully enlightened. He has many students, considerable support, and complete confidence in his realization. But then a deva—a heavenly being, rather like an angel—visits him.

When he asks the deva whether he's enlightened, that question itself should have been telling. The deva responds clearly: "You're not enlightened. You're not even on a path to enlightenment. You haven't even started on the path yet."

Deflated, the teacher asks if anyone truly is enlightened. The deva tells him about a recluse named Gautama, known as the Buddha, who wanders in northern India, and provides directions to find him.

Bahiya immediately abandons everything and sets out on foot to meet the Buddha. When he reaches the town where the Buddha is staying, the monks tell him the Buddha has gone on alms round. So Bahiya goes into town and finds a being with a magnificent face, great posture, and radiant presence. This must be him.

Approaching respectfully, Bahiya says, "Venerable sir, you must be the one known as the Buddha. Will you give me your teaching in brief? Please—I see you're on your alms round."

The Buddha replies, "I can't do it right now. I'm on my alms round."

But Bahiya persists: "Life is short. Who knows how long you will live or I will live? Please give me your teaching in brief."

Again the Buddha says, "I can't do it right now. I'm on my alms round."

So Bahiya asks a third time. And as you may know, the third time always works. The Buddha gives him his teaching in brief:

"This is how you should train, Bahiya. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

He's saying: don't make a you on the basis of your sense experience. Don't build a you in relation to experience.

When Bahiya heard this teaching, he awakened. He was obviously someone with tremendous paramis—spiritual qualities and development—who simply needed this precise pointing for his mind to release and become liberated.

An hour later, walking through a field where a mother cow was protecting her calf, he ventured too close. The cow gored him and he died on the spot. His urgent message to the Buddha—"Please teach me in brief, for we don't know how long you or I will be here"—proved prophetic.

But he got the teaching, he was freed. He was liberated. But this is the same pointing that Thanissara Bhikkhu is offering. Don't imagine "I am the thinker" or "I am the hearer" or "I am the seer." In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. Take the "I" out of it.

I wanted to share one other sutta passage with you—another kind of beautiful story. Anuruddha was another great disciple of the Buddha who became enlightened over the course of practice. He had gone away to practice on his own in one part of the country, while the Buddha was staying elsewhere. As he was practicing, he had a reflection. He said that his reflection was "seven thoughts of a practitioner." They had to do with—he phrases them as "this Dhamma is for"—and I think he means this Dhamma is realizable for, or this Dhamma is realized by.

So I'll read you the seven:

"This Dhamma is for one with few desires, not for one with strong desires. This Dhamma is for one who is content, not for one who is discontent. This Dhamma is for one who resorts to solitude, not for one who delights in company. This Dhamma is for one who is energetic, not for one who is lazy. This Dhamma is for one with mindfulness established, not for one who is muddle-minded. This Dhamma is for one who is concentrated, not for one who is unconcentrated. This Dhamma is for one who is wise, not for one who is unwise."

The Buddha was living on the other side of the country, but he read Anuruddha's mind. He immediately projected what's called the mind-made body—you read about this in Don Juan also; it's one of the psychic powers in that shamanic tradition. He could generate a body that looked like his and immediately appeared next to Anuruddha to visit with him.

The Buddha said, "Anuruddha, those are seven good thoughts, but there's one more you should add to that list." That eighth one is: "This Dhamma is for one who delights in non-proliferation, who takes delight in non-proliferation, not for one who delights in proliferation, who takes delight in proliferation." The word is papañca. So this Dhamma is for one who takes delight in non-papañca—the Pali is nipapañca—not for one who delights in papañca.

He said, "Now you have these. These are called the eight thoughts of a great person about the Dhamma."

I think this is the invitation in our meditation: Do we delight in spinning out in thoughts, manufacturing thoughts for which we have great creative ability? We could keep going forever. People come on a three-month course thinking, "I'm going to think all my thoughts in the first month, and then I'll be fed up with thinking." But it doesn't work like that. Deep into the three-month course, we're still thinking thoughts—plenty of them, no end of thoughts.

What do we delight in? Do we delight in the thinking of thoughts? There is an attraction to thinking, there's no doubt about it. Or do we delight in nipapañca, in non-proliferation?

Start to feel in your meditation what is the quality when you're not spinning out in a lot of conceptual thought. What does that feel like? At the very least, there is a great quality of peace, ease, spaciousness, relaxation, settledness, avenue to concentration, presence. All those things are there.

As we take delight in that, as we develop a taste for that, it comes really to be our heart's preference. When that's established as our heart's preference, it's much easier not to get on that train. Because we know where the train leads—to being beset with all the confusion and disturbance and worry and hope and fear that papañca stirs up. We develop a preference for staying settled in the peace, the quiet, the concentration of non-proliferation.

So I think that's the message of this sutta. I'll just leave you with one question: Is there a problem in life, in your life, if you don't think about it? Or are all problems constructed by thinking they're a problem?

That was the study for today.

Thank you for your attention and for staying with us throughout this exploration.

Any last questions before we finish?

Yes?

Student offers observation: It seems like the suttas and the Buddha's words are, in fact—a lot of them are very direct pointings to how to hold the mind in meditation. And I think this is one of those. Then there are a lot of teachings about conduct also that aren't so much of that nature, but tell us how to behave helpfully in the world. But a lot of them are really direct pointers to how to hold the mind—the quality of mind, the nature of mind.

Yes, exactly. Thank you for that observation.

Administrative note from Sean: If people don't wish to take their honey ball handouts with them, they can put them on the back table so we can redistribute them rather than recycling. If you don't want to take your paper... I'm sorry we don't have an actual honey ball to offer.

Thank you all for coming. It's been wonderful to explore this teaching together with everyone. Thanks for your participation and for your listening.

CHAPTER 276

Sutta Study Class: The Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (part 1)

Guy Armstrong · 1h30

> In this opening session of a sutta study series, Guy Armstrong introduces the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (MN 18) from Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation of the Majjhima Nikāya. The discourse begins with an encounter between the Buddha and his uncle Daṇḍapāni at Kapilavatthu, where the Buddha declares he teaches in such a way as to not quarrel with anyone in the world. Armstrong explores the crucial concept of papañca (mental proliferation) - the mind's tendency to spin out uncontrollably through thinking, creating perceptions and notions that lead to suffering.
> The talk examines how saññā (perception) differs from mere sense contact, functioning as a recognition and categorizing faculty that brings along past associations and conditioning. Armstrong discusses the seven anusaya (underlying tendencies): lust, aversion, views, doubt, conceit, desire for being, and ignorance - deeply conditioned mental habits that remain dormant until triggered. The teaching emphasizes how clinging to views and craving leads to disputes, quarrels, and social conflict, with the Buddha advocating for inner peace through non-attachment to philosophical positions.
> This systematic study offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners insights into early Buddhist psychology and the practical relevance of these ancient teachings for understanding how mental proliferation creates suffering in daily life.

My name is Guy Armstrong. I'm one of the teachers here at Spirit Rock, and I appreciate you all coming out this afternoon when there's a 49ers playoff game in progress. I know it might have been divided loyalties, but the Buddha is winning in this case, so I appreciate that. And I also appreciate your interest in taking a look back at the original texts. These texts are a little dense, sometimes hard to penetrate, sometimes a little confusing, and take some effort to get in and find the meaning in them. So I appreciate people coming out and making that effort.

What we'll be doing over the next six months is offering one of these afternoons every month. It's on a dāna basis, which means Spirit Rock isn't collecting a fee for you to be here. The teachers who are doing the series are not being paid. And so to the extent that you find the class helpful and wish to express your appreciation, there will be the opportunity to offer a donation or dāna at the end of the afternoon, and as always, it's gratefully received on behalf of the Center and on behalf of the teachers as well.

We have a few teachers in the series over these six months. I'm going to begin, then Richard Shankman is coming in, James Baraz, and Temple Smith. I think those are the four of us who will be covering these six months. I can't promise that there will be a sequence to the teachings. Each of us is going to do our own thing, but I think you'll find them all interesting, and all these people have a lot of familiarity with the text, so I think it will be a good foundation for us to begin with.

Our text for today is taken from the Majjhima Nikāya, which literally means middle-length collection. I'm using a translation from Bhikkhu Bodhi from around 1995 when he published this whole collection as The Middle-Length Discourses of the Buddha. I just wrote a review for Inquiring Mind of his new book, which is the translation of the Aṅguttara Nikāya. This book, now called Numerical Discourses of the Buddha, has just come out. And so there will be a review of it in the next Inquiring Mind.

As I was writing and thinking about Bhikkhu Bodhi's contributions to Dharma in the West, I came to feel that this book, the Majjhima, was a revolutionary work for serious students of Vipassanā and Theravāda because it was the first time that the whole collection of a Nikāya had come out in a readable translation with an excellent introduction and good notes and indexes. There are five Nikāyas in the Sutta collections, and this was the first time that a full translation of a Nikāya was available. So we have in this book a way for those who want to kind of self-guide themselves into the study of the Buddha's original words. If you were going to start with any one volume in looking at the suttas, this is the one I'd recommend.

I'm picking one sutta today from this collection for us to look at, which is called the Honey Ball. That's sutta number 18. There are 152 discourses or suttas in this whole collection, and we're looking today at number 18. In Pāli, it's the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta. It's only at the very end that we find out why it's called the Honey Ball, so you have to stick around for the afternoon to find that out.

I think it's a really fascinating and important discourse, but it's one that we haven't spent much time talking about as Spirit Rock teachers. So some of it may be new. I know you're going to be familiar with some of the key concepts because you've heard the term papañca a lot, I bet. But the way that it's explained here, I find really interesting and insightful. And there are some other threads, other suttas that we'll pick up that highlight the profound significance of the term papañca and the way it affects our human lives.

I'd like to start with a little bit of an experiential reflection and ask that we all just step back a moment and with a broad view of Dharma, take a look at the question: How does suffering arise in our lives? You might say, what are the things that lead us into suffering? Where are the difficult areas of our life? What is it by our own activities that lead us into suffering? And of course this is the central question of the Buddha's teachings. We want to understand what leads to suffering and then how to release it, how to become free.

When I ask that question, I'm sure you're not at a total loss for answers. What are some of the things that you see in your own life that lead to suffering?

"Wanting things to be different from the way they are."

That sounds a lot like one of the noble truths. That's a very nice formulation of the second noble truth, which is craving. Wanting things to be different than the way they are. Sometimes that expresses itself in desire terms: I want to get something pleasant. Sometimes it expresses itself in aversive terms: I want to push away something threatening or unpleasant. But in any case, we're always trying to manipulate our experience to milk it for something a little bit better. And that's the operation of craving. How does this activity reflect itself in your experience?

This preference of wanting things to be one way and not wanting them to be another way—how do you notice it comes through in your direct experience of living? How do you see it happening in you? What's the mechanism?

Anxiety. Sadness. Habitual patterns of thought and action. And in action, can we include emotion? Thinking, feeling, acting. Emotion is also karmic, sort of volitional. So anxiety and sadness are two expressions of this. The more general formulation is habitual tendencies and ways of thinking, acting, and feeling.

Does that formulation pretty well cover it? It's quite comprehensive, isn't it? Under these habitual patterns, we could include desire and fear and anger and regret and all kinds of other particular expressions. But it's these habitual tendencies of thinking, feeling, and acting that get us into trouble.

In the realm of acting—what we might call the realm of sila, of ethical conduct in the Buddha's teachings—we're more or less covered by the five precepts. If we clean up our lives in terms of the five precepts—not killing, not stealing, not engaging in sexual misconduct, not lying, and not abusing drugs and intoxicants—we've covered the purification, you might say, or the cleaning up of the conduct of speech and body.

Then, a lot of emphasis in meditation—this is where we go next—is put on working with emotions. We start talking about the five hindrances and then open up beyond that to look at the full range of emotions that people feel: sadness and grief and anger and desire and frustration and self-judgment and loneliness, embarrassment, regret, all of those. We work with those emotions one by one to become comfortable with them.

Now, the area of thinking—why is thinking a problem? I mean, we can all relate to the distress of these difficult emotions, right? This is one of the hardest things to bear in life. Life has physical pain and life has emotional pain. That is a lot of our dukkha. What's the problem with thinking?

We make it worse.

We make it worse. How? How does thinking make things worse?

Dwelling in a mind state which is not helpful.

Yes. Thinking helps us dwell in a mind state which is not helpful. It takes hold of some situation that causes an emotion and then dwells on it, meaning we go over and over and over. As we dwell, what's happening to the mind state or the emotion? We blow it up, don't we? So thinking gets us involved in multiplying the emotional pain.

If I have an interaction with you and you do something that offends me and I feel some annoyance at the time, once your words stop, who's harming me if I'm getting upset? It's just me, isn't it? Your words have stopped. Any unskillful action from your side has ceased. It's my own thinking about and dwelling on that past situation that causes the harm again and again, that causes the suffering.

This realm of thinking is intimately connected with the difficult emotions. If we didn't dwell on the difficult emotions, what would happen to them? They'd arise and they'd pass away. But by dwelling on the situation, on the people, on the episode, on the emotion itself, we fixate on it and we keep blowing it up. So this area of thinking becomes really crucial if we want to step out of the suffering that we create in our lives.

Do you feel in control of your thinking?

For seconds at a time.

A second at a time? When the mind is steady in meditation, do you feel more secure from thoughts?

More aware.

More aware. Being able to pause. Yes. When you're mindful of your thoughts, can they impact you as strongly?

No. This was pointed to in a really fascinating sutta. I'm just going to digress for a moment. It's in the Majjhima, number 123, called "The Wonderful and Marvelous."

In this sutta, the Buddha describes—or is said to describe, though I actually don't believe a lot of this—his birth, where he descended from a heaven realm. Coming out of his mother's womb, it's said that he stood up as soon as he was delivered, took eight steps and declared, "This will be my last birth." I have a lot of general trust in the suttas, but I don't have trust in stories like that.

So he's describing the wonderful and marvelous qualities of a Buddha—his life and his understanding. He gets to the very end, talking to his attendant Ananda, and says: "That being so, Ananda, remember this too is a wonderful and marvelous quality of the Tathagata. Here, Ananda, for the Tathagata, feelings are known as they arise, as they are present, as they disappear. Perceptions are known as they arise, as they are present, as they disappear. Thoughts are known as they arise, as they are present, as they disappear."

So in the middle of all this miraculous material attributed to his life, he adds: "I know my thoughts, I know my feelings, I know my perceptions as they arise, as they persist, and as they pass away." If we set this as our goal as meditators and achieve it, we would be well down the road to freedom, to liberation. This is a wonderful aspiration for us. If we can bring mindfulness to the arising of our thoughts, perceptions, and feelings, we will discover a huge amount of inner freedom.

That's really the theme of this sutta—to start taking a close look at this habit of thinking that we've developed without much attention, without much mindfulness, and to strongly encourage making wiser choices in relation to our thoughts. That's the background and territory where this sutta is leading, pointing to some of the potential for freedom that can come.

All right, let's begin. I'd like us to read through the sutta paragraph by paragraph out loud. If you don't want to read, just say "pass" and we'll go to the next person. Max, could we begin with you? Since it's short, could you read the first two paragraphs?

"Thus have I heard. On one occasion the Blessed One was living in the Sakyan country at Kapilavatthu in Nigrodha's park. Then when it was morning, the Blessed One dressed and, taking his bowl and outer robe, went into Kapilavatthu for alms. When he had wandered for alms in Kapilavatthu and had returned from his alms round after his meal, he went to the Great Wood for the day's abiding, and entering the Great Wood, sat down at the root of a bilva sapling for the day's abiding."

Thank you. This describes a fairly typical day in the life of the Buddha. He wakes up, gets dressed in his robes, wanders for the morning meal of alms food, then comes back and simply abides. Why not, when your mind is really peaceful? He doesn't need television, DVDs, or even the New York Times and a latte. He just sits at the base of a tree, present, available for people to visit with him, as we'll see happens next.

Let me say something about the setting here. How many of you have been to some of the Buddhist holy sites in India? I thought there were a few. This is set in Kapilavatthu. Anyone been there? I think you were, Maggie. This is where the Buddha grew up—not his birthplace, which is Lumbini, but where he grew up. It's not far from Lumbini, but Lumbini is in Nepal and this is just across the border in India.

If you go to Kapilavatthu today, there's nothing there—empty farmland by and large. I don't know where the Great Wood would have been because there aren't many trees left in that part of northern India. But you can see some remnants of where monasteries were erected at the time of the Buddha. This is basically his homeland.

The clan who lived here were called the Sakyans. The Buddha was a Sakyan—that was his tribe or clan, his affiliation. His father was the head clansperson. Sometimes it's put out that his father was the king, but the king was actually in a different area. They paid obeisance to King Pasenadi, who was further west. So his father wasn't a king, but his father was a well-off, well-to-do chief of this clan. The Buddha grew up in very comfortable surroundings, and you'll see how comfortable in another passage.

This is Nigrodha's Park—not a place of huge significance in the suttas, but there are a couple of little stories about it. It's a park that was given to the Buddha in the first year after his enlightenment, presumably by a wealthy landowner. It is the site where Mahapajapati first asked the Buddha for ordination.

You know how he established the Bhikkhu Sangha? He didn't establish a Sangha—an ordained Sangha—for women. Then his stepmother, his aunt who had raised him because his mother had died, named Mahapajapati, came and said, "There are a group of us women who would like to follow you also. Please ordain us." And the Buddha said no. She asked three times and he still said no. That was at Nigrodha's Park in Kapilavatthu. Again, the family connection. You'll see a lot of these Sakyan people are related—close family ties.

Then he left and went to another town called Vesali, which he also spent a lot of time at. She followed him there, along with a few of the other women who wanted to be ordained, caught up with him, and Ananda interceded, so the story goes, and convinced the Buddha to ordain women. So he set up full ordination for bhikkhunis shortly after he had turned it down, fairly early in the life of the teachings. That's why we had the bhikkhuni order for a thousand or more years until it died out in India and Southeast Asia. Now it's coming back, which is wonderful. So that was the site at Nigrodha's Park.

So he's just hanging out in the Great Wood. He's sitting, and section three describes this next little encounter.

Dandapani—this may not have been his given name. This may be something of a nickname. It means "stick in hand." So he's leaning on what was said to be a golden stick or cane, although he was actually quite young. It gives the impression that he's a little pretentious. You have to be wealthy to have a gold stick. He didn't need it for walking, but he liked to brandish it, like a dandy. So his name, Dandapani—he's kind of a dandy. That's the trip with him.

Now, in the vernacular of the day, just coming up to a renunciate and saying, "What do you assert? What do you proclaim?" is not a very friendly way to get started. Usually they say they exchange courteous and amiable talk, and then the person sits to one side. So Dandapani is still presumably standing, leaning on his cane. "What do you teach?" He's coming across a little arrogant. He's fairly young, so he doesn't have the stature of an elder. And he's kind of spoiling for a fight.

If you know about Indian religious circles of this time, there were a lot of different sects with a lot of different views and they loved to argue. So it's kind of like, "What do you teach? And I'm going to tell you what I think." That's the way he's provoking the Buddha.

Now interestingly enough, he is the Buddha's uncle on his mother's side.

He is a brother to Maya, who was the Buddha's mother, and also a brother to Mahapajapati, who became the first ordained woman. Nonetheless—or perhaps uncles can be a little more assertive than anyone else—he's not particularly friendly in this approach.

So let's see how the Buddha reacts. Here comes this somewhat dandyish fellow who wants to argue with him. He asks, "So what do you teach?" He's just spoiling for a fight. And the Buddha responds, "Friend, I assert and proclaim my teaching in such a way that one does not quarrel with anyone in the world, with its gods, its Maras, and its Brahmas, in this generation with its recluses and brahmins, its princes and its people, in such a way that perceptions no more underlie that brahmin who abides detached from sensual pleasures, without perplexity, shorn of worry, free from craving for any kind of being."

It's quite clever, isn't it? He doesn't answer directly. Instead, he picks up on the energy and responds to it. "I proclaim such a teaching that I do not argue with anyone in the world."

You'll notice that many of the Buddha's discourses are delivered to one person specifically. He might have said something very different if someone had approached him respectfully. In many situations, he's looking for the one person in the crowd who can understand his message to the deepest level possible. He may talk past a number of people there, and the whole teaching may be oriented to that one person who, we're told, got it in the course of that discourse.

Sometimes we want to take these exchanges in the discourses and say, "Well, this is the Buddha's teaching" or "This is the central truth he was pointing to." But many of them are very situational. This is one that's very situational. "I teach in such a way as to not argue" is not the central crux or the most profound center of the Buddha's teaching. But it was the teaching for Dandapani on that day.

Let's pull out a key teaching here: "A teaching such that perceptions no more underlie that brahmin"—here brahmin is being used not as a caste, which it was at the time, but in its more basic meaning of holy person. "Perceptions no more underlie that holy person who abides detached from sensual pleasures without perplexity, shorn of worry, free from craving for being."

This basically refers to someone whose heart is liberated. They're not drawn to sense pleasures and they're not invested in becoming something great. They're free, in other words. But what's key here is "perceptions no more underlie them." This is a subtle point, but it's the heart of the sutta. Perceptions don't underlie one whose mind is liberated.

So we have to stop and ask: what does this word perception mean in the Buddhist language? In Western psychology and philosophy, perception is sense datum—the registering of a sound in our experience. But in the Buddhist language, it's something different. That registering is called contact.

In Buddhist understanding, the impinging of sense data on us through sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts and feelings is called contact. We're always contacting the world through these six senses. The word for contact is phassa. We'll meet it later on.

The word being translated as perception is saññā—a key term. Perception or saññā means the recognition of a sense datum. So hearing the sound pre-verbally, that's contact. But when your attention turns toward it and you recognize "that's the meditation gong," that's perception.

This labeling faculty, the naming, the categorizing—which is based on memory—is perception. You wouldn't know to call something a meditation gong unless you'd met one before. It's a mental activity. Animals have this quality too. When you open a can of dog food at 5 p.m., your puppy knows what that is, doesn't she? She comes bounding over because she recognizes that sound.

So perception is a part of the normal functioning of mind. It's not in any way wrong or to be gotten rid of. Sometimes people think, "Oh, I was sitting in meditation, I heard the sound and I immediately thought 'footsteps.' I shouldn't do that. I should just stay with the bare experience of hearing." But actually this perceiving faculty is one that goes on all the time. Our minds simply organize that way.

I'm sure it has something to do with survival. Millions of years ago we had to recognize what might eat us or what we might eat—very handy for survival. It's an integral part of us. We don't need to worry about it. We don't need to turn it off. So don't worry that it comes in with some verbiage overlaying your basic sense experience. It's not a problem. Words are the way we meet the world. That's okay.

If perception is wrong or inaccurate, then it can create problems, but the fact of perceiving is not a problem. This faculty of saññā takes our experience and categorizes it. As you look around the room, you are categorizing and seeing women, men, chairs, tankas, Buddha, Kuan Yin, bell, and so forth. We may not be verbalizing it, but our mind is organizing all the time. If we stuck with the bare sense data, all we would see is form and color—turquoise blob, brown blob, blonde blob. But we do more than that. We interact with that form and color and we give it names. That's okay.

This is the quality of perception. It's a recognition. It does more than just put things in a category—it brings along all the associations that we have with that sense object based on our past experience. As I entered the room, I saw people that I knew, and I perceived them as people I had known before and had warm feelings for. When you go home and meet friends or family, you often have many, many years of associations with those people, both pleasant and difficult.

When we walk out to the parking lot, we'll see a range of cars out there. When I go out to the parking lot and see a Prius, I think, "Oh, beautiful. I love Priuses. I don't have one, but if I had to buy a car, that's probably what I would buy." And if I go into town somewhere and see somebody driving a Humvee—great apologies if there's somebody like that today—I think, "I don't like that car so much because it uses a lot of gas."

We have all kinds of associations with the things we perceive, and they're very deeply conditioned. If you've ever tried to change the dynamics in an intimate relationship, you know how fixed some of those patterns of perceiving are. We perceive our partner in a certain way. We perceive our child in a certain way. They perceive us in the same way. Not so easy to undo those associations.

As soon as we connect with the world, which is really just arising fresh in each moment—there's something very unspoiled about the reality of the present moment—we have this quality of perception and it pulls along a bunch of the past and past associations. It mixes into our mind in a way that we can easily get entangled.

What is being pointed to here is that for someone who is free, they're not bound by their perceptions. Perceptions don't underlie them. So often we construct ourselves on our perceptions of our role, of our personal history, of our relationships, of our status, of our car, our home, our wealth, or whatever. We overlay on the basics of what we have contact with all sorts of interpretations that come automatically based on those old associations. All of that is part of perception. That meaning comes with a perception. That's why perception can be quite entangling. Can be, but doesn't have to be.

This little piece right here that is the reply to Dandapani in a way lays out the gist of the sutta and what's going to be explained in more detail.

So let's see how Dandapani responds to that teaching.

[Question from participant about pure perception versus elaboration]

So it's really helpful what you're saying, but I'm thinking of experiences when there was a moment of just hearing the bell that momentarily was not elaborated and how freeing that moment was. So it seems to me that there's still—it can be useful to see that overlay, not to make it a problem, but to see that there's pure perception, sound, awareness, and then there's mental elaboration that names and identifies it and associates to it.

Yes, thank you. I think that's very true. There are times when the little verbal overlay on sense datum either doesn't come in or comes in very weakly, very faintly, and there's a greater feeling of spaciousness as a result. Just being able to stay close to the bare sense data gives a greater feeling of inner peace, spaciousness, presence. When it happens like that, it's a good sign of meditation developing.

But I wouldn't want to hold that up as the way meditation should go. The most important thing is if it's like that, you notice it's like that. If you hear the sound and then the thought arises "bell," that's okay too. But you know the difference. You don't think that the sound is the bell. You understand that "bell" is a conceptual overlay that you're putting on the sound. So if you see the sound as a sound and the perception as a perception, then you're clear.

So let's see how Dandapani responds to this opening teaching.

When this was said, Dandapani the Sakyan shook his head, wagged his tongue, and raised his eyebrows until his forehead was puckered in three lines. Then he departed, leaning on his stick.

We have to value these small moments of humor in the suttas because they don't come all that often. But this is a good one. What do you read of his reaction? What's going on at his feeling level? It's kind of cryptic, right? What do you suspect?

[Responses: Lack of comprehension... skeptical... grumpy...]

Yeah, and then he goes away. So he's kind of uncomprehending, confused, frustrated, annoyed, and then he just stalks off—which is not a bad outcome from the Buddha's point of view. He doesn't have to get into a dispute. We kind of knew Dandapani was a little bit ill-tempered when he arrived, and this sort of confirms it.

So he walks off, and then let's see where the story goes next.

Then when it was evening, the Blessed One rose from meditation and went to Nagrodhas Park, where he sat down on the seat made ready for him and told the bhikkhus what had taken place. Then a certain bhikkhu asked the Blessed One, "But, venerable sir, how does the Blessed One assert and proclaim his teaching in such a way that he does not quarrel with anyone in the world, with its gods, its Maras, and its Brahmas, in this generation with its recluses and Brahmins, its princes and its people? And, venerable sir, how is it that perceptions no more underlie the Blessed One, that Brahmin who abides detached from sensual pleasures, without perplexity, shorn of worry, free from craving for any kind of being?"

So in this passage, it just describes the Buddha going back to Nagrodhas Park where he's actually living. That's where his hut would have been and where other bhikkhus are staying also. As he often does, he relates the events of the day as a teaching story for the people who are still there around the monastery, and then they question him about it.

This introduces one of the other common traits of the suttas, which is repetition. We heard the dialogue, didn't we? We read that once, but we're going to read it again. You'll find that many of the key passages get repeated once, twice, sometimes many times.

I think there are a couple of reasons for this. The repetition does bring them home more deeply. So I would encourage you when a repetition comes, don't just get frustrated and skip it.

So let me read this again, because this is really the heart of what the Buddha is pointing to in this teaching.

As to the source through which perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation beset a person—if nothing is found there to delight in, welcome, and hold to—this is the end of the underlying tendency to lust, of the underlying tendency to aversion, of the underlying tendency to views, of the underlying tendency to doubt, of the underlying tendency to conceit, of the underlying tendency to desire for being, of the underlying tendency to ignorance. This is the end of resorting to rods and weapons, of quarrels, brawls, disputes, recrimination, malicious words, and false speech. Here these evil, unwholesome states cease without remainder.

There's a tremendous amount packed into this paragraph. This is quite dense, so we want to slow down and take time with this.

First, notice that the Buddha has changed his language slightly from the opening. It's not just perceptions anymore. Now it's "perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation." The Pali word here is actually a phrase—three words strung together. This is truly the heart of the sutta.

The key word is papañca, which is being translated as "mental proliferation." This entire teaching is really about the theme of papañca—the tendency of the mind to spin out in an uncontrolled way with thinking. Someone mentioned earlier that we dwell on our thoughts, running the same thoughts over and over again, somewhat out of control. This is the thrust of papañca. It's like thinking has gone amok, running away with us. When it does that, it can wander into all kinds of pleasant and unpleasant territory, finding its way into everything.

Let's look at the terminology more carefully. We have "perceptions and notions"—saññā and saṅkhā. So the phrase is papañca-saññā-saṅkhā: perceptions and notions born of mental proliferation. Saññā is the word for perception, which we know well. The word for "notions" is saṅkhā.

As we spin out through our thinking, we see things in our life that we react to through our memories or projections. We think things based on those proliferations.

And then those disturb us. They beset us. They trouble us. Like the person who thinks about a tiger and then gets afraid of the tiger. This is what we're doing with our thought all the time. So papañca-saññā-saṅkhā is this whole fabrication through the wandering mind of all kinds of conceptual imaginings that lead us into difficulty. This is a key phrase that we'll come back to again.

Then, how do we relate to these? When these perceptions and notions that we've been proliferating about come into contact with us, how do we relate? Do we delight in them, welcome them, and hold on to them? This is that quality of fixating.

You're rummaging through the memory storehouse and you remember something that happened last week with a friend or a colleague. How do you relate to that memory? Do you let it come and let it go? As the Buddha said, he could see his perceptions, feelings and thoughts arise, persist and pass away. Or do we delight, welcome and hold on to that memory?

Some plan about the future occurs to us: "I could go for a vacation in Costa Rica this winter. Wow." Now, do I let that thought come, see it as a thought, or do I fixate on it and take hold of it and start planning? "Am I going to use Kayak or Expedia for my airfare? Do I have to rent a car or do I stay in a resort where I don't need to go anywhere?" And then we can spin out about that for a while.

So as these thoughts and perceptions come out of proliferating, do we fixate on them, hold on out of some kind of emotional investment, or not? What's recommended? Let it go. Let it come, let it go. Of course, some of them we may need to do our work effectively, to take care of ourselves and our families, but those are relatively few in the whole number that we cling to unnecessarily.

If we delight and hold on, we are not ending these underlying tendencies. This is an important list—one of the other lists that we don't talk about a lot, but it's actually very central. These are called the anusaya. It means underlying tendency. There are seven of them, which he lists here: lust, aversion, views, doubt, conceit, desire for being, and ignorance.

Have you heard some of these before? The Buddha focused on unwholesome states of mind and wholesome states of mind, and he made different lists of each of them. What are some of the lists of the unwholesome states? Five hindrances. The poisons or root causes. The fetters—ten fetters to keep us bound. Vipallāsas, perversions of understanding. The taints, the āsavas—that's a big one. There are a number of these lists, used in different contexts.

The anusaya are in some ways a very fundamental layer of the mind. The taints, or āsavas, also have this very fundamental nature. You might say the most deeply conditioned tendencies of mind are in the taints, and they reappear here. Lust is basically the desire for pleasant experience. Aversion or resistance is disliking. These are so fundamental to the mind—basically two of the poisons and two of the hindrances.

The underlying tendency to views. Views are one of the four types of clinging. Buddha said there are four things, four ways we cling. One of them is views. So we'll get into views more as we go through this sutta.

Of the underlying tendency to doubt. This includes perplexity, uncertainty, particularly about the path.

Of the underlying tendency to conceit, desire for being, and ignorance. Though conceit is this quality of comparing ourselves. It's basically considering ourselves to be something. But once we're something, we compare—are we better than, worse than, equal to other people? So the judging mind, that takes us to be something.

One of the most deep-rooted tendencies that only is uprooted at full liberation is the tendency to desire for being. How did we get here? How did we get in this body? The Buddha said it was because there was a desire to be. Why are we afraid of dying? That's a gut fear, isn't it? Quite independent of the pain, you might be assured that your death was going to be painless, and yet there would often be fear connected with that. Why is that? Desire for being. We want to exist. Most things that take birth want to exist. Everything that I know of that is born wants to exist.

And the tendency to ignorance. Ignorance is not understanding things the way they are, believing that there's a self when there isn't one.

So these seven things are very deeply conditioned habits of the mind. I find it so interesting, this translation, "underlying tendency." I think this is probably a faithful translation. People felt when Freud came along that he invented the unconscious—that he was the first one to notice that there were things going on under the surface. But this word anusaya has been around for 2600 years.

As I see it, this is kind of the level of what we might call the unconscious, because these things are sort of lying dormant in us until something happens to trigger them. But because we have these tendencies, these inclinations, we're not safe. Any of them can be triggered at any moment. And then they come through as a suffering state. So this is the realm of the anusaya. They're dormant tendencies that are in all of us until they're worked out. All of them can be purified. All of them can be released. But it's not easy, not quick.

And then it gets into a very interesting section. It goes from the underlying tendencies to "This is the end of resorting to rods and weapons of quarrels, brawls, disputes, recriminations, malicious words and false speech." In other words, this is where the underlying tendencies lead—to this whole area of dispute.

It's interesting, we don't talk about this a lot in the West. I don't hear us talking about it a lot, but the Buddha talked about it a lot. What creates disputes for people? I think this is really important because it shows the breadth of his interest in teaching. He was looking upon society, looking upon life as it was at that time, and he saw one of the great sources of suffering were people arguing with one another, quarreling, entering into disputes, and then taking up rods and weapons and actually coming to blows.

This hasn't exactly stopped today. But we tend to, as Buddhists, leave that to civil society. We're more focused on how can we cultivate heart of loving kindness? But in the broader society, this is a really important question. He has a lot of teachings on why disputes arise and what's the cause. So I'd just like to read you a few. They're in suttas other than these.

This analysis of what causes arguments generally runs on two tracks. One is views and the other is craving.

So in the society at his time, where there was so much religious debate, there was a lot of argument about views. You can see this in the academic world today. I don't know if you ever peek into the academic world, but there are some very nasty fights that go on because one person's theory is different from another person's theory. And what difference does it make? But they get very upset. Buddhists can do that too. So these are good admonishments, cautionary words for us as Buddhists.

Views are one key way that disputes, arguments, hurt feelings, grudges, and insults come about. Another one is craving—I want something and I don't want you to have it. You can see that in the conquest of land, in the pursuit of money, in all kinds of criminal activity.

I want to read some of these passages because I think they're quite illuminating, quite wise. This is from the Samyutta Nikaya, spoken by the Buddha: "I do not dispute with the world. Rather, it is the world that disputes with me. A proponent of the Dhamma does not dispute with anyone in the world."

Now that's not to say you can't sit down with a good friend and have a discussion where you take differing views of what a passage means or how you apply it in your life. That can be a healthy discussion. But when he says dispute, in this context it means argument where there's a real sense of conflict and somebody's coming away feeling like they won, somebody else feeling like they lost. So there's suffering involved in this situation.

"I do not dispute with the world. It is the world that disputes with me." And in another place he mentioned something like this, he said it's because one who sees the truth knows it and they don't have to argue about it. You can kind of see that, can't you? If we get into an argument, there's usually a little insecurity underneath because we aren't resting in real knowing. We're resting in some kind of belief. This is a very interesting thing to look at.

In the Sutta Nipata: "The sage does not get involved in any dispute that has arisen." I think he means emotionally involved because he was actually asked to mediate disputes. It happened toward the end of his life. There were some water rights that became the source of a war between two neighboring clans up north, and he did help mediate that.

Again from the Sutta Nipata: "Desisting from all theories, the wise one does not enter into dispute in the world." Desisting from all theories. So when we're talking Dharma with someone, are we talking from our personal experience and something that we know and feel confident in, or are we attaching to a theory that we think is the way things are and we want to argue with somebody who holds a different theory? The Buddha says, "Desisting from all theories."

And then I love this passage, also from the Sutta Nipata: "This I do now declare. After investigation, there is nothing among all the doctrines that such a one as I would embrace." That's a strong statement. "This I do now declare. After investigation, there is nothing among all the doctrines that such a one as I would embrace. Seeing misery in philosophical views, without adopting any of them, I discovered inner peace."

Isn't this interesting? We're not in Dharma practice to make up a theory, even if it's the best theory in the world. "I have a theory, there is no self. And I think this will free you if you take it up." "But I feel like I have a self." "No, you don't have a self. I know you don't have a self."

In all his understanding, he didn't come up with one thing that he would cling to as a doctrine that should be believed, that he would try to defend against all comers and say, "This is my philosophical view." "Seeing misery in philosophical views, without adopting any of them, I discovered inner peace."

That's our mission—to find inner peace.

It's not to develop philosophical views or cling to them. For one who is free from views, there are no ties. For one who is delivered by wisdom, there are no follies. But those who grasp after views and philosophical opinions wander about the world annoying people.

It's true, isn't it?

So I always look for this in Dhamma discussions and teachings and in teachers. Is there a general sense of metta in the discussion? Or is there a fixed holding, a rigid holding on to a view that will create conflict? I think that's a very helpful way to look at views.

So even though there's something in Buddhism called right view, that shouldn't be clung to either. Because right view is more a way of seeing than it is a philosophical doctrine.

That's one way we get into disputes: by holding on to views. The other way is basically this force of desire. Again in the Sutta Nipata, quarrels and disputes come from having preferences, from holding things dear. We hold on to the things that we treasure —whether it's our reputation, our money, our home. Once we stake out "this is mine" and hold that and cherish it, then we'll come into conflict.

In another section in the Anguttara, the roots of dispute are said to be if someone is angry and revengeful, contemptuous and domineering, envious and avaricious, deceitful and fraudulent, has ill intent or wrong views, or clings tenaciously to one's own views. This covers a lot of ground.

There's a passage in the Anguttara that is interesting because it shows the progression. "I will teach you nine things rooted in craving. And what are the nine things rooted in craving?" This is a step-by-step building, one step on the next.

In dependence on craving there is seeking. In dependence on seeking there is gain. In dependence on gain there is judgment. In dependence on judgment there is desire. In dependence on desire there is attachment. In dependence on attachment, there is possessiveness. In dependence on possessiveness, there is miserliness. In dependence on miserliness, there is safeguarding. With safeguarding as the foundation, originate the taking up of rods and weapons, quarrels and disputes.

It's a step-by-step analysis of how we form a relationship with something and turn it into possession, and that becomes the ground for argument.

This is quite a dense paragraph, this paragraph eight. Let's continue with a couple more paragraphs.

"That is what the Blessed One said. Having said this, the Sublime One arose from His seat and went into His dwelling. Then, soon after the Blessed One had gone, the bhikkhus considered, 'Now, friends, the Blessed One has risen from His seat and gone into this dwelling, after giving us instruction in brief, without expounding the detail and meaning. Now, who will expound this detail?' Then they considered, 'The Venerable Mahakaccana is praised by the teacher and esteemed by his wise companions of the holy life. He is capable of expounding the detailed meaning. Suppose we went to him and asked him the meaning of this.'"

You'll often see this in the suttas. The Buddha will say something that's a little cryptic, and then they'll go to some senior monk or nun—because nuns also get questions in this way and answer, and there are suttas in the Majjhima delivered by nuns as well. Then they will give a detailed explanation. Mahakaccana was said to be the monk who was most skilled at giving in detail the meaning that the Buddha had explained in brief.

"The Venerable Mahakaccana replied, 'Friends, it is as though a man needing heartwood, seeking heartwood, wandering in search of heartwood, thought that heartwood was to be sought among the branches and leaves of a great tree standing possessed of heartwood after he had passed over the root and the trunk. And so it is with you, venerable sirs, that you think that I should be asked about the meaning of this after you passed the Blessed One by when you were face to face with the teacher. For knowing, the Blessed One knows. Seeing, He sees. He is vision.'"

He is knowledge. He is the Dhamma. He is the Holy One. He is the Sayer, the Proclaimer, the Elucidator of Meaning, the Giver of the Deathless, the Lord of the Dhamma, the Tathagata. That was the time when you should have asked the Blessed One the meaning. As he told you, so you should have remembered it.

It's a little bit of a scolding, isn't it? And he's right. They should have asked the Buddha. So Mahakaccana, though he's a senior monk, is very deferential to the Buddha in this passage and goes into several lines of praise for the Buddha.

This is one of the things you'll find in the canon from time to time—these words of praise for the Buddha, for the Dhamma, for the Sangha. These are wonderful sources for reflection. That's why I included that extra page in your handout, the one that starts with "preliminary homage." These are traditional chants in praise of the Buddha that are chanted frequently in monasteries and have been handed down for many years. In many cases, the words come from the suttas themselves.

I thought it might pick up our energy a little if we did some chanting at this point in the afternoon. The way this is structured, I borrowed from the Abhayagiri monks' chanting book. The phrase in parentheses is usually chanted solo by the person leading, and then all the other phrases are chanted in unison. We'll do first the Pali, then the English. The English is a translation of the Pali in both cases, so you'll get a sense of the meaning.

I brought this in because I want you to get a sense that there's a devotional quality that comes through the suttas—a quality that is part of monastic life that we don't often include at Spirit Rock events. Some people resonate strongly with it and love it as part of practice. Others resist it, perhaps recovering from other religious traditions, and don't want anything to do with it. So I offer it in this light way to see if it's something you might enjoy.

We'll chant the preliminary homage three times in both Pali and English. When there's a mark above a syllable, you chant that on a higher tone. When there's a mark below, on a lower tone. When there's no mark, it's on a middle tone.

[Chanting of Namo tassa bhagavato arahato samma-sambuddhassa and English translation follows]

[Chanting of Buddha recollection in Pali and English follows]

If you were living in a monastery, you might chant this a couple of times a day. It does a few things: it tends to pick up the energy, it puts a nice melody in your head—not very stirring, not like Tchaikovsky's Fifth that's going to rouse the emotions, but pretty mellow. And it reminds you of the beautiful qualities of the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha. It's nice to have these images and words accompanying us as we practice.

The qualities of the Buddha that are pointed to here are blessed, pure, and enlightened.

And it's said that these stand for the three key qualities of the Buddha. The blessed stands for compassion because he is able to offer blessings to people out of his love and compassion. The pure stands for his purity—that is, the mind that has been freed of greed, aversion, and delusion. The perfectly enlightened one refers to his wisdom, that he is awakened by developing penetrating insight. It's the insight that liberates.

So these three qualities of compassion, purity of heart, and wisdom are summed up in this one line. And as we reflect on that, it can remind us what we're practicing for. I'm sure you can see these qualities in teachers that you connect to strongly, that you admire.

The Spirit Rock staff is going to be doing a retreat this week. Dana is going to be leading—Dana is our staff dharma teacher. The theme of the retreat is Brightening the Mind. It's a wonderful thing to take into daily life.

One of the ways to brighten the mind is to reflect on the qualities of the Buddha, the dharma, and the sangha. If this seems a little too idolatrous or worshipful, think about the qualities of a teacher that you love. By reflecting on those qualities, you can inspire yourself anytime that you feel the mind needs brightening. It's really a wonderful exercise.

Why don't we take a break here? You've been very patient. And suttas are hard work—listening for over an hour is a lot of hard work already. So let's take a ten-minute break. I'll ring a bell, and then we'll come back together.

Thank you for listening.

Sutta Study Class Series: Majjhima Nikāya; All the Taints, Part 2 of 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h07

In this second part of his study of the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), Guy Armstrong explores the Buddha's teaching on abandoning the three āsavas (taints) through seven different methods. He focuses particularly on wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) versus unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) as fundamental to spiritual development. Armstrong explains how ignorance is the most fundamental of the three āsavas and how suffering results in either bewilderment or search. The talk covers the Buddha's teaching that the hindrances are all fed by unwise attention, using practical examples to illustrate how we can get caught in patterns of giving attention to the "sign of the beautiful" or "sign of the unattractive." He examines the different philosophical views that arise from unwise attention and explains how the noble disciple practices wise attention to the Four Noble Truths, leading to the abandonment of the first three fetters at stream entry. The discussion includes practical guidance on restraining the sense faculties and the importance of not grasping at the signs and features of sense objects while remaining present and aware.

Let's continue with a little more on ignorance before moving forward. We're only at the second or third paragraph of the sutta, so we need to accelerate our pace.

I want to share a few thoughts about ignorance. This quality of restlessness in the mind is not random or superficial—it's a deeply rooted tendency that manifests both ignorance and suffering. The Buddha offered a profound insight when he said that suffering results in either bewilderment or search. Most of the world experiences both: bewilderment and searching, though typically searching through sense pleasures for an end to unhappiness.

As we become wiser, we begin searching through spiritual paths. There's often an intermediate stage of searching through philosophical views, which proves ineffective. Many people search through the intellect to construct philosophical frameworks, but this doesn't resolve the fundamental problem, so they continue searching and arguing. However, once we learn to search through meditation and discover inner peace, that path yields genuine resolution.

This bewilderment forms part of the confusion of ignorance that has lain dormant. Ignorance is the most fundamental of the three āsavas. Its position at the beginning of dependent origination suggests this—it's the starting point of the wheel. Majjhima Nikāya 9 offers this illuminating passage: "With the arising of ignorance, there is the arising of the taints." This places ignorance in a more fundamental position than either sense pleasure or becoming. Though that same sutta also states, "With the arising of the taints, there is the arising of ignorance"—showing that taints and ignorance mutually influence each other—ignorance remains more fundamental than either sense pleasures or becoming.

Now we're ready to move into the third paragraph on the destruction of the taints. We return to that crucial sentence: "The destruction of the taints is for one who knows and sees, not for one who does not know and see." Who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention.

These represent two of the most essential concepts, not only in this sutta but in the Buddha's entire teaching—concepts that we as Western teachers haven't emphasized sufficiently. These are central ideas that Ajahn Sucitto explored deeply during our recent retreat, drawing out their fundamental importance. Wise attention and unwise attention constitute the heart of the path. They serve as the counterpoint to ignorance, initiating the entire process in a wholesome direction even before mindfulness, or alongside mindfulness.

Let's examine these two terms carefully. The Pali phrase being translated is yoniso manasikāra. Manasikāra means attention, and in the Pali texts, it encompasses both meanings familiar to us in English. First, it refers to the focus of our consciousness—how we naturally shift our attention from one object to another as we survey our environment. Manasikāra also indicates where our focus lands momentarily, always changing. During a meditation session, attention might rest on an in-breath for one moment, then shift to a mental state, then to a sound, then to a passing thought, then to another bodily sensation.

The attention is always moving and highlighting different aspects of experience. That's one meaning of manasikara in Pali. The other meaning is more like: what are we interested in? What do we give attention to in a broader way in our life? Like when a small child comes up who has a cut on their thumb—you want to give attention to that, to take care of the child's wound. That's just a natural thing to do. So we could call that giving attention over a sustained period of time. Even though if we look closely, our actual momentary focus will shift from the sight of the child, to what we're going to say, to thinking about where the band-aids are, to coming back to touch the finger, and so forth. So it has both this narrow meaning—momentary focus—and the broader meaning of what do we care about and give our energy to.

Now this word yoniso is interesting, because it's being translated here as "wise," but the original meaning, as I understand it, is like a yoni. And in Indian language—I think both Pali and Sanskrit—yoni is the female organ, and it could be translated as "womb." So I've heard this explained two different ways.

One is that this reference to the womb means caring—a kind of attention that embraces, holds, nourishes, nurtures, cares for. That's one meaning I've heard explained of yoniso by a Pali scholar. The other meaning I've heard explained—and this is Bhikkhu Bodhi's interpretation—is that it means "source." Like the womb is a source, but it's source as in: where does everything come from? Let's get to the point. This is the way Ajahn Suchito explained it. Let's get to the point with this.

So an investigation or a kind of attention that gets to the point about something. The way that Bhikkhu Bodhi describes it is careful, thorough, deliberate—that kind of meaning. And attention doesn't just mean, in the narrow sense, simply noticing what's there. But in the sense of yoniso, it means more like examination, reflection, consideration, deliberation.

In the way that Bhikkhu Bodhi explains it—and this seems to fit well—it really means letting our interest and attention settle and come to understand what's going on. Get to the point of it all. So I'm going to explain it from that perspective.

As it says in paragraph three, when one attends unwisely—without a lot of consideration, without being careful in one's looking—unarisen taints arise and arisen taints increase.

Let me give you an example of this unwise attention. I was at the gym a couple of days ago, and they have a lot of magazines on the rack, so you can pick them up and read them while you're on an exercise machine. There was this one magazine—I don't know if it was People or Us, but it was in that range—and the headline was, "Kate and Kim Due Same Day!" with an exclamation point. At first I wondered who they were talking about, but then I realized, because I read enough headlines, it's Kate Middleton and Kim Kardashian. They're both pregnant, and they're pointing to the fact their babies are due on the same day, and that's a big deal.

I thought: this is really unwise attention. Whatever journalist spent enough time on that to figure it out, make a headline of it, and put it on the cover of a national magazine—that is unwise attention. The unarisen taints arise and the arisen taints increase.

So think about how much time we spend on things that aren't of any spiritual import—that aren't for our development, that don't actually benefit our mind. All the gossip that's on the web, on televisions, all the gossip about our friends and our neighbors, the curiosity we have about other people's lives.

And then think about even the things that are important in our own lives. Let's take things like our children, or our partners, or our parents, or our jobs, or our bank accounts. These are important things, but how much of the time do we dwell on them in ways that make the taints increase? With worry, with anxiety, with regret, with longing, with desire, with frustration, with irritation.

So this sutta is calling on us to look at where we put our mental energy and how we're relating to the things we relate with. Wise attention is not just about what's a useful thing to connect with in our life. It's really about how we're connecting with it. How am I relating? We want to relate in ways that will help develop our minds, our minds and hearts.

And not in ways that will erode our minds and hearts. The taints erode our hearts, while developing wholesome qualities feeds, nourishes, strengthens, and grows our minds and hearts. The Buddha says when one attends wisely, unarisen taints do not arise and arisen taints are abandoned. That means the mind comes into a wholesome place.

So one of the reflections for a meditator is: where am I putting my attention? This is not just on the cushion, which is important, but also in our daily life. Where am I putting my attention, and am I doing it in a wise or unwise way?

We want to put our attention on things like our children and parents and partners and family members and our bank accounts and our jobs and so on. Those are important parts of life. But we don't want to do it in a way that we're stoking our anxieties, fears, regrets, self-recrimination, blame, guilt, hostility, and so on. So this is a strong calling—something that we can take as a daily life practice for a very long time. Where am I placing my attention? And how am I using my attention?

Because where we put our attention, we energize that part. That part of our life gets more cared for. It can either entangle us or it can open us to wisdom. So how are we relating to those important parts of life that have captured our attention? And how many places are we putting our attention that are not really benefiting us or anyone else? Like whether Kate and Kim are due on the same day or not.

This is a very, very big area, this whole quality of wise attention. Bhikkhu Bodhi says something like—or I think this is from one of the commentaries—unwise attention is the basis for the whole round of existence. And we can see that. Our energy goes out in unskillful ways and enmeshes us with the things we relate to in life, and out of that craving gets amplified and that becomes the ground for more attachment.

On the other hand, wise attention is really the key to liberation because when we start considering things closely with this wise attention, then we start understanding how suffering comes to be and how suffering gets released. That's really the point of wise attention. How do we harm ourselves? How do we free ourselves?

The Buddha pointed to the importance of wise attention. He was talking about the factor of right view, which is the first factor of the Eightfold Path, in many ways the most important, most liberating factor of the Eightfold Path. He said there are two key factors that cause right view to grow. One is a spiritual friend, hearing from another the way things are. The second is wise attention—two key factors for the bringing about of right view.

And then there are several suttas where the Buddha talks about how wise attention is what gives rise to the seven factors of enlightenment. And the seven factors of enlightenment are what carry one to liberation. So you could say in a way it's really the foundation of the path—what we give our attention to and how we give it.

Something else that I hadn't realized until quite late in my practice because nobody ever said it to me, but it's clearly said in the suttas: the hindrances are all fed by unwise attention. Without unwise attention, the hindrances would just shrivel.

Here's an example. This is from the Samyutta Nikaya, number 46, Sutta 2: "What is the nutriment for sensual desire? Frequently giving unwise attention to the sign of a beautiful object." Think about that. What is the nutriment for sensual desire? Frequently giving unwise attention to the sign of a beautiful object.

It doesn't say giving attention to a beautiful object because it could be that a handsome man or a really attractive woman is someone that it's appropriate to give attention to. It says frequently giving attention to the sign that is the beautiful, that which is seen as beautiful in that person, physically attractive. Frequently giving attention to the physical attractiveness of someone is what makes it problematic. So the language here is so precise and so accurate, and we can see that.

It could be a new car. You go into a showroom, you're looking for a new car, and the Mercedes dealer is right next to the Honda dealer. And you thought you were going to come away with a Civic, but you've just looked at the C-Class Mercedes and you think, "Wow, that was so beautiful." And you go home and you keep thinking about it.

You keep thinking about how beautiful it is, and you start to feel the craving force arise. "I've got to have it," you think. Then you take out too large a loan, can't pay your heating bill for the winter, and face all those complications that come from giving too much attention to the sign of the beautiful object.

"Can you go over that distinction again between the sign and the object?" someone asks.

"The sign and the object? Right." The word here is nimitta, which is also used in the development of samadhi, but it's more general than just a samadhi usage. The sign of an object is its distinguishing characteristic that you zero in on.

You could meet someone and the sign they present to you—the thing you pick up on—is their wealth. You could meet someone and the sign you zero in on is their beauty. Or it could be their anger, in an off-putting way. So you focus on one particular sign about the object. It's a feature that jumps out at you, and then you frequently give attention to just that aspect. You don't see the person in their entirety. You forget the whole of it.

It's like looking at the Mercedes. If you viewed it as a whole, you'd have the impression of how much it's going to cost and what your annual budget actually is. You'd say, "It's beautiful, but it just doesn't fit." But you zero in on that one aspect and dwell on it again and again. That's what creates the hindrance.

"Is that aspect chosen to feed the ego? I mean, I choose the thing that pleases me most about that, instead of encountering the thing itself. Is there some ego behind that?"

"Yeah, there are our own biases. When we're giving a lot of attention to one sign and it's being driven by desire, there are personal biases and the self is taking root in those biases. When the grasping has happened and there's wanting, wanting, wanting, we're establishing self. There's a new becoming. The person who wants the Mercedes—the self is being born again. So there's definitely ego involved."

"What if one just appreciated the beauty of the Mercedes?"

"That's fine. Then it's totally clear. There's no hindrance at work. You could even have joy for the craftsmanship. You could take a test drive and say, 'Wow, this steers so well. I really appreciate the way they did the dashboard.' It's a beautiful thing, and I don't need it."

So let me read the next hindrance. After sense desire comes the second hindrance: aversion, or ill will.

The sutta continues: "What is the nutriment for aversion? Frequently giving unwise attention to the sign of an unattractive object."

You know somebody who's an angry person, and that's really what strikes you. You look at them and see "angry, angry," then you go home and think about that. "That person is so angry. How could they say that to me?"

Why would they do that? This kind of mental rehearsal may initially seem skillful—after all, we're trying to understand the situation. But it's the way we give attention to it over and over that builds up the aversion.

Let me share a simple example from my own experience. I was once in a meditation retreat, and I went out for my walking meditation only to find somebody in my walking path. I got very annoyed and started thinking, "Why are they in my walking path? They shouldn't be there. It's wrong of them. They should have noticed I was walking. They should have walked somewhere else and let me walk where I've been walking every time."

I kept telling myself this story, and the more I told it, the more annoyed I became at this person. As long as I was telling myself the story, I was giving unwise attention to the sign of the unattractive—the person in my path. I couldn't get free of it.

What releases us from this kind of situation is beginning to give wise attention to the experience of the moment, which is anger. In general, the hindrance tends to take us into unwise attention toward the object. Mindfulness brings us into wise attention with the emotion or the hindrance itself, and that's what can free us.

As long as we keep giving unwise attention and dwelling on the problem, we're stuck. As soon as we can turn the mindfulness to give wise attention to what we're feeling—ah, that's the way out. It may not happen immediately, but that's the way forward.

A student asks: "In other words, you bring wise attention to the unwise attention?"

I would prefer to say you bring wise attention to the hindrance itself. The hindrance is leading us to give unwise attention to the object. The wise attention needs to come to the hindrance. We feel that the hindrance is coming from the object. If I have aversion to somebody, I feel that aversion is coming from them instead of from me. So how do we turn that around?

It's simply a matter of turning the mindfulness to the aversion in oneself. Realize the aversion is here. It's something not related to that object, which is just doing what it is as it's being, even though I wish it would change. That's something I can't control. So we just allow it to be and watch our reaction to it. Being in touch with our own feelings is the most important thing.

Sometimes, of course, the person really is doing something that's not right. Consider the Tibetan monks who have been imprisoned and tortured—they know their guards are doing something truly wrong. But if they dwell on how bad it is, what the guards are doing, they'll get caught up in anger or fear. So they simply watch themselves, taking responsibility for their own heart and their own reactions.

This is something really helpful to remember about the hindrances: they are always rooted in unwise attention. If you can bring wise attention into the situation, you start to move out of the hindrance. You shrivel the hindrance when you bring wise attention to it.

This definition of wise and unwise attention is very similar to the definition of right effort—it's like one half of right effort. The definition of right effort is that arisen unwholesome states you let go of, and you guard against the arising of unarisen unwholesome states. So it's that half of right effort in relation to the taints.

The other half of right effort involves developing wholesome states and maintaining them once they have arisen.

Let us now turn to the fourth section of our readings. We have learned that there are taints that should be abandoned by seeing, by restraining, by using, by enduring, by avoiding, by removing, and by developing. The remainder of this sutta will guide us through these different approaches to working with the taints.

Let us begin with paragraph five, which addresses the first method.

"What taints, bhikkhus, should be abandoned by seeing? Here, bhikkhus, an untaught ordinary person who has no regard for noble ones and is unskilled and undisciplined in their dhamma, who has no regard for true men and is unskilled and undisciplined in their dhamma, does not understand what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he attends to those things unfit for attention and he does not attend to those things fit for attention."

This passage echoes what we discussed regarding wise attention and unwise attention. When we attend to something and the taints increase, that attention is unfit. When we attend and the taints decrease, that attention is fit. The teaching here expresses essentially the same principle, which we will explore further in paragraph six.

I want to note something significant about the opening phrase: "taints should be abandoned by seeing." Here, "seeing" translates the Pali word dassana. According to Bhikkhu Bodhi—and I believe he is correct—this represents a technical usage of dassana in the Pali texts, specifically meaning stream entry, the first stage of enlightenment. As we progress through the sutta, we will understand why he makes this connection.

In the Pali tradition, dassana carries this specialized meaning of seeing the unconditioned. A practitioner engages in continuous practice, developing insight and vipassana as the mind becomes increasingly clear and the factors of enlightenment mature. At a certain point, there occurs what is considered a breakthrough to the Dhamma—a direct breakthrough to the unconditioned. In this moment, one knows directly and personally the nature of the unconditioned, which marks the attainment of stream entry.

We will discover why this interpretation proves accurate as we continue. For now, let me simply point out the distinction: when "seeing" appeared earlier in paragraph three, it referred to the ordinary knowing and seeing of wise and unwise attention available to practitioners on the path. But here, it refers specifically to the achievement of the first stage of enlightenment.

Now, what constitutes things unfit for attention?

"What are the things unfit for attention that he attends to? They are things such that when he attends to them, the unarisen taint of sensual desire arises in him, and the arisen taint of sensual desire increases. The unarisen taint of being arises in him, and the arisen taint of being increases. The unarisen taint of ignorance arises in him, and the arisen taint of ignorance increases. These are the things unfit for attention that he attends to.

"And what are the things fit for attention that he does not attend to? They are things such that when he attends to them, the unarisen taint of sensual desire does not arise in him, and the arisen taint of sensual desire is abandoned."

The unarisen taint of being does not arise in him, and the arisen taint of being is abandoned. The unarisen taint of ignorance does not arise in him, and the arisen taint of ignorance is abandoned. These are the things fit for attention that he does not attend to.

By attending to things unfit for attention and by not attending to things fit for attention, the Buddha is talking about the person who has not been trained and is just letting the mind go in its habitual direction. So basically the taint of sensual desire is arising and not decreasing. This can happen if we turn our attention to those things that are the five chords of sense pleasure. The unarisen taint of becoming arises and the arisen taint increases. How can this be? If we turn our mind to what we want to become in the future with a sense of strong ego around that. And with ignorance we engage in seeing permanence, lasting happiness and self or attractiveness where they are not present. We give our energy to seeing, validating the vipallasas.

I want to go back to paragraph five for a moment. This phrase "untaught ordinary person" is common in the suttas. It appears over and over. Bhikkhu Bodhi says he now has a preferred translation for this, which is "uninstructed worldling"—someone who has not been exposed to the Dhamma. So a worldly person living by worldly values. The Pali word is puthujjana. You often will hear this in Dharma circles. People talk about "those puthujjanas."

Craving for existence is where the desire and craving come in—you're craving for existence. Craving for sense pleasures is a little different. We were talking about it during the break: someone who is the CEO of a company and every time he walks by, everybody smiles and bows and sort of grovels. He gets an ego reinforcement for that because he's really somebody. That's a kind of craving for existence. And that could be different than, say, the sensualist who really enjoys good food, good drink, massages. That person is more driven by craving for sense pleasure. The desire for being someone is under the second taint.

This other phrase, "true men," Bhikkhu Bodhi now translates as "superior persons"—gender neutral. And it also recognizes that this is someone who has followed the way of the Dhamma, developed their inner qualities more. So he's basically saying that the uninstructed worldling doesn't know what to pay attention to or how to pay attention, and on account of that, the taints arise and the arisen ones increase.

Giving attention to what we want to become in the future becomes unwise attention when there's a big sense of self around it. But if we're just planning—what do I need to learn in order to have a livelihood that will support myself and my family—that's all very sensible. But if we think, "I'm going to be a big important person" and get a lot of ego thrill out of that, then it's moving into unwise attention. Planning for our future support can be done very wisely. It's a good thing.

Let's see in paragraph seven how one attends unwisely:

"This is how he attends unwisely: 'Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past?

How was I in the past? Having been what, did I become in the past? Shall I be in the future? Shall I not be in the future? What shall I be in the future? How shall I be in the future? Having been what, what shall I become in the future?

Or else he is inwardly perplexed about the present: Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I? Where has this being come from? Where will it go?

These questions have an almost comedic quality, like little Gertrude Stein – "What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become?" The repetitive, circular nature of this thinking reveals how the mind can become trapped in endless loops of self-inquiry.

So this is how one attends unwisely. Now these questions may sound somewhat formal and removed from our actual experience when we sit in meditation. But when we examine these patterns more closely, we recognize that much of what we do is indeed mull over the past and future.

Especially this inquiry: "How was I in the past?" We constantly examine our actions. Was I skillful? Was I unskillful? Should I have said that to that person? Should I not have said that? We look at the past often with regret and sadness – that's how the hindrances arise. We look at the future and think: What shall I do? How shall I do it? "I have to give a presentation next week to my manager – how shall I do that? What shall I be? Will I be anxious when I do that?"

If the past generates regret and sadness, future perplexity creates hope and fear. This process is mostly unconscious. It's not as if we deliberately decide to think this way – it's being driven by these underlying taints.

One student shared that after retiring a couple of months earlier, this passage made her laugh because it captured her entire inner dialogue. "I should embroider it on something," she said. It's remarkably true – our minds do go in these loops.

All this preoccupation with past and future reveals where our minds spend most of their time, even on the meditation cushion. And as the text indicates, it's all about "I" – about me and evaluating ourselves, judging ourselves. We're often trying to find a reference point: Am I okay? Am I not okay? If I compare myself to this other person, perhaps I'll get a sense of where I stand.

This provides an excellent checklist to observe in meditation – not just on the cushion, but when washing dishes or going about daily activities.

One of the comments I've read is that what really removes this kind of perplexity is seeing dependent origination. When we start to understand dependent origination, we realize it's not so much about the solid I, but about understanding the causes and effects that lead things to unfold. Then we don't have to worry so much about trying to control every little piece of it—it's going to happen based on causes and conditions.

Let's take a look at number eight. This one is for philosophy majors, but let's go ahead and go through it.

"When he attends unwisely in this way, one of six views arises in him. The view 'self exists for me' arises in him as true and established. Or the view 'no self exists for me' arises in him as true and established. Or the view 'I perceive self with self' arises in him as true and established. Or the view 'I perceive not-self with self' arises in him as true and established. Or the view 'I perceive self with not-self' arises in him as true and established. Or else he has some such view as this: 'It is this self of mine that speaks and feels and experiences here and there the result of good and bad actions. But this self of mine is permanent, everlasting, eternal, not subject to change, and it will endure as long as eternity.' This speculative view is called the thicket of views, the wilderness of views, the contortion of views, the vacillation of views, the fetter of views. Fettered by the fetter of views, the untaught ordinary person is not freed from birth, aging, and death, from sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. He is not freed from suffering, I say."

To make sense of this—because otherwise it sounds too theoretical—let's go through these different views briefly.

"Self exists for me." This is considered the eternalist view—there is a self and it's ongoing.

"No self exists for me." This is not the Buddha's doctrine of anatta. The Buddhist doctrine of anatta never says "no self exists." It says "this dhamma is not self, this dhamma is not self, this dhamma is not self"—but it never says "no self exists." This view is what was called the annihilationist view in Indian philosophy at that time—there's really no self.

The next three are about "I perceive self with self," "I perceive not-self with self," "I perceive self with not-self." These recognize that there are two aspects to us—let's say simply consciousness and body. We might take both of those as being self, so the consciousness perceives the body and both of those are me. Or "I perceive not-self with self"—the consciousness is the self, but the body is not-self. Or "I perceive self with not-self"—the body is the self and the consciousness is not-self. Those are the different combinations.

This last view basically just says, "I am a self. Let's get on with it."

Of course, the Buddha doesn't land in any of those views. This paragraph is about having a view about things—a fixed view. What the Buddha describes is not a philosophical view, but rather the way to see things in order to liberate ourselves.

He says the way to see things to liberate ourselves is not to take the body as self, or feelings as self, or perception, or emotions, or consciousness - not to claim any of them as "I" or "my."

"Not to identify with anything?" someone asks.

Yes, not to identify with anything. That's the path that will lead to liberation, to seeing clearly. But to say "there is no self" - that's a view, and then there's actually, if you take a stance like that, there's somebody there doing it. So he doesn't take a stance on it. He's just telling us how to practice to see more clearly.

Let's move quickly through paragraphs nine, ten, and eleven, because I think you'll see these quite clearly.

Because a well-taught noble disciple who has regard for noble ones and is skilled and disciplined in their dharma, who has regard for true persons and is skilled and disciplined in their dharma, understands what things are fit for attention and what things are unfit for attention. Since that is so, he does not attend to those things unfit for attention, and he attends to those things fit for attention.

This is simply the other side of the paragraph about what the untaught ordinary person attends to. Here's what a skillful person does.

Paragraph ten describes what are the things unfit for attention that he does not attend to: "They are things such that when he attends to them, the unarisen taint of sensual desire arises in him, and the arisen taint of sensual desire increases." There's an ellipsis here where you understand that he's going through also what happens with the taint of being and so forth. "These are the things unfit for attention that he does not attend to."

"And what are the things fit for attention that he attends to? They are things such that when he attends to them, the unarisen taint of sensual desire does not arise in him, and the arisen taint of sensual desire is abandoned. These are the things fit for attention that he attends to. By not attending to things unfit for attention, and by attending to things fit for attention, unarisen taints do not arise in him, and arisen taints are abandoned."

This is still just the opposite of what the uninstructed worldling does.

And paragraph eleven: "He attends wisely: 'This is suffering.' He attends wisely: 'This is the origin of suffering.' He attends wisely: 'This is the cessation of suffering.' He attends wisely: 'This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering.' When he attends wisely in this way, three fetters are abandoned in him: personality view, doubt, and adherence to rules and observances. These are called the taints that should be abandoned by seeing."

This is quite a potent paragraph. What's this list he's attending to? The Four Noble Truths. He's seeing suffering, its origin, its cessation, the way leading to its cessation. So he is wisely attending to the Four Noble Truths, which is the undoing of ignorance. Ignorance is not seeing the Four Noble Truths. As wisdom is developed, it sees the Four Noble Truths. This is the point of the path.

When he attends wisely in this way, three fetters are abandoned in him. What does this mark? When these three fetters are abandoned - yes, stream entry. These are the first three of the ten fetters, and these are the three that are abandoned at stream entry. That's why it says "these are the taints that should be abandoned by seeing." That's how you know that the seeing here refers to that first moment of seeing Nibbana - seeing enlightenment - because the stream enterer has understood the cessation of suffering firsthand for the first time.

It hasn't fully released that person, but one has seen how it can happen. One has no doubt any longer that it can happen. One has walked the path and knows that the path leads to letting go of craving entirely, experiencing the unconditioned. And so doubt is eliminated because one knows for oneself the truth of the third noble truth—the end of craving—and that one has walked the path to reach it.

And personality view—Bhikkhu Bodhi says that what he likes to say now is identity view. This is basically identifying with any of the five aggregates: taking body as self, taking perceptions, feelings, mental formations, consciousness as self. One recognizes none of those constitute an enduring self because one has stepped out of them altogether. In seeing the unconditioned, one realizes that all the conditioned aspects are simply coming and going.

There's this very nice phrase that's repeated over and over in the suttas. It's not in this one, but it recurs again and again: "The spotless, immaculate vision of the Dhamma arose in them. All that is subject to arising is subject to cessation." That's the indication of stream entry. That's the stock phrase that indicates stream entry. I'll say it again: "The spotless, immaculate vision of the Dhamma arose in them. All that is subject to arising is subject to cessation."

So first there's the vision of the Dhamma. This is Dhamma with a capital D—the clear seeing of the Dhamma. Dhamma is often a synonym for the unconditioned, for the ultimate truth. And then, all that is subject to arising is subject to cessation. So one is seeing clearly that all conditioned things have the nature to come and go. This Dhamma is the only thing that does not have the nature to come and go. So one realizes there's no basis for identification that could endure more than momentarily.

Of course, ignorance comes back in and one forgets and one will attach again, but one has seen. So stream entry is really being described as getting a first real convincing flavor of these things. It's described as the first glimpse of the unconditioned. And it usually doesn't last long. For most people, it doesn't have the power to uproot all the fetters. The Buddha's enlightenment uprooted all the fetters with one insight. But for most people, it's more gradual than that. So the first contact, the first realization of the unconditioned uproots these three fetters.

The third fetter, adherence to rules and observances, has two senses that I know of. One is that the Buddha was teaching at a time when Brahminical culture was the religious establishment of the day. There were many texts about the rituals one had to perform, or that the priestly caste had to perform, to carry out that work of purification. And the Buddha basically said, "Sorry, rituals don't do it. Rituals will never purify one. That is not a way that the heart and mind get purified."

And the observances here—one could say that certain external practices alone could do it. There were many ascetic practitioners in the Buddha's time who thought that the way to purity was negating the body. They would spend winters in the Himalayas with no clothes. They would practice in the blazing sun and be very, very hot. They would go without water or without clothing. They would stand on one leg for hours and hours and thought that torturing the body would release the soul. The Buddha said, "No, that doesn't do it either."

So one has understood through the path that one has walked, and what's required to open the Dhamma eye—the vision of the Dhamma—that it won't be done through rituals and it can't be done through external practices. It's only a development of the mind that will lead to that, specifically the seven factors of awakening.

"Can I ask about that—by not holding on to any fixed view? I mean, this is rules and observances, but even on the path, if you hold on to any view, that will prevent you from release."

Yes, at some point one does have to let go of all the fixed views. The simile of the raft—the Buddha talked about how even Dhamma views are for the purpose of crossing over and not for the purpose of hanging on to. He says when one has crossed over, one lets go even of Dhamma views. Yes, eventually.

So these are called the taints that should be abandoned by seeing, and this seeing is meant to be insight into the unconditioned. Now, the word "taints" here is being used to describe these three fetters. So I would say that the word "taints" in this instance is being used rather loosely. Personality view is not normally considered a taint.

There are only three taints in the suttas: sense pleasures, becoming, and ignorance. So here the term is being used more loosely to describe unwholesome qualities of mind. We should understand that the definition is being expanded at this point. That's perfectly acceptable. These three fetters are all expressions, in some way or another, of sense desire, desire for becoming, and ignorance.

The three fetters mentioned here are different forms of the classical taints. I think we can move on to the next section, which I'd like to spend more time exploring: "Taints to be Abandoned by Restraining."

This passage describes how a bhikkhu, reflecting wisely, abides with the eye faculty restrained. While taints, vexation, and fever might arise in one who abides with the eye faculty unrestrained, there are no taints, vexation, or fever in one who abides with the eye faculty restrained. The same applies to all six faculties: ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These are called the taints that should be abandoned by restraining.

This relates to the earlier paragraph about objects unfit for attention, though I want to make an important distinction again. It's not that there are specific objects one shouldn't give attention to—it's that there are objects one shouldn't give attention to unwisely.

What does it mean to dwell with the eye faculty restrained? We often speak of "guarding the sense doors," especially on retreat. This doesn't mean closing your eyes or avoiding all sensory contact. It doesn't mean refusing to see a beautiful sunset, hear a bird's song, or look at an attractive person. Rather, it means that when your eye is functioning, you attend closely to the mind that's receiving that impression.

This becomes clearer in another passage from Majjhima 39: "Bhikkhus, you should train thus: We will guard the doors of our sense faculties. On seeing a form with the eye, we will not grasp at its signs and features." Here, "sign" refers to the nimitta we discussed earlier—the main characteristic that jumps out at you. "Features" are the secondary qualities you notice. "We will not grasp at its signs and features. Since, if we left the eye faculty unguarded, evil unwholesome states of covetousness and grief might invade us, we will practice the way of its restraint. We will guard the eye faculty. We will undertake the restraint of the eye faculty."

This same principle applies to all six faculties, including the mind door. We watch whether covetousness and grief arise around any of the sense doors, not getting carried away even with mental objects that appear in consciousness.

That's called guarding the senses. It's not about putting blinkers on and refusing to see anything. Rather, it's about attending very closely to the mind's reaction when experiencing things through the sense doors.

If you see a violent movie, you immediately recognize that the mind will not have a wholesome reaction—it will be disturbed. In that case, you might say, "I'll watch the birds, but I won't go to this movie." You can work skillfully with the objects themselves.

There is another list of taints that are abandoned by avoiding. If you know that certain sights will be unhelpful, you simply avoid those places. If you know that certain people will be unhelpful, you avoid those people. The texts mention avoiding bad companions—so-called friends who want to lead you down an unskillful path. This generally applies to appealing things that might lead to attachment.

Here's another way of describing this practice, from Samyutta 46.6: "Having seen an agreeable form with the eye, a bhikkhu does not long for it, or become excited by it, or generate lust for it. His body is steady and his mind is steady, inwardly well composed and well liberated. But having seen a disagreeable form with the eye, he is not dismayed by it, not daunted, not dejected, without ill will. His body is steady and his mind is steady, inwardly well composed and well liberated."

These are simply two different ways of describing how to guard the sense faculties. Whether seeing agreeable or disagreeable forms, one doesn't let them invade the mind and remain there.

"Suppose we encounter an object that we have strong aversion to, and there's intense emotion. Do we just be present with that, or is this instruction asking us to actually rein it in?"

This instruction is indeed more than just being present to what's happening. Basically, the teaching here is don't get carried away in reactivity. But sometimes one doesn't have a choice about becoming reactive. When reactivity does arise, I would say the instruction is to attend wisely to the reactive formation in oneself, rather than attending unwisely to the signs and features of the objects that provoked it. That would be wise attention in such cases.

"I'm curious about the word 'fever'—does it refer to something physiological or something else?"

I interpret it as psychological fever, but it's difficult to know definitively. You would use your own practice to determine what creates stability and equanimity.

The remainder of the sutta is fairly self-explanatory. It covers taints to be abandoned by using, by enduring, by avoiding, by removing, and by developing. In the section on developing, it essentially lists the enlightenment factors. When we develop the enlightenment factors, unwholesome states do not arise.

Regarding removal: "What taint should be abandoned by removing? An arisen thought of sensual desire, an arisen thought of ill will, an arisen thought of cruelty. He does not tolerate arisen unwholesome states."

He abandons them, removes them. So these are the three unwholesome motivations —desire, ill will, and cruelty are the three wrong intentions. As far as possible, if one has a thought like that, one doesn't dwell on it, one lets it go. Sometimes the mind is compulsive and can't let go, but the instruction is to try to let go. And if one can't let go, then one tries to be wisely attentive to it as far as possible. That's the best we can do—to be mindful. But the encouragement is to let go if we can.

So it's really abandonment. A synonym for abandon is let go. Think of it as let go. And a synonym for let go sometimes is let be, if we can't let it go. Sometimes let go means make it go away, and that has too much of an aversive push. So then we need to say let it be.

Let us wrap up our class here. May your wise attention and careful consideration of these themes recommended by the text be helpful for your own practice, for the removal and decreasing of unwholesome states. May that help everyone you come in contact with and everyone they come in contact with, so that our work together today be dedicated for the welfare and happiness of all beings everywhere.

Thank you all for coming. I enjoyed being with you and enjoyed our dialogue.

CHAPTER 278

Sutta Study Class Series: Majjhima Nikāya; All the Taints, Part 1 of 2

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this comprehensive study of the Sabbāsava Sutta (MN 2), Guy Armstrong examines one of the most fundamental teachings on the mental forces that perpetuate suffering. The sutta addresses the three āsavas (taints or effluents): kāmāsava (taint of sense desire), bhavāsava (taint of becoming/existence), and avijjāsava (taint of ignorance). Armstrong provides detailed etymology of the word āsava, explaining why various translators render it as taints, cankers, influxes, or effluents, and distinguishes these fundamental mental forces from other Buddhist lists like the hindrances or three poisons.

The talk explores how sense desire operates through the five cords of sensual pleasure, examining our cultural and economic investment in gratifying sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. The discussion of bhavāsava reveals our deep craving for existence and becoming, both on a life-to-life level and moment-to-moment as we grasp for identity and meaning. The exploration of avijjāsava (ignorance) goes beyond conceptual misunderstanding to reveal the fundamental misperception of the Four Noble Truths and three characteristics, introducing the four vipalāsas (distortions) that turn reality upside down in our perception.

This first part establishes the foundation for understanding these deep-rooted mental patterns, setting up practical methods for their restraint and eventual destruction through wise attention and the cultivation of insight. The teaching emphasizes how these taints operate continuously, creating the web of suffering that binds us to saṃsāra.

So good afternoon, everyone. My name's Guy Armstrong. I'm one of the teachers here at Spirit Rock, and I'll be with you this afternoon for Sutta Study of Majjhima Nikāya No. 2. I appreciate all of you turning up on a sunny weekend afternoon. Not only is it a sunny weekend afternoon, it's Father's Day, so it may have been a sacrifice. I appreciate everybody coming here to study the Dhamma.

I hope you have a copy of the handout which is on the table as you came in—the copy of Sutta number two from the Majjhima. By virtue of where it's placed in the Majjhima, we can assume that this is a fairly important discourse. And because it's titled "All the Taints," it's got quite a comprehensive significance. As we get into it, I think you'll see there's a lot here.

The title in Pali is Sabbāsava Sutta, which means discourse on all what are being translated as the taints—discourse on all the āsavas. The word for all is sabba. You might have heard something like the chant "Sabbe sattā sukhī hontu"—sabba means all, and the word āsava is being translated here as taint.

So before we get into the gist of the sutta, let's talk about this word āsava. It's a very important word in the teachings in the suttas, and the way it's being translated as taint is not quite satisfactory, so let's look at the etymology. Just to remove the curiosity factor, the āsavas are three in number in this sutta: the āsava of sense desire, the āsava of being, and the āsava of ignorance. We'll get to the significance of those three and how they play out.

The word itself is difficult to translate into English satisfactorily. The word sava means flow, and the long ā in front of it means either in or out—you can't tell from just the word whether it's meant to be in or out. So it either means something flowing in or it means something flowing out, and different translators will take it in different ways. But in any case, it means flows. In the human mind and heart, it means mental qualities that are coming into our experience. So you could say they're flowing into the mind, or you can say because the mind includes them as potentials, when they arise they're flowing out of the mind.

Some translators would take this ā to mean in, and they might translate it as inflows or influxes. Last time I heard Bhikkhu Bodhi speak, I think he likes the word influxes now. But at this time, which was almost twenty years ago, he was calling them taints. The translators who like the word ā to mean out might call them outflows, or I really like Thanissaro Bhikkhu's translation "effluent," because of the resonance with sewage systems. Because these flows are not beautiful—these are impurities of the mind and heart, taints as they're described here.

One of the earliest translators, I think Bhikkhunāṇamoli, used the word taint. Another translator translated it as cankers. So you get the sense these are not flattering descriptions of what's in the mind.

Of course, the Buddha had lots of different lists. This is one of the lists. He had lots of different lists for the unbeautiful qualities in the mind. What are some others that you're familiar with? The hindrances is a set. The three poisons. Defilements, more or less synonymous with the three poisons. The fetters. Underlying tendencies. Another list.

Each of these lists has a different context or connotation. The hindrances are especially the ones that arise when we turn our attention to meditation. We come into the present moment and develop the quality of mindfulness. The five hindrances are the forces that come to oppose that. The defilements—the three poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion—are usually used around the quality of action. It can be action of mind, action of speech, action of body. So they're the influences on action. They're described as the roots of the unwholesome. And because of their relation to action, they're closely tied to karma, and they have an ethical component to them.

So this list of the taints—what is this about?

This is the list I think that tries to address the most fundamental deep urges in the heart and mind that give rise to our bondage and suffering. In some ways here the Buddha is pointing to the most fundamental forces that are within us and that lead us into difficulty.

Here's one place where the Buddha describes the taints, from Majjhima 36. He says, "These qualities defile, bring renewal of being, give trouble. They give trouble. Ripen in suffering, and lead to future birth, aging, and death."

So these are such fundamental forces that we can assume they're operating most of the time in us. Sometimes more actively, sometimes in a more underlying way, but they're there most of the time. So we want to give close attention to what all of these things are. And this sutta gives us some practical ways of understanding how to deal with them. That's the beauty of it. The Buddha isn't just going to point us to sources of suffering in the sutta. He's also going to tell us how we can work with these forces.

Let's take a look at the first paragraphs. As we've done before, I like to have people read these sections as we go around.

"Thus I have heard. On one occasion, the Blessed One was living at Savatthi in Jeta's Grove, Anathapindika's park. There he addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus.' 'Venerable Sir,' they replied. The Blessed One said this:"

This is a setting that we've visited before in this series. Savatthi was home to one of the kings, King Pasenadi, and it was in Kosala. It was one of the areas the Buddha frequented a lot. He spent something like twenty-five rains retreats in Savatthi. Anathapindika is the rich merchant who was a benefactor and donated the land of Jeta's Grove that became one of his principal dwelling places. You can go today and visit this place in northern India in the town of Shravasti, as it's called in Sanskrit, and walk where the Buddha is said to have walked, sit where the Buddha is said to have sat. The "Thus have I heard" indicates that it's Ananda who's reciting the sutta, his attendant for many years.

"Bhikkhus, I shall teach you a discourse on the restraint of all the taints. Listen and attend closely to what I shall say." "Yes, Venerable Sir," the bhikkhus replied. The Blessed One said this:

So we start off and he announces that he's going to teach this sutta on the restraint of the taints. When one is restraining something, the image is like a wild horse that wants to pull every which direction, and one puts some reins on that horse in order to bring it onto a useful and workable track. So you can think of this as reigning in, controlling, managing these forces that are within us all so that the wildness eventually becomes tamed. This is an image the Buddha uses a lot in the discourses—of taming the mind or taming individuals. And what we need to be tamed from are the forces of these taints, these asavas.

This is the introduction. And then in the very next paragraph, it moves to a different topic:

"Bhikkhus, I say that the destruction of taints is for one who knows and sees, not for one who does not know and see. And for one who knows and sees what? Wise attention and unwise attention. When one attends unwisely, unarisen taints arise and arisen taints increase. When one attends wisely, unarisen taints do not arise and the arisen taints are abandoned."

So in the first paragraph, he says we're going to learn how to restrain the taints. And in this second paragraph, there's a different emphasis, which is the destruction of the taints. You can understand this as a developmental process. When we begin in practice, we need to restrain the taints in order to let the mind come to some degree of calm and peace. But eventually, as the mind becomes more developed, more peaceful, and is on the track where the enlightenment factors are being brought into maturity, then in the fullness of that, the path leads to the destruction of these qualities. So for one who is fully freed, fully enlightened, these qualities no longer arise in the mind. They are destroyed as part of the process of the path.

And when you read in the sutta that someone has realized the destruction of the taints, that's a synonym for full enlightenment. This term appears frequently—the Pali is āsavakkhaya, meaning destruction of taints. This represents the fruition, the goal, the very aim of the Buddha's teachings: that one comes to the destruction of these forces.

Now, there's a very important element in this paragraph about how we progress, but before we explore that, I want to spend more time examining what these three taints are that we're going to look at restraining and eventually uprooting.

The first is the taint of sense desire or sense pleasures—in Pali, kāmāsava. This is the taint of sensuality, referring to the way our minds gravitate toward what's pleasurable. We'll return to explore this more deeply, but that introduces it.

The second is bhavāsava, translated here as the taint of being, though what it really means is desire for existence. When Bhikkhu Bodhi explains it, he describes it as the craving for existence. Bhava means being or existence, so the shorthand is the taint of being. You could also translate it as becoming—wanting to be something—or understand it as the craving for existence.

The third āsava is ignorance—the Pali term avijjā. Combined with taint, it's avijjāsava. In Sanskrit, it's avidyā.

Is this the same as the unwholesome root of delusion? It's very similar—you could say it's more or less synonymous with delusion, though they're used in slightly different contexts. Delusion appears in the three poisons as an immediate quality of mind that leads us to act in particular ways, while ignorance is seen as an underlying quality that turns the whole process astray.

Where else are you familiar with this term avijjā or ignorance? From what other list do you know it? It's the first link in dependent origination. This really points to its primacy in the unfolding of the entire chain of suffering.

Let's examine each of these three in more detail so we understand where the sutta is directing us.

Kāmāsava, the taint of sense desire, is essentially craving for agreeable contact. This term "sense desire" usually refers to the five physical senses, not typically the sense door of the mind, though it can include that as well. Generally, it encompasses what the Buddha describes as the five cords of sensual pleasure: pleasant sight, pleasant sound, pleasant smell, pleasant taste, and pleasant touch.

I like to think about this in economic terms. Where there's significant interest, there's substantial money involved. Take pleasant sights—what industries can you think of that are founded on gratifying our sense of sight? Media, advertising, clothing, cosmetics, movies. All of these are designed to provide human beings pleasant visual experiences, and we spend billions of dollars annually gratifying this sense of sight in myriad ways.

Pleasant sounds follow the same pattern.

Music—the entire music industry, both live and recorded. Think of all the symphony halls, all the rock concerts, all the CDs and MP3s in the world. These exist solely to gratify that sense of beautiful hearing contact.

Moving to smell—some food industries serve this purpose, but primarily we see perfume and cosmetics. These industries exist purely for smell, nothing else. Deodorants, air fresheners—Febreze has made considerable money from our need for pleasant smells. Incense, soaps. Yes, soaps serve other functions, but the scent element is embedded in there for marketing reasons. You receive an advertising brochure in a magazine and it's scented for various purposes. This represents a substantial industry.

For taste, we have the entire food industry. Not necessarily for nutritional value, but purely for taste. Chocolate comes to mind immediately. The whole food industry—restaurants, food stores, what we prepare at home. Not to mention wine, fruit juices, soda pop. Soda pop has virtually no nutritional value, yet represents a billion-dollar industry. Wine, alcohol, spirits—these constitute a huge industry with vast amounts of money invested.

Of course, food is necessary for survival, so to some extent this is natural. But we could all eat tofu and brown rice every day and adequately address our survival needs. However, that wouldn't satisfy our taste desires. So billions upon billions of dollars go into providing delicious tastes.

Finally, touch—bodily sensations. What industries serve this? Clothing, for comfort and texture beyond mere warmth. Massage therapy. The sex industry, which is much larger than commonly acknowledged because much operates as an underground economy. Prostitution, pornography—this represents perhaps the biggest industry for touch. Though I'm uncertain how it compares to the massage industry, it's certainly substantial.

Notice how these industries interconnect—pornography serves both sight and touch, demonstrating how our sense desires often overlap and reinforce one another.

The Buddha actually addressed this possibility quite directly. He described different types of people who encounter meditative states, and one category he identified were those who become what we might call "jhana junkies" - practitioners who discover these pleasant concentrated states and then just want to keep returning to them without progressing further.

The Buddha's perspective was that while these states are indeed wholesome and beneficial, they're not the ultimate goal. They're more like a rest stop on a long journey - a wonderful place to pause and refresh yourself, but not where you want to set up permanent residence.

What makes the difference is understanding the purpose of these states. The jhanas and other pleasant meditative experiences serve multiple functions on the spiritual path. They provide the mind with a taste of what's possible when we're not caught up in the usual cycles of craving and aversion. They offer deep rest and restoration. And importantly, they give us a stable platform from which to develop insight into the nature of experience itself.

But if we stop there - if we just keep cycling back to pleasant states without cultivating wisdom - we're missing the deeper transformation that meditation can offer. It's a bit like someone who discovers they love the feeling of being physically fit, so they spend all their time admiring themselves in the mirror rather than actually engaging with life from that place of fitness.

The Buddha taught that true freedom comes not from finding a pleasant place to hide, but from understanding the fundamental nature of all experiences - pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. This understanding, or insight, is what leads to the kind of peace that doesn't depend on maintaining any particular state of consciousness.

So while jhana addiction is certainly possible, the Buddha would say it represents an incomplete understanding of the path. The real invitation is to use these states as stepping stones toward greater wisdom and freedom.

Well, number one, he wouldn't say it's a bad thing. Because when the mind is in a jhana state, one of the terms is that it's secluded from the hindrances. So one is dwelling in quite a wholesome place. One hasn't done unskillful things to get there. One hasn't robbed a grocery store to get the money to pay for a heroin fix, for example. One has had to develop moment-to-moment attention and mindfulness, connection to the body in order to reach that state. So one has employed wholesome means to get there and one has arrived at a wholesome place. And so that is a good thing.

Now if one stops one's practice there, that's unfortunate because one has the foundation to go further with insight, but stopping there I don't see as a bad outcome. One has samatha, one doesn't have vipassana—one has samatha. One hasn't uprooted the kilesas or the asavas, but one has suspended the hindrances temporarily.

It also just seems impossible. I mean, my experience of impermanence is that you get there and you think, oh, I'll just hang out here. And you may think that, but... you know, I don't worry about it because I don't see this as a real possibility.

You're absolutely right. What turns these samatha experiences into vipassana is the reflection on impermanence. When one exits—as one has to—from a jhana state, one reflects on the impermanent nature of that state, and that very reflection leads one to see the dukkha, the unsatisfactoriness of that conditioned state, and therefore to spark the urge to become free from dukkha altogether. That is the way it's supposed to work. The truth is that it works that way for most people. Most people can't hang out in the jhana states for very long at a time.

There's a funny story that Ajahn Jumnian tells. And the other point is the jhana states don't uproot the hindrances or kilesas or asavas—they just suspend them. So he had a nun whom he had trained who was very good at concentration. One of the higher stages of concentration, one can sit for seven days at a time without coming out, without needing to eat, without needing to move. And this nun that he had trained was able to do that. She could enter, with a resolve, one of the higher jhanas, stay in meditation posture for seven days, and then come out. She had to give herself the resolve to exit before she went in, or she might not have come out. So going in, one says, "May I abide here for seven days," and then at the end comes out.

And then he said she would go around the monastery complaining about what all the people were doing because her aversion hadn't really been touched by this experience. She'd gone into this very pleasant space for seven days. She came out and resumed her aversive habits of mind because they hadn't been either understood or uprooted or restrained, we might say.

So whenever jhanas are taught, teachers usually point to this risk that one gets too fascinated by the pleasure of the jhana. But in actual practice, most people that I know of move through that and see the limitation and are more interested in the vipassana or the insight practice that follows. So I haven't seen too many people in our circle get caught up in that, but it's a possibility.

But I do appreciate you bringing this other word, addiction, because this is a relationship that does develop to the five types of sense pleasure. And you could say in small ways, we're all addicted to those sense pleasures. I mean, most of us are. I am. When I go on a retreat, I miss the comforts of my home. I miss the food that I want. I miss the couch that I like to sit on. I miss my books or music. You know, I miss things. So to me that's a sign I'm going through a little bit of withdrawal when I go on retreat. That's a little bit of a sign of some addiction.

And then some people get very addicted, build their whole lives around a drug that makes them feel good, or money and the different things that it can buy, or sex, or people looking up to them if they're in a position of power—there's some gratification there. So addiction accompanies—is one of the real risks of these five kinds of sense pleasure.

So let me read some passages from the suttas that deal with the Buddha's advice, because this is an area that is an important part of the training, an important part of the practice. "The eye delights in forms, takes delight in forms, rejoices in forms. That has been tamed by the Tathagata, guarded, protected, and restrained. And he teaches the Dhamma for its restraint." So we'll come to some more passages later. But the Buddha teaches a lot about how we live in the world with our five senses open and we don't get caught in the things of the world through attachment.

Because this is the source of our bondage. One of the sources is we get caught in our enmeshment and attachment to the five kinds of sense pleasure. So how do we guard against that? We'll return to this question later in this sutta.

The second taint is the taint of being - bhavasava - which Bhikkhu Bodhi glosses as a craving for existence. Just consider how widespread this is. How many people do you know who don't care whether they live or die? Honestly, people who are engaged in the activity of living. I know when people are starting to die, they will surrender and say, "I'm ready to go." And there are people who develop a hatred for life or a fear of life and want to commit suicide to end it. But for people who are engaged in life, do you know any who don't have a desire to keep going? It's pretty rare.

Most people who are engaged in life don't want to die. You see this very clearly in the animal realm. Animals do not want to die. This force in us, exactly like the animal realm, is a craving to continue to exist. According to the Buddha, this is part of the mental urges that lead us after death to take another birth.

I may have mentioned this in an earlier class, but on my first three-month retreat, someone I got to know told me she went up to Joseph Goldstein, who was the teacher, and grabbed him in the hallway very urgently, saying, "Joseph, why are we here?" And Joseph said, "Do you mean here on this retreat or here at all in this life?" She said, "Why are we here at all?" And Joseph said, "Well, it's because you wanted to see and hear and smell and taste and touch."

This mixes with the first taint. We want these pleasant experiences of the five senses, and in order to have them, we have to be in a body. Notice the five sense doors are physical. If we aren't in a body, we can't have these five pleasant kinds of contact. So this deep craving for existence goes along with this craving for sense contact and sense pleasures. When we think about letting go - really letting go - part of what we would let go of is contact with the world. That's a very, very deep renunciation. Very hard to do.

A student asked: "This craving for existence - which I assume could be the next moment as well as your whole life, this craving to be born into the next moment, not being here - this is something you can observe. When you see that happening unconsciously, the one who's watching that... we could say maybe we have the ego that wants to be reborn. Then you can see that happening and relax with it."

Yes. This craving for what we call renewed becoming happens not only on a life-to-life level, but moment-to-moment. The way we establish the self in each new moment is by taking hold of something. Every time we take hold of something, we establish ourselves in relationship to it. There is a craving for that - to take a view, to take a stand, to be an owner of, to be in relation to. By grasping, we get born over and over again in the course of a day.

You can see that craving come: "I want to be something. I want to become something. I'm going to do..." This is sometimes called becoming. Even though it can appear as an act of wanting to do something, it's actually wanting to be the doer.

You can see this happening moment by moment, and if you can relax - what relaxing really means is stop grasping - then that relaxes the becoming. We're taking a new birth in the very act of taking hold of something. We are becoming again, coming into the now again through grasping.

But it is basically future-oriented. We want to become something in that way.

"I don't quite understand how this fits into the five taints, but it seems to me that a lot of our obsessing and craving and clinging is around relationship, around love, longing for love, arguing with people in our minds, and just always grasping to get people to love us so that we feel appreciated. How does that fit into the five taints?"

The question is about how our desire for relationship and connectedness fits into the taints. I want to make two sides of this. On one side, there's a natural and healthy interest in connectedness that comes out of metta and compassion. I think there's a wise way that we connect that's not related to the taints.

But there's also what we might call a neurotic or insecure way that we relate that is based on this taint of craving for becoming. I feel it in my own experience as wanting to be affirmed as somebody, or as somebody who's important to someone else. When I feel that insecurity and that need, someone else can provide that by recognizing me, by affirming me, by stating that I'm valuable and important.

"Yes, exactly. And you can go into a mental whirlwind around that."

"Yes, especially if it's not provided."

So what is this really? It's wanting to be. Wanting to be born in some way. Wanting to take a birth as someone who is important, valued, esteemed.

One of the difficulties of retreat is that we give up those contacts. We're not having those affirmations, the strokes, throughout the day. And so on retreat, we often start to feel the inadequacy, the vulnerability, the not being loved, the lack of self-esteem. It's one of the things that comes out strongly when we're in silence. That shows what we're looking for in social interaction that are driven by need.

So that's the taint of becoming, wanting to be. Psychologically, it seems to be about wanting to be something solid, trying to find some solid ground in this world which is impermanent, selfless, empty. On some level, we've intuited that emptiness. Early on, we've intuited that impermanence and emptiness.

When I was a teenager and somebody told me that the way out of my insecurity was just to be myself, I didn't know what myself was. That just threw me into more emptiness. I couldn't find myself. That wasn't helpful at all for me. It exposed the emptiness that I was trying to get away from in the first place.

I think we've all intuited that. And so we're looking for a form of self, a form of self-identity to fill that up. This is all part of the craving for existence. In its deepest form, it keeps us being born again and again—being born, dying, being born, dying, over and over.

The third taint is in some ways the most interesting: the taint of ignorance, avijjāsava. This is that fundamental force forming the first link of dependent origination. This is not ignorance of facts. It's not a conceptual kind of ignorance. It's not about not knowing who the president of Iran is now. Did you notice that there was a new election and the most moderate candidate got elected with a majority of the vote? Very interesting.

But it's not about knowing facts in the world—what's the population of the world right now, what's coming with global warming. It's not about knowing facts. It's not even about knowing Buddhist facts. It's about not deeply understanding the way things are.

The simplest definition is not understanding the Four Noble Truths. This is expressed in the suttas a few times as the very definition of ignorance—not understanding the Four Noble Truths.

Well, is there anybody here who doesn't understand the Four Noble Truths? We've all studied them, right?

There's a truth of suffering, the cause is craving, the end of it is the end of craving, and the way to it is the Eightfold Path. We all know that, right? We all understand that.

Well, knowing it intellectually and really looking at it are different things. That's what is being pointed to with this fact of ignorance. We may even know it conceptually very well. We might be able to explain it to people and teach it, but we keep getting deceived by dukkha, don't we? We don't see the truth of impermanence, so we think that things may offer a lasting happiness, so we keep taking them up.

The only reason we keep holding on is we think something's going to provide a lasting security in a changing world. So as long as we're keeping on grasping, we haven't really understood the Four Noble Truths. It hasn't penetrated deeply enough. So that's why we need to examine these truths over and over and over in all aspects of our experience so that we see them again and again everywhere we turn.

Another way to understand ignorance is not seeing the three characteristics. Again, we don't see the impermanence, so we miss the dukkha. Not understanding the full nature of impermanence, we think that we continue. We think there's a self here that continues over time. This is an important association between the self and time.

It's not obvious that the concept of "I" implies time, but it does. If it didn't, why would you worry about your own death? You would say, "I'm not going to be there." Woody Allen had this great line. He said, "I don't mind about death, I just don't wanna be there when it happens." If you understand self in the right way, you won't be there when it happens. Another you will be there, but this you won't be there, so why worry about it? But it's not that simple, of course. We think the "I" extends over time, so we think it is this "I" that will die.

So not understanding the three characteristics is synonymous with not understanding the cause of suffering and the release from suffering. We don't understand impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and the truth of not-self. These tie in with a nice little teaching that doesn't show up in a lot of places, but it's a very intriguing teaching that can be developed further than we've brought it out so far in the West, called the Four Vipallāsa. The reference is Aṅguttara 4, Sutta 49, because there are four of these things.

The Buddha said these are four distortions of perception, thought, and view. This is not just happening on one level. We see something wrongly and then that turns into a thought about it. We dwell on it with thought—that's a second level. And then we turn those thoughts into a view—that's the third level which solidifies it. So vipallāsa has all three of these levels.

The word itself has been translated as distortion or illusion or hallucination. The literal meaning, the etymology of the word, is to turn upside down. We've turned things upside down in the way we see reality. And we do this in four different ways.

I mention this because it's another way of thinking about ignorance, very close to what we've already talked about. These four distortions are that we see something as permanent, which is impermanent. Part of what this is doing is making explicit the other side of the three characteristics. We see something as satisfactory or lasting happiness, which is unsatisfactory. We see something as self, which is not-self.

The fourth is quite interesting. We see something as attractive, which is actually not attractive. Or you could say we see something as beautiful, which is actually not beautiful. This one is mostly used for sense pleasures. We think sense pleasures are the best route to happiness. An uninstructed person will see sense pleasures as the surest route to happiness, really sometimes the only route to happiness. But when looked at with wisdom...

we see that the other side of that is disappointment, unhappiness, and then craving for more. The cycle of addiction is a really good pointer to the true dynamic of sense pleasures.

The way I look at them now as a lay person, because lay people are not told to stay away from sense pleasures entirely—we have sense pleasures in our lives—is that it's not to become fixated on them. It's to continue to understand the ways in which they're unsatisfactory. Then I think we'll have a healthy relationship to them.

"Would the first step be to recognize the pleasure in experience and label it as this pleasurable experience?"

Yes. And that will allow some freedom. As far as recognizing the unsatisfactory nature, that's another step of watching, observing.

You could say something more about that. The Buddha, when he talked about sense pleasures, often talked about them in terms of three things: gratification, danger, and escape. The gratification acknowledges the pleasure that's there. The danger acknowledges the risk—basically, if we become addicted to them and think we need them for our well-being, then we're going to be very unhappy. And the escape is not to hold on, not to cling to them.

Sense pleasures come the Buddha's way and come even to renunciates. They often get good accommodations, good meals, fine clothes. As a monk, you can even get fascinated by your robes—the quality of the cloth, the dye job, how even the color is, how appealing the color is.

When I was a monk in Burma, the last time I was ordained, toward the start of the rains retreat, a layperson came and offered to the monastery a set of robes for every monk out of very fine cotton that was dyed almost purple. It was almost like the sweaters that you all are wearing today. When all the monks put on their purple robes together, we were really sharp. We all lined up for alms food, and you could have just saluted that band. It was very lovely.

So even in the renunciate life, one can become attached to the sense pleasures that one has. It's just really to keep an eye on the pleasure of it and the limitation of it.

These vipallāsas point out the danger of seeing things as permanent, as sources of lasting happiness, as self, and as attractive. When we see the danger in sense pleasures, they lose some of their allure. It's not that we shouldn't enjoy them, can't enjoy them, don't enjoy them. They don't have to make us bound if we are wise in our relationship to them.

This is a poem that follows at the end of this sutta from the Aṅguttara on the vipallāsas:

"Beings resort to wrong views. Their minds deranged, their perceptions twisted. Such people are bound by the yoke of Māra and do not reach security from bondage. Beings continue in saṃsāra, going to birth and death. Having heard the Dhamma, wise people regain their sanity. By the acquisition of right view, they overcome all suffering."

"Beings resort to wrong views"—that's pointing to the way the vipallāsas go from a perception to a thought to a view or a belief. And then the Buddha describes such people as having their minds deranged. That's strong language. Our minds have been put off track, turned upside down by not understanding.

One way to think about sense pleasures is to compare them to the promise of the path. The path can give true lasting happiness and peace. Seen from that vantage point, sense pleasures are like a consolation prize. If you don't develop the qualities of the path and find real happiness, then there are these sense pleasures to keep us gratified along the way. Of course, that's what our Western society offers people—it offers food and drink and media and music and television to provide the consolation prize to true deep spiritual happiness.

Ignorance, as we mentioned earlier, is a synonym for delusion, or the Pali word for delusion is moha. But ignorance is often considered to be something more fundamental or the more fundamental side of the force of delusion. With ignorance, we often get the idea that it's just something sort of dimming our view a little bit—that we're just not quite seeing things right, but we're just a little bit off.

But it's more sinister than that. Ignorance weaves a web that is constantly misleading us. It's not just like a dimming of the light. It is sending us in a completely wrong direction, and it's doing it more or less all the time. You notice how when you try to sit in meditation and think, "Oh, I should just sit and be at peace..."

The body's at peace. Why can't the mind be at peace? But the mind runs on with ten million different kinds of concern. Those concerns are our ignorance weaving its web again and again, saying you need to be worried about this, don't forget about that, keep an eye on this. And they have a way of establishing the self and all of its concerns again and again. These messages that thoughts are putting out beguile us and lead us away from the promise of the path, but we just take it for granted.

We simply say, "Oh, that's what the mind does." And we don't see that it's an active force that's taking us away from the Dhamma, away from the possibility of freedom. I gave a talk on this that's up on Dharma Seed. If you're interested in this aspect, I think it's called "Impulses Come from Ignorance." If you go to my page and search for "impulses" and "ignorance," that talk should come up.

If you remember the chain of dependent origination, avijjā, ignorance, is the first link. Do you remember the second link? Mental formation, saṅkhāra. That refers to this busy, active nature of thoughts and emotions that takes us out of the present moment and leads us astray. So the way it's said in the Pali is avijjā paccayā saṅkhārā—ignorance gives rise to conditioned impulses, karmic impulses. It's weaving this web all the time.

That's why it's very striking when we step out of ignorance briefly. It's rare that we step out of ignorance, but if we step out briefly, there's a shock when it comes back in and that motor starts up again. All the engine of self-concern starts up again. It's like falling out of heaven into earthly life again.

So this restlessness that's in the mind that we encounter when we try to meditate is a potent force. Even though it's just one of the five hindrances and sits right next to sleepiness and doesn't look like that big a deal, restlessness does not go away until full liberation. It's one of the last fetters.

Student*: I have a question related to that. Can you speak a little bit about the physical aspect of that? Because deep in meditation I think I can feel that very subtle stress. Sometimes I even feel how it's holding me or preventing me from completely relaxing.

Teacher*: Yes, a question about the physical side of restlessness. I think what's happened, especially being in the West today, everything is so fast-paced. There's so much stimulation in our life that we go through years and the body can't take it all in. The body is vibrating at a higher rate than is healthy, in the West especially.

If you go to Asian countries or more traditional indigenous cultures, you'll feel people are slower and they have their feet on the ground. Their bodies just don't vibrate. They talk more slowly. The bodies don't vibrate at as high a rate.

This energy that comes up in Western culture so much—we still have to function. We can't let it be like that all the time because it makes too much movement in the mind. That's where tension comes into the body, I think. We want to control that strong energy, so we tense, and then we can do our job. But we come to retreat, we start to relax a little, and then we find the body is still wound up. It takes quite a bit of time in meditation for the body to lose some of that wound-up energy.

When we talk about samatha, which is often translated as serenity, there are samatha and vipassanā effects of meditation. The serenity that needs to come in is both of the mind—that the mind slows down—but also that the body becomes more serene by letting go of some of that stored-up overstimulated energy.

Student: What I also think I feel sometimes during meditation is this place somewhere deep inside me that I think is ignorance, that's kind of looking for something. Maybe a little more fundamental than that stress you talked about—it's a little bit of vigilance.

Teacher: It's like we've looked for what can possibly threaten, what could harm us. It's an animal survival mechanism that we're always on the lookout for danger. In meditation, at some point, I think we all come upon that vigilant part of personality that's looking for "Is anything going to threaten?" And that does prevent us from relaxing.

But if we just open to that and feel that, wisdom—wisdom is very important here—can start to see, "Oh, that's not necessary." And it can let that relax also. That's something one has to go through in calming the mind, another layer.

Student: Thank you.

So we've been sitting for a little over an hour and a quarter, and I think this might be a nice time for a break. I think we'll end at four today. I've found in doing these classes that it's hard to keep our attention on the suttas for more than about two and a half hours.

So I think we'll probably plan to end about four o'clock. I think it said on the schedule four-thirty, but I found that's a little too long. So let's have a fifteen-minute break now, and we'll come back for one more hour.

CHAPTER 279

Deepening in Emptiness

Guy Armstrong · 1h06

Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of emptiness (suññatā) as the central thread running through the entire Buddhist path. Drawing from the Cūḷasuññata Sutta (MN 121) and insights from Nāgārjuna's Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, he examines both the emptiness of self (anattā) and the emptiness of phenomena. The talk investigates how our meditation practice naturally moves from getting caught in mental proliferation (papañca) - driven by craving (taṇhā), views (diṭṭhi), and conceit (māna) - toward seeing the insubstantial nature of all conditioned phenomena (saṅkhāra-dukkha). Armstrong explains how understanding impermanence gradually wears away the gravitational pull of self-clinging, even as deeply conditioned volitional formations (saṅkhāra) may persist. He guides two meditations: first examining the self-centered nature of our thinking patterns, then exploring a practice of 'abiding in emptiness' through awareness of boundless space. This intermediate teaching is particularly valuable for practitioners who have glimpsed the truth of not-self yet still experience the arising of habitual reactive patterns, offering both understanding and practical tools for continued liberation.

This talk was given at Insight Meditation South Bay. For more information and a schedule of our events, visit the Insight Meditation South Bay website at www.imsb.org. For information about online programs, visit the Bodhi Courses website at www.bodhicourses.org. Bodhi is spelled B-O-D-H-I.

Our topic for tonight is titled "Unfolding in Emptiness," or you could also call this "Emptying"—either one as you like. We're going to do a quick overview of some of the facets of the unfolding of emptiness through our dharma path. We could talk all night and probably a whole weekend just on this topic, but we're going to condense it and hit some of the high points.

We're going to offer two guided meditations: one at the beginning, followed by a dharma talk, and then another guided meditation toward the end. In the last part of the evening, I want to allow plenty of time for comments, questions, and discussion for you all to join in.

I should mention that I'm not used to teaching at night in this room—I'm in my office. I'm not quite sure how the lighting will be. I've got as many lights on as I can find, but if we have to call the game on account of darkness, well, that's just one of the things that happens in the springtime. At least you can hear me if it gets dark.

Let's begin with a meditation. Please sit as you would for your own meditations. Sit comfortably in a relaxed way, but also feel an uprightness in your body so that the spine is reasonably straight. Feel some erectness through the upper part of the body, which brings in a sense of alertness and energy. At the same time, you can let your weight drop into the sitting base. Know that the earth holds you and supports you, and you can rest there.

If you feel comfortable in your sitting posture, you can let your eyes gently close. If you're not comfortable having your eyes closed, you're welcome to keep them open.

Take as your first meditation focus the body in the sitting posture. Have the sense that your awareness pervades the whole body, that you could direct your attention anywhere in the body and feel sensations or an absence of sensation in that part of the body. You can check through the head, the shoulders and arms, the back, the chest and belly, the hips, and the legs. Awareness is found throughout the body. You can notice either sensation or a lack of it anywhere you'd like to direct the attention.

Sometimes we like to take the whole body posture as an anchor or a focus in mindfulness practice. See if we can take in the whole body posture with one look. We may not get it all, and that's fine, but have a sense that the awareness can spread out a bit and take in a good part of the body in sitting. Rest with your attention to some degree on the whole body posture.

As you're connecting with the body in sitting, begin to notice what happens when you breathe. Every time you breathe in, certain sensations arise in the body. Every time you breathe out, other sensations happen. Maintain this overall awareness of the body in sitting and just feel the sensations that come from breathing in and breathing out. You don't have to try to alter the breath to make it long or short or deep or shallow. Just breathe naturally and feel the sensations that come.

From time to time, you may lose touch with the sensations of breathing because the attention may get captured by a thought or a train of thoughts. This is natural, as you know, and can happen often in meditation practice. The attention may go into a thought for a few seconds, or a quarter of a minute, or a few minutes. But at some point, the attention will return to the present moment, and again, you can feel the body and breathing.

Normally in vipassana instructions, we simply say: when the attention returns to the present moment, just notice that a thought was there, don't judge it, and let the attention return to feel the body and breath. But in this meditation, I want to ask you to do a little bit of investigation with the thought that you've just noticed.

You've returned to the present moment; a thought has just taken place, or perhaps a train of thinking. I'd like to ask you to take a quick look at the content of that thought to see what it was about. Once you've noticed the content and have a sense of what it was about, then return the attention to the body and breath.

Please practice in this way for the next several minutes, feeling the breath in the whole body. When you notice that a thought has taken the attention for a while, just investigate to find: what was that thought about?

For the last couple of minutes of the sitting, I'll ask you to reflect a little bit. Having noticed the content of a number of thoughts, I want you to investigate one more thing: Was there a common thread to those thoughts? Any common theme that you might identify that those thoughts share?

Take just a minute to review the thoughts you noticed and see if anything links them together.

The meditation bell has rung, so you can open your eyes and return to the group. I'll pick up the dharma talk now, coming back to the questions I asked you to investigate, but first I want to open with the theme of the evening.

We're talking about unfolding and emptiness. We should explore what this word means. The basic meaning of emptiness, which many of you already know, is that everything in our experience is not solid or substantial, even though it might appear that way. This applies to the events of our inner experience as well as the objects of the world in our outer experience.

This sounds simple, but there are actually many assumptions embedded in this statement, and the full unpacking of its implications can take quite a bit of practice.

Something to say very clearly upfront is that emptiness in the Buddhist context is not a blank or a vacancy or a nothingness or nihilism. It's not leading to despair or an emotional state of deadness. It's not any of those things with negative connotations. I think the word is provocative for us and sort of forces us to ask, "What is the Buddha talking about here?" But I think it was probably provocative in his day as well, maybe even more so because there were so many philosophical systems floating around that tried to explain through concepts the way the world worked.

It's a term that makes us sit up and question, that makes us wonder a little bit. But please throw out the idea that it's going to lead somewhere depressing, because that's not where we're headed.

Emptiness, when understood in our experience, is an insight that enriches life. So much so that people say the understanding of emptiness really leads them to feel the fullness of the life they have. I think that's a good way to hold it: emptiness leads into a feeling of fullness.

The aim is for us to free our hearts and minds. It's not about some intellectual theory or a grand philosophical notion. It's a very practical tool designed for us to free ourselves.

This was brought home to me when I was watching a DVD I've had for a while—a series of teachings that the Dalai Lama gave in Tucson a few years back on a chapter in Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, specifically the chapter on wisdom. He started off by remarking that he'd been in Tucson thirteen years prior to the current visit where the filming was being done. That was a nice way to reconnect with this audience because he probably met a number of them before.

Then he said, "Yes, since thirteen years ago, oh, I haven't made much progress." And everybody laughed because you don't think that the Dalai Lama needs to make much progress. But he still practices in a very dedicated way and is still committed to his own full awakening. It was wonderful to hear his humility and lightness around that.

But then he went on to say that what little progress he had made came from a deepening understanding of his bodhisattva vow and further insights into emptiness. That's the Dalai Lama—over the past thirteen years, more insights into emptiness. He's still learning and growing and developing from this area.

We're not going to get it all in one night or in one retreat, but it's a very rich and full teaching. In fact, one of the things I want to say tonight, and the reason I titled the talk the way I did, is that the entire path we're on can be understood as a deepening in emptiness. When we understand it correctly, it is emptiness that takes us from the beginning to the middle to the end—to liberation. Even nibbana is described as the supreme emptiness. So it is a thread that we can follow all along the course of our own journey of awakening.

There are two primary meanings within the whole Buddhist tradition of the term, and these can be summed up as emptiness of self and the emptiness of sense phenomena.

This is where I want to come back to the first meditation we did this evening. When you looked at the thoughts that came and took you away from the present moment, briefly or for a while, did you find a common theme? We don't really have time right now to hear your reports on that, but what I find when I look closely at my thoughts in this way is that the thoughts that take me away are all about me. They're all about myself in one form or another. They're about I, me, and mine.

Those are the thoughts that grab me. Those are the thoughts that claim my attention. And those are thoughts around areas where I've invested energy in my life—things that I care about because I have some self-interest about them. They show different facets. It could be about my work, my relationship, my health, my family, my finances, my friends. But they are all areas that are near and dear to me. That's what takes me away from the present moment.

I don't find myself waking up in the middle of a long string of thoughts about how to solve the humanitarian crisis in Yemen. That's not what's grabbing me. It's self-centered thinking and the emotions that go along with that. In this way, you come to see that the self is kind of like the North Star of our life—that point in the heaven that everything else revolves around. This North Star is central to the way we think and feel and view ourselves and life and the world.

The next thing that's interesting to look at, although we didn't get into this investigation this evening, is: did any of the thoughts go on for a while? Sometimes in meditation, there'll be a thought and you're just gone for a few seconds and then right back in the present moment—body, breath, sounds, whatever. But sometimes a train comes along that seems very interesting. We hop on the train, go down the tracks, and it could be half a minute, a minute, even fifteen minutes before we come back and notice, "Oh, here's the body and here's breath."

These long thought excursions have a special name in the Buddha's teachings. They are called proliferations. You get the sense of how one builds upon the next, builds upon the next, and you're off on a long journey of mental proliferation. The Pali term for this is quite good: papañca. It has that kind of punchy quality to it. Papañca means proliferation.

The commentaries—the Buddha didn't say this, but the commentaries—identify three primary forces that drive proliferation. It's very interesting to start tuning into these forces as well that lead us on these thought trains, to see if they line up with this traditional explanation. It's said that the thought trains are driven in three ways: by craving, by views, and by conceit. In Pali, this is tanhā, diṭṭhi, and māna. Māna, or conceit, is not as commonly spoken of, but it basically means the belief "I am," or the sense "I am." Māna is the deep tendency of mind to try to locate ourselves somehow, somewhere.

So see if your thoughts could be summed up—I like to sum these up as "I want," "I think," and "I am." Things I want in the world, views and opinions that I hold that kind of define me, or "I am" in relation to someone or something else. This is often our role in society, in our family, or in our work. I want, I think, I am. This is a lot of what makes up our proliferations. They're all just different expressions of self.

So what's the problem? Well, as you know, these selfing thoughts can lead into a lot of suffering. They're often bound up with reactive emotions of greed or aversion or confusion. These are the forces that drive us. These are the expressions of tanhā, of craving, really.

This is again from the Dalai Lama: "One of the most important insights in Buddhism comes from what is known as the understanding of emptiness. At its heart is the deep recognition that there is a fundamental disparity between the way we perceive the world, including our own experience in it, and the way things actually are."

This is sobering. The disparity between the way we perceive the world and the actuality of the world—in this gap is where suffering is born. So the whole point of our meditation practice, the whole point of insight meditation, is for us to see things the way they actually are. This is the meaning of vipassanā, because it said that

When we see things the way they are, we come to peace. We come to freedom and we live with wisdom. This is why we meditate. So emptiness is a pointer to that gap between how we think things are and the way things actually are.

You probably know that for many years of his life—the last twenty-five years of his life—the Buddha was attended by his cousin Ananda, who was one of the sweetest figures in the whole Pali Canon. He cared very much for the Buddha and took great care of all the visitors who came to see him. Because they spent so much time together, Ananda had the chance to ask all the dharma questions that he wanted.

So at one point he came to the Buddha and said, "Blessed one, it is said empty is the world, empty is the world. What does this mean?"

And the Buddha replied, "The world is empty because it's empty of a self or what belongs to a self. The world is empty of a self."

That's a challenging statement. There's no basis in reality for this belief in self. But wait—that's our North Star. Everything in life revolves around self, and you're telling me there's no basis for it?

This is really the same as the Buddha's teaching on not-self, or anatta, which I'm sure you've heard in many dharma talks before. In this first part, emptiness of self is equivalent to the teaching on not-self, or anatta.

But if that's the case, what does the Buddha mean by "the world"? What is empty of self? This is important to clarify.

This is described in a discourse called the Discourse on Totality, where the Buddha says, "Bhikkhus"—which means for us practitioners; we're all bhikkhus if we're sincere in practice—"what is the totality of things? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of things. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality of things would not be speaking of something they knew about."

So what the Buddha is describing here is our own direct experience of the six senses: the five physical senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch—and the mind door, mind objects, which are basically thoughts and emotions, states of mind. This is the totality of things.

This is quite a lovely statement, especially from a great spiritual teacher, because we're not pointing to some abstract notion or some remote ideal like union with Brahma. The Buddha is directing us to look at our immediate experience. This is really what sets the stage for our meditation practice, for mindfulness practice, because mindfulness is to become aware of our direct experience of these six kinds of sense happenings. As Joseph Goldstein likes to say, there are only ever six things going on.

So this is the field that we need to get really familiar with, become free in. As we explore these six kinds of sense happenings with our mindful attention, one of the things we ask early on is: are these things permanent or impermanent? Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind objects. Have any of them ever lasted for you? No. They're all impermanent.

What's missing from this list? The self. There's no self in this description of our experience. And what do we understand as an assumption about the self? There are several hidden assumptions, and I won't go into all of them tonight—I do talk about them in the book—but one of the key ones is continuity. We think the self is ongoing, in some way has been the same since we were in grade school up until today, and will be the same until we die. But none of the facets of our experience at the senses meet that criterion. And that's how we know something's off in our concept of the self.

Well, how do we know that we have this assumption of continuity? Because we're worried about dying. We think it is this self that is going to meet death one day. If we thought someone else was dying, we wouldn't be as worried. But we think "I'm going to die" and therefore we worry.

So vipassana practice or mindfulness practice in the Eightfold Path takes this view of totality—the six senses—as our field of practice. We develop skill in paying attention to all these things as they arise and as they pass away, as they arise and as they pass away. So immediately,

We are coming out of the field of mental proliferation and into the reality of sense experience. This is a big deal. We're retraining the mind not to get lost in the broad, expansive fields of papañca. We are training the mind to stick with the reality of the six senses. Instead of going into the field of papañca where we increase "I want," "I think," "I am"—where the self just proliferates—we come into reality, and that selfing gets starved. We don't give it the attention we had been giving it that feeds the sense of self.

Not only that, but when we start to examine the nature of these sense appearances, we find something else that's interesting.

A few years ago, I was down in your neck of the woods and the Dalai Lama was giving a series of talks at Shoreline Amphitheater. I don't know if any of you were there, but it was a lovely occasion. It might have been in May because it was sunny, but not baking hot. He was up on the big stage up front. If you know the amphitheater, there are lots of rows of seats in a semicircle and then a big grassy lawn, so you could either sit in a chair or go back and put a blanket out on the lawn. The big speakers that normally would be used to blast the Grateful Dead back in those days were full of the Dalai Lama's voice. It was just a delightful setting to listen to him.

He was talking on the Heart Sutra, which is all about emptiness—one of the key texts in the Mahayana. The theme he was on was dukkha and how we get led into suffering. He explained there are three kinds of dukkha, and this comes straight out of the Pali Canon.

There's dukkha-dukkha, which is the straightforward form of suffering—painful experience of body and mind. There's vipariṇāma-dukkha, which is the pain of alternation. That means something goes along that's pleasant for a while, but then it changes. It alternates and becomes neutral or unpleasant. In any case, we lose the pleasure of it.

And then he said there's the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena, which is called saṅkhāra-dukkha. There he explained the problem is not simply that impermanence means something goes on for a while and then changes or goes away. When we look into the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena, what we see is that every appearance at a sense door is arising and vanishing, arising and vanishing, moment after moment after moment. This takes us into the field of the emptiness of phenomena.

All the phenomena that the Buddha described as being in reality, as being in totality, none of them last more than momentarily. This is something that we discover through our practice of vipassana, through insight meditation, as the concentration deepens. This is seen quite clearly.

So in a way, this aspect of saṅkhāra-dukkha explains the difference between just seeing impermanence and seeing emptiness. When we recognize impermanence, we know that nothing is really going to last forever. But some things seem like they last quite a long time—like the smell of the new car we've had for three months already, or a new relationship that we're really quite into might last three months.

But saṅkhāra-dukkha shows that nothing is lasting in a substantial way for more than a moment. So both seeing into impermanence and seeing into emptiness are taught for the same reason: to persuade us not to hang on. Because if we're hanging on to the pleasant, it's going to hurt when it goes. Impermanence says it's going to change. What emptiness shows in saṅkhāra-dukkha is there's nothing solid there to hang on to in the first place.

Every appearance is truly insubstantial and therefore ungraspable. In many cases, all that we can hang on to is a memory to which we've given a name. We call it "a good meditation" or "my partner" or something. Once we've given it a name, then we can hang on to the name and the memory. But the thing itself keeps changing as we look at it.

So as we see into impermanence, it does wear away the sense of self. It reduces clinging, and clinging is what gives rise to a sense of self. The Buddha put it this way: "When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sense desire, it eliminates all ignorance, and it uproots all conceit of 'I am.'" This is a powerful statement about seeing impermanence, one of the three characteristics. It leads to a very full experience of the Dhamma.

So as we come into the present moment, we're more in touch with reality. Selfing is getting starved.

So the self starts to be reduced just through our normal mindfulness practice. We are more in touch with reality. There is less giving rise to papañca of "I want, I think, I am." And we are less inclined to cling because we see that nothing is substantial enough to cling to. All these things go on in our practice.

Of course, these insights take quite some time. They take years to develop and come to fruition, but they do come. And so the self exerts less—I would say—gravitational pull.

The gravitational pull of the self is basically felt as a contraction. The self is trying to hold on, to solidify, to cling to, to bring things in. And in that there's a narrowing, there's a narrowing of focus to the desired objects, to draw them in and hold onto them. And that shrinks our being somewhat.

As we let go, there's a widening that happens. There's a relaxation in the body and a greater ease. And with that, the mind sort of spreads more outward. There's an opening, there's a widening. And then at some times, the self can even temporarily go away.

You might know this poem by Li Po, the Chinese poet:

"The birds have vanished down the sky
Now the last cloud drains away.
We sit together, the mountain and me, until only the mountain remains."

So these moments come in meditation when the self temporarily just isn't present, may not be present at all for a period of time in our meditation or in nature perhaps. There may even be an awakening, an awakening to our deepest nature.

Do either of those things always uproot the self formations completely? No. The selfing activities are deeply conditioned and they don't stop so easily, even though they've been seen through, even though we've understood there's no actual self there.

This is from a Korean Zen teacher named Seongcheol: "Although one has awakened to one's deepest nature, the beginningless habit energies are extremely difficult to remove suddenly. And so one must continue to cultivate while relying on this awakening. Through this gradual permeation, one's endeavors reach completion. Hence, it is called gradual cultivation."

So what Seongcheol is pointing to here is a kind of intermediate stage on the path, isn't it? We've reached some understandings. We've seen through the self. There may even have been a partial awakening. And yet the activities of the self are still going on. We can see them. We know that they're not leading in the right direction—they're just more "I want, I think, I am"—but they're compulsive. We can't stop them so easily.

So at this point, we might want to start reflecting on these patterns that I would call our personality. We'd say our personality consists of our habitual ways of thinking, feeling, speaking, and acting. This is how we come to know somebody. We observe them, we notice how they tell us how they think and feel, we observe how they speak and act, and we see ourselves in the same way. We know well how we think and feel, and we can observe our speech and actions.

So we get a sense of our personality shaped in a certain way. Each person has their own kind of unique combination of mental traits that lead to these actions. It's consistent to some extent, right? You kind of know your friend is going to be a certain way. You kind of know you're going to be a certain way, reacting to different circumstances, but it's within some variety, within certain bounds.

There's a consistency to personality, even as we understand there's no self there. There's no solid core at the middle. If there were, we couldn't be liberated. We couldn't be free.

That solid core would get stuck and would block the true liberation, the uprooting of all ignorance, the ending of the conceit "I am." There's no solid core. So the personality is really malleable.

And yet, as we observe even from this partly awakened place, we see the same habit patterns repeating again and again and again. This can be frustrating. We've seen the emptiness of self, we've seen the emptiness of phenomena, and yet the grasping continues. If we look more closely, the habits of greed continue, the habits of aversion continue, the habits of fear continue, or the habits of confusion. We all have different varieties of these, but they are all variations on the theme of the defilements of greed, aversion, and delusion.

These patterns are volitional. They are not just random. They are built on things that we want, on views, on sense of self. We have generated these patterns ourselves. They are volitionally formed. As the Buddha says, "Whatever a person frequently thinks or ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind." So we could call these our volitional formations. It's a synonym for our personality.

Interestingly enough, "volitional formations" is the name the translators give to the fourth aggregate, which is sankhara—states of mind that are put together from these impulses, greed, aversion, and delusion. We start to understand that this is a deeply conditioned part of our approach to the world, a deeply conditioned way that we see ourselves and others.

We may have come into meditation practice hoping that there would be a quick resolution, a speedy resolution of this desire force or this angry force or this fearful force or this confusion that leads us into suffering. But it's not so quick. Even with understanding, as we do, it's not so quick.

At this stage, we really need to trust that the dharma is doing its work. Sometimes in this stage, people see, "Oh, I still have the same conditioned responses to things. I still get anxious. I still get frightened. I still have so much wanting or ambition or craving for control or something like that. Am I not going anywhere? Is the path really not helping?"

But the path is helping. The path is working, because one of the things that I can almost guarantee is happening is that the intensity of those conditioned reactions is decreasing. And perhaps even the frequency with which they come is decreasing. But sometimes we don't step back and take a look at that. We just see, "Oh, I still have anxiety. The anxiety isn't going away. Oh, the practice isn't working. It's never going to lead to freedom."

This is where we have to renew our trust in the dharma. We have to trust the process.

Nagarjuna was a brilliant author around 100 to 150 of the common era, one of the early teachers in the school that later became the Mahayana. His central work is all about emptiness. It's called "Root Verses on the Middle Way," available in a number of English translations. It's really a wonderful book to deepen one's understanding of emptiness. If the Buddha was the king of emptiness, Nagarjuna is the prince in our tradition. He's a very interesting lineage to study.

One of the things Nagarjuna says is that emptiness stops papañca. Emptiness stops papañca. So the more we penetrate the truth of emptiness, both on the level of self and on the level of phenomena, it undercuts this tendency to run off into "I want, I think, I am." It cuts through and can eventually halt that string of papañca that gets us involved in so much selfing and the attendant suffering.

We have to trust in that. The Buddha put it this way: when a carpenter looks at the handle of their ax,

They see the impression of their fingers and thumb, but they don't know how much of the ax handle has been worn away today, so much yesterday, so much earlier. But when it has worn away, the knowledge occurs to them that it has worn away. So we don't know how much of the ax handle is still to go or how much has been worn away from yesterday or the day before, but we do know that it is wearing away. And this is what we have to trust in.

Basically what is happening is that emptiness and our attention—giving ourselves to the present moment, starving those self-generating papañca patterns—is wearing away the confusion, the kilesas, the greed, and the aversion. All those karmic patterns, we call them karmic patterns because they spring from our own volition. Volition, as you probably know, is at the heart of karma. It is whether our intention in an action is wholesome or unwholesome that determines the weight, in the Buddha's view, of that experience, of that action.

So mindfulness is constantly cutting through our karmic formations. And that's why Nagarjuna went on to say, "Karma is not abandoned by letting go, but by meditation." So we don't just decide, "I'm going to let go of this volitional pattern. I'm going to get rid of this karmic pattern and formation." It doesn't work that way. Karma is abandoned by seeing it clearly in meditation and not buying into it. This is the way.

Now, mindfulness practice will go there, but I want to suggest another meditation that lends itself, I think, really well for this stage of the unfolding and emptiness. One has seen through the reality of self. One has seen the insubstantiality of sense appearances. One doesn't want to go on clinging, and yet the habits still keep arising. So let's explore a meditation that the Buddha might call "abiding in emptiness." This is based on a discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 121, the lesser discourse on emptiness. Let's see how it fits and if it's something that appeals to you.

So again, please take a comfortable meditation posture. We'll just do this for about ten minutes, and then this will be the last part of the evening before we open up to discussion, questions, comments.

So again, please sit comfortably. Be relaxed and upright. Let your eyes gently close.

Once again, feel the body in sitting. Notice that the body is really filled with awareness. Wherever you turn your attention, you can find yourself in the body—from the top of the head, through the abdomen, into the sitting base and legs. Awareness can move to any of those points that you choose and notice what's there.

For one thing, we notice that there's a distance, a felt sense of distance between the top of the head and the feet. The body is a physical object located in space, and we can feel a gap, a space between the top of the head and the feet. So we feel the sense of space within the body. We can also feel a distance between the right arm and the left arm—another sense of space.

As we let the attention move through the whole body, we see the whole body is located in space and that there's distance between all the different parts of it. We can feel that this is not imaginary. This is the felt sense of the body.

Now, as you explore this distance within the body from the top to bottom, from right to left, is the whole of the outline of the body jammed full of sensations? Or are there areas in the body where no sensations are apparent or felt? Is every cubic millimeter of the body chock full of sensation? Or do you actually find space within the body? We might say between the sensations, even within the sensations. Can you notice some empty space within the body?

So you have a sense of the space within the body. And now, can you also get a sense of the space around the body? Perhaps where your skin is exposed, you feel the coolness of the air or the warmth of the air. Air around the body, space around the body.

If you'd like, you can open your eyes momentarily, take in the space in the room, and then close your eyes again and see if that sense of space stays a little bit—space around the body.

So there's space within the body and space around the body. Are these two really different spaces, or is there one space that you can feel holding the body, containing the body, as well as within the body?

Can you get a sense of that one space that you feel both inside and beyond the body? Let yourself notice now that space, that one space. Bring your attention to it and investigate a little bit.

Does that space have an edge or a boundary? Or does it feel like it might go on and on? Well, if you're in a room, you might feel, "Oh, it stops at the wall." But if you were to open a window, then you might well have a sense, "Oh, that space keeps going on." Or a door—"Oh, that space keeps going on."

If a door or window was open, would it really affect your felt sense of that space? Could it be that your felt sense of space really doesn't have an edge or a boundary? Could we say that you may be able to perceive a space that is boundless?

In any case, I invite you to put your attention on that perception of space, however wide it seems to you, and make that the focus for your mindfulness. Let your focus be on that space for the remainder of this sitting—the last couple of minutes. And then notice: how does it feel to have the attention on that perception of space? What is that like for you as a meditation focus?

That was the meditation bell signaling the end of that guided meditation. I just want to say that this is adapted from that discourse, Majjhima 121 that I mentioned—the lesser discourse on emptiness that the Buddha gave.

I find this perception of space a very helpful focus because when I focus on the whole body, that can be very pleasant. But the body still has painful aspects and pleasurable aspects, which can easily lead to being involved in liking and disliking. When I move the attention to space, it doesn't have those pleasurable and painful aspects. And so I find that the mind is able to rest the attention there with greater equanimity. And yet there is a clear focus for the attention to land on.

One more wrinkle, which we don't have time to go into tonight: you can inquire what is knowing that space and then put your attention on the knowing element. This offers some of the same beauty as the meditation on space, but that's for another exploration.

That's really what I wanted to cover in the talk and the meditation this evening. Thank you for listening.
