And the three unwholesome actions of mind, he said, were covetousness, which is about wanting what someone else has; ill will, wishing another person harm; and, most interestingly, wrong view—not understanding things the way they really are. Because when we have wrong view about the world and about ourselves, we act based on a false understanding of reality. And that gets us into trouble.

The ten wholesome actions are simply to refrain from the ten unwholesome actions. This is wonderful because it gives us a guideline—a very practical guideline—for our daily lives. Once we understand the importance of karma and the results of karma, we have really clear standards by which to guide our external actions. It's extraordinarily helpful, especially in our outer life. The Buddha was very strong about taking great care with our conduct.

He said that one who has taken real care with their actions for quite a while enjoys what he called "the bliss of blamelessness"—a certain freedom from regret or remorse. When you come into a situation like this where things are really quiet for a while, often, if you haven't experienced this before, a certain amount of life review takes place. You start remembering things you've done that weren't so skillful, and one can be filled with regret. The mind can become very clouded as a result—heavy with self-judgment.

But having taken care with our conduct, we are free from that kind of regret. It brings the bliss of blamelessness and allows the mind to settle more easily in happiness, which leads to concentration, which leads to insight, which leads to freedom. So this moral foundation is a really important part of the meditative path.

How far can this be developed? I like to think about people like His Holiness the Dalai Lama, who's been working on this for a long time now. The Dalai Lama had an interview a few years ago with Oprah Winfrey. This is one of the great things I think Oprah does—she brings great spiritual teachings to a very broad audience, and I really appreciate that. There's nobody else who does it quite like she does.

She started the interview by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable, not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experience with more advanced meditators—even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind—I don't lag too far behind."

Part of the reason for his meditative skill is this bliss of blamelessness. His mind can just rest very happily in its own nature because he doesn't have any regrets about his conduct. A beautiful statement.

So we're only about thirteen lifetimes behind him. We'll get there too.

This is the field of action, which has moral weight based on volition. And then the central teaching of the Buddha is that actions do have consequences. They have consequences based on the nature of the intention behind them. The basic message is that wholesome intentions lead to wholesome consequences, while unwholesome intentions lead to unwholesome consequences or unhappiness.

Ruth Dennison, a great elder in our tradition, has a way of putting things very succinctly. She said, "Karma means you don't get away with nothing, darling."

This is the law. The Buddha also said this very crisply near the start of the Dhammapada collection of verses: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief."

Speak and act with an impure mind, and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. This is the basic message of the law of karma.

And this understanding is becoming more accepted in Western culture. Some years ago, James and I were teaching a class to some young men in a juvenile hall in San Mateo. A friend of James worked in the juvenile hall and managed to get us the invitation to go in. These became the class series that eventually grew up and were taken over by the Mind-Body Awareness Project and the Lineage Project. This was the beginning of it.

We taught a six-week series on meditation, which we didn't call meditation because we figured they wouldn't be into it. We called it "Mind Power" so that they could dig it. At the end of the six weeks, we handed out certificates with each person's name stating they had completed a six-week training in Mind Power. One of the young guys—and you know, in juvenile hall, people are under the age of eighteen, awaiting trial—asked, "Can I take this certificate and show the judge?" These kids, whose whole life could be in front of them, don't know what's going to happen when they actually go to trial.

We'd been teaching them the usual suspects of mindfulness: being with the breath, being with body sensations, being with emotions, feeling emotions in the body. This emotional work was really helpful for them because, first, they were a captive audience, so to speak, and they were very receptive to the teachings. They had a lot of time on their hands. And juvenile hall, like most prisons, is emotionally a very charged place. These young men don't know what's going to happen to their lives. There's a lot of anxiety, and at the same time, there's a certain amount of aggression going on. They had a lot of time just to feel what was happening. It was not easy for them. So learning to relate with fear and anger were very helpful tools.

Near the end of the class series, we thought, "Well, we should say something about sila, shouldn't we? Should we say something about the precepts? Should we talk about karma?" James and I sort of looked at each other and debated it back and forth. We finally decided we only have one chance to speak to these guys—let's do it.

So we introduced the notion of karma and said something like, "If you act out of anger or fear, it's going to come back in your life in unhappy ways. But if you act out of kindness or caring, it's going to come back to your life in happy ways. Does that sound like something you've ever heard before?"

One of the young guys put his hand up and said, "You mean 'what goes around comes around'?"

"Yeah."

He said, "Sure, we can relate to that."

So that idea is already there in the culture. It just needs to be spelled out more. They got it quickly.

The Tibetans have a series of phrases for the brahmaviharas that are a little different than ours—quite similar, but a little bit different. And embedded in their phrases for loving-kindness and compassion is some of this same teaching. They call these states the four immeasurables because they're boundless states.

The phrase for loving-kindness is: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." It's beautiful because it puts the understanding of how happiness comes about directly into the wish for happiness.

The compassion phrase is: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue." This becomes a daily kind of reflection that one might do in the Tibetan tradition.

The Buddha said that this law applies to all beings. It's a universal law. It doesn't matter if you believe it or not. It doesn't matter if you know it or not. It doesn't matter if your religion believes it or not.

It doesn't matter if your culture believes it or not. It applies to all beings because these forces of the wholesome and the unwholesome are in everyone. And particularly, our growth in the path is based on this same law, which we'll explore further next time.

So far in the Brahmavihāras, we've gone through loving kindness, compassion, and appreciative joy. In a couple of days, we'll introduce the practice of equanimity. It turns out the practice of equanimity in the Brahmavihāras is based on the teaching of karma.

The classical phrase I'll mention now—and you'll be given the opportunity to practice with it in a couple of days—is: "All beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are their relations, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of those they will be the heirs."

Sometimes for Westerners, this is a bit of a shock. This seems like kind of a tough phrase. If your mind doesn't relate to it easily, we have some softer versions that we'll be happy to offer in a couple of days' time. But this reflection points to how beings, to some extent, create their own destinies or their own journeys through life, and everyone has their own way.

It's a reflection that can be very helpful with friends and family members. Do you have any of those people in your life who keep making the wrong choices? You see it coming, and you want to tell them, "Don't do that. If you do that, it's going to be a train wreck. I can see it coming." But they don't want your advice, right? They never want our advice. So we allow them to make their own choices and we see how that leads in many cases to their own suffering. But that's how they have to live out their own choices and their own direction.

The Buddha in the suttas actually stated this phrase even more strongly: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their relations, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of those they will be the heirs."

This is quite a powerful reflection when you carry it in a sustained way like we do with Brahmavihāra practice, because we start to see how our very being is emerging from our own past actions. Moment after moment, we are born, we are taking birth from our own past actions in these patterns that go on over a whole lifetime. These patterns of acting and feeling and thinking that we are the owners of. When we start to understand in this way, it brings about a tremendous sense of personal responsibility. If we want the outcome to be favorable, we have to start the work from within our own hearts.

I find that Westerners often have a strong resistance to this notion. In Western culture, it's not familiar, and it conflicts with some of our cultural values. I think especially in the West, we have very strong democratic ideals about equality. The second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence, where the United States declared its freedom from Great Britain, starts by saying, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all people are created equal."

This notion of equality goes very deep in the West, and it's a wonderful, inspiring ideal that I think points to a deep truth. It's inspired political movements all around the world in really beautiful ways. But somehow it comes along with another idea, which is something like people should be equally happy. And that doesn't seem to be the case. It just doesn't seem to work like that.

So when we say that people are to some extent responsible for their own happiness, it seems like kind of a cold worldview. Where's the compassion in that? Where's the caring? It can seem very cruel sometimes. As a reading into this teaching on karma, sometimes people think, "Oh, well, what the teaching is saying is that beings deserve their pain and they deserve to suffer. If they've done unskillful actions, then they deserve to suffer."

That is not implicit at all in the law of karma. The Buddha taught for forty-five years out of compassion to end people's suffering. I'm very convinced that if he could have looked within the heart of every person he met and plucked out the source of suffering, he would have done it. He didn't have any idea that people deserve to suffer.

A classic example is Aṅgulimāla. Aṅgulimāla was a sincere spiritual seeker and student who unfortunately took advice from a not-so-skillful teacher who told him that in order to progress on the path, he needed to murder a thousand people, collect a finger from each individual, and wear those severed fingers in a necklace. His name meant "finger necklace."

So Aṅgulimāla had hidden out in the forest and killed everybody who walked by until he'd reached the number 999. He just needed one more to make the teaching complete. The Buddha was planning to walk his way. So the Buddha's supporters said, "Don't go that way. Aṅgulimāla is staying there and he will rush out and kill you."

And the Buddha said, "I'm not worried. That's the way I'm going to walk."

So he walked that way. Angulimala came to attack him, but he wasn't successful. And when he encountered the Buddha, he was so impressed by the Buddha's dignity and poise and lack of fear that he bowed down and asked to become his student.

So at this point, the Buddha could have said, "Oh, sorry, but you deserve to suffer. You're a serial killer. And I think you just need to have your karma play out and you'll reap a lot of suffering and you deserve that." He could have done that, but he didn't.

The Buddha ordained Angulimala, taught him the Dharma, taught him how to practice, and in a relatively short period of time, Angulimala was awakened. He remained a bhikkhu for the rest of his life, remained a part of the Sangha.

When he would go out on alms round, people still thought of him as the mass murderer, and they would attack him and not offer him food and throw things at him and want to injure him. And Angulimala came back and told the Buddha about that, and the Buddha said, "You just need to bear that. That's part of your karma. But your mind is free." And his heart was cleared of all that hatred.

So the teaching on karma doesn't imply anything about deserving to suffer, but it is a law. To expect that we can do unskillful things and not suffer would be like expecting an apple to come off the stem and not fall to the ground. The law of gravity says if the apple comes off the twig, it's going to fall to the ground. There's no way around it. You can't stop the law of gravity and you can't stop the law of karma except through deep spiritual realization, which we'll talk about more next time. And that's how Angulimala got out of the worst situation of his suffering due to the Buddha's compassion, due to the Buddha's wanting him not to have to suffer the consequences of those actions.

Another way we sometimes take this that's also off the mark is we think that karma becomes the reason not to care. We see someone in suffering and we think, "Oh, well, it's their actions that took them there, therefore it's their fault, so it's their problem, so I don't have to care about them." That's also a misunderstanding.

That attitude is called indifference. Indifference is the near enemy of equanimity. As you know, the near enemy is an unwholesome state that masquerades as the wholesome. Indifference is not the appropriate attitude toward any kind of suffering. So the proper attitude is compassion. When the heart is awakened and open, the response to suffering is compassion.

So it doesn't matter where the person's suffering came from. It could be a purely physical cause. It could be some mental cause. It could be an accident. It could be some kind of attack or assault. It could be many sources. It doesn't matter where it came from. Compassion wants to relieve the suffering. Indifference is off the mark of the teachings. So we often talk about in teaching equanimity, take care that it doesn't slide into indifference. And if it does, then the equanimity needs to be warmed up with more loving kindness and compassion so that it has that balance.

So these results of action come through in at least six different ways. There are six ways we can understand the results, the consequences.

We feel it before we act. If we're thinking about doing something wholesome, it feels good. You know, when Carol talked about the generous actions that she and her friends carried out in Burma, I know that as they were planning those actions, they got great feelings about the people that were going to be able to be supported by them. And when we think about doing something unkind, it doesn't feel so good, even before we do it.

In the moment we're acting, we feel that quality of the intention. When we're doing something loving and generous, it feels good in the very moment. When we're doing something unpleasant, unkind, it hurts in the moment. Sylvia Borstein has this lovely expression: "Anyone causing great pain is themselves in great pain." And you can feel that, can't you? That harming and hurting.

After the action, as we recollect it, we can feel wonderful about the skillful things we've done and we can feel a lot of regret about the unskillful things. So in the metta practice, we often encourage this recollection of our past skillful actions, actions of love and generosity, as a way to feel good about ourselves as people.

The fourth way that we feel these consequences is that our actions come back to us from other people in the ways that we've related to them. So if we've been kind, supportive, generous, loving, affectionate toward people, then when we meet them, they're happy to see us.

They're very open. They're warm and generous and welcoming back. If we've been cold or critical or judgmental or angry, then when we meet those people, they're not so open to us. They're not so welcoming, not so inviting to us.

The fifth way that we can feel these consequences is in habitual states of mind. And this we get to know through observing these karmic patterns in our own meditation practice and in our lives. We find that our minds fall into fairly predictable grooves. And those grooves have been created just by the repetition of those habits of mind before, again and again.

This is from the Buddha: "Because whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, then their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

So through this repeated activity, we form this groove in the mind that by habit we tend to fall back into again and again.

These are five ways that we can feel the results of karma experientially, pragmatically, in our own observation.

Then there's a sixth way, and this is the kind of mysterious way that most of us cannot verify. And that is that our actions bring results in the future in some kind of unpredictable and unexplainable way. And this is mysterious. I don't know how this works. How is it that kindness brings happiness? How is it that kindness brings good things into our life? I don't know. But the Buddha said that he could see that from his own direct experience, that this actually is the case.

So this is the point at which when one says, "I don't believe in karma," this is the point that people don't necessarily believe in. And you don't have to believe in this. As long as you see the other five ways which are verifiable and come to trust in that, that's plenty to fuel your practice. But I encourage you to think about, consider this other possibility a little bit. Because it's kind of a profound comment on the universe that we live in.

Originally some people think that the teaching on karma is cold or heartless or uncaring because it puts so much into personal responsibility. But I see it differently. You know, after hanging out with this teaching for a while, what it says to me is the truth of morality, goodness and ungoodness is woven into the very fabric of the universe—that this is a universal law that applies to all sentient beings everywhere. This is not just something that's constructed out of evolution for social ease in generating a better society. The Buddha's teaching points to this being an essential element in the fabric of the universe for sentient beings.

What that says to me is that we live in a moral universe. Not just a moral evolved human society, a moral universe. That this law has been there from the very beginning. So to me, this teaching warms the universe up. It doesn't feel cold and heartless. It feels like there's a heart of caring at the very center of sentient life. And it's the kind of universe that I want to live in, where morality is an integral part. And that's part of what the Buddha was pointing to.

Now, the way these actions play out are mysterious and they're complicated. The Buddha said that if you tried to figure it out, you would go mad and experience vexation. Which comes first, I'm not sure. But they both sound not so helpful.

So we can't figure it out, like how the karmic results unfold. All we can do is take it on some faith that this might be a possibility and then explore. So he called this one of four imponderables that are not advised to reflect on. The other three are the range of mind of a Buddha, the kind of insights a Buddha can come to; the beginning of things, the origin of the physical universe; and the third is the range or the power of a concentrated mind. These are beyond rational comprehension.

Another misunderstanding is sometimes we believe that everything that happens can be attributed to karma. So the Buddha was asked about that one time. He said, "Is everything painful or pleasant that happens to us the result of our past action?" And the Buddha said, "It's not like that. You can't say that." He said things come from other causes. And he mentioned illness, diet, climate, accident, and assault. So the understanding is there are several kinds of causes in the universe—physical, chemical, biological, genetic, psychological, etc.

And karma is another one. So karma is one force that causes things to unfold, but it's not the only one.

With this teaching of the mysterious unfolding, I would encourage you to keep an open mind about it. If we say, "I don't believe that—that's false, there's no basis for that view," that's just another speculative position because we don't have the insight to know whether it's false. You can simply keep an open mind and hang out with it.

As I've sat with this concept over time—it was foreign to me when I started practice—and as I've watched people's lives unfold over the thirty-five years I've been in the Dharma, knowing people for that length of time, I've come to have considerable faith in this teaching and the mysterious ways that it works. But it took me a long time to arrive at that understanding. Just hang out with it, let it sit there, evaluate it over time, and see where you end up.

I want to talk a little about rebirth, because part of these karmic results have to do with future lives. Again, this teaching on future lives and rebirth is an integral part of what the Buddha had to communicate, and he considered it important. He wouldn't have taught it if it were merely incidental. He knew much that he didn't bother sharing, but this teaching on rebirth weaves through many, many discourses. It's not something that appears just once, which you could discount by saying, "Oh, that was added by later editors." It comes up again and again in many different suttas, on many different occasions, in many different contexts.

The understanding here is that the actions we carry out in this life influence the conditions of our next birth. After death, there is some continuity that takes place. There will be a birth in the future after our passing away that bears some connection to our life now. To see the full playing out of karma, one has to look at this possibility of future lives. Without this perspective, I don't think one can really come to have much faith in this teaching.

Consider a simple example: Pol Pot, dictator of Cambodia from 1976 to 1979, responsible for a regime that killed twenty-one percent of the population, exterminated the professional classes, monks, and nuns, and virtually eliminated the educated class and all the Buddhist clergy of the country. Pol Pot was driven out of power by the Vietnamese in 1979, but he formed a kind of shadow government near the border and lived until about 1998 when he died. Some suspect he was poisoned, but that's not entirely clear.

When I look at the trajectory of his life, I do not see any suffering proportional to the horrific crimes that he committed through his regime. I have to consider that the suffering that will eventually come to him is being played out in his next life—probably currently being played out. Sometimes it's not possible to see this cycle of karma and the unhappiness that results from actions within one human life. But the Buddha often talked about wholesome actions leading to happy births, unwholesome actions leading to unhappy births, in a way that makes this understandable.

The Buddha talked about the effects of specific actions which he could see. He said things like: killing living beings will lead at some point to a lifespan that is not long; injuring living beings will lead at some point to a lifespan characterized by ill health. But on the positive side: not killing living beings will lead to a lifespan that is long; not injuring living beings will lead to a lifespan that is healthy. Being generous in our actions will lead to a life in which we experience abundance at some point; being stingy will lead to a life where we experience lack or scarcity.

What he didn't say—and I want to make this clear—is that you can take current conditions and use karma as a rearview mirror. In other words, you cannot say, "Because I'm having health problems, therefore it means I killed living beings in my past life." He never said you could use it to look backwards and draw conclusions.

In this understanding of karma, we cannot use it as a rearview mirror. Some people become concerned about this—if they're experiencing suffering in this life, they worry it means it's a result of unwholesome past actions. There is nothing in the teachings that provides ground to support that conclusion. Please don't take it in that way. We cannot see that clearly. That would just be a speculative view. So we shouldn't judge ourselves, and we shouldn't judge others, on that kind of basis. We don't know if suffering came through karma, accident, assault, genetics, or what—it could arise from many different directions.

The Buddha said again that karma is the womb from which we are born. In that agrarian society of India 2,500 years ago, grain was a form of wealth. "Grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, servants, workers, and dependents—none of these can you take with you after death. You must cast them all aside. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner."

Therefore, do good actions. Gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings after death.

Now, you may not believe in this teaching about karma and rebirth. You don't have to believe it. But what if it's true? What if the Buddha was right about this the way he was right about all the things we've already verified? How would you want to live your life? We'd really want to be careful, wouldn't we? We'd be mindful not to harm and motivated to do a lot of good.

So the Buddha said this is a good bet to make. Act as though it's true whether you know it or not, believe it or not. Act as though it's true. If it is true, then you'll have the rewards in this life and in future lives. If it's not true, you'll still have a great life in this life. This is described in a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 60, if you'd like to read it. So it's a good bet.

But what's happening in rebirth? The question is: what is it that gets reborn?

I have to interject here with Trungpa Rinpoche's quick reply to this question. "You want to know what gets reborn? It's your bad habits." He's saying that from a perspective where the beautiful habits of mind are all intrinsically there in consciousness, so of course they carry forward. And the individual patterning is made out of bad habits. But that was a little cynical throwaway.

So let's talk about it in more detail. We can understand this process of rebirth either as one life to the next or moment to moment in this life. We've talked about this process of becoming and taking birth based on contact, feeling, craving, clinging. This is the moment-to-moment description of being born again and again. And then there's also the dying and taking a new birth description. The process of karma in both is pretty similar.

Let's think about it for a minute in the moment-to-moment birth in this life. Say you walk into a meditation period and you're very untroubled about your basic identity. You walk in and you're Sari or you're Klaus or you're Don, and you know who you are and you sit down. You know who your personality is. You sit down and in the middle of your meditation you have a very clear recognition: everything is changing. Sights and sounds and smells and tastes and touch and thoughts and emotions—they're all just coming and going. There's nothing fixed in this whole process. You see clearly it's all impermanent.

Bell strikes. Stand up. Oh, Sari's back. Klaus is back. Don is back. The personality reassembles, doesn't it? You can be in this vast openness, clear seeing of impermanence, nothing lasts—stand up, personality's back. It's like that, isn't it?

There are these ways that we feel ourselves that we could call patterns of our personality—familiar ways we think and feel and believe and see that go on, even though our moment-to-moment experience is totally impermanent, nothing fixed, totally changeable. But these patterns which kind of tell us who we are, that are consistent, continue.

So that's how, when I come out of a meditation, I don't get reborn as the Dalai Lama. Much as I might like to stand up and be him, I get reborn as Guy with my kilesas and all. So these patterns, both the beautiful qualities and the difficult qualities, kind of get recreated over and over and over. And this is that groove in the mind.

It's curious because if we look minutely, there's no continuity. There's nothing we can put our finger on and say, "This is continuing from one moment to the next." But somehow these patterns have some continuity.

So the way that happens is that one moment of consciousness conditions the next, and that moment conditions the next, and that moment conditions the next. This process of conditioning—one moment shaping the next, shaping the next, shaping the next—is what carries these patterns along. That's why we seem so similar hour by hour and day after day.

This process is basically the same process that leads to some continuity in the next birth. They're not very different. Ajahn Amaro put it this way: the process of going from one life to the next is not very different from the process of going from one moment to the next. Because one moment conditions the next, even though nothing single is carrying over, there appears to be continuity. And that's what happens with death and rebirth.

Let's look a little more closely at the mechanics of rebirth—how it's understood in our tradition. The Buddha did not describe it clearly. He considered it one of those things that one didn't need to understand in order to become liberated, so he didn't give many details about it. There are only a few hints, but there are a number of hints that are quite consistent. I'll tell you the way that it reads and a little of my interpretation of what that means.

The first thing is that the suttas talk several times about what he called the descent of consciousness into the womb. What's being pointed to here is very different from the Western materialistic view that consciousness is generated as a result of the physical development of the body. The Buddha rejected that view—the Western scientific materialist view that egg and sperm come together and the cells multiply, then the being grows up and consciousness is just a byproduct of the complexity of chemical reactions that occur when the brain gets a sufficient number of neurons. The Buddha rejects that view.

He says, and I'll read this exact quote: "Bhikkhus, the conception of an embryo in a womb takes place through the union of three things: the union of the father and the mother, the mother's season, and the being to be reborn." In other words, the father's sperm meets the mother's egg, they join and form a union, and into that union comes a consciousness that's been associated with some past life. It's only the coming together of those three things that creates the ground for a human being to grow in the womb.

This is another way he described it: "If consciousness were not to come into the mother's womb, would name and form develop there?" Name and form is a translation of the Pali nama-rupa—one of the aspects of the chain of dependent origination, basically the beginning of a human being. So the Buddha was asking one of his other monks, "Would name and form develop there?" "No, Lord." "Therefore, consciousness is the root, the cause, the origin, the condition of name and form." And name and form is the start of the new being.

This is how it's explained by Bhikkhu Bodhi: "It is the stream of consciousness coming from the preceding existence that functions as the nutriment consciousness—that nourishing element, nutriment consciousness—by generating at the moment of conception the rebirth consciousness which brings forth name and form, the beginning of the new human being."

How this happens is not explained. But somehow there is some continuity of consciousness from the past existence in which the karmic patterns are perpetuating themselves. This joins with the sperm and egg, the fertilized egg, to form the new being. That's why children come out with such distinct personalities right out of the womb—because they are carrying the karmic patterns of that past life.

The important thing is that the karmic patterns we're creating now not only fill the rest of this life, but to the extent that we don't become free of them, they also are the grounds for the arising of bondage and suffering in a future human existence.

The reason the Buddha talked so much about karma and rebirth, I believe, is to encourage us to clean up this chain. We can't just assume that if we don't clean it up in this life, it's going to end at death. According to the Buddha, it doesn't. This chain—which until we get free includes bondage and the suffering of birth, aging, illness, and death—will go on and on and on until the mind becomes free.

When the mind becomes free, there is no more volition driving more becoming. There is no urge toward birth and becoming. So when an enlightened being dies, there is no reappearance of name and form. There is no reappearance of the five aggregates. The chain of samsara has been ended at that point.

Again, this may be something you believe or don't believe. I would just encourage you to keep an open attitude about it and just ponder it as a hypothesis. To me, it's the hypothesis that best explains all the observable facts of this world.

I came into this world with a certain personality and karmic patterns already formed. I don't know where they came from because I can't see that past life, but I feel I arrived partly shaped. I observe this same phenomenon in many other people.

If you're interested in exploring this scientifically, there is a professor at the University of Virginia named Ian Stevenson who researched this area for forty years. He studied approximately 2,600 case histories of young children who claimed they could remember their previous lives. He collected their data, examined the records of the people they identified, and attempted to verify the children's claims. If you read his books, it becomes difficult to find any other explanation for these kinds of continuity apart from the truth of rebirth.

If you remain skeptical, I encourage you to explore the writings of Dr. Stevenson. He is not a zealot, nor does he present his findings as absolute proof. He simply states that he cannot find any other logical explanation for all these case studies.

This is the force of karma—the evolution of karmic patterns and mental habits driven by intentions that, when we begin to understand them, are mostly unconscious and carry a large degree of unwholesomeness that binds us to suffering. This is what becomes illuminated by the light of mindfulness.

Next time I want to discuss how we come to the end of these compulsive patterns and how that liberation frees our heart and mind. But as a preview, I'll leave you with this quote from the Buddha: "What is the action that leads to the end of action? It is just this Noble Eightfold Path that leads to the end of karma."

Let us sit for a moment together with this teaching.

What is the action that leads to the end of action? It is just this Noble Eightfold Path that leads to the end of karma.

Thank you for staying present with these teachings. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 107

Patterns of Becoming 5: The End of Karma

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the apparent contradiction between the teachings of karma and anatta (not-self), revealing how these foundational Buddhist concepts actually support each other. He explores how personality patterns are formed through repeated volitional actions (karma) and how mindfulness practice can free us from these binding formations.

Armstrong uses the metaphor of mind streams to explain individual continuity without a fixed self, showing how our personalities are simply karmic patterns we've identified with. He details how meditation practice - particularly the development of mindfulness and the brahmaviharas - creates new wholesome karma that gradually dissolves old conditioning. The talk culminates in an exploration of the Buddha's three insights on the night of his awakening and the discovery of the "unborn, unailing, undying" awareness that leads to complete liberation.

Drawing from the Majjhima Nikaya and Udana, Armstrong presents the noble eightfold path as the karma that leads to the end of all karma, offering practitioners a clear understanding of how dharma practice leads to the cessation of becoming and the end of suffering.

So last time we looked at this creation of self, how nothing is staying the same from moment to moment. But because of each mind moment conditioning the next, there is this sense of the continuity of these patterns of becoming, which are basically the repetition of volitional actions, which is called karma. We talked about how we get kind of enclosed in these actions, and tonight I want to talk about how we can get free, how meditation practice releases us from these patterns.

I hope this is well-timed because by the end of the retreat we should be talking about release, right? You want the fourth noble truth at the end and not the second noble truth. So that's where we are in this process of release.

To start again, we're going to look at this question: the relationship between karma and the teaching of not-self. When you first think about it, they seem kind of contradictory, don't they? The teaching is, my actions come back to me. Where's the self in that?

Somebody in the time of the Buddha, one of the bhikkhus, asked him this very question. He said, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" Oh, that's good. And the Buddha basically said, you haven't been listening to me. You haven't got it.

So these teachings of not-self but karmic consequences coming back to us are, on the surface of it, contradictory. But as we go through it, I think you'll see that these teachings actually really need each other. The teaching of not-self depends on karma. The teaching of karma depends on the understanding of not-self. They're really related.

One of the things we have to remember is the teaching on not-self doesn't deny individuality, right? It doesn't mean that when we see anatta, we have this blissful merging with the cosmos and all is one. That's not the Buddhist understanding of things.

We may understand this by thinking of the concept of a stream. I like to look at the streams that are flowing on this property, and there's an analogy here. The streams don't have very much water in them this year, unfortunately, because of the lack of rain. But if you look at the water that's flowing, you might think, oh, this is the Spirit Rock stream, right by the meditation hall here.

What is this stream? I looked up the definition on the internet, so it must be true. It said that a stream is a body of water running in a channel or current bounded by its banks. But the main definition is a stream is a body of water.

So we look at that stream and we ask what it is. Does it change? Is the water changing? It's always changing, isn't it? You remember Heraclitus said you never step in the same river twice. You look at that stream, it's a very predictable, consistent formation. But if you look at the definition of the body of water, there's nothing constant in it. It's always moving. And yet, this stream is different from the Mississippi River. So it's very helpful to know the Spirit Rock stream and how to relate to it. And it's different from the Mississippi River.

By the same analogy, each of us can be considered a mind stream. This is a word that's used in Buddhist teaching. We're a mind stream. And we've got ever-changing thoughts, impressions, perceptions, feelings, emotions, moods, ideas, images running through this mind stream. Also, of course, the mind is receiving sense impressions from the five physical senses. There's nothing constant in there, but there is a continuity to the stream.

So the stream that we call Carol is different than the stream we call Sally. And if you mix them up, you'll be in the wrong interview. And if they mix them up, they'll be in the wrong bed. We want to keep that straight.

So this is a very useful designation. It keeps things simple. Nothing is steady, is fixed in this mind stream, but there's a formation there that we can come to know and understand. Just like this stream has a certain shape and it has dams at certain points, it has currents and eddies at certain points, a big river might have a whirlpool in a certain place. So also there are patterns in each of these mind streams, and we can come to understand them.

In Western terms, we talk about this as personality.

From a Buddhist perspective, what do we mean by personality? Consider the common, ordinary understanding of personality. When you think about different people, they all have different personalities. Someone is generous, someone is not. Someone is caring, someone is indifferent. Someone is angry, someone is loving. Someone is funny, someone is gloomy. All these qualities are simply characteristics of different personalities.

When you examine the term itself, isn't personality basically about how we think, how we speak, how we feel, and how we act? This essentially sums it up.

This understanding of personality—if it concerns thoughts, feelings, speech, and action—closely parallels our definition of karma, which is volitional actions of body, speech, and mind. What we call personality, what makes each of us unique and individual, is really just these formations of our own volitional activities carried out again and again, expressed through these three spheres of action. It's simply karmic patterning.

There's nothing solid there, but the patterning remains relatively consistent. From one day to the next, one year to the next, we can observe a continuity. We see that our own personalities, our own mindstreams, have been conditioned by our own volitional actions. That's essentially all personality is—the repetition of volitional actions, which is karma.

This forms the basis for our self-view, which is why we call these patterns of becoming. We observe this repetition within ourselves, become familiar with this type of personality, and identify with it. We declare, "This is who I am. I'm the angry person, or the caring person, or the helping person, or the generous person." This forms our fundamental view of who we are.

We're identifying with a self, with these formations—mental formations, sankhāras, volitional formations, karmic formations, whatever you wish to call them. We're speaking about the fourth aggregate of sankhāras here. We're identifying with these phenomena which are all impermanent. They may arise and pass in us with some regularity, but they're all impermanent. There's nothing fixed there.

We form this concept that we project into the past: "I've always had this personality." We extend it into the future: "I'll always be this personality." Because it becomes so substantial, it feels like a burden. This concept of self that we create begins to weigh us down. In practice, it's one of the key elements we ultimately work with.

We don't see how this "I" has been formed. We began forming it very early on. We don't perceive it until we begin to examine it in practice. It's formed from our various volitions, and by the time we observe it, it's somewhat established. But we haven't been aware of its creation yet.

This entire flow of becoming is rooted in ignorance, rooted in delusion. It exists because we haven't paid attention to its formation.

There are many kinds of personalities we encounter in the world. We each have a personality. We meet other people. Everyone has a personality, and there's a very broad range. Many of them are characterized by different aspects of greed, aversion, and delusion. I want to share a brief list I've compiled of different personalities I've encountered in my adult life. This isn't from the DSM-IV or any clinical manual—just observations from lived experience.

As you hear these descriptions, I invite you to reflect on what kind of personality each represents. We all have these tendencies of mind. But when we speak of it as a personality, it means someone has organized their life around this as a fundamental urge.

That's what gives it the weight of personality. This pattern has become deeply established, repeated countless times, until we come to know ourselves and others through these familiar grooves of being.

So these are some of the underlying foundations of personality. I'm going to base them on greed, aversion, and delusion. As I mention each one, you might reflect on which of the three kilesas is most operative.

Let me go through them slowly. Types of personalities: dependent or addictive, craving for attention, ambitious, controlling, fearful, aggressive, perfectionist, self-critical, melancholy, lost or confused.

All of these movements of mind become foundations around which an entire life can organize itself, always trying to satisfy that particular tendency. They're all volitional—urges seeking satisfaction.

Now, these are the unwholesome patterns. But patterns can also emerge from a mixture of wholesome and unwholesome qualities. You may know people like this: the compulsive helper, someone who's going to help you whether you want it or not—and who's not your mother. Or the very strict moralist, someone who's ethical but holds it very tightly. You encounter these people often in monasteries—the ones who are experts in the Vinaya, the monastic code of discipline. They tend to hold it really closely and expect you to hold it really closely. There's a mixture there, some wholesome, some unwholesome.

When we think about personalities that are truly wholesome—people who are loving, kind, generous, compassionate, joyful—we don't tend to think about these as patterns because the compulsive element isn't there. The constraining element is absent. We think of purely wholesome qualities as expressions of freedom, free choice.

The patterns that create difficulty are the ones arising from compulsion, and compulsion is always based on ignorance. These are the patterns I'm mainly going to discuss the undoing of. We don't need to undo wholesome patterns if they're flowing from freedom in our hearts.

But we wake up in practice and see some pattern in the way we approach life, and we discover it's not so easy to change. This is one aspect of the noble truth of dukkha—not so easy to change these habits of mind. We find ourselves caught in patterns that bring suffering, and it's not so easy to step out or transform them.

The Buddha's teaching is entirely about stepping out of these patterns. But he used different language—the language of kilesas, of craving, of clinging, and of becoming. That sounds rather dry and abstract, doesn't it? "Clinging" doesn't exactly get your juices flowing. But when I speak of fearful, ambitious, controlling, aggressive, self-critical—this is juicier, more immediate. This is the ground where Western psychology takes its stand, looking at individual characteristics.

But don't think they're any different. This is precisely what the Buddha was pointing to. We simply need to interpret his language in light of our unique personal experience of living. Each of these personality patterns, if compulsive, contains elements of the kilesas—elements of craving, clinging, and becoming. He's pointing to these very individual experiences that you and I know intimately, though we experience them differently because we have different personalities.

Don't be misled by the apparent dryness of his language. He's pointing to this very immediate, personal material that all of us are working with.

I think this is beautifully expressed in this quotation from the Buddha: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin."

This is karma. The word "action" here is karma.

So our volitional actions have bound us, have limited our freedom in the same way that a wheel is fixed to the axle by a pin. All the teachings are about how to undo this fixing, how to undo this bondage that our own actions have put us into. This is the sense of karma as a burden and an obstacle—living beings are bound by karma like the chariot wheel by the pin.

But if this was all there was, we'd really be in trouble. This is the territory of the first and second noble truths. The key is that within this stream of volitional actions, nothing is fixed. Nothing is even constant from one moment to the next. There is this essential openness, spaciousness. There's an essential freedom at the center of our beings. What this means is that anything that's in there can be changed. That's the purpose of dharma practice—to free us from these patterns that we have formed that constrict the mind and heart and bring suffering.

Let's talk about how dharma practice does this and how patterns get undone through what we've been doing here for the last month. Many of you have spoken about seeing these habitual thoughts and difficult emotions, and learning to work with them. These habitual patterns that arise in the form of thoughts and feelings—this is old karma. When we get quiet physically and sit down, we see the mind keeps moving in these old, rather predictable patterns, which we've repeated again and again.

As we come into meditation, we feel ourselves at the effect of these patterns. We experience qualities of anger and sadness and fear, judging and self-criticism, desire and wanting, longing. The meditation practice is to notice this old karma, which is a pattern, and to bring mindfulness to it. That's always the instruction.

This is where it gets very interesting. When mindfulness meets these old habit formations, something different can happen. This is the unfolding of freedom. Sometimes when mindfulness sees an old thought, the thought doesn't grip us in the same way. When mindfulness meets an old emotion, the emotion doesn't grip us in the same way.

Why is that? Because we're very aware. And we're very wise. Mindfulness has wisdom that knows how to see this as just another arising phenomenon. If the old emotion or thought comes up and we buy into it again and react in the exact same way that we have, then we're reinforcing the old karma and there's no change. But if the old pattern comes up and we see it with mindfulness, there's a new response. We don't have to believe the thought. We don't have to believe the feeling means that we're a bad person or unworthy. If we're afraid, we don't have to believe something awful is going to happen. We just see, "Oh, that's the emotion of fear. It arises, it persists, passes away. No problem."

When we can bring that kind of mindfulness to the pattern, there's a new response. There's a new kind of personality being shaped in that. The response of mindfulness is based in freedom. It's not based in compulsion. All of a sudden we have choice with these things. I don't have to do that act. I don't have to believe that thought. I don't have to feel afraid of my fear. I don't have to feel angry at my anger. We feel this freedom coming in through the power of our awareness and our mindfulness.

We start to see the door opening. This is really a big shift. We start to see the door opening. But then, you know what? Sometimes it closes again. We have all this wisdom. We understand we don't have to believe in it. We don't have to buy it. We don't have to get upset by it.

But many times again, we will find ourselves caught. We'll observe the pattern in action yet somehow still cannot see it clearly enough to remain free. This can be deeply discouraging and frustrating.

This is where we need faith to see the process through. Sometimes we lose that strong mindfulness and fall back into the old pattern. But the next time, mindfulness will be there again—stronger—and we'll see more clearly, with an even greater opening to freedom. Still, it can be maddening to see the conditioning coming, to know what to do, and yet find ourselves unable to do it.

I love an exchange that happened when Trudy Goodman was teaching at Dharma Prajna Parami a year or so ago. During the discussion period, someone asked, "I'm so tired of seeing my same old stuff coming up again and again." Trudy's response was perfect: "Whose stuff would you like to have?"

The truth is, it doesn't matter. We all have our conditioning, and we all must work with it. All these patterns are binding in their own way.

This represents an intermediate stage in our relationship to the patterns. We know enough to understand what needs to be done, but we cannot always do it. We feel caught sometimes, but not all the time. And this is actually beautiful—it's a sign that the practice is working, that mindfulness is developing.

Once you begin to feel that momentum, the pattern is essentially doomed. Because you've understood how not to buy into it, not to believe in it, not to identify with it, it's as if you've cut a tree at its root. When you sever the root of a tree, the leaves don't all fall off that day, but the tree cannot survive because it can no longer receive nourishment. It will live, and the leaves will remain strong for a while, but not forever.

This is the crucial shift. When mindfulness enters, the pattern begins to lose its power in two fundamental ways.

First, we stop identifying with it. We no longer claim it as "I" and "mine." We simply see it as fear arising, or anger arising, or sadness arising. We don't construct a new sense of self around it—just an emotion arising and passing away.

Second, as mindfulness strengthens and continues to grow, the pattern loses its impact on us. It cannot touch us as deeply or move us in the way it once did. A strength of mind and wisdom develops that provides protection and refuge.

As mindfulness dissolves the pattern's power, the pattern itself begins to fade away. Sally Clough Armstrong used the term virāga in her recent talk on transcendent dependent origination, pointing to this same phenomenon. In her presentation, it was the kilesas as a whole that were fading away. But we can each feel our particular patterns fading—those specific ways that the kilesas have crystallized in our experience and our lives.

We discover that we don't need to work these neurotic reactions out on the level of the neurosis itself. There is a greater strength that emerges through the Dharma and takes care of it for us. We don't have to trace back to what our mother or father did, or examine how patterns developed during our teenage years. Simply being present and understanding the empty nature of these formations does the work.

As the patterns fade, the emotions themselves remain—they're not completely uprooted. But they become the emotions that everyone has: anger, fear, sadness, wanting. They resume their natural place in the flow of life. Children have these emotions, we have them, but they're no longer binding forces that define the center of our being.

This is our work as practitioners. The Buddha expressed it beautifully: "A wise one makes straight this restless mind as a fletcher straightens the shaft of an arrow." A fletcher is an arrow maker. We can imagine the practice as straightening our minds from these entangling reactions we've believed in through long misunderstanding.

This intermediate stage of the path requires tremendous patience.

These patterns can come up and be seen, come up and be seen, grab us and drop us many, many times over years. So we don't know how long it's going to take for them to undo, for them to release. But we do know that it will happen.

The Buddha offered this beautiful image: "Suppose, bhikkhus, an ocean-going boat rigged with ropes, having been exposed to the water for six months, has been dragged to the shore for the winter. Then the ropes that had been affected by wind and sun, when soaked by the monsoon rains, will easily go to waste and rot away. It is similar with a bhikkhu who applies herself to the meditative development of her mind. Her fetters will easily be loosened and rot away."

This meditative development is bhavana—the cultivation of the wholesome qualities of mindfulness and concentration and all the factors of enlightenment. This is the development of the path, and it's helpful to know where the path is leading because the path is its own unfolding.

Here it's useful to reflect on a quote from one of the great wisdom masters of the last century, Yogi Berra, who put it this way: "If you don't know where you're going, you could end up somewhere else." So let's think about where the path is going so that hopefully we can end up there.

We're developing our bhavana, our meditative development. We're generating wholesome mind states that begin with mindfulness. Mindfulness is the first of the factors of awakening, and it's the key to unfolding all the others. In parallel, we're also developing the brahmaviharas—loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

I feel it's very helpful for Westerners to develop these two movements together, because mindfulness is basically understood as the wisdom training, while loving-kindness and the brahmaviharas represent the opening of the heart. The brahmaviharas have the potential to bring so much self-confidence. When we start feeling that goodness unfolding in ourselves, we can really trust what's in our own hearts, relax into it and let it take us. And that brings a lot of ease and happiness.

Mindfulness and wisdom start to unfold, bringing along qualities of energy and determination, renunciation, calm, non-identification. This is a very potent process unfolding in our minds through our dharma practice.

What's happening is we come into practice and we've got this old stream of becoming. Generally we're not so wise when we start to meditate. We have this stream of becoming that's been formed in not understanding and is mostly based on the kilesas. As we sit, we feel all that. We begin to see that this cycle has been going on over and over in our lives. Often we can trace it back to childhood and teenage years and all through our adulthood—these different personality tendencies.

And where it has taken us again and again is to lake samsara, just recreating the suffering over and over in the same kind of predictable ways. It's helpful to see that this has happened out of our own intentions. Basically, the kilesas are all expressing intentions. These personality styles are all expressing intentions. So this intention, repeated, has brought us to this place of lake samsara.

But now there's a new river coming in. This is the river of the dharma. To these old intentions, these habitual patterns, we start adding the intentions of mindfulness, loving-kindness, compassion, investigation, energy, calm, concentration, equanimity, joy, non-identification, wisdom. All of these are intentional too.

That stream flowing into the lake starts to turn the flow. Lakes are fed by rivers, so there's an inflow and an outflow. Now we flow this stream of intentions into this river that's going into lake samsara, and it starts to divert it. It starts to turn it in a new direction, and that direction is the nirvanic ocean. So we're no longer flowing to lake samsara—we're going to the nirvanic ocean. That's where we're headed. That's the only place we're headed.

If these streams of becoming, these old patterns of becoming, really referred to something fixed in us, we couldn't divert that river. All the dharma in the world couldn't shift it. If ignorance was planted in the heart forever, if greed was planted in the heart, if self-criticism was planted in the heart forever, all the dharma couldn't move it.

But it's because our basic nature is open and empty that nothing is fixed in us. These old patterns have a lot of power—they've been active for a lot of years, some would say lifetimes—but they're not fixed. And so these wholesome forces come in and they start to wear away the patterns of misunderstanding, the patterns based on ignorance and craving.

We can become liberated because our being is not fixed, and the dharmic elements only lead in that direction. This stream of intention, which is also karmic, only leads in one direction.

So we understand the path itself is a karmic unfolding. We are taking advantage of the law of karma by generating these wholesome intentions moment after moment after moment. Basically, mindfulness and metta. Those are the primary intentions we work with, and all the rest springs from that.

As we generate those intentions moment after moment, we're changing inwardly the karma of our being. This is part of the new karma that's getting added, and it sends us in a completely different direction. If one doesn't believe in karma, it's very hard to explain the workings of the path. The workings of the path depend on karma.

So we start to see that intention, even though it feels light in the beginning—remember the first moment you were taught to become mindful? Did that feel like a transformative life experience? It didn't for me. It felt like a sore butt. But you see how you keep applying that moment after moment for a month, and it goes to a really deep place.

So this intention to be present, to pay attention to our experience, generates enormous power—enormously liberating power—as we just keep doing it moment after moment after moment. We see that our tool, our basic tool, is intention. To tell you the truth, it's our only tool. It's our only tool to change the karmic flow: to put in new intentions.

Tibetans have a way of pointing to this that's really succinct. They say everything rests on the tip of motivation. Everything rests on the tip of motivation. So we start to put these new intentions into the karmic stream.

You know, it's kind of like when I came into Dharma practice, my life was chaotic. I had some happiness, I had some unhappiness, I had no idea what caused either one, and I just felt vulnerable to the winds that were going to blow me. So it's kind of like, to continue the lake analogy, before we understand how this all works, we're adrift on the sea. A current comes and sweeps us that way, and another current comes and sweeps us that way. We may go to happiness, we may go into suffering. But it's all out of our control. It seems so random. The chaos is happening outwardly, the chaos is happening inwardly, and we have no way to steer. We don't know where the harbor is.

As we listen to the teachings and find out where to put our intention, we find the rudder. Intention is our rudder on this chaotic ocean of life. And if we hold to that rudder, it will take us to the harbor. The only direction of the teachings is to the harbor. So this is the value of intention. It lets us steer our lives because it influences the whole karmic flow.

This is a quotation from Nisargadatta Maharaj. A questioner put this question to him. He made a statement. The questioner responded. This is a dialogue.

Maharaj said, "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny."

And the questioner said, "Surely karma interfered."

So tease this out. Your own will is a synonym for intention. So Maharaj is saying it's your intentional actions that have shaped your destiny. And the questioner says, "Well, surely karma interfered."

Maharaj: "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

Your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character. And how do you do it? Through your own will, through your own intention, through setting your own karmic direction using the tools of the practice.

So there are two kinds of threads in the teachings of the Buddha. One is if you want worldly happiness and the other is if you want liberation. If you want worldly happiness, the basic prescription is dana, sila, bhavana—generosity, morality, and development of the mind, primarily loving kindness. These are basically enough over time to take us to normal worldly happiness.

But some of us want another dimension, and that's the dimension of liberation. That needs a different set of instructions. So let's talk about what leads to that happiness of liberation, which the Buddha said is the highest happiness.

This is where we get into the teaching on the end of karma. The Buddha said that for one who has fully awakened, such a person has come to the end of karma. This is a mysterious statement, and I don't pretend to understand everything it means. But essentially it means that they are no longer bound by action in any dimension or in any way. There can still be the results of past karma—like when the villagers were assaulting Angulimala when he went out for alms, even after he was awakened. Past karma can still come to fruition. Mahamogalana died in a very unhappy way that the Buddha said was the result of some of his past actions. But the arhat, the liberated one, is not generating any future karma, anything that's going to play out in future circumstances.

So how is this? I think that something like this was pointed to by the Buddha when he talked about the night of his enlightenment. There are two suttas in the Majjhima Nikaya, numbers 4 and 26, that describe the night of his enlightenment from slightly different angles. They're very worth reading.

From Majjhima 4, he said that on the night of his awakening, his mind became very concentrated. He called it purified, bright, and malleable. When the mind is malleable, we can turn it to whatever we want to turn it to. So he said he directed his mind that night to the recollection of his past lives. He recollected one past life, ten past lives, a hundred past lives, a thousand past lives, a hundred thousand past lives. You may believe this or not, but this is what it says about the night of the Buddha's enlightenment. He recollected, "I was born here and I lived this kind of life. Then I was born there and I lived that kind of life."

Now, there's a little connection between the three insights that night. There's a little connection between them that isn't in the suttas, but I kind of imagine. So I imagine after that, the Buddha goes, "Well, why are those lives formed like that? What was responsible for creating lives like that?"

So then he took this concentrated mind and turned it in a different direction. He turned it to see many, many beings passing away and reappearing, dying and being reborn, and to try to understand how it came about that people were born in such different circumstances with such different strengths and weaknesses. He saw in that second insight of the night that it was owing to their actions that beings reappeared in the world in a new birth according to their past actions, that their circumstances were shaped by that.

So now there's another little interlude. And here I'm going to suggest that he saw good actions led to a happy rebirth, harmful actions led to an unhappy rebirth, but in both cases they led to rebirth. This is interesting because if you think of it in terms of becoming and the self, you can see how we can do good things from a self-centered viewpoint. "I'm going to go out and fix the world and it's I that am important. I'm going to be very generous because I'm such a good and helping person. I'm going to be so strict with my morality because I am going to be perfect in that realm."

So there can be self even around good actions, good karma. Here I'm thinking the Buddha thought, "Well, doing bad is certainly not the way to go. That leads to unhappy birth. But doing good has its limitation too. You still get born and go through birth, aging, illness, and death. What could be the way to real liberation? What could be the way to a peace that doesn't ever stop?"

So he said then he turned his eye, his purified mind and his eye, to the destruction of the taints. The taints are another grouping for these impure qualities of heart and mind that lead us into suffering. He said that at that moment he understood the Four Noble Truths. He understood that the taints were being destroyed in him, these afflictions that bound him. At that point, he realized his own liberation.

So what was this understanding that brought him out even of the realm of good karma into the complete liberation of mind? That's the interesting question. What leads to the end of karma, being hooked on karma at all?

But I want to talk a little bit about this moment of awakening—and we'll come back to that question. He expressed it in a couple of different ways that really point to this ending that he had experienced. One quote, from Majjhima 26: he said he saw right then, "My deliverance is unshakable. This is my last birth."

Now there is no renewal of being. This is my last birth. I have stepped out of that cycle of becoming, of being born and aging and getting ill and passing away. I've stepped out of it.

And then there's this famous poem that's in the Dhammapada that you probably will recognize: "Through many a birth, I have wandered through sorrow, seeking but not finding the builder of this house—this body, this mind, this self. Painful is birth again and again. House builder, you are seen. You will build no house again. All your rafters are broken. The ridge pole is shattered too. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving." House builder, you are seen, you will build no house again. This is the end of becoming, the end of birth, the not even taking up good karma.

So then the Buddha follows this. There's good karma, there's bad karma. And then he says, what karma? Well, let me put it a different way. There's karma that he called dark leading to suffering. There's karma he called bright leading to happy states. And then there's this third kind: the karma that leads to the end of karma. What is the karma that leads to the end of karma? It is this noble eightfold path—namely right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. It's the eightfold path that leads to the end of karma. So it's the eightfold path that leads to the end of becoming.

So as you put yourself on this eightfold path, it's helpful to understand that that's where it leads. There are good habits being cultivated, but basically the eightfold path is leading to stepping out of birth altogether. And you can understand birth on a moment-to-moment basis if you don't like to think of it as rebirth. Either one is fine, but we're stepping out of the process of becoming anything at all.

So we've talked about this in an earlier talk. We talked about discovering this quality of awareness within ourselves that is present, knowing all the changing phenomena, but is not involved with them, is not caught up with them. And we've given some different names to this. Carol has talked about this as the pure citta that's free of the three kilesas. Upasika Ki used the phrase "unentangled knowing." One teacher talked about resting in the gap between feeling and craving. Or Ajahn Buddhadasa talks about it as temporary nibbana. These are all pointing to that same experience—an open awareness that's not caught up in the phenomena.

This kind of awareness has a flavor of unbecoming, has a flavor of unborn, has a flavor of undying, has a flavor of unconditioned. It's not constructed out of other elements. It's there when we stop doing. When we stop grasping, it's there.

So again, the Buddha describing his insight on that night of awakening: "I discovered the unborn, unailing, undying, supreme security from bondage—nibbana." This open space of the pure citta, of unentangled knowing, is unailing. It's healthy. And that's why the ability to rest there is so healing. Because we are resting in an element that is essentially free and unailing and undying.

So again, it's why we don't have to work it out on the level of the emotions, which are all subject to coming and going. We discover this other dimension. And it's this unailing element that rots the fetters. This is the sunlight and the wind on those ropes and sails that have been drenched in the monsoon rains.

So the Buddha said, "If there were not this unborn and unbecome and unconditioned, there would be no escape possible from what is born, become and conditioned. But because there is this unborn, unbecome, unconditioned, there is an escape possible from what is born, become, and conditioned."

So this unborn element, this unailing element, has the potential to free us from all the patterns of becoming, which we've created again and again through our own volition.

So what's the essence of this quality? There's something in it about peace. There's something in it about calm. There's something in it about stillness. There's something in it about non-doing.

Here's one of the descriptions of nibbana, the fullness of nibbana: the stilling of all formations, the relinquishment of all attachments, the destruction of craving and cessation. That is nibbana.

So in this full awareness of unentangled knowing, we can stop doing. We can stop all the different forms of activity and just rest in that stillness. Someone mentioned in an interview the other day that their meditation for a while was like a completely flat lake on which no wind was blowing. So there were no ripples at all. That is that quality of the stilling of all formations.

In that place, we let go of all kinds of self-centered activity, even good self-centered activity. We let go of it all. And then there's a stillness we feel. We can trust in that stillness. We can rest in that stillness. We don't have to do anything with it. We can rest in it, and out of that stillness some other dimension may emerge.

I had one particular meeting that revealed to me something of this other dimension. I was in Kathmandu visiting a teacher in the Tibetan tradition, Satni Rinpoche. I had received teachings from him over a number of years and wanted to visit him at his home monastery in Kathmandu. So I stayed in Kathmandu for a couple of weeks and would go up and receive teachings from him.

While I was in town, there was this very highly regarded older Tibetan Lama staying at Rinpoche's monastery named Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche. I'd heard a lot about him—he's a famous Dzogchen master in his lineage. Rinpoche asked me if I wanted to meet Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche. Actually, let me back up a bit.

A friend of mine was a student of Nyoshul Kempo and asked me to give him some dana. So I told Rinpoche I'd like to offer some dana, but I could just give him the envelope and he could offer it to him. He said, "Wouldn't you like to meet Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche?" I said no, I don't need to. You can just offer the dana. Because I sort of thought, you've seen one Rinpoche, you've seen them all.

I sat with that for about a day and thought, no, I would like to meet him. I've heard a lot about him. Friends have spoken really highly of him. I would like to meet him.

So it was all prepared. It was a little bit of a formal occasion. It happened in one of the shrine rooms where he was staying. He got dressed in this kind of gold robe, and an interpreter was there and Satni Rinpoche was there and Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche's wife was there. I came in feeling nervous because I'd heard a lot about him and heard he was a very special teacher.

I went in and did my three bows when the time was right. On my knees, I approached him and offered the envelope containing the dana that my friend wanted to offer him. He received it from me. Then he took my head in his hands and looked right into my eyes.

At that moment, something shifted in him. What I remember is his eyes moved a little bit apart, like he was looking way in the distance. His gaze opened up into something I had never experienced before. Looking into his eyes, there was this kind of stillness and vastness that I didn't know was possible. His mind was—it was just like looking into some still ocean and it just seemed like it went forever into him. Even to say his mind was still wasn't accurate. There was no mind there to be either still or moving. There was just this presence that was completely undefended.

His eyes were just open and completely unguarded. I was looking right into his vastness. Then my self-consciousness came up. I got nervous because I thought, he's so undefended. I guess I'm also undefended. He's going to see my nervousness, and I felt uncomfortable. At that moment, something kind of closed in me.

But I just had the feeling that if I could have kept looking into his eyes a little longer... But then the moment passed. Yet it was an amazing revelation, a kind of transmission of what's possible for us. What level of development is possible that he could move into a space like that?

I have no doubt that he was resting completely in the unconditioned, completely unmoved by the sight of me or the room or anything. And that he had the ability to do that at will. He just moved there and he was simply there. This gave me a sense of how the Buddha could have transmitted awakening to so many people as he did, because I believe he had at least that stillness and more to share with people.

So this is possible for us. This is part of our potential as human beings, through this practice, through the practice of the Dharma.

I want to close with one final quotation from the Buddha. This is from the Udana, also on this state of nibbana:

"One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's just sit together for a moment, please.

One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 108

The Three Characteristics

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) that the Buddha identified as fundamental to all experience: impermanence (anicca), unsatisfactoriness (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). He clarifies what the Buddha meant by 'conditioned things' and distinguishes between the conditioned realm and the unconditioned dimension of Nibbāna.
> Armstrong weaves together traditional Buddhist teachings with contemporary research, including Harvard psychologist Daniel Gilbert's findings on happiness, to illustrate how poorly we predict what will bring lasting satisfaction. He shares personal stories from his ordination as a monk in Burma under Pa-Auk Sayadaw, the challenges of practicing through difficult conditions, and contemplating impermanence through direct encounters with death and aging. The talk includes the Buddha's five daily reflections on aging, illness, and death as 'heavenly messengers' that inspire spiritual urgency.
> The heart of the teaching reveals how deep meditative investigation shows the fluid, dissolving nature of all sense experience—sounds, thoughts, emotions, and even bodily sensations lack the solidity we assume. This understanding naturally leads to non-clinging, which Armstrong identifies as the doorway to freedom. He concludes by pointing to peace not as the absence of activity, but as the unchanging context within which all experience arises—an 'unentangled knowing' that offers refuge regardless of conditions.

Sharon and Sally both talked in the last couple of nights about the factor of wisdom and how important it is in meditation practice. Sharon talked about how loving-kindness practice really changes us by developing understanding through the interconnection that comes from metta practice. Sally talked about how in some Buddhist traditions, wisdom is paired as a complement to mindfulness, understanding that they go together and that the role of mindfulness is really to foster wisdom.

We could say that wisdom is the most important thing that develops during Dharma practice. Experiences come and go. Concentration comes and goes. Mindfulness comes and goes. But the things that we understand change us, and those changes travel with us for hopefully the rest of our lives.

This is a funny word in the West, the word wisdom. It doesn't have a generally acknowledged meaning in our culture, so it has a special meaning within the teachings of the Buddha. It's not just about book knowledge, although that can play a role. It's not just about IQ. It's not even about emotional intelligence alone. And it's not just about accumulating life experience. In the lineage of the Buddhist teachings, wisdom means the understanding of life the way it is—which means our inner experience and our outer experience, what their constituent parts are really like, what our human experience is all about.

Insight meditation comes from an Indian word, vipassana, which we could understand as seeing things the way they are. So you could say the goal of our insight meditation practice is to see things in our experience the way they truly are. And the understanding is that this is the avenue in our lineage to a true and reliable happiness.

This factor of wisdom is a natural capacity that we all have, but it needs to be woken up. We wake it up through paying attention. And then as it starts to wake up, we develop it and strengthen it through various kinds of examination and investigation.

So where should we look to see the way things are? The Buddha suggested looking specifically at three aspects of our experience that he called the three characteristics or marks of existence. These three marks apply to all existent things, all phenomena. The way he described it, he said that all conditioned things are impermanent; all conditioned things are unsatisfactory; and all things are without self. These are the three marks: impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and this aspect of not-self.

There are a couple of words here that need some description. What is a conditioned thing? A conditioned thing is something that comes from prior causes and conditions. It's something that is subject to coming into existence, and by virtue of having come into existence based on underlying conditions, it will also pass out of existence when those conditions change.

All the aspects of mind and body that we've been practicing with here are conditioned. Sensations of the breath, the sounds that come and go, the sensations in our bodies, the thoughts and emotions that are passing through—these things all have underlying causes. They come, they last for a while, and then they pass away. These are considered conditioned things, every one of them.

All conditioned things are impermanent, meaning they're subject to arising and passing. All conditioned things are unsatisfactory. This word needs some explanation too. It doesn't mean that all conditioned things are unpleasant. A lot of conditioned things are very pleasant. We can have pleasant experiences with the breath. We can have pleasant experiences of sounds. We can have blissful sensations in the body. We can have beautiful emotions—love and compassion, happiness. So it doesn't mean that they're unpleasant, but what it means is that none of those things has the ability to give us a lasting sense of happiness. None of them is capable of providing a deep sense of satisfaction, which we yearn for. As humans, we have this longing for a deep and reliable sense of being satisfied, and none of these things that arise and pass have the ability to give that to us because of their impermanent nature.

Then the last statement is a little different. All things are not-self. It doesn't say all conditioned things, but all things. What the Buddha is pointing to here is that there is one element, or you might say dimension, of our human nature that is a thing in his language, but it's not a conditioned thing. So what is that?

It means there's something within us that's not subject to arising and passing. There's something within us that isn't caused by prior conditions. There's something within us that isn't impermanent.

So he gave a special name to that. He called it Nibbāna, or Nirvana in Pali. It's a subject of a lot of mystery in Buddhist writings and thinking because it's hard to put your finger on exactly what that thing is. We're not going to try to define it yet. We'll point to it a little later in the talk. Just be aware that everything is not self. That means all the conditioned things as well as this mysterious dimension of Nibbāna is not self. None of these things are self.

So by the Buddha's recommendation, we want to explore these three statements through our direct experience and see if we think they're true or not. The flavor of his teaching is not to say something and expect us to believe it. The flavor is, here's the way I see it—check it out and see what you find. So the recommendation is to check these statements out and see what you find in your own personal experience, directly.

There's a story from the Jewish tradition. You may have heard this from other traditions as well, but I rather like the Jewish version of it. The story is around King Solomon, who ruled around 900 BC. King Solomon, it's said, had a minister who he felt was getting a little too prideful. He was a chief minister and obviously a very powerful individual, and the king thought he was getting a little too full of himself. So he decided he would take him down a notch.

He gave him an assignment that he didn't think the minister would be able to carry out. The king said, "I hear there's a magic ring somewhere in the world. And this magic ring has the power—if you give it to a happy person, it will make them sad. And if you give it to a sad person, it will make them happy. I want you to find this magic ring because I want it. And I'll give you six months to do it."

So the minister felt his reputation was on the line with this assignment. He asked around all over the kingdom and spoke with travelers who'd been through other realms, asking if they knew of such a ring. And everybody said, "Never heard of such a thing. I don't know that there is one. You'll never find it."

He was running out of time. The six-month deadline was coming. There was going to be quite a big banquet where he was going to be asked to present this ring to the king, and he was very afraid of failing. So in desperation, he went to the local marketplace to a very poor ring seller—a man who didn't have any fancy jewelry or a big stand, just a very poor man. And he said, "I need to find for the king a ring, a magic ring that will make a happy person sad and a sad person happy. Do you have such a ring?"

And the ring merchant said, "Wait just a minute." Then he took up a simple gold band and with a tiny stylus he etched in it three syllables. And then he handed the ring to the minister.

The minister went to the banquet. The king said, "Well, minister, where's my magic ring? You've had six months to find it." And he was sure that the minister wouldn't have found it.

So the minister says, "Yes, your majesty, and here it is."

The king took it up and read the three syllables, and the smile dropped from his face. Because those three syllables said: This too will pass.

That was the magic saying that would make a happy person sad and a sad person happy. So this is really a teaching on impermanence, isn't it? And a teaching on equanimity.

Now the fact is, it won't make a happy meditator sad, because we've already figured that out. But generally it would make a happy person sad. So this truth—this too shall pass.

It's an interesting reflection that we can bring to every single moment of our experience. And it's always the case. We know this, right? We're not dumb. We've been reading dharma books for a long time. We know that everything changes, and yet somehow we haven't fully grokked the full implication of that truth.

How do we know that? Because life keeps surprising us.

Here's a simple example. Most of us learned probably in the seventh grade that what we think of as solid matter is actually full of atoms and molecules composed of electrons, protons, and neutrons that are whizzing around through mostly empty space. And we can't even find an electron, actually. It's just kind of a probability smear somewhere in the space of an atom—an unfindable particle. But how many of us actually experience the world as mostly empty space? Even though we believe that to be true, don't we mostly experience this world as full of solid things, this physical world? Generally we do, so we haven't quite integrated that teaching on impermanence that the scientists tell us is true.

Other things surprise us too. I was in the middle of a dharma talk at Spirit Rock a couple of years ago, and we heard this kind of dreadful cry. It was a cry like a baby was crying. The caretakers went out to investigate, and I went out after the talk to see what it was. A deer had died—had probably been killed by some dogs. So the deer was there near the meditation hall. A group of us had gathered around it, and we said some loving-kindness and well wishes for it. It had already died when we got there.

The caretakers then called the Humane Society, who offered to come out to the campus and pick the deer up and take it away. So they moved it down out of the meditation retreat facility to the entrance and waited for the Humane Society to come. Unfortunately, they never came.

So over the next days of the retreat, I would pass by that deer virtually every day. It was by the side of the driveway, and I would watch what was happening to it. Because of all the scavengers on the Spirit Rock land, that deer disappeared rather quickly. We have turkey vultures, we have raccoons, we have mice and rats, we have lots of ants and insects. Within a few days, the bones had been picked clean. There was no flesh left—there was fur and bones. And the rest of that deer was just gone.

So how is it that a creature can be so alive a few days earlier and then so completely gone a few days later? It was shocking to me. Why? Because I hadn't really fully taken into account the deer's impermanence while it was alive. It shocked me. It surprised me.

By my age—if a lot of you are kind of around my age—we've probably all had the experience of having friends die, loved ones, parents, siblings. And it always has come as a shock to me that someone can be so alive one day and then the next day not there. How does that happen?

So although we know in our mind this truth of impermanence, we don't always know it in our gut. It keeps surprising us. You could say that a lot of our dharma practice is about realizing this truth more and more thoroughly so that life doesn't surprise us in that way. It doesn't shock us so much.

We know this truth is accurate on a cosmic level. Earlier generations didn't know this, but we know that the sun itself wasn't here nine billion years ago or so. The Earth wasn't here about four and a half billion years ago. And in a few billion more years, the sun will burn out and all life on Earth will end because it will be heated by the sun's burning out. So all life on Earth will be gone in just another few billion years. We know that scale of impermanence is also true.

And in some cosmological theories, even space goes away. If the expansion that's happened results in another contraction back to a very small core of matter, space may even disappear. So we can see this truth on a cosmic scale.

We can also see this truth at the scale of our own lives. And this is interesting to explore, because we receive a certain message from the culture that the way to happiness is through acquiring more—more stuff, more money, a bigger house, a newer car, a better stereo, the latest iPhone or computer. Acquiring more seems to be what the culture thinks makes for happiness.

But we all know that's not the whole story, or we would never have come here. We may still wonder why we came, but at least we know that acquisition alone wasn't going to do it.

There was an interesting article in the New York Times about a book by a researcher at Harvard named Daniel Gilbert. He was researching this question of happiness and unhappiness and what makes for it. What he found is that we're not very good predictors of what will make us happy. The New York Times article was entitled "The Futile Pursuit of Happiness"—the way we usually go about it.

He studied people who had good things happen to them and who had bad things happen to them, then measured their happiness level over time after that event. He found, for example, that getting a new car—like a new BMW, for somebody who really wanted one—did increase their happiness level for a while, but then it tapered off again, basically back down to the level it had been at before. This was consistent across many subjects. Whatever the thing was, it produced a glow at the beginning, an increase in happiness, but then it fell back down to the standard level.

But then he also looked at events that were painful—if somebody broke an arm or leg or lost a job. He found that those events did make people unhappy, but the unhappiness didn't last as long as they expected, and their resilience brought them back to the happiness level they were at before. So the good things didn't last as long in their impact, and the bad things didn't last as long in their impact, as people had thought they would. We couldn't predict accurately what would make us happy or unhappy. That was a very interesting finding.

The article summarized: on average, bad events proved less intense and more transient than test participants predicted. Good events also proved less intense and briefer as well.

There is a nice conclusion from this. Dr. Gilbert said, "Hope and fear are enduring features of the human experience, but it is unlikely that people are going to abandon them anytime soon just because some psychologist told them they should." This is probably true. He even said he was ambivalent about his own conclusions: "I don't think I want to give up all these motivations. I don't think I want to learn too much from my own research in that sense."

It's interesting. We don't really want to understand the full implications of impermanence. There's a resistance to seeing that truth, that things change in that way. But when we reflect on this study, we realize that what it can strengthen is our trust in equanimity. Sharon talked about how these changing conditions, the vicissitudes of life, come and go all the time. Equanimity is about staying even, staying balanced in the midst of all that. And this study supports that conclusion—that we can learn to be calmer if the wisdom is there to support it.

So we've understood that external events in the material world aren't going to finally do it for us. We come into the spiritual world and discover, as we stay with it, new sources of joy and happiness and satisfaction. I'll just say from my own experience that the richness of satisfaction I've found from meditation practice has been much greater than the satisfaction I used to find from things in the world. It's both greater in magnitude and more reliable.

We come here and new realms open up to us that have really a lot to offer. We find joy in loving-kindness. We find joy in being able to open the heart to compassion and deep connection with others in a way that's truly fulfilling. It shows us what life as a human being can be about and the richness that can be in it. We find through developing this present-moment attention of mindfulness that the mind can collect, develop concentration, and come into states of peace that I, at least, had never known before I meditated. I had never known this level of peace and the contentment that can come with it.

Of course, then what happens is we want to repeat those experiences too, or we want them to last all the time—and they don't either. The heart is sometimes open and deeply connected and joyful, and then it will close. We work over several days in retreat toward an experience of collectedness and feel a great sense of calm and relaxation and ease, and it lasts for a while, and then it changes. The mind becomes active again, the body feels restless, and there are a lot of thoughts and emotions.

So here too, we find ourselves going through the ups and downs of change—pleasant and collected experiences, difficult and random experiences. If we are wanting things to always be on the pleasant side, then we're not going to find this very fulfilling. We're going to run into friction with that wish.

This experience also teaches us a lot about impermanence, the changing conditions of heart and mind and body. And as we go through these ups and downs again and again and again, we start to realize: oh, maybe it's always going to be like this. And maybe that's okay.

Maybe I can find my balance in this changing ocean of conditions. Maybe that's possible.

But in between, there are a lot of these ups and downs. And it's funny how we come to meditation expecting these states to last. It's so interesting. Even though we know cognitively about impermanence, when we hit a state, we think it's going to be there for a while.

I remember when I was five years old, I got measles. And I hated it. I didn't like being sick in the first place, but then I hated the way my face looked. I had these red spots all over. I remember being convinced—I told my mother this—I know those red spots are never going away. I was absolutely certain I would have that on my face the rest of my life. But somehow it passed.

A few years ago, I went to Burma to go on a meditation retreat, a six-week retreat. I arrived right at the start of the rainy season. There's a three-month rains retreat in all the monasteries in Southeast Asia, and this one started at the beginning of September. I arrived right at the start, and the teacher, a concentration master named Pa-Auk Sayadaw, agreed to ordain me. I'd been a monk years before in Thailand, twenty years before, and I'd left it a little too early. I'd always had a longing to be back in the ordained life again. So I was able to go and meditate, and then he offered to let me ordain again as a monk—something I'd wanted to do for a long time, to re-experience the beauty of the monastic life.

I arrived one day late in the afternoon, about five o'clock. I was shown to my hut, and the next morning I was taken into town, still a layperson, to buy my robes and bowl and other monkly accessories to prepare me for the six weeks I was going to be there. Then right after lunch that day, I shaved my head, went through an ordination ceremony, and put on my new robes. So there I was, less than twenty-four hours after arriving from America—a Burmese monk.

It was kind of a shock because the transition had been so quick. I hadn't been ordained for a while. I'd kind of forgotten how to tie my robes, to tell you the truth. I felt a little awkward. But I loved having the opportunity to do that.

We were right at the start of the rainy season, and that's when it started raining, almost on cue. The day I got ordained was really sunny, and the next day the rain started. If you know the tropics in the rainy season, it's intense. It was coming down about three inches a day in this part of Burma, the southeast part.

My kuti was a fifteen-minute walk uphill from the meditation hall, where I had to go about five times a day for group sittings—the shortest of which was an hour and a half in length, and the longest was two hours. We'd collect at a central dining hall to get our meals, and I'd take my meal back to my hut to eat it.

So there I was, trying to adjust to monastery life, undergoing this very rigorous schedule common at that monastery, and also starting to practice the concentration practice that Sayadaw taught: keep your attention on the space above your upper lip all waking moments of the day. This was the only meditation object—right here, no other. It was rigorous.

The rain was coming down. It came for about two weeks without any break. I didn't see the sun for about two weeks. I remember one day walking back to my hut after the midday meal was served. I was carrying my bowl in one hand, the lid on top holding a dessert that I was really looking forward to. The bowl was hot because it was freshly steamed rice and stir-fried vegetables. In my other hand was an umbrella because the rain was really coming down. I was walking up this rocky, muddy path in a pair of plastic flip-flops while my robe was falling off my left shoulder. I was trying to squeeze that up while Burmese laypeople were bowing to me because they really appreciated that a Westerner would come and try to practice, leave behind the affluent lifestyle and come to Burma.

At that point, I started to think: What am I doing here?

It went like that for at least two, two and a half weeks. I got very discouraged. I've practiced through a lot of different conditions, but these were the toughest I'd ever experienced. I kept telling myself: This is going to change. The rain isn't going to last the whole six weeks. Surely it's going to change.

You'll get better at tying your robe. You won't need the umbrella every time you go out. And you'll get used to spending eighteen hours a day at your upper lip. But even though I told myself all of that, I was really getting discouraged. It's funny to look back on it now, because the conditions were kind of extreme. But at the time, it wasn't easy at all.

Also, I was eating just one meal a day—a vegetarian diet of basically rice and stir-fried vegetables, very little protein. Over those six weeks, I lost almost half a pound a day, and I didn't have a lot to lose in the first place. I was losing weight like crazy.

So I was getting very discouraged. And I happened to have brought with me a little altar piece, which was a photograph of the Dalai Lama. I love the Dalai Lama. I find him maybe the most inspiring human being on the planet. So I had this photo of him there, and I thought, I'm going to ask for advice. I'm desperate. I don't usually contact the spirit world or anything like that, but I thought, "Your Holiness, I'm really having a difficult time. Can you give me a word of advice?"

Immediately—and I don't actually think this came out of the spirit world—but immediately his voice appeared in my head. It was very clear, and it had his Indian-accented English. He said, "Yes. Stay optimistic, cheerful, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support."

That actually picked me up. It really picked me up. I thought, stay positive—I can try that. So I tried. I took that advice, and sometimes I could do it. Even in the midst of everything, I'd say to myself, stay optimistic, stay cheerful. And I could put a smile on my face and feel great about being there. Other times, the rain was coming down and I was in one of those two-hour sits, and I wasn't so optimistic or confident. But sometimes I could do it.

When I couldn't, though, it felt like this was going to last forever. And that was the place from which I had to ask for the advice—I thought I was stuck. I really thought that gloom and discouragement was going to last. And that's how those states are, aren't they? When they descend like that, it's hard to remember this truth of impermanence. It's hard to remember that things are going to change. And yet, they do. They do.

But the good states—sometimes when they come, we have the same expectation. When I first started getting quiet in my retreats, I thought, oh, it's always going to be like this now. My life is going to be just like this forevermore. And of course, that didn't stay either. So even though we know about impermanence, sometimes it's hard to really remember it when these conditions happen for us.

Another way that we see impermanence in our life—and I see it a lot given where I'm at in my age—is in the aging process. I've seen my body go through a lot of changes over especially the last ten to fifteen years. And in fact, this fact of aging is said to be one of the things that inspired Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha-to-be, to set out on his spiritual journey. It's said that when he was still a young man of twenty-nine, he journeyed outside his palace, visited a local town, and saw an old person, a sick person, and a corpse. Seeing those three beings woke him up to the truth of impermanence.

So aging, illness, and death are what are called in this tradition the heavenly messengers, because they bring down this kind of remembrance for us. Remember where this is headed. And it provides a real motivation for our practice and for understanding now, while we still have our health and our well-being.

So our bodies do this. We don't ask for it, but our bodies do this. And this started to hit me actually quite a long time ago. In my thirties, my hair started to go gray. I still considered myself very young. Sally and I were at a monastery somewhere in England, listening to a Dharma talk. We'd sat together, listened to the talk, and then I wandered off. Somebody turned to her and said, "Well, who was that man you were with?" She said, "What man?" They said, "Oh, that middle-aged man you were with." I thought, wow, I'm only thirty-five and I'm already middle-aged? It was shocking. And then it gets more shocking.

You know you're in this phase when you hang out with a bunch of friends at a meal table and the talk turns to what we call the organ recital. How are the kidneys? How's the liver? How's the spine? A lot of these conversations happen when you get to be my age.

It's not easy to lose our capacities through aging. We lose physical capacity, we lose mental capacity, we lose our looks. I was really struck by the honesty of a conversation a few years ago when I was sitting with this really wonderful American monk who's lived in England and run a monastery there for a long time, named Ajahn Sumedho. He's very honest and also funny about his process. He said, "Yeah, you know, I think I look ugly now." He was in his early seventies then. "And it's not much fun. Aging is not what the self likes." But then he added, "It's very interesting from a Dharma point of view." And it really is. We learn so much from this process. We understand what life is about. We understand what aging is about. We start to understand what death might be about.

There's an interesting passage from the Mahabharata, the ancient Indian epic—a collection of poems, stories, and plays from a long, long time ago, with many stories nested within it. The Bhagavad Gita is tucked within it as just a small piece. In one dialogue, someone is asked, "What's the greatest miracle in existence?" The answer comes: the greatest miracle is that everyone is surrounded by death but believes that they themselves won't die.

It's kind of true, isn't it? It's hard to take in this heavenly messenger. It's hard to take in this truth about our life. I think the psyche has some defenses against recognizing that fact, that truth, because it's unsettling when it's called to mind. But it's a very powerful reminder of the truth of impermanence.

One of the other heavenly messengers for the Buddha was seeing the corpse that day, seeing a dead person. So it's become part of our lineage that if one has the opportunity, one visits and contemplates dead bodies. Sally and I just had the opportunity to do this a few weeks ago in California. A friend who's also a meditation teacher has a connection with a professor who runs the anatomy lab at a college in Santa Cruz. He arranged for us and some other friends to go down, and she opened up the lab to us, letting us view and touch the dissected bodies that her students had been working with.

It was fascinating because we seldom get this opportunity. Now you know what meditation teachers like to do in their spare time. There were a few of us down there—it was good mutual support. We weren't sure how it was going to feel. The bodies were brought out from the cold room, from the refrigerator where they were stored.

They were uncovered and we could stand next to them. They had already been dissected, so the instructor just took various layers off. We were able to look inside the chest cavity. We were able to look inside the skull. And I was able to actually hold half of a skull that still had the brain inside it. It was very heavy. I hadn't expected it to be that heavy. And to hold the liver of this man who had died probably a year before—they'd had him for a while. It was also very heavy. I was surprised how much mass is in the liver.

And then, of course, the important reflection is: that will be me someday. That's kind of shocking because we all like our bodies and we don't like to think that they will become that, but that is the truth of things. It's considered a very healthy reflection in our tradition to realize that and to have that contact and to know that that is the outcome of life. It continues to inspire me to want to practice and to understand.

Because there is this kind of inbuilt defense against seeing that reality, the Buddha recommended that we reflect daily on these truths, in order to keep them in our mind and to inspire us to understand while we still have health, vitality, intelligence, and energy. So he recommended that every day we reflect: I am of the nature to grow old. I have not gone beyond aging. I am of the nature to grow sick. I have not gone beyond illness. I am of the nature to die. I have not gone beyond death. Just to remind ourselves, use our time wisely while we still have it.

Then, as we come into meditation, a whole other dimension of impermanence starts to open up to us. In our reflective life outside, we can bring in these reflections on aging, illness, and death, and it starts to shift the way we understand life and the way we value the preciousness of our time. But there's another level of insight that comes out of meditation that I want to talk about.

This message of quantum mechanics—that everything is in rapid change, that all physical matter is in flux—has a correlate in meditation experience, but it's not so easy to find. As we attend in a really continuous way, like through a retreat, to the moment-by-moment knowing of breath, body, sounds, emotions, thoughts, smells, taste, touch, we start to look at each of those sense experiences, each of those sense doors really closely, and we can ask: Is there any solidity there? Just like quantum mechanics reveals the lack of solidity in physical matter, this meditative exploration, supported by mindfulness and concentration, can let us look at the question of solidity in the experience of our six senses.

For instance, tuning into sounds. Any solidity in sounds? Or are they all just of the nature of appearing, disappearing, coming, going? None of them last very long.

What about thoughts? Solid? Thoughts are so ephemeral. I think Sally was talking about that when she was guiding the other morning. What is a thought? If we look at it closely with mindfulness, it may just go—right on the spot, it can just pop. If we don't look at it closely and invest in it, it can run our life. But if we look with mindfulness and steadiness, the thought is just this little blip.

How about emotions? Have you found a solid thing in the emotional world? Has any emotion lasted more than a few hours since you've been here? Usually at most maybe a couple of days. And then even while they're here, have you ever tried getting a hold of one? They're so cloud-like. We can feel them if we slow down, but they're very subtle appearances.

What about the body? We know what the body looks like from the anatomy books, right? There are solid hunks of bone and flesh and tendons and organs. But is that the most reliable guide to the body, the anatomy photographs?

Or is a more reliable guide our own awareness? Perhaps our own awareness and its intimacy with the body is a more reliable way, a more reliable place to look.

So what does your awareness reveal about the sensations in your body? Is any body sensation truly solid? Or if you look closely, is it always kind of changing and pulsing, getting bigger, getting smaller, turning on and turning off, growing and shrinking, vibrating, changing moment by moment? Look closely if you haven't done this, and see if you don't detect that fluidity, even in the sensations that seem most solid in the body.

When we look closely with the mind that's concentrated, the body also is just coming, going. Sensations just arising, changing, and dissolving. When we look closely, every facet of our experience with this still mind of meditation, what we see is things dissolving. The solidity that we normally assume the world has—it doesn't have that solidity when we look this closely.

We might be able to tell ourselves everything's impermanent, but when we look this way through meditation, we really know it. We know it firsthand, even closer than the book on quantum mechanics. We know how fluid everything is in our human experience. And then it starts to be clear that we can't hold on. The reason we can't hold on is there's no solid thing there to take hold of. We get this in our marrow—that we really can't find a solid thing to latch onto.

The Buddha said that this level of impermanence is like someone being swept down a river. There's a strong current carrying them downstream. They don't want to be carried downstream, so they keep reaching for things on the bank to take hold of, to stop their flow. But everywhere they reach, they just clasp a bunch of grass and it pulls out in their hand, and they keep being swept down the stream. This is our situation if we're looking to hold on to the things of the senses. None of them are solid enough to be able to support us.

This is from Rumi: "Think of how phenomena come trooping out of the desert of non-existence into this materiality. Morning and night they arrive in a long line and take over from each other. It's my turn now. Get out. This place of phenomena is a wide exchange of highways with everything going all sorts of different ways. We seem to be sitting still, but we're actually moving, and the fantasies of phenomena are sliding through us like ideas through curtains."

Seeing in this meditative way generally brings about one of two responses. In the first place, it's very liberating. You start to see that all the patterns and emotions and thoughts that we were struggling with, that seemed so dense and impenetrable, are just all poofs—and that nothing is binding the mind. That's wonderfully freeing and uplifting and delightful and true.

And then we stay a little longer with that understanding, with that seeing, and we start to wonder: what's next? If none of those things are solid or can be held onto, where do I rest? Then it gets scary. But that's not the end of the journey. There's more to come.

Impermanence is revealed through our meditation practice, and it opens the door to these other two characteristics. Conditioned things are unsatisfactory because they're not solid. We can't hang on to them because they're not really lasting long enough to be clung to, when we understand them.

So what happens when we try to hold on? Well, either we take hold of something painful—like a difficult emotion or psychological pattern—and then there's pain right away. We're holding on to pain, so that's painful. Or if we hold on to something pleasant, like a beautiful state of meditation or concentration, if we hold on to that and cling, then we suffer when it goes. Either way, it's unsatisfactory. There's some suffering for us, some unhappiness, if we're clinging.

This is from Suzuki Roshi: "Without accepting the fact that everything changes, we cannot find perfect composure. But unfortunately, although it is true, it is difficult for us to accept it. Because we cannot accept the truth of transiency, we suffer. So the cause of suffering is our non-acceptance of this truth. The teaching of suffering and the teaching that everything changes are two sides of one coin."

These two characteristics are very closely related. The third, not-self, requires a little more investigation, and I'm just going to touch on it briefly. When you think about the idea of the I or the self that's at the center of our world—our world revolves around ourself—you start to realize there's an assumption of continuity that's intrinsic in the idea. If there wasn't, we wouldn't worry about dying, right?

If you thought it was somebody else who was going to die, no problem. But it's because we think it's I who am going to die that there's a problem. So that shows there's an assumption of continuity from who we are today to who we are up to the moment of death. It's this continuity that is questionable.

Let me put it more precisely. The assumption that there's any lasting entity in this mind-body process that will continue from now through every moment up until our moment of death is not accurate according to the Buddha's teaching. When we look at this changing flow of experience at all the six sense doors, we start to realize nothing stays constant from one moment to the next, let alone one year to the next or one decade to the next. There's nothing fixed in here that can be that solid "I" that's going to persist. That's why impermanence also reveals this teaching on no lasting self in the middle of all this.

So how do we come into alignment with this? I don't know if any of you have seen the movie Bedazzled with Brendan Fraser. It's one of my favorites. He is in a pact with the devil, and it's based on the Faust myth. He gets to request the perfect life for seven different lifetimes, but every time he expresses the wish, he misses some vital element that makes it really miserable. In one life, he's a kind of debonair intellectual in New York City—a well-known author and something of a bon vivant. People are really attracted to him, and he's a philosopher with thoughts on the meaning of life. In one conversation, he says, "Why does the existential dilemma have to be so damn bleak? Yes, we're alone in the universe. Yes, life is meaningless and death is inevitable. But is that necessarily so depressing?"

I love that line. And in a way, it's very dharmic. Because if you look at people who have been contemplating the truth of this for a long time, there's generally a lot of lightness and joy in them.

There is this fact that the teaching on impermanence sounds at first like some bitter pill that we just have to swallow and kind of stoically accept and resign ourselves to. But that's not the point. The point is that this wisdom, this understanding, is a way to free the heart and mind. That's why the Buddha taught it. This is the doorway to our freedom.

Why? Because we learn not to hold on to what can't be held on to. We learn not to cling, and that non-clinging is freedom. It is freedom and it's a doorway to greater freedom, both. Ajahn Chah put it this way: if you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. If you let go completely, there's complete peace. This is the pointer.

There's a beautiful chant in Pali that is chanted in Buddhist countries in Southeast Asia. You've probably heard this line: Anicca vata sankhara. It means "all conditioned things are impermanent." The chant goes on—it's very brief. It says: All conditioned things are impermanent. Their nature is to arise and pass away. To live in harmony with this truth brings the highest happiness.

This is where the happiness of the path points. Understanding the nature of conditioned things, not clinging—this is what frees the heart and mind to be here, to be present, to be light, to be open. It's a state of non-clinging that's the doorway.

This is from the Buddha: "When one establishes the perception of impermanence in all formations without exception, the mind inclines to complete peace."

So we need to carry on this work of perceiving impermanence again and again and again in all situations. It's not just one insight, but we need to see it over and over and over in every situation that comes our way. Then this quality of peace starts to become more evident.

I want to explore a little bit with you this quality of peace and whether it's a conditioned thing or not—or whether this quality of peace might be that link to the thing that's not conditioned, that dimension of the unconditioned.

I'll start with silence. I think there are two ways to understand silence. One way is that it's when there aren't any sounds. This is a pretty quiet meditation hall. Sometimes there might not be any sounds and then you say, wow, it's really silent in here.

But there's another way that silence can be understood—as the context or the background from which all sounds come and go. Does that make sense? If you understand silence in this way, as the container of sounds, is that silence broken when a sound appears? Or is that context still there? That context is still there, isn't it? Can you tune into it sometimes, even when a sound is present? Can you feel the extent of that silence? If you practice, you can.

Now let's look at peace and activity. There's a way in which peace can be understood as the lack of activity—all activity is stopped. But there's another way that peace can be understood as the context within which activity happens. If we understand peace in this way, things can arise—sense experiences can arise, sensations, thoughts, even emotions. And if we learn, we can still tune into that peace that's the underlying context for all those arisings. That peace isn't being broken by the arising, just like the silence isn't really shattered by a sound.

So that peace isn't dependent on conditions. It doesn't matter if there's activity at the sense doors or not. That peace is still available, and we can tune into it at any moment, once we learn to. That is analogous to, it's a taste of, a foretaste of, it's very close to that unconditioned element that the Buddha was pointing to—that really, truly complete peace.

In our meditation, we can start to feel this. Things keep happening. Things are arising and passing, but we're not holding on. In that not holding on, we can feel that kind of deeper peace. And this is a quality of meditation that one teacher called "unentangled knowing." We're fully aware things are happening. We're not cutting off any sense experience, but we're still and unmoved on some fundamental level because we're not getting entangled in holding on to the comings and goings.

This place is free from suffering. It's free from unsatisfactoriness. There's nothing to complain about in that place of unentangled knowing. And this is the place we find refuge and safety. It can be found in any moment when we can tune to it. It's available in any moment. And we learn more and more how to find it, how to recognize it, how to rest there, how to come back to it. And that is our safety.

I'll close with this quotation from the Buddha. And just to mention again—that peace is not dependent on conditions. It's there regardless of the activity that is happening. Here's the quote:

"One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here nor a there nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Morning Instructions - Choiceless Attention

> In this retreat instruction, Guy Armstrong introduces the practice of choiceless attention (sometimes called open monitoring), a meditation approach that moves beyond anchored concentration to rest awareness openly on whatever presents itself in each moment. Rather than maintaining preferential attention on the breath, practitioners learn to ask 'What am I noticing now?' and allow mindfulness to naturally flow between the six sense doors - sounds, breath, body sensations, emotions, thoughts, and mental formations.
> Armstrong emphasizes that this open approach builds upon all the foundational meditation instructions for working with individual phenomena. He guides practitioners through the transition from focused attention to receptive awareness, noting that when the mind becomes scattered, one can always return to the breath as a home base before opening again. The instruction includes practical guidance for working with the natural tendency of attention to move rapidly between objects, and addresses common challenges like feeling obligated to 'produce' experiences or losing trust in the method's natural unfolding.
> This teaching is particularly valuable for practitioners who have developed stability with breath meditation and are ready to explore the more spacious dimension of mindfulness practice, cultivating what the teacher describes as effortless, natural meditation that flows with the changing nature of experience.

In the instructions this morning, I want to introduce one other approach that we've talked around, but I want to make more explicit. It's a style that I'll call choiceless attention.

In our meditation so far, we've relied a lot on our primary anchor, which is the breath for most of you, and treated it with a preferential attitude. It becomes our home base—we start there, we stay there. If anything strong takes our attention, we'll go away, but then generally we'll come back and focus again on the breath. That's a very good approach for developing stability of attention in the middle of changing experience.

In choiceless attention, we let go of our preference for the breath and simply focus on whatever's presenting itself in this new moment. It's like every moment, the mindfulness has to be really fresh and awake, and you're answering the question, "What am I noticing now?" And then a moment goes by. "What am I noticing now? What am I noticing now?"

You'll find as you do that, what you notice keeps changing. In one moment it might be a sound, in the next moment it might be a body sensation, then you might feel a thought, then there might be an in-breath and an out-breath, then you might notice a mood, then another body sensation. If you look closely, the attention keeps moving between these different experiences all the time. In choiceless attention, we're not choosing where to place the attention, but we're letting it do its natural thing of roaming. We just want to be there to be mindful of wherever it's landing.

This is a very open kind of approach to meditation. It can feel very natural and even effortless if there's enough stability to support it. But because of this openness, sometimes it's easy for the thoughts to slip away, and it's easy to become distracted. So if that starts to happen as you're practicing the choiceless style, come back again to your primary anchor—the breath—recollect the mind there, and once you feel steady, then you can try opening up again.

This choiceless attention builds on all the meditation instructions that we've done so far. I'll mention them briefly as we go into it, but the instructions for sounds, breath, sensations, emotions, and thoughts are all necessary so that you know how to relate to those phenomena before we move into this more open or choiceless approach.

We'll play with that during this period. And if you find it suitable, you can bring it into your meditations for the rest of the day as well.

Beginning again, sitting comfortably, being relaxed in your body and yet also upright, so you feel alert, awake, but at ease. Letting the eyes gently close.

You can open the attention to sounds if that helps you bring in a sense of receptivity and effortless awareness. As you rest with this attention that's fairly wide, open to all the sounds that arise, notice that everything else is also held in this open space of awareness. The sounds come and go. The breath rises and falls. Sensations in the body are pulsing or vibrating or twinkling. Thoughts can enter and pass. And the mood or emotion is there too as a background.

These are all just the natural functioning of our six senses. And in choiceless attention, we can be aware of any part of that which presents itself.

Out of that whole range of appearances that we meet, bring the attention first to breathing. Feel the breath through the whole body or in the area where it's clearest to you—it could be in the abdomen, the chest, or at the tip of the nose.

Notice any other sensations that are apparent throughout the body. Just feel their bare physical actuality of tingling or pulsing, pressure or warmth or coolness, ache or bliss. Let that sensation be directly known with mindfulness. Bring the attention close to it, feeling it just the way it is. Mindfulness is equally able to be with an unpleasant sensation as with a pleasant sensation.

Notice the mood or emotion that's present. It could be one of the hindrance energies—wanting or aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, doubt. It could be one of the beautiful qualities of mind—concentration, peace, metta, compassion—not needing to make that state of mind go away or last any longer than its nature is to last. Just be present to feel it just the way it is, to know it.

These moods aren't you or yours. They're just like clouds, systems of weather coming into this space of awareness. They arrive, they last for a while, and they pass too, due to their own causes and conditions.

Notice any thoughts that are appearing, persisting, and then passing away. When mindfulness is strong, you can see thoughts as another present moment phenomenon without getting lost in their content. You'll still know the content, but it won't throw you off your present moment seat of staying anchored in the present, letting the thought arise and pass.

Anything now that arises in our field of experience as we sit can be the subject for our mindfulness. We can pay clear attention and know it just as it is.

So now allowing the attention to become choiceless, not directed in any particular way—not necessarily to breath or body or sounds, just open. Open in a way that you have a real interest and a freshness of looking. What am I noticing now? And then let the mindfulness connect with that.

Not needing to become fixed on it. Let the mindfulness simply rest there if that's its choice, if that's the choice of attention. But open in the next moment to the next arising, the next thing that presents itself. What am I noticing now?

So in this way, the meditation becomes very fluid, very natural and unforced. Just resting in the present moment, noticing what's appearing. Again, if you find yourself carried away with a train of thought, just notice when you return from that, appreciate that moment of being back. And then just asking again, what's happening now? What do I notice now?

If you ever become confused or uncertain what to pay attention to, just go back to your home base. Return to the breath, your anchor. Reestablish that connection. Collect the mind a little more. It's always there for us, this anchor that we've developed the relationship with. Going back, settling in, and when you feel collected again, if you like, you can open up again to this completely open attention in a choiceless style. Just noticing what's happening now, moment after moment.

So a couple of announcements before we take comments and questions. You may have noticed this is the last full day of the retreat. If you haven't noticed that, you get the gold award for present moment attention. So that's really good.

In context, this is the last full day. And on this retreat, we'd like to allow time for you all to get together with each other for some discussion. And we'll do some of that this afternoon and some of that tomorrow morning. So there will actually be two opportunities for you to meet in smaller groups and to talk about the impact, perhaps, of mindfulness in your life and your work.

So we'll begin some integration this afternoon at the 2:15 sit. We'd like to ask everyone to please come to the sit at 2:15. We'll start with a gentle return to mindful speaking with one another, and then that will be the prelude to dividing into smaller groups and having some discussion among yourselves. Then we'll come back into the large group and we'll hear from the smaller groups so we'll get a sense of the creative juices at work in the whole group when we come back together.

Tea time will be a little later today. We'll go back into silence at tea time and then in silence for the rest of the evening and through breakfast tomorrow morning. Tomorrow morning, again, at closing, we'll have more opportunity for talking about taking the practice home and into the world, and also for you to discuss with each other. So that's the general flow of the rest of today and tomorrow. We'll end about 11 tomorrow morning.

So in the meantime, we are still in the momentum of the retreat. You all have worked very hard to get to this point. A lot of moments of mindfulness have built up and the noble silence has supported it. So please take care with this retreat container.

Right through the morning, through lunchtime today, the break after lunch, and then coming into the 2:15 sit, please keep the support of that silence as we go through this last morning of silent practice together, and then we'll start to open it up at 2:15.

Okay, so that's the outline of the day. Any comments on your practice or questions? Yes, seated at the back.

"I found that liberating. I feel like when I have to follow my breath, I feel constricted. But my question is, can you follow more than one sense simultaneously? Or are you just time slicing it and catching them both?"

Good question. He said he found it freeing—that when he was with the breath, it felt a little constricting. When he could open it up, it felt a lot freer for him. And the question is, can you follow two things at once? Or is that apparent following of two things at once really just rapid time slicing?

I'm going to leave this as an open question and not answer it because I think it's more useful for you to investigate it yourself and come to your own understanding. It's a really interesting thing to explore.

Here's the way I would put the question: Can attention be with more than one thing in the same moment? Or does attention only focus on one element, one phenomenon of our whole experience in each new moment?

I'll leave that as an open question for everyone to explore. Often with these questions, the investigation is the fun part, and the conclusion isn't even as important as what you learn by doing it.

There was another question. Yes?

The questioner said he found himself naming everything his attention went to, and asked if there's a difference—is it possible to notice without naming?

It is possible to notice without naming, and the naming is actually fine too. Remember, we've talked about the noting practice where with the breath we might note "rising, falling" or "in, out." We can do that with all the phenomena that our attention lands on and give just a short label for each one.

That can be very helpful, as it is with the breath, in maintaining a real continuity of noticing. The mental note or label is optional, but if you find it helpful, if it comes easily and you don't find that it interferes, it can be really good support.

We could be sitting and we might notice: rising, thinking, hearing, touching, hearing, touching—just like that. In each case, we want the majority of our attention to be with the direct experience and have the note be really soft, kind of in the background, so the verbal doesn't overwhelm the direct experience. But it can be a very helpful way to keep reminding ourselves to keep paying attention.

He mentioned needing to give his attention a little direction not to move so quickly. How did you give it that direction not to move so rapidly?

"I found myself becoming restless as my attention was jumping all over the place, so I sort of followed it while directing it. I'm not sure how to explain it."

His comment was that when he let his attention go, it started moving really quickly. Anybody else have that experience? Sometimes that happens. You'll just see ten things in a second for a while. Obviously you can't keep up noting with that rapidity, even though something's being known in each of those moments.

In the Abhidhamma, which is the classical Buddhist text on psychology, they analyze these movements of attention in very fine detail. They say basically there are many mind moments in every second. I don't know what that number is—I've heard seventeen trillion tossed out, but I frankly don't believe that. But if you measure how quickly we can perceive, I think it could be twenty to forty things per second. Perception might be on the order of a twentieth or fortieth of a second.

Sometimes in meditation, we can actually see things move maybe not quite that fast, but more than we can keep track of. At that point, if it feels restless, it's fine to slow it down a little bit. One of the metrics I use is to emphasize a noting about every two seconds—the pace I was demonstrating a couple of minutes ago. That's the pace I would note at, at least in the beginning, though it can get a little quicker too.

There might be little movements in between that you don't pay so much attention to, but maybe every couple of seconds you notice something fairly major and note that if you like. That will help slow down that rapidity of movement.

But if the mind is steady with it, there's no problem with that rapidity. If it leads to restlessness, it's fine to slow it down. Sometimes it's just interesting to let the attention go as quick as it wants to and see what happens. Maybe it will continue like that. Maybe it will play itself out and settle down on its own. Either way would be fine.

We'll take one last question before moving on.

"This sounds like the rebellious adolescent in me, because when you gave me permission not to focus on my breath, then I went right back to my breath."

"Did you do that?"

"Yes. How was that?"

"Oh, wonderful. All you have to do is tell me not to do it."

Her comment was that the rebellious adolescent came through—when I gave permission to go away from the breath, she went right back to the breath, and that was wonderful. Before anyone had given you permission to move away from the breath, had you been wandering wide open?

"Yes."

So if we say wide, you go narrow. If we say narrow, you go wide. Perfect. Go both ways.

One more question from our honorable questioner.

"It's an observation and an invitation for comments if you think it would be helpful. I find it difficult to not try to produce a note. For instance, if I don't notice an emotion for a while, there's this little 'oh no, I'll never have an emotion again' sort of tendency to check my emotions rather than just wait for them to present themselves."

So taking a look to see if there's something there?

"Yeah, almost. I wouldn't say trying to produce something there, but checking in. Having practiced with the breath so much, not trusting it will ever go somewhere else."

His comment was about turning to the open instruction—he felt almost an obligation to produce something. He's so familiar with the breath that it's very easy to go there. In particular with emotions, there's a need to almost check to see if something's happening because he doesn't want to miss it, since emotions aren't noticed very often. It could be with any of the sense doors because he's so accustomed to being with the breath.

This is one of the adjustments one makes when moving from a practice that's really strongly focused around an anchor like the breath and then opening it out. You have to find your way in that open space, and there are a lot of confusing currents that can come in. Sometimes people report feeling lost or overwhelmed in the spaciousness. It's kind of like the breath has been so small and cozy—like sitting with your best friend—and then you're thrown into the New York subway at rush hour. So it takes a while to get adjusted to the bigger frame of reference.

I would say the thing that can be helpful is if the breath still stands out, let yourself notice that. Don't feel like you have to not notice the breath. Sometimes that's what will happen out of habit when nothing else much is going on. Trust the method. Trust it.

The other thing is really coming to this meditation with a sense of receptivity. You know how we've talked about when you open to sounds—you can just be sitting still in the middle of a concert hall and just let sounds come to you. You don't have to go out to find them. Similarly, when you open up in this way, think about just being in a really receptive place. You don't have to conduct the symphony. You're just there to listen to it.

The symphony is happening at the six sense doors. There are six instruments playing this symphony. So you just settle back. Now it's the ear. Now it's the body. Now it's thought, and you're just there to receive them all. Strengthen the receptivity and just let things come. They'll come.

If you like, play with this balance between focus on your anchor and this open, choiceless attention. If you feel a little scattered, come back to your anchor and collect.

When you feel a little collected, try this venturing into the wider space, which can bring in a sense of ease and effortless meditation. You can play with that balance through your sittings today.

So please have a mindful day. Notice that your thoughts may go to the future this morning, and continue to notice that as thinking.

The practice invites us to discover this natural rhythm between gathering and opening, between the focused attention that stabilizes the mind and the spacious awareness that receives whatever arises. In this dance between concentration and mindfulness, we find a meditation that is both grounded and free, both purposeful and effortless.

As you move through your day, carry this same quality of aware presence. When the mind gets caught up in planning or projecting, simply notice this as the activity of thinking. Return again and again to this moment, to what is actually here. This is the continuous practice—not just on the cushion, but in every moment of our lives.

Working with Difficult Emotions

> In this dharma talk from an insight meditation retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses one of the most immediate and practical benefits of vipassana practice: learning to work skillfully with difficult emotions. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), particularly the third foundation of mindfulness (cittānupassanā), Armstrong explains how emotions are part of mental nature and subject to the three characteristics of existence: impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā).
> Armstrong identifies four primary difficult emotions that arise from our relationship to pleasure, pain, and time: sadness/grief (connected to past pleasant experiences), anger/resentment (past unpleasant experiences), desire/longing (future pleasant experiences), and fear (future unpleasant experiences). Through personal stories and practical guidance, he demonstrates how mindful awareness can understand the components of emotions: bodily sensations, mental mood, and supporting storylines.
> The talk introduces the RAIN technique (Recognition, Acceptance, Interest, Non-identification) as a systematic approach to working with afflictive mental states. Armstrong emphasizes that while complete freedom from difficult emotions may take lifetimes, we can immediately begin transforming our relationship to them through understanding their impermanent nature and learning not to resist what arises. This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners concrete tools for one of meditation's most valuable applications in daily life.

The Buddha's teaching was all about—and I mean this literally—understanding how we suffer and how to come out of it and find happiness, the deepest kind of happiness possible.

When we look at life in the world, the kinds of suffering that we see in our friends and on the planet seem so complex that many of them seem insoluble. A son is using drugs and doesn't listen to anybody else's advice. Our mother has Alzheimer's and it's very painful to watch her decline. Our marriage starts to unravel because a partner is unfaithful and very painful. And not to mention the global issues of climate change and wars and racism and genocide. It seems overwhelming, the amount of suffering.

But when we come into this setting, everything becomes much simpler. The kinds of suffering that we're subject to even become really simple. This is encouraging because when we can see them so simply, we find out they're workable. They're really workable and quite solvable with the tools that we have.

There are really three ways we notice suffering in this setting. The first way is bodily pain. Anybody had a dose of that today? Usually first days of retreat, that's a very big part of the experience. You're sitting and there's pain in the neck or the back or the seat gets sore after a while or the knees start to ache from that old skiing accident. This is very common and it's unsettling. It's scary. We don't know where it's going to lead. We're sometimes confined with that pain for forty-five minutes at a stretch, so it's difficult. Meditation doesn't promise to end the physical pain. We can change our relationship to it, but meditation is not always a remedy for physical pain. Some pains it is. A lot of pains it is not. Some of this is unavoidable.

The second big area of suffering that we feel here is in our states of mind, in the difficult emotions that we find when we sit and are quiet and just with ourselves. The whole range of painful emotions that humans are subject to will come, among all the people here, in various forms: wanting and loneliness and sadness and fear and envy and pride and anger, resentment, self-judgment and criticism. Many more different flavors will come and be experienced in this setting, not necessarily because anything here triggers them, but because they're habits of our minds. We start to realize that in this simple setting, we see the habits of our mind so clearly.

The good news is that our meditation is a very powerful tool for working with difficult emotions. In the long run, the practice offers the possibility that we can actually be completely rid of these difficult emotions. But that's a long-term project. That's not one retreat. It's not one three-month retreat. It's probably not one lifetime. The teachings and the practice offer that possibility, which I find very inspiring.

I've had the good fortune to meet people, as I've practiced over all these years, whose minds seem to be pretty free of most negative emotions. I remember particularly Dipa Ma, who some of you may have heard of, a very highly developed teacher from India, who came upon meditation out of a deep sense of despair when she lost her husband and two children to illness. So out of that grieving, she had to find a root, and her root was meditation. She was a very accomplished practitioner, a very accomplished yogi.

At the time that I met her, fairly late in her life, she was once asked, "What's in your mind?" Because everybody was struck by her presence. She said, "There are only three things in my mind: peace, concentration, and loving-kindness." That was it. I never saw her deviate from those three, except occasionally a little joy snuck in there.

I really have faith from some of the teachers that I've met that this degree of freedom is possible. But it's not necessary for us to reach that level to find a really satisfying amount of happiness in our life. The tool of insight meditation and mindfulness give us the way, the route to work with these difficult emotions so that they don't become such a burden in our lives. As they become less burdensome, other more beautiful emotions begin to open up.

In Mahayana Buddhism, which came around about four hundred years after the death of the Buddha, it was said that of these difficult emotions, there were 84,000 different ones. That's a lot for us to work with. Of course, that was 2,000 years ago, and things were simpler then. By now, there are probably 168,000 or something.

But the good news also is that the beautiful emotions we will be exploring—love and compassion, joy, balance of mind, mindfulness, concentration, equanimity, peace, calm, tranquility, happiness, contentment—are equally available to us.

I think there are 84,000 of those too. So as we get more space around the difficult emotions, then these more beautiful emotions come in naturally because they're a natural part of us as well. So we cultivate them through our mindfulness practice, we cultivate them through our metta practice, and that development starts to bring them out in all those different flavors.

So those are the two kinds of pain that we see very clearly when we come on retreat. The third type is a type that we enjoy as meditators specifically. The person in the street doesn't enjoy this third class of suffering. It's the suffering of the distracted mind.

Because if you go to the person in the street and you ask, "Has your mind been wandering today?" they're not going to know what you're talking about. But if you ask a meditator, "Has your mind been wandering today?" Oh man, it drove me crazy. I couldn't believe how restless it was. You know, I'd connect with a breath for two breaths and then it was gone. It was so frustrating.

So we have this third kind of suffering, which I consider a fairly high class suffering, but it's our own special kind: the wandering mind of the meditator.

In the talk tonight, I want to focus specifically on this second area—the difficult emotions which are huge burdens in our daily life and sometimes in our retreat life until we learn to work with them—and how the tools of meditation can help us get a new relationship with them. It's not in the near term that we aim to get rid of these. If it was possible, the Buddha would have told us how. But in the near term, for most of us, that's not a possibility. But it is possible to completely transform our relationship to them and in that find a huge amount of freedom. This is one of the most immediate benefits that people will find through mindfulness practice, through Vipassana. It's very real and it's very accessible. So that's what I want to talk about tonight.

These meditations about the states of mind and emotions come, for those of you who are familiar with this, in what the Buddha called the third foundation of mindfulness. The first foundation is the body, which we've talked quite a lot about. Second foundation is feeling tone, which we'll talk about later. The third foundation are all these qualities and states of mind. And the fourth foundation is basically the dharmic principles of the Buddha. These are areas that we can pay attention to. So this was identified specifically as the third foundation. Therefore, it's a central part of the Buddha's teaching.

The word that he used for this foundation is citta. It's worth explaining a little bit. I may often use the word mind, but emotions in Buddhism are considered part of mind. So we will sometimes, to emphasize that, we will say heart-mind or heart and mind. And both of them are included in this word citta. Citta is frequently translated as mind, but a better translation probably is psyche. Because psyche has both the cognitive and the emotional components. And it's important to remember when we say mind, we mean the emotions too.

If you ask someone in the West, generally, again, man or woman in the street, where is their mind? Where do you think most people will point? Yeah. Mind's generally understood without too much controversy to be up here.

But if you ask someone in Thailand, "Where is the mind?" The word they use is jit. Where do they point? Yeah. The center of the chest in the heart area. And this is kind of a classical Buddhist understanding that the actual seat of the mind is in this area we call the heart center, the center of the chest.

A friend was giving a demonstration to some Tibetan monks over in Dharamsala of the neuroscience that is growing up in Western research centers. So he took over some simple equipment—a cap with some electrodes connected to a computer—and he put it on to model it for them and showed how all the wires fed into the computer and it decoded the electrical signals. And he took it off, and the monks, there were about 500 monks in the audience, they broke up laughing. And he thought it must be because he looked so silly with the cap on his head. So he asked them, "Why were you laughing? Was it because of the cap?"

They said, "No, no, no, it wasn't that. It was that you're trying to measure the mind here when we all know the mind is located here." They thought that was so silly.

So I'm waiting for the neuroscience that figures out how to measure the mind here.

That will be really interesting.

So this word citta encompasses the cognitive aspects and the emotive aspects, and we're going to talk tonight about the emotive aspects of mind or the heart-mind.

In coming to greater freedom with these difficult states of mind, we need two things. The first is a shift in attitude, because mostly when these states come up, we don't like them, and we try to push them away, or we judge them as something that shouldn't be happening. That's a problem. That resistance is a problem. That's our normal conditioning, and we need to unlearn that. We need to open to these states with acceptance. That's the attitude shift.

The second thing is we need more wisdom. We need to understand the makeup of these emotions. In particular, we need to understand how they are part of nature as everything else we experience is part of nature. Usually in the West, when we say nature, we mean that stuff—trees and grass and clouds and rain and sky. We're so fortunate here to be surrounded by beautiful physical nature. But in the Dharma, we understand nature also to mean the mind. This body is a part of physical nature and it obeys the same laws as the rest of physical nature. The mind is also part of nature. So there's physical nature and then there's mental nature.

We need to understand that these states, these difficult emotions are also part of nature, and that means they obey or they manifest these qualities called the three characteristics of everything that exists. Everything that exists in nature is characterized by impermanence, by unsatisfactoriness, and by not having a self. These emotions are the same.

When we understand their nature, they are passing and transitory phenomena. They don't belong to us and we are not them. We are not our anger or our insecurity or our grief or our loneliness or our self-judgment. We've spent so much time believing that we are—oh, this is who I am, this particular pattern. It's not the case. We all have all of these. They're all part of nature, human nature. And so we understand that for all of us, they arise like the weather. They manifest for a while, and following their nature, they pass away.

That's why it's safe to feel them. We start out thinking, "I don't want to feel it. I can't feel it. I've got to push it away." But when we realize they're part of nature, we just let them show their nature. They arise, they play, and then they go. Without our doing anything, they go. And that's why we don't have to fuss with them. So they arise, we feel them, we acknowledge them, we name them, we get to know them, and then we watch them pass. Their passing is what we trust in. It's why we don't have to push them out because they will go on their own.

As we understand this nature, that all these emotions are manifesting the three characteristics, we become much more transparent to them. They arise, they persist, they pass away, and they don't have to bother us. They don't have to harm us. They don't have to make us do stupid things in the world. They can flow through us in our equanimity. Our balance can be there.

So let's investigate these a little more closely. The first step in working with difficult emotions is to know what we're feeling. This is not as easy as it sounds. I'll tell a little story from my own practice that shows this.

I was about two weeks into a six-week period of retreat, part of a three-month course, but I was just there for six weeks. I had settled in after two weeks. I was feeling very present, very mindful. Every day I had done my walking meditation on the same path down on the grass near the meditation hall. So morning sitting had ended and I went out from the meditation hall and was walking down to my walking path when I noticed there was somebody there.

I couldn't believe it. I'd been walking on that path every walking period for two weeks. I thought, didn't they see me? Is this a vendetta or something? Is this a Vipassana vendetta?

And I was walking very mindfully. I really noticed lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. I thought, did I cut in front of them at breakfast today? Are they getting back at me for that? Lifting, moving, placing. I thought, they're not very sensitive. If they were very sensitive, they would know that was my spot. Lifting, moving, placing.

I got down there running more stories like that, found another walking path, which to my great surprise worked just as well for meditation. And thirty minutes into the walking period, I realized I'm angry. I'm angry at this person who is in my walking path. I had been angry for about thirty minutes and I hadn't known it. I thought I was really mindful. I was lifting, moving, placing, but I was missing the central fact of what was going on, which was I was pissed off.

Now that's kind of hard to believe, but this is how these hindrances operate. Even when we have our mindfulness radar up, they slip in underneath. We don't know what we're feeling when we're feeling it. That's when we're in danger. If I could have had a conversation with that fellow, it would not have been a good outcome.

So not recognizing that we're angry puts us in danger. Recognizing that I was angry gave me the way out. Oh, I know how to work with this. I could let it go and settle into my walking and be open again.

The first most important thing is to know what we're feeling. The reason these things are called hindrances is that they rob our mindfulness. We lose our mindfulness to them by getting involved in their story and the drama that they build up. The story I got involved in was a story I created—he's in my walking path and it's really mine and it should have my name on it and he should have known that. As I kept running that story over and over, I locked myself into that drama, not even knowing I was angry.

That's the way the hindrance works. It blinds us. It blinded me to seeing the most important thing going on—I'm angry. It's that blindness that robs our understanding, robs our wisdom until we start to notice, oh, there's that emotion. This is the really crucial step: knowing what you're feeling. Being able to name it is really helpful. I suggest that as you work with these emotions, you name them when they come.

What happens then is, instead of directing all my attention to the guy who stole my path, I was directing my attention to my own experience. As long as I'm focused on him and what he did wrong and why he did it and what I'm going to do to him and how we're going to talk about it, I can't free myself. When I can turn the attention back home to my experience, then I can release what's going on.

Another way of talking about the hindrances in terms of mindfulness is misplaced attention. We're placing our attention on the external circumstance or person instead of the inner world where it's rooted. As long as we're fixated on the outer circumstance, we're not going to be able to liberate or come to a freeing relationship to that emotion. But when we can turn the attention here, which is the right place to put the attention, then we have the possibility of freeing ourselves in that moment.

As we turn our attention to these difficult emotions, I want to encourage you to look at three particular areas. If the emotion is strong at all—and it's mostly strong emotions that make us suffer—it's going to have an impact in the body. This is a great place to ground your attention because the body will hold your attention. We've been working with the body for two days now. You've learned how to connect.

Let's say I'm feeling angry. I might feel a pressure in the chest and a burning around the neck and shoulders. I turn my attention there. I can feel it in the body and I stay in touch with it there. As I feel it in the body, I know the sensation—tightness, pressure, heat—and I'm also staying in touch with the anger. So if it's strong, find it in the body.

Where are you feeling it? Where is it manifesting?

Second, turn and feel that mood or color in the mind. You know, anger feels different than even impatience, feels different than happiness, feels different from fear. Just on a... the flavor of the emotion, the taste of it, which is a mind quality, feels different from anger to joy to fear, whatever. So let yourself taste that flavor of anger or whatever.

And then the third piece is if the difficult emotion is being sustained for a while, if it's lasting for a while, it's being supported by a belief that we could call a storyline. We've made up a story that justifies the emotion and keeps it in place. My story was he's taken my walking path and that's wrong. That's what fed the anger. And as long as I kept thinking those thoughts, the anger kept getting built up. When I could see that the storyline was a creation of mine, then the anger could just die down.

Again, the anger will manifest impermanence if we don't keep stoking it back up. Taking out the storyline lets the emotion just wilt away, which all emotions are ready to do when we withdraw our investment. So start to notice the sensations in the body, the mood in the mind, and the story that supports it. We'll go through some specifics to give some more examples of this.

And this is what mindful awareness does. Mindful awareness starts to understand how the emotion has been put together from these different components. And understanding that, we're not so enchanted by it, we're not so deceived, we're not so gripped by it anymore. So this is the wisdom factor starting to come in with the emotions.

In my own practice and working with lots of people over the years, it seems to me that there are four emotions particularly that are kind of primal and that we all feel and work with and that constitute the most difficult ones. Then there are some subgroupings. And I want to see if you can tell me what these are.

So I'm going to suggest difficult emotions get born around experiences of pleasure and pain. This may be a new concept, but I'm going to suggest and you can think about this. The reason life is so difficult is because we have a mix of pleasure and pain. If life was always pleasant, it wouldn't be problematic, would it? It's the alternation that makes life difficult. So the alternation of pleasure and pain makes for difficulty.

The other thing that makes for difficulty is time, or you could say memory and anticipation. When we're completely in the present moment, it's hard to be overwhelmed by a difficult emotion. Difficult emotions depend on a sense of time.

So let's say that pleasure and pain are on a vertical axis. This is for all of you who really liked algebra in the eighth grade. Pleasure and pain are on a vertical axis. Pleasure up here, pain down here. And time will be on the horizontal axis, with past over here, the present, a very tiny point in the middle, and then the future over here. So again, for you algebra buffs, this creates four quadrants, right?

So let's start off with past pleasant. So that's up here. Let's say that something was really pleasant in the past. What emotion might you have in relation to it? Now, past means it's not here now. So, hmm? You'll have a memory of it for sure, but there's an emotion around it.

Missing it. Could that be sadness? Yeah. Sometimes people will answer this and say desire, but that's if it could reappear again. But let's say that it really is gone. Then sadness or missing is more the emotion, isn't it? So sadness or grief is one of the primal emotions that we all work with.

Let's say it was unpleasant. We're in this lower quadrant. Unpleasant in the past. And just to narrow it down, let's say it was connected to somebody. Somebody did something that was unpleasant for you in the past.

What emotion arises around that? Anger. Resentment. This is another of the big ones. Of course it doesn't have to, but that's the trigger for anger. Some degree of pain that happened in the past is the trigger for anger. We don't always succumb, but that's the trigger.

Okay, let's move into the future. Pleasant in the future. How do you feel about that? Hope. It's good. What's another synonym? What's a stronger synonym? Desire. Desire, longing, hope, yearning. This is the kind of emotion that we feel about pleasant things in the future.

And what about unpleasant things in the future? Fear. Fear. So we have sadness or grief, anger, desire, and fear.

So I want to suggest that these are maybe the four most primal emotions that we humans work with, live with, or are subject to. And at times, each one of them can be overwhelming and very, very painful.

Now, there are different subcategories that I'll get to with some of these, but these are the four that I mostly want to talk about tonight.

So let's take, as an example, desire. This is a movement of mind looking for a pleasant experience. It comes a lot in retreat. You've probably seen it a lot here.

How many of you have wished you were home sometime in the last couple of days? Some nice thoughts of home? No? Congratulations. How many of you wish for more chocolate chip cookies at tea?

So often in retreat, there's a missing of the pleasant things in our life - the ability to choose our own food or sleep in our own bed or be really warm when we get up in the morning or be with friends and go out for a nice meal. Often it comes. It's maybe not a big source of suffering, but often that wanting comes when we're here.

I was teaching a retreat in Italy. Actually, Carol and Sally and I were all there. It was a lot of fun to work with Italian yogis. They're very frank about their emotions. It was a kind of emotional culture, and they knew their emotions well and were at ease talking about them.

The retreat setup was a little different. It was at a Catholic convent, and when we first went in the first night for tea, there was a carafe of red wine on every table. So we had to ask them to remove that. More suffering. And then you grow up.

But we did not take away the espresso machine that was outside the meditation halls. Every time at the end, ding, ding, ding, ding, people were awake.

So at one point early on, I had an interview with this young man, very nice young fellow, and I said, "How's the retreat for you?" He said, "Oh, I really don't want to be here. I'm really having a terrible time, not happy at all." I said, "Well, why are you here?" He said, "Well, my friends invited me to go to the Caribbean with them or I could have come here." I said, "So why did you choose this?" He said, "Well, all the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out." That's why he was at the retreat. He said, "But while I'm here, all I can think about are my friends in the Caribbean and the beautiful sand and the water and the warm sunshine."

Just so I don't want to be here.

So we talked about this a little while. I said, "So you're wanting to be somewhere else. What if that wanting wasn't here? Is this situation actually bad in itself? Is it really unpleasant being here?" He thought about it and said, "No, you know, it's not so bad, but I really want to be there." I said, "But what if that wanting wasn't there? Would it be so bad to be here? Go check it out. In those times when the wanting isn't there, see if it's that bad."

So he went away and practiced. I saw him again a few days later. He had let go of the wanting, had settled in fine, and was really enjoying the retreat. It was so interesting because that's what wanting does—it makes us think that we would be happy if we were somewhere else, and since we can't be, we can't be happy here. That's what strong wanting does. It blinds us to what's good where we are.

So wanting has this bittersweet quality. You can notice this when you're feeling a little bit of suffering around wanting—check out the bittersweetness. It brings in a pleasant object, and that's the sweet part of it. But you don't have it, and that's the bitter part of it. So desire is always like that. It always has this frustrating quality. When there's a little suffering around it, there's the suffering of frustration, because what we want are things we don't have. Do you ever want a hand at the end of your arm? No, because you have one. If you lost it, you would really want it.

So desire is inherently frustrating. It seems to hold the possibility of gratification, but the lack of the object makes it dissatisfying. And we can't find that real contentment that comes from being present.

The next general area I want to talk about comes under the heading of aversion, which is a word we use a lot in dharma talks because it's one of the fundamental tendencies of mind. Basically, again, because we're driven by pleasure and pain, we want the pleasant and we want to push away the painful. That movement of pushing away the painful is what we call aversion. And that movement of wanting to hold on to the pleasant is what we call wanting or desire.

So aversion has lots of different blooms. I'll just name a few: ill will, anger, hatred, impatience, irritation, fear, sadness, grief, judgment, blame, resentment, depression, despair, resistance. Get the flavor? It's a big one. It's one of the fundamental movements and expresses itself in many different ways.

In general, the storyline under aversion is something like: "I can't be happy because this is here. This painful experience is here and it's blocking my happiness." When we're in a state of aversion, everything sort of rubs us the wrong way. Everything doesn't fit right, is not suitable, is not quite to our liking.

Long term, the antidote that the Buddha talked about for this general tendency of aversion is loving kindness. It's kind of interesting—if you notice that there's a lot of aversion in your general approach to life, and sometimes that's just the way it is, loving kindness is a very good practice to offset that. You can kind of think about it because you can feel into aversion how it makes the mind tight and stiff and hard. Loving kindness opens and softens and sweetens that mind. So it undoes the tightness of aversion with this soft opening. It's a very good general direction for people with aversion.

So I want to talk about a few aspects of aversion, one of which is anger, one of the four primary ones. You'll notice that when you're angry with someone, you will tend to think certain thoughts that blame that person, just like I was doing with the person in my walking path.

Notice how when you're angry with someone, you tend to think certain thoughts that blame that person, just like I was doing with the person in my walking path. You can see that the more thoughts you think, the more the anger builds up. You're justifying your point of view and blaming the other person. Those anger thoughts tend to be the same again and again.

We could say the storyline with anger is "I'm right and they're wrong." We tell ourselves that over and over and over. That very telling builds up the anger. Then we feel it in the body—the body becomes tight and burning. We feel that fiery tone in the mind from the flavor of the anger.

What happens if you stop telling yourself the angry thoughts? The anger fades. This is a really useful thing to know. If you want to get out of anger, stop telling those stories. Then you'll see the anger doesn't have the support and it fades.

But of course, in the beginning, our thinking is very compulsive, and we don't feel we have much choice about what we think. As mindfulness develops, we have more and more choice about thinking those thoughts. The curious thing is that we can see the pain of anger, and we still choose to continue to think those thoughts. It's so funny. We sabotage ourselves in doing that. But at least we know there is a way to let the anger fade, and that is to stop thinking those thoughts.

Now, one of the things that's tricky is sometimes those thoughts are true. People do terrible things in the world and hurt us and other people deeply. When we think, "I'm ethically right and they're ethically wrong," that may very well be true. But is it helpful? That's the question. Is it helpful?

The Dalai Lama tells this story. He left Tibet in 1959, which was ten years after the Chinese invasion and occupation, when he saw that it wasn't going to get any better. But there was a monk that he knew there who stayed behind, and eventually that monk was imprisoned and spent twenty years in prison for the crime of being a monk. While he was in prison, he suffered a great deal, but he eventually was released and escaped from Tibet to come to India.

The Dalai Lama in those years was trying to meet all the refugees who came, especially monks who managed to get out of Tibet. As soon as he came to India, he found the Dalai Lama and had a meeting with him. The Dalai Lama remembered him from earlier, and he remembered him as quite an ordinary monk, nothing special. The Dalai Lama asked him, "Well, how was your time in prison?"

The monk said, "Oh, I felt I was really in danger."

The Dalai Lama was very concerned and said, "Do you mean in danger of being tortured?"

The monk said, "Oh, no, I was tortured, but that's not what I meant. I was in danger of getting angry at my captors. But I didn't."

That was the level of his practice. Who was ethically right in that situation? Who had all the grounds in the world for anger? And yet he didn't allow himself to get angry at his captors. The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of that monk's practice. He was much better developed than he had thought before.

This is a real human possibility. This is beyond me—I am not at that point where I could do that yet—but I am a lot better than I used to be at letting go of anger sooner and sooner when it comes.

As we explore and investigate in this way, we start to see that when we become angry, we suffer first. Tune into the feeling of anger, the tension in the body, the kind of burning quality in the mind. It's not a pleasant experience. In the texts, they say that getting angry at somebody is like picking up a hot coal that you want to throw at them. But you've picked it up and it burns you first. Especially explore if you're angry while you're here—whoever you're angry with doesn't even know it. But you're suffering.

Another analogy is drinking poison and expecting the other person to die.

For me, feeling the suffering of anger was the biggest encouragement to let go. I had to feel my own suffering in anger time and again before I said, I don't want this anymore. And it was a great motivator in letting go sooner and sooner. So it's important to feel that pain of anger. There's a lot of learning there.

Now, we can still act in the world when someone has done something that's ethically wrong. We can still act in the world, and I believe we'll be clearer in our actions if our mind isn't clouded by anger. So maybe we can use a little bit of the strength of anger to make us determined, but then let go of the delusion of the cloudiness in order to act properly. And sometimes that means acting forcefully.

One variation of anger is when we turn it toward ourselves. In the West, we tend to do this a lot in the form of self-judgment, self-criticism. It almost seems like our culture has created generations of people who don't like themselves very much and find every opportunity to criticize themselves. We are lacking—we find ourselves lacking in so many qualities. I'm not good enough. I'm not lovable enough. I'm not attractive enough, I'm not smart enough, I'm not thin enough, I'm not making enough money. We can never quite feel good enough about ourselves.

So the story is that we're not quite good enough or lovable enough. And this is felt as a kind of burdensome pressure that doesn't let me feel hopeful or confident or tall with optimism—a burden that weighs me down. And it's very widespread. We hear it a lot in retreats. People comment on this, that especially as they get quiet, they hear a lot of thoughts judging themselves. You're not doing this right. You're not doing that right. Not good enough in many different forms.

A group of Western teachers was meeting with the Dalai Lama some years ago and asked him how to work with this problem. And the Dalai Lama could not understand what they were talking about. He had no experience of it and he had not seen it in Tibetan culture. And so people had to explain it time and time again before he started to get a flavor of what they meant. And he went around to each of the Western teachers and said, "Have you experienced this?" "Yes." "Have you experienced this?" "Yes." Every Western teacher there knew what this was like from their own personal experience. And the Dalai Lama hadn't. And it's not really in Tibetan culture.

So this is definitely something that's workable through meditation. Again, the development of loving kindness is a huge asset in this way. Because when loving kindness grows, we start to feel, oh, there's goodness inside. This is a goodness that's always been there, but it maybe hasn't been so strong. We haven't seen it clearly. As metta develops, we start to feel, oh, there is real goodness inside, and we feel better and better about ourselves.

So when you notice the judging thoughts, take a moment to just feel the impact, that kind of burden that it puts on us to be perfect. And notice you don't have to believe the thoughts. The way through self-judgment is not getting rid of the thoughts, because that would be more aversion. But the thought can be there and we don't have to believe it. We don't have to take it so seriously. "Okay. That's the judging mind again." We could say, "Thanks, Dad. I appreciate your concern for my perfection." But we don't have to believe it.

A way to lighten it up was recommended by Joseph Goldstein. He said, when you hear a judging thought, add on the words "and the sky is blue." "I'm a crummy meditator, and the sky is blue." So learn to see them with some degree of understanding. This is just a judging thought.

It's an old pattern. It's not true. The people who are most tuned in to this self-judging mind are meditators, but I happen to think meditators are the best people in the world because you all are devoting your time and energy to making your hearts and minds clearer and adding more love and wisdom to the world. That's what we need. I think you all are doing the best work on the planet, and yet some of you may be feeling this self-criticism. It's not warranted. You all are good people, and I hope you will feel that and believe in that.

So another of the emotions that we come upon is sadness or grief. We've all had lots of disappointments in life. I think there's grounds for sadness in every person I've known. Some of us have had bigger losses than others. Some losses take a long, long time to heal from. I don't want to minimize the work involved in grieving. But sometimes it feels like when there's been a big loss, it can feel like we can't start to open to it because we'd drown in it. We'd get lost. We'd never come out. But that's just a belief. That's a story.

What I've seen is that even in the biggest kinds of loss—and I'm thinking of parents who lose a child to suicide, which I think is one of the probably most devastating things that happens in a life—even then, the capacity is there with meditation to touch that grief and little by little open it up and let it come through and let it pass through. A huge amount of healing can take place if we're open to starting that process, being able to feel it and touch it, and then also finding a way to open to the beautiful aspects of life, which loving kindness also reveals to us. My general impression is that grief has a timeline, if we're willing to open to it, that it also will pass, although it can sometimes take some time.

The last of these primal emotions I wanted to talk about is fear. I want to especially talk about this one because it was one that I learned a huge amount from in the early years of my practice. It was such a constant companion for me in years of practice. At times it became a very, very intense kind of overpowering experience. I had to develop wisdom in relationship with it or I really would have been lost.

When fear comes, the storyline is something like, "This moment may be bearable, but there's a calamity about to happen." If you feel into fear, it's that feeling that something awful is about to descend. Yet, even though the fear is there, the calamity usually doesn't follow. We can first just start to question that, and maybe it's safe to let the fear be felt. That was the way in for me. What if I just feel the fear?

My teachers directed me to feel it in the body. That was where I put my attention. Many, many times when fear would come, I would feel the body sensations and I would try to open with acceptance. There'd be a contraction in the belly. There'd be a fluttering in the chest. There'd be sweat under the arms. I would just try to open to those. The question I ask myself is, can I bear these sensations? Because normally when fear comes, if it's strong, in the beginning it feels unbearable. I didn't think I could bear it. But I found that I could bear those sensations. Yeah, I can feel that. I'm not going to die from a fluttery chest or a contraction in the belly. I can bear that.

Then as I was able to bear that, I could start to explore that mood in the mind. Fear is tricky because the essence of fear is, let's get away. Let's escape. So trying to get close to that mood was, let's not feel this. It was hard. It's subtle. It's tough to just feel that fear directly. But I was able to do that. I found that I could bear the emotion.

I could bear the sensations. I no longer quite believed the storyline. But still, sometimes fear would be very strong, and I didn't like it. I could bear it, but I really didn't like it.

At a certain point, I had to dig deeper. The question I asked myself was: am I really accepting this or am I just pretending to accept it so it will go away? At that point, I was kind of pretending.

So I said, if I really was going to accept this fear, could I be okay with it if it was here the rest of my life? That was the question I asked. I thought that's the bottom line with this. If I really accept it, then if it stayed forever, could I be okay with that?

The answer immediately came: no way. I could not accept it being here the rest of my life.

So then I inquired, okay, why? Well, if fear was always here, I couldn't enjoy a sunset the way I used to. I couldn't get high listening to music the way I used to. I couldn't fall in love the way I wanted to.

I said, okay, so you want to hold out for getting high sometime in the future. And that's why you're going to keep fighting now, fighting the fear now. In other words, you don't want peace now if it means the possibility of giving something up in the future.

When I saw that, I said, no, I want peace now.

So I finally surrendered. I said, okay, I'm going to open to it whether it stays the rest of my life or not. And I did. I went through a period of working with fear where if it came, that was totally fine. If it didn't come, that was totally fine. I had no preference either way.

When I opened to it to that extent, something about that grip of fear in my mind broke. It could never hold me the same way that it had before. Curiously, that complete acceptance or complete surrender to the fear broke it. It broke its spine in my mind.

So this is possible for us. Fear has come many times since, but I know how to work with it. The fear doesn't scare me. I can be with it. I can work with it. I can work with acceptance. Of course, a lot of things haven't happened yet. There's no telling what will happen later. But so far, so good.

All these emotions are capable of this kind of transformation and this kind of taking the grip out of our minds of these strong, afflictive emotions. What transforms them is this deep, unconditional acceptance with the understanding of their nature. They come into the mind, they express, and then they pass away.

I want to suggest a simple way to remind yourself of the nature of these states when they come. We can practice with this tomorrow morning again in the instructions. It's a little acronym called RAIN, R-A-I-N. It was developed by a Vipassana teacher. If you go through these four steps of RAIN with your difficult emotions, you'll start to get a really good handle on a wise and mindful way to relate.

The four steps are recognition, and that's the naming process. When we can name the state, it creates space around it. Like when I could name my anger in walking, I could start to work with it. So we recognize the emotion that's there.

The second step is acceptance. We work to not resist because you may have heard this line: what we resist persists. What we open to can pass. So we work to accept rather than resist these states.

The phrase "like this" invites interest—what is it like? How does that feel in the body, in the mind? What kind of thoughts come with it? And "like this"—there's no I or mine in that. Anger is just this arising, and it's like this. Your experience of anger is not so different from my experience of anger. It's all part of the human package, all these emotions—part of human nature, part of the human package. Not I, not mine.

I'd like to close with a poem by Rainer Maria Rilke that he wrote when he was in his early twenties. He was in a very Christian phase of his life, from a book called The Book of Hours. The scenario in this poem is that God has created a being and is about to launch them into their life—this life that you and I are living—into the world. But before doing that, he gives them a little pep talk. So the poem is the pep talk.

God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night.
These are the words we dimly hear:

You, sent out beyond your memory,
go to the limits of your longing.
Embody me.

Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in.

Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror.
Just keep going.
No feeling is final.

Don't let yourself lose me.

Nearby is the country they call life.
You will know it by its seriousness.

Give me your hand.

So let's just sit for a moment together, please.

Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me.

Thank you for your attention. We'll take questions in the morning or comments. Thank you.

We have about fifteen minutes for walking meditation, and then we'll come back and sit for the last period of the day at nine o'clock. It won't be a full thirty minutes, and we'll begin with chanting to wake everybody up.

CHAPTER 111

Factors of Awakening

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the seven bojjhaṅgas (factors of awakening) as essential wholesome mental qualities that support the path to liberation. Drawing from the Buddha's systematic approach to mental cultivation, he explains how these factors work sequentially and synergistically: sati (mindfulness) initiates the process, followed by the energizing factors of dhammavicaya (investigation), vīriya (energy), and pīti (rapture), then the calming factors of passaddhi (tranquillity), samādhi (concentration), and upekkhā (equanimity).
> Armstrong skillfully illustrates each factor with practical examples and personal anecdotes, showing how mindfulness answers "what's happening now?" while investigation brings us closer to our experience through yoniso manasikāra (wise attention). He emphasizes how energy (vīriya) - with its heroic quality derived from 'vīra' (hero) - fuels our dedication to abandoning unwholesome states and cultivating wholesome ones. The teaching progresses through rapture's joyful interest in meditation itself, to the profound settling of calm, the natural unification of samādhi, and finally equanimity's balanced responsiveness.
> The talk concludes with the Buddha's promise that these factors, when developed and cultivated, "lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbāna." Armstrong presents this as both a practical roadmap for daily meditation and the mind's preparation for moments of liberation, emphasizing that while we cannot force awakening, we can cultivate the conditions that make it possible.

We talked the other night about the difficult states that come and bring suffering into our hearts and minds, and also about the beautiful states that we can open to and discover within us. The Buddha, of course, made a lot of lists of both.

On the side of suffering, you're probably familiar with lists like the hindrances, the fetters, and the taints. He talked a lot about these as ways to understand how we suffer and the deep roots of our suffering. But he also talked about just as many, if not more, wholesome qualities—beautiful qualities of mind. He put these into lists as well: the Eightfold Path, the Five Spiritual Faculties, the Four Brahma Viharas, and others.

As we read the teachings and understand how the path works, we start to see that the heart of the path is to grow the wholesome qualities of heart and mind and reduce the unwholesome. That's really what meditation is all about, and insight as well. We see that the mind has so much potential in this way—that we can pick the kinds of qualities we want our minds to manifest. By practices oriented in those directions, we can shape the mind to be what we want it to be. Of course, it's still subject to impermanence, and it takes a lot of work and training to do that. But we can shape it in any of the wholesome directions that we choose. We can also shape it in unwholesome directions, but that's not recommended.

As an example of this shaping in a wholesome direction, there's a nun in Burma called the Metta Nun. All she does all day, every day, is loving-kindness practice for all beings. So you can be pretty sure that in the hours of daylight in Burma, somebody is sending you metta. It's a beautiful reflection. Imagine what her mind is like, having practiced metta day after day for years and years in her simple life as a nun. It's a beautiful inspiration to me. We can do that ourselves in whatever direction we want. We can shape our minds by our choices.

You may know this story from the Native American tradition that became popular around the time of 9/11, called the Two Wolves. The story goes that a boy comes home from school one day and talks to his grandfather about how he's been picked on by some other boys at school. It made him really mad, and he wanted to fight back and hurt them the way they had hurt him. He said, "Grandfather, what should I do?"

The grandfather said, "I know this very well because there are two wolves inside me. One wolf is angry and violent and wants to rage against injustice and hurt the people who have caused it. But the other wolf is peace-loving, loves harmony, wants to be friends with everyone, and doesn't want to give in to hatred. These two wolves are battling for control of my soul."

The young boy said, "Well, grandfather, which one will win?"

And he said, "The one that I feed."

I like this language because the Buddha used very similar language. The list that he talked about, particularly for meditators—and one that I don't say this very often, but I think this is worth memorizing—I think it would be good for you all to memorize this list and know it in your own experience in your meditation practice—is the seven factors of awakening, sometimes translated as the seven factors of enlightenment.

These factors of mind are a meditator's best friend. They will support you on your path and lead you to awakening. The way the Buddha described them is that by feeding these seven factors of awakening, we are starving the five hindrances. That is what leads to awakening or enlightenment. This image of feeding and starving is right there in the ancient texts.

The seven factors are usually described in the texts in a certain order because they have a sequential unfolding. They are: mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, calm, concentration, and equanimity. As the Buddha said, "They lead to awakening, therefore they're called factors of awakening." He described all of them as maturing in release or liberation. That's their destination. As they develop, that's where they take the mind.

"Just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline towards the roof peak, so too, when a practitioner develops and cultivates the seven factors of awakening, she slants, slopes, and inclines to nibbana"—the term for the highest kind of freedom that's possible.

In developing these factors, they lead us in the direction of freedom and liberation. They also describe, when brought to maturity, the mind as it's poised for that moment of awakening. The understanding in our tradition is that the mind develops in a certain way...

And when it's in a perfect state of balance, as we'll see from these factors, it's ripe for opening to a glimpse of the unconditioned, nibbana.

That moment where the mind moves beyond the conditioned realm and contacts this unconditioned element called nibbana is what constitutes enlightenment or awakening in our tradition—in the Buddha's description, in our understanding.

So these are both the factors that lead to that awakening, and they also describe, when brought to maturity and balance, the mind that's poised for that movement, for that opening to the unconditioned.

The Buddha described them as sequential, so I'll describe them in that way. But we also need to understand that each one reinforces the others. You will experience them all along your journey, and they keep feeding back into one another, creating a circular quality as well. When you consider the whole path unfolding, there's a sequence that the mind goes through, and these factors illuminate that progression.

The reason we emphasize these factors is that you want to be able to recognize when they're present in your meditation. You want to know how they come into being and how they become strengthened. They're very wholesome in themselves, and even if the journey doesn't carry all the way to enlightenment, the development of these qualities will be pillars of your practice. Having them alive in your mind is the path of meditation—this is how we develop through insight meditation.

The first of these is mindfulness, which we've talked about extensively. It's been our practice throughout the week, and it starts the chain going. It's like when you have milk at the right temperature and add yogurt culture—it starts the whole transformation into yogurt. Mindfulness works the same way. You introduce the culture of mindfulness into your mind, into your practice, and it begins to unfold these other factors.

The next three factors are energizing—we call them arousing factors. The final three are pacifying or calming factors. That's the essential balance of the entire set. Mindfulness initiates them and also helps balance the energizing and pacifying factors. This describes the fundamental balance that this set of mental factors creates.

Essentially, we're aiming in practice for a mixture, a balance of energy and calm. You'll hear us in meditation instructions encourage you to find that mix in your body posture—find a posture that's relaxed (the calming piece) but also upright (the alert or energizing piece). The body expresses this balance we're developing in the mind.

We've talked extensively about mindfulness this week. Sally gave a complete talk on it a few nights ago, so I don't need to elaborate much. I want to leave you with what I consider the definition of mindfulness. You can read many books on mindfulness without finding a clear definition, so this is my personal understanding of what mindfulness is.

Mindfulness is the factor of mind that knows what our present moment experience is. Just that simple.

You could say mindfulness answers the question: What's happening now?

You can see that you can be in the present moment—like the thief, the rock climber, or the surgeon—but not be answering the question, "What's happening now in my experience?"

Consider a dog. Is a dog in the present? Almost all the time. Is a dog mindful? No. It lacks that self-reflective quality that can observe and note, "This is my present moment experience."

For instance, you open a can of food at 5:30, the dog's dinnertime. The smell emerges, and the dog immediately bolts to the dish. Does the dog ever think, "Oh, hearing, hearing. Perception of can opener. Rising of aroma—Frisky's meatloaf, associated with mealtimes. Pleasant, pleasant. Should I go to my bowl or not?"

No. The dog doesn't go through that process. The dog lacks mindfulness.

The baby is also very present, but hasn't yet developed this self-reflective quality. The baby is not answering the question, "What's happening in my experience right now?" But mindfulness answers that question.

You can see that it's a factor we can turn on or off in any moment. It's not that hard. Carol mentioned, "How hard is it to feel the touch of your hands?" It's not hard, but remembering to do it is hard. So this is mindfulness—a factor that has some wisdom, some intelligence in it, answering the question: What's happening now in my experience?

When we start to become mindful and pay attention to our experience, we lead directly into the next factor. We become interested. We become curious. We want to know what's there. When you start to wake up, you have this alert interest—especially in a place like this, but anywhere—this alert interest in what's happening in your experience. This leads to the second factor of investigation.

Investigation builds off the mindful connection and wants to look more deeply. It wants to know more deeply: What's the nature of this experience? We've talked in different ways about this factor of investigation during this retreat. There was a question earlier about using a life situation to inquire into and contemplate, and that can be appropriate and very useful in its own time and place.

The main thing I want to say about this factor of investigation is that primarily it's not conceptual. We're investigating our experience, and we don't need so many words to do that. To give you an example: when you're feeling your breath, if you want to know your breath more intimately or in more detail, do you have to think about it? Or can you just bring your attention closer to the sensations of breathing and feel it more deeply?

That's the way this factor of investigation is meant to work. It's meant to encourage us, based on mindfulness, to bring our attention right together with the thing we're experiencing and know it that intimately, so that the awareness and the focus come right together. Then we know it as closely as it can be known.

You can see this kind of attention coming naturally when you get interested in something. For instance, when you go by on your way to the dining hall and see the mother robin in that nest, isn't your attention just right there? There's not a forced effort in it, but the interest just draws you in to what she's doing. Or when you see the sun setting on Discovery Point and those rosy pink tones coming in, you just want to look. You want to be close to that experience. That's the factor of investigation.

We can assist this factor with some cues or questions. For example, if the breath is a good anchor for you, a way to get more intimate with it—more continuous and with more detail—is to see if you can experience with each in-breath the beginning, middle, and end of that in-breath. And if you can experience with each out-breath the beginning, middle, and end of the out-breath. See if you can sustain that recognition breath after breath after breath.

This does two things. It makes for greater continuity in the mindfulness, so there's less tendency to stray. And it allows you to perceive more detail in the experience. Because when you start to look that closely, you realize the in-breath isn't just one thing. We start by saying, "Just be with the in-breath"—okay, that's just one thing. You're with the in-breath. But when you look at beginning, middle, and end, you see there are lots of little sensations arising and passing, moment by moment, in the course of an in-breath. Same with the out-breath—many little sensations arising and passing that make up the out-breath.

In seeing this finer level of detail, you drop down and start to see the truth of impermanence that Sally talked about last night. It's not like the in-breath is one solid thing that lasts for a while. The in-breath is actually made up of very rapidly changing sensations, whether you're experiencing it at the belly or in the nose. As you look closely, you'll find that.

This kind of attention the Buddha described with a phrase that is quite lovely: yoniso manasikāra. It's usually translated as "wise attention," but the meaning is more poignant than that. For those who know a little about Indian culture, yoni is the word for the female organ and lingam is the word for the male organ. If you go around to Hindu temples, you'll see lots of representations of lingams and yonis because they're sacred in Hindu worship.

So yoni we could translate here as "the womb." Manasikāra means "attention." Yoniso manasikāra literally means "attention that's like the womb." It's not like a cold, clinical, detached, microscopic observation. It's the way that a womb supports the baby growing inside it—nourishing, embracing, and supportive.

So that's the quality of attention that we want to bring into this investigation. Sally used the phrase "kind attention" in describing mindfulness, and this term yoniso manasikara really unfolds that meaning. This is how we become more familiar with our experience—by becoming very intimate with it and embracing it with this kind of nourishing and caring attention.

We discussed this approach briefly when we talked about emotions. When you want to understand an emotion well, you bring your attention to the experience in the body. You look for the flavor in the mind or heart, and you notice what thoughts are associated with it. Again, you're getting to know the emotion in all the different ways it manifests by coming very close. When we understand it in that way, we see how it's put together and we're not so enchanted or deluded by it. We understand its makeup because we've looked at it so closely and carefully.

This factor of investigation emerges from what you might call the wisdom aspect of mindfulness. People often ask, "How do I bring wisdom into my meditation? How do I awaken that factor?" Investigation is the premier way, the direct way, because you're opening up the aspect of curiosity and wanting to understand as you look more closely and investigate to feel more directly. You're directly awakening the wisdom faculty.

In concentration practice, investigation is not that important a feature. Concentration practice is designed simply to still the mind. One of my teachers, Pauk Sayadaw, who's a master at concentration practices, told me, "Don't investigate while you're doing this practice—it disturbs concentration." He was referring to the deepening of stillness, basically saying to turn off the investigation faculty. But for vipassana practice, where the whole purpose is to awaken wisdom, the investigation faculty is key. You want to have it alive and growing.

This aspect of interest and curiosity naturally brings up the next factor in the sequence: energy. When you're interested in something, you get energized, don't you? It brings about physical energy and mental energy, and that's the next of the seven factors.

This is not just random energy, however. It's energy directed toward what you could call the path. Sometimes the word used here is "effort"—the kind of effort toward the accomplishment of the path. If you put the two together and think of it as energetic effort, that's a nice way to hold this factor.

The word in Pali is virya, and it carries deep connotations because the word vira, which is the root of virya, means "hero." You can think of a hero or heroine arousing great energy to carry out a really difficult task. This word vira shares the same root as the Latin virile and the English word "virile," which has its root in Latin—the same root as the word "hero."

When you put all that together, you get the sense that this factor of virya, which we're translating here as energy, could equally be effort, energetic effort, ardor, enthusiasm, courage, or determination. It encompasses all those aspects of giving yourself wholeheartedly to the work of meditation that you're carrying out.

This is how the Buddha described it: "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the responsibility of cultivating wholesome states." I hope you can sense the heroic quality of this undertaking. It's what all of you have been doing day by day in being here.

I mentioned the other night all the wholesome qualities that you've all been generating and working on during these days—the moment-by-moment practice. This virya really demonstrates that: the moments you've created of mindfulness, of loving-kindness, of patience, of determination, of wisdom, of courage. These are all summed up in this quality of virya—the moment-by-moment effort as we confront the difficulties in the mind, the emotions, the kilesas, and transform them into wisdom and compassion. That's a heroic journey.

Now, the degree of virya that we bring to this path depends on our level of motivation, which depends on our inspiration and our understanding of what we're doing here—what the path is about and what it means to us. There are many gradations of motivation among practitioners.

Some people find the path and go into a cave for twelve years, like Ani Tenzin Palmo. I don't know if you've read her story—she's an English woman who ordained in the Tibetan tradition and literally spent twelve years in a cave in India practicing. That's the outcome of great inspiration and motivation.

You see this in other fields too—people doing incredible kinds of training. I just read an article about a Kenyan athlete who won the marathon in the 2008 Beijing Olympics. The kind of training he went through was unbelievable: twenty-four-mile runs almost every day, climbing very steep hills as part of that routine at high altitude, so that when he came down to Beijing near sea level, he would be tremendously conditioned.

from his high-altitude training. Week after week, year after year, he maintained this rigorous schedule to stay in championship condition. I believe he set a world record time winning that Beijing marathon.

My particular sports obsession is tennis, and I'm drawn to the generation of the Sampras-Agassi rivalry. Andre Agassi used to train in Las Vegas with Gil Reyes, an athletic coach at the University of Nevada. Reyes was this big, strong, inspiring figure who would take Agassi into the hills of Las Vegas in the middle of summer and make him run uphill until he vomited. That was his training regimen. Once he threw up, he could call it a day, go home, and have an energy drink.

People do these incredible things merely for money and fame—they're not even trying to get enlightened. Imagine the energy we could put into spiritual practice.

One teacher in our circle who emphasized this energy factor most strongly was Sayadaw U Pandita, a Burmese master and Dharma heir of Mahasi Sayadaw. While Mahasi had many successors, U Pandita took over his main monastery in Rangoon and was a true Dhamma warrior. Though I didn't practice with him personally, Carol did and survived to tell the tale—we bow to her endurance.

Sayadaw U Pandita expected practitioners to maintain twenty hours of daily practice with only four hours of sleep. I began a three-month retreat when several teachers were studying with him and teaching in this format. Joseph and Sharon at IMS were practicing this way, and that became their instruction to me: practice twenty hours a day, sleep four.

I didn't think I could manage it, but during daily interviews they asked how many hours I'd sat, walked, and slept. There was no escaping the accountability. So I kept working at it until I actually achieved four hours of sleep nightly with mindful practice filling the rest. It was tremendously powerful—an experience I treasure, though I don't practice quite so intensively now. I'm a bit older, perhaps gentler, but I'm grateful I undertook that training when I had such energy and fervor.

However, effort need not be so extreme. It can simply mean perseverance—just continuing. I love this quote from Bhikkhu Bodhi, the great modern scholar and translator: "There are only two requirements for reaching liberation. One is that you start, and the other is that you continue. Then the outcome is guaranteed."

This we can all do. We can start and continue, and liberation will unfold.

Consider Milarepa, perhaps Tibet's most revered yogi from the eleventh century and ancestor of many Kagyu masters. Though his teacher Marpa gave him considerable hardship, Milarepa eventually integrated all the teachings and retreated to practice alone in remote mountain caves for years. He's said to have attained the highest realization within one lifetime through pure dedication.

You'll recognize him in Tibetan art by his simple white cotton robe. He mastered tummo—inner heat generation—enabling him to survive mountain winters. Legend says he lived on nettle broth, which sometimes gave his skin a greenish tint in paintings.

Milarepa had two famous disciples: Gampopa and Rechungpa. When Gampopa had received all necessary instructions and started down the mountain path to find his own retreat cave, Milarepa called him back, saying he had one final pith instruction. When Gampopa returned, Milarepa turned around, lifted his white robe, and showed his buttocks—callused as hard as camel hooves from years of sitting in meditation.

And then Milarepa said to Gampopa, "There is nothing more profound than meditating on this pith instruction. The qualities in my mind stream have arisen through my having meditated so persistently that my buttocks have become like this. You must also give rise to such heartfelt perseverance." So just the power of continuing is so important. It's all we need to do.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who I think we've mentioned a few times, who Carol has sat with in Burma and Sally and I sat with on the East Coast, puts this in a beautiful way also. I'd like to read you his words: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort which is simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

When we have energy in our practice, as you may have felt this afternoon, things become very vibrant and alive. And when things become alive, it's satisfying in some way. It creates a kind of happiness in our experience. That leads to the next factor in this sequence, which is called rapture.

Rapture is a translation of the Pali word piti. I think rapture is actually a rather unfortunate translation because it has so many connotations from the Christian fundamentalist viewpoint. It denotes a state of intense ecstasy and self-surrender that isn't necessarily captured in the word piti. It's somewhat over-dramatized. Perhaps better translations would be "delighted interest" or "joyful attention."

Piti refers to this quality when the meditation starts waking up and you begin to really enjoy being with your object—whatever it is, whether it's the breath or the sounds of nature or the sight of the robin or the ease that might come in your body as you relax. It's finding delight in the meditation itself. This is a special kind of joy. It's not like getting joyful because you're thinking about the new raise you're going to get when you go back to your job at the end of the retreat. It's not that kind of joy. It's a joy in the present moment arising from the meditation itself.

In this enjoyment with the object, we find it's where we want to be. It's not forced anymore. We're not having to apply tremendous effort to stay with it. There's this growing pleasure in being with the object, being in the moment. A number of people have mentioned this quality of enjoyment coming into their practice during interviews, and that's the quality of piti or rapture.

This is generally a very pleasant experience—indeed, one of the synonyms is joy. But it's often accompanied by physical expressions because the energy has preceded it. The physical expressions can manifest as momentary jolts of energy, a sense of showering energy that starts from above and flows through the body, or all-pervading energy where the entire body feels alive with this flowing energy. Sometimes the degree of energy can be a little too strong to be pleasant, and it turns into somewhat of a burden—this physical manifestation of the factor of piti.

When that happens, it's something to discuss with one's teacher. The encouragement is simply to stay with it, not to back off from the process that has brought you there. Just bear the energy for a while, because as the practice continues, it starts to smooth out. The rapture becomes less burdensome as the meditation continues to deepen.

Essentially, one has discovered a happiness that comes from the mind's relationship to its own experience. This provides a gateway to the next factor in the path, which is calm. The happiness has entered the meditation and we stop having to look outside so much for our satisfaction or fulfillment. The fulfillment begins to arise through the inner experience of the meditation. As that happens, this searching, questing, craving, longing that keeps us stirred up—all of that starts to settle, because the fulfillment has been found internally.

This quality of calm is the next factor. Now we're moving out of the energizing factors—the three energizing factors of investigation, energy, and rapture—into the calming factors, and this is the first one. The experience of calm begins to arise, and we feel it both in the body and in the mind.

It's significant that we feel it in the body. Often when we come into meditation, the body is something of a jangle of nerves. We've accumulated tremendous tension through the overstimulation of our culture and the overwork of our particular society.

And so we come in and the body is often vibrating with too high an energy level that it's accumulated and hasn't known how to release. So as the calm starts to settle, it's felt through the body as well. The body can really relax, maybe for the first time.

This word in Pali is passaddhi, for the calm, and it's sometimes translated as relaxation. It's almost like for the first time now the body can really let go and settle down and relax. So then we can come more and more fully into this present moment with a sense of peacefulness, both mentally and physically.

Thoughts are not stirred up as much as before. It doesn't mean they stop, but they're coming at a more leisurely pace. Because the body is calming and relaxing, there's not as much pain in the body. And the calming also means that the kind of flood of difficult emotions has slowed down quite a bit.

The feeling is like we've crossed this stormy ocean and we've come into a safe harbor. There's a sense: I just want to rest in this safe harbor. There's this beautiful poem by Emily Dickinson that points to this. This is an excerpt from a poem of hers called "Wild Nights":

Futile the winds to a heart in port
Done with a compass, done with the chart
Rowing in Eden

That's a little bit of what it feels like. We can float on this place of calm. "Rowing in Eden" is a sense of having arrived in this safe harbor. It's only temporary—this is not the end of the road—but it's a very nice turning of a corner, a nice discovery.

We find that this peace and ease has always been available to us, but we've been stirring it up with our own reactivity. And now we've found a way not to stir. We find it's always available when we're not stirring.

There's this beautiful meditation instruction from Ajahn Amaro, who's an English monk and now the abbot of Amravati Monastery in England. At a certain point in a retreat, he'll give this instruction. This is the only instruction he'll give in a morning session:

Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of the mind and body. And then notice what disturbs it.

That's it. Once we discover there is this access to peace and ease, we can simply rest there. This is a really satisfying thing to discover, that this is possible for us, because in a way, it's part of what we've been looking for all along. I think there is a really deep longing for peace in our life. And this is the corner in turning in meditation where we discover it.

Sometimes it's not so striking in the beginning. People will be going along, having had a few days of settling in, a little bit of turbulence, and then they'll come to an interview and report, "Well, there's really nothing going on now. I was really restless for a few days and my body was aching. My body feels okay now. There's really not much going on. I'm sort of sorry to report this, but there's not much happening in my practice."

So I'll ask them, "Well, is it basically peaceful?"

"Oh, yeah, it's pretty peaceful. But there's not much going on. It's basically calm. Yeah, but it's kind of boring because there's nothing happening. I thought I'd have more emotions to purify and process."

It takes a little bit of time to realize the importance, the significance of this. Because we're often so accustomed to intensity, big highs and big lows, when those go away and the experience takes on a little bit of a neutral feeling, we don't quite know what to make of it. Sometimes an element of boredom comes in: nothing happening.

This is like the first touch of calm. It may seem boring because for once the experience is kind of neutral. It's not insanely great and it's not crazy bad. And we're not used to that neutral. Boredom is basically aversion to the neutral. But when we can see this, oh, there's some potential here.

You know, the Buddha said peace and calm were pretty good things to develop. And this is just the beginning. So trust in that and let yourself go into it.

There's a cartoon that sums up this state of perhaps disappointment. It's a Gary Larson cartoon about two Zen monks sitting in a zendo. One's a little older and one's a little younger. The older monk is leaning over and whispering something to the younger monk, and the caption says, "Nothing happens next. This is it."

That's sort of this stage of just beginning to touch the calm. But we need to have the trust that this is actually a really wholesome unfolding and just to rest in it. You don't need to do anything with it. You don't need to try to pump up the calm either. You just need to trust and rest in that.

One of the Buddhist statements that I really like in relation to this is the comment that peace is the highest happiness. Generally in Western culture, I don't think we believe this. I think we generally look for something more intensely pleasurable, some kind of high that's higher than just peace. And we think that's the highest happiness.

The Buddha said really clearly, peace is the highest happiness. And I think this is an important lesson in human psychology. This is truly what satisfies—finding the access to peace. As we really start to feel it and trust in it, we start to open the door to contentment. We don't have to run around outside looking for more things, looking for special experiences, looking for intense highs or gratification. We start trusting in the fact we can just rest in this peace, which is always available when we don't disturb it.

We also discover that it's possible to encourage this peace. In the Anapanasati Sutta, which describes the meditation on the breath, the Buddha has these very nice lines: "I shall breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe in tranquilizing the mental formation." And same for breathing out. So we find we can use the breath to bring about this factor of tranquility or calm in both mind and body.

As we settle into this calm and trust in it and let go of so many other wrong kinds of effort and craving, then the mind starts to collect within itself. It's as though we can just let the mind drop into our experience of—you could say—the whole body. And as it drops in that way, it starts to collect, come together and unify.

This is the next factor in the sequence, which is concentration. Concentration is the translation of the Pali word samadhi. And again, it's not a very good translation because in English, concentration means I'm going to take a narrow focus. Don't distract me with anything else. You know, I want to focus on my timepiece here and read the luminous dial. Don't distract me with any questions about tomorrow.

Samadhi doesn't have this sense of exclusive focus. Samadhi refers to the mind that has come together, which could happen from a narrow focus like the breath, but it could also happen from a very broad focus like sounds. So samadhi is this unification of mind where we've basically given up these jumps into past and future, into analyzing and rehearsing and planning and all that extra movement. We've let go of all that. The energy is collecting naturally through the power of calm into the mind and body coming together.

And we find when that happens, the mind feels different. It feels stable. It's not swayed so much. It's not so restless. It feels steady. We can stay in touch with the present moment, moment after moment for extended periods of time. It has a sense of well-being. It feels good when that happens. And it feels strong. By recollecting all this energy that we've been sending out, the mind discovers its own natural strength. And this is a great feeling.

There's a mistaken kind of understanding that concentration comes from a lot of effort. And I think maybe Sally mentioned this the other night. It's not about efforting.

The proximate cause of concentration is happiness. So again, it simply points to this relaxing within, trusting the sense of well-being and letting that collect all our energy.

Concentration offers two key benefits. First, it feels good. The mind feels strong, peaceful, and capable of accomplishing things—it provides access to peace. As the Dalai Lama teaches: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." Samadhi forms a fundamental component of this inner peace.

The second great benefit is that concentration leads to insight. When the mind is restless and moving all over the place, it cannot see clearly. Driven by craving, restlessness, and aversion—all those factors Carol described that blind us to clear seeing—it lacks the stability for genuine understanding. As it settles and collects and we turn our attention somewhere, we begin to see things as they truly are.

Imagine we've been riding on a merry-go-round, seated on one of the horses going round and round. One of our friends stands beside the platform holding up a newspaper, but we're moving by so quickly we cannot read it. The merry-go-round just keeps going, going, going. With samadhi, however, it begins to slow down. It slows and eventually stops in front of our friend holding the newspaper. Then we can read it, and it says: "Life has changed. If you hang on, you suffer. The way to peace is letting go." Then we get it. Insight comes when the mind is still—we can understand and let go.

This quality of concentration can be developed to extraordinary degrees. The Buddha taught that the range of the concentrated mind is one of the imponderables—one cannot even reflect on the possibilities of a concentrated mind. Such development leads to states of deep absorption called jhana and even to psychic powers. But for us, well-being and insight are enough.

When the mind has become strong in this way, that concentrated mind is not so easily moved by the passing experiences of pleasure and pain. This leads to the seventh factor: equanimity.

Equanimity refers to a mind that is not disturbed by the transitory fluctuations of pleasant and unpleasant experiences. Normally our minds are spent being rocked by the jolts of pleasure and pain, creating that sense of restlessness and instability. When the mind becomes concentrated, its strength provides stability in the face of these movements of pleasure and pain. This stability expresses itself through the mental quality of equanimity—meaning we are not disturbed by the momentary flows of pleasant and unpleasant.

For a long time, I thought equanimity meant not feeling. I imagined it meant becoming emotionally shut down because nothing mattered or moved you anymore. But this was a complete misunderstanding. In fact, in the early part of my practice, I tried to emulate what I thought that goal was, ending up repressing my feelings in ways that were not helpful at all.

What actually happens is this: as you discover this quality of equanimity, you find there is a kind of ease and balance in being with the waves of life. I prefer the word "balance" even more than "equanimity" here. When we are in a state of inner balance, the heart actually opens much more easily to the beautiful emotions.

Consider your own experience this week. At times when you felt peaceful, balanced, and well, didn't your heart respond more easily with love, happiness, joy, and compassion? This is what equanimity points toward. We find this inner balance and feel—ah, the burden is off. When the burden lifts, the heart can respond.

So equanimity is not a dead, unfeeling, uncaring place at all. It is a place of great richness, depth, and openness. This quality of equanimity...

This quality of equanimity appears at the end of the seven factors of enlightenment. It's the culmination of the seven factors. It's also the last factor in the list of the paramis, the last factor in the brahmaviharas, and the last factor in this list from the Visuddhimagga called the Progress of Insight that describes the journey to awakening. It's the last in all these lists.

So I would say that it's the fruition in mundane terms of the path and the closest mundane mental state to the unconditioned. It's the best approximation to nibbana that we can make by our effort.

When we have developed all of these factors, something beautiful emerges. The mindfulness starts them. Investigation, energy and rapture pick the energy up. Calm, concentration and equanimity settle it. When these are in balance, there's the stillness of concentration and there's the alertness of energy and investigation. The mind is in this perfect poise for meditation.

This is where meditation goes really well. It goes well from the point of view of feeling well-being and trust and confidence and happiness, and it's the platform for insight. From this point the mind can not only see into the three characteristics that Sally described last night, but also where it can, if the grace comes of that moment, open to the unconditioned, to that moment of enlightenment or awakening.

There's no way to force or make that opening by effort. All we can do by effort is to develop these seven factors and bring them into that balance and then rest there. And then grace can provide that opening into awakening.

I'll close with this quotation from the Buddha on these factors:

"Bhikkhus, these seven factors of awakening, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering. Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future—all will do so by overcoming the five hindrances, by firmly establishing their minds in the four foundations of mindfulness, and by cultivating the seven factors of awakening in their true nature."

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

These seven factors of awakening, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 112

Formation of Self-View

Guy Armstrong · 1h12

> In this dharma talk from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong investigates the fundamental question of how selfhood comes into being. Drawing from the Sakkāyadiṭṭhi teachings, he examines how we create identity through four ways of relating to the five khandhas (aggregates): regarding form as self, self as possessing form, form as within self, or self as within form. Armstrong explores the Buddha's teaching that 'in whatever way they conceive of self, the truth is ever other than that,' highlighting how the sense of 'I' strengthens during mental disturbance and weakens in spacious awareness.
> The talk addresses the paradox of embodied existence - we take birth to satisfy sense desires, yet this very embodiment creates suffering through separation, vulnerability, and the constant project of seeking pleasure while avoiding pain. Armstrong discusses how the activities of 'I-ing' (ahaṅkāra) and 'my-ing' (mamaṅkāra) continuously recreate selfhood through clinging (upādāna), referencing the Buddha's ultimate teaching that 'nothing whatsoever is to be clung to.'
> Practical meditation instructions focus on recognizing the space between thoughts and the natural peace that exists before the arising of self-view. The talk concludes with the liberating wisdom of seeing all phenomena as 'not mine, not what I am, not my self' - the antidote to craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and wrong view (diṭṭhi).

So I want to start this session by exploring some of what you might have investigated during the guided meditation. We were looking at opening into a receptive awareness to bring a sense of peace and ease. And then what comes in that disturbs that? What's the nature of the disturbance and how does it feel?

Will, what did you notice?

"What I've been battling with is reflecting on all the things in life that I feel a great amount of guilt about. And it's very distracting. I hope you have a magic answer for me on how to become more present and not go there."

Thank you. Remorse over past actions is a big thing that comes up in silent retreats—regrets about little things, regrets about big things that we've done. And they tend to stay with us with some charge until, in my experience, we've given enough time to let the awareness come in contact with them and for us to feel the remorse that's coupled with the guilt.

We say that the guilt isn't so helpful because it adds an element of self-judgment, but it's important to feel the remorse. And it's hard to know how long it will take for that healing to take place, but we need to keep feeling the remorse part as long as it's coming up strongly.

And then the other side is, if there are times when we can simply say, "don't let the thoughts go down that road," and we can just bring them back and stay connected with something in the present, that's skillful. Sometimes something more active than just the experience of breath or body is helpful, such as loving kindness or compassion practice—a more active practice.

How did it feel in the body? What was the bodily experience?

"Tightness in the chest and kind of an uneasy feeling in the stomach."

Thanks. I'm feeling better about it now. This is something that's going to wear down. I guess we call that purification—just letting it wear down to where it has less of a charge. I still remember things that I did as a child that were unskillful, and I still feel some pain around them. My father took me out hunting when I was a kid, and so I learned to shoot birds with a shotgun. And when those memories come up, I still feel badly about them. But they don't weigh me down the way they did when I first started to recollect them.

So the disturbance manifested as contraction and unease in the stomach.

Patty, what did you notice?

"In that particular sit, I was interrupted by moments of spacious awareness and I was predominantly dealing with body pain and sensation. And it kept me very present-oriented. I mean, I stayed in the present, I watched the sensations change and every once in a while there'd be relief and then I could just be so grateful that I went into spacious awareness for a few minutes. But primarily it was hard to find the spacious awareness."

So the disturbance was around body pain and then there were times of relief. Was the relief because the pain went away or because there was a different mental relationship to it?

"I think it's because the pain went away because I was trying to be very kind to myself. I pretended it was somebody else's body pain and so I sent loving kindness to her and to it. It changed moment to moment. And when it changed to lessen, I could relax into that spaciousness. But for the most part, it was intense."

So intense body pain felt as a disturbance. Was there an emotional reaction to the body pain?

"There was yesterday when it was new."

Yesterday I had a hissy fit that I'm too young for this and I don't want this and this better not be the rest of my life. And I did that yesterday. And today I realized that wasn't useful.

"So was the emotional response to the pain this morning equanimous?"

"Pretty much so. I could find kindness pretty quickly. I was uncomfortable and kept saying, you know, unpleasant, unpleasant, unpleasant, but I wasn't getting all bent out of shape around it."

"Could it be said that you were, even though the pain was there and intense, you were somewhat at peace with it?"

"Intermittently."

"All right. Thank you. And then when there was the reaction to the pain, how did the body manifest? How did you feel that reaction in the body? Not the pain itself, but kind of the reaction to the pain."

"There was definitely a tightening in my brain. I mean, I felt a tension in my head."

"Yeah. Tightness and tension. Yeah. Thank you."

Let's take maybe one more. Anything anybody noticed about the center at the back?

"The image that kind of helps me with the spaciousness is not the sky but a big pool of water, so very, very wide boundaryless pool. And it's nice because a lot of the sounds don't disturb me because they kind of imagery of like raindrops falling in and just a little ripple in that, but it's still the water. When a big noise, it's kind of like a wave coming through, but it's still water. So that was lovely for me.

But what does disrupt me is thoughts. And I have thoughts all the time. I mean, it's just amazing how many thoughts I have. And a couple of things I noticed. One is that the energetic feeling of it is almost as if the spacious water collects into a funnel up. You know, like everything goes up into my head, that's kind of logical, that's where thoughts would go, but I just notice, oh, I am totally in my head.

And the other thing I notice is that I like my thoughts. Not that they're all pleasant, but I mean, I like thinking. And that I feel more comfortable there than I feel in that spaciousness. The spaciousness makes me a little queasy after a couple of seconds. It's a little too vulnerable. And I'm very comfortable thinking. And so it feels like, oh, now I know where I am. So it's interesting to discover that I sort of take refuge in my thoughts from the vulnerability of that wide open spaciousness."

Thank you. So a couple of things to comment on in that description. I love the image of the pool, and actually it's one I've used in talks, and that the sense impressions are like drops of rain falling on the surface, just like ping, ping, ping. Every sense impression is like that. And I think Carl Jung used the lake, big body of water, as an image for consciousness. Or when that image comes in a dream, it symbolizes consciousness. So I think that's a very nice way to get into this natural peace and ease.

And then the comment that thoughts kind of come like a funnel rising up implies that the attention is taken off from the breadth of the lake and kind of concentrated, and you mentioned coming up into the head, and then the loving of the thinking. This unfortunately is the meditator's dilemma.

We love to think, we love to proliferate, and it gets us into trouble.

So what I wanted to draw out from the comments and what many of you probably experienced is that there can be this initial expansiveness, whether through the sky image or the lake image, and there's a quality of peace in that.

In that expansive awareness, what's the sense of I like? Big or small, relatively? In that expansive place, the sense of I is relatively small, isn't it? Kind of weak.

Then a disturbance comes and it implies some narrowing of focus. People mention tension, tightness, contraction, tension in the chest, the narrowing of thought energy. There's a coagulation of that broad energy into something small. This smallness brings a sense of tightness or constriction or limitation. And there's something reassuring in it. That's why we keep coming back to it.

What's the sense of I like when the thoughts and disturbances are causing that kind of contraction? Stronger, right? So the wide open attention—sense of I is not so strong. Disturbance comes along. The disturbance is mainly about me, right? Past actions or my pain or what I love to think about. Then with that sense of contraction and smallness, narrowing of focus, the sense of I goes up.

What we want to explore in this session is what this sense of I is all about and how it gets created. Sally spoke last night about how within all the field of our sense experience, or the five aggregates, there is really no self in that. She spoke very convincingly. I was convinced there's no self.

And yet here we are this morning—the self is coming up again. The I is establishing itself. We're believing it. We're feeling it in the body. It matters to us. So what is this interplay between this open state, which we've all touched and can recognize—there's no inherent I in this. In that open place you can see there's nothing stuck or fixed. There's no inherent self there. And then the narrowing and concentration of energy and the coagulation into self again. What is that dynamic all about?

The Buddha certainly pointed to this sense of self as one of the primary forms of our bondage, maybe the primary form of our bondage to suffering. The ignorance which is at the root of the chain of dependent origination is largely about not seeing this. The covering over of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self that Sally spoke about last night is an active force in the mind that blocks us from seeing things the way they are. That's how we get caught in this self-belief.

I also want to suggest, just by way of perspective, this is not a trivial or small problem. At the risk of sounding pretentious, I think it has cosmological implications. When you think about the creation myths that different cultures come up with, every culture has something to explain how all this got here.

In our day and age, there are a couple of predominant ones. One is the theistic creation myth—that before anything appeared, there was this God with a capital G, and God made all this. But those never explain how the God element got here. So they're not quite satisfying for someone who wants a more philosophical, intellectually nuanced solution.

The other creation myth popular in our culture is the scientific view. In the philosophical realm, I would call this the materialist view, which says that in the beginning there was the Big Bang. From a very small concentration of only matter, the matter exploded throughout, creating the expanding universe. After some billions of years, it collected enough into stars and then planets that life could form on a planet such as ours.

The estimate of the Big Bang, the most recent estimate, is 13.75 billion years ago. Then after 10 billion years of empty matter in space, on Earth at least, life started to emerge about 3.5 billion years ago in its most primitive form. The understanding is that it was just chemical reactions in pools of water, perhaps struck by lightning and fueled by a chemical-rich soup that allowed the first microbes or bacteria to form.

And from that humble, purely chemical beginning, more and more complex organisms evolved until one day there was intelligence. Exactly when that emergence occurred remains unclear, but the materialist explanation holds that intelligence—and we could say consciousness—was born out of dumb matter. Personally, I find it difficult to understand how unconscious matter can give rise to intelligence, yet this remains a prevailing cosmological view.

There is one other perspective I want to introduce—an Eastern religious view that likely originated in India, though I don't want to pin it down too precisely. This view proposes that in the beginning there was mind, not matter—mind. There existed some sort of elemental consciousness, and that was all there was in the universe. Because there was nothing else, there wasn't really anything for that consciousness to know. There was no other object to be known, only perhaps this capacity for self-knowing. But there was some kind of intelligence there from the very beginning.

Then something within that unitary consciousness stirred and developed an appetite to experience other. It broke off from this primal unity of consciousness and became a separate knowing. Suddenly there was something to know. Out of this dance, mind created matter. Mind created the worlds that we encounter today. How fascinating—a creation myth that places mind at the center, mind at the beginning.

The Buddha didn't take sides with either view. In fact, he warned that anyone who speculates about the beginning of things will go mad and experience vexation. So we won't try to resolve these questions definitively, but we can observe that in some mysterious way, consciousness and this body have become joined.

In the Buddhist understanding, this consciousness will sever its connection to the body at death, and some form of it will continue into another birth. Some rippling effect will carry forward into another existence. But how did we arrive here in the first place? How did this individuality come to be? Somehow this sense of selfness is intimately tied up with our experience of individuality, yet the origins remain quite mysterious.

Again, the Buddha didn't declare whether mind or matter was primary. What he did teach is that body and consciousness lean against each other like two bundles of reeds that have been tied together. Imagine taking a bunch of reeds, tying them up, and setting one bundle on the ground. Then tie up another bundle, set it down, and lean them against each other. Body and consciousness support each other in precisely this way. Remove the body and consciousness collapses. Remove consciousness and the body collapses. He understood them as interdependent—not one based on the other, but mutually arising.

This is the mystery we want to explore: how selfhood and individuation happen, and how these two aspects of our existence relate to each other. Rumi captured this beautifully when he wrote, "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." That's essentially our situation.

We don't know where we came from, we don't know how we got here or why we're here, but at some point in the meditative journey we wake up and begin to examine our experience. What exactly is this human experience?

This inquiry is described on page five in the study guide. Today's topic is the formation of self-view, and quote number thirteen describes our fundamental situation. The Buddha is speaking to a group of monks and asks them, "Monks, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life."

What a remarkable claim. Have you ever known any other thinker or speaker to make such an assertion? Einstein didn't attempt it. Freud didn't try. Marx didn't dare. Yet here is the Buddha, 2,500 years ago, declaring: "It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who claims to describe something beyond this as the totality of life would not be speaking of something they actually knew about."

You'll probably recognize this list.

These are the six internal and external sense bases. Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects are the objects of the six senses. Eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind are the sense organs from which we experience the six kinds of sense appearances. The Buddha is saying that's all there is—these six senses and the appearances connected with each one. This is what our lives are based around.

I was at my first three-month course quite a few years ago, and one of my friends on that course was seized by the perplexity of this situation. She came up and grabbed Joseph Goldstein, who was teaching, grabbed him in the hallway of the lobby, and said, "Joseph, why are we here?" And Joseph said very calmly, as he always does, "Do you mean here on the retreat or here at all?" And she said, "Why are we here at all?" And he said, "Well, it's because you wanted to see and hear and smell and taste and touch."

In the Buddhist understanding, we basically take birth in order to satisfy this longing for sense contact, for sense desire. That's what it's all about, from one way of looking. Out of this desire, which the Buddha said has been going on for a very long time—this is a quotation from one of the texts—"Obstructed by ignorance and fettered by craving, beings have been wandering in this samsara since beginningless time, searching for sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch."

So here we are in this individual existence, and it turns out to be problematic. Unfortunately, it's not possible to keep pleasant experiences at those five sense doors coming all the time. We can't control it that well. From the Buddhist point of view, we're drawn to birth because of this longing, but we can't quite satisfy it because of that impermanence that Sally talked about last night. We find that being in a body, being separated out in consciousness, is problematic.

There's a wonderful Indian teacher—I don't know if you know him—Nisargadatta Maharaj. He's from the Advaita Vedanta tradition, and some of his dialogues were collected in this marvelous book called I Am That—highly recommended reading. This is an answer to a questioner. Maharaj said, "The desire for embodied existence is the root cause of trouble." The desire for embodied existence got us here, but it's the root cause of trouble.

Because once we're in a body, this sense contact is out of our control. We want things to be pleasurable, but they're not always. The body is very vulnerable. It's subject to pain, subject to illness, subject to aging, and subject to death. And in all the other senses, we can't keep the contacts always as we want them.

Moreover, this embodied existence gives rise in us to a sense of separateness. Because our bodies are separate, we believe in this separation as absolute and true and real, but it's not. Our bodies are separate, but our minds interpenetrate each other. Just like we pick up on each other's love and compassion, or we pick up on each other's anger or sadness or frustration. We interpenetrate to the extent that I'm part of your experience right now and you're part of my experience. We could say that you're in me right now and I'm in you right now. So our bodies are separate and we believe that means we're separate, but that separation is only apparent. We're not finally separate from one another.

Researchers are studying many different things these days related to psychology and meditation. One of the things they're finding is that one of the deepest sources of human unhappiness is a sense of isolation. It makes us deeply unhappy. I think you could say the same for animals. If you take a herd animal or a pack animal and separate them from that natural gathering, it tends to make them neurotic or depressed. As community has fallen apart in the West, we feel that sense of isolation even more keenly, and I think it's a real problem in Western culture these days. It reinforces that sense of being separate.

So this individual existence, embodied existence, gives us a sense of separateness. Also, once we have a body, we have to take care of it. We have to feed it and clean it and protect it and defend it, keep it out of harm's way, out of the way of pain, injury, and death. That gives a sense of fear, a sense of worry and concern. And of course, underlying it all is the fear of dying. We all recognize from an early age that at some point this body will reach a natural end and our death is inevitable.

With this unexamined sense of separateness and the fear around the body, we kind of make a project. You could say this is the project of the self: keep the pleasant things coming as steadily as possible and keep the unpleasant things away. This is what human beings are basically concerned with. We can feel that in our meditation. The disturbances that come in meditation are basically about this problem.

How do I keep pleasure coming as continuously as possible? How do I keep pain away as permanently as possible? Because this is our main wish, it becomes a project that doesn't have an ending. Through investigation, through meditation, we realize that sense contact cannot be controlled.

This alternation, this rapid alternation of pleasant, unpleasant and neutral contact at the sense doors is simply our human condition. It was the Buddha's condition. His awakening didn't end this flow of sense data. You read in the texts places where he will say, "Ananda, you give the Dharma talk tonight. My back is paining me and I want to lie down." So the Buddha was also subject to these same frailties of the body and uncertainties of the body.

This constant search for pleasure and to ward off pain constitutes the ceaseless, unending project of the ego, the project of the self. When we grow up, we think this is the only way to live. We think this is natural, unavoidable. "I'm just human." It is human. But there is another way. As we see when we come into meditation, we start to discover we have some other choices.

What I want to point out is that this is not a slight disturbance or a slight problem. This is the human dilemma. What do we do with the vulnerability of separate embodied existence and being subject to pain and separation from pleasure that involves? That's our situation.

As we start to wake up to this, this sense of I, the separate being, starts to be felt as something of a burden. We have to look after it, we have to defend it, we have to feed it, we have to nourish it, we have to protect it. That's why Maharaj says in another quotation, "All yogas have only one aim, which is to save you from the calamity of separate existence." Believing ourselves to be separate is a kind of calamity because that's what involves us in all the struggle and all the turmoil.

As far as I can tell, it is only spiritual life that offers a way beyond seeing in this way. It is only spiritual life that offers a way out of the calamity of this apparent separateness. And it is only apparent. It's not ultimately true. It is true that our bodies are subject to uncertainty and pain, but it is not true that we're fundamentally separate or isolated or distant from one another.

We can see at times the truth in this lack of separation, the truth in the no abiding self at the center of everything, but the sense of self continues to come back, the sense of separateness. So let's take a closer look at that. We can search for this in our meditation, and I think meditators need to search to find where this self is.

William James, the philosopher, said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." He was lucky. Buddhists often find less. The Dalai Lama said, "When something seems very clear to you, but you go to look for it and you can't find it, that's a sure sign of delusion."

The self seems so obvious, doesn't it? Of course there's an I. But when we look for it, we can't find that thing. Some of the confusion around self is easily seen in our language. If I ask you, "How tall are you?" That's easy to answer, right? It's not a trick question. I'd say I'm 5'10". In answering "I'm 5'10"," which everybody would accept as a commonly true statement, no problem, what I'm really saying is my body is 5 feet 10 inches tall. I'm not talking about my thoughts. I'm not talking about my emotions. I'm talking about this body. So here I'm identifying I with the body. I am the body and I'm 5'10".

But I could also ask you, "What color are your eyes?" And I would say, "My eyes are brown." Oh, now I'm someone who owns eyes. Now I'm not saying I am the eye. I'm not saying I'm brown. My eyes are brown.

So there's someone who stands apart from the body who owns it. Are you the body? Or are you the person who stands apart, who's the owner of the body? You can't really be both, can you? How many selves do you have?

We can do the same with emotions. We talk about "I'm happy" or "I'm sad" and then we're identifying ourselves with an emotion, an object of mind. Or at other times we'll talk about "my joys and my sorrows." And then we identify ourselves with the owner of our emotions. So we could be the body, we could be the emotions, we could be the owner of the body or the owner of the emotions.

Or as Sally indicated last night, one of the most common and deep-rooted ways we take ourselves is that I live behind my eyes in the center of my head. And I look out at the world through this command and control center. And that's who I really am—this observer that's somewhere in the center of the head. And that eye is the one that experiences all the things at the six sense doors.

I did a lot of retreats in the style of U Ba Khin as taught by S.N. Goenka and Robert Hover and other teachers. One of the great things about that practice is that you are encouraged to place your attention in absolutely every corner of the body and explore it through this practice of sweeping. So I spent a lot of time putting my attention in this area behind my eyes and between the ears, never found a self there. But it was a really useful exploration because I went through every bit internally and on the surface. I couldn't find the eye anywhere, although it felt like it was somewhere. But I looked for it and couldn't find it anywhere. So I think in meditation it's helpful that we try that, that we look to convince ourselves it's not lurking there somewhere in one of those corners.

How does this sense of self come about? How does it arise? Let's look at quotation number 20, also on page 5 of the study guide. The term being used here, personality view, is a translation of the Pali sakāya-diṭṭhi. And it basically means the belief in personhood, personness, the belief in an ongoing self.

The Buddha replies: "Here bhikkhus, an untaught ordinary person regards material form as self or self as possessed of material form or material form as in self or self as in material form. He regards feeling, perceptions, formations, consciousness likewise. That is how personality view comes to be."

So what the Buddha is describing is that we take an aspect of our experience—and here he's singling out material form, rūpa, the first of the five aggregates—and we're identifying with it in some way. That is, we're claiming a self based on the relationship to form, or let's say, this body.

This is a little bit dense and a little hard to penetrate at first. Let's just go through these. He offers four ways that we create this identification with regard to, let's say, body.

The first is we regard body as self. Do we do that? Yes. "I'm 5'10"," and we believe it. I am 5 feet 10 inches tall. We regard body as I.

Or self is possessed of body. Do we ever say, "This is my body"? Often. "My eyes are brown."

Or material form as in self. Now this is a little different. When we did the meditation this morning and you were invited to open the awareness wide, to take in all the sounds that were coming and going and the sensations that were coming and going, could you imagine yourself identifying with that awareness and saying, "That's who I really am"? I'm really that wide open awareness in which everything is happening. Could you imagine?

So if you say self is this big awareness, is body located within self? Yes. So this is the sense one regards body as in self. We identify with the awareness, and then we think the body is in that self, which is truly me. The awareness is truly me, but the body is within that.

So regards material form as in self, or self as in material form.

So this is the eye that's behind the eyes and between the ears—that's where I really am, in the center of the head. So these are four ways in which we commonly create a sense of I based on a relationship to the body. This is what we do all the time, and it's not correct.

If you look at quote 19, just above that, the Buddha says, "In whatever way they conceive of self, the truth is ever other than that." Note that "of self" is in brackets—it doesn't appear in the Pali in the original text, but this word "conceive" is usually used in the text to refer to this conceiving about oneself. It's the same root as the word "conceit," which is one of the ten fetters and one of the last five fetters to go. It only goes at full awakening. Māna is the Pali.

So this sense of conceit and conceiving in this context is about conceiving about ourselves, conceiving about a self. In whatever way they conceive of self, the truth is ever other than that. One of my teachers put it more directly. He said, "Everything you think is wrong"—where self is involved, at least.

I want to draw out one other thing about what we ascribe to self, and why it's injurious to regard any of these things as self. There's something we don't talk about a lot, but when we conceive of a self, there are a few assumptions that are bound up in that. Or you could say a few assumptions that are bound up in the notion of I.

The main one is continuity over time. If you truly can see this body and mind as arising, passing, arising, passing, arising, passing, moment by moment—as Sally described in the talk last night, as the true teaching of impermanence—nothing is lasting even over more than a moment. Then you would feel yourself being born and dying, being born and dying, if you took yourself to be this. But we don't feel like we're being born and dying, being born and dying, moment by moment. Generally, we feel we're continuing and sensations are coming and going, sounds, etc.

So there's implicit in this idea of I or self—there's a commitment to continuity or, you could say, some permanence. If that commitment, belief in continuity were not there, we wouldn't be afraid of dying, the true physical death that's at the end of this life. The reason we fear that physical death is because, for most of us, it means the end of this thing we call I. That's what's threatening.

So one of the assumptions about self is there's a belief in continuity or permanence. Another of the assumptions is that there's a belief in control. As Sally read last night, "If form were mine, I should be able to say to it, 'Form, be like this.'" So I should be able to control what is mine, what is myself. But we can't.

And the last one I'll mention is that the self is really considered to be unitary or just one thing. People who believe they have multiple selves are usually medicated. So for most of us, it means we believe there is only one self. And that plays an important role. If you say, "Well, yeah, but I am the owner and I'm the body and I'm the thoughts and I'm the emotions and I'm my liver and I'm compassion and the experiencer of sounds," that's being multiple selves. Liver is not the same thing as compassion. If you want to be the liver, you can't really be compassion. Maybe your liver has compassion, but you can't be it. So we have to find out where that one self is to be found, if it is to be found.

The Buddha put it this way—this is actually going back on page three, but it's one of my favorite quotes from the canon. It's quote number 11, just at the beginning of the quotation: "Venerable Ananda went to the Blessed One and on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. As he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One, 'It is said that the world is empty. The world is empty, Lord. In what respect is it said that the world is empty?'

"And the Buddha replies, 'Insofar as it is empty of a self or of anything pertaining to a self. Thus it is said, Ananda, that the world is empty. And what is empty of a self or anything pertaining to a self?' And then he goes through the six sense doors."

In other translations, I've seen this said, "The world is empty insofar as empty of a self or anything belonging to a self." So that undercuts the notion of I or mine, that a self can possess anything. Basically what the Buddha is saying is that when we say I or mine in relationship to the experience of our senses, we're falling into delusion.

We're not seeing things the way they are. And at the same time, it seems to be here. So how can we look into this? We've come to understand the self isn't necessarily inherently there in every moment. We experience sometimes when it's quite weak, other times when it's quite strong. How does it get brought into being? How does it reappear after going relatively quiet for a while? How does it come back into being?

On page five, quotes 14 and 15 talk about this to some extent. Quote 14 is one of the more famous quotes from the Pali Canon where the Buddha says—it puts the Dharma in one pith statement: "Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to." The Pali being Sabe, Dama, Nalam, Abhinivesaya. Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to. And it's not included here, but after that he says, "One who has heard this has heard all the dharmas. One who has practiced this has practiced all the dharmas. One who has understood this has understood all the dharmas." This is really it. Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to.

And then Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of our Thai forest teachers no longer living, put it this way in quote 15: "If one amplifies the meaning a little, it may be rendered as no one should grasp at or cling to anything as being I or mine. As being I refers to the feeling called I-ing, ahankara, the grasping at a soul or abiding ego entity. As being mine refers to the feeling called my-ing, mamankara, the grasping at phenomena as being connected to ego."

I love this statement. It connects grasping with the formation of I and mine. It talks about the forming of I and mine as verbs. I-ing and my-ing. This is really an important understanding. As Sally said, we can't get rid of the self because there's no self there to be found and gotten rid of. But the truth is we create self again and again and again through the activities of I-ing and my-ing, ahankara and mamankara. In our meditation, we can start to see this. We can slow down the process of creation enough that we can start to see it happening.

Just one more thing to pull out from quotes 14 and 15: basically, the I-ing and my-ing happen because of grasping. When we grasp at something as being I or when we grasp at something as being mine, it's only clinging that establishes the sense of self. And in fact, you could say that selfing and clinging are synonymous.

So in the middle of this vast open space, natural peace and ease, something comes along that has some kind of connective fuel of greed, hatred, or delusion. We grab hold. There is grabbing hold of it—not I grab hold of it. There is grabbing hold of it, fueled by these underlying forces. And that grasping is what creates a sense of self. Nothing else. We can start to see that happen.

In quote 16, the Buddha describes this process as well. "Whether I teach the Dhamma briefly or at length, those who understand it are hard to find." Isn't this poignant? To me this is one of the most poignant teachings in the whole of his dispensation. You can almost feel the disappointment—not necessarily suffering, but some disappointment there. And he's with Sariputta, one of his two chief disciples.

Then Sariputta says, "Oh Blessed One, now is the time for it. Now is the time to teach the Dhamma in brief or at length. There will be those who will understand." Sariputta is the cheerleader. "Come on, Buddha, you can do it again. Somebody will get it."

So the Buddha replies, "Well then, Sariputta, this is how the training should be done. Concerning this body with its consciousness, let there be no self-centered imaginings of I and mine and no such bias. With regard to external objects, let there be no self-centered imaginings of mine and no such bias."

We shall then abide in the attainment of the heart's liberation and the liberation by wisdom. Let there be no self-centered imaginings of I and mine and no such bias.

This formation of I and clinging to I is a bias in the world. It treats this embodied existence as more important than that embodied existence, and it continues to reinforce the fuels of greed, aversion, and delusion.

So in our meditation, this stilling of the mind that happens to some degree in meditation retreats is so important because it gives us a background—a state of receptive, relaxed attention from which the uprising of the clinging of I can be seen clearly.

In daily life, for the untaught ordinary person who hasn't been exposed to meditation or these teachings, I is being regenerated on such a continuous basis, so frequently and with such strength and conviction, that it's very hard to tease it apart. This teasing apart really relies on coming into a meditative frame of mind where the pace of grasping and the pace of thinking has settled enough that we can start to look from a foundation of some steadiness of attention, calm, or peace.

From that place, we can see the clinging happen and the uprising of I and mine as an experiential activity, a volitional activity—something that is coming from an internal will or urge. Then we really see that the I is not intrinsic. It's not steady and ongoing. It quiets down for a while, and then it rises up through our own volition. And then it settles down again, and then it rises up through our own volition.

We become familiar with how the times of peace have a certain subtle satisfactoriness in them. It's not big bells and whistles like pleasant sensory contact, but there is a satisfying, nourishing, contentment-leading subtle experience in the state of calm and peace. Of course we love the fireworks of our thoughts and the sense contact and all that too, but over time one does develop a taste for this quality of peace and non-entanglement.

And then we see the I arise again with clinging. So this is interesting to investigate. Does the I ever arise without taking hold of some facet of our sense experience? Or is it always my knee pain, my back pain, my sadness, my home, my relationship—always defining itself in relation to something else? Do you ever sit there and the I just goes "me"? It doesn't usually happen. It's usually by taking hold of something else.

So it is conditionally arisen, dependently arisen out of this factor of grasping to something else. And that's all it is. It's just coming out of taking hold of different parts of our experience. We could call it grasping. We could call it clinging. We usually use grasping for the act in the present moment, the new taking hold. And we use clinging to refer to something that has been grasped and which grasping is continuing. But it's the same word in Pali—upādāna.

How can we start to let go of some of this movement of I-ing and my-ing in the sense of bondage and separation and fear and greed that it conditions? When we come into meditation, as I mentioned, usually our thoughts are going so quickly, grasping is going so quickly, the self is being recreated so quickly, we can't see anything else. But as the thoughts slow down and as the movements of mind slow down, we start to open up some space.

Such an important, valuable discovery in meditation—I think Gil referred to this yesterday. We start to experience a space between two thoughts. One thought has ended and there's a pause before the next thought begins. What's the quality of that space like? What does that feel like? Usually that quality is a quality of non-suffering. It has a quality of some kind of peacefulness, non-disturbance.

This can be a meditation. Can we start to tune in to the quality of the experience of that space between two thoughts? And as we do, it tends to open up more. As we arrive there, as we connect with it, as we learn to rest there, that space tends to open.

This place also has a sense of equanimity. There's a feeling of perhaps a gathering of strength through resting in that place. Because it leads in the direction of contentment, of non-disturbance, there's a sense of a gathering of the strength of the mind so that when the next contact comes, even if it is unpleasant, there's not much of an aversive reaction. And if it is pleasant, there's not much of a greedy reaction.

So we start to find by resting in this place some kind of balance. This balance, which we often call equanimity, is one of the highest factors of the mundane factors of mind that are developed through meditation.

It's the seventh of the enlightenment factors, the fourth of the Brahmaviharas, mentioned again and again throughout the teachings. This equanimity, I believe, is one of the most durable qualities when one leaves retreat and returns home. It's often what people report in making the transition back into daily life.

"You know, my concentration was shot by the second day of meditating at home. I didn't have that kind of peace. The loving-kindness wasn't quite as rich as it was. But you know what? It was okay. I had a lot more space around all the things that were going on in my life."

That's equanimity, and we can cultivate it by discovering this space between thoughts, leading in the direction of peace. Peace, calm, equanimity—these are all important factors to develop. But the most important is how we understand differently, how we see differently. That's the development of wisdom.

Let's continue with quote number 20. The Buddha had been discussing how personality view arises through identification with the five aggregates. He's then asked: "Well, Venerable Sir, how does one know, how does one see, so that in regard to this body with its consciousness, there is no I-making, mine-making, and underlying tendency to conceit?"

"Bhikkhu, any kind of material form whatever, one sees it all as it actually is with proper wisdom thus: 'This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself.'"

This is the activity of wisdom. We come to understand that these arisings, even though we may have clung to them and formed some immediate notion of self, it's not really true. It's not mine. I am not this. This is not myself.

The commentaries say that these three phrases point to three important underlying tendencies of mind. "This is not mine"—or rather, its opposite, "This is mine"—is the outcome of tanha or craving, a form of wanting or greed. "This I am not"—or its opposite, "This I am"—is an expression of mana, defining oneself to be something or other. "This is not myself"—or its opposite, "This is myself"—is an expression of sakkayaditthi, or simply ditthi. These three short phrases are said to be expressions of tanha, mana, and ditthi—craving, conceit, and views—summed up very briefly here.

The Buddha continues: "Seeing thus, a well-taught noble disciple becomes disenchanted with material form, disenchanted with feeling, with perception, formations, and consciousness. Being disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, one's mind is liberated. When it is liberated, there comes the knowledge it is liberated. One understands: birth is destroyed, the holy life has been lived, what had to be done has been done, there is no more coming to any state of being."

Now while this discourse was being spoken, through not clinging, the minds of sixty bhikkhus were liberated from the taints. The Buddha had something.

I'll end this session with the last few quotes on this page. "Whatever be the phenomena through which they think of seeking their self-identity, it turns out to be transitory. It becomes false. For what lasts for a moment is deceptive. The state that is not deceptive is nibbana."

This final quote is from the Visuddhimagga: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. There is no doer of deeds, nor one who reaps their fruits. Empty phenomena roll on. This view alone is right and true."

So, just an invitation. In your meditations, please pay attention to the space, the natural peace and ease, and then how the self gets formed in grasping and disturbance out of that.

These are profound questions that really get to the heart of practice. When we work with concepts like anatta alongside teachings on karma, it can feel like we're holding two seemingly contradictory truths.

Let me address the question about remorse first. Remorse may indeed be triggered by thoughts of "I" connected to a memory of past action. The way it typically unfolds is that a memory arises in the present moment, and there could be a sense of remorse or guilt—though these are slightly different experiences.

Remorse can actually be felt without a lot of I-ing and my-ing when it arises from recognition and understanding of karma. Yes, in a way it was this mind-body that performed that earlier action, but we also recognize it's an entirely different mind-body now. However, the karma from those earlier events continues through this mind-body continuum. We'll explore karma more deeply later in the retreat, but it's closely connected to what you're asking.

There is no one who receives the fruits of karma, as pointed out in that beautiful Visuddhimagga quotation, and yet the results of my actions don't land on you—they land here. Karma is a fascinating phenomenon to explore in relation to understanding that there's no abiding self, and yet there is continuity in the mind-body process.

So a memory can arise from the past, remorse can be felt, and remorse doesn't have to be a quality of suffering. This is why I was trying to distinguish it from guilt. With guilt there is suffering. Remorse can be an honest acknowledgment that something was a mistake, without a strong sense of self but with recognition that "I am the owner of my karma."

Regarding the five daily recollections—"I am of the nature to age, I am of the nature to get sick, to die, to be separated"—and why the last one, "I am the owner of my actions," seems different from the others, this touches on dependent origination as well.

The first four recollections are indeed about relinquishment, recognizing impermanence. But the reflection on karma serves a different purpose. It's really helpful for reminding us to be very careful with our actions and not break the precepts we've undertaken. When there's a breaking of a precept, then there's ground for remorse or guilt, confusion of mind, and so on. The importance of that reflection in this sequence is to encourage us to be really careful moment by moment, because we are always acting in body, speech, or mind. Karma is being generated at every moment. It's an encouragement to keep our actions really wholesome as we practice.

There's something else important to say about those reflections. The Buddha used reflections like this—"I am of the nature to age"—many, many times without being concerned about the apparent contradiction of using "I" while teaching that there is no fixed self. He said it's fine to use these words conventionally, understanding that this mind and body do form a continuum. It's just that every element of it is constantly changing. There's nothing fixed, no abiding element that has continuity within it.

But the continuum—which is the conventional sense of a being, you could say the conventional sense of a self—does go on. It's the recognition that due to impermanence, that will change. Perhaps it would be clearer to say "this body is of the nature to age," or "this mind and body will be separated," or we can simply understand that the word "I," used conventionally, refers to this ever-changing process.

Somebody asked this question in most metta retreats: How can you say, may I be happy, when there is no I to begin with? So I have a metta phrase that corresponds with the Vipassana understanding, which you're welcome to use if you prefer.

You could say, "may I be happy," or "may Sally be happy." Or you could say, "in this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena, conventionally designated as Sally, may the mind state of happiness arise ever more frequently." You could use either one. They're both fine. I find it a little easier to just say, "may Sally be happy." But it means the same. Same meaning.

One more question on the aisle.

Thank you. I actually, there's many things you talked about and I've got many confusions, but two which I just wanted to focus on. One is you proved to me that if I go looking for a self, I won't find it. And I feel if I go looking for consciousness, I won't find it. So why is it reasonable to believe that consciousness goes on? That's number one. And number two, without the self, where's the free will coming from? If everything is a process of karmic causes and conditions that are going on, how does free will arise and where does that come from? Those are just two of my confusions.

Great. Two good questions. I think you've been over some of this material before. So the first question about consciousness—his comment is he can't find the self and he also can't find consciousness. It's true in a way, and yet there's another way that we are able to know that we're conscious, and that knowing that we're conscious is some kind of finding. So it's not finding consciousness as an object, like we would find the breath or a body sensation or even emotion, but do you have any doubt that you're conscious?

Yes.

Okay. So generally we know that we're conscious, but we have a little trouble pinpointing exactly where it is or how it can be found. So I prefer to think of consciousness as an activity rather than an object. So if we think of it as the activity of knowing, then I get some sense—oh yeah, knowing is happening. I get that. I can't quite put my hand around it, but knowing is happening. And so that's enough to work with. So that knowing activity, the Buddha said, may be able to continue after the body dies.

And the second question about free will is a very interesting one, too. The Buddha didn't come down on the side, I would say, of free will or determinism as a philosophical outcome. But he did come down against determinism. And he said, if one takes up a view—he called it fatalism—that everything is preordained and you don't have any choice or control about its direction, then one will not make effort. So he rejected determinism on the very pragmatic ground that if you believe it, you won't be motivated to take up the Eightfold Path, of which effort is one of the key spokes. So determinism was rejected.

Free will he didn't describe exactly. But certainly as we come to more understanding of karma and where volitional activities come from, we see how strongly conditioned our actions are—actions of body, speech and mind. And it certainly puts some question around the concept of free will. However, we can't toss it out because that tosses out effort.

So what I will say is that there is a factor in the mind called volition, which is the decider. Remember George W. Bush's famous comment, "I am the decider." We often—ego often thinks that. I'm the decider. In fact, volition is the element in the mind responsible for motivating actions, and you could say for making those choices. And volition is another impersonal—that means non-self—but highly conditioned element within the mental factors.

So volition can be influenced by wisdom, by love, by compassion, or volition can be influenced by desire, by aversion, by confusion, in different ways. So volition acts and is in that way a deciding factor, but it's conditioned by the elements, the qualities of mind that are present at the moment of acting.

And as someone on the path, it's best to act as though you have free will. It works. It works to act as though you have free will to cultivate the path factors. Even though, as we see, our will is not totally free. Like, you could come down and say, "I want to be effortlessly present with the breath for 45 minutes." But we don't usually have the will to make that happen. But it's best to act as though you have free choice and the path can unfold.

The path unfolds through our willingness to engage with it, even within the constraints of conditioned existence.

Okay, thank you. Unfortunately, I think we're out of time at this point for this session. So right now we move into interviews. I hope you've checked—some of you will be seeing Sally or Gil or myself at this time in a small group interview.

One word about the interviews: we want them to be discussions as you continue exploring these teachings in your practice.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 113

The Emptiness of Phenomena

Guy Armstrong addresses the Mahāyāna critique that Theravāda Buddhism only understands emptiness of self (anattā) but not emptiness of phenomena. Drawing from the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta (SN 22.95), he demonstrates how the five khandhas reveal that all phenomena—form, feeling, perception, saṅkhāras, and viññāṇa—are like foam, bubbles, mirages, plantain trunks, and magic shows: appearing substantial but lacking solid existence.

Armstrong explains how our human experience consists entirely of consciousness knowing sense contact, with no separate self required. All appearances—including the physical world we take as ultimate reality—are constructions held in the groundless bubble of consciousness. Through personal reflections on death and meditation insights, he shows how seeing phenomena as empty appearances rather than solid objects cultivates both wisdom and compassion.

This teaching integrates traditional Theravāda analysis with profound contemplation of consciousness, offering practical ways to see through the illusion of substantiality while maintaining an open heart toward the suffering inherent in our shared human condition.

The subject of the talk tonight is the emptiness of phenomena. So far in the retreat, we've been focusing most of our attention on the emptiness of self, using the five aggregates and the six sense bases to show how through non-clinging, we cease to regenerate the sense of self over and over. This is the way emptiness is mostly used in the Theravada—to be synonymous with anatta, the lack of abiding self at the center of our experience.

For 2000 years, the Mahayanins have been challenging us about this. They've been saying, "You have emptiness of self, but you don't have emptiness of phenomena. You don't really have the whole Dharma. We have the whole Dharma and you're missing half of it."

What I aim to demonstrate tonight is that we have the whole Dharma too. We do have emptiness of phenomena. It's just tucked away in corners and hasn't been focused on as much. But it's here, and I want to explain how we find it in the Theravada and some of its implications—because it has what I consider to be profound implications.

We're going to start looking at our human experience through a couple of different schemas. In the Visuddhimagga, it's said that when an awakened person who has carefully investigated mind and body looks at a person, they don't say "person." Rather, they see in more refined terms. When the Buddha looked at a being, I don't think he generally saw a being, a human being, a self, as the first thing.

The Visuddhimagga says that somebody who looks at a person and says "person" is like a skilled butcher who's cutting up the carcass of a cow and as they cut, goes "cow, cow, cow." The skilled butcher wouldn't do that. They would be cutting and saying "rump, sirloin, tenderloin, ribs." Similarly, someone who has looked closely at this mind-body process wouldn't see generic person.

When the Buddha looked, he saw in one of two ways, which we've been discussing. One is the six sense bases, as pointed to in the Sutta on Totality. Remember that? "I'll teach you the totality of life. It's the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, and so forth." The other way is the five aggregates, which Sally explained in many different forms today. Both these ways see the human being in a more detailed manner that brings an element of deeper understanding and less tendency to cling.

This became important for me almost twenty years ago when my older sister died. My sister was only fifty-two at the time. She was a few years older than me, and her death came completely unexpectedly. She'd had a chronic condition, but it wasn't immediately life-threatening. But one day she succumbed and went into cardiac arrest, and the technicians couldn't bring her back. So it was a shock for all of us.

She was someone to whom I was quite close. In addition to the waves of grief that I went through, I felt a darkness for a couple of months in my life—waves of more sadness, less sadness going on day by day during that time. I was able to move through that. But her death really perplexed me.

I had spoken to her just a few days before she died. She was somebody with a big personality, a big heart, a big sense of humor, very caring, very personal, a warm, affectionate kind of person. She had been so full of life and so alive and seemingly so solid the week before, and then she was just gone. I'm sure you all know this experience. It's just so perplexing. What happened to that solid, energetic, loving, caring being that was my sister?

The reflection that helped me most figure out what happens in death, what is involved in the transition from a living being to a dead person, was the five aggregates. In tonight's talk, I hope to touch on some of the insights that helped me understand that better. When I came to a greater understanding of what a person is and therefore what dying means, it was easier to let go and understand the naturalness of this process.

I say this to emphasize that this is not just an idle intellectual pursuit we're engaged in when looking at these teachings of the Buddha. These are really bearing on questions of life and death and the deep meaning of our relationships and our own existence. It's been very relevant and very helpful for me, and I hope it may be for you also.

We've been through a lot today—form, feeling, perceptions, formations, and consciousness. I just want to touch on two very briefly to bring out a little more. We've spent a lot of time in other retreats on form, feeling, and formations. So I want to say one more thing about perception.

Perception is a powerful and underrated factor in our experience, and I believe that putting more emphasis and investigation in this area will prove very rewarding. It plays a particularly significant role in developing insight. In insight meditation, the factor of perception is crucial because insight basically means—well, let me ask you: does insight mean you see something new, or does it mean you see something old in a new way?

It could be both, but very often it's the latter. You're sitting in meditation and suddenly you see things in a way where there's no clinging and you don't make a self around it. You're seeing the same sensations and thoughts, but you're not constructing a self around them.

One quotation from the Buddha points to this importance of perception in the shift we need. He said that when the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust, eliminates all lust for existence, eliminates all ignorance, and uproots all conceit of "I am." Notice what he's saying—the perception of impermanence. This is the area for insight, something we can turn the mind to and perceive to some degree by investigating, cultivating, and inclining the mind. We can perceive impermanence more frequently than we do, and that perception, when we develop and cultivate it, leads to all these kinds of freedom.

The second aspect I want to explore further is consciousness, which is central to tonight's theme and has been discussed today as well. As Sally mentioned, consciousness is the knowing quality taking place with any of our sense experience. It's the bare factor of knowing sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and emotions. Human beings have consciousness, dogs have consciousness—all sentient beings have consciousness. It's what enables them to relate to their environment and learn how to survive.

The interesting point I want to bring out is that sense experience and the knowing of it arise together. They're not two separate things. You won't find consciousness beforehand and then a sense experience that you see them meet—they come up completely together. For instance, when there's an in-breath, there's a sensation of rising in the abdomen and falling in the abdomen. You feel that. Feeling that is another way of saying you know that, another way of saying there's consciousness of that. If there were a corpse, you could press on that abdomen in and out, and the physical experience would be happening in that body, but there would be no knowing of it. The knowing is right there with the experience.

In other words, our human experience always consists of knowing sense contact. If you go to sleep, then you don't know sense contact for a while, and consciousness isn't active. So the two are always coming up together. Human experience is sense contact and the knowing of it—there's nothing else going on.

Let me offer another context. The domain of Buddhism is human experience—our human experience. The domain of physics is the interaction between objects and studies of mass and movement of physical objects. The domain of chemistry is the interaction among atoms and molecules. The domain of biology is the study of living organisms. The domain of Buddhism is human experience. The Buddha was not very interested in anything apart from human experience because it's here that there's suffering and the end of suffering. Our human experience is always about knowing sense data—there's nothing else going on.

This is the point I want to clarify. We have here a couple of bells, and I want to use them to illustrate that knowing and the experience—the sense data—are together. But we can look at one aspect or the other. They're not separate things, but we can choose to focus either on the sense object or on the knowing of it. But it's one experience. That's the important thing—there's only one experience, but it has two aspects.

Okay. This bell that you just heard briefly—is it gold or is it round? It's just one bell. It's gold and round, and you can tune into one side or the other of that unity.

So with an in-breath, a sound, an emotion—there's the object and the knowing of it fused as one experience. That's what human experience is: this fusion. We're conscious, we're knowing it. A corpse may have an experience, but the knowing isn't there. So our whole human experience is this union of knowing and objects, knowing and objects. And we can tune in to one side or the other.

Mostly in our meditation instructions in this lineage, we've been giving the instruction: when you're with the breath, feel the sensations. But as Sally indicated today, we could also say, tune into the knowing side of that. That's the consciousness piece. You can learn to tune into consciousness in that way.

So consciousness is subtle, but it's not unknowable. It's not unfindable. We'll get into that. It's not quite graspable, but you can feel it working. You can feel it happening.

Okay, five aggregates: form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. Why is this so liberating? Because there's one central element missing.

Now, back up a second. Form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. Can everything in your experience be fit into one of these categories? In other words, is this an exhaustive description of human experience? Can everything fit in one of these categories?

What about the unconscious? I would say the unconscious is not a reality until it makes itself felt in the conscious. The unconscious is a concept developed by Western psychology, but it can mean one of two things. It could mean something that's active but is too subtle for us to pick up and recognize. The word that Buddhism uses for that is delusion.

For example, I decide to give a gift to somebody, but really what I'm interested in is getting the recognition from them. But I'm unaware of that motivation. That motivation is at work, but we would call it unconscious because I'm not aware that that's happening. So an unconscious motivation is: I want recognition. That distorts the act of giving. And it may come across really weird to the person because I keep hanging on and going, "Did you like that gift? Did I get you what you wanted for your birthday? Was that like the coolest birthday gift you got this year?" That's an unconscious motivation, but if we were more attentive, we would recognize it.

So I will say that from my point of view—Buddha's point of view—the unconscious is not real until it expresses itself in consciousness in some way.

Then the Buddha also talked about things he called latent tendencies. So we have latent tendencies such as desire and becoming and ignorance that aren't apparent because they aren't active right now. We can recognize that those things may be there somewhere, but they're not significant until they act, until they're brought into consciousness. And when they come, latent tendencies are in the fourth aggregate of sankharas. They're one form of mental formation.

The five sense objects all go in the first category of rupa. Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch are all in the category rupa. And then thoughts and emotions are in the category sankhara—the fourth. Actions really go in the fourth aggregate as well, volitional formations.

It does include actions of body, speech, and mind. So everything in human experience can be accommodated within these five aggregates. This is important. If you don't think it through tonight, think it through later. This is an important question.

Alice pointed out that Nibbana is outside this list. Most of us are not experiencing Nirvana, clearly. So it is the one thing that is outside this list. But generally, let's say sense experience—all the elements of our normal waking experience—can be fit into one of these categories. So for now we'll say it's an exhaustive list. Everything can be fit in there.

So there's one big element that's not named there. Form, feeling, perception, volitions, consciousness. Where's the I? There isn't any. This describes human experience exhaustively and it doesn't require an I or a self to do that. So that's why it's liberating to see in this way.

When we see our experience as the five aggregates or as the six sense bases, we see it without this overlay of self. And I believe that's how the Buddha saw. So when we start to see this way, we're starting to see the way the Buddha saw. We're training ourselves to see without ego, to see the world of human experience without ego. That's the significance of it.

So this is kind of freeing. There was one point in my practice when I was doing a home retreat and studying this book by Nagarjuna called The Root Verses on the Middle Way. There are a few quotes from it in the study guide. It's a treatise on emptiness. He just keeps looking at every form of existence that one could solidify, and then he shows the emptiness in that. I'd been really plunged into this in the middle of a period of retreat time.

One night while I was sleeping, I had this dream. I was standing in front of a full-length mirror and the me that was standing in front of the mirror asked the question, "Why is emptiness important?" The person in the mirror answered, "Because it means you don't exist."

That's the significance of emptiness. It means that we don't exist as an object, as a center of things, as a problem. There are these processes of nature that are going on. There's no owner, and they don't constitute an enduring entity. And when we can see in this way, it takes some of the burden out.

You may know this story. Jack Kornfield, after he had been a monk in Thailand, was visiting this old monk in Sri Lanka. The old monk knew that Jack had done some Dharma practice in Thailand, and he said, "Oh, so you've been practicing Buddhism for a while. Tell me, what's the essence of the Buddhist teachings?"

Jack said, "Well, the essence, as I understand it, is that there's no abiding self at the center of this human experience."

And the old monk said, "That's it. No self. No self, no problem." And he just laughed. No self, no problem.

And that is the meaning of it. That's the importance of it. When we take the self out, it takes out some of the problem.

This also leads into emptiness of phenomena. They're connected. I was talking to one of my teachers once and saying, "Should I look on the side of emptiness of self or look on the side of emptiness of phenomena?"

He said, "There's only one emptiness."

So we're going to explore this manifestation—the emptiness of phenomena. Let's look at page eleven, quote number thirty-five. This is called the Sutta on a Lump of Foam from the Connected Discourses.

It says: "On one occasion, the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a person inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?'"

This is a little shocking, isn't it? Isn't form the most substantial thing you can think of? What is more solid than form? But here the Buddha is saying no, form is exactly like a lump of foam.

In this passage, he doesn't actually use the word śūnya, which means empty, but he uses a couple of words that are synonymous. He uses the term "void"—this term in Pali is rittaka, meaning devoid of, very close to empty. And then the word "hollow"—the Pali word used is tuccha. This was used by the Buddha at one point to scold a monk who lacked substance, calling that person a tuccha purusa, a hollow person, hollow man. So both are synonyms of śūnya, even though that word isn't used here.

So how is form like a mass of foam? I was teaching a retreat at Spirit Rock one year, and at this time of day I was giving a dharma talk when I heard a really eerie shriek from outside. It was like a baby crying or screaming. A couple of staff people went out to see what was happening. I continued with the dharma talk.

When the talk ended, I went out to see what was there. A deer had been killed, lying right over by Upeka, on that little grassy area, and its neck was twisted way back. One of the staff people said that when they had gone out, they had seen a couple of large dogs running away. So apparently the deer had been attacked, and it looked like its neck had been broken. It was dead. By the time we got there, there was nothing we could do.

We formed a circle—some yogis came out—and said some prayers and sent loving-kindness for the deer. The caretakers called the Humane Society, who said they would come and take away the dead deer the next day. So the caretakers moved the deer down near the front of the property, actually near where you all park, and waited for the Humane Society to come pick it up. But they never came. I imagine they had other more pressing things to do.

So the carcass of the deer sat out there. It was very interesting to watch it day by day because it just started disappearing. Other animals came and fed on it—probably vultures and coyotes and raccoons and maybe even bobcats. There were bobcats on the land and other scavengers. Day by day, there was a little less there, a little less there, until within a week, there was really only the hide and the skull left, and the bones that remained.

I thought: something that was so solid and vital a week before—poof—gone so quickly. So in that way, form is like a mass of foam. It seems substantial, but it can go really quickly.

Then the Buddha continues in this sutta—I haven't put it all in here—but he compares the five aggregates to a magic show. This was an interesting reflection. If you've ever been entranced with magic, a lot of teenage boys go through a fascination with it. I did for a while. I looked into the life of Houdini. Harry Houdini was this great illusionist and escape artist around 1910, and he would do some very impressive tricks.

They would tie up his hands and clasp them behind his back. They would circle him round and round with chains and put padlocks on the chains. Then they would put him in a box, a wooden box, and nail it shut on every side. And then they'd throw it into a river so that he would sink. But every time they did it, a few minutes later, Houdini would swim to the surface. And every time, people couldn't believe that he'd done it again because they'd seen him tied up and bound and padlocked. It was like magic. How did he escape again?

But there were tricks. And when you know the tricks, it's no longer magic. So the tricks were: his hands were tied not very tight. The first thing he did was wiggle his hands free. Then inside his mouth, he had some very small picks and wrenches. He would pull them out when he got his hands free. And then he was an expert lock picker. He could undo the locks that were binding the chains and unwrap the chains. And then one of the sides of the box was nailed very lightly—it was almost false nailing. He could knock that out and then swim to the surface.

But one other skill was needed: he had to hold his breath for three minutes underwater because that's how long it took him to do all this other work in the dark, cold water. So when you put all those skills together, it's quite difficult to do, but it's not magic. It's an impressive display, but it's not magic.

So the Buddha said that's what consciousness does. And then the Buddha goes through this whole list of similes:

Form is like a mass of foam.
Feeling is like a water bubble.
Perception is like a mirage.
Volitions are like a plantain trunk.
And consciousness is like a magic show.

The plantain trunk we might have to explain. The banana tree—plantain is a form of banana—does not have a solid core. If you ever look at one, it's just green leafy stalks overlapping each other, forming enough strength to hold the plant up with the fruit. But when that fruit finishes, the tree basically dies. There's not a trunk there to continue it. So it's got a hollow core, basically.

And consciousness is like a magic show. So explained the kinsman of the sun.

Let's take a look at this area of consciousness being like a magic show. How is that?

As I mentioned the other night, we live in a culture that puts a lot of emphasis on the material. Western culture hasn't very well investigated the mind—not to the depth that Eastern cultures have, either Hinduism or Buddhism or Taoism. In some of those Asian wisdom traditions, matter is not primary; mind is primary. Or you might say consciousness is primary.

What happens if we look from the side of consciousness at our experience? What does that look like?

First of all, in meditation, we start to get a sense of the lightness of sense experience in the senses first. We come into meditation and we feel the body is solid. Do you remember the first time you started to see it's only sensations? It's only changing sensations of pulsation and vibration and pressure and coolness. That there isn't anything solid in the felt experience of the body? That's kind of radical when we discover that.

People who have done retreats with S.N. Goenka usually have experienced that by the end of the retreat. It's just a flow of sensations that make up this thing we call body.

As the mind stills, we start to see how sounds just come out of nowhere and then disappear. Thoughts arise, and if they're seen clearly, they often just go poof. Emotions which seem like such strong motivators—when we can see them clearly, it's hard even to find them. Oh, I know I was feeling that sadness, but where is it? It's just like a cloud.

All these sense impressions become very light. There was that great book by Milan Kundera called The Unbearable Lightness of Being. Our meditation leads us into that kind of relationship.

But there's one of the senses that's hardest, for me anyway, to find the lightness in, and that is sight. When I look at a room, at people, at walls, at floors, it really looks solid. So let's investigate that and see: is sight really as solid as it looks?

Let's use a little bit of our scientific knowledge. We know that the way sight is generated is that light falls on an object in the form of photons, reflects off that object to our eyes. Sight can only arise if light lands on our retinas and then stimulates an impulse through the optic nerve that goes to the brain. Then some kind of processing happens that nobody understands, not even the neuroscientists. And then boom—a sight appears.

So that sight seems to be solid and unchanging, but when you reflect, it's actually being continually refreshed or regenerated by these millions of photons landing on the retina each second. And if that flow of photons stops, the sight disappears. So the sight is not a solid thing at all, but it's being on-off, on-off, on-off, on-off so fast that we normally can't see it. I will say that yogis in deep meditation can see that flickering nature, but normally we don't. But we can use a little scientific reflection to validate that it is just flickering on-off, on-off, on-off.

So then one starts to wonder: in the Western worldview, we normally take the physical world as the ultimate reality. That's the way we're conditioned to think. This is what's real. And I am born into this physical world called planet Earth. I am trapped here for the duration of my lifespan. When I die, I go away and this physical world, which is the ultimate reality, continues. That's the standpoint from which we understand and look at it.

But I wonder if this physical world is the most fundamental fact, or if perhaps consciousness is equally fundamental. Remember I mentioned that the Buddha said that body and consciousness support each other like two stalks of reeds. So what if consciousness is equally important as this physical world?

In examining this process of seeing, we have to question: are we seeing the real ultimate physical world? Or is light simply landing on our eye, being processed in the brain, and then we're constructing a representation of the world through our senses and brain that's held in consciousness? Can we ever see the real absolute physical world unvarnished, or is it only known through our senses and brain's processing? It's the latter, isn't it?

This physical world that we take as ultimate, absolute, true, unquestioned, is only a construction of our own senses, brain, and consciousness. Who knows what relationship it bears to the physical reality out there. Animals see it differently than we do. We know they don't see in color as one example. They may detect things that we're unable to detect—different spectrums of light. So we've taken this representation that's a floating phantom in consciousness, and we've ascribed to it this ultimate, grounded physical reality that it just doesn't have. All the sense impressions are only appearances in consciousness.

Now, we also tend to think—it's very comfortable to think that there's a ground underneath us. And physically we can feel that. We feel the pull of gravity and the ground feels solid. But what's underneath this ground? If you go to the other side of the earth, it's just empty space. It's just hanging in empty space. Even this physical thing doesn't really have a ground. It's just a relative floor.

But the interesting thing about consciousness is it doesn't have any ground. It doesn't need a ground. What's the floor of your consciousness? It's just a bubble. Consciousness is just a bubble.

One of the things I used to like to play with was color. Color is so amazing, the way it exists. If I hold up this book, I think everybody would probably see that it's blue, right? But then I started to wonder: well, where is blue? Normally we think, oh, blue is here. But again, if you know the laws of physics, you know that the reason it looks blue is because all the other light is being absorbed and only the blue is being reflected back. That's why it looks blue. The blue gets reflected to our eyes and so we see blue.

But actually what's absorbed here is all the other colors of the spectrum. So actually this book is anything but blue—it's everything but blue.

So where is blue? It's only in your consciousness, isn't it? It's not in this physical reality. Blue is only an appearance in consciousness.

Here's another one that particularly interested me. When we go out at night under the sky—on a clearer night than tonight—we can see all these stars, right? The vastness of consciousness becomes really apparent. So, is your consciousness actually reaching out to that star? Or has light from that star traveled all those millions of light years, impinged upon your retina, and then the brain and consciousness created this appearance of vast space? Your consciousness doesn't reach to that star, does it? I'm not saying consciousness is bounded or limited or finite, but I don't think it's reaching out to Alpha Centauri tonight. So again, consciousness creates this sense of space, this vast sense of space.

We don't live in a reality of the physical world. We live in a representation of reality constructed by our senses and our consciousness. And everything that appears is only an appearance in consciousness, which has no ground. This is the sense of the emptiness of phenomena. The physical world does not have the substantiality we attribute to it. It's only an appearance.

One nice way to remind ourselves of this is to change our language. Instead of talking about objects, we can talk about appearances. Everything that we used to call an object, we can start to see as simply an appearance. It's just an appearance in consciousness.

That's why the Tibetans call this whole thing a magical display. They call it a magical display, but they probably don't know that they're taking that image from this old Theravada sutta, where the Buddha compared consciousness to a magic show. But that's where it comes from. Or in the Diamond Sutra: "Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world, like a star at dawn, a flickering lamp, a bubble in a stream, an echo, a mirage, and a dream." These images are also closely related to this old sutta. Sometimes it's also compared to a rainbow. A rainbow appears, but there's nothing substantial there with those colors.

One of my teachers put it this way: Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever. No solid existence. Maybe there's something solid out there. But Buddhism is concerned with our human experience. In our human experience, everything that appears has no solid existence whatsoever. Things are only appearances in consciousness. This is the meaning of the emptiness of phenomena. Nothing in our field of experience is solid or grounded. It's all groundless and held in this bubble of consciousness.

There's this wonderful set of teachings in the Mahayana called the Lojong Training or the Seven Point Mind Training, created by a seventh-century teacher named Atisha in India. It's a wonderful set of slogans to study, and I recommend it. But one of them that I really like says, "In post-meditation, be a child of illusion." That means when you're not formally meditating, when you're walking about and experiencing the world with your eyes open, be a child of illusion. Or you could say a student of illusion. Meaning, we often create the illusion that this physical world is solid and the ultimate reality. But it's not. Remind yourself: this is only an appearance in consciousness. Everything we see is only an appearance in consciousness.

This opens the door actually to seeing ourselves in a new way also. And I want to talk a little about that.

When I was a monk in Thailand, one of the great privileges of being a monk is that we were allowed to witness autopsies. So I was thirty-two years old, and I went down to a hospital in the center of Bangkok, very near to the parade ground, if you know that part of the city. A lot of buses coming and going, a lot of people walking through this busy part of Bangkok, and went to a nearby hospital, Siriraj Hospital. And I had never stood next to a dead body in my whole life. I walked into the coroner's office and there was a dead body laid out on a stainless steel table. It was a young woman who had drowned in one of the klongs, one of the canals. And I was able to stand next to her.

I'd been meditating quite a bit in the monastery at that time, and so I was very open and very sensitive, and here I was next to my first dead body. So that was powerful enough.

But then we sat in the operating theater, and she was brought in on a table, and the coroner began to dissect her in carrying out the autopsy. I'll spare you the details, but he took apart basically every part of her abdominal cavity and her brain in order to remove the organs and weigh them. We were able to just sit there and watch that happen. And then he brought out two other bodies. That took about half an hour, the first autopsy. And then he brought out two other bodies and did the same procedure for them. So we got to watch those also.

And then we left and I was with a friend and we headed back to the monastery. I remember walking out onto that parade ground and watching people walk by—couples walking by holding hands, parents with children in strollers, an old woman carrying a shopping bag of groceries over to the bus stop. And everyone I walked by, I saw as a walking corpse. That's a phrase that came to my mind. They're all just walking corpses.

And this wasn't depressing. It was very enlivening.

And then I had to reflect: what's the difference between those who are walking and alive and those bodies I had just been standing next to and watched being disassembled in the coroner's office? What I saw was in the people who were walking, the difference was there was this spark of consciousness that I could see shining out through the eyes. And then there was the body. That was fundamentally what I saw. There was a body, which was just like those corpses, but then there was this spark of consciousness.

But as I reflected on it, that spark of consciousness was totally here and now. No past, no future. Just here and now, awake, alive, taking in the sense input. But there's this peculiar capacity we have called memory. So we can store up these moments of consciousness as vignettes to bring up later. And the bringing up of them over and over gives us a sense of past and future and a continuity through the present. But that was all a mental construction. The reality was there was the body, which was totally of the present moment. There was this brightness of knowing, which was totally of the present moment, and there was nothing else. There was really no past and no future in reality.

That's where I got a sense of where my sister had gone. What ended was only this brightness of consciousness, which was so insubstantial to begin with, so light to begin with. And also seeing in this way, the brightness of consciousness in the body were all the same. This consciousness is not very different. These bodies are not very different. So seeing in this way—this is a situation for all of us. We're just this brightness, but we're deceived by memory into constructing a continuous self enduring through past and future. But there is only this bright awareness.

So seeing in this way can also be a little unsettling. We mentioned this at the beginning of the retreat. There isn't the solid ground that we thought there was. There is only consciousness and the appearances that it holds, none of which are substantial or solid. And we are not very far away from the reality of a corpse. Just that brightness of consciousness and knowing.

That's why the Tibetans say that it's not easy to bear the truth of emptiness. It takes some time sometimes, and it takes some heart to bear the truth of emptiness when it's seen on this level and to this degree. But at the same time, they say emptiness is the womb of compassion, because we see we're all in the same boat.

Some years ago, Sally and I were teaching a class for some senior students of Spirit Rock, and we were going through this material with them. We asked them to reflect and give us feedback on how it felt for them. So a week later, one of the students came back and put it this way. She said, "It's spooky. I would look at everything like this Japanese lamp that I love and I'd see that it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When I went from an object to say it's an appearance to a person to say they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But it's true, and it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time."

When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile.

For me, being able to see in this way means that I can turn from seeing someone as a personality with a personal history and psychological patterns and past and future and problems and joys and all that, to in a moment seeing them essentially as a body plus consciousness. I recommend that you play with this. Play with it with some of your friends, partners, loved ones. You know them really well. Imagine them as a personality enduring over time and see how that feels. And then turn to see them as essentially what we all are in this moment—body plus consciousness—and see how that feels. I encourage you to play with it. I think it can evoke a lot of compassion.

Kuan Yin is the bodhisattva of compassion in Chinese Mahayana Buddhism. It's said that her special gift is that she hears all the cries of the world, the cries of the ten thousand sorrows. She's listening and hears the difficulties that we all face. So she hears that suffering, and Kuan Yin is not a beginning meditator. Kuan Yin's a bodhisattva and she's a pretty advanced meditator. That means she understands that there's suffering, but there's no "I" at the center of this to whom the suffering is happening.

One meditator described it this way: "Suffering is just rope burn." You get that image? All these things are passing through and we try to hang on and we can't. So Kuan Yin understands that. There is suffering, but there is no "I" at the center that is doing the suffering.

This understanding is a beautiful blend of wisdom and compassion. The wisdom of seeing the emptiness gives the heart ease. It gives the sense of freedom, the understanding that no one is permanently damaged by this process. But the compassion gives the ability to stay open and related and wanting to help in the ways that we can to the situation that all of us face.

So this blend of wisdom and compassion—you'll feel it in statues of Kuan Yin, like the statue at the back, and her posture of royal ease. That's the liberation, but the heartfulness is also there. You see it in the half smile of the Buddha, which is that expression of equanimity, balancing wisdom and compassion.

Through seeing the emptiness, the heart becomes less burdened. And in that unburdening, then we have the capacity to feel the suffering that we meet in life, our own and others. And our heart, because it's not so burdened, can open better with love, compassion, kindness—whatever the situation needs.

I'll close with this quotation that is attributed to Kuan Yin, who's not known to have been a historical being, but who cares: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?

CHAPTER 114

Morning Instructions: Big Mind

Guy Armstrong · 42 min

> In this guided meditation session from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong leads practitioners in cultivating expansive awareness through the metaphor of 'big mind' - consciousness likened to open sky or empty space. The session systematically opens attention to sounds, bodily sensations, and mental phenomena, inviting practitioners to recognize how all experiences arise and pass within the boundless space of awareness.
> Armstrong guides meditators to observe sounds appearing and disappearing like phenomena in empty space, bodily sensations glimmering like stars in the night sky, and thoughts drifting like rootless, homeless clouds. The meditation emphasizes looking directly at the nature of awareness itself - recognizing it as clear, invisible, without boundaries or foundation, yet containing all experience without being composed of it.
> This practice draws from Mahāyāna-influenced approaches to śūnyatā (emptiness) meditation while remaining grounded in experiential investigation. The session concludes with integrating this expansive awareness into walking meditation, suggesting how this 'big mind' perspective can extend beyond formal sitting practice into daily activity.

This period will be a guided meditation on the theme of an expansive awareness. It's helpful in this meditation if you can be comfortable, relaxed, and relatively still. The stillness of body will really help to support the stillness of mind. But do it in a relaxed way. Don't struggle with your posture. Be comfortable, relaxed and quiet.

We'll begin by opening our attention to sound, letting the awareness become wide, expansive, taking in all the sounds that are coming and going. Could be sounds from inside the room, sounds of one another, sound in my voice. Could be sounds from outside. And because the hall's fairly quiet this morning, I'm going to ring a bell from time to time just to drop in a little sound. But the sitting will end when the big bell rings three times.

When the awareness is wide in this way, we can get the sense that it's like a big clear sky or like empty space in which all the sounds just appear and disappear. And when there are no sounds, you can let that big empty sky just reveal the silence, the reach of silence, allowing the sounds to arise and pass in this big empty space of awareness—not resisting any sound, not holding on to any sound. Letting them all appear and disappear in the open space of knowing.

This awareness is like the sky. It's clear and doesn't have any limit. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Now becoming aware of sensations throughout the body. Sensations arise as points of feeling, points of sensing. They rise and change, glimmering like stars in the sky at night. All within this big empty space of awareness. In our direct experience, there's no head, no shoulders and no back. There's no chest, no arms and no legs. There are only these points of feeling, points of sensing arising, glimmering and changing in this open space of knowing.

This awareness doesn't have an inside or an outside. There are no boundaries or separations. There are just sounds and sensations arising, changing, passing, all in this empty space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness. Let the mind be soft and open and still, not moving toward or away from any appearance.

Now becoming aware of thoughts and images. Thoughts and images are just like clouds drifting through the sky. They don't have any roots and they don't have any home. They're just arising, drifting and passing all in this empty space of mind. Look at the nature of this awareness. It's clear and invisible, like the sky, without any form or boundary.

This awareness is, but it doesn't quite exist. It contains all things, but it's not composed of them. This awareness is empty and doesn't have any foundation. It's insubstantial like the sky or space. To see if it's like that, look at the nature of your own awareness.

For the last minutes of the sitting, putting this all together. Sounds appear and disappear. Sensations arise and change, glimmering like stars in the night sky. Thoughts and images drift like clouds, rootless and homeless. All in this big empty space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look at the nature of your own awareness.

So we'll have a short break now and maybe see if you can walk in this big empty space. Maybe walking can happen in the empty space of awareness also.

CHAPTER 115

Emptiness and Karma

In this dharma talk from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong explores the intricate relationship between the Buddha's teachings on emptiness (suññatā) and the law of karma. Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya's fundamental teaching that "volition (cetanā) is what I call action," Armstrong explains how actions arise from wholesome or unwholesome motivations - the three roots of greed, hatred, and delusion versus their opposites of generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.

The talk addresses common Western misconceptions about karma while demonstrating how understanding cause and effect deepens our comprehension of not-self (anattā). Armstrong uses the metaphor of mind-streams flowing like rivers to show how individual karma operates without requiring a fixed self. He explores how dharma practice itself becomes a karmic process, where new wholesome intentions gradually redirect our mental patterns from saṃsāra toward nirvāṇa.

The teaching culminates with the Buddha's profound teaching on four types of karma, including the mysterious "karma that is neither dark nor bright" - the Noble Eightfold Path itself - which leads to the complete end of karma in liberation. This talk offers practical guidance for ethical action while revealing the ultimate transcendence of all volitional activity in awakening.

One of the main themes we've been touching on since the beginning of this retreat is cause and effect. Gil mentioned it very early when talking about the general form of dependent arising: when this is, that is; this arising, that arising; when this is not, that is not; this ceasing, that ceases. We talked about it in terms of the Four Noble Truths—suffering and its cause, liberation and its cause. Then Sally discussed the detailed chain of the twelve links of dependent origination.

It's not an accident that when we address emptiness, cause and effect comes right to the foreground. When you take the self out of the picture—when you remove the idea of a controlling entity—you see that everything in the universe arises according to certain causes and conditions in very lawful ways. The universe unfolds lawfully through different causes and conditions from different directions and sources.

One of these central laws I want to discuss tonight is the law of karma, and I want to explore how it operates. There are a couple of reasons for this. First, I think it's really needed to complete the understanding of not-self. Second, we're all moving back into daily life now, and when we return to daily life, we're moving into the field of action.

This week we've been studying primarily in terms of the Eightfold Path, focused mainly on right view. We've been examining the view that understands the selfless nature of things, the empty nature of things, the lack of solidity and substantial essence in anything. Now we're returning to the field of action, which in the Eightfold Path is described as sila: right speech, right action, and right livelihood.

There's one important link between the path factor of right view and this whole field of action. Right intention—samma sankappa in the Eightfold Path—is the bridge between right view and right action. This is closely connected with karma as well.

The Dalai Lama was once asked if he had a choice between teaching Westerners about emptiness or teaching them about karma, which should he teach? He said karma. So perhaps we've missed the boat this week, but we're going to try to fill it in this evening.

Teaching about karma is interesting because it's one of the topics we can't verify so easily. I can't verify the Buddha's teachings on karma, and I doubt that many of you can verify them experientially. I can't tell you from my own experience whether this is true or not, and I don't think it's my job to try to convince you that it's true. But I think it is my job to tell you what the Buddha said about karma. Then it's up to you to figure out how you want to hold it and relate to it.

Personally, I think it's helpful to believe in, and coming from the man who gave us the Four Noble Truths and the Eightfold Path, it might be worth considering. He might have had some insight here.

I want to explain two things this evening. First, the basics of karma and how we can relate to it in a sensible way, because there are some misconceptions and obstacles for Westerners. Second, how it relates to the theme of emptiness, because at first it can seem contradictory.

Let me begin with some basics of what karma is. The word karma is from Sanskrit; the Pali word is kamma. Both were simple words in the Buddha's day that meant action. As I use the terms tonight, I might say karma, kamma, or action—I'm using them all synonymously.

This was a big topic of discussion in the time of the Buddha. Wanderers and philosophers would cross paths and debate with one another about the meaning of action. There were all kinds of different views. Some people said actions mattered; others said actions didn't matter at all. Some believed there was no ability to make choice, that everything was determined in a fatalistic way.

Some people said there were results from action; others argued there were no lasting results from action. All these different debates were swirling through the spiritual communities.

But the Buddha introduced a revolutionary perspective on the central importance of action. He taught that what truly matters is action with volition. As he stated clearly—this appears in the first quote on page 20 of the study guide—"Volition, oh monks, is what I call action. For through volition, one performs the action." This comes from the Numerical Discourses.

The word "volition" translates the Pali term cetana. Sometimes I'll say "intention," even though this can be confusing because we often use "intention" to translate the second path factor, samma-sankappa. They're related but not identical. I apologize for any confusion, but I may use either "intention" or "volition" to translate cetana, which lies at the very heart of karma. Other synonyms that convey this meaning include urge, motive, impulse, or will.

The essential understanding is that actions arise from some inner movement within us—the motivation or driving force, some kind of emotional energy that makes the action happen, that brings it forth.

Actions are considered to take place in three spheres: body, speech, and mind. So thoughts and emotions have volitional energy behind them. This is why the fourth aggregate of sankharas is sometimes translated as "volitional formations." The energies of desire and hatred, joy and compassion, all express some motivation.

Karma refers to the action as it happens in the present moment. The results of that action are given another term: vipaka. In the West, we tend to mix them up—like that John Lennon song "Instant Karma." I think he's really talking about results, but the proper term for that is vipaka. Karma truly means the action as it's happening in the moment.

Here comes the revolutionary aspect of the Buddha's teaching: actions are considered skillful or unskillful depending on the volition behind them. He was clear about what constitutes skillful motives and what constitutes unskillful ones.

When an action arises from the energies of greed, hatred, and delusion, he labeled these as unskillful actions. He called these three forces "the roots of the unwholesome." When an action comes from the forces of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, those actions are considered skillful. Non-greed could be understood as generosity or renunciation; non-hatred as loving-kindness; non-delusion as wisdom.

It's that urge that makes an action skillful or unskillful. An action could be described similarly but have two very different motivations. For instance, if I tell you I saw somebody plunge a knife into a person's belly and blood flowed out—is that skillful or unskillful? Was it a thief trying to rob the person? Or was it a surgeon removing an appendix to heal an illness? The action might appear similar, but the moral weight is entirely different.

We must look at the motivation from which actions arise to determine their skillful or unskillful nature. Of course, when we examine our own actions closely, many are mixed. We have a combination of wholesome, beautiful motives alongside motives that are more self-centered, desire-based, or anger-based. These actions are considered mixed in their karmic weighting, their skillfulness or unskillfulness.

As we return to daily life, this field of action becomes not only important but genuinely fascinating. It's so interesting to tune into our own intentions and observe the mixture of motivations influencing us.

I've had several conversations here about life choices. One thing that seems crucial when making important decisions is that we wait until the mind settles and we can trust that the energy surrounding the decision is based on clarity and wisdom—and certainly kindness toward ourselves—rather than arising from confusion and a tangle of wanting and not wanting.

To me, one of the greatest values of retreat is that it allows our inner turmoil to settle enough that we can begin to see with some clarity. When that clarity is present, it provides a good foundation from which to make significant choices or decisions or to take action.

This process of tuning into our own intentions as we speak, as we act in the world, even in the thoughts we grasp and follow—this is very significant in terms of karma and deeply interesting as a way to explore what's happening inside us.

The basic guidelines as we move into the world as committed practitioners are the five precepts: not killing, not stealing, not engaging in sexual misconduct, not lying, not misusing drugs and intoxicants. These can be refined to quite subtle degrees.

Mostly we take the precepts—perhaps we'll do this tomorrow morning before leaving retreat—and we aspire to follow them. But I don't really expect myself to follow them perfectly. I take them expecting that I'm going to break them at some point in some way, but I try to use that as an opportunity for learning.

We recommit ourselves again and again to this aspiration of causing no harm in the world. How do we live in such a way that we truly cause no harm, make no unskillful ripples through our life's choices and actions? This is a really important inquiry.

When we can do this successfully, we enjoy something the Buddha called "the bliss of blamelessness."

The interviewer was moved to a profound state of wonder. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about," she said slowly, letting the words settle. "That's a good life. That's a great life—to have no regrets."

When asked about his service, the Dalai Lama responded with characteristic humility: "Regarding service to Tibet, service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced practitioners—even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind—I don't lag too far behind."

You get the sense that part of the reason his mind can settle so evenly and deeply is this foundation of care in his actions—to have a life free from regret. What a beautiful aspiration for us.

This is the area of karma. We look at our actions, their impact on others, their impact on ourselves, and we understand that actions do have consequences. They have implications. This is one of the early verses in the Dhammapada, where the Buddha says:

"Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

This is the basic teaching on karma: that if we act out of wholesome motivations, happiness will come into our life. And to the extent that we act out of unwholesome motivations, sadness and unhappiness will come into our lives.

This is wonderful instruction because it can provide a template for our whole life—for our meditation practice and our life in the world—to follow in a way that gives us the greatest likelihood possible of happiness. And then we also understand how we can create choices that lead to unhappiness.

I imagine you know people in your life where you can see examples of both of these. When you know somebody about whom you would say, "Wow, they're a really good person," can you look and see how their choices help establish their happiness? I have people I can see like that. And then do you know other people whose lives have a lot of unhappiness, which leads to confusion, and they keep making the wrong choices, and you see the effects of that in their life?

So we can kind of see this lived out—looking at our own life, looking at the lives of people that we know. Fortunately, I think this idea is getting popular in this culture. Karma isn't quite understood fully, but a little bit.

I was teaching a meditation class in Juvenile Hall some years ago—it was a great privilege, actually. One of my co-teachers, James Baraz, had a friend who worked as a nurse in San Mateo Juvenile Hall, and she was able to get us admitted to teach a six-week beginning meditation class. We were in the maximum security wing, so these were young men, usually sixteen or seventeen years old, who had been arrested and charged with things like assault, armed robbery, murder, and different kinds of felonies like that.

We didn't know if this class would fly at all—a couple of old middle-class guys coming in and talking about Buddhism and meditation. But we decided to give it a shot and see what happened. One thing that was very conducive was that they had time on their hands. You might say we had a captive audience.

Not only that, but emotions were running very high for these young men because they were awaiting trial. The trial might mean they would go to jail for years, or it might mean they could be released back to their families. Here they were, not knowing what the outcome would be. So there was a lot of fear, and a certain amount of aggression present in that population—another cause for fear. Of course, they didn't know how to deal with the fear they were experiencing.

The main thing we emphasized was how to work with strong emotions—to feel them in their body, generate mindfulness, and create space around them. The people who took to the practice found it really helpful. We got a lot of positive feedback, and the project kept continuing after we left, eventually transforming into the Mind-Body Awareness Project and later the Lineage Project.

As we were getting near the end of the class, James and I said to each other one morning, "Should we teach them about karma? And should we teach the precepts?" We really didn't know how that would go down. We thought, this is the last chance we'll probably have to meet with these guys. Let's do it.

So I gave the talk and presented it as the science of happiness—if you want to get happy, this is what you might want to think about. I explained how wholesome motivations lead to wholesome results, unwholesome lead to unwholesome, and so forth. Then I asked, "Does this sound like anything you've ever heard before?"

A young guy raised his hand and said, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around?" Sure. So it was very accessible for them, and they took it in very easily.

Later—this is kind of a postscript—we also taught them the loving-kindness practice. Someone who went in after us as a follow-up with this group said that one of the guys who was in there was a gang leader. He explained to the other guys in the group how they should practice loving-kindness for the rival gang members because they also had mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers. It was very moving.

So this understanding is becoming more widespread, and it really can change lives when it's seen and we take it as a direction.

The Tibetans in their teachings also have what we call the Brahmaviharas, the divine abidings. They call them the four immeasurables—a term you can also hear in the Theravadan tradition—for metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity. They're called immeasurable because there's no limit to the beings they can be extended to. They're boundless states.

But they phrase them a little differently, and this teaching is embedded in their phrases. The phrase for loving-kindness is: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." For compassion: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue." These are the phrases they say to themselves as they're practicing love and compassion.

The Buddha taught this as a pretty universal law for human beings. It basically doesn't matter if we believe it or not—the law applies. It doesn't matter if our religion believes it or not—the law applies. It doesn't matter if our culture believes it or not—the law applies in quite a universal way to all human beings everywhere.

The Buddha stated it in quite a strong way in several places in the texts. Here's one quotation: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge."

Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of that they will be the heirs.

Westerners often have some resistance to this notion—one, because it's not immediately verifiable, which is understandable. But I think there's a kind of inner resistance. Perhaps it goes back to our democratic roots. Very early in the formation of this country, the Declaration of Independence states—and I paraphrase—we hold these truths to be self-evident, that all persons are created equal.

Somewhere in this comes the notion that maybe everybody should be equally happy. But according to the teaching on karma, we are to some extent responsible for our own happiness. Certainly the actions of others—society, parents, and so forth—will affect our happiness. But the teaching on karma can seem kind of cold or uncaring or cruel to say that people have some responsibility for their own happiness.

Sometimes there's also an overlay of, "Oh, it means if they're responsible for their unhappiness, then they deserve to suffer." I don't think this is in the Buddha's teachings at all. This notion of anybody deserving to suffer—I don't find in his approach at all.

The simplest example you probably know about is Angulimala. He was a spiritual student, quite a sincere spiritual student, who unfortunately got some bad advice from a teacher. His spiritual teacher told him—this is out of a bad motive—that what he needed to do to advance in his practice was to kill a thousand people, cut off a finger from each one, and deliver it to the teacher.

At the point at which we pick up the story, Angulimala was said to have killed 999 people and taken a finger from each one and woven it into a necklace which he wore around his neck. He was looking for his thousandth victim to complete his commitment when the Buddha was going to be walking by where Angulimala was living. People said to the Buddha, "Don't go there. Angulimala will come and kill you." The Buddha basically said, "I don't think so."

Undeterred, he walked by. Angulimala approached him to try to kill him as his thousandth victim. The Buddha eluded him and Angulimala yelled after him, "Stop, stop!" The Buddha turned around and said, "Angulimala, I have stopped, but you're still burning with greed, hatred, and confusion. You stop. Stop."

Something about that turned Angulimala's mind. He said he had never seen anyone who wasn't frightened of him before. So he approached the Buddha and bowed down and asked to be instructed.

Now, you're the Buddha. Here's a guy who's killed 999 people. If there's anybody who deserves to suffer, isn't this guy pretty high up on the list? If you're the Buddha, would you teach him? Or would you let him stew in his own karma?

The Buddha taught him. Not only did he teach him, he ordained him. He admitted him into the Sangha. He gave him teachings. And in a relatively short period of time, Angulimala became awakened, became liberated, became one of the arahants.

So I don't think the Buddha had any idea that anybody deserves to suffer. If he could have plucked out the suffering of every being he met, I think he would have done that. But it's not in anyone's power to pluck out that suffering.

By the way, it's said that Angulimala continued to go for alms round in some of the villages where he had killed people. The villagers threw stones at him because they still thought of him as the mass murderer who had killed their friends or relatives. He would come back and complain to the Buddha, "I went for alms, but the people hate me, they stoned me."

The Buddha said, "Bear it, Brahmin, bear it, practitioner, because this is your karma for those actions for which, if you hadn't developed in spiritual practice, you would be suffering for a long, long time. So just bear it. That's the result of your actions."

So I don't think the notion of deserving is there in the teachings on karma at all. But doing unskillful actions and expecting not to have suffering consequences would be like an apple coming off its stem when it's ripe and not falling to the ground. You can't arrest the law of gravity. You can't arrest the law of karma. It's just part of the way things work, according to the Buddha.

Another way people sometimes take it as being a heartless view is that one might say something like, "That person is suffering. I see their suffering, but it's their fault. They created it. Therefore, I don't have anything to do with it."

I'll turn my back on them. That is not wisdom. That's indifference.

The Buddha talked very clearly about compassion being appropriate in all situations. Indifference is closing off the heart. So we can rationalize why we shouldn't care about someone's suffering, but that's still indifference that closes off the heart of compassion and care. The heart of compassion wants to address suffering, whatever its cause—whether it's karmic or psychological or physical or biological, whatever it is, compassion wants to address the cause of suffering.

So it's a misuse of the teachings to say, "That's their problem, not my responsibility." Indifference is actually considered in the Brahma Viharas the near enemy of equanimity—an unwholesome state that looks like equanimity, but is not.

So we can see how actions create consequences in at least six ways. I'm just going to mention them briefly.

When we're thinking about doing an action, if we're thinking about doing something wholesome, generous, loving, or kind, we feel good just thinking about it. If we're thinking about doing something that's going to be hurtful, it doesn't feel so good. So we feel it already in planning it.

In doing the action, it feels beautiful to give or to love or to help. And it feels awful to hurt. As we get sensitive, we can feel that in the moment. So in doing the action, we feel it.

And then when we contemplate it later, we feel what it was like—the goodness of generosity and kindness, the awful feeling of regret if we've hurt or harmed someone. So these are three ways: planning it, doing it, remembering it.

Then our actions have consequences in the way people relate to us. If we are consistently warm, friendly, thoughtful toward people, then they will like to see us coming and they will welcome our presence. If we're judgmental and critical and angry or resentful, then they'll feel that energy and they'll close off and they'll back up and they won't be so welcoming.

The fifth way is in habitual states of mind. When we enact certain patterns again and again, they wear a groove in the mind. The Buddha pointed to this centuries ago. Neuroscientists are finding the same thing when they say neurons that fire together wire together. Whether you think of it as a karmic pattern or a brain pattern, these things get reinforced and a groove is developed in the mind.

This is from the Buddha: "Monks, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, then their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness and compassion, then their mind will incline to thoughts of renunciation, kindness and compassion."

Then there's this one other quotation that I really like a lot. I've heard it attributed to the Buddha, but I don't believe that it's anywhere in the text. I don't know what the source is, but he could have said something like this, so I'll just repeat it as though he had. This is how these impulses become set and formed as habits of our personality that develop into character. So this is the fifth way.

The sixth way that we can see our actions have consequences is one we can't see. And that is what the Buddha often talked about—how our actions have results in the future in mysterious ways that we cannot understand the mechanism of. You hear stories like this in the suttas all the time.

Somebody has a life situation. For example, there was a man at the time of the Buddha who was very wealthy, but he lived in very miserable circumstances and didn't let himself enjoy any of his wealth. So he ate crummy food, he didn't have comfortable clothes, he lived in a miserable little dwelling, although he actually had a lot of wealth. The Buddha said, "Oh, that's a result of an action in a past life. He gave to an awakened being, which is a very wholesome thing to do, but then he regretted it later out of stinginess." So he said the result of the gift was that he has wealth, but the result of the stinginess was that he couldn't enjoy it.

So the Buddha would talk about these things that he could see. He said that he could see the workings of karma in ways that we can't. And the range of mind of a Buddha is vast. So he pointed to these things, but it's not something that most of us can verify. So this is the area that's mysterious. We can't quite tell for ourselves whether it's true or not. But this is just one of six ways that we can see how our actions have consequences.

Mostly when people say "I don't believe in karma," they mean this sixth way. They can't see these mysterious workings. But we can all see the first five—the ways that our actions have results in our life.

In fact, the Buddha said you can't figure out the detailed workings of karma, how it unfolds in the future. It's one of four things he called imponderable. And he said that one who speculates about them will go mad and experience vexation. I'm not sure which order that's in, but either way—not a good idea.

Another thing that sometimes gets confusing about karma is that people try to use it to explain everything that happens. The Buddha was once asked, "Does all pleasant and painful feeling come from our own past actions?" It's another way to say, "Does everything that happens in your life come from your past actions?"

And he said that people who claim this don't know what they're talking about. You can't really say that because you can see there are other kinds of results that come from other sources in the world. He pointed to causes like illness, diet, climate, accident, and assault. He said you can see things are also caused by these forces. So it's not right to say that everything comes from past actions.

The way I would interpret that in modern terms is that karma is one law in our universe, but there are a number of other laws too. There are the laws of the physical world, laws of chemistry, laws of biology and genetics. So there are many different kinds of laws at work, one of which is the law of karma, but it doesn't deny the operation of the others.

Sometimes people use a current situation—like if you're struggling or have an illness—and they'll say, "What did I do in my past actions to bring this on?" We don't know that it has anything to do with our past actions. Bodies break down for their own reasons. We inherit certain tendencies of mind from our parents. We don't know it has anything to do with our actions.

This is like trying to use karma as a rearview mirror. Here's the present—what happened in the past? We can't do that. If you and I try, we're just making up speculation. We can't see. So don't even try. There's no point.

Where karma is useful is as a map to drive down the right road in the future. We have choices now. These are the ones we want to make based on the teachings on karma. We can't interpret the past—we don't know. So let's use it going forward. That's the skillful way.

Now I want to talk about how that works. This really comes to the idea of the relation of karma and emptiness. These two seem opposite at first. Let's take it as emptiness of self—karma and anatta. How can karma land when there's no self? There's no self doing the action. How can it land?

This was raised by a bhikkhu at the time of the Buddha. This monk asked the Buddha, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" The Buddha basically said, "You haven't been listening to me." That was really all he said. But this is the question, isn't it?

To approach this, the first thing to say is that the teaching on not-self doesn't deny individuality. There's Gil and there's Sally. They're not the same, and it's good that they understand that. Sally doesn't wear Gil's boots home tonight.

Gil doesn't drive Sally's car away after the retreat. That's very helpful. So the individuality is still here, but there's nothing fixed in the individual.

A useful way to understand this is through a term in some Buddhist traditions called the mind stream. It's said that every sentient being has a mind stream or is a mind stream. In this mind stream arise all the different sense impressions, thoughts, feelings, concentration states, meditative states, and so on. Each of our mind streams is somewhat different.

Like there's this little creek running down by the meditation hall. We could call this Dharma Hall Creek, and it has its own particular way of being. It's good to designate it. "I'll meet you by the Dharma Hall Creek." We can designate that—it's helpful. We know it's different from the Mississippi River. I'm not meeting you by the Mississippi River; I'm meeting you by the Dharma Hall Creek.

But if you go and look at the Dharma Hall Creek, there's this flowing body of water. That's really what a creek is—the flowing water. It's not the same from one second to the next. You never step in the same river twice. The water's always changing—new water all the time. But there's something about the form of it that has some constancy and consistency. It will change too as the rains get bigger or smaller, but there's some consistency to it.

Each of us is this stream of being, and particularly a stream of mind states. That's where karma is important—a flow of experience. It's tending in a certain direction, and this direction kind of describes our personality. What is personality? Isn't it the flow of thoughts and feelings and speech and action that each of us embodies? Isn't that basically what determines your personality—the way you think and feel and speak and act in the world? This sounds very much like karma: volitional formations of body, speech, and mind.

As I understand it, personality is basically just these karmic patterns that we have become habituated to, which have hardened into character, that repeat again and again, that we support and reinforce by our own choices and interests and tendencies. So personality is the sum of our karmic patterns. Always changing—sometimes generous, sometimes not; sometimes loving, sometimes not. Always changing, but personality is somewhat predictable. We each have our own grooves, you might say.

But within that flow of the mind stream, nothing is fixed. Nothing is fixed. It's always changing. Now, it's not so easy to change in big ways—that's why dharma practice takes so much work. That's why the Buddha put it this way: "Action makes the world go round." Here the word he's using is karma. "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action, like the chariot wheel by the pin."

You can feel this in practice—how these grooves that we've worn in the mind are very hard to unstick. We're bound by our past volitional actions, and it's hard to move out of them. But it's not impossible. Anything that's within the mind stream can be changed. Nothing is stuck in there.

Our dharma practice uses this principle for our transformation. Or another way to say it is: the path is a karmic unfolding. Our path unfolds by the principle of karma.

We come into practice carrying mostly unconscious tendencies of mind that have shaped our character in a particular direction. Our inner flow moves in a certain trajectory. Generally, for most of us entering the Dharma path, we're flowing toward Lake Samsara—cycling into birth again and again, not understanding, repeating unwise choices, heading inevitably toward that familiar destination of suffering and confusion.

But then we take up Dharma practice, and a whole new set of intentions begins entering this mind stream. We cultivate the intention toward mindfulness, toward loving kindness, toward wisdom. We develop intentions for renunciation, for stillness, for understanding. All these fresh intentions arise as we generate, strengthen, and repeat them moment after moment in our formal meditation practice and throughout daily life.

These new intentions flowing into our consciousness begin to change the entire karmic river we've been riding. They start to reorient the very direction of our stream. At first, this influx appears quite minor—it doesn't shift the overall current very much at all. But as these wholesome intentions build up and gain power, as we become more skilled and strong in our practice, they truly begin to alter both the direction and contents of our inner stream. Now it starts heading somewhere completely different: toward the nirvanic ocean. This is how our Dharma practice redirects us.

This entire transformation rests on understanding karma, because everything centers around our intention in this present moment. As we change our volitions, the direction of our stream—our life patterns, our very trajectory—becomes completely transformed. These new intentions can turn us around precisely because nothing in that original stream is solid or fixed. Yes, ignorance has been a major player. Yes, craving has dominated the flow. But these forces aren't permanently stuck there. Our fresh intentions can uproot these old patterns. We all know they have certainly weakened them for us, and eventually they can uproot them entirely, to the degree of complete liberation.

This is karma working through our practice.

The way it appears to me is this: you and I, all of us in life, are floating on a sea of constantly changing conditions. All the shifting circumstances of existence, internal and external—our inner world of emotions and thoughts, our outer world of relationships, livelihood, politics, environment, ecological developments. We're exposed to all these changing situations over which we have very little control.

So we drift on this sea which contains many aspects of chaos. The world doesn't always function well. The environment doesn't always support us. We remain exposed, vulnerable to countless forces and changes. Everything seems rather chaotic, with no clear sanctuary in sight.

Yet we possess one navigating tool on this uncertain sea: our intention. Intention serves as our rudder, the one instrument that can steer our boat through all these shifting and unpredictable conditions. When we align our intention with the principles of Dharma—with the principles of wisdom—that boat heads toward safe harbor.

So we begin cultivating those intentions I mentioned: mindfulness, loving-kindness, wisdom, compassion, simplicity, generosity. These lead us in the right direction.

There's a dialogue with a teacher I mentioned earlier, Nisargadatta Maharaj, who works primarily through direct conversation with students. Someone was discussing with him their sense of direction in life, their destiny. Maharaj responded, "Your own will was the backbone of your destiny."

The person replied, "Surely karma interfered." This reflects the common understanding in India that past actions push us in certain directions beyond our immediate choosing.

Maharaj's response was profound in its simplicity: "Karma shapes the circumstances. The attitudes are your own."

"Ultimately your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character." This is the profound message of karma. We take up skillful intentions that form our character, and these have amazing consequences in our life.

If you've been practicing Dharma for some time, you've probably witnessed this yourself. Did you make all those positive changes happen? Are all those positive changes only in your inner life? Or do you see positive changes in your relationships and your circumstances? I believe our Dharma practice truly impacts our outer life as well. It takes time—it doesn't happen overnight—but I have deep faith that this inner development expresses itself outwardly as well.

This is the promise of karma. It can steer us to happiness, it can steer us to refuge, and it can steer us in the end to freedom.

The Buddha spoke of this liberation in some of his more enigmatic quotations, where he talks about awakening as being synonymous with the end of karma. In the Anguttara Nikaya, he says: "These four types of karma have been understood, realized, and made known by me. Which four? There is karma that is dark with dark result, karma that is bright with bright result, karma that is dark and bright with dark and bright result, and karma that is neither dark nor bright with neither dark nor bright result, leading to the end of karma."

What is he talking about?

As I understand it, karma that is dark comes from unwholesome motivations—greed, hatred, confusion, cruelty. Karma that is bright is action done willfully with the motivation of moving toward the positive: generosity, loving-kindness, positive actions inspired by the wish to do good. Then there's action that's mixed—you give somebody a gift, but you want recognition back. That's dark and bright together.

Then there's this karma that is neither dark nor bright with results that are neither dark nor bright, leading to the end of karma. The end of karma is a synonym for liberation, for arahantship. The Buddha said that the fully awakened one has come to the end of karma.

So what is this karma that is neither dark nor bright? The Buddha explains: "It is the volition to abandon the dark karma with dark results, to abandon the bright karma with bright results, and to abandon the dark and bright karma with dark and bright results."

This means at some point—and this is my interpretation, as it's not spelled out so clearly—we stop trying to do anything at all. We definitely don't want to do harm, but in the refinement and subtlety of meditation, we also stop trying to cultivate beautiful states like generosity and loving-kindness, and of course, anything mixed. We're abandoning volition. We're letting go of individual will. We're not calculating our life at that point. We're opening up to the fullness of not-doing, letting the stream of Dharma carry us wherever it will.

That is the Eightfold Path.

The Noble Eightfold Path, as I understand it in its refinement and depth, is a way of deeply letting go of personal desire and action based on personal interest. It's such a complete letting go that it opens into the profound stillness of awakening from a place of great trust and non-doing—the end of karma.

But it remains something of a mystery. So let's sit for just a moment with that mystery: the karma that is neither dark nor bright, with neither dark nor bright results, leading to the end of karma is just this Noble Eightfold Path.

Thank you for your attention.

CHAPTER 116

Brahmavihāras: Mettā

In this dharma talk from a February retreat, Guy Armstrong introduces the four brahmavihāras—the divine abidings that the Buddha repeatedly emphasized as essential for spiritual development. These heart practices are mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), mudita (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity). Armstrong explains how these complement vipassanā practice, with the Buddha describing two types of disciples: dhamma followers (wisdom types) and faith followers (heart types).

The talk focuses on mettā practice, which cultivates unconditional caring without seeking anything in return. Following traditional methodology, practitioners begin where it's easiest—with oneself and a benefactor—before extending to more challenging relationships. Armstrong guides the cultivation of mettā through four traditional phrases covering safety, happiness, health, and ease of living. He emphasizes that mettā doesn't require intense emotion but rather sincere caring, and practitioners should trust the process rather than forcing feelings.

The session includes practical guidance on working with resistance, selecting appropriate benefactors, and maintaining steady practice even when feelings fluctuate. Armstrong addresses common challenges like self-judgment and the complexity of adult relationships, offering skillful alternatives such as visualizing people as children or switching to compassion practice when difficult images arise.

So we're beginning today this afternoon practice, which we'll do every day, of a guided meditation in one of the four Brahmavihāras, or in English, the divine abidings.

These are four states of mind that the Buddha talked about again and again in the texts as important to cultivate as an aid to our overall development in the Dharma. And these four qualities—we'll have time to explore all of them for a little while in the month of February. Normally, if you go on a shorter retreat of seven days, you just have time to go through one. It's usually loving kindness. But because we have four weeks, we'll go through all four.

We're going to spend more time on the first one, which is loving kindness. The Pali word is mettā. Actually, we call it "metta," but that's a mispronunciation. It's "mettā." So those of you who are living in the first dorm, you are in Mettā. It's even sweeter than "metta," isn't it? Kind of has a nice ring. But because we're so used to the English pronunciation, I'll probably just call it metta.

And the second of the four is compassion. The Pali word is karuṇā. The third is appreciative joy or muditā. And the fourth is equanimity or upekkhā. So we named these four residence halls after these divine abidings. We could have named them after the four noble truths—dukkha and taṇhā—but we thought that wouldn't be as appealing.

So these are the four practices. The first three are very strong heart practices: loving kindness, compassion, and joy. The fourth is the balancing factor or strengthening factor that's really the foundation for the other three. It's a cooler quality emotionally, but it's very important as a way to hold the opening of the heart.

We really recommend these practices as a complement to the Vipassana practice. And some people will find they love these practices more than the insight practice. The Buddha talked about two kinds of disciples. He said there are those who are Dhamma followers—we could say wisdom types—and there are those who are faith followers, and you might say faith or heart types.

In our tradition, the wisdom practice, the Dhamma practice is Vipassana, this development of clear seeing of the way things are, and it's the one that frees the mind. The heart qualities are really important also for our development because they lend a sweet quality to our experience of life. And they give the mind the strength or the confidence or the buoyancy that lets us let go. And it's the letting go that opens us to insight. So the Vipassana practice and the Brahmavihāra practices really support one another and make a good combination as we walk this whole path.

For the first two weeks of February, we're going to focus on the development of loving kindness through the cultivation of this quality of mettā.

Mettā, as many of you know, is a kind of love that's not self-centered. So it's a kind of caring for ourselves and others that isn't looking for something back. You know, with romantic love, there's a wish for something in return. And if that something isn't forthcoming, the romantic love tends to stop. But this altruistic caring of mettā cares about others without putting strings on it, without asking for conditions. So we say sometimes it's an unconditional caring for ourselves and for others.

It's intended to be developed and felt for all beings everywhere. We'll get to this point, but we'll work up to it. Traditionally, we work up to it through several different categories of individuals before we open to all beings everywhere. So we'll probably spend the first week and a half working with different individuals on the way to all beings.

The recommendation is, with all the Brahmavihāras, start where it's easy. Isn't that a nice relief? Vipassana often seems like we have to go into the hardest stuff first before we get to the dessert. But with the Brahmavihāras, go where it's easiest first and use that as the foundation to work to where it's more difficult.

So in the teachings of the tradition, the person who it's generally easiest to care about is oneself. So that's where we'll start. We'll start by sending the caring to ourselves. Then who's next easiest? Someone who's just been generally very kind to us. And this is the person that we're going to call the benefactor. So these are the two people that we'll bring into the meditation today: ourselves and the benefactor. And I'll explain each of them in a little detail how to practice with this.

Even though it's said in the tradition that self is the easiest, often when we do this practice, we find self is the hardest.

Because as we tend to feel caring or loving towards ourselves, all the reasons we're not lovable can come to the front. Objections come and reservations come, and we hold back from a real sense of tenderness for ourselves. So we want to put some extra time and effort into this developing of loving kindness for ourselves. We'll recommend that you include it in every period, even as we go through the different categories up to all beings.

So what is this quality and how do we develop it? Basically, as you start to care for somebody, what you find is you hope for their welfare. That's kind of the essence of caring—you wish for the person's welfare. If you have a sincere wish that someone be well, whether it's yourself or another, that is the essence of loving kindness.

We'll develop this quality by repeating phrases that express that wish in different ways. Some of you may already have very established phrases for loving kindness. It's fine to use those. If you don't, then we'll recommend that you start with some form of the traditional phrases.

There are four traditional phrases that are used to develop this sense of caring. They can be applied to you or to anybody. The first is you take a look at the person's situation in life and you hope that they're not in danger. How are we in danger? We can get harmed from outside or we could harm ourselves from within. The difficult and dark places that our own minds go to are generally more harmful to us than what happens to us day by day from other people. So this wish for safety is felt by everyone and it applies to both external safety and internal safety.

Second area that we look at is someone's overall sense of mental well-being. You could say their quality of happiness. If you want yourself and your friends to be well, you wish for their mental well-being or their happiness.

Third, you wish for their physical well-being. You hope that they're not ill or injured or suffering a lot of physical pain.

And fourth, we hope that people find their way in the world easily. In terms of making a living, being able to support yourself, having supportive relationships of friends and family, you hope that goes well for people.

So these are the four areas that the traditional phrases of loving kindness will cover. As we get into the meditation, I'll suggest some different ways that you can say these four wishes.

The beautiful thing about these four phrases that we'll offer in variation is they apply to everyone. They apply to all human beings and they apply to all non-human beings. You can think about the squirrels that you see running up the trees and you can wish these same four things for them. You can think about beings on other planes, if that's part of your view of the cosmos, and you can have these same four wishes for them. So they're very universal.

As you get familiar with the phrases and how they apply to every being, you start to see that we all really want the same things. All beings everywhere have these same basic wishes. So this universal nature of our aspiration is something that joins us with all of life.

The practices of the Brahma Viharas are considered very uniting. They take away all kinds of divisions—divisions based on age or race or gender or class or part of the world that one lives in or ethnicity, even the differences between human and animal start to get worn away as we see we all want the same things: safety, happiness, health, and ease.

So these are the four things we'll focus on in the traditional phrases. As I said, if you have phrases you're already comfortable with, you don't need to change them. But these four phrases are good phrases. They've been used for 2,500 years, and they work. So they come with that endorsement.

The feeling of loving kindness doesn't have to be a very strong one. Sometimes people think, well, if I'm going to be becoming more loving, I have to have a really strong, passionate feeling for someone to say that I feel loving kindness. But it's not like that. It can be a little flicker of just sincere caring. I just care that you're well. That's the beginning. It can grow to be much stronger, but it doesn't need to be.

So as we do the meditation, which we'll do by repeating these four phrases again and again, don't try to push your heart into feeling anything. Trust in the practice and let whatever feeling comes, let it come. It will grow in its own due course.

The head already puts a lot of pressure on the heart to feel certain emotions and not to feel others. In the loving kindness practice, we want to give ourselves lots of care also. Part of that is don't put pressure on your heart.

As you repeat these phrases, let the words settle into your heart rather than just passing through your mind. Feel the quality of intention behind each wish.

May I be happy and peaceful.

And here you can think of happiness in whatever way feels natural to you - perhaps a sense of contentment, or joy, or simply the absence of suffering.

May I be healthy and strong.

This includes not just physical health, but mental and emotional well-being as well.

May I live with ease.

May the difficulties of life not overwhelm me. May I find a way to move through challenges with grace.

Continue repeating these phrases at your own pace, letting them resonate in your heart center. If your mind wanders to other thoughts, that's completely natural. Simply notice where it went and gently bring your attention back to the phrases and the intention of caring for yourself.

You might find that certain phrases feel more natural or meaningful than others. Feel free to emphasize those, or to modify the language slightly if that helps the meaning come alive for you. The traditional phrases are: "May I be happy, may I be healthy, may I be safe, may I live with ease." But you can also use phrases like "May I be at peace" or "May I be free from suffering."

The key is finding words that genuinely express your wish for your own well-being. Don't worry if you don't feel a strong emotional response right away. Sometimes the practice works more quietly, planting seeds that will blossom later. Trust the process and simply maintain the intention of kindness toward yourself.

As we continue, notice any resistance that might arise. Sometimes we find it difficult to offer ourselves the same kindness we would readily give to others. If you notice self-criticism or the voice that says you don't deserve happiness, simply acknowledge those thoughts with compassion and return to the phrases. This resistance is normal and part of what we're working with in this practice.

Let the rhythm of the phrases create a gentle, soothing quality in your mind. Like a lullaby of loving wishes for yourself.

May you live with ease.

So we're expressing the same wishes for wellbeing, but now directing them toward this person who has shown us kindness. As you repeat the phrases, notice how it feels to send these good wishes to someone you care about. Often there's a natural warmth that arises, a sense of genuine care flowing from your heart to theirs.

And just as with the self-directed practice, after completing a round of phrases, pause and return your attention to the heart center. Feel the resonance in your body of having sent loving wishes to your benefactor. Notice what emotions are present—perhaps gratitude, affection, or simply a quiet sense of connection.

Sometimes with the benefactor, the loving kindness flows quite easily. This person has earned a place in your heart through their kindness, and it feels natural to wish them well. Other times, you might notice thoughts arising about their current circumstances, worries about challenges they're facing, or even guilt about not being in closer contact. Whatever arises is perfectly normal. Simply return to the phrases, trusting in the power of your sincere intention to wish them well.

The benefactor stage serves as a bridge in our practice. We move from the sometimes challenging territory of self-love to the more accessible realm of caring for someone who has cared for us. This helps establish the feeling of metta more strongly in our system before we venture into more challenging categories of beings.

Take your time with the benefactor. Let yourself really feel what it's like to send loving wishes to someone who has been good to you. This feeling of warmth and care that you cultivate here becomes the foundation for extending metta more widely. We're strengthening the muscle of loving kindness, learning to access and direct this natural capacity of the heart.

May you live with ease.

And just continuing to repeat these phrases directed toward your benefactor. Try to stay connected to the sense of your benefactor's presence. Sometimes if the phrases are getting a little dry or impersonal, then renew your connection to the benefactor—bring them to mind again, see their image, hear their voice. So you really feel the wishes are directed to this particular being.

Remember that metta is not about necessarily feeling a strong emotion so much as having a sincere wish for the other's welfare.

May all beings be safe from harm.
May all beings be happy.
May all beings be healthy.
May all beings live with ease.

So these are the basics of the loving kindness practice. If you find it helpful, you can bring it in throughout the day in any sitting. You could do ten or fifteen minutes. You might take one sitting a day where you do the whole period of loving kindness. It can be a very helpful mood softener.

Even as you're starting a Vipassana sit, just remembering that the intention is really to be kind and take care of ourselves can bring a softer attitude as we go into the mindfulness practice. So you can experiment a little bit with combining these, and we'll do a guided meditation every day at this time and then bring it in throughout the day if it's helpful for you.

At this time, we have some time for questions. A lot of you have heard and done much metta instruction and practice and may prefer to go to walking. So if you'd like to just stay quiet and begin the walking, please feel free to go. If there are questions, we can take a few minutes for those.

So the question is, could I say something about grace and its connection with ease? And the second is, are these being recorded?

The second is easier. Some of them are being recorded. Max is going to be here some afternoons to record, and they will be available later. What I think we'll try to do is record every time we add a new category. Like today we did self and benefactor, and we'll do this for a couple of days. So the instructions won't change so much for a couple of days. Then we'll add another category and another category. So we'll try to record the changes. Most of it hopefully will be recorded.

Grace is a word that isn't used a lot in Buddhism, but I like the answer that I think it was Sasaki Roshi who gave. He said something like, in regards to grace, God has already done his part and now the rest is up to us. So that's one angle.

Another angle is that by putting our sincere energy into our practice, good things happen for reasons that we can't always explain. And so by setting the seeds of our good intentions, grace follows based on that. So I think this particular practice is a really good way to invite the quality of grace.

Traditional metta has brought me joy when directed to myself—it feels good and nice. However, right now there's something I want so badly for my physical health that when I did the four phrases and got to "may I be healthy," even though I'm generally healthy, there's something I really want for my physical health. Instead of it feeling good, I feel myself constricting. I know I also want to accept things just as they are, but at the same time, I notice my wish for my physical health becomes permeated with grasping, and I wonder what you could suggest about working with constriction and attachment.

This is such a beautiful and honest question. What you're describing is exactly the dharma in action—you're seeing how desire and attachment work, how they create suffering even in the context of a loving practice.

It's a good question. When she practices the phrase for health, instead of feeling caring, it reminds her of something she's concerned about regarding her physical condition, bringing up worry and anxiety rather than the intended loving-kindness.

This can actually happen with any of the phrases. I've known people who, when they make the wish for safety, find memories arising of times they didn't feel safe, or become aware of current situations where they feel vulnerable. When this occurs, it's better to find a different phrase.

You could either skip that particular phrase on health, or use something that cultivates acceptance of present conditions. One alternative people have found helpful is "may I live in harmony with this body." This invites the mind toward equanimity and opens us to accepting things as they are right now.

I'd suggest either approach—find a phrase that genuinely brings equanimity and acceptance, or simply focus on the other three phrases. Both are skillful responses.

Another participant raised a fascinating question about wishing all beings to be safe and happy, noting that in nature, many beings need to eat other beings to survive. Sharks, for instance, aren't going to be healthy without consuming other creatures. How do we reconcile this with our loving-kindness practice when the happiness of some beings requires the death of others?

This touches on why equanimity serves as the necessary foundation for all the Brahmaviharas. When we contemplate sharks eating seals, it can bring up worry, reservation, and certainly compassion. There are several skillful ways to work with this.

One approach is to develop greater trust in our equanimity around such situations, accepting that this is simply how nature functions without seeking a final resolution. Another is to let these images guide us naturally from metta to compassion practice. If the image of a shark eating a seal arises, we can extend compassion to the seal, and perhaps even to the shark—after all, it's not particularly pleasant to survive by killing others.

When disturbing situations arise during metta practice, we hope our equanimity can hold them, but if it's not quite steady, moving consciously to compassion is perfectly appropriate. Then we can deliberately turn our attention to beings who don't harm others in order to be happy, changing our focus rather than wrestling with an unresolvable logical dilemma.

There's no perfect philosophical solution to this aspect of existence, but there are practical ways to work skillfully with it. I'd recommend the practical approach, remaining open to how your relationship with these realities might evolve over time. It is indeed a heart-wrenching truth of animal existence.

A participant shared a beautiful insight about working with resistance toward adults. She noticed that when sending loving-kindness to adults, complicated relationships sometimes create obstacles. However, when she envisions them as children, her heart naturally expands with pure caring. She finds the same openness when seeing the child within herself during self-directed practice.

This is actually quite skillful. Many of us can more easily access unconditional caring when we see the innocent child within the adult. There are several ways to work with this recognition.

In about ten days, we'll explore the "difficult person" category, where we deliberately choose a complicated relationship and practice extending sincere caring to that individual. When we can find genuine metta for one challenging person, it demonstrates the possibility of extending it to others with whom we have complex dynamics. So there's real value in occasionally staying with the difficult adult relationship, even when the loving-kindness doesn't flow easily.

At the same time, it's perfectly fine to shift perspective and see them as a child, allowing that pure form of metta to flow through. Both approaches have merit, and we simply acknowledge that some adult relationships carry complexity that affects our practice.

They're going to take a bit of work, and so we're going to put in the work and see if it can shift. This is one of the beautiful uses of this practice. Once we discover the power of this tool of loving kindness, we can use the formal meditation to transform these complicated relationships.

Because ordinarily, the wish for the other's happiness isn't the first thing on our mind when we relate to them. But we find if we can tune into their welfare and our wish for their welfare and come from that place, it can completely change the quality of the relationship. And then they start to feel it too. That's what's remarkable about these things. As we change inwardly toward a difficult person, they start to feel it and they change in relationship to us.

So that's one way to go. The second way, as you mentioned, is to think of them as a child. Another way is to think of their suffering, and it moves into more of a compassion flavor than a metta flavor. You could still use the metta phrases, but you focus on their suffering or pain, and what comes through is more compassion—but it's still a way to hold them.

And the fourth approach, which is what I usually recommend, is to go to someone easier. So at this point, if you're engaged and the person you bring in is complicated, go where it's simplest. Benefactor, good friend—and we'll get to the difficult relationships a little later. Thank you. It's a great thing to work with.

Maybe time for one more. Was there a question? Yes.

Just kind of a utilitarian question. After repeating the phrases twice, he felt he was done. Should he keep repeating even though he doesn't really have much feeling with it?

And the answer is, yes. I did this practice—I've done this several times on six-week retreats where this was all I did for six weeks, was repeat these phrases all day long, in sitting, in walking, in meals, in showering. The feeling keeps changing. That's the beauty of it. Impermanence manifests through this practice all the time.

So it may go flat for a little while, but then it will wake up again, and it'll get stronger, and it'll get really strong, and then it'll go flat again. And then we want to give up, but we just keep going. And then it wakes up again and it gets strong again. So the steadiness with keeping the phrases going is an interesting way to look at what the heart does with that.

Because the heart keeps opening and closing. And it's one of the things we learn. I don't know of any heart that stays open all the time. So I think its rhythm is that it opens and there's metta feeling. Then it closes for a while and things are neutral. And then we keep going and it opens again.

So for me, it's really interesting watching the seasons of the heart as we just keep steady with our effort in saying the phrases. And it becomes interesting to watch how they change and how our response changes. Yeah, I encourage you to just try it. Just try it.

Okay, so it's quarter to five. We have thirty minutes of walking before tea. And so I hope you'll take the metta with you as you walk. Walk happily. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 117

Self and Proliferation

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the deep psychological mechanisms behind our mental restlessness and proliferative thinking. Drawing primarily from the Honeyball Sutta (MN 18), he traces how perception leads to thinking, then to mental proliferation (papañca) - the endless elaboration of thoughts that keeps us trapped in cycles of craving and aversion. Armstrong connects this process to the three kilesas (greed, aversion, delusion) and explains how our attempts to construct a solid sense of self through these mental formations actually create the very insecurity we seek to escape. He offers practical insight into how mindfulness can interrupt this cycle by meeting experiences directly without the overlay of past conditioning and future projections. The talk emphasizes how touching the silence beyond proliferation gives us a taste of the unconditioned peace that leads toward liberation, making this essential listening for understanding the mechanics of suffering and the path to freedom.

I want to start from the theme that Heather talked about the other night, which is how we go on and on with our thoughts based on some kind of non-acceptance of the basic situation that we find ourselves in and how we can put a period to that—not do that any more than needed.

Tonight I just want to look a little more deeply into the dynamics of that situation of running on with our thinking and what's involved. Because I think that it's closely related to our sense of a self.

You know, the Buddha said that the sense of an I is not intrinsic to our experience as a human being in a body, but rather it's something we construct and create out of our own thoughts and views and beliefs. And that when we strongly affirm and believe in this sense of self, it constitutes a kind of bondage.

And you can feel this in a moment-to-moment way in your practice. We've probably all touched to some extent an experience where we realize that our nature includes this vast awareness, limitless awareness, that can be filled with a sense of boundless loving kindness directed to all beings. But how often do we live there? And what takes us out of that boundlessness? Something keeps shrinking the consciousness back in and closing us up in some kind of contraction.

And when we look at this, what creates this contraction, it's usually around some sense of I and me and mine and some concern about self. So we can take a look at this dynamic—the times in the day when we're open in this very unbounded way, and then the ways that we feel that narrowing and constriction due to the interests of self. What's going on with that?

And I think that when we start to look at this dynamic closely, we'll see that we generate this small sense of self again and again and again. It's not intrinsic to our momentary experience, but we recreate it over and over with pretty predictable ways of thinking and feeling. Each of us has our own particular patterns and tendencies of our personality, but we each have some that generate this small sense of self in rather expectable ways again and again.

So I want to look a little bit tonight at how that sense of self gets built up and constructed and what keeps it going.

In one way, the Buddha's description of our situation in that constriction is very simple. Here's one quotation: "Nothing whatever is worth clinging to. One who has heard this has heard all the dharmas. One who has practiced this has practiced all the dharmas." Sounds simple, right?

Or the second and third noble truths: The cause of suffering is craving. The end of suffering is the end of craving. Wow, that's just craving and clinging. That's all I have to deal with.

But it's complicated because these operate on so many subtle levels and layers and get into every facet of our life and our personality and our heart and our mind and our body and our relationships and our work and everything that it generates quite a tangle. The Buddha talked about this again and again—the tangle that has to be unraveled for us to come to freedom.

So the mechanisms of our suffering are actually quite complex. And yet we have the ability through meditation to understand them and to see them. All the Buddha's basic teachings are pointing to this tangle and the threads that make it up.

So if you look into the Four Noble Truths, dependent origination, karma, not-self, becoming, the five aggregates, the end of karma and nibbana, they're all about this central dilemma of how we keep constricting through this sense of self and how we can open and release into the space of freedom. So all these basic teachings are connected.

So I'm going to talk about a number of them tonight as we explore this formation.

I want to start with something that Heather talked about, about how active our minds are when we find ourselves in retreat. Probably most of us have come out of pretty busy lives. I've heard a number of reports in the first days about people being tired because life was so busy and catching up on sleep and feeling exhausted. And that's normal for early days of the retreat.

So most of us come out of pretty busy lives and we come here. And then all of a sudden, all that doing and planning and creating and constructing isn't needed anymore. Right? Does the mind know that? Just because the outer activity stops, does the mind stop? Not usually.

Along with the reports of sleepiness, the most common other hindrance reported is restlessness. Restlessness. So in between the periods of fatigue and sleepiness, the mind is sort of going at quite a high rate. You know, probably pretty similar to the way it was going when we were out in our life last week. Things are starting to slow down now—I'm hearing this in the interviews also—but it's taken a while.

So we come into this situation where we can drop our outer doing, but there's this momentum built up in our mental activity and in thinking and planning and so forth that doesn't stop, even though it's no longer needed, even though it's no longer necessary. Why is that? Why can't we just say, mind quiet down? I don't need you right now.

Let me just sit here peacefully and enjoy my meditation. Why does this engine keep on running and running and running?

There seems to be some momentum there, and I think that momentum is not just random or accidental. I think there are deep forces in the heart and mind that are driving it. So we want to look into that.

Now, I'm not suggesting that your goal in meditation should be to stop all thoughts. First, it's not possible. Second, it's not necessary. So please don't interpret this as saying no thought should arise for a good meditator. That's not what I'm saying.

But there's a difference between a thought arising, being seen and let go of, and plunging into the swirl of mental activity, taking hold of it, engaging and furthering it. That's the activity that we don't need to do. We don't need to keep energizing those thoughts and driving them forward and buying into the storm that they create. That's a level of doing that isn't necessary.

So thought can arise, pass away—no problem. No problem for a meditator. But this active engagement in the thinking process based on past and future causes us to lose our mindfulness. We get lost in the created fiction of that conceptual world. And so this is what we want to look into. Where is this coming from? And is it necessary, or is it possible to stop that kind of doing, that level of activity?

This stopping of doing activity—or you could call it non-doing—is quite a high value in Buddhism and in meditation. This is something that we want to explore. Of course, we need to do in daily life, physically. How much we need to think about it ahead of time is a matter for some refinement. But here in meditation, we don't need to do a whole lot. When you're sitting on the cushion, when you're walking back and forth, not much thinking is needed to do that. And so is it possible to find some non-doing in these simple activities? And if we can, there's a real sense of freedom in it.

Some of my friendships in the Dharma go back quite a few years. In my early days at IMS, I was on staff there for a couple of years with good friends like Carol Wilson and Rodney Smith and Steve Armstrong. In those early years, we were doing a staff retreat. We took a two-week period and the staff went into retreat while other people cooked for us. One year, Steve exercised some of his free time to create this brochure for IMS—a parody kind of brochure.

The symbol on the front of it was a Dharma wheel with eight spokes. It said "Insight Meditation Society" and advertised the advantages of coming on retreat: "No talking, no swimming, no eating afternoon, no golf and no tennis." It said, "The vacation of your dreams!" in that style. But what I remember best about it was the motto on the front cover of the brochure, where Steve said, "It's better to do nothing than to waste time."

So this is kind of our goal as meditators—to do nothing. And it's not as easy as it sounds. We can stop doing with our body, but we keep doing with our minds. So what would it mean to stop doing with our minds?

Just as an indication of the value of this, I want to mention a young Tibetan Lama who I've met and practiced with a couple of times named Mingyur Rinpoche. I think he's now about thirty-six years old. A few years ago, he was in the midst of building a very large worldwide organization. He had a center in the U.S. based in Minneapolis, a center in Asia based in Hong Kong. He has in Asia several monasteries, hundreds of monks and nuns, lay students across Asia, and thousands of students here in America and Europe. He's a very respected young Lama.

He did his first three-year retreat at age thirteen. At that age, he felt a strong draw toward meditation. He asked his father for approval—his father was a famous Tibetan Lama also—and received his approval.

So Mingyur Rinpoche went into retreat at age 13. He completed that retreat and at age 16 he said, "It's not enough. I want to do another." So he signed up for another three-year retreat at age 16. About a year into that retreat, the head teacher, the retreat master, died. What were they going to do? Cancel the three-year retreat, or find another leader?

One of the heads of his lineage, a very senior monk, said, "We'll pick a new retreat master, and it will be Mingyur Rinpoche"—who was 17 years old at that time. That's the kind of background and stature he has within the Tibetan community—highly respected from a very young age.

After he finished his retreat practice, he went into something like nine years of formal monastic studies, developing a very deep philosophical training as well. He has a broad vision for bringing meditation into the world in the West and Asia, not only through monasteries but to lay people. He has active programs in education and hospitals and a great vision of outreach.

Through his personal magnetism, he had attracted many students and created two large organizations. They were flourishing with retreats and teachings and books and videotapes. This was all in full swing when he announced, "I want to do another three-year retreat."

His students and administrators were very supportive because they know how much practice means to him. They prepared to cover all the activities of the organizations while he went away for three years. About a year and a half ago, he took off for another three-year retreat. As far as I know, no one I know has seen him since. He's wandering somewhere between India and Nepal and maybe Kashmir, practicing in remote mountain hermitages.

Why would a young, budding lama, growing in stature internationally, leave all his worldly activities like that? Because the value of stopping is so important. The value of retiring into seclusion—which you all have here—to do that inner work of ceasing and developing the mind and heart. It was such a strong draw, he left all that aside for three years.

This quality of non-doing is very highly regarded in all the Buddhist traditions. In appreciation of it, we want to look into the energy behind our own doing. What is it that drives all this mental activity? Is all this activity of the mind just a random vestige, like an appendix that doesn't mean much anymore? Or is there something significant going on? Is there some deeper fuel for this engine?

I want to suggest that there is. I think it's quite significant, all this activity.

The way I see the situation is that all of us at some point in the past have had a glimpse of the underlying uncertainty of human life, of all sentient life. We've seen the nature of change, the light or empty nature of the world and our senses. We've intuited on some level that there's nothing very reliable there that we can take hold of and hold onto. The world isn't solid in the way that we often assume it to be. I think we all know that on some level.

As a defense against seeing that deep nature of change and the lack of solidity and substance outwardly, I think we've all tried to create it inwardly by constructing a solid sense of self. If we have a sense that there's an "I" somewhere in here that goes on and on over time, that seems to provide some continuity that the outside world can't offer. This tries to create a sense of security that we haven't been able to find externally.

I think we have all constructed what we hope will be an inner refuge against the incessant waves of change that life presents—through some sense of ongoing identity, a continuing sense of self or "I."

Let's take a look at some of the details. How would one go about constructing such a thing? How would one feed a self like that?

Well, one of the things we notice is the "I" likes pleasure and doesn't like pain. So one of the ways we can feed it is to keep giving it pleasure and keep the pain away. Then this "I" seems to be somewhat safe. But how reliable is that strategy? Can you always do that? Of course not. We can't always do it, but we keep trying.

So we keep looking to adjust what life is presenting to us to keep this self fed and secure. We have three main strategies for doing it, which the Buddha pointed to again and again and again. The first strategy is the force of desire.

The word that's often used in translation is greed. It's a translation of the Pali word lobha. And that is the tendency of mind that keeps trying to get pleasure coming our way.

The second tendency is called aversion or dosa in Pali. It expresses itself in two ways. There's an aggressive form of dosa, which pushes away the unpleasant. And there's an avoidance form of dosa which shrinks from the unpleasant. One might be called anger, one might be called fear. So together those are our ways, our strategies for separating ourselves from the unpleasant.

And the third piece that's needed to keep the rest in place is not looking at it too closely. And this is the operation of delusion or in Pali, moha. Because if we look too closely at what we were doing, we would see it doesn't really work and it doesn't make sense. And that would undermine the whole project of self.

So these three things go together. The Buddha called these the three kilesas, roots of the unwholesome: greed, aversion, and delusion. And together they constitute the enterprise of self. And they underlie all this unconscious doing that we keep engaging in again and again and again.

So this doing is not just an accidental or random thing, but it's an outgrowth of these very deep forces connected with our search for security. But this search for security inwardly, through feeding the self, through constructing an ongoing self, also isn't truly successful. Because the inner landscape is changing also and we can't control the outer. But we keep trying because we haven't really examined the nature of our activity. We haven't examined these movements of greed, aversion and delusion. So we keep trying to fix life. Again and again and again, make it a little bit better.

So the Tibetans have a saying that the essence of samsara, which is this endless cycle of taking birth and dying—which can be understood on a life, death, rebirth, and a new life level, or can be understood as the creation of a new self moment to moment. Either way you want to understand samsara is fine. The essence of samsara is trying to correct. We keep trying to fix life, to align with this project of self.

So it's why our sittings aren't always so peaceful. You know, we want the body to feel a little more comfortable, or we want to push away the pain that's come into the shoulder. Or we want to recapture that peaceful sitting that we had earlier in the day. Or we want to feel again this really beautiful loving kindness that we had for our benefactor. Or we don't want to feel some fear or anxiety that's surfacing in the moment. And so we keep trying to make things just a little better, just a little better. We keep fussing with and tinkering with our basic experience moment after moment after moment. And all that doing, based on greed, aversion, delusion, blocks the sense of peace. We don't know how to stop it, because this project has such deep roots and we've put so much into it, it keeps going from a lot of momentum.

This ongoing activity we're engaged in comes from a deep motivation. And because the factor of motivation is there, it connects with the Buddha's teaching on karma. Karma just means action out of a motivation, out of an intention. And the compulsive nature of these activities is born from the intentions of greed, aversion, and delusion.

And when we look at them closely, we'll see that all these thoughts that keep running, running, running, running, running are mostly about I, me and mine. And they're not always so important. You know, we can get quite involved with really minor thoughts and then we can neglect sort of other big areas. Did you spend very much time today worrying about the global economy? Or the unemployment rate, which is currently at 7.9% in the United States? Or the 5 million people who are about to have their homes foreclosed because of the banking crisis of a few years ago? I mean, those issues are a bit larger than most of the concerns we go on and on about. But we go on and on about them because they're my concerns. So this is kind of the nature of our inner dialogue. When we stop and slow down physically, we start to hear it.

Ajahn Amaro kind of captured this contrast in a really beautiful talk title. He gave a talk on becoming, and it was subtitled, "Why Public Speaking is More Terrifying Than Worldwide Nuclear Destruction." Because it's about me.

So we have this dilemma. I mean, it really is, it's our existential dilemma as people. There is this underlying openness in existence.

And part of that openness is a lack of permanence, a lack of solidity. And yet we have this quest for security. The human heart is not happy in lack of security and has this deep urge to find it.

And just a postscript while we're on this topic: the Buddha considered that his path led to true security. So it's not the case that there is no security in life, but there is no security in the changing elements of conditioned existence. This hunger for security is answered through the fulfillment of the path. That's why he called the goal a refuge. But it is not found through the construction of self or through the changing elements of existence.

So once we've embarked on the creation of this self, we need to define ourselves in a certain way to give our personality a sense of continuity. We construct a self-image or self-view, a belief in who we are. And in order to maintain it, we have to take the events of the day and sweep them into our self-view. This is another part of what the activity is about.

Something happens to us during the day and we affirm, "Yes, that confirms my sense of being unworthy," or "That confirms my sense of never getting a fair deal in life," or "That confirms my sense of being better than everybody else here, of being smarter or more compassionate or something." So we take the events of the day and we reconstruct the self on those events to match who we take ourselves to be. And those patterns are fairly predictable because who we take ourselves to be needs to be ongoing.

This is summed up in a really nice quotation. This quotation has been attributed to the Buddha. I've never found it in the texts and I don't believe it's there, but let's pretend that it is because it's a great quotation: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit and habit hardens into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

I'm going to read it again because there's an important point here: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit and habit hardens into character. Therefore watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

So we have all shaped and we are all shaping our character out of our thoughts and our intentions and our actions. And then that becomes the person that we take ourselves to be. This aspect of character then feeds into our personality view, our self-image, who we think we are. So our own actions shape the mind and then that mind takes a momentum that carries forward even when it's not appropriate.

I remember early in my practice, I was doing a three-month retreat in the summer in England. It was at the retreat center that was the precursor to Gaia House, the first Gaia House. It was in Wiltshire before Gaia House was bought in Devon. It's actually where Sally and I met. She was managing the retreat, and I came to sit for the summer, and that's how we got to know each other.

So I was a yogi there. And England in the summer can be really beautiful, as you may know. One evening, I remember it well—I was doing standing meditation out in the back garden underneath a tree, probably a fruit tree like an apple tree or a pear tree that was flowering. I was doing standing meditation. My eyes were closed. I was on the lawn right next to this tree that was in full bloom.

My inner process was that at this point in my practice, I was going through a lot of fear. So fear was coming up strongly in my sittings and my walkings and in my standing. I was experiencing fear right then. So I was deep in my inner world and the thoughts and the feelings were going through and I was really caught in this emotion of fear and resisting it and hating it and so forth.

And something made me open my eyes. I opened my eyes and it was this beautiful, soft, British summer evening. The air was just mild and the blossoms were around me and that golden light of late in the day was falling on the garden and some birds were calling in the neighbor's yard. The grass was green. Everything was beautiful. I felt held in this beautiful, tender nature space.

And then the thought went through my mind, "Wow, yeah, it's really a scary place, this world." The contrast was just so amazing between what was going on in my head, which was just the momentum of images and feelings that I'd been developing for years, and the reality of the moment, which was open and clear and loving and beautiful.

So dharma practice is to take us out of these fabricated illusory realms of our projections and bring us back into the world of the present, which is in the end, even though it's not totally reliable, more reliable than our fabrications.

So we come back into the present and find the life and vitality and openness there.

As we come into practice, most of us have a lot of old momentum going—a momentum of habits, of thinking and feeling. This is part of what we meet when we're on the cushion. If these feelings are strong, which they are for most of us, we also find them in the body.

A lot of our deepest ways of relating to the world have become embedded in the body. This is why it's so important in the early part of the retreat that we give the instructions on how to be with the breath, using the breath to find your way into a grounded relationship with the body, and then how to stay in the body and explore everything you find there. Because a lot of old emotions are touched in the body. And a lot of the healing of meditation is about feeling them, opening to them, accepting them and letting them move in a way that they haven't been able to. They've been held in the body, and in that holding they've been frozen. So as we open up with mindfulness and tenderness, loving kindness, these can come up and come through.

We discover as we come into meditation that we have shaped our own patterns of relating to the world. Obviously, these have been strongly influenced for many of us by childhood events, relationships, abandonment, mistreatment, cruelty, abuse, neglect. Many unwholesome forces have come to bear on us. Out of responding to those, we've developed ways of relating that haven't always helped us.

So we come into those patterns, and for many of us who have found a way to support ourselves, have family life, these patterns of our personality are felt as the biggest problem in our life. We've learned how to take care of ourselves physically, to support ourselves financially, to build even loving relationships with friends and family. But the sense of freedom isn't so accessible if these patterns are strongly operative and we feel bound by them. We feel the constriction of that small sense of self from their operation.

So we start to come to terms with our anger or our fear, with our addictions or our dependency, our self-judgment, our sense of lack of self-worth, of not being lovable. This is all part of the field of meditation. You could say this is one of the hearts of the field of meditation: coming to terms with our personal legacies from the past, felt in the body, felt in the mind, felt in the heart.

We understand that these habits of mind and activity form into character. Based on what we've seen, we form an image of ourselves. That image then gets believed in, reinforces the hardness of the character, and then we keep affirming it by bringing the new events of our life into alignment with it so that the sense of continuity is uninterrupted. This is the dilemma that we find ourselves in. The patterns support the self-view and the self-view supports the patterns.

So how did this all get started? How does it keep going? The Buddha had an interesting commentary on this in a text from the Majjhima Nikaya—that's the middle length collection—called the Honeyball Sutta. It's number 18 in the Majjhima.

The sutta opens with the Buddha living in a part of India where he'd grown up. It's the area of Kapilavatthu. So he's back in his hometown, basically, as the Buddha. You get a little bit of a sense as the sutta opens of the life in northern India at this time, which is almost 2600 years ago.

It was a time of great spiritual ferment. Wanderers all across that region of India carried different philosophies, different teachings, different meditation practices, different beliefs. All these spiritual seekers would wander around and meet each other. The way they'd usually relate is they'd have these intense debates. "Here's what I think.

What do you think? That's what you think? Here's an argument to that." It's kind of like a knockdown drag-out through the verbal realm. The person who was left standing was considered to have won, and his school prevailed.

At the beginning of this story, a man approaches named Dandapani. The name literally means "stick"—stick in hand. The commentary says that he was not an old person, but he always leaned on a golden stick. You get a sense of this person as a little bit flamboyant, a little bit vain. Carrying around the golden stick was a sign of his wealth and somewhat ostentatious.

So he approaches the Buddha, who's seated on the ground. He doesn't sit down near him, which would be a more respectful thing to do, but he stands on his cane and says to the Buddha, "What does the recluse assert? What does he proclaim?" In the language of the time, this is kind of provocative. It's not really a polite way to address someone. It's kind of, "What do you think? What are you trying to teach?"

The Buddha undoubtedly picked up on that energy and replied, "Friend, I proclaim such a teaching that one does not quarrel with anyone in the world."

He completely took the ground out from under that kind of argumentative stance of Dandapani. And he said, "No perceptions underlie such a one who is free of craving." No perceptions underlie such a one—he was pointing to himself—who is free of craving.

And then it said that Dandapani sort of wagged his head and furrowed his brow and then strode off with his cane, obviously unhappy with the reply. So that's a little bit of a quizzical expression: "Perceptions no more underlie such a one."

So the Buddha went off to take a rest after recounting this story, and the monks were puzzled and asked another monk, "Well, what did he mean by that?" And so this other monk named Mahakaccana responds and explains what the Buddha was pointing to.

And this is what Mahakaccana says in his explanation: "Dependent on eye and forms, eye consciousness arises." This is kind of a stock phrase in the text, and what it means is, in order for us to see, we have to have a working eye, we have to have visible forms out there to see, and we have to be awake and functioning and have eye consciousness. When all three of those are there—the eye, something to see and we're conscious—then sight arises and that's called contact, seeing contact.

So he continues, "The meeting of the three is contact." So that's how a sight arises. Right now, you're experiencing contact as you look into the hall and you see everything that you see.

"With contact as condition, there is feeling." And here the feeling that's being pointed to is the Pali word vedana. It means a feeling tone. What you see is either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither—you might say neutral. So you might like what you see. You might dislike what you see. It might be kind of neutral.

You can take a look at your sight right now. My sight is quite pleasant. The meditation hall is beautiful. You all are sitting quietly, attentively. It's quite pleasing, the visual sight for me right now.

"What one feels, that one perceives." So now we need to look at this word "perceives" and what is going on with this word "perceives."

In Western psychology and philosophy, I think the word "perceive" is used in a little different sense. I think it just means the sense data. So when you see a sight, you're perceiving through seeing. That sight is the perception.

But in Buddhist language, perception means something different. In Buddhist language, the sight itself is just called contact. And then after contact, there's something else that happens called perception. And what perception is basically is recognition.

So perception is a little mental activity that happens after contact where you recognize what you're seeing. So as you're looking around the room now, you may not be noticing it, but you're recognizing elements such as woman, shawl, man, mat, wall, statue, flowers, and so on. Those things are perceptions. Those categories that you are able to put things in is the act of perceiving.

Now really, all there is, if you go back to the basics of sight, there are just patches of form and color. That's all sight is. If you close one eye, you see that even more clearly. You take away the three-dimensionality of it. There's just patches of form and color, but we've learned to interpret them as woman, shawl, man, mat, floor, wall, etc. So that's the act of perception. It takes things, puts them into categories based on memory.

So then, "What one feels, that one perceives."

Now, this perception has an emotional component to it. If we perceive something simple like the bell, there's not much charge around this perception. So we tend to leave it alone. But with other things, there's some charge, there's some meaning.

You know, it's a simple example, kind of a light way to look at it. If I say "car," that's just fairly neutral, right? It doesn't have much emotional impact one way or another. What if I say "Prius?"

Do you like? Is this a like? Like? I love to see a Prius because it means people are committed to helping the planet, saving gas, not polluting. I feel warm feelings when I see a Prius. What if you see a Humvee? Not so easy to like, is it? Too big. I feel a little scared when it's next to me. It's using a lot of gas, polluting the atmosphere more. So even a simple thing like a car, when we get to specifics, the perception of a Prius is one thing, the perception of a Humvee is another. Simple things can take on quite a bit of charge.

If I'm in a big group and it's time to go to lunch—I get to lunch early because my first meditation teacher told me that was a good thing to do—I'll go in and take one of the first seats in the dining room. This might be a conference, a meeting, could be a dining hall on retreat. I'll go in and sit with my meal at a table in what's still kind of an empty room, and often there are two empty chairs next to me.

As the room starts to fill up, those empty chairs take on a certain meaning. So I perceive there's an empty chair—in the beginning it's very neutral—but if the room is filling up and both the chairs next to me are still empty, I start to wonder: do I not have any friends here? Why does nobody want to sit with me? People are sitting with all the other people who sat down, but no one is sitting with me. Now the empty chair, that perception is frightening, because it means nobody loves me. Nobody wants to sit by me. And then I become so grateful when somebody sits down and fills that empty chair.

So even an empty chair, which is like nothing, takes on meaning, takes on emotional meaning. If I'm on an airplane flying from San Francisco to Boston, I get on early and I have an empty seat next to me. I have a very different attitude toward that empty chair. Then everyone who comes on the plane is a threat because I want to keep my empty chair. The first scenario is more desire, the second one is more fear, but both of them are different kinds of attachment—all about an empty chair. Empty chair seems like nothing, but I built a whole drama around it out of my likes and dislikes.

So imagine not just empty chair, not just Prius or Humvee. Imagine when perception is one's child or one's dear friend or one's partner or one's body or one's body and illness or one's body and aging. Then the perceptions become much more loaded, much more charged. A lot of emotions come around those kinds of perceptions. So the perception of things opens the door to our whole range of connection and relationship and strong feelings.

So this sutta continues: "What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates." Mental proliferation is the translation of the Pali word papañca. And this is a word that I think you'll relate to quite immediately because it's this unreined-in quality of thinking that Heather was talking about a couple of nights ago—how once we get on a roll with our thoughts, they just go on and on and on and one thought leads to another through associations and different objects, and then those bring up a whole storm of emotions and feelings.

A simple example: sitting here in the hall, you look up at the front, you see that Buddha statue and you think, "I need a Buddha statue in my meditation room. My altar has just a little tiny one—I need a big Buddha statue like that. Maybe I'll go down and look in the store. Marianne has some nice Buddhas." I'll go look in the store, but I looked before and didn't see quite the one I wanted. If I had my cell phone on, I could look online. There are some good online shops, but I turned my cell phone into Beth the other day. Maybe I could get it back on the pretext of needing to call my caretaker at home. Would Beth believe me if I said that? Or would that be a violation of the precept? Okay, I think I can get online, and then which credit card should I use? Now, that one's maxed out. I think this one's okay, but do I have enough to pay for it on the automatic debit card?

So a simple inclination like "I'd like to have a Buddha," and we're into questions of truth and honesty, we're into sneaking down to do some shopping, we're into going online and checking out the stores, and do we have enough cash? Proliferation gets us into trouble.

So that's how the sutta unfolds. It begins quite straightforward: "What one perceives, that one thinks about." That's not a problem, as Heather pointed to as well. The first few thoughts we have about something are natural and harmless. We could simply place a period there and be done with it. But we often don't.

The sutta continues: "...with what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions tinged by mental proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms."

Notice how this sequence has progressed. It starts off being quite passive, beyond our control, and completely benign. The meeting of eye and forms brings contact. With contact, there is feeling. There's no choice there, not even an activity—just natural process unfolding.

Then it becomes slightly more active: "What one feels, that one perceives." Here we have some mental activity as perception takes place. I recognize the car or the person or the statue. "What one perceives, that one thinks about." Still no problem. We can think logically, accurately, staying on the mark.

Now comes the crucial shift: "With what one has mentally proliferated, perceptions beset one with respect to past, future, and present." The proliferations now spiral beyond our control, wandering into past and future as well as present. When we enter past and future, we create grounds for hope and fear, for worry and regret. All of this begins to assault us.

We're no longer in passive mode. We're not even in active mode. We're in "being beset" mode. Suddenly we find ourselves victimized by the very patterns of thinking and feeling that fuel this mental proliferation.

As thoughts spin out of control, launching into past and future indiscriminately, they return to haunt us. They trigger our hopes and fears, our worries and regrets. The thoughts trigger emotions. Once we're caught in emotions, they trigger more thinking: "How do I get out of this? How do I deal with this? What am I going to do with this in my life?" The spinning continues, all based on our old patterns, because the "I" is operating throughout this entire process—the "I" with its concerns, self-image, and accumulated karma weaving through everything.

How can we get free from this? How can we become unhooked? Is it possible to have a perception—even a meaningful one like our own body, the memory of a partner, our work, our child, or even a pattern like the fear I felt under that fruit tree in England—and not spin out about it? Can we encounter something that carries emotion, feeling, and meaning for us, and meet it directly without proliferation?

If we can, that's the opening for mindfulness. Then mindfulness can establish a new relationship with that experience that isn't overlaid with all the accumulations from the past—our patterns, hopes, fears, assumptions about ourselves, our self-view. We can meet it fresh.

When we hold experience this way, without proliferation, we discover it within the context of silence. There's a silence of mind that we begin to touch. That silence is inherently peaceful because it's not assaulting us. We're not being beset by past and future. We're simply in direct, clean relationship with what's here in the present moment.

So we're not creating the self again. We're not proliferating it. We're not moving into self-assessment. We're not sweeping it into the creation of an identity. There's just this direct knowing through mindful attention in the present moment.

In a way, what we're doing is putting aside our likes and dislikes and just saying, here it is. Let me just connect with it just as it is. You know, these likes and dislikes are an integral part of who we take ourselves to be. We like certain things. We don't like other things. We like some people. We don't like others. We like some political parties. We don't like others. It's integral to our self-identity.

Often you meet a new person, have some conversation, and you have to decide: do you like that person or do you not like that person? That goes on for me sometimes—do I like them or do I not like them? That's an unnecessary question. Clear awareness can see a person, see a person's strengths, see their personality, see the limitations of the personality, and just rest there. We don't have to sum it all up with a like or a dislike.

When things are held that way, we see them accurately. This is not rose-colored in any way. But we don't have to proliferate about them or make up a story about them. And then things get held in a lot of space. They get held in that silence and in that peace.

This is what we're developing here with our moment-to-moment mindfulness as we explore all the different aspects of our experience. We're developing the capacity to meet things with a spacious and non-reactive awareness that just sees things the way they are and doesn't load them up with our projections and likes and dislikes, and doesn't load the encounter up with all of our past history, self-assumptions, and projections about our own continuing identity.

When we don't load up our experience that way, there's a lot more openness, a lot more space, and it lets our mind return to that limitless nature that is our birthright, that is a basic part of us.

This is where the practice is heading. This is what we're doing here. As we open into that peace, we find out that's not a constructed thing. It's not constructed out of our thoughts or out of our patterns. It's there all the time when we open to it. That silence is not a constructed thing. It's always available.

Its always being available means it's beyond the cycle of being born and dying. It's beyond the cycle of arising and passing away. So we are starting to come in touch with something that is a true refuge, not subject to birth and death. As we tune into it more and more, we find ourselves coming out from the cycle of birth and death, coming out of samsara, because we've stopped trying to fix it. We've stopped trying to project on it. And we're just meeting it the way that it is in this vast peace.

But this is not the end of the road. It's not that we're doing our meditation, we discover a little bit of peace, and that's that. This kind of peace is onward leading. This is the path. This becomes the path. And the Buddha said that opening to this peace, undoing this construct of self, leads us to the fullness of liberation, leads on to that unconditioned element of Nibbana.

The wonderful thing is we may just get a little taste of that silence or that peace, but it's a genuine foretaste of what's possible. We're finding a taste, a hint, a clue, an aroma of something that's beyond birth and death, of something that's beyond arising and passing. And as we put more and more of our faith in that, that deepens and it leads us, inclines the mind to that liberating understanding, the realization of the unconditioned, of the deathless.

This is our practice here.

So let's just sit for a moment together and let the words settle.

CHAPTER 118

Morning Instructions

> In this morning instruction from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong continues the progressive teaching approach by expanding from breath awareness to include body and sound meditation. He introduces the crucial concept of finding a meditation 'anchor' - a primary object of mindfulness such as breath, body posture, or sounds that serves as a reliable home base for attention.
> Armstrong explains how mindfulness naturally moves to predominant experiences while maintaining the anchor as a grounding point. He provides detailed guidance on working with bodily sensations, including painful ones, emphasizing the importance of receptive awareness rather than effortful observation. The teaching demonstrates how awareness can inhabit the body from within, creating an integrated rather than observational relationship with experience.
> The instructions cover practical aspects of posture, the balance between effort and ease, and how to work skillfully with challenging sensations through acceptance and softening. This foundational teaching shows how all experiences - whether breath, body sensations, or sounds - can become objects of mindfulness practice, supporting both formal meditation and daily life awareness.

In the instructions for the meditation this morning, we're going to continue to unfold the instructions on the body, which Temple introduced yesterday. Just to give a little bit of a sense of the flow of the instructions, we're introducing them day by day so that eventually everything that comes into your experience while you're sitting will be a subject for the meditation, can be the focus of mindfulness.

So the meditation is not just about the breath or just about the body—it's about all our experiences as we're sitting, as we're walking, as we're moving around through the day. But we're introducing them a little bit at a time so that we can learn well how to work with each area that we're exploring.

In the first few days, as you're seeing, we focused on the breath, a little bit on sounds, and now on the body. We encourage you all to find what we call an anchor among these three subjects. An anchor in meditation is something that becomes a primary focus for you that you come back to again and again to ground your attention when nothing else particular is going on.

So you sit, nothing is striking in your field of experience. Oh, where do I put my attention? Ah, where's my anchor? So it's sort of like a home, a meditation home that you can always come back to. You develop a good, steady relationship with it. The attention learns how to settle on that subject and it's always available to you.

For many of you, the breath will be your anchor, your primary subject. But for some people, the breath isn't so comfortable. There may be a sense of tightness. It could be a history of breathing difficulties that get triggered by focusing on the breath. In that case, a different anchor would be helpful for you, something like sounds or the body.

The body is an excellent anchor—puts us in touch with something that's always available and connects well into the emotional life. So as you're meditating through today, over the next days, see what suits you as your meditation home, as an anchor in your practice, something you come back to again and again, hopefully among breath or body or sounds.

Begin the meditation by sitting comfortably, being as relaxed as you can, and still being upright. This balance of uprightness and ease is a pointer to the mental attitude that makes right effort. We want to be energetically with our experience without pressing too hard on it, without getting tight around experience.

If we relax too much, mindfulness will slip away from the present moment. If we push too hard, the body and mind will become tense. Finding in our posture the right balance that expresses this mental attitude of right effort—a balanced effort.

Let go of any obvious areas of tension—the forehead. Let the eyes be soft. The jaw is relaxed. Shoulders are dropped. And the belly is soft.

Just let your awareness inhabit the body, fill the body. So that you simply sit and feel the body in sitting, know the body in sitting. We're not knowing the body as a separate observer from outside or behind or at a distance, but we're knowing the body by feeling it from inside, awareness integrated throughout the body.

So you can have a sense just of resting the awareness within the body. In this way, the body posture can itself be an anchor for your meditation. The posture itself can be the focus that you come back to again and again.

As you sit comfortably, then open your attention to the realm of sounds, letting your awareness become wide, expansive, opening to any sounds that arise from inside or outside. It could be the sounds of one another, sounds of the building, sound of my voice, sounds from outside. And if there are no sounds, you can just rest your attention in the wide extent of silence.

Notice how any sounds that arise are heard without any special effort. You don't have to go looking for them. Just as you rest, the sounds are known spontaneously. This can be a doorway to finding a very receptive kind of attention—just as though you were listening to a symphony in a concert hall. Just being still and everything is known.

Then bring the attention back into the body. As you feel the body, the same receptive attention can know the sensations of the breath, just resting easily. The in-breath is felt and the out-breath is felt. You can bring your attention to a particular part of the body if you like, where the breath is clear—the nose, the chest, or the abdomen. Or you can leave the attention spread throughout the whole body, feeling the impact of the breath through the whole body, each in-breath and out-breath.

As you're attending to the breath, from time to time another sensation will arise in a part of the body that is strong, naturally draws the attention to it. So if this happens, easily let go of the breath. Let the attention move where it's called to this new sensation.

and just feel that sensation in its bare physical nature—tingling or pulsing, vibration or pressure, heat or coolness, ache or pain or stabbing, blissful, bubbly. You can let the attention stay with that new sensation for as long as it's drawn there.

We notice how the attention will move from time to time to something that is predominant—to what you might say is the strongest feature in our field of experience. If you have an anchor, such as breath, sounds, or posture, then you'll find the attention will be drawn from time to time to other sensations in the body because they become predominant or strong or noticeable.

So we don't resist that draw of the attention. We allow the attention to move there naturally, and we establish our mindfulness in relationship to that new arising. Feel that new sensation as long as it's calling us, as long as it's predominant. It could just be a slight twinge that passes in a few seconds. It could be an ongoing ache that goes on the better part of an hour. So you could be with the sensation for a few seconds, or you could be with it for most of the meditation. Either way is fine.

If the sensation subsides and stops drawing the attention, then allow your attention to return to your anchor. And when another sensation comes, again allow the attention to go there and feel that new sensation in its bare nature.

Sometimes painful sensations will arise in parts of the body—the pressure on the cushion, the knees, or the shoulders. When a painful sensation comes, because it tends to be a compelling subject, it can be a good focus to keep the attention in the present moment. So allow your attention to go there, allow the awareness to go right into the painful sensation.

Have a sense that you can explore it with your awareness. You can pay attention to the details of the sensation. Explore how far it extends all around it. And then also notice the mind's reaction or relation to it. Is there a reaction of fear, anxiety, dislike, or worry? Resentment of the pain? If so, notice that and see if you can soften the attitude—soften the mind's relationship to one that accepts the pain, allows that sensation to be the way it is, and still feels it.

If the mind stays aversive, it tends to lead to more tension in the body. If the mind can soften and relax, then at least we give the body a chance to relax with the pain. So notice the pain, notice the mind's relation to it. Have your attitude be one of allowing, softening, acceptance.

And then if the pain becomes too strong, bringing about a lot of concern or worry or turmoil, feel free to shift your posture. You can move slowly, mindfully—lean forward or put the knees up. Take a little break. When you feel refreshed, you can go back into the sitting posture and continue, keeping the continuity of the mindfulness going.

And if you're ever unsure what to attend to, just return to your anchor—breath, body posture, or sounds. Some place you can always come back to and stay simple with.

CHAPTER 119

Morning Instructions, Day 7 - Mindfulness of Thoughts

Guy Armstrong · 29 min

> In this seventh day of retreat instructions, Guy Armstrong guides practitioners into the challenging territory of mindfulness of thoughts (vitakkavicāra). Drawing from the comprehensive awareness taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), he explains why this aspect of the four foundations of mindfulness is introduced later in retreat practice—thoughts are particularly seductive and can easily pull us away from present-moment awareness into proliferation (papañca).
> Armstrong offers a practical "thought game" exercise, asking meditators to visualize thoughts appearing on a blank screen, observing their arising, persistence, and passing away without getting caught in their content. This approach transforms our relationship with thinking from being "subjects of our thoughts" to seeing each thought as merely "a little bubble, insubstantial, fleeting." He emphasizes that mindfulness (sati) can be cultivated with any object, including thoughts, and that the goal is not to eliminate thinking but to develop a wise relationship where discriminating wisdom (paññā) evaluates thoughts rather than being compulsively driven by them.
> The teaching integrates this mindfulness of thinking into the broader framework of retreat practice, maintaining connection with one's meditation anchor (breath, body, or sounds) while opening awareness to include thoughts as just another phenomenon in the field of experience. This instruction is essential for developing the mental clarity and freedom that allows practitioners to see the constructed nature of thoughts and their limited relationship to reality.

In the meditation this morning, we're going to extend the instructions to take in the whole area of thinking. The reason that we wait this long in the retreat to introduce thought, even though it's quite a central activity, is that it's one of the more difficult arisings to actually be mindful of. As you know, it's so easy to get swept up into the content of the thought.

What we want to do in meditation is to develop a new relationship to our thoughts that sees them with mindfulness as a present moment happening. Every thought has this present moment nature of arising, persisting for a little while, and then passing away. Mindfulness can notice that happening without getting sucked into the content of the thought. But this is a challenge because it goes against our years of investment in our thoughts, our belief in our thoughts, our being seduced by our thoughts.

The mindful relationship to thinking offers us a tremendous amount of freedom because we see that a thought is just a little bubble, constructed in the moment, bearing often little relationship to reality. And yet thoughts and our belief in them govern our lives. They govern our choices, our actions, our speech, our life direction. So it's very important to establish a clear and wise relationship to thinking, and that's what the meditation today is designed to lead into.

As you develop this mindful relationship to your thoughts, you won't lose touch with the content of the thinking. Don't worry that you're giving something up. You'll still feel the content and see the content and understand it, but you won't be as compelled by it. Then thoughts can be examined with discriminating wisdom to assess them for their truth or untruth, their usefulness or potential harmful nature.

Please approach the meditation this morning in the nature of an exploration of what is this phenomenon called thinking. It's such a powerful force and yet when we look at it, each thought is nothing more than a little bubble, a blip, insubstantial, fleeting, of much less import than a physical sensation in its bare nature. And yet thought rules the world. Most people are subjects of their thoughts.

It's not that we dismiss the value of thinking. Thoughts are necessary for us to live and function in an orderly manner. But as one spiritual teacher said, thought makes an excellent servant, but a terrible master. We want to transform the relationship where wisdom evaluates thoughts rather than thought dictating things on its own.

So far in the retreat, you've probably experienced thinking as something of an enemy, because it is the one thing that carries us away from the present moment and causes us to be lost in past and future. It's the being lost in past and future that generates this proliferation of concepts and ideas that beset us. So there is certainly a danger to thought running wild.

But thoughts are not a problem if we can bring mindfulness to them. They're not the enemy. Mindfulness can be developed on a thought just as well as it can be developed on a breath, a sensation, a sound, or an emotion. Mindfulness doesn't care what the object is. So thought can be a fine object for mindfulness. It's just a little bit tricky.

In the meditation instructions this morning, I'll review where we've been in the instructions and then give a little specific way to work with thought and then open it up to a more general way of working with thoughts. When I say thoughts, you can interpret it either as an image that comes, that expresses a situation and an activity, or a string of words. Some people are more image-oriented, some people are more word-oriented. So we can use thought in this case to refer to either one. They both have the potential to pull us in out of the present moment.

Begin the meditation by taking a posture that's upright and easeful. Come to rest the awareness in your body, having the sense that the whole awareness can fill the whole body. By whole awareness, I mean an awareness that's wholly in this present moment. This is the fullness of collectedness.

Let go of any thoughts or images that you may be carrying in from a period of work or walking. Just arrive here, being present and at ease in the body. Open to sounds, if that helps you bring in a receptive, effortless attention. Return the attention to the body where we can feel the impact of breathing and sensations throughout the body.

Feel the body as it breathes in. Feel the body as it breathes out. Don't try to stand separate from the body as a detached observer of breath, but feel the breath within the body with that full awareness that fills the body. Just sit, rest and feel.

If there's one area where the breath is experienced most clearly, you can let the attention rest in that area, around the nose, the chest, or the belly. Or you can stay with the experience of the whole body breathing.

As you're attending to the breath, you may notice from time to time other physical sensations that are strong and draw the attention. If that happens, let the attention move easily, naturally to the new sensation, just being aware of it in its bare physical nature: pulsing, pressure, warmth, tingling, vibration, coolness, ache, bliss.

Or you may notice an emotion or a state of mind that calls the attention. Could be one of the five hindrances of sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, doubt, or their variations of fear or shame.

loneliness, self-judgment, resentment, despair. They could be one of the beautiful qualities of heart: happiness, compassion, love, peace, interest, joy, calm.

If the emotion is strong enough, you'll feel it somewhere in the body. So let your attention connect with that experience in the body and let that ground the awareness. It's easier to stay connected with the body than with just a vague mood. Feeling the body sensations, you'll also feel the emotion. You can go back and forth between noticing the sensation in the body and the emotion that you're feeling there.

Now we're going to open up to become mindful of the whole area of thought. We're going to play a little game for the first few minutes with thoughts. Imagine the visual field as a kind of blank screen, like you're sitting in a movie theater and there's a blank screen. From time to time a thought will cross that screen, will appear on it.

So we're going to drop the focus on other parts of our experience. Just kind of notice that blank screen that's in front of us. I want to ask you to pay close attention to the first thought that appears in that field on that screen after I finish this sentence. When you've noticed a thought, you can just come back and feel the breath or body. Just rest again, bring your mindfulness into the present.

In giving attention to thought in this way, see if you can discover that mindful relationship to a thought that sees it as a phenomenon in the present moment. It doesn't have to take us out of the present moment into past and future. Instead we can stay grounded, present and mindful as the thought arises, expresses itself and passes away.

Once again, bringing our focus to that blank screen and just alert to the first thought that comes after this sentence. Then return the attention to be grounded again in your anchor—breath or body or sounds. Make sure your connection to the present is clear and firm.

Now we'll open up to this thought game for a little longer. We'll just create a little space of time. In that space, try to notice each and every thought that comes onto the screen.

Then come back again to rest with your anchor, just collected in the present moment. Notice what happened during that period where you were intending to be mindful of thoughts. Could you stay present and mindful for that entire period, noticing each thought that came? Or did you find that some of the thoughts had that sticky, seductive quality that caused you to lose your mindfulness in their content?

We're starting to understand that there are two different ways of relating to thought: being lost in the content and losing mindfulness, or sustaining the present moment attention so that we can see the thought as it rises, lasts and vanishes.

This time we'll take a little longer period with that blank screen. Explore. Take enough time to explore. Perhaps you'll get lost. But then you can return and again take up the thought game—just seeing each thought with mindfulness.

Connect with the blank screen. For a period of time, let thought be your primary focus for mindfulness. Notice each and every arising and passing.

Then come back into the present moment, reconnecting with your anchor and steadying the attention in the here and now.

Now see if it's possible to integrate this mindfulness of thinking into our general meditation practice. You may like to start by connecting with your anchor and then opening to the overall field of experience, noticing any other sensations or emotions that come. See if you can include thought as just another phenomenon in your overall field of experience. Notice them when they arise. You might even use the soft label "thinking." Then in the next moment notice where the attention is landing: breath, sounds, body, mood.

See if it's possible to integrate this mindful relationship to thinking in the context of your overall meditation. If you find yourself ever getting lost in trying to pay attention to thought or confused about what to attend to, just drop everything else and come back to your anchor. That's why it's so helpful to have this home in meditation that's always there for us, always available. We have a simple and developed, cultivated relationship. Anytime you like, feel free to try the thought game again.

It's a way of exploring thought as your primary meditation focus. Just imagine that screen sitting in front of you like a cat outside a mouse hole—no other purpose than waiting for the mouse to appear. And then noticing when a thought comes, expresses itself, and goes.

Not resisting the arising of any thought and not promoting the continuation of any stream of thought. Just letting thoughts come when they come and go when they go, living their own life like any other phenomenon in the vast field of awareness.

This practice invites us into a spacious relationship with our mental activity—neither pushing thoughts away nor getting caught up in their content, but simply witnessing their natural arising and passing. In this way, we begin to see thoughts not as problems to be solved or stories to be believed, but as temporary visitors in the open sky of consciousness.

Through this gentle observation, we cultivate the profound understanding that we are not our thoughts. We are the aware presence that witnesses them. This recognition can be deeply liberating, freeing us from the tyranny of believing every mental formation that appears and allowing us to rest in the peaceful awareness that is always already here.

Morning Instructions Day 12

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> In this retreat instruction from day 12, Guy Armstrong introduces the technique of 'choiceless attention' - a natural approach to meditation that allows awareness to move freely between all aspects of experience. After establishing familiarity with breath, body, sounds, emotions and thoughts, practitioners learn to unhook from any anchor and simply notice where attention naturally lands moment by moment.
> Armstrong explores the Buddhist concept of manasikāra (attention) as a mental factor that constantly selects and highlights different elements of our six-sense experience. Rather than directing attention to a specific object, this practice involves following attention's natural movement while maintaining mindfulness of whatever arises - whether breath sensations, sounds, physical pressure, thoughts, or emotions. He offers two ways to approach this: asking 'what am I aware of now?' or simply following where attention lands.
> The teaching includes practical guidance on using soft mental noting to stay present, and how to balance this open awareness with returning to an anchor when the mind becomes scattered. Armstrong emphasizes developing both narrow focus for stability and open attention for ease, explaining how experienced vipassanā practitioners can alternate between these approaches. This technique represents the culmination of retreat instructions, offering a completely natural way to practice that 'hardly even feels like meditation' while cultivating continuous present-moment awareness.

This morning in the instructions, we're going to introduce a technique that is the logical conclusion of all the instructions we've been giving so far. We've given instructions on how to be with the breath, the body, sounds, emotions, and thoughts. This makes up the majority of your experience as you're sitting in silent meditation.

This morning, I'm going to introduce a technique that I'll call choiceless attention. It highlights this one particular factor of mind, which is attention. I want to talk about that a little before I give the meditation instructions.

What is attention? In our experience, there are many things going on all the time at the six sense doors. But if you'll notice, one of them is always being highlighted. It's like you focus on one thing at a time and relate to that. That focusing property is the activity of attention.

In Buddhist terminology, this is manasikāra. It's a factor of mind that selects one element from all our different sense experience and brings our awareness to that in particular. This is happening all the time and it's changing. Attention is a common mental factor that is in every moment of experience.

Just take a look right now at what your attention is doing. It generally doesn't stay in one place for very long. It will attend to the sound of my voice. Then you'll notice a sensation in your body, perhaps a pressure. Then you'll notice an image of someone in the room. Then you'll notice the temperature of the air on your hand or your face. Then you'll come back to the sound of my voice and so on.

The attention, if left alone, is always moving and shifting, picking out, highlighting, focusing on different aspects of our experience, moment after moment. This movement of attention is one of the symptoms of restlessness in the mind. Part of the meditative training is being able to direct attention by our conscious choice. So we say, "I'm going to place my attention on the breath, in the belly, and leave it there," and not have it roam so much.

As we know, this is a very challenging task because attention doesn't naturally stay in one place. But by training, we can get better at that skill of directing the attention and have it stay somewhere. So in the early part of the retreat, we were directing the attention often to an anchor. We encouraged you to find an anchor in the breath, the body, or sounds, and be there if nothing else was strongly calling you. But from time to time, other things would. And then you'd go be with a sensation or a thought or an emotion, then come back to the anchor.

In the meditation this morning, we're going to unhook from the anchor altogether. There's going to be no preference for breath or body or sounds. We're going to let attention go wherever it will. That's why this technique is called choiceless attention. We're not choosing where to direct it. We're letting it go. But we want to notice where it lands.

Our task is to see where the attention is falling in each new moment and be mindful there. Anything that we notice can be the subject for mindfulness. This approach to meditation is so natural, one hundred percent organic, it hardly even feels like meditation. All we're doing is letting the attention be natural and noticing where it is.

You may find that you'll notice an in-breath, and a moment later you'll notice a sound, and a moment later you'll notice a sensation, and then you'll notice an out-breath, and then you'll notice a thought. In fact, this practice, this technique can be supported by the habit of mental noting or labeling so that in each new moment you might note where the attention is landing with very simple words like "in," "pressure," "planning," "calm," "hearing," "out," and so on.

There are basically two ways to think about this practice. It's the same practice, but I'm going to explain them both because some people resonate with one and some with the other. One is, this practice is just answering the question, "What am I aware of now?" In each new moment, what am I aware of? And then you let yourself become mindful of that. The other way to explain it is you're following the attention, seeing where it lands, and noticing that. Same practice, two different descriptions.

The noting is optional. You might play with it during this period because if it's helpful for you, it can really be useful in getting us to stay in the present moment. It cuts down on the tendency to be lost. Because if the notes aren't happening, it's because we're lost in thought. So the steady nature of the note reminds us, "I'm staying connected to the present moment."

What we're aware of is not so critical. The fact that we're aware or mindful is the key thing.

So in approaching this meditation, I'll suggest that you begin by paying attention, bringing attention to the anchor. Stabilize a little bit there, and then I'll invite you to open up and let go of the anchor and try this new technique of choiceless attention. Because there are so many different objects in choiceless attention, sometimes it gets confusing. What should I pay attention to? Am I thinking too much? Should I go to this or that? If that happens, make it simple again. Just come back to the anchor.

Beginning the meditation, find in your posture both ease and alertness. Relax any obvious areas of holding in the body. And then connect with your anchor. It could be the breath, could be the body posture, could be the field of sounds. Choose to direct your attention to your primary subject and let it remain there as steadily as possible while the attention stabilizes a little.

Now let your attention release from the anchor and be open. First take a few moments just to be aware of the vastness of the field of our experience. This can include sounds both near and far away. It includes all the sensations within the body, including breath, any thought that arises and passes, any mood or emotion or state of mind, all within this current field of awareness.

With the attention unhooked from the anchor and just free to go where it will, notice in each new moment where the attention has fallen, what experience is being highlighted, which of the six sense objects is being known. Then establish mindfulness, however briefly, with that experience in this new moment. Don't cling to that new experience, so the attention again is just free. Then notice in this new moment: where is it landing? Be mindful of that just for a moment.

You may find that by habit the awareness or the attention naturally lands on your anchor. That's fine. It's not a problem. It may be there for several moments in a row. We just don't make the effort to direct it there. If it lands there, no problem. But it's always free to move on and our mind stays fresh, alert, interested to see where it will go next.

This approach to meditation almost takes the effort out because the movement of attention is so natural. But at the same time we have to be very awake to notice what's happening. Let that interest really be present. What am I knowing now? What's being revealed in this new moment? Being mindful of that.

If you'd like, you can experiment with the noting practice. Just keep a steady naming of what you're noticing in each new moment. Maybe the timing is such that you make a new note every couple of seconds. When you make the note, make it in a very soft voice, like a whisper, so it doesn't become too intrusive. Your noting might be something like: in, out, hearing, pressure, memory, image, in, cool. See if it helps the attention stay connected to the present moment and avoid the tendency to be drifting off in a chain of thinking.

Sometimes you might find that the very openness of this kind of practice makes it hard for mindfulness to stay steady, to stay continuous. If you find yourself drifting into more thinking, then come back again to the anchor. Spend some time just being mindful of that simple focus. If it feels like the attention steadies a bit there and you like, then you can open up again to the choiceless attention, to all passing phenomena.

We have these two differing styles of practice now that we've introduced. One where you take a fairly narrow focus on your anchor, direct the attention there, stay with it in an ongoing way. The other instructions have been moving to this more open style, concluding today with this total openness, which brings in a quality of naturalness, ease, relaxation, receptivity, where the attention can just go to whatever is drawing it in a given moment.

Generally, we recommend that vipassana meditators develop both of these styles in their sitting practice. The narrow focus really helps for stabilizing the attention, bringing some steadiness of mind. Once you have that as a foundation, then the open attention brings in this greater sense of ease and non-doing.

And you can just feel in the spaciousness how there's a kind of easy way to relax in that big space. The big space holds everything.

Meditation generally goes best by alternating between these two approaches. Spend some time with your anchor, bring some stability in, get the mind a little steady. When it is, open up to the bigger space. But what happens is the bigger space tends eventually to lead to spacing out. And when you find you're spacing out and getting lost in thought, come back and reestablish the mindfulness in the narrower focus of your anchor.

This dance between focused attention and open awareness becomes a natural rhythm in practice. The concentrated focus gives us the stability we need, like establishing a strong foundation. From that foundation, we can then safely explore the vast openness of awareness itself. But awareness without some grounding can become diffuse and unfocused, so we return again to our anchor when needed.

This interplay between samatha and vipassana, between concentration and insight, between doing and non-doing, reflects the very heart of Buddhist meditation practice. Both qualities support and enhance each other, creating the conditions for wisdom and understanding to naturally arise.

Afternoon Brahmavihāra Practice - Compassion

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> In this guided meditation from a February retreat, Guy Armstrong introduces karuṇā (compassion) as the second of the four brahmavihāras (divine abidings). Building on the foundation of mettā (loving-kindness) developed over the previous two weeks, Armstrong explains how compassion naturally arises when an open heart encounters suffering - described traditionally as "the quivering of the heart in response to suffering."
> The teaching explores the elegant architecture of the brahmavihāras: mettā as the foundation, karuṇā emerging when mettā meets suffering, muditā (appreciative joy) arising when mettā meets happiness, and upekkhā (equanimity) balancing all three. Armstrong discusses the near enemies of compassion - pity (looking down on suffering) and grief (being overwhelmed by suffering) - and emphasizes how equanimity prevents these wholesome states from tipping into unwholesome territory.
> The guided practice introduces a "suffering person" category and uses phrases like "May you be free from your suffering" or "May you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion." Armstrong particularly emphasizes self-compassion as "finding gold on the path" - a transformative way to relate to our own difficulties that acknowledges pain while offering a new relationship to it through the heart's natural capacity for care.

For the past two weeks, we've been developing the quality of loving kindness as the foundation for all the Brahmavihāras. In today's guided meditation, we're going to open into the second Brahmavihāra, which is compassion.

Sometimes you might make a lot of the distinction between metta and compassion, but they're very closely related. If you read Tibetan Buddhists, Mahāyāna Buddhists in general, they always talk about compassion and give it a very high place in their whole system. If you listen to Theravādins, we more talk about metta. So we could have a little inter-tradition conflict here. Which is more important? Metta or compassion? Love or compassion? Either one works.

But making this turn at this point, I think you'll get a sense of the beautiful and elegant architecture of the Brahmavihāras in the tradition in which we hold them, Theravāda. Metta is the foundation. And metta, as you all know, is the open heart that cares about any individual, any sentient being. We can wish for their welfare, for their happiness, for their safety, and it can be applied universally. Human realm, all other realms—all beings have the same wish.

So we take this open heart that wants the welfare of others and then in compassion, we turn it on to suffering. When the open heart of metta is turned on to suffering, the quality or the flavor that comes through is compassion. It's no different than that. The open heart of metta, looking upon suffering, moves into compassion. It's classically described as the quivering of the heart in response to suffering.

Just to continue the architecture one more turn, what happens when the open heart looks on happiness? You meet someone with a lot of happiness in their life. What flavor does that evoke? That's appreciative joy or mudita, sympathetic joy. Our heart resonates in happiness with their happiness.

So metta opens the heart. When it looks on suffering, compassion emerges. When it looks on happiness, appreciative joy emerges. And these are all held in balance. All three of these are held in balance by the fourth of the Brahmavihāras, which is equanimity. If there is not equanimity, the first three Brahmavihāras will tip into their near enemy if we're lucky or their far enemy if we're not lucky. Equanimity is what allows the Brahmavihāras to be held in a mind with strength and stay wholesome because it's very easy to fall into either the near or the far enemy.

So compassion is the response of the heart to suffering. That means that in order to cultivate the flavor, the authentic flavor of compassion, we have to come into contact with some form of suffering, different forms of suffering.

In the metta practice, we were encouraged to look on what's beautiful or lovable in someone. In the compassion practice, we're going to take different individuals and we're going to let ourselves feel their suffering. We're going to deliberately call to mind things in their life that are difficult. This could be physical difficulties, could be emotional difficulties, difficulties of finding one's way in the world, difficulties in relationship. Different things will come to your mind.

So this practice is sometimes sobering. It's not like metta where we can get—I'm sure you felt this at times—just very delightfully warm and loving and uplifted and cheered often by thinking of people's potential for happiness. That's a beautiful quality in metta and very uplifting. But in compassion, we're going to be looking moment after moment at the difficulties in life ourselves. And this is not to develop a gloomy view. It's to open our heart to the truth, the first noble truth, the second noble truth, as it manifests through our life and through the life of every sentient being.

In compassion, just like in metta, there's a very beautiful universal quality that happens when we realize that I have suffering, you have suffering, every sentient being that we turn to has some degree of suffering in life. So we let that really come in in the compassion practice. If we can hold it with equanimity, it really softens our heart, tenderizes us to what life holds for everyone. Every single being faces these difficulties.

The near enemy of compassion has two kind of flavors. Sometimes it's called pity. Pity is this sense of looking down on someone who is suffering. In that looking down, there's a holding ourselves above. So when compassion gets mixed with conceit or the comparing mind, and we hold ourselves as better than the person who's suffering, what comes through is looking down on them or pity. This is one distortion. The other one is maybe more common.

And that is, it's said the near enemy is grief. This doesn't mean the grief of loss, because that will happen naturally when the heart is open. If someone dies or a relationship ends, there will be grief. It's more grief for the world. Or you could say being overwhelmed by the amount of suffering we see in ourselves, in someone else, or in the world. The sense of being overwhelmed by the magnitude of suffering—grief in that sense. It's close to despair.

When we feel that the suffering in the world is too much for us to bear—either our own, another's, or the whole range of suffering—it's too much to bear. That's also the near enemy of compassion. We're in touch with it, but it's not held in the balance of equanimity, and so the mind tips into an unwholesome state.

And why is it unwholesome? Because if we're feeling overcome by the magnitude of the suffering, we're not in a position to help. We want compassion to be able to make our heart inspired to help. Compassion has an active component. It's not just enough to look on the suffering from a distance and let our heart get refined. In compassion there's an urge, there's a wanting to solve the pain, wanting to address the pain that we feel. So if this quality of grief is there—despair—we don't feel we have the capability to help, and that doesn't allow compassion to function. We want to keep that balance where we can feel the pain but not be overcome by it. That's the quality of compassion.

The far enemy of compassion is cruelty—when we see suffering and we enjoy it. That can happen sometimes with ex-relationship partners, for example, but we don't necessarily go there right away. So we want to be on the lookout for the true feeling of compassion. We want to be aware of these enemies, the near enemies or the far enemy of compassion, and just recognize them when they come also.

The compassion practice develops just like the metta. We bring individuals to mind and we say a phrase. In this case, in compassion, we only use one phrase—not so many to remember. If you remember at the beginning of your metta practice, this retreat or a long time ago, how long it took to memorize those four phrases, that was quite a challenge to have them flow easily. So compassion is even simpler. There's just one phrase.

The classical phrase, and I recommend you try it, is "May you be free from your suffering." Or "May I be free from my suffering." Or "May all beings be free from their suffering." That's a classical phrase. It's a good phrase. It's worked for centuries, and I recommend it to you. It has the essence of the feeling.

But some of us find that phrase brings in a little attitude of "get rid of." "May you be free from your suffering" easily goes into "I hope you can get rid of that suffering," and sometimes that brings in an aversive reaction, a suggestion of aversion. So it doesn't work as well for everyone, and it's not the phrase that I use.

The phrase I use is "May you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion." Or if you like, substitute something more specific for pain and sorrow: "May you hold your illness with compassion. May you hold your fear with compassion. May you hold your grief with compassion." Just tailor it a little if you want to the person, because it might evoke more feeling. But the general sense is pain and sorrow, and every sentient being has some. "May you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion."

Another one that some people like is "I care about your suffering."

Or I care about your pain and sorrow. That's also a very direct way to say it. Works really well for some people.

So these are the three I'll suggest. You can play with all of them. You might want to try to pick one over the course of this meditation today, the one that resonates most for you, that gets you best aligned with that feeling of compassion.

But notice in all of them, we're pointing to the person's difficulty. So this is integral to the practice. We want to come face to face with the suffering of life as it's manifesting through the individual we're with. I'll repeat the phrases as we get into the meditation so that you don't have to write them down now.

With the Brahmaviharas, we tend to start the meditation where it's easiest. So with loving kindness, we started with ourselves because we basically care most about ourselves. With compassion, we're going to bring in a new individual, a new category. It's a person we're going to call the suffering person.

So I'll invite you early in the meditation to pick someone in your circle of acquaintances who's going through a hard time right now, so that their difficulties will be really apparent to you. And again, it's helpful if the relationship isn't too complicated so that their difficulties aren't too tied to your difficulties. Like a business partner and your enterprise is going under or something like that. So that you can have the equanimity to look on their suffering and keep a sense of balance.

For today, we'll bring in the suffering person to start, and then we'll also bring in ourselves. So as you work with yourself, again, play with the phrase. You could use a little different phrase for yourself. You could say, "May I be free from my suffering?" But when you get to yourself, you may want to say, "May I hold my suffering with compassion," or "May I hold my pain with compassion?" Feel free to experiment a little bit with the exact phrase that you use.

So let's begin the compassion meditation. The way it will unfold over these few days—we'll do it over the next four days—is that we'll bring in the same categories that we brought in for metta with the addition of the suffering person. One new category, and then the rest will be the same.

Please sit comfortably, being relaxed in your body, being present just here and now. And to feel just a little bit of the mood of compassion, just taking a reflection that every being that takes birth faces some pain and sorrow. Either physical pain, emotional pain, facing loss, facing illness, old age, and death.

Wherever we look around the planet, here in the West or in the East, in the North or in the South, we can find this quality of suffering everywhere we turn. And everywhere we look, we can have that wish: may their pain be alleviated. May they be free from that form of suffering. May they be free from all suffering.

So we can begin with our expansive, boundless connection to life and wishing: may all beings that live be free from suffering. And may they hold their pain and sorrow with compassion.

And then bringing to mind someone you know who's currently going through a hard time. It could be in big ways—facing financial difficulties or loss of their home or loss of a job, relationship difficulties, aging parents, children in trouble, unhappy time in life, facing illness, facing old age, possibly dying. So take a few moments and see in your circle who you might like to bring in as the suffering person. Please take a moment and select that person.

And once you pick them, bring them into the moment with you so that you can really see them, feel them, hear them as though they're alive right now with you. And as you connect with them, remember your connection, any degree of warmth and friendship you've had with the person, times you've shared. Remember their potential for happiness, for well-being. So there's a foundation of loving kindness as you look on them.

But now they're going through some difficulties. And so let yourself bring into your mind the problems they're facing. You might imagine them in their home or the situation where they're feeling the suffering of it. Whatever the source of the difficulty, you can feel its impact on them, the weight of it that they carry, recognizing that this is something that could happen to any of us.

And so as you hold them, connect with their difficulty, and send them your wish with a compassion phrase: May you be free from your suffering.

Or may you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion. Or I care about your pain and sorrow. Try these different compassion phrases. See what connects for you and just hold them in your heart and repeat this phrase to them.

Let there be a little space between the phrases so that you can just drop back into your heart center and feel their situation again. So that compassion like metta is felt through the body. Don't try to make any particular feeling come. Just connect with the person and say the phrase and then notice how you're feeling. And let the practice evoke whatever mood is going to fit.

If you find some difficulty in connecting with the person you've chosen, then you might try another being. Remember that you could try an adult, a child, an animal, a pet. Remember that compassion is a brahmavihara, a divine abiding and not a state of suffering. If you find yourself suffering with a person, you might just imagine how Kuan Yin might see them. How would the bodhisattva of compassion be able to look upon this being and see with equanimity?

And now bringing ourselves in for the practice of compassion. Coming into this moment, into your body again, feeling yourself as you sit here and now. Coming into your heart center and letting that be a connection to who you are. So in touch with yourself, some of your good qualities and your potential for happiness, your sincere wish for happiness. So that we begin by holding ourselves with the open-hearted attitude of loving kindness.

And then letting our attention bring to view things that are not going so easily in our life right now. Could be little things, could be big things. Could be we don't like tempeh for lunch. Could be we don't like the cold air coming in from the north today. Could be bigger difficulties in our meditation, hindrances or physical pain. Could be difficulties in our life outside—relationships or money or work, family. Could be our illness, our aging.

And as we recall the difficulties we're having, remembering that any of us could be having these. Our suffering doesn't mean that we've done it wrong or that we're an unworthy person. These are universal qualities. So connecting with what's difficult in our life and then embracing that with this wish of compassion. May I be free from my pain and sorrow. Or may I hold the suffering with compassion? Or I care about my suffering. Trying the different phrases with yourself, seeing which one best expresses what you want for yourself. And then as you stay in touch with your being, with your nature, aware of the difficulties, just continuing to repeat the compassion phrase for yourself.

Suffering can make us feel separate and isolated, but if we can hold it with compassion, it can make us feel united, joined and connected in the suffering that all sentient life experiences.

If you start to feel a little overwhelmed by the difficulties that you're facing, getting into that near enemy territory of grief, then change the focus a little. You could go back to your suffering person or you go back to something more uplifting like loving kindness for your benefactor. So check the development of the meditation and if it's in an area that feels a little uncomfortable, it feels a little too much, find another place in the brahmaviharas, probably in loving kindness, that can restore the balance of mind, can bring in some brightness and uplift. And then once you feel balanced again, you can continue the compassion for self.

And in the last minute of the meditation, extending this sense of compassion, of care out in a boundless way to all beings everywhere. Recognizing that all beings who take birth want to be happy and don't want to suffer. But every being has some degree of suffering in their life—having that sincere wish that all beings everywhere may be free from their suffering, that they hold their pain and sorrow with compassion. May all beings be free.

So I think this meditation of compassion for self is really, really useful as you walk the path. One person, one teacher said it's like finding gold on the path, because it really can give us a different way to relate to the pain that we run into. You know, mindfulness can hold things to a certain extent, but then mindfulness reaches a point maybe where it's not shifting things very much. And we can feel stuck, even with a lot of mindfulness.

Bringing in compassion for self at that point, whether it's with emotion or physical pain, gives us a new relationship to it. It's a new way to hold it. It doesn't deny it. Like metta can sometimes seem too idealistic. You know, we're really struggling and we go, may I be happy? That's like fantasy land. But this meditation touches, acknowledges the pain that's there and says, you can hold this with compassion. That's a possibility for you. And so it can bring in a real level of peacefulness.

in our relationship to it, where we're not having to have it go away, but we can hold it with a different spirit.

So I really encourage you to try this during these guided meditations—develop the compassion meditation—but also try it if you get into a hard place in your life or your practice outside of these guided meditations. It's really a tremendous tool.

The beauty of this practice is that it meets us exactly where we are. It doesn't ask us to pretend everything is fine or to bypass our genuine struggles. Instead, it offers us a way to be present with our difficulties while wrapped in the warmth of our own compassionate heart. This shift in how we relate to our pain can be profoundly healing and transformative.

When we learn to hold our suffering with compassion rather than resistance, we discover that we have more capacity than we imagined. We find that we can be present with life's challenges without being overwhelmed by them. This is the gift of compassion practice—it doesn't eliminate our difficulties, but it changes our entire relationship to them, offering us a refuge of kindness even in the midst of struggle.

Unentangled Knowing

> Drawing from the Thai Forest tradition and teachings of Upāsikā Kee, Guy Armstrong examines how we become entangled in experience through the process of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda). He focuses on four key links: contact at the six sense doors, feeling tone (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging (upādāna) - showing how each moment of grasping constructs a temporary sense of self that inevitably leads to suffering. Armstrong demonstrates how freedom is found in the gap between feeling and craving, where we can rest in what Ajahn Chah calls the 'natural mind' - an unconditioned peace that doesn't require construction through effort. He offers practical guidance from Sayādaw U Tejāniya for checking our attitude by asking: 'Is greed present? Is aversion present? Is delusion present?' This 'unentangled knowing' allows awareness to remain clear and present without getting caught up in the constant arising and passing of phenomena, offering a taste of the deathless (amata) quality that points toward full liberation.

A couple of talks ago I talked about how we construct this sense of self again and again and how our proliferations of thought lead us into that territory and how the sense of self is felt as limiting and constricting and leads us into different kinds of unhappiness and difficulty.

Tonight I want to talk some more about how that sense of self gets constructed, and then I also want to look at how it can be released.

Hopefully the motivation for all of us in doing Dharma practice is to some extent a way to find greater freedom in our life—freedom of heart, freedom of mind. And I think there's an important question to ask around this question of freedom: will we know it when we see it? And does freedom only come at the very end of a long, long path?

Because there is the possibility of that kind of freedom. That's what the Buddha pointed to again and again. He called it an unshakable deliverance of mind where the heart is freed from the constrictions of greed or aversion or confusion. So we might know when we hit that point, but that might not happen this retreat.

In a shorter term, is there such a thing as freedom? And what would that feel like? How would we know it when we encounter it? How can we recognize it? Because if we can recognize that and feel it coming alive in our practice, it can give us a lot of confidence, a lot of faith, and a lot of sense that the practice is taking us in the direction that we want to go. And it's very supportive.

So the talk tonight is titled Unentangled Knowing. This is a term that was used by a Thai laywoman teacher named Upasika Kee. For those of you who aren't native English speakers, this is a funny term, unentangled. Tangle, you probably know, means twisting or snarling or knotting up of different threads or yarn or string that makes a mess that's hard to pull apart. Then the verb entangle is just the process of making that tangle happen. And then putting "un" in front of it means we don't go into the creation of that tangle. So this is what Upasika Kee is pointing to in meditation: How do we keep from getting all tangled up in our experience?

Because the Buddha used this concept of a tangle over and over again to point to the way that we relate to the experience of living. He put it in a couple of different ways that I'll just mention briefly.

One quote: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn." This is a powerful image. Everywhere you look in the world, you can see this, can't you? How people's actions for getting or pushing away cause so much confusion and pain and harm to one another.

Or here's another quotation. This quotation was used as the opening to the Visuddhimagga, a 6th century commentarial text—a standard meditation manual in our tradition. This is the opening framing of the Visuddhimagga:

"A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle." True, isn't it? "So I ask of Gotama this question"—this is a Buddhist family name, Gotama —"who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

The answer that the Visuddhimagga gives is that one who is developed in conduct, in meditation, and in wisdom disentangles this tangle and goes toward freedom.

So Upasika Kee used this image in one of her talks, "An Unentangled Knowing," and I first want to just mention who she is. She has a really wonderful book that's been translated into English of her talks called Pure and Simple. It was translated by Thanissaro Bhikkhu, and I really recommend it. It's a very good Dharma book and one of the best books by a woman in our tradition that I'm aware of.

She started to teach in the 1950s, and then she died in 1978. So she taught for close to 30 years in a small setting in Thailand, but she became very well known. Thanissaro Bhikkhu says that she was the foremost woman teacher in Thailand in the 20th century. So that's a strong statement. One does not find so many women teachers in Thailand because the monks have a little bit of a monopoly on the Dhamma. But she stood out for the depth and the purity of her teaching, and also because she was a laywoman. She wasn't even an ordained nun. She taught as a layperson. And yet her Dhamma was very deep and profound.

So this is the quote that I want to build the talk around today: "An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside."

Maybe that'll give you a little bit of a flavor.

An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside. So I'll go through this in more detail as we go, but I wanted to frame it in that way.

What she's pointing to is a knowing—another synonym for awareness or mindfulness—that's clearly in touch with all the elements of our experience without getting caught up or tangled in them. In order to understand how we can be with our experience with awareness but not get tangled up, we want to do what the Buddha did, which is to analyze how we get tangled.

You'll notice that the Buddha was very precise about explaining how suffering and this bondage and limitation happen. And by understanding it clearly with wisdom, we understand how to release it and how to be free.

I think this unentangled knowing is happening for all of us in many moments during the day. This is not something that will be new for you, but we may not be tuning into it. So I hope by looking at the way that we often get caught and the way it is to be released, you'll start to notice when it's happening and that will accelerate the process of freeing ourselves.

Toward the end of the talk, I also want to describe a few meditation approaches that lead in this direction of unentangled knowing.

As I begin, I want to mention that the vocabulary in this talk is drawn largely from the Thai forest tradition. Upasika Ki taught in that tradition, and I'll use many references from that lineage. It's a little different from the vocabulary and some of the understandings you'd find in other Theravadan schools.

For example, our meditation instructions come from the teachings of Mahasi Sayadaw. He was a Burmese monk, very orthodox in terms of his place in the Theravadan tradition and connection to the Visuddhimagga and the Abhidhamma. This brings about tremendous precision and clarity in relationship to the events in our experience.

The Thai forest tradition is a little more open-minded, I would say. It has more of a heart quality. What's interesting about Spirit Rock is that we hold both these lineages in our teachings here. Our meditation instructions and much of our approach comes from the Burmese side of Mahasi Sayadaw, and yet much of the spirit and the reverence for nature comes from the Thai forest tradition.

It's kind of interesting to marry these two schools, which have not been so married in Asia. In Asia, the schools are going down their own tracks, and here we're bringing them together. So tonight I want to talk largely from the perspective of the Thai forest.

We want to understand how the constriction happens, how the self gets constructed in order to see how we can release that. The model that I want to use tonight for showing this construction of self is that of dependent origination—what may be the most profound insight of the Buddha.

But I don't want to go through the whole chain tonight. Dependent origination is described in terms of twelve causal links that begin with ignorance, lead through momentary experience, and land in suffering. And then the suffering tends to cause more ignorance and starts the chain again. So it describes the way beings get locked into the cycle of suffering again and again until we find a path. By understanding how it arises, we also learn how to release it.

In dependent origination, there are twelve links, but tonight I only want to focus on four—what I consider the heart of the chain for a practitioner. The first five links get kind of philosophical, and we don't need to go there tonight. Then there are the four very experiential links, and then the last three links are also kind of philosophical. So we're just going to go into the links that I think map most closely onto our experience.

To begin, I want to come back to something we've talked about before. What's our basic situation as human beings or sentient beings? I think we've said that we are aware, and in that awareness, we are always having contact. Things are impinging on our senses of varying natures.

This is one of the discourses where the Buddha talked about this, and he started by addressing the bhikkhus. In this context, I think someone mentioned bhikkhu means a dedicated person of practice. So male or female, lay or monastic, you are all bhikkhus for the sake of this retreat.

He said, "Bhikkhus, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully and I will teach you the totality of life." I love this as an opening. Who would dare to say this? Einstein didn't say it. Marx didn't say it. Freud didn't say it. But here's the Buddha 2600 years ago: "I'll teach you the totality of life."

And what is the totality? It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who claimed to describe a totality other than this would not know what they were talking about.

I love this description because it frames our experience in a way that's really simple to understand. I think it's the genius of the way the Buddha saw that he could see life in such simple and direct terms. So many other systems—and I would include Einstein, Marx, and Freud—get so conceptual, they're built on proliferation.

The Buddhist system brings us into direct experience. You may have heard the phrase, perhaps from Gestalt therapy, "lose your mind and come to your senses." This points to the same truth. We are trying to extricate ourselves from the entire web of conceptual proliferation, which is so complicating and not always truthful, and return to the direct moment-to-moment experience of life.

The direct moment-to-moment experience is remarkably simple. There are only ever six things happening: sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, and objects of mind—primarily thoughts and emotions. If you master your relationship to each of these six fields, you master life. It's that simple. But it's not that simple, is it? Still, this gives us a very clear framework to approach our experience, and it's the framework from which our meditation is drawn. We're learning to be mindful in these six sense spheres of sight, sound, smell, taste, sensation, thoughts, and feelings. This is where mindfulness is established.

There's one other essential element we need to bring in. When we encounter sight, sound, smell, taste, or touch, we're aware of them. That awareness is a key piece, or we could call it consciousness. When a sound arises, we hear it. That hearing has an element of awareness or knowing—consciousness. There's a knowing of the sound that arises with the sound. If the sound arose next to a dead body, would the awareness be there? No. Consciousness has departed from the body, so there wouldn't be any hearing experience. But we're awake, we're alive, we're conscious, and we hear the sound.

So there's the sound and the hearing of it because our ears are working. The meeting of these three—the sound, the ear, and the consciousness—is what makes for contact. Because we're conscious, we're experiencing contact at these six sense doors.

This is the first link of dependent origination that we'll start with: the link of contact. It simply means that our senses are alive, we're conscious, they're functioning, and we're having experiences of seeing and hearing, smelling, tasting, touching, and thinking and feeling. Contact is happening at the six sense doors all the time when we're awake. Can you turn it off? Can you simply say, "I'll stop seeing" with your eyes open, "I'll stop hearing"? No, it's happening all the time. So this is the first link—actually the sixth link in the chain of dependent arising, but the first link we'll look at tonight.

Contact is happening constantly at these six sense doors. Then contact leads to the next link in the chain: feeling tone, or vedanā, which Temple spoke about several nights ago. This means that as contact is happening, these six kinds of sense objects are being registered as pleasant, painful, or neither pleasant nor painful. Can you choose whether the contacts feel pleasant or painful? Can you monitor it and say, "Let all my contacts be pleasant"? Not possible, is it? The contacts come through and the difficulty is they vary widely. Some are very pleasurable, some are very painful, some are fairly neutral. We're simply on the receiving end of that effect. This variation is what makes life challenging. We don't know what to expect. It's part of the uncertainty.

Feeling tone is so central and important because it's the basis for reactive formations. When the feeling tone is pleasant, if you're not paying attention, what's the conditioned reaction to pleasant feeling? Greed, isn't it? You want to hold on, keep a hold of the pleasant. What's a conditioned reaction for something that's unpleasant? Aversion—we want to push it away. What's a conditioned reaction for something that's neutral? Delusion. We don't notice it because we're so preoccupied with the pleasant and the painful.

So these three conditioned reactions of greed, aversion, and delusion go together to make up the next link in the chain. If we're not mindful, the conditioned reaction is summed up with the word craving. Craving is the force that Sally talked about a few nights ago. It's the second noble truth, the cause of suffering. It emphasizes the desire force, so it seems more closely related to greed.

But if you think about it closely, aversion is also expressing a kind of desire. Aversion says, "I don't want this experience, I want that experience." So it's expressing a strong preference too. Craving can manifest as either greed or aversion. And the delusion is we don't see it. We don't see how greed and aversion operate and keep the mind spinning. When we start to see it, which mindfulness uncovers for us, then we start to realize this doesn't work so well. And we start to let go a little more of those reactive formations.

So you could say that craving encompasses greed, aversion, and delusion, or is made up of greed, aversion, and delusion. And it stands for the reactive formations toward pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral objects brought about through contact. So craving is the next link in the chain of dependent arising. We have contact. Based on contact, there's feeling. Based on feeling, the reactive formation is craving.

And then feel what happens when craving comes in. There's the first kind of recognition that there's something happening there that might be either pleasant or repellent. You want to go toward it or you want to go away. The mind leans toward it and then the next thing that happens is we take a hold of it. Obviously we take a hold of the pleasant to hold on, but in order to push something away, we have to take a hold of that too in order to push away. So this taking a hold quality is known as grasping or clinging. So that's the fourth link that we're going to look at tonight.

Out of the reactive formation comes this movement toward that takes a hold of. And that's how craving leads right into clinging. The reactive formation leads the mind to fixate on that thing that has captured our attention and then to take a hold of it, either to pull it toward or to push it away.

So you can sort of see the way the links go. There's contact. The contact brings feeling. The feeling conditions craving, and the craving leads us to fixate, take a hold of, and cling.

Now these four steps happen so quickly that it's very hard to separate them out. It's almost like there's a pleasant contact and we've taken a hold of it. So don't think that in your mindfulness you're going to be able to break it down. "Oh, there's contact for a few seconds. I'll get cozy with that. Then a few seconds later some feeling tone will come up and I'll see that forming. I got that. And then a few seconds later there's some wanting. Then the mind slowly inclines to take a hold of it."

I wish it were that easy. But instead it's like knee pain, grasping, "Ah, ah, ah."

So you have to kind of explore this territory again and again to pick out the individual pieces. All four can go by in a second. But as the mind slows down, as the concentration develops, you start to pick it up. You pick up maybe one of them in one sequence. And in another sequence, you pick up another one. And then you see another one. So little by little, as the mind slows, you'll start to get a feeling. But you need to examine it and explore it in your direct experience a number of times in order to see these four links working together. And then you'll see it's quite a brilliant description of moment to moment, how we go from contact, which is just automatic for a sentient being. All sentient beings are having this contact to getting tangled with it. It's the craving and clinging that make for the tangle. Because we want to stop time and take a hold of something or make it go a different direction. Then we become entangled with the simple facts of our experience based on these reactive formations of liking and disliking.

So you can see this happening over and over again in life from the time that we're babies. All these different objects come into our world and we have to make relations to them.

That's kind of what growing up is about—finding our relationship to all the features of life. So we start making relationship with mother and breast and food and father and playmates and school and homework and high school and attractive people and college and sex and work and career and Lady Gaga and MTV and Barack Obama and the global economic crisis.

In all of that, there are going to be things we really want to hold to and things we really don't want anywhere near us. And our life gets tangled up in all these likes and dislikes, becomes so complicated.

The basic message of the chain of dependent arising—we've just gone through one section of it—is that once you've gone into clinging, there's going to be suffering. That's the heart. Clinging leads inevitably to suffering, and we'll go through why that is with a couple of examples.

Let's say you're an eight-precept yogi and you wander down to the dining hall this evening feeling a little hungry, but you want to go down for that nice glass of juice that the cooks are putting out for you. So you wander down and as you walk in the door, you get the smell of the tom yum soup. Oh, those Thai spices—they're like the best. And you're so hungry, and you start thinking, "Why did I ever take eight precepts? A little hot Thai soup would be so nice tonight. Why did I do that?"

And then you see the peanut butter. Oh, no. Missing the spreads, too.

So you go over and pour yourself your little glass of juice and sit down at a table and watch other people enjoying their peanut butter and crackers and smell that tom yum soup. And you go, "Why did I ever do this? I'm so hungry. Maybe I should just go off tonight. Could I just go off for one night? But then I'd throw off the cook's count and people have seen me with my juice and they'd think I was being a really bad eight-precept yogi if I did that. Maybe I could come back in later, sneak in after they've all gone and get a little bit of the crackers and peanut butter. But I wouldn't feel so good about myself if I did that. And so, oh, this eight-precept thing—I should never have done this in the first place. I should have just gone on a system where I could eat if I wanted and didn't eat if I didn't want."

You can sort of go on like this for a while, right? One can spin out for a while on the food issue on eight precepts, for sure.

So what's happened is there's been a contact, which has been pleasant. There's been a craving, and it's led to a judgment of one's own situation and a disliking: Don't like this eight-precept stuff.

In that taking hold of the food situation—being on eight precepts and being hungry—what we do is we construct a new self. We construct the self which is, "Now I'm the hungry yogi. I'm the hungry yogi who's dissatisfied with the eight-precept resolution." And then we dwell in that for a while. We take birth as that hungry yogi. Might be for thirty minutes, might be for an hour, might have gone into the next sitting. Feel the stomach rumbling; the juice didn't fill it up. I'm still feeling hungry.

So we take birth as this hungry yogi for a while, and it's not a very happy birth. And then eventually that clinging is released. We're not going to carry this issue around the rest of the retreat. At some point, we're going to drop it. And when we drop it, the mind comes back into some kind of balance, which it always does. Upasaka Ki calls this the natural mind. When the mind comes back into balance and things are cool again, that's the natural mind.

So we've dropped the fixation on the hungry yogi. We've come back into balance, natural mind, things are nice again. So what we could say is that hungry yogi died for us to return to the natural mind. Here we had the formation of a new self. It was a new birth, the hungry yogi. And then after a while, that being, that self was temporary and it died. So we had a painful birth, but the death was actually quite pleasant. Taking hold of something difficult, we have a painful birth but a happy death.

Now suppose you come in at 6:30 and you have a really concentrated sitting. And then there's the delight of mastering the subject of concentration and being at ease, being relaxed, being effortlessly present, being able to stay steady with my attention minute after minute. And then we start to think, "I'm really getting the hang of this meditation."

Now that I've got it, the rest of the retreat is going to be like this. I finally figured it out. I'll be able to meditate like this, and I think I'll be able to take this back into my daily life. So I found the secret. I'm going to be able to be like this in my relationships, in my job, with my family. This is so cool. I'll just be so mellow in everything I do—wise and compassionate. Gosh, this is great.

And then we get up and 7:15 comes and the bell rings. We go outside and trip over something, or somebody's in our way on our path to the restroom, and all that nice mellow energy fades. We get a little disgruntled and our faith is shaken. Maybe I'm not going to be able to carry this forward anymore. We get very stirred up and come into the dharma talk just wanting some nice reassuring words from James, but unfortunately the talk is on some difficult theme like dependent origination. Oh no. It's such a bummer.

So here, the birth has been quite pleasant. We've taken birth as the good yogi, the concentrated yogi, the successful yogi. And it's a very pleasant place to be. We look at the rest of our life and it looks really open and beautiful and inviting. Our relationships, our daily life, our work—they all look great. It's a wonderful birth, kind of a heaven realm birth. I can float through the rest of my life on this concentration cloud. It's really groovy.

And then we go out, a few things happen, and it breaks up. That death is really painful. There's such a longing to be back in that concentrated state.

So here we've taken hold of something pleasant, but when it changes, that being dies and that death is really difficult. With the hungry yogi, we had an unhappy birth but a pleasant death by taking hold of the food issue. By taking hold of the concentration issue, we had a very pleasant birth but a painful death.

So either way, whether we hang on to the pleasure or the pain, there's suffering—either immediately or when it changes. Clinging inevitably leads to some kind of pain, immediate or through impermanence. So that "I" dies away, and one way or another, we suffer.

What we're starting to see is that this taking hold of, this act of clinging or grasping—and they're the same word in Pali, by the way—we use different words in English, but the Pali word is upadana. We use "grasping" to refer to the act of first taking hold, and we use "clinging" to refer to the ongoing quality of holding on. It's the same word in Pali, and that's this link of upadana.

What happens is when we hold on to something, we make a self. We take birth as a new "I" through this holding on. And in birth, there's going to be some kind of suffering. So this grasping is synonymous with the creation of a new self.

Andy Olendzki, the scholar at the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, explains this well: "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds onto or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

The key thing is that grasping is not something that you or I do, but rather when grasping takes place, a new sense of self is born. And that's all that it is. That's all that the sense of "I" is—just a momentary action of grasping.

So you might ask, well, who is it that grasps? But there's no answer to that question. There is no one behind the grasping. Grasping is just this process of fixating and clinging. There's nothing else there. There's no one there, but it's a capacity of mind to fixate and take hold of. That action creates the sense of self. And that's the only place the sense of self comes from—it is born from this.

If you've ever watched a monkey swinging through the vines in a jungle, you'll see that what the monkey does is grab hold of one vine and swing, not letting go of that one until there's another one there that they can grab onto to go a little further. So the way the monkey moves through the jungle is by grabbing one vine after another and swinging on it.

So for most of us, until we're trained, we live in that same way—always grasping something, never letting go of one thing until we have something new to take hold of and build the self around.

So where is there any freedom in this? Is there any freedom, or is this inevitable—this grasping and being born and dying and suffering? Which is another way of asking: can this chain be broken somewhere? When you look at dependent origination, one link leads to the next, to the next, to the next, and they all lead to suffering. So can the chain be broken somewhere?

Classically, the way that breaking is understood is between feeling and craving. We've talked about this—that when a pleasant experience comes up, but you don't fall into greed around it, there's peace. When an unpleasant experience comes up and you don't fall into aversion or hatred, there's peace. We've talked about bringing acceptance, bringing openness to a pain in the knee or a difficult emotion, or letting the beautiful state of metta live and breathe without trying to fixate or hold on.

This is really the heart of dependent origination in terms of our own experience. Can we bring acceptance around that element of feeling tone—to allow the unpleasant, allow the pleasant, allow the neutral—and not get carried away in reactivity? If we can, then the chain doesn't lead to craving, clinging, birth, and suffering. If the feeling tone exists but we don't develop craving around it, the rest of the chain doesn't continue.

So this is the classical place to find some degree of freedom. One teacher said, "The whole of the Buddhist path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving." It breaks the cycle of conditioned arising leading to suffering—resting in the gap between feeling and craving.

Now, in terms of vocabulary, this might sound like there's a time gap between feeling and craving—that you must be able to find a few seconds there to discover and come to equilibrium in. But it's very quick. To say it more exactly, it's becoming aware of feeling and not generating cravings. That lack of reactivity opens up some space, which might be felt as a gap. But very often, the feeling is there in one moment and the craving is there the next, and there's no experience of a gap. That's okay—it's been happening for a long time this way. It can happen a few cycles more.

But if there's a feeling and you don't respond with craving, what does that feel like? What is it like when there's a pain in the knee but you're not strongly averse to it? What is it like when there's a pleasant sit and you're not holding on to it? There's some kind of peace in that, isn't there? You can feel it. We hear it from you in the interviews—you're already reporting that.

We could call it peace, ease, calm, non-reactive, equanimous, balanced, steady, stable. The word I want to use tonight for that place is free. We're not confined. We're not limited. We're not taking birth at that time. As you explore this, I invite you to tune into the quality of freedom in that. The heart isn't being burdened with reactivity at that time. We're not out of touch—we can still see all the elements of our experience. That's not a problem. But by not reacting, we're finding some degree of peace or freedom.

So this degree of peace or freedom that we're coming into—is it constructed? Is it something we brought about by a lot of doing? Did we create that peace through effort in the moment? Or did it come when we stopped doing? If we stop craving, is that peace there?

Yes.

So this is an important thing to check out—we don't have to manufacture peace.

We just have to stop disturbing it with craving, with greed, aversion, and delusion.

So this is one of the pointings of dependent arising: that when we acknowledge feeling and we don't move into craving, there's a natural kind of intrinsic peace that's there in the mind. It doesn't disconnect from the things that are coming and going. It doesn't disconnect from contact. But we find a different relationship to it.

The things that are coming and going—they're all conditioned. But in this kind of peace, we're finding something that's not so conditioned. It's not so constructed by our effort. It's kind of like it's always there if we let it be. That "always there" quality points to something less conditioned, less subject to arising and passing, less formed by changing causes and conditions.

This is from Ajahn Chah. It's a little long, but I hope you'll appreciate it:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself. The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

"The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are: as transient, imperfect and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

Finding this space where feeling has arisen but craving hasn't arisen is the ability to rest, is the ability to discover peace, and there's the taste of the Dhamma in this. We're not taking birth, we're not turning into some new form of I, new form of self.

The Buddha wandered around northern India for forty-five years after his awakening, teaching. The dominant religious strain in northern India at that time was Brahmanism, which was generally a fairly wealthy ecclesiastical class who had a bit of a lock on recognized religion of the time. They had many rituals and chants and sacred texts that they based their faith and understanding on.

The Buddha was one of these wanderers outside the established religious system, questioning, looking at things in different ways, taking fresh viewpoints and practicing meditation. So it's interesting—sometimes he would go into these villages, being an outsider, just a wanderer, and come up against these established Brahmins. Some of them would really resent his presence because he was kind of a challenge to the orthodox order. But then there are these very sweet encounters where some of the Brahmins are genuinely interested in what he has to say.

There's this one section in the texts where a group of young Brahmin men come up and ask the Buddha questions. It's kind of touching because they're stepping outside their own tradition and really inquiring in a fresh way. Here's one of these questions from a Brahmin youth who asks the Buddha: "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?"

Wouldn't you have liked to ask the Buddha this question? What is liberation like for one who is freed?

And the Buddha replies: "That sage is without desire. They have nothing. They are unentangled in becoming."

So this "becoming" is another image for the construction of a self—how we become the hungry yogi or the concentrated yogi or the lonely yogi or the partner or the daughter or the father, whatever. We become all these different things through our own construction. This word "becoming" is quite central to the generation of self in these teachings.

This again is Ajahn Chah. You can imagine him delivering this talk in an outdoor Thai hall, a sala, because the weather is quite comfortable. They don't need walls and windows and heat. Many of the outdoor halls are just a floor and pillars around the outside supporting a roof, but the whole thing is open air. So he would often speak in these open-air halls.

This talk was probably delivered in a place like that. He's addressing the people who are listening, and he said:

"The roof is a becoming. The floor is a becoming. But in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness."

Nibbana, you might know, is the fruition of the path—the end of suffering. Nibbana is this empty space where there's no becoming, where there is no taking a stand. Resting in the gap between feeling and craving is resting in that empty space where there's no becoming. And to put it bluntly, nibbana is that space.

Now, he's using the term nibbana a little bit loosely here. So someone from an orthodox Theravadan tradition would say this is heresy—this is not the proper use of the term. But in the Thai forest tradition, you hear this kind of language. So we're going to say that it's not the final nibbana or the ultimate nibbana, but it is a taste of nibbana. This peace that we experience when we don't fall into craving is a taste of liberation, a taste of the ultimate peace.

This is sometimes also called the deathless. Why is it deathless? Because it's not come from taking birth. It's not come from something constructed, because everything constructed will pass away. But this space comes not from doing or creating—it comes from not doing. When we stop disturbing, that space is already there.

So through this ability to rest in this gap, we start to get a little bit of a preview of freedom, or we could say a little taste of freedom here and now. In a way, this can become a kind of fruition or goal. We're reaching our goal here and now, and we may reach it many times in a day. And so to start to recognize when these moments come where greed, aversion, and delusion aren't arising, where craving isn't arising, and feel into the quality of that space—feel into the peace or ease or freedom or openness.

One of the other things you'll discover is that this peace is also where the beautiful states of mind come through quite easily. When we rest in that peace, the heart isn't so burdened and then it's easy to move into loving kindness, compassion, forgiveness, joy, contentment, happiness. So start to investigate—feel into the quality of heart and mind when the reactivity isn't forming as a new kind of self. And then that can be the scent that we follow to the fullness of freedom.

This little taste of freedom is a little bit of the goal, but it's also a path. If you rest in that state and you get to know it, that peace, it is onward leading. It keeps leading to more and deeper experiences of that peace and ease and freedom. So it's a little bit like—we were talking about this at tea time—being near a bread factory. You know how great it is to drive near a factory where they're making bread because the smell is like nothing else? So you get a whiff of that and you may be a couple of blocks away and you don't know exactly where it is, but if you keep following the direction where the smell gets stronger, you get to the factory.

So this little whiff of freedom—if we keep following it, let that be the scent of freedom, and we keep following that, it leads us to the fullness of freedom. So we trust in that.

We're not cut off from anything. Contact is happening, we're open, we're knowing, we're aware, but we're free in relationship to everything that's happening. The six sense doors are alive, awake, rich, but we're not caught up in them.

This is from Ajahn Jumnien and another teacher in the Thai forest tradition. The best way to develop a great awareness—and the term he was using here was maha sati. Maha means great, sati means mindfulness. The way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their nature of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless.

So see what happens when you rest your attention in that open space. Let it fill that space in between feeling and craving and see what that's like. The awareness is there and full. Phenomena are still coming and going, but we're not caught. So what is the quality of the mind at that point? And could the quality of the mind itself be where our attention lands?

So far we've been emphasizing using breath, body, sounds to anchor. But as our meditation develops and there's more stability, sometimes for people an interest develops in what's the quality of mind that is aware? What's the quality of mind that is knowing? So there's this kind of natural shift that can happen away from just objects to the knowing itself. And this is a little where Upasaka Kee is pointing with that phrase of unentangled knowing.

This is Upasaka Kee: "So your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact."

If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on.

So basically she's saying, is the mind resting and knowing its own clear nature, or is it going out and trying to take hold of objects? If it's taking hold of objects, troubles will arise.

This is the way Ajahn Chah described the same exact kind of practice. If you want to see a train, just go to the Central Station. You don't have to go traveling all the way up the Northern Line, the Southern Line, the Eastern Line, the Western Line to see all the trains. If you want to see trains, every single one of them, you'd be better off waiting at Grand Central Station. That's where they all terminate.

Just look right here, he pointed to his heart, at Central Station. Greed arises here. Anger arises here. Delusion arises here. Just sit here and you can watch as all these things arise. Practice right here because right here is where you're stuck. Right here is where the conditioned arises and right here is where the Dhamma will arise.

It takes a little stability to be with the heart and its movements in that way. So there's one practice I want to recommend as a way in to this way of looking. It's a practice that is taught by Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who we've mentioned before. Someone mentioned that he asked these three questions: Are you aware? What are you aware of? And what's your relationship to it?

So this third question, he expands in more detail by asking three more questions. To check on the movement of the heart in any moment, you can ask yourself: is greed present? Is aversion present? Is delusion present? And if it is, just pay attention to that experience of greed, of aversion, or delusion.

Now that's sometimes not so easy to see. So you can refine the question. How do you know if greed is present? You ask yourself, am I wanting something else to happen? It does arise like that, doesn't it? We want our experience to be another way.

Is aversion present? You can ask the question, am I wanting something to stop happening? That happens a lot too, doesn't it? The knee pain, the difficult mind state, the restlessness, the boredom.

Or to see if delusion is present, you can ask the question, am I not in touch with what's happening? Usually once we ask that question, we're back in touch. So the answer usually once we ask is no.

But this is a way you can check in any moment. Is there greed? Am I wanting something else to happen? Is there aversion? Am I wanting something to stop happening? Is there delusion? Am I not in touch with what's happening?

You can ask these three questions several times during a sitting. As you get comfortable with looking that way—we call this checking the attitude—you can ask more often. And as you get really comfortable, you can make checking the attitude your primary practice.

Let your attention rest in the heart where Ajahn Chah is pointing, where all the trains come from, and just see if there's a movement into greed or aversion or delusion. Recognize each of them as they happen. And when we're aware in this way, we can stay very centered and very alert to the movements of the heart.

The mind that's aware in this way, this is Upasaka Ki again, the mind that's aware in this way doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. That means out toward objects. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way. In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside.

So the flavor of this practice is when the attention is somewhat steady, we bring it to bear on our own heart and the movements of our own heart. And we just start to look: am I heading off toward wanting?

Am I heading off toward disliking? Am I heading off to spacing out? And if we are, we just become mindful of that. And that mindfulness starts to bring the attention back into the center, back into this balanced, peaceful ease of non-reactivity. And that can be our primary way of looking, our primary meditation focus.

I'll close with one more quote from one of these Brahmin youths. This is in the same section where the other Brahmin youth was talking to the Buddha. This is a Brahmin youth named Kappa who asked the Buddha: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger"—it's just an image for the realm of samsara, of birth and death—"overwhelmed with aging and death, tell us the island, dear sir."

And the Buddha replies: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is Nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is Nirvana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death.

CHAPTER 123

Brahmavihāra Practice

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> In this concluding talk from a month-long retreat sequence, Guy Armstrong offers deep teachings on upekkhā (equanimity), the fourth of the brahmavihāras or divine abodes. He emphasizes that equanimity is not emotional detachment but rather a balanced awareness that allows feelings to arise without disturbance, providing the foundation that prevents mettā, karuṇā, and muditā from falling into their near and far enemies.
> Armstrong explores how equanimity requires both wisdom—understanding that present conditions arise from countless past causes—and trust in the lawful nature of existence. He offers various phrases for practice, from the traditional "all beings are heirs of their karma" to gentler alternatives like "things are just as they are" and "I care for you but cannot control your happiness." The guided meditation systematically extends equanimity from neutral persons through difficult relationships to all beings everywhere.
> This teaching illuminates how the four brahmavihāras work together as an integrated system, with equanimity providing stability while being warmed by the other three divine abodes. Perfect for practitioners seeking to understand how balanced awareness can serve both inner peace and compassionate engagement with the world's joys and sufferings.

This is our last day on the whole sequence of the Brahmaviharas that we're presenting. Today we're going to be leading into equanimity for all beings, and that rounds out the set.

I want to say a few words about equanimity before we start. I want to begin with a story from Sylvia Boorstein, one of our dear teachers. She had a friend who came up to her from one of the classes and said, "I finally found the best way to answer the question when people ask, 'How are you?' You know, you get that question all the time and you don't know whether to be sincere or phony when you answer."

So Sylvia's student said that she found a reply which was, "I couldn't be better." And that's a true statement that works in all situations, doesn't it? I couldn't be better. So I recommend that to you for your social life back in the world. But I also recommend it as a foundation for equanimity practice.

Because in a way, equanimity, whether we're looking at ourselves or someone else or the world, equanimity says it couldn't be better. It says it couldn't be otherwise. It says the way the present moment is is the result of so many past moments and so many different causes and conditions that this present moment could not have arrived here in any different way than it is arriving.

Given the truth of that, our job as meditators is to come into harmony with it. Otherwise we're fighting with reality, and you know who wins that battle. It doesn't mean we shouldn't in the next moment go out and try to change the causes and conditions that have created this moment. There's a lot of injustice in the world and wrongs and things that need to be corrected. But we feel it's better to try to do that work from a place of a balanced mind than from the place of a disturbed mind.

So as meditators, if we can come into a peace of mind, a balance of mind with the way things are now, that not only makes our life happier, but it gives us the right platform to go out and do our work in the world. Whether it's helping other people or changing the world or carrying out simple tasks.

This quality of balance of mind is in some ways the most important and central thing we're doing through the day. And when that balance gets disturbed and we fall into a strong reaction, the basic instruction is do what's needed to bring the mind back into balance. Balance is just another word for equanimity.

So equanimity shouldn't be confused with absence of emotion. I got that impression. I looked at these stone statues of the Buddha for a long time and I thought, "Oh, he's not feeling anything. So that's the way we want to end up, is not feel anything." And then I suppressed my emotions to try to align with that ideal. And that was really painful and a misunderstanding.

It's not about not feeling. Equanimity is about allowing the feelings that are there to be there and not be disturbed by them.

In particular, equanimity is what gives the mind strength. And that strength is what keeps us from falling into the near and far enemies of the brahmaviharas. If you take a look at the whole map of these Brahmaviharas and their near and far enemies, you come up with twelve different states and they describe a very good map of the heart's movement, where the heart can go.

Briefly, the way I understand it is the Brahmaviharas themselves are refined, cultivated, developed, beautiful qualities of heart and mind that we work towards and access more as we practice. But they're not always a given in our emotional life. We have to work towards them.

The next category down are the near enemies, which look like the Brahmaviharas, but have an unwholesome component. I think we've talked about all of these: attached affection, pity or grief, overexuberance, and for equanimity, it's indifference—cutting off feeling. So I see the near enemies as the basic neurotic, egoic relationship to life. They're not dreadful states. They're just states based on self rather than consideration for all beings. So the near enemies are kind of normal neurotic reactions to life.

The far enemies are the distorted, very reactive, painful responses to life.

So what keeps the Brahmaviharas from falling into the near and far enemies is equanimity. Metta that transcends attachment needs the foundation of a balanced mind. Compassion that doesn't fall into pity or grief needs the foundation of equanimity. Appreciative joy that doesn't fall into over-excitement needs the balance of equanimity. So it's when we get to this fourth Brahmavihara that we understand how they all four work together.

And then equanimity needs the warmth of the other three. If equanimity doesn't have, underlying it, metta, compassion, and joy, then it is cold. It is indifference. It is not feeling.

So metta, compassion, and joy have to warm up the heart so that true equanimity can reveal itself. When you're in a place of very refined equanimity, there may not be a lot of emotion present. You may be sitting in quiet meditation in the hall or in your home, where the suffering of the world, the joy of the world may not be impinging on you. Then equanimity can be a very refined, spacious, cool place to abide. That's perfectly fine.

But how do you know if it's equanimity or indifference? Bring to mind someone in a place of happiness, joy, or suffering and see if the heart moves with either mudita or compassion. That's how you can check it out.

So we want this kind of balance where the heart is supple, pliable, responsive, warm. But when it rests, it can simply rest in this very cool place of balance, not disturbed by our life, by others' lives, by life in general.

This takes two developments. One is wisdom. We need to see that everything that comes arises from many past causes and conditions, and it could not be otherwise. This is an equanimity phrase if you like it: "Things could not be otherwise." And it needs this element of trust. We have to trust in life itself. We have to trust the Dharma, the laws of this universe.

So if we have both those things—understanding and trust—then we can relax and the mind can be at peace. This particular reflection of equanimity really helps steer our minds to that kind of safe harbor. So it's a very powerful practice. Once, in a long retreat, I did ten days of intensive equanimity, and it was a very wonderful experience and deep in learning. So it's a practice that we can stay with for a long time, and it really shifts our understanding of how life unfolds. I recommend it to you.

If you don't like the karma phrase, as I imagine Kate and Heather both explained, there are many other phrases. So I'm going to read alternate phrases, as I imagine they did too, just to make sure you have a full range.

The karma phrase is: "All beings are the heirs of their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their past actions more than on my wishes for them." That's the classic phrase.

But here are some variations:

"All beings meet their joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature."

"All beings have their own journey."

"Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding according to a lawful nature."

"I care for you but can't control your happiness or unhappiness."

"I care about you, but I can't control the outcome of your life."

"I wish you well, but cannot keep you from suffering."

"Everything arises from past causes and conditions."

"Things are just as they are."

"This moment is just as it is."

"Things couldn't be otherwise."

So we will hold different individuals, we will hold all beings, and just use one of these phrases—the one that resonates for you without resistance—to try as you consider your life, their life, the process of living.

Let's begin the meditation. We'll start with the neutral person.

Please bring to mind your neutral person and see them as clearly as you can. If you've held them in metta, in compassion, in appreciative joy, you'll have some sense of different aspects of their character and some of their joys and sorrows. Let yourself intuit some of their joys and sorrows.

As you hold the neutral person, reflect that there are causes and conditions for the way their life has unfolded. Different events have made them the person they are. And among those events are their own intentions, the habits of their mind.

So if you'd like to use the phrase on karma, I find it most helpful to think of it in terms of the habits of the person's mind constructing their happiness or unhappiness moment by moment. Whatever phrase you like, begin to repeat that phrase as you hold the neutral person in your heart.

"You are the owner of your actions. Your happiness and unhappiness depend on your own habits of mind."

Now bring in either your benefactor or your good friend, whichever you'd like to connect with. As you bring in your benefactor or friend, you've gotten to know them well through these weeks of meditation.

So as you hold them, let yourself remember the good things and the difficult things in their life. Get a sense of their joys and sorrows. You may notice some movements of metta, of compassion, or mudita with this person because your heart is alive and responds to them. Allow those feelings to be there.

And then as you stay connected, just repeating your equanimity phrase: "Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding by a lawful nature," or "You will meet your joy and sorrow according to a lawful nature."

And then letting go of the friend or benefactor and bringing in yourself. Connecting with the image of yourself or just feeling yourself as you sit here and now. And you know really well the range of happiness and unhappiness in your life. You've touched on it through metta, through compassion, through joy. So coming in contact with the realm of your own experience, the range of it. And in touch with your deep wish for happiness, wish not to suffer.

And then can we each find a balance of mind in relation to the situation that we're in? Can we find this peace and acceptance of the way our life is today? So perhaps trying different versions of the phrase to see which one resonates with how we hold ourselves: "I am the owner of my actions. My happiness and unhappiness depends on my own habits of mind," or "Things are just as they are. This moment is just as it is. I couldn't be better."

And if you feel ready now, we can bring in the difficult person as a way to prepare for all beings. So if you like—you don't have to, but if you like to try it—then imagine your difficult person, bringing them into your field of awareness, seeing them if you can, perhaps at a distance, not too close.

And as you connect with a difficult person, remember the things in their life that are going well, the things in their life that are difficult. Remember their basic wish also is to be happy and not to suffer. And yet you may be able to see how their very actions lead them into more unhappiness, or how they could lead to happiness.

And so repeating for them an equanimity phrase that feels appropriate: "You are the owner of your actions. Your happiness and unhappiness come from your own habits of mind," or "I wish you well, but can't control your happiness and unhappiness," or "You meet your joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature."

And now beginning to open up the sense of equanimity, of balance in a limitless way. And we'll begin just with those of us in the meditation hall and perhaps just the few people who are sitting closest to you. And have a sense that your awareness can hold those who are somewhat near to you.

And as you connect with them, letting the image of different people just come into your mind for a few moments each. So you get a sense of your Dharma brothers and sisters who are sitting close by, who you've been sharing this month with. And as their face comes into view for a few moments, let yourself feel into their being and anything you felt about their joys, their difficulties in this time together. And appreciating the strength of their character continuing with the discipline of the practice.

And as you hold them in your mind, you might just feel if there's metta, compassion, joy for them. And then having a sense that this feeling of equanimity can extend outward from you and include them in their being, in their life, in their situation, in their hearts and minds. "Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding according to a lawful nature. All beings meet their happiness and unhappiness by a lawful nature. I wish you well, but can't control your happiness or unhappiness."

And then opening your awareness further to take in everyone in the hall at this time. And as you hold us all, let different people come into view for a little while. And just feel the different beings that are here. Let different images come so that this sense becomes personal. You're feeling a human life as you say the phrase.

And as different people come, let yourself feel their being, their happiness or unhappiness that you've seen or felt. With a sense of caring for all the support you may have gotten from them. And directing the equanimity phrase in a broad way to everyone in the hall: "All beings are the heirs of their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own actions of heart and mind."

Our lives are unfolding according to a lawful nature. So have a sense that the equanimity can be very wide and take in all of us, but at the same time it can become quite personal. You can think of one person and reflect on the phrase, touching them. And as you let different people come to mind, you'll feel the range of experience that a human life involves. Let the experience touch you and see if it can be held in balance.

Then opening your awareness in a really unlimited way. Open to all beings everywhere—beings on the land and beyond, beings we can see and those we can't, human beings, creatures, all other beings. Every being that is born faces this mixture of happiness and unhappiness, wishing to be happy and not to suffer, but life is mixed. Feeling the tenderness, the difficulties, the joys for all beings.

As you extend to all beings, let different beings come into your mind for a while. Beings at home whom you've left to come here—partners, children, parents, family, friends. Let yourself feel how their happiness and unhappiness is shaped by their own habits of mind, by their own actions. And beings further away, in states of health, in states of illness, in situations of ease or distress, in poor countries or in rich countries. All the animals, those who are free physically, those who have been captured, those treated with love and those treated with cruelty. I care for you, but I can't control your happiness and unhappiness. All beings are the heirs of their karma. All beings find their happiness and unhappiness through their own habits of mind.

May all beings be peaceful.
May all beings be happy.
May all beings be liberated.

I hope you get the sense of the vastness of this practice too, that it's not just a cold and unfeeling relationship to life. It can really hold the joys and sorrows and find our own balance of mind with it all. Reflecting on the all beings reflection really tends to bring out the universal quality of the range of experience in life—how we hold that with our own balance.

CHAPTER 124

The Attitude In Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this foundational dharma talk from an insight meditation retreat for experienced students, Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive framework for cultivating the proper attitude in awareness practice. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching from the Sabbāyatana Sutta on the totality of experience through the six sense doors, Armstrong explains three essential principles: relax (letting go of control and the grasping mind), observe (arriving fully in the present moment), and allow (accepting things as they are without inner resistance).
> Armstrong provides crucial clarification of key Buddhist terms, distinguishing between viññāṇa (consciousness - the basic knowing quality present in all sentient beings) and sati (mindfulness - the intelligent understanding that recognizes experience within the framework of the four satipaṭṭhāna). He explains how awareness in English encompasses both meanings, sometimes referring to spontaneous consciousness and other times to mindful understanding. The talk emphasizes how resting in pure awareness naturally embodies the three characteristics of nibbāna: freedom from greed, aversion, and delusion.

This evening I want to talk on the topic of an attitude for awareness.

There are two things I want to touch on in this talk. First, I want to go over some of the specific terms and technical language that we'll be using throughout this retreat. Philip touched on much of that this morning and described them beautifully, showing how they relate together and impact our experience. I want to expand on that a little bit.

The second thing I want to talk about is how we approach our practice—the spirit that we bring to it. This is quite an important part of practice. This is not just a mechanical process of following instructions that lead to predetermined results. There needs to be an inner relationship to what we're doing. This is sometimes described as having the right attitude in meditation, or taking the right approach. So I want to talk about the attitude with which we can approach our practice. This applies not only to this particular retreat, where we'll focus a lot on awareness, but to our meditation practice in general.

One teacher described this kind of right attitude with three simple words: relax, observe, allow. I think these are three really good guidelines for us for this whole week together. So I'll talk about each of these aspects.

In relaxing, we are both intending to relax the body and intending to relax the mind, insofar as they will do that. Sometimes they will not do that. Learning to relax the body is something that in the West we spend quite a bit of time on. We have developed the technology of massage and hydrotherapy and reflexology and all those different kinds of touch to bring relaxation to the body. Even then there are some aches and pains and tensions that just won't release. But we generally in the West haven't had a lot of understanding of how to relax the mind. This is really where the heart of relaxation has to come from.

How can we relax our mind? There are many things that make the mind not relaxed. The challenges of daily life bring movement from within our own mind that lead away from relaxation. We have reactions of wanting or not wanting, of desire and aversion, and all those forces tend to make the mind tight and unrelaxed.

In our meditation practice, we can get tight if we're afraid of doing it wrong. Sometimes we think if we miss one moment or do one stretch of meditation wrong, we're never going to get it and we're going to be a bad meditator forever. So we can get tight around that. We find, of course, that we can make all kinds of mistakes in meditation and somehow things keep unfolding. It's sort of amazing that despite some of our bad habits, it doesn't actually stop the meditation from working. That's very reassuring to find out.

Sometimes the mind can become unrelaxed if we really want something special to happen. I had quite a lot of this in the beginning of my practice. I had a quality that's generally considered good in meditation practice, especially in the beginning—something that's sometimes described as zeal. I had a lot of zeal in the start of my practice, but I have to say it was a little out of balance. Part of it was that I really wanted some result, like enlightenment or liberation or something major to happen, and I was pressing.

This was pointed out to me not long after I'd moved to California. My wife and I moved there some years ago, and not long after we arrived, some of our friends in the Dharma community were going to see a psychic. So I thought, I'll go see the psychic. That's kind of what you do when you go to California. You get your driver's license, you go to see a psychic, and then you've really landed.

She and I went to see this psychic together and we walked through the door. As we walked in, the psychic sort of did this big recoil from me. He said, "Hold on, you want it so much. Don't you know that God comes to those who don't want him so strongly?"

That was actually a really good intuition about this zeal that I was approaching meditation practice with. I have to say, I'm glad that I had that zeal, especially in the early part of my practice, because it's a tremendous motivator. It fueled really good years of serious practice. So I especially recommend it to young practitioners—don't worry about having a lot of zeal. It can carry you a long way. But at some point, and when I saw the psychic it was probably a good point, we need to start learning to bring it into balance. Otherwise we can burn ourselves out with that kind of dhammachanda, desire for the Dhamma, in meditation.

So there are all these different forces in the heart and mind working to bring contraction.

Our basic sense of self-centeredness and self-concern works to contract us. And to undo that, we have to learn this quality of relaxing. Really, in essence, this quality of relaxing is about letting go—about not clinging, not holding on, not controlling. But it's not something that comes so easily, so we want to investigate it and incline in that direction often.

You'll often hear us in the instructions point to this quality of relaxing. We mean to relax the body as much as possible and to begin to learn how to relax the mind, to let go a little bit of the mind's tendency to grasp and control.

When we're able to relax, this sends a very important message throughout the system. It sends a message to the brain that says something like, "Things are all right. Everything is basically okay." If we can bring that quality of relaxation in, then the mind knows it, the brain knows it, then the body gets the message and everything can start to settle a bit.

There is a deep reason in the Dharma why we can trust and what we can trust in. I want to relate this koan that comes from a Chinese Chan master many centuries ago. His name—which I'm not sure of the pronunciation of, but I read it as Shi Tou—was a Chan master some generations after Hui Neng, who I think was the fifth Zen ancestor and author of the Platform Sutra.

Shi Tou was in a dialogue with a seeker who was coming to him for advice and teaching. This seeker came to him and said, "What am I supposed to do?" And Shi Tou's reply was, "Why are you asking me?" So we might use this too during this retreat, so be forewarned.

He says, "Why are you asking me?" And the seeker says, "Where else can I find what I'm looking for?" And Shi Tou replies, "Are you sure you've lost it?"

"Are you sure you've lost it?" is another way of saying, "Are you sure you're not complete and whole and perfect just as you are?" It's a profound pointer to the basic nature of our own minds that each of us has, embodies, is. This basic nature, of which awareness is a direct expression, has a quality of awakeness, of purity, of never having been stained or corrupted.

As we start to trust in that and feel that, then we know we have something we can really trust in and relax into. The discovery of this is really the grounds for a quality of —we could call it—faith. The Pali word is saddhā. Faith is kind of a mixed word for Westerners because often we take it to mean belief, but it's maybe better translated as trust or confidence.

We discover this quality in ourselves, this basic goodness and purity, through our direct experience. Awareness plays a vital role in that. Awareness sort of leads us into the knowledge of that and the experience of that, the trust in that. Once we know that that is there within us, that's what we can relax into. We realize we don't have to make something up to make ourselves different than we are. There is this basic goodness, this basic nature that we just have to relax into, and it will hold us, it will support us, and it will respond with loving kindness, with compassion, with understanding, with insight.

I think for all of us on the teaching side, this quality of exploring awareness has been so helpful because it's led us into a trust in this basic nature. We'll talk more about that as we go through the retreat.

Sometimes we might describe it as relaxing, sometimes we might call it letting go, we might call it dropping. Another nice phrase is just settling back into the present moment. As we stop trying to make anything special happen, we can just settle back into the way things are right now. In that settling back with presence, with awareness, this nature will start to reveal itself, will start to be felt.

Once we touch this relaxation, the next word in attitude is observe. Observe is not my favorite word for this, but it's not bad. We could also say pay attention or be mindful or be aware. Observe is a nice short way, but observe sometimes feels a little too dualistic—like I'm removed and I'm going to watch from a distance something that's happening. Maybe a better word is feel. Feel into, sense, soften into our experience.

At any rate, once we relax, then we want to start to pay attention. What is our experience? What's happening? We learn to pay attention to many different aspects of the experience we're having. The key, of course, is that it's happening in the present moment. This is what we want to learn from—a present moment experience. And again, we have many tendencies that take us out of that.

There's this New Yorker cartoon that sums this up really well. It's got three panels.

The cartoon depicts something profoundly true about human consciousness: whatever we're doing, it's so easy to find ourselves somewhere else entirely. When our experience becomes this fragmented, we start to feel scattered and incomplete. We lose the collectedness of samadhi, that gathering together of awareness that has been mentioned. As we learn to collect our attention in the present moment, however, we begin to experience a quality of wholeness—being fully together here and now—which allows us to genuinely learn from our experience.

This quality of observing requires first arriving here, gathering ourselves so we can truly give our heart and mind to learning from our present moment experience. The result is profound contentment, happiness, and satisfaction. I don't believe it's possible to find genuine satisfaction while living in that fragmented way, where half our vital energy is lost to past or future. But when we call that energy back into the present moment, contentment and fulfillment naturally arise.

A visitor once came to see the Buddha and his community of monks and nuns—I believe it was a king, one of those who maintained strong relationships with the Buddha and supported the monastic community. He told the Buddha, "I've visited many different spiritual teachers and traditions, and often I find people arguing, quarreling, being disputatious. The atmosphere feels very disharmonious. But when I come here, your people are orderly and quiet, and everybody looks so happy. Why are your followers so happy?"

The Buddha replied simply: "Because they abide in the present. They abide in the present."

This ability to abide in the present removes much of life's complication and restores tremendous energy, bringing great joy and happiness. Thoreau captured this beautifully in Walden: "I feel a little alarmed when it happens that I have walked a mile into the woods bodily without getting there in spirit. What business have I in the woods if I'm thinking of something outside the woods?"

You might notice this phenomenon during walking meditation or simply walking in nature. Are we really here where our body is? This is the training of meditation—we go off again and again, and gently we bring ourselves back. We'll unfold these instructions day by day, learning to pay attention to many aspects of our experience: objects like breath, body, and sounds. In this retreat especially, we'll focus on the quality of awareness itself—this knowing element that recognizes all phenomena will be central to our exploration.

The third element, "allow," means that in meditation, whatever is happening in the moment, we let it be as it is. It may not be what we wanted or what we would have ordered, but it's what's happening. We work to bring our heart into alignment with the way things are. We come into the present to see reality clearly, and this quality of allowing brings our heart into harmony with that reality.

In the present moment, things couldn't have unfolded any other way. There are countless causes and conditions that have led this moment to be exactly what it is. For it to have emerged differently, all those causes and conditions would have had to be different. So in any given moment, that moment has unfolded in the only way it could, based on past conditions. Our meditation practice then becomes: How do we respond to create the next moment skillfully, wholesomely, in ways that bring satisfaction, happiness, and freedom from suffering?

One of the students at Spirit Rock shared a lovely dialogue with her teacher. She said, "People often ask how I am, and I've learned to reply, 'I couldn't be better'—because it's literally true. In this moment, I couldn't be better. If I could have been, I would be. But this is what is in this moment."

This moment couldn't be different. Yet so often we fight with that reality. Of course, when you fight with reality, you know who wins. But we frequently do resist the actuality of the present moment. This message of "allow" invites us to let our heart and mind soften and open to the way things are right now.

It's important to note that this describes an inner relationship—

This is not saying what action you should take back in the world to address social injustice, unfair circumstances, damage to the earth, or harm to others around us. That's a different movement entirely. But learning this inner quality of allowing enables us to settle with greater peace into the reality of the present moment, and that settledness provides a wiser foundation from which to choose our response.

If something needs to change externally or internally, we come from a place of settledness and equanimity in order to most skillfully make the next step. For instance, in meditation on a day like today, you may have observed many moments of not wanting to accept things as they are. The first day of retreat often brings considerable friction with the way things are.

Someone's in the shower when I want to be there. What's served at lunch isn't what I would have ordered. Someone is making noise in the meditation hall behind my seat, and I really want things quiet. A back pain arises after forty minutes of sitting, and I really don't want to feel it. Many different things arise, and our habitual response is to push against what we don't like and try to make happen what we do.

It's fascinating to observe the mind and its activity from this perspective, especially on a day like today. You may see that you've been quite busy trying to make countless little adjustments—just to feel a bit better, just to get ahead in the lunch queue, just to make things a little quieter in the hall. We're constantly adjusting our experience.

When we first notice this habit, it doesn't seem like a big deal. It's just a little habit of mine. Everyone does it. It's natural. We like some things, dislike others. But we don't initially notice the effect this has. We're trying to control our experience, and there's always a price for attempting control. That price is the surrender of some freedom.

As we examine this habit of adjusting, making things a little better, putting off discomfort just a bit more, we begin to see it keeps the mind perpetually busy and prevents us from settling into a deeper peace that embodies allowing. In the Tibetan tradition, they teach something profound about this pattern.

You've probably heard of samsara, the wheel of birth and death that according to the Buddha we cycle through again and again. It can be understood as many lifetimes of being born and dying, or as a moment-to-moment phenomenon throughout each day where we take birth in different personalities, psychological states, and physical conditions—all lasting briefly before dying off as something new emerges.

However you understand it, Buddhist philosophy holds that this cycle, this incessant wheel, is wearying. Through repeated birth and death, one grows tired of the struggle inherent in that cycle. Finding freedom in relation to changing situations is discovering nirvana in relation to samsara—one of the fruits we might discover through meditation practice.

In the Tibetan tradition, they teach that what keeps the wheel turning is trying to correct things. The essence of samsara is our attempt to correct it. Here lies a profound pointing: this quality of resting in peace, where we release control, can lead into the dimension of nirvana—deep, satisfying peace.

One beautiful aspect of the awareness we're exploring—which Philip hinted at this morning when he described it as mirror-like—is that it doesn't care what it reflects. So often we care deeply. We want pleasant experiences and resist unpleasant ones. But awareness truly doesn't care. It reflects the beautiful, harmonious, peaceful, and pleasing with the same accuracy as it reflects what's difficult, conflicted, or painful—whether physical, emotional, or external.

Awareness possesses this capacity to accurately reflect anything that appears before it. As we let our attention enter that realm, our being begins to absorb some of that impartiality. We start to inhabit that dimension that's equally at home with both pleasant and unpleasant appearances. The more we surrender to that quality of awareness, the more our being discovers that peace, trust, and refuge Leela described last night.

This quality of awareness and its inherent peacefulness and impartiality becomes a living refuge, an actual sanctuary for us. As Chan master Shito taught: "Your essential mind is absolutely still and completely whole, and its ability to respond to circumstances is limitless."

We begin to trust it not only as our resting place for peace and contentment, but also as our capacity to meet the world skillfully. By resting in awareness, we don't lose touch with any of our senses or our connection to the world. Rather, it enriches our connection to the world.

And awareness also has this beautiful quality of responsiveness, that it can meet the situation with what's appropriate—love or compassion or happiness or patience, all the paramis. So this is the practice of right attitude: relaxing, giving ourselves to the observation, wanting to learn from our experience and allowing things to be the way they are. This is our platform for exploring the objects of our experience and the quality of awareness that comes.

Now I want to look at some of the key terms we'll be using and try to get a little more precision about our definitions. I think we've all been using them in a consistent way so far, but let's examine more deeply what we actually mean by these terms. I want to particularly look at the words consciousness, mindfulness, awareness, and attention.

Before diving into definitions, I want to say one of the things I really appreciate about retreats is their simplicity. We have a very simple lifestyle here. We eat and we sleep and we walk and we sit, we spend time in nature, we open our eyes, we close our eyes. A very simple life that's really common to all humans. And that kind of simple life brings us back to some basic questions. One of the questions I like to think about is: what is our most basic situation as human beings? And how do we find freedom in relation to it?

One way of framing this is through a short poem from Rumi, where he wrote: "Where did I come from and what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." That's kind of our existential situation, isn't it? As adults, we start to wake up. We're here. Why are we here? What am I supposed to do? I don't know. This body and mind didn't come with a user manual. They didn't tell us at birth what we were supposed to be doing with our human life. What are we supposed to do?

One of the things that I like to feel into when I'm on retreat is what does it mean to be a sentient being? We are all sentient beings like the birds and the chipmunks and the people who are driving by on the road. What does that mean? Well, I think sentience means that we are experiencing things. We are knowing things. We are conscious beings. If you think of it, basically what it means is as long as we're awake, things are happening and we're aware that they form our experience.

So in the present moment, you're feeling body sensations, you're seeing the room, you're hearing my voice, you're having a certain mood, and some thoughts are going through your mind. All these experiences are just going, going, going. We don't have to do anything particular to make them happen. In fact, could you stop them? As long as we're awake, some form of that is just going to keep going, going, going, whether we want it or not. That's what being sentient involves. We're constantly being bombarded, you might say.

The Buddha described this in a beautiful little discourse called the Discourse on Totality. He started this way: "Bhikkhus"—a word that's usually translated as monks, but it really means committed practitioners, those who are exploring the nature of their experience like you are—"I will teach you the totality of life. Listen, attend carefully, and I will speak."

This is a pretty bold claim, isn't it? I'll teach you the totality of life. You think about the twentieth-century intellects. Marx didn't say that. Einstein didn't say that. Freud didn't say that. Here's the Buddha 2,600 years ago: I will teach you the totality of life. Listen, attend carefully.

What is the totality of life? It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and objects of mind. This is called the totality of life. Anyone who attempted to describe a totality beyond this would not know that of which they were speaking.

So I love this passage because it directs us to what I would say is the Buddha's map for us. This is a certain map we call the map of the sense doors. In Buddhism, they are considered to be six sense doors—the five physical senses and the mind, which is another door primarily bringing through thoughts and emotions.

This is the range of our experience, and our meditation is to become familiar with all of this. That's why we give, in a standard vipassana retreat, so many instructions about how to pay attention to sights and sounds and sensations and breath and thoughts and emotions. This forms our world. This is where we get caught and suffer. This is where we can find release and freedom as we learn to relate wisely.

So I'll suggest—not right now, but later—take a look at this list, the six sense doors and their objects, and ask: is there anything else in your experience that's not covered in that? Or does that in fact describe the totality of life for you? It's something to reflect on later.

In this passage, one of the things that makes up the totality of life is mind—mind and objects of mind. Objects of mind, you can think of basically as thoughts and emotions. But what is this thing called mind?

Mind in this passage refers to that which knows all the other things. Mind knows sights and sounds, smells, tastes, sensations, thoughts, and emotions. Or we could say that's an aspect the Buddha called consciousness. The word he used in Pali is vijñāna. This is such an important word that we'll probably refer to it again and again, and it's useful to know in this retreat. Vijñāna relates to knowledge or cognition—the ñā syllable means knowing or cognizing. It's the heart of vijñāna.

So it's the mind that knows all these different objects. Another way to say it is that we're conscious of sights, sounds, smells, tastes, sensations, thoughts, and emotions. This is the activity of consciousness that knows these sense door objects in their most basic nature.

For instance, when we look at the eye door, what are we actually seeing in a moment? You might see this more clearly if you close one eye. If you look out, what we really see are just patches of form and color. That's the data in the eye door. We've learned that that's a woman, that's a man, that's a cushion, that's a floor, that's a wall, that's a lamp. But the basic eye door data is simply patches of form and color. In that very simple, primitive, uninterpreted way, that's what the eye door reveals.

Similarly, the ear door can reveal sound, but the conscious knowing of that sound doesn't interpret it as bell or bell that ends a sitting. That's an addition. That's in the realm of what we could call perception. Consciousness reveals the sound. The perception or interpretation explains it or recognizes it.

So vijñāna is this quality of our mind. It's really the essence of our mind's activity that's knowing and presenting to us all the different objects of experience at these six sense doors. That's what consciousness does. It presents the world to us in this very bare form. It's pre-verbal. It hasn't been interpreted. Just the bare sense data. This is vijñāna.

It's happening all the time as long as we're alive and awake and the sense doors are working. If your eye, ear, nose, tongue, body are working, these are going to be happening. We can't decide not to feel them. We can't decide to turn them off. Also, this consciousness doesn't require that we be particularly intelligent. It's happening all the time quite automatically.

We have it. Do animals have it in your intuition? Are animals conscious? Yes, they're probably having these same experiences through their sense doors. Babies?

Are babies conscious? Can they see and smell? Yes, they respond to these things. It looks like they're conscious also.

So consciousness is in all living things, all sentient things, let's put it that way. Worms have this, sloths have this, the Buddha had this, Einstein had this, the birds have this. Everything that is sentient has this quality of consciousness.

Now let's talk about mindfulness. Mindfulness is another step up, you could say, in intelligence—in relating to the objects of the senses revealed by consciousness—because mindfulness understands what they are. For instance, consciousness reveals the sound; mindfulness recognizes it as hearing or as a sound. Consciousness reveals a pain; mindfulness understands it as sensation with unpleasant feeling tone.

It's very interesting that the central discourse of the Buddha's on mindfulness is called the Satipatthana Sutta, Foundations of Mindfulness. The word in Pali for mindfulness is sati, which originally meant "remember." So I think of it as remembering to notice what's happening, remembering to be in the present.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, as the Buddha describes the four foundations, there's a word that recurs again and again. Every time he describes how to do mindfulness meditation, the word he uses is pajanati. Pajanati is related etymologically to the word sampajanya, which you may have heard before—it's usually translated as "clear comprehension."

For instance, when the Buddha says, "Breathing in long, the bhikkhu understands, 'I breathe in long.' Breathing out long, the practitioner understands, 'I breathe out long.' She understands the mind affected by desire as the mind affected by desire. She understands the mind unaffected by desire as mind unaffected by desire," and so on.

Everywhere the Buddha describes this practice of mindfulness, the word he uses is pajanati, which gets translated as "understands." This is very interesting. Mindfulness requires this understanding, which means there has to be an intelligence behind it. There has to be a certain amount of intelligence to understand our experience in the framework of the four foundations, which develop the quality of mindfulness.

This is another aspect of cognition, but it's a higher level functioning. In fact, you could say we've looked at three different levels of cognition. Vijnana reveals the pure sound before words—maybe it's F sharp or something on a scale—it reveals that pure pitch. The next level up is perception that recognizes it as, "Oh, that's the sound of the bell." So there's a recognition factor based on memory. The next step up is mindfulness that understands that this is a sense object arising at the hearing door.

That's mindfulness. It knows it as an object of the six senses arising at one of the sense doors. You don't have to go through that thinking every time, but essentially that's what mindfulness is doing. It's locating it within the framework of the Buddha's map, the totality of life—the six kinds of sense objects and their doors.

This intelligence is the opening to wisdom. This factor of wisdom is so important in the Buddha's teachings because it's only wisdom that can liberate our hearts and minds. We can get peaceful and still just through meditation training, but it will end when we get up off the cushion and encounter the world, unless it's accompanied by understanding, by wisdom. So mindfulness is the entry gate for wisdom to come in.

The word is panya in Pali, for wisdom. One of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, liked to pair these two words, and he didn't often refer to it as mindfulness—he called it "mindfulness-wisdom." What we're developing here is mindfulness-wisdom, and he called that sati-panya. He regarded it as a native quality of our mind. Sati-panya.

So mindfulness has this quality of intelligence that understands things in the context of the Buddha's map. As we practice mindfulness, we're waking up that wisdom factor in us. That's so key because it's understanding that liberates the heart and mind—understanding of how we suffer and how we release that suffering.

Krishnamurti had a book with a lovely title pointing to this called The Awakening of Intelligence. That's what we're doing in every moment of mindfulness practice. We're awakening this native intelligence that will liberate us.

So I want to contrast this quality of mindfulness and the quality of consciousness.

Consciousness is happening all the time. Even if you want to, you can't turn it off. And there are many times we would like to. I flew from San Francisco to Boston the day before the retreat started. I would have loved to turn off consciousness for about six hours. I couldn't do that. So consciousness is always there.

Is mindfulness always there? Was your mindfulness there uninterrupted today? No. Mindfulness kind of comes and goes. There are times that we're really in the present and knowing our experience, understanding our experience. There are many other moments when we get carried away by a thought train or we feel very sleepy and too dull to really notice what's happening. So mindfulness comes and goes.

Generally, does it take some intention to be mindful? Yes. Consciousness is happening spontaneously, doesn't require any effort, can't stop it. Mindfulness isn't always there and usually needs a little bit of inclining the mind in that direction for it to be activated.

Dogs have consciousness. Does a dog have mindfulness in the way the Buddha uses it? If you have a dog and it's dinner time and you go over near the bowl and you pull out a can of dog food and you bring out your can opener and you go "rip, rip, rip," does your dog perk up its ears? Usually then they come right over to the bowl and they want to see what's in there.

Does the dog ever go, "Hearing is arising at the ear door. Perception is telling me that that's the sound of the Friskies can being opened. A pleasant aroma is arising at the nose door. Perception is telling me that that's the chicken flavor for tonight. A thought arises that my bowl will soon be filled with food. So the question arises, should I walk over thoroughly mindful to my bowl and check out whether the food is there yet?"

That would be a mindful dog, but usually that's not the way dogs work. They just go, smell, boom, and they're there, or hearing, boom, and they're there. So dogs are driven by many things—hunger or fear or loyalty or affection—but they don't stop to notice the motivation or the force from outside. The understanding in Buddhism is that the dog does not have the ability to develop mindfulness. But we do.

What about babies? Are they mindful? Sadness comes up. Does the baby know, "Oh, this is sadness"? When the breast comes near, do they know, "Oh, this is desire"? Probably not. Are they in the present moment? Yes. Is the dog in the present moment? Yes.

So we can be very present moment oriented, but not have this quality of mindfulness active, at least in the way it's described in the Eightfold Path, this quality of samma-sati, right mindfulness. This is the understanding of consciousness on the one hand, which all sentient beings share, and mindfulness on the other, a higher level of intelligence which humans can develop but not all beings have.

So what is awareness? It's kind of interesting, isn't it? This is an important point. There is no word in the Buddha's language, in the Pali language, that needs to be translated as awareness. The words he used are viññāṇa and sati—consciousness and mindfulness. There's no third word that we need to translate as awareness. So that's kind of interesting.

Is awareness more like consciousness, that it's happening all the time and quite unprompted? Or is it more like mindfulness, that it's there some of the time and not there others? I'll give you my opinion. You can find your own, but I'll give you my opinion. Sometimes it means one.

and sometimes it means the other, and sometimes it means somewhere in between. So it's a wonderful word in English because it sort of spans this range.

For instance, if I say, "Are you aware right now?" Yeah, if you're awake, you're aware. If somebody is thinking, when you are thinking, do you lose all awareness? No, you're aware of what you're thinking about. What you're thinking about may be the square root of 16 or something, but you're aware of something. You're not aware that that's a thought, but you're aware of something. So in that way, it's used like consciousness.

But then it could also be used like mindfulness. Like I could say, "When you said that to me, were you aware of your motivation in saying it?" And then it means, were you mindful? Did you know what motivation was present when you said that?

So in this way that it kind of slides between these two, it's a beautiful word. It's very expressive. It's a really nice English word. We're using it as the theme of this retreat. But also be aware that it's not very precise in the way that the Buddha's language is. Vijnana, very precise. Sati, mindfulness, is very precise. Awareness is kind of slippery.

And so this richness of the term awareness can actually help us, can help our intuition settle into kind of both aspects of what are going on. There's the knowing of individual things happening quite spontaneously, and there's this intelligence that can meet them and understand them. And both of those are pointed to by this term awareness.

So there's a little potential for confusion here, but I hope you won't let it worry you too much. As you use the word yourself, look into what you mean by it. Are you leaning more toward the spontaneous knowing of things like consciousness? Are you leaning more to having this wisdom factor like satipanna of mindfulness? We will use them in both senses. And so that ambiguity is kind of just part of the retreat. We're quite comfortable with it. And so I hope you will be too. And it's very interesting to keep looking into these, you could say these two aspects of the English term awareness. It's a beautiful term and really helpful to us.

So we'll be presenting lots of different meditation objects at the six sense doors, and then we'll keep wanting to turn and look back at this quality of knowing of them, the consciousness and then the higher level cognition of mindfulness, both of which we might describe as awareness.

So as we've said a few times today, don't worry too much whether you're with the sense object or you're tuning into the knowing of it, this consciousness factor that's receiving it. Because either way, the quality of mindfulness will be activated. And the quality of mindfulness opens the door to understanding and liberation. So either way is fine. And we'll sometimes talk about the objects and we'll sometimes talk about the knowing or the consciousness of them. And either way, the practice will be going great.

So don't spend too much time sort of spinning around about, "Am I with the knowing or am I stuck in the dreary old object?" Those dreary old objects work just fine for us. So we'll go back and forth and we'll get more fluency in that going back and forth.

So I'll just close with this little quotation from, actually it's from Sariputta. He was asked at one point, "What is nibbana?" You probably know this term—nibbana is the ultimate goal of the path of mindfulness. It's a state of deep and complete peace and the end of conflict, inner conflict. And he said, "Nibbana is the destruction of greed, the destruction of aversion, and the destruction of delusion. This is called nibbana."

So these qualities, when you start to look at the nature of awareness itself, these qualities are absent in this pure nature of awareness. So as we tune into this knowing faculty, with its associated wisdom, we are stepping out of the samsaric forces of greed, aversion, delusion, and inclining the mind toward the goal of the path—this ultimate peace of nibbana. That is what we are doing moment by moment. So as we rest there, as we find out how to rest there, we get a little bit of a taste of that peace already, and it's leading into its own deepening.

So this will be the path of practice for this week. And if we understand in this way, we kind of bring the path and the goal together. Resting in this place of knowing is free from greed, aversion, delusion, and it leads onward to the full purification, the full liberation of nibbana.

This is our direction for the week.

At the end of the talks, we'd just like to have a little bit of quiet time, a minute or two, just to let the words settle. So we'll just sit for a minute or so together in silence, please.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 125

Morning Instructions

Guy Armstrong · 54 min

> In these morning instructions for experienced insight meditation practitioners, Guy Armstrong explores the balance between cultivating a broad field of awareness and maintaining connection with specific meditation anchors. Drawing on participant questions from the previous day, he guides meditators in developing both expansive sky-like awareness and focused attention on individual objects such as breath, body sensations, and sounds.
> Armstrong addresses common challenges faced by experienced practitioners, including how to work skillfully when attention moves away from chosen anchors, and the importance of maintaining compassion and loving-kindness (mettā) throughout practice. He emphasizes that awareness in its pure nature is free from greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha), naturally expressing qualities of kindness and care. The instructions include practical guidance on establishing familiarity with meditation anchors while remaining open to the natural flow of present-moment experience.
> The session concludes with a question-and-answer period addressing concerns about meditation technique, the role of compassion in practice, and managing the inevitable friction that arises in sustained meditation practice. This teaching offers valuable insights for practitioners seeking to deepen their understanding of awareness itself while maintaining the heart qualities essential for wise practice.

Yesterday in the question period following Philip's instructions, one of you mentioned that sometimes awareness was easier to feel in a broad way, like a broad field of awareness, rather than the specific awareness of an individual object, like a body sensation or breath.

In the instructions this morning, I want to give encouragement to connect with that broad field of awareness, if that's helpful for you. And then also a suggestion to come back and re-look at the awareness in relationship to individual experiences—breath, body, and sounds. Perhaps, as I mentioned at the ten o'clock sit yesterday, choose an anchor from among those three that will be the focus that you return to again and again.

Because we will spend a little bit of time on sounds this morning, and the hall is so quiet, I may add a little additional sound. You'll know the sitting has ended when there are three bells from the big bell. Don't stop before then—keep meditating.

Please settle comfortably into your sitting posture, grounding the attention in the body, letting the body relax and letting the mind relax. Things are okay the way they are and we don't need to get anywhere else. Just settle into the present moment, feeling its sufficiency, letting the body be as it is, letting the mood be the way it is, and letting thoughts come and go as they will. Not chasing after them, but not pushing them away. Just letting thoughts come and go, but we don't have to be led around by them.

Find your connection to the earth through the sitting base that you can relax into, and the uprightness of the torso and head, letting the spine rise toward the sky. This whole living body filled with awareness from head to toe in every corner.

Now let your awareness become expansive and wide, open to all the sounds that are appearing and disappearing. If no sounds are apparent in any moment, just become aware of the extent of the silence, the vastness of silence. You might have the sense that your awareness is like a big clear sky stretching out without any limits, or like empty space in which all the sounds inside and outside arise and pass away—a space big enough to hold near sounds and distant sounds.

In giving attention to sounds, to hearing, let the attention be very receptive, not needing to send the mind out toward the sounds, but just resting in the center of all the sounds and letting them come to you. We don't need to do anything for sounds to be heard. As we rest, they're known effortlessly, spontaneously. So we just stay relaxed and present and the sounds are known.

Now become aware of sensations throughout the body. Sensations are arising, changing, fading. Also in this big empty space of the broad awareness—we might say this broad field of awareness—it's like space. Feel the sensations. And also recognize the awareness that lets them be known, this field of consciousness in which they come and go.

Among the sensations in the body, we meet again the experience of breathing, letting the breath just come naturally in its own rhythm, but feeling in the body the effect of breathing in, the effect of breathing out. You may notice a whole breath—the way the air enters through the nostrils, causes the chest to rise, causes the belly to expand on the in-breath and on the out-breath, how the abdomen falls, the chest falls and the air exits the nostrils. Or you might like to bring your focus of attention to one part of the body where the breath is clearer—at the tip of the nose, in the area of the abdomen, or in the chest. Then be quite continuous in the awareness of the in-breath and the out-breath.

It can be helpful to have an anchor that you come back to again and again in your meditation. Something that becomes very familiar and a home base for you. It could be sounds, could be the body posture as you sit, could be feeling the breathing. See where your attention falls easily, where you can connect easily. Then give your attention today to establishing a relationship with that experience. And as you do, tune from time to time into the quality of awareness that's revealing the experience. Right where the experience is, that's where the knowing is also—in sounds, in body, in breath.

If you find it helpful, you can reconnect with this broad sense of awareness being like a big clear sky or like empty space in which all the sounds and all the sensations arise and pass away. So you can be in touch with this sky-like nature of awareness. You can be in touch with the individual experiences. You can be in touch with the knowing of the individual experience. All of these are fine approaches in our meditation today.

If you're ever uncertain of where to give your attention, that's when it's helpful to have the anchor. Just a simple object—sound, body, breath—that you can come back and connect to with mindfulness again and again, allowing all facets of the experience just to be the way they are, just revealed through this impartial awareness that's open to all phenomena.

Stay connected with your anchor, clearly mindful moment by moment—sounds being known, sensations being known, breath being known. Can you tune into the knowing? Can you feel that knowing of the individual experience as it happens? Just let your intuition operate as you get close with your attention to that direct experience of the phenomenon. Intuit the knowing as it happens.

And then again, simply connecting with the appearance, sound, body, or breath. And just before the bell sounds, you might connect again with this broad sense of awareness, with its nature of being like a big clear sky, like empty space in which all the sounds just appear and disappear.

Do you have any questions this morning about your practice, about the instructions or the talks?

"I'm not sure if I have a good anchor because I'm trying to correct the body posture and it lasts about three seconds. It seems like maybe there's a feeling that the anchor needs to be the only thing that's in my consciousness and mindfulness. When some other object comes in alongside the anchor, there's a sense of disappointment and incorrectness. Then I've tried to become mindful of that..."

Great question. He finds that he can be with an anchor for a couple of seconds, and then something else arises. His attention gets drawn there, and he feels disappointment when attention moves away from the anchor. Then it becomes confusing as to where he should be.

This happens to all of us. As the instructions develop, we'll make this more of a choiceless paying of attention so that whatever arises can become a wonderful focus for mindfulness. Even at this stage, you can start working with that.

It's perfectly fine to move attention away from the anchor. Whether you're with sounds or with tinnitus—which itself can be an excellent meditation focus—you can tune into that as one of the sounds in the space. Then other things will be noticed: sensations in the body, perhaps aches or pains or pressures or lightness. You can tune into those, connect with them, feel them, feel the knowing of them. When they're no longer so compelling, you can return to the anchor.

Begin to play with that sense of freely moving away from the anchor at times. If something else arises and draws attention, let mindfulness become established with the new experience. When it's no longer compelling, no longer naturally drawing the attention, the anchor is always there to return to.

It's like beginning to play. At this stage we're working with body sensations, sounds, and breath. As the retreat progresses, we'll also open up to include emotions—beautiful emotions, difficult emotions—and the activity of thoughts. We want to eventually move our attention easily to any of those. For now, this is a good time in the retreat to start opening up to your anchor and to these simple experiences beyond the anchor. Feel free to make that movement. Come back to the anchor when there's nothing else really drawing attention naturally.

"Could you speak a bit about the role of compassion as we work with different anchors and focal points of attention? I find that early in my practice I was able to bring a sort of lightness of compassion and then experiment more, but over the last few years I've gotten much heavier. I'm able to soften, but it still feels like there's a lot of friction as I move from one anchor to another focal point."

An important question about the role of compassion in relation to the attention we bring to meditation. He mentioned that earlier in his practice he could bring a sense of compassion or lightness into meditation. Now he's feeling more friction as he works with the anchor and moving away from it.

This is such an important part of meditation's development. Leela did a guided meditation on loving-kindness yesterday at the 3:30 sitting, and we often include this in retreats because the heart qualities of love and compassion are so needed for us to hold the experience of meditation and the difficulty of being a person. It's not easy being a human being, as has been said many times.

That sense of care and compassion needs to start with ourselves first. We recognize the struggles in daily life, struggles in meditation, and we want to bring a warm, caring, allowing attention to that. Wherever we feel conflict or heaviness or sadness or unhappiness, we want to take a moment, acknowledge that, and meet it with this sense of care. You could call it compassion. You could call it loving-kindness. Just acknowledge that this too is part of our human experience.

In this retreat, we're focusing on these less personal aspects of awareness—mindfulness, consciousness, attention—as a theme to develop because you're all experienced meditators. But we recognize that just because you're experienced meditators, suffering hasn't gone out of the picture yet. It's really important that you hold as a background the Four Noble Truths, the ubiquitous quality of dukkha that comes with being a person, and how to keep the heart open as we meet the suffering that will come on the cushion as it does in daily life.

So whether it's the suffering of the body and physical discomfort, whether it's the suffering of mind states that come—sadness or longing or frustration—whether it's suffering that comes specifically in relation to meditation—frustration that you don't feel you're getting it, that you're sliding away, that you can't touch awareness, that you're losing the anchor—all these big and little kinds of disappointment and conflicts that come, we really need to continue to bring an open heart, whether it's loving kindness or compassion for yourself, into this moment by moment.

If you find that the formal meditations are helpful, which Leela introduced yesterday and will do again in this retreat—whether it's metta or compassion—feel free to bring those in at any point during the day. It's not an anchor in this retreat, but it can be an anchor in other retreats, and it's a very helpful attitude to carry all the time. And if that attitude isn't quite naturally present, do a little of the formal meditation as Leela led yesterday and evoke it for yourself so that you're holding your experience with that kindness and caring. It's really an important quality.

I talked just a little bit last night about how awareness really in its pure nature is free from the influence of greed, of hatred, and of delusion. So we start to see as we tune into awareness that it has this naturally kind and compassionate quality. When desire and aversion are absent, the mind is in a pretty pure space, and then love and compassion can come out of that. So we're heading in that direction. Sometimes we'll talk about it formally and sometimes we may not, but it's really behind all the instructions and very helpful to bring in. So thank you for bringing that up this morning.

I'm going to stop here with the questions. We need to have a few announcements, and I want to stop a little early because we're starting the interview groups this morning.

Most of you have probably been in interview groups before and kind of know what they're for, but just to make it clear, it's just a chance for you to meet with one of us, talk about your experience in the meditation so far, what's going well, what's been difficult, and to check in about how the retreat's going for you. We'll meet over these two days with everyone in a small group of about six or seven people. We'd like to hear from everyone in the course of the group. Then as we move through the first couple of days, we'll start to meet with you one-on-one.

These group meetings will start today, and we'll see half of you today. If your name wasn't on the list today, you'll be up tomorrow. Please check if it's not up tomorrow—it either means you're not really here, or we just don't have a sheet for you yet. The interview questionnaires, if there are any still outstanding, please give them back to Elizabeth. So we'll see everybody today or tomorrow.

This is not a grilling. This is not a quiz. This is not for us to evaluate you. This is just for you to ask some questions, and it actually helps to hear each other's questions in the small group. So it'll be a little more personal and you'll hear from other people as well.

Leela will be in the welcome room, which is the room where you registered, just across the hall.

The Five Hindrances - Part 1

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this opening dharma talk for a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong begins an exploration of the five hindrances (pañca nīvaraṇa) - the mental forces that obstruct meditation and spiritual development. Drawing on the Buddha's water bowl analogies from the Aṅguttara Nikāya, he examines three hindrances in detail: sense desire (kāmachanda), sleepiness and torpor (thīna-middha), and restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca).
> Armstrong emphasizes that hindrances are universal human experiences that "fly under our mindfulness radar," seducing attention toward external situations while obscuring inner awareness. He distinguishes between unwholesome desires (taṇhā, rāga) and wholesome enthusiasm (dhammachandā), noting that sense pleasures aren't inherently problematic for lay practitioners when approached with moderation and wisdom.
> The talk offers practical guidance for each hindrance: recognizing their bodily felt sense, examining our relationship to them without judgment, and applying appropriate antidotes when mindfulness alone isn't sufficient. Armstrong stresses that how we respond to arising experiences matters more than what arises, emphasizing acceptance and compassion over resistance. He concludes by noting that liberation requires first surmounting these five hindrances before establishing the four satipaṭṭhāna and developing the seven bojjhaṅga.

The subject of tonight's talk is the five hindrances. I'm actually only going to talk about three hindrances, though I figured calling the talk "the three hindrances" would really confuse people. You probably know this list fairly well, but especially at the start of a long retreat, it's beneficial for us all to remind ourselves what these qualities are, how to recognize them, and how to work with them.

Tonight I'll cover part of the list, and in a few days Joseph will talk about the rest. If you recall, the five are sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt. I'll discuss sense desire, sleepiness, and restlessness. Joseph will cover aversion and doubt in a few days. Until he talks about those, you're not allowed to have them—they're not workable yet. But you can have the others.

These hindrances are forces in the mind that come very often to us, certainly in our life as meditators on retreat and in daily life as well. It's really important that we learn how to see them and clearly understand how to work with them.

When we use the word "mind," we're usually translating the Pali word citta, but it really refers to qualities of both heart and mind. If you ask someone in Thailand where their mind is—the word for mind in Thai is jit, which comes from citta after Thailand has been steeped in Buddhism for so many years—they'll point to their heart center. If you ask someone in the West where their mind is, they'll probably point to their head. In Buddhism, we understand that this word citta, which we usually translate as mind, encompasses both feeling qualities and cognitive qualities. I'll use the word "mind" for that, but it includes the whole range of emotions we have as well.

Bonnie was talking last night about the genius of the Buddha. One of the most incredible things about his understanding was the way he could see all the different forces that come into our hearts and minds and see clearly which ones were to be supported and developed and which ones were not going to be helpful and therefore were ultimately to be abandoned. As she said, it is possible to abandon the unwholesome, and that's why he asked us to do it.

Much of his teaching was about which states of mind lead us into suffering and which states of mind lead us to happiness and eventually liberation. He used different lists for these qualities. For the suffering states, you might read the list of the taints, the kilesas (usually translated as defilements, though I'm not fond of that word), the list of the fetters, or the list of the hindrances. For the beautiful states, you might read lists like the five spiritual faculties, the seven factors of awakening, the four brahmaviharas, or the four iddhipadas—the bases of spiritual power.

Each of these lists has a different purpose and connotation, so I want to talk about what the list of the hindrances is about. As I understand these lists of difficult states: the taints refer to the most deep-rooted tendencies of the human heart and mind that are present in all living beings—the fundamental building blocks of suffering. The kilesas—greed, aversion, delusion—are usually used to refer to action. They're called the roots of unwholesome action, influencing thoughts, speech, and bodily acts. They're seen as the fundamental influencers of action and are very related to karma. The fetters are the list of things that bind us, which get released at different stages of development until there's no more bondage at all.

What are the hindrances? The way I understand it, the hindrances are especially directed to meditators—to those of us who are developing the path through the Eightfold Path and particularly meditation. As we develop in our meditation on the journey to awakening, the hindrances are the forces in the mind that obstruct that journey, that block or oppose that development to awakening until we become aware of them and understand how to work with them, how to become mindful of them.

In one of the suttas, the Buddha said that the hindrances are forces that overcome mindfulness and weaken wisdom. That's a strong statement—they overcome mindfulness and weaken wisdom. In another sutta, he used an analogy for the hindrances. He said it's like there's a swift river flowing toward the ocean with a very strong current that will carry everything along in its path. But then someone comes along and opens some irrigation channels on both sides of the river, and big flows of water get carried off into those side channels. The main current going down the center of the river is no longer as big or powerful or fast as it was before.

What he was implying is that hindrances are like opening side channels on our stream to awakening. As we set in motion the Eightfold Path, we generate this strong current that's going to carry us to liberation. The hindrances open side pockets that take some of that energy off and drain it away. Basically, when the mind is overtaken by hindrances, our strong movement to awakening is getting diverted and weakened.

Another way the Buddha described the hindrances is he said they are makers of blindness. If we are overtaken by them and don't know how to work skillfully, they make us not see clearly what's going on. The Buddha used analogies for these five hindrances, comparing them to a bowl of water that's getting influenced in different ways.

For each of the hindrances, he used an analogy for some kind of disturbance in the clear water. So he basically said if the water was clear, a person could lean over it and see clearly their reflection in the water. But the hindrance puts another element in the water that makes the reflection not come through clearly. So he said if a person with good sight should look at their own reflection in the water, they would not see it as it really is. This is the misleading effect of the hindrances.

He said, "When obsessed by a hindrance, one does not see as it really is one's own good, nor the good of others, nor the good of both." This is all to say that the hindrances are fairly important. I don't want you to get discouraged by this, but to recognize the magnitude of the situation in relating to them and to make a real effort to understand and learn how to practice with them.

One of the things that's tricky about the hindrances is that they kind of fly under our mindfulness radar. You know, as you're practicing, you have your mindfulness antenna out and you're looking for anything that's going to arise from any of the six senses. And often you may be very clued in to the body or breath or sounds, but being aware of the mind is a little more subtle and a little harder. So these hindrances kind of get in under our early warning system and implant themselves in the mind, sneaking in on us like that.

I'll give you a simple example. This is one of the hindrances I'm not supposed to talk about tonight—it's just an example. So I was practicing here one three-month course, and it was a couple of weeks in, so I was getting pretty present. After the morning sit, I went out the back door to go down to my walking path, which was on the grass below the new building. That grass was still there a long time ago.

So I was heading down the steps out the back of the meditation hall, and I thought I was being pretty present—lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. And then I saw that there was somebody already walking in my walking path. Unpleasant sight. So I kept being very mindful: lifting, moving, placing. And I started thinking, "How could they be in my walking path? I've walked there every walking period for the last two weeks." Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. I thought, "They must not be very sensitive, or they would have noticed, and they wouldn't want to take it away from me." Lifting, moving, placing. "Did I cut in front of them at breakfast today? Is this some kind of head game?" Lifting, moving, placing.

So I kept walking. I found another patch of grass, which, much to my surprise, worked just as well for walking meditation. And I was doing my walking, and about thirty minutes in, I sort of realized, "Oh, I'm angry." I was annoyed at the person who was walking in my path, and all those thoughts could have clued me in to the fact that I was annoyed and resenting the person, but they didn't. I thought I was being really pretty continuously mindful, and I was missing the biggest thing that was going on, which was that I was getting angry.

While I was getting angry, all I was doing was blaming them and trying to cast doubt on their sensitivity, on their choice, etc. And while I was caught like that, there was no way to get free of the anger because I hadn't even recognized it. So that annoyance just crept in under my mindfulness, took a seat in my mind. I was totally captivated by it, and I thought I was being mindful.

So this is what the hindrances do. They sneak in with a seductive storyline. And my storyline was basically, "They shouldn't be in my walking path"—like it should have had "Guy Armstrong" emblazoned on it from day one. But as soon as I could recognize, "Oh, there's anger here," then I could start to relate to it. And then it was pretty easy to release it because I saw it was actually pretty petty. Sometimes it's not so easy to release even when we see it, but the first thing is we need to see it. We need to see what's there.

And the hindrances are fairly major events in our experience on retreat, so it's really important that we start to tune in and recognize them and then work with them. The tricky thing about the hindrances generally is that they lead our attention into the external situation. So my attention was focused on the person and the path, and where it wasn't looking was my own inner experience. So that's what the hindrances tend to do—they tend to focus us outwardly, and we kind of dwell on that.

I sort of ran this storyline over and over with something the Buddha called unwise attention. It wasn't helping to run the storyline. I was giving attention to a story that wasn't going anywhere, except generating more annoyance. The only way to release was to direct the attention where the wise person would, which would be: what was I feeling?

When I did that, there was a possibility of releasing it.

You could say that every hindrance is an example of misplaced attention. We are generally seduced into putting our attention on an outside situation or a misleading situation. What we really need to do is turn the mindfulness on the hindrance itself—on our own state of mind. Then it becomes workable. Then it's not a big obstacle.

In fact, as we start to practice with these hindrances with mindfulness, they open up a lot of new areas of freedom. Generally, these are the habits of mind that catch us, the habits of mind that enmesh us in repeated suffering. As we start to be able to notice them, recognize them, and work with them, that has the potential for opening up many areas of freedom in our practice and in our life. So they're very rich for opening and for growth, these qualities.

One of the things I find really beautiful in the world today is this area of applied mindfulness that Bonnie mentioned last night. Mindfulness is becoming quite a buzzword in the whole culture, going out in so many different directions. One direction I think is really exciting is its movement into schools.

There's an organization in the Bay Area called Mindful Schools. I don't know if they're on the East Coast yet or not, but they've trained like a hundred people to go into public schools from elementary to middle school and teach children how to be aware of their emotions. The first step for anyone to develop empathy is to recognize what they're feeling and how that feels to them. So children are being taught from a really early age to notice their own feelings of sadness and fear and anger and joy and excitement and interest. They're getting a whole vocabulary that was never explained to me in my primary school.

This kind of learning is actually going on in tens of thousands of schools, if not a hundred thousand schools across the country now. And I just think, wow, what if a whole generation of children could grow up understanding their emotional world? That would be so good for the whole planet.

I'll tell one little story because it really touched me. One of our sangha members in California is leading groups where she's teaching this to children. But she said with the children she teaches who are pre-kindergarten, you can't really use formal concepts like mindfulness, awareness, and emotion—it's too abstract for the kids. So what she does is lead them in a relaxation exercise, get them to lie down on the ground, and then tell them to imagine that their whole world is this lake that lots of different fishes are swimming through.

A sad fish can swim through the lake. A happy fish can swim through the lake. An angry fish can swim through the lake. But they don't have to worry so much about the fish. They should be the lake. That's her instruction: "You be the lake, and you let all the fish swim through."

After one time doing this, she asked the kids, "Well, how was that for you? What was that like?" This little boy raised his hand—he was four years old, I think—and he said, "I could let all the fishes swim through, but I couldn't let the mad fish swim through."

She said, "Why couldn't you let the mad fish swim through?"

He says, "Because when you don't remember you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt people."

From the mouth of a four-year-old. So it's beautiful. Children have this intuitive wisdom. They can get these concepts early if presented skillfully. I thought this was a really lovely example of that.

Of course, one of the difficulties when the hindrances come is we usually don't like them. Who wants sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, and doubt? Often when they arise, there's some resistance to them, and there can often be judgment: "This shouldn't be coming. I shouldn't be having this. If I was a good meditator, this wouldn't be happening." So we're putting up a wall that tends to block them. By adding judgment or resistance, we're just compounding the situation.

A really important thing to look at is what our relationship to the hindrance is when it comes. As far as possible, just be really open, allowing, and accepting that that energy is there.

Because truly these forces are in all of us. It's not like "your aversion" or "my desire." This is just a very impersonal human quality. All of them are going to come to all of us as we meditate, as we take the journey down that swift river. They're all going to appear. So we don't need to own it as "I" or "mine" or "who I really am." We don't need to resist it because just as they come, they'll also go, like the weather.

As these hindrances come, learning not only to recognize them—and I think it's most helpful to name them—but also to ask the question: how am I relating to it as it arises and as I'm feeling it? Am I resisting, judging, aversive, or can I really just allow it as a part of my humanity, just a part of my human experience?

This is hard to believe, but we say it often, and I think it's really important: what is happening in our meditation—that means a particular arising—is not really as important as how we're responding to it. I'm going to say that again because it's so important: what's arising in our meditation is not as important as how we're responding to it.

Generally what arises is what I would call old karma, old habit patterns that have been set in motion for maybe many years, maybe since childhood, maybe from before. They have a momentum that's just going to run and that we don't even have to put a lot of energy into sustaining. They're going to arise. But what's really important is: from our current understanding, our dharma wisdom, how can we respond in this moment? Can we respond with some acceptance, with some compassion, with some kindness for ourselves, with understanding the nature of these impermanent visitors that just come for a while and then pass on their own terms?

Make this an important part of looking at hindrances. Not only what is arising, but how are you relating when it's there? And not to judge that either, but just to realize that the response is really where we establish our dharma practice. These old karma things can come from nowhere, can come just from habit pattern. But our dharma practice is about: how do I meet this present moment? And that we have more choice in.

The first of the hindrances I want to talk about is called sense desire. The Pali term is kamachanda. These two words are significant. Kama means sensuality. You probably know it from that old Indian text, the Kama Sutra, which is not a Buddhist text, I might add. If you haven't heard of it, it's a manual for lovemaking. So kama is sensuality. Sometimes it's synonymous with sexuality. In that instance, it's the Sutra, which is considered a holy kind of text on sexuality. You wouldn't find that from the Buddha's teachings.

But in this case, it means desire in the realm of the physical senses, which includes sensuality and sexuality. So sometimes kama is translated as "sensual." Kamachanda could be "sensual pleasure" or "sense pleasure." We're translating it as "sense desire."

The first thing I want to talk about is this word "desire." Desire has gotten a bad rap in Buddhism. It's kind of logical when you think it's the cause of suffering, right? If craving's the cause of suffering, that's not a person you want on your side. But there are many different words in the Buddha's language that get translated as desire, and it's important to understand the differences between them.

The word that's the cause of suffering is usually translated "craving," and that word in Pali is tanha. So tanha generally has an unwholesome connotation. Another word that comes in a lot, kamachanda, translated as "sense desire," is considered one of the hindrances, so also not something to blindly follow. Raga is a word that's often translated as "lust." It can mean lust for many different things. It also usually has an unwholesome connotation, as does lobha, which is usually translated as "greed" in that list of greed, aversion, delusion. These all have connotations that are leading to the unwholesome, although I'm going to qualify that in a minute.

But there are other words for desire which are not considered unwholesome. One of the key words you'll hear is chanda. Chanda means a desire, but it's not qualified as necessarily unwholesome. Chanda can be combined with wholesome qualities or it can be combined with unwholesome qualities. One could talk about lustful desire using the word raga. One could talk about sense desire using the word kama. Then it takes on a questionable connotation. But chanda can be paired with the word dharma and talk about dhammachanda.

Then it's more like our zeal, our love, our enthusiasm for the Dharma and our practice of it. So if we didn't have dhammachanda, we wouldn't be walking this path together. If you didn't have a huge amount of enthusiasm and commitment and love for the Dharma, you wouldn't be here. So this quality of zeal or enthusiasm we talk about as dhammachanda, and it's the whole origin of the path.

I was thinking about that quotation that Joseph used, I think, on the opening night when he quoted Maya Angelou and said, "The ache for home lives in all of us." For me, that's kind of an expression of dhammachanda also. The ache for home, for me, is kind of a deep spiritual longing. I want to find a home that's beyond change, a home that's a real refuge beyond impermanence. And that's a way that I actually feel the call for the spiritual journey.

So sense desire in this context means desire for pleasant experiences in the five physical senses: sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch. These are huge areas of human pursuit. If you just sort of take a step back and think about the way the world works, there has always been this desire for more in the field of material goods. How many centuries has one country been fighting another for land or resources? How many centuries has one country been exploiting another, taking it over and colonizing or oppressing it for land and resources, essentially money, material goods? And to the extent that we do it today, how much are we harming our earth to carry out what seems like an endless kind of desire for more?

I just recently watched a video. You may have seen it. Joanna Macy took a plane flight over this part of Canada, which is called the Athabasca oil sands or the Alberta tar sands. What they've discovered is over this huge stretch of northeast Alberta, they think there's as much petroleum underground there as there are petroleum reserves in the whole rest of the world combined. But it's very hard to get out because it's under the ground in this very sticky, sandy mixture of petroleum and sand and clay and minerals.

So in order to get it out, they're having to go deep to dredge it up and then refine it and ship it. This area—quite a bit of it has been mined in what is essentially open pit strip mining. Quite a lot of the acreage has already been used in that way. Joanna Macy is an environmental activist and Buddhist, as you probably know, was flying over in an airplane and videoing what she was seeing. I know Canadians have heard about this for years, and probably many of you have heard about it, but I'd never seen the extent of it. I was shocked.

The area that this oil lies under is like 54,000 square miles, which is about the size of New York State. Joanna said that when they were flying, they flew for some hours in this small plane and didn't reach the end of it. And what she showed on the video just looked like that whole area had been strip mined. It was just raw and bare and opened up.

There's this kind of insatiable desire, hunger for more in the material realm. There don't seem to be any limits to what humans will do to acquire it. It's this huge force that's been with us for a long time.

In a lighter way, it's kind of fun to just think about in our capitalist society what industries are built up around satisfying these sense desires. I was just reflecting—this is not in any way a complete list, but I just will toss it out.

In the area of sight, think about the industries that are built on satisfying our desire for pretty sights. The first one that came to my mind was fashion. But it wasn't monastic fashion because you can't build much of an industry off monastic robes. But high fashion, you know, Dior and Lagerfeld and Prada and all that stuff—a lot of money there, and then the trickle-down effect. Anyway, I'll just go through these. Cosmetics, cosmetic surgery, hairstyles, bodybuilding, photography, movies, and there are probably a lot more.

In the area of sound, listening to pleasant sounds, the whole music business. So CDs and MP3s and iPods and iTunes, stereo systems, headphones, live concerts, symphonies, music festivals—all of that is so people can listen to pleasant sounds. Multi-billions of dollars.

Tastes. Okay, we all need to eat. But there are a lot of really expensive restaurants that people don't really need to eat at because the simple foods at IMS will actually serve your nutritional needs, not to mention the delicious meals that we get every day. So special restaurants, fad restaurants, special foods, exotic foods, desserts, beer, wine, cocktails—all of that money going into these special tastes that people pursue.

Smells. This is kind of an interesting one until I started thinking about it. Perfumes was the obvious one that came to my mind. That's a big market.

And then scented cosmetics, deodorants, air fresheners, fabric softeners, scented detergent—the list continues from there.

And then touch. This might be less obvious, but massage, bodywork, chiropractics, pain medications, and sex workers all involve the pursuit of pleasant sensations through touch.

So there's a significant portion of the economy devoted to pursuing sense pleasures. It's fundamentally a movement of mind that seeks pleasant experience, and it can arise very frequently during retreat. You might find yourself thinking about being back in your comfortable home, in your own bed, sitting in your living room chair, watching a movie on your TV, enjoying some special food from your refrigerator. These fantasies can become quite compelling.

At the end of one retreat, after I had been here for quite a while, I started feeling homesick. I began imagining my living room. What was interesting was that I was fairly concentrated, and the level of detail with which I could visualize my living room was extraordinary. I could almost see every thread in the carpet and every book on the bookshelf. It was really amazing. I felt such a pull of homesickness to be back somewhere familiar and comfortable and homey. I wanted nothing more than to lie on my couch eating from a box of chocolates. That looked like heaven at that point.

Sometimes it's about fantasies of places you'd like to visit. You hear people talk about Burma and imagine wanting to see the stupas and monasteries, the pleasant sights of travel. It might be someone you particularly miss, or someone here that you find attractive—the Vipassana romance that can develop on retreat.

All these different kinds of wanting can arise very easily in a retreat setting because our life here is pretty austere. It's quite natural for this to happen.

Take some time to explore this quality of desire. What does it feel like when sense desire is present? I often find there's a kind of soothing quality to it because it brings in something pleasurable and familiar. It's almost as though I want to add something sweet to counter the simplicity of this environment.

But when I feel into it more deeply, there's something about the experience that isn't quite satisfying. There's this sweet thing, but I don't actually have it. With any kind of desire, there's this gap between what we want and what we have—or in the moment, don't have. Tune into that. Desire has an essentially incomplete quality to it, and that's why it always comes with some dissatisfaction. If the desire is really strong, it could bring a lot of dissatisfaction.

Just observe this nature of wanting. We usually don't want what we already have. Have you ever wanted a hand at the end of your arm? No, because it's already there. If you didn't have a hand at the end of your arm, you would really want it. But because we have it, we take it for granted.

I want to emphasize that there is nothing wrong with sense pleasures for laypeople. There is a path in Buddhism for those who want to go beyond sense pleasures altogether—the path that Bhante has chosen, which he spoke about the other night as the renunciant path with its 227 precepts for men or 254 precepts for women who take full ordination. That is a wonderful path, and essentially in the life of a renunciant—a bhikkhu or bhikkhuni—there is no real opportunity to pursue sense pleasures. They can't choose their own food, can't choose their lodging, can't really choose their dress, can't choose to travel for recreation, can't handle money, so they can't go out and buy what would be pleasant. There is an entire venerated path within Buddhism that specifically sets aside the pursuit of sense pleasures.

But the rest of us aren't on that path. As laypeople, sense pleasures are part of our life. Coming here, we give up many of them. If you take the eight precepts, you give up even more. But in our daily life, we're open to sense pleasures. We may be in a loving relationship that has sexuality as a very natural component. We may choose to eat foods that please us, to enjoy music, to make music, to be creative through our relationship with music. All of that is fine. There's no problem with any of that unless we become obsessed by it.

What's important for us as laypeople is to keep examining our relationship to sense pleasures and notice if addiction, obsession, or compulsion is arising. Then we may need to investigate further and discover greater wisdom. But if we're moderate in our enjoyment of sense pleasures and we're not harming other people, sense pleasures in moderation are perfectly acceptable in lay life.

So don't interpret the presence of sense desires as something to judge yourself for.

It's a natural part of our life as lay people.

I mentioned that the Buddha used an analogy of water with all the hindrances. The analogy for sense desire is that the bowl of water has been colored by different kinds of dyes. So you can imagine these different colors swirling around—beautiful blues and golds and reds—in a bowl of clear water. It's very attractive, but when you put your face over it and look in, it doesn't really reflect back so clearly because it's tinted with all these other colors. So it's not a clear seeing of things as they are.

We notice this when we become fixated on an object of desire. When we get fixated on something we want, we don't notice what else is there. We can't appreciate our current situation.

Let me share an example from a retreat I was teaching several years ago. Carol and I were teaching in Italy, which was a lot of fun. The Italian culture is different—there was an espresso machine right outside the meditation hall, so at the end of every sitting, boom, boom, boom, we're drinking shots. We were in a convent that rented its facility out to different groups. The first day we showed up for a meal, there were carafes of red wine out on the dinner table. So we had to go and talk to the servers and say, "We don't do this in a Buddhist retreat setting." They kindly took the red wine away.

One thing I found about the yogis is that they were very open and quite fluent about their emotions, willing to talk about what they were feeling. Early on in the retreat, a young man came into an interview and said, "I'm having a problem with the retreat."

"Oh, what's up? What's the problem?"

"Well, I don't really want to be here."

"Okay, why did you come?"

"Well, this is our holiday time, and I could have spent my holiday going to the Caribbean with my friends or coming on this meditation retreat."

"So why did you come here?"

"Because all the tickets to the Caribbean were sold out."

So I got it. We were second choice.

He was spending his retreat thinking about being in the Caribbean with his friends on a nice sandy beach with that beautiful blue water, swimming every day. So it was a little hard for him to adjust to the atmosphere of the retreat, especially once we took the wine away.

I said, "Look, I think the problem is that you're thinking about the Caribbean. Maybe if you could let go of that, what's going on here is not so bad. Why don't you just see if it's really that problematic being here, or if the problem is just that you're thinking about this other thing and you can't really appreciate what's here."

So he went away, practiced, came back and saw me in a couple of days. He said, "Yeah, I've settled in. It's fine here. I'm enjoying the retreat. I let go of the Caribbean."

That's the way it is with desire. When desire is strong, we feel discontented. But the discontent isn't because the object is missing—the discontent is because the desire is present. So just letting go of the desire, then we can settle in and see what's really here. Life is usually not problematic in the moment. We come into the moment, it's more neutral, and then we can open to it.

So how do we work with desire? First, just be mindful of the feeling of desire and your relationship to it. One thing I notice about the feeling of desire is there's a straining forward quality. I feel it as a tension in my body, as though I'm leaning forward trying to get something else or somewhere else. That's often the first thing that lets me know desire is present.

It may be something you're looking for outside—some pleasure back home or some imaginary future. This is a little outside the realm of the five senses, but I often find on retreat that the straining is for a meditation experience. I want to recreate a sitting where I was comfortable, relaxed, present, concentrated. I want that feeling of ease in the body. That's what the straining forward is about.

What I'll try to do is pick up on the desire from the straining energy, some tension in the body, and then I'll ask, "What have I been thinking about?"

and the thoughts are usually a clue to what it is I'm wanting. Then if I can see that, it's a little easier to let go.

So let yourself just feel that. What does desire feel like in the body, in the mind, and how are you relating? Is it okay? Can you accept? Can you bear it?

If you've been with the mindfulness of the feeling for a while and it doesn't seem that anything's shifting—after being mindful for a while, maybe either the hindrance will weaken a little bit or your identification with it will weaken a little bit. The calling it "I" or "mine," the judgment, the taking it personally might weaken a little bit.

If you've been mindful of it for a while and neither of those has relaxed at all, then you might move—and this is kind of general for hindrances—to an antidote. There's an antidote for every hindrance. The first approach: be mindful for a while so you really explore it and get to know it. If nothing's shifting, then at some point you can try an antidote.

The antidote for desire, the classical antidote, is to reflect on the unattractive. And generally, this would be the unattractive aspect of the thing you want. So if you're thinking about a Caribbean vacation, you might think about how expensive it is, how much time it takes to fly there, sitting on a long plane flight for all those hours, getting sand in your shoes when you get to the beach. It's really a drag when you're on those sandy beaches. You could think about that.

If you're thinking about an attraction to a person, you might think about that person as they age. If you're in your twenties, you may not have seen this cycle long enough, but I'm in my sixties, and I know what happens when people age. That's a very effective reminder for me.

You can reflect on the unbeautiful aspect. You can reflect on the impermanent nature of what you're thinking of. Because even if it's a beautiful thing, the satisfaction we get from beautiful things diminishes. Whether it's a new car or a new house or a new partner, that initial glow does wear off and then things become routine. I'm sorry to say.

So that's the antidote approach with desire.

With sleepiness—and I want to assure my colleagues, we only have another thirty minutes to go in the talks. They'd fall off their chair if they thought I was serious.

So sleepiness. I know you all know what this feels like because you've just started a long retreat. I like the old Victorian formulation, which is sloth and torpor. I like that language because the sloth is kind of physical and the torpor is kind of mental. And the other reason I like it is in the early years on staff, we had a maintenance crew who were not really known for their work ethic. And so they were nicknamed McSloth and McTorpor. Kind of brings them back to me.

So, you know, drowsiness, sleepiness, dullness, lethargy, apathy, sluggishness—all these great evocative terms for this kind of foggy cloud that can descend on us at any point during the day, especially early in the retreat. It can come from a lot of different causes, actually.

Coming into a retreat, almost everybody goes through it. And I think it's coming out of a life that is usually fairly full, fairly busy. The mind has relied on stimulation in the outside life—of interaction and conversation and activity and movement—to kind of pick up its energy. And then we come into this setting, which is so tranquil and uneventful, and nothing is happening, and the mind just kind of goes... it kind of collapses because it's not getting stimulated anymore.

And then a few days later, what's interesting is it kind of settles into that non-stimulation and starts to wake up and find its energy from a different source, which is kind of its native interest in its own experience. It's really a beautiful quality. And then you know at the end of retreat how energized you are, because the mind has found a different source of energy that isn't dependent on outside stimulation. And then you take that into the outside world, and you meet with stimulation, you can get really tripped out, right? The integration period—you can get really kind of spinning. But it is beautiful. The energy comes up from a new source, and then it really sustains us more or less through the retreat.

Sleepiness can come back in after the first four or five days. If sleepiness is coming in often, there are a couple of things to check out. One is, are you really getting enough rest? And sometimes people have trouble sleeping in this environment, adjusting to a new situation. So lack of sleep can obviously be a cause. But there are a couple of other causes.

And one is that we may have learned how to use sleepiness to avoid feelings. So sleepiness can be a defense mechanism, a kind of denial or escape from something that's going on inside that's a little unsettling or threatening.

So we might find that that habit occurs here, and it can arise when things get a little uncomfortable. Just take a look. See if it feels like this is a habit that you've also seen in your outer life - of shutting down or dissociating or not wanting to feel some of what's going on for you.

Then sometimes, even if it's not like a groove in the mind or a big habit, something might come in that is a little bit disturbing. It could be just a body sensation. It could be a mood. It could be a little twinkle of a memory that just doesn't feel so comfortable. And sometimes that fog will come down like a curtain so that you don't have to look more closely at it. So if you have the experience where you're sleeping well, you don't have this long-established habit, generally your body feels good during the day, but from time to time you get this blanket of fog descending, just take a look and inquire: what was the last thing you noticed before the fog came down? Sometimes that could be a clue to an experience that is being guarded against, is being defended.

So how to work with sleepiness when it arises? First thing again is to notice it and name it if you can. Sometimes the sleepiness is so thick you can't even get out the word. That's about all you can get out. Sometimes these dreamy images are going by and you really can't even fight your way back to the present moment. So sometimes that's not possible. But as it's descending, maybe just notice: sleepiness, sleepiness.

And then notice if there's aversion or not. Often we resist being sleepy, but in fact, I think the aversion strengthens the dull quality. At times when I've been able to accept the sleepiness, it's brought more energy. So again, check your relationship. Practice mindfully with it for a while.

In the Buddha's analogy of the bowl of water, sleepiness is when the bowl of water is covered over with algae and water plants. You can't see through because there's just this thick mass that's covered it over. The antidote to sleepiness is to arouse energy. That's what's lacking. It's just a state of low energy. So whatever you can do to arouse energy will be helpful. And you've probably heard the traditional list: open your eyes, sit up, take a few deep breaths, stand up, go for a fast walk the next time you go out for walking. And then be moderate with sleep because dullness can come from oversleeping, and moderate with food.

The last of the hindrances that I'll talk about this evening is restlessness and worry. Restlessness is the other side of the spectrum from sleepiness. Instead of too little energy, it's too much energy. So it feels like the body and the mind are kind of on overdrive. There's a lot of energy in the body, a lot of thoughts, lots of emotions, and it can feel like kind of just a swirl is going on inside - of agitation and some confusion and too much happening.

So if one has the idea that in the middle of this one should be able to find, let's say, the breath very clearly or a detailed body sensation very precisely, you can get really frustrated. Because when the swirl takes over, you're lucky to be able to stay in your seat. Sometimes when restlessness is strong, it's all we can do to keep from jumping up and running out of the meditation hall because restlessness can be really uncomfortable.

So just naming it as restlessness is very helpful. That is the step of mindfulness in relation to it. So it's not a precise mindfulness like you might have with your breath, of noting clearly each in-breath and out-breath. It's kind of like stepping back and looking at a bigger frame. But we step back and we say, "Oh, what's going on is restlessness or agitation or just a swirl." And maybe that's as precise as we can get, but that's precise enough for mindfulness to be established. So that's a skillful thing to do.

How to work with the restlessness from that point? If it's fairly mild, you may be able to resolve it by going to an anchor like the breath, using the breath's calming quality to bring calm in the mind to balance that energy, and you'll feel settled, balanced, and collected. If the energy is stronger than that, the restless energy is stronger than that, then trying to be precise again is going to feel too much like bottling it up. You're going to feel like you're bottling a genie up in a very tight package, and it's going to feel more explosive.

If it starts to feel like that, then it's much more skillful to go really wide. Sounds are a really good focus if the experience is of a lot of restlessness. So make your awareness really wide and open. You can let sounds lead you that way. If it's very quiet, you can just be with the extent of silence or just the sense of space - big sense of space - and let that space just hold the swirl and the stirring and the agitation. This is the advice that Suzuki Roshi gave when he said to give your cow a big pasture.

Give your cow a big pasture. Give your mind a big field to roam around in when it's very restless, and that will help it to quiet down.

The analogy of the water bowl in this situation is the bowl of water stirred by the wind, rippling, swirling, and churned into wavelets. You know how when a lake or pond is really stirred by wind, you can't get a clear reflection looking into it. You can't see things as they really are if you're looking for a reflection.

The antidote is calm. First, establish mindfulness, noticing the restlessness is present, seeing if there's aversion to it, and just working to accept the experience, allowing this combination of factors to unfold. If you've done that for a while and it doesn't feel like the restlessness is shifting or the identification is shifting, then work with calm. You can use the breath for some calm. You can use space. Walking meditation can help. You can try it two ways. If the energy is really high, you might want to walk it out—walk quickly, and that can use up some of the energy. If the energy is just middling, then you might want to walk at a moderate pace and use that moderate pace to work toward calming.

What's so painful about the quality of restlessness, which by the way doesn't go away until full awakening—it's one of the last fetters to be dropped—is that it blocks our access to peace. It is the opposite of peace. It's the absence of peace. The mind is jumping from one moment to the next, and that's why it's also tiring. Sometimes you can go through periods of restlessness, get very tired, and then move into periods of sleepiness.

I want to read this quote from a Tibetan teacher, Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche, that offers the antidote: "Rest in natural great peace, this exhausted mind, beaten helpless by karma and neurotic thought, like the relentless fury of the pounding waves in the infinite ocean of samsara." Especially remember that first line: rest in natural great peace.

The foundation of our experience is peace. You could call it emptiness, but more simply, it is peace. It's natural, it's always available, and it's always possible to rest if we can connect with that. Remember that possibility of resting in this natural great peace.

As practice unfolds, the work with the hindrances takes on a few different levels. First, mindfulness leads us to understand them, open to them, and be much less in conflict with them, and that creates a lot of ease. As the quality of concentration develops, concentration has the power to suspend the hindrances temporarily. We can feel periods when the hindrances are not arising at all. The Buddha said that experience is like being released from prison or recovering health after a long illness. Finally, with different stages of awakening, the hindrances are completely uprooted not to appear again.

I would like to close with this quotation from the Anguttara Nikaya where the Buddha talks about the course of practice and the way this river to awakening works: "All those who have been liberated or who are being liberated or who will be liberated first surmount the five hindrances that weaken wisdom, and then, with their minds well established in the four establishments of mindfulness, develop correctly the seven factors of enlightenment. It is in this way that they all have been liberated, or are being liberated, or will be liberated."

Let's just sit together for a minute, please.

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

> Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive exploration of the five khandhas (aggregates) - rūpa (form), vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (mental formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness) - as the Buddha's primary teaching method for understanding anattā (not-self). Drawing from personal experience of his sister's death, Armstrong demonstrates how these five categories completely account for human experience without requiring any permanent 'I' or self.
> The talk examines how we mistakenly identify with and claim ownership of experiences that arise naturally through physical and mental processes beyond our control. Armstrong references the Bāhiya Sutta from the Udāna, where the Buddha teaches: "In the seen, let there be just the seen... then there will be no you in terms of that." He explains how this understanding of not-self doesn't lead to coldness but rather to the heart's natural opening in love and compassion.
> Through practical examples and classical analogies, Armstrong shows how the conventional sense of self is constructed through what the Buddha called ahaṅkāra and mamaṅkāra (I-making and mine-making), and how recognizing the impermanent, unsatisfactory nature of the aggregates can lead to freedom from this unnecessary burden.

The subject of tonight's talk is that the five aggregates are not self. I want to explore through this schema of the five aggregates—one of the lists the Buddha used very often—this concept of self or I. I'll use the words "I" and "self" more or less interchangeably as we examine how this sense of self gets created and how it can be understood.

I think you all know that in the Buddha's understanding, this sense of self is not really necessary for the experience of being human. It's not considered a solid thing that we're endowed with from birth, but rather it's a concept that, if adhered to tightly, is generated by our own views and beliefs and then becomes a limiting factor in our life.

In fact, you could say that it's one of the key meanings of the word ignorance, which starts the whole chain of dependent origination that leads to suffering—this misunderstanding of the sense of I or self. As we develop a conviction in the true existence of this I or self, that becomes the basis of a lot of self-concern upon which is built hope and fear. Those movements of hope and fear narrow the mind and limit our attention and limit our empathy. An unlimited kind of awareness with a boundless heart of loving kindness gets smaller and contracted by the activities of self-concern and leads to a lot of suffering. This is why we really want to understand how this works, because this is one of the central pointings of the Buddha.

For most people, the I is really the center of the universe. Just like many centuries ago, they thought the Earth was the center of the universe and then discovered it actually wasn't, for most of us the I is the center of our universe. It's the concept that everything else revolves around—our thoughts and our plans, our ideas, our dreams, our wants and likes and dislikes, and our life direction. And it seems so obvious and self-evident. What could be more obvious than this I?

But have you ever been able to find it? Have you ever been able to locate it? You've been looking closely at this mind-body experience. Have you found a single thing called I? William James said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." The Dalai Lama said, "When something seems so evident but we search for it and can't find it, it's a sure sign of delusion."

The classical analogy is that there's a piece of rope on the ground made up of different colors braided together. One takes a quick look at it and thinks it's a snake and then jumps back in fear. But in fact, if one perceives it correctly and sees that it's actually a rope, then the fear goes away. And that's our understanding of self. When we perceive the self within this mind-body experience, there's fear. And when we can see it more clearly, some of that fear and worry lessens and eventually can go out altogether.

So let's start to look at some of the confusion around this use of the word I or self with a few questions. These are not tricky questions—they're straightforward questions.

The first one is: How tall are you? You can hopefully answer that fairly easily. I would say I'm 5 feet 10 inches tall. If you're from Europe, maybe you're 170 centimeters tall. Most of us know that answer. But when we say that without thinking, what do we really mean? We really mean this body is five foot 10 inches tall, right? My thoughts aren't 5'10", my insights aren't 5'10", my metta isn't 5'10". It's just this body that's 5'10". So when I say I am 5'10", we're saying I am the body, and it's five feet 10 inches tall. Here we're identifying I am the body—one common way.

But let me ask another question: What color are your eyes? I would say my eyes are brown. It's very common language—my eyes are brown. Well now I'm no longer the body but I'm something separate from the body that has eyes. So I turn into the owner of the body. First I'm the body and now I'm the owner of the body. Can you be both of those things? Which is right? Which are you?

We do the same thing with the mind. Sometimes we'll say, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." So there's the identifying of I with the mind state, the emotion—I am the emotion, happy or sad. Other times we'll talk about "my joys and my sorrows."

So now I'm not the emotion anymore. I'm the one who owns the emotion. So are you the body or the owner? Are you the emotion or the owner?

Another way that's really common to feel the "I" is to think that where we actually are is somewhere behind the two physical eyes, in the center of the head—maybe in the middle of the brain somewhere. We're like this central experiencer that everything comes into and happens to, and it's really all happening inside the head, somewhere behind the eyes. We're the one who sees sights and hears sounds and thinks thoughts and is the doer or the receiver of all the sense experience.

Actually, it's very interesting. One of the things they're finding in brain research is that there's no central control faculty in the brain. So it's kind of what the Buddha talked about a long time ago—there's no single controller even in that gray mass.

These are five ways of feeling ourselves to be, and there are more, but they're all not quite right. They're not really true in the final analysis. The Buddha said, "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." That's a pretty strong statement. However you imagine the self to be, the fact is ever other than that.

One of my teachers put it more strongly. He said, "Whatever you think is wrong." That was kind of to the point. And it reminded me of something I heard on the radio one time. I think it was a sportscaster who said, "The mind—often wrong, seldom in doubt." That's kind of our experience.

So we want to look into this sense of "I," and we can do it through some of the Buddha's classical teachings. When the Buddha looked at a person, I don't think he saw a self the way that we tend to. He generally described us in one of two ways—kind of the whole human experience.

One of them I'll read to you from this sutta called the Sutta on Totality, from the Samyutta Nikaya. The Buddha said, "Bhikkhus, what is the totality of existence?" That's a bold statement, isn't it? "Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and touches, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond that as the totality would not be speaking of something they knew about."

This is very interesting. Joseph is fond of saying there are only ever six things happening: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects. So this points that out, and it makes our task really simple, doesn't it? All we have to do is know those six things and not hang onto them. Easy, right? A little more complicated.

But this is a nice list. This is the list of the six sense bases called internal and external, and it maps onto our meditation instructions very well because our instructions are usually directed to some form of sense experience: knowing body sensations, knowing sounds, knowing thoughts, knowing emotions, knowing sights, smells, tastes, and so on. Bhikkhu Bodhi said that the Buddha usually used this list to help people cut through craving, because craving tends to orient around sense experience.

But there's another list that the Buddha used as often as the six sense bases, and that is the five aggregates. He's talking about the same totality of experience, but he's dividing it up in different ways. And in this list, the Buddha usually talked about it, according to Bhikkhu Bodhi, to cut through wrong view—and that is the misunderstanding of what constitutes the self.

So the five aggregates was kind of the Buddha's preferred way of looking at this question of self and where we misunderstand it. The value of our looking at this schema, this other map, is that as we look to see ourselves and others in this way, we look to see human life without the false sense of "I," without the conceptual overlay. We look to see things more as they really are.

So the five aggregates that we'll talk about this evening—the term "aggregate" is a translation of the Pali word khandha. In Sanskrit, the word is skandha, so you may hear Mahayana teachers talk about the five skandhas. It's the same list. The term "aggregate" is a translation I don't really like because it sounds very technical. It sounds kind of like road base, to be honest. You mix some asphalt and some concrete and cement and some mixed aggregate, and then you've got road base.

So instead of that, another translation I find more accessible is components—these are like five components that make up our experience. But even more simply, I like to translate khandha as "kinds of stuff." I think that conveys the essence best. These are the five kinds of stuff that make us up: material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. We'll explore each of them individually.

But I want to preface this by saying that when I first encountered this list, I thought it was too technical to be interesting. I didn't see how it would have any relevance to me as a person, as a human being. I thought it was a little too philosophical and intellectual.

It was over fifteen years ago now when one of my older sisters died. She was quite young—fifty-two. I was five years younger than she was, and her death came completely out of the blue. It was a real surprise. She was not in the best of health, but she was not seriously ill at the time. Yet one day in her house, she slipped into a coma. The paramedics couldn't bring her out of it, and she was dead within about twelve hours.

So it was a tremendous shock to her family and her children and, of course, to me, because I was pretty close to her at the time. I'd been on the phone with her a week before, and my sister was somebody who had a big personality. She was a very warm and funny person, and when you were around her, you couldn't miss the sense of her vitality. She was energetic and always enthusiastic about what she was up to.

So when she died, it was a shock of loss, of course, but I also couldn't understand how this being who had been so vital and engaged and active and alive a week earlier no longer existed. It just didn't compute for me. How could somebody who was so solid disappear and not exist any longer?

This became the motivation for me to start looking into: what is this mix of body and consciousness and thoughts and feelings that constitutes a human being? What is this mix? And how is it that at death the body is just left and everything else is gone? That's what was so puzzling.

The five aggregates became the most helpful way for me to understand this, which is ultimately a mystery. I can't say I understand birth and death, but it helped me to understand them better. The way it helped me was that I saw that a person was not just a unitary thing, but actually consisted of these five different processes, all going on in the same bundle or unit, but they are five very distinct activities that are happening. As I could begin to see the separate nature of them, I got a better sense of how they come together in us while we're alive and function together. But they're different activities.

So that's what I'd like to explore this evening.

The first of the khandhas, the first aggregate, is form or material form. The Pali word is rupa. The most dramatic part of rupa is the body, but rupa includes all physical form, all matter. All physical matter is included within rupa, both our own body and externally.

Here is the Buddha's definition of rupa: "Any kind of material form whatever, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—this is the material form aggregate."

So it includes this body and everything we see in the outer world. In fact, rupa is often translated as "sights," so there's a strong connection with form as what we see. But it also includes all the interactions among physical forms—sounds and tastes and smells as well as the touch of the body and all the sights that we see.

For example, when the bell is rung, that sound is in the form aggregate. This is considered part of the material world and part of material form, and therefore part of rupa. So in one fell swoop with this word rupa, we've included all five physical sense bases. In the six-sense-base outline, the first five are the physical senses—they're all subsumed under rupa.

Now what we have left is mind and mind objects.

So the other four aggregates are mind and mind objects. This gets more interesting. Let's look into this mind in a little more detail.

The first mental aggregate is feeling tone or vedana. This is the same quality that Andrea talked about in the instructions the other morning. So you know from that that feeling tone comes in three flavors: pleasant, unpleasant, and neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

The significance of this, of course, is that these form the basis for craving. In the chain of dependent origination, craving is activated by feeling tone. As you were probably working with, the feeling tone of the pleasant is what stimulates, if we're not mindful, the reactive formation of greed. The feeling tone of unpleasant can stimulate the reactive formation of aversion. And the feeling tone of neither—shorthand we say neutral—can stimulate the reactive formation of delusion.

So I wondered about this: how is it that delusion is part of craving? We ignore things, we overlook the neutral, and that's an aspect of craving. Why is that? Because the neutral itself doesn't seem like it evokes craving. So the way it makes sense to me is that when craving is active, all we care about are the pleasant and the unpleasant. We're looking for those. And because we're focused on those out of either greed or aversion, we just don't care about the neutral because it neither entices us nor threatens us. So we tend to overlook it.

You can see this—take a simple example of colleagues at work. If there's someone you really like, you dwell on that person with thought, don't you? If there's someone who's really difficult, you dwell on that person with thought. If there's somebody who doesn't rub you one way or another, it's very easy to forget about them, isn't it? This is kind of the way pleasant, unpleasant, and neither work in our sense experience.

The interesting thing is that feeling tone is in the mental half of the aggregates. So when we hear the sound of the bell, generally that's a pleasant tone. Intrinsically it's kind of pleasing. But it's even more pleasing because it marks the end of a sitting. That's one of the eight best moments of the day, when that bell rings. So we really come to—Pavlov dogs—we really come to like that particular sound, so it generally will strike us as pleasant.

But it's interesting: it's our own mind that is giving it that tone. It's not intrinsic to the sound itself. Sayadaw U Tejaniya sort of describes this—he uses feeling in this sense rather as a verb. It's like we feel our way into the association with that sound. We impute pleasantness as an activity of the mind.

How do we know that? Because some people experience things as pleasant which other people experience as unpleasant. Simple example: When I was growing up, my mother liked to play records, albums of Mantovani recordings. If your experience with music goes back to the 1950s, you will recall that Mantovani was a conductor who had an orchestra that played a lot of movie soundtracks. So it was kind of these lush orchestral arrangements with swelling strings and big crescendos—sentimental movie music, very emotional generally. My mother really enjoyed that kind of music. So I grew up listening to it, and I didn't mind it too much.

Some years ago, there was a 7-Eleven store in Southern California that was having a problem with people coming into the parking lot to deal drugs. When people were dealing drugs in the parking lot, other customers didn't want to come in because it didn't feel safe to them. So the store owner would go out and ask the dealers to leave, but they wouldn't. Then he'd call the police and ask them to leave, and then they'd leave, but then the police would go away and they'd come back. He didn't know what to do about the drug dealers in the parking lot.

So what he did is he put Mantovani on his sound system, cranked up the outside speakers, and the drug dealers fled. Because they did not find Mantovani pleasant.

So my mother found Mantovani very pleasant. The drug dealers did not find Mantovani pleasant.

And that's because feeling tone comes out of the mind, not intrinsic to the thing itself.

So the next of the mental aggregates is perception. The Pali word is saññā. And I think probably Bhante talked about this a bit the other night when he talked about papañca and the Honeyball Sutta, where saññā is a key term in the Honeyball Sutta.

Perception in the Buddhist language means something different than it does in Western philosophy and psychology. I think in Western philosophy and psychology, perception usually means the sense data itself—like a sound might be considered a perception. But in the Buddhist language, it's different than that. So you might have to unlearn some of that Western language for a minute.

Perception here means really recognition. That is, something arises in one of our senses, and we recognize what it is based on prior experience and familiarity and memory.

So, simple example: as you look around the room tonight, if your eyes are open, you probably see women and men and chairs and cushions and lights and floor and ceiling and statue. And you recognize all those things. And it's happening so fast that it's virtually automatic. It's a categorization feature of the mind that's connected to memory.

We're doing it all the time; we don't know that we're doing it. But often as the mental process slows down in meditation, we can see these perceptions happen. A sound arises and we recognize not only sound—we might recognize truck. Or there's a sound in the hall; we recognize hearing, we also notice sneeze, something like that. So the recognition is happening, sometimes with words, sometimes wordlessly, but still you know what it is.

And we think this is just kind of the way things are. We don't realize that we've learned through repeated contact to recognize these things. But a little story from Oliver Sacks illustrates this. He's the neurologist who works in a hospital and has a lot of fascinating case studies.

So he had a chance to work with a patient who had been blind since he was a young boy. Maybe three years old or so, he lost his sight. And then medical technology evolved and they developed the surgical tools that would let him see again. And by that point, he was in his mid-50s.

So they performed the operation on the man, and he was recovering in his hospital bed and the day came to take the bandages off his eyes. So his family was there, the surgeon was there, Sacks was there. They took the bandages off and they expected him to go, "Wow, it's fantastic, I can see again." But the man didn't say anything. He was still lying back in bed and he didn't really respond.

And finally, the man said that he couldn't make any sense of what he was seeing. There was a visual field, but all he could really see was patches of form and color, and he didn't know what they were. Until, he said, this kind of white object started looming from the distance toward him and seemed to say, "Can you see me?" And he recognized the surgeon's voice and he thought, "That must be my surgeon's face coming toward me." But he couldn't perceive the objects of the room in the way that we do without even trying.

So the story goes on. The man did a lot of rehab and a lot of training, and he eventually learned to perceive again fairly well. But some of those circuits hadn't been wired up in the developmental stage when he was younger, and he never recovered full perception again.

So this quality of perception is something that we definitely learn, and then we use almost automatically.

And something else about it is that it comes from repeated recognition, repeated contact, and some familiarity. So it's not just as simple as woman, man, cushion, chair, wall, because the things we see have emotional resonance that comes through in the perception.

So when you see an old friend, you don't have to think, "Oh, I've known this person for 20 years and we had these experiences together and this was beautiful and this was difficult." But just seeing your friend, that whole gestalt comes through as you perceive them. So perception is also very rich with meaning. Sometimes the meaning is accurate, sometimes it's not so accurate.

Simple example: If I say "car," that's a fairly neutral word. There isn't much emotional resonance, is there? And we generally don't get too emotional about "car."

But what if I say "Prius"? Do you like Prius? I really like Prius. I don't have one.

I kind of envy my friends who do. It seems like half my friends have Prii. But I really like them because I think they're one of the best cars to combat climate change and global warming. Fifty miles to the gallon—wow, that is so cool. So I have a very warm association with Prius.

And then I think about another car—Ferrari. I have a different resonance with Ferrari. I think, wow, it's a pretty cool car, but gets twelve miles to the gallon. So I think probably the engine's too big, not so good for global warming. So I have a different resonance with that.

So perception also is not always reliable. The difference between Prius and Ferrari—that can be pretty fact-based. But as Bonnie said in talking about the vipalasas, we see things as permanent which are actually impermanent. We see things as offering lasting happiness which do not provide that. We see things as self which are not self, and so on.

So we have to be watchful of our perceptions. Because they come so quickly, it's not always so easy to see them. We have to be watchful and mindful to notice when they're forming and to check them out to see if they're accurate.

I heard this very touching story this summer. I was listening to a woman who was talking about race in this country, and she had a very interesting history. She was European American, and her first husband was also European American, and they had a daughter. So the daughter had grown up some, and then her husband died, and she married again. Her second husband was African American, and they had a daughter. And so this daughter, being mixed race, was taken in the wider world as an African American. And the first daughter was taken as white.

And what this woman said that was so moving, and of course sad, is that those two girls had very different journeys in their life. The first daughter had all the privilege of being accepted into the world based on her whiteness, and all kinds of doors opened for her. And the other girl, being perceived as African American, did not have all those advantages, and the doors didn't open for her in the same way.

She didn't have to go into a lot of detail, but I could just imagine the milieu of both those girls growing up and the different responses they would get from classmates, from teachers, from classmates' parents, from boys in high school, from professors in college, from sororities, from employers.

What was so moving about it was that both girls got the same kind of love and care at home. And so they grew up with a sense of self-love and self-respect. And for one, that self-love and self-respect was mirrored in the outer world. And for the other, it was not. And that's kind of heartbreaking—that beautiful young children don't get mirrored based on who they truly are, but get mirrored based on people's distorted perceptions based on race or ethnicity. So that's a sad fact of our life in America today, and one that I hope we can overcome for the benefit of all those beautiful children who are growing up here.

So very simply, when we hear the bell and we recognize it as a sound and we recognize it as the bell that ends the sitting, that's the activity of perception going on all the time. And we can start to pay attention to when that categorization happens, when that naming happens for us.

The next of the mental aggregates is a big one. It's called mental formations, sometimes called volitional formations or karmic formations. This is the one that includes all the other thoughts and mind states and feelings that aren't included in feeling and perception. So this includes all the range of the hindrances and the difficult emotions, all the movements of greed, aversion, delusion, all the beautiful states of heart and mind—qualities of love and compassion, refined meditative qualities of mindfulness, concentration, equanimity. All of these are lumped under mental formations.

These are the objects of mind, along with our thoughts. So it's basically thoughts and mind states that make up this whole vast category. And the reason they're called volitional formations is that most of these mind states are expressing something. Desire expresses a kind of intention. Anger expresses a kind of intention. Loving kindness expresses a kind of intention. Even refined states of mindfulness and concentration are there because we've intended them, because we've grown them as habits in the mind.

So this intentional or volitional quality is also why they're sometimes called karmic formations—volition or intention being the root of karma. We understand that within this aggregate of mental formations are all the factors of the path. Bonnie was talking about how we nourish the wholesome factors, and this is what accelerates our journey along the path. These are all found here.

For example, when we hear the bell marking the end of a sitting, we may feel, ah, now I can relax. And then the thought might come: Wow, I could sit forever now.

So that quality of relaxation or ease, that thought "I could sit forever," these are mental formations. This is in the basket, the aggregate, called sankharas in Pali.

The fifth of the aggregates, the last mental aggregate, is called consciousness. The Pali word is vijnana. This is a very subtle experience to tune into. It is something that we can find and know directly in our meditation, but it's not easy to take hold of. It is the knowing quality.

Consciousness is that receptive element, as the Buddha described it—that receptive element of mind that knows all the other objects. So consciousness knows sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, thoughts, and emotions. It receives them. It holds them. It's how we experience the world. It is this factor of consciousness that gives rise to our experience in life.

Again, a simple example. When you hear a sound, there are actually two things going on. Mostly, we've just talked about the sound. I don't know what that is—it might be F sharp or something like that. The sound has a material quality that we can identify, and it's in the field of rupa. But because you're a sentient being, you're a conscious being, you're hearing it. If that sound was struck and there was no one in the room, the sound waves would happen, but there would be no hearing taking place, because this hearing depends on our being conscious.

We can start to feel in our meditation practice what's the sound, which is the rupa part, and what's the knowing of it. That's the consciousness piece. It comes as one experience, but it's got these two aspects that we can start to feel into.

So how is it that one thing can have two aspects? Let me ask you: Is this round or is it black? It's round and black, isn't it? But you can focus on the roundness or you can focus on the blackness by choosing. Similarly, when a sound arises, you can focus on the physical quality or you can focus on—oh, there's knowing in the mind of that sound. And that knowing is this element of vijnana.

So it's not something you can take direct hold of because it's doing the holding. It's holding another object, but if you draw your attention close, you can start to intuit how this knowing is taking place. It's a very interesting practice as you start to come close to that.

So these are the five aggregates—form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. One of the interesting things about the aggregate list as opposed to the sense bases list is that all five aggregates are present in every moment of experience. So you might have an experience where there's not a sound or where there's not a taste or where there's not a smell. Some of the sense bases might not be there. But the five aggregates are always there in some form, doing their thing. So they're always available. When you want to tune into them, they're always there.

When I first started working with this list, I thought, this is kind of a funny list. It drags out things like feeling and perception, but it doesn't drag out other special things like volition and attention. Those are really important factors too, but they aren't dragged out of sankharas into this special, unique category. Why is that? But it doesn't matter so much.

When the Abhidhamma goes through what makes up a human being, they only have three categories. What the Abhidhamma does is to list rupa, which is our rupa; citta, which is like our vijnana, consciousness; but then it throws feeling and perception back into sankharas and just calls these mental factors.

This is very interesting because when you look at a person you can see—oh, there's a body, there's consciousness, which is this brightness of knowing, and there are all the states of mind. That's a very interesting way to look at people, and to look at yourself. Basically what we are is a body, plus consciousness, plus mental states. That's it.

When I saw that, I understood how my sister could die and I could lose her. Because the body was still there, but the consciousness and the mental states, which had always been joined, weren't. So that's what breaks apart with dying.

I don't know where consciousness and mental states go, if they go anywhere. But I understood that ending better than I had before.

So it doesn't matter really whether it's three or five or eight aggregates. The important thing is: is this list exhaustive? Meaning, any aspect of your experience—can you toss it into one of these five categories? I'm just going to ask that for tonight. You don't have to answer because it takes some reflection. If you can toss everything that's part of you into one of these five categories, then it's an exhaustive list. It covers everything in our experience.

I'm going to suggest it is exhaustive. I'll let you reflect on that.

And then why is that important? Because there's a big word that's missing from this list. And that big word is I. There's no I in this list. So what the Buddha is saying is that in our experience, there is form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness, and that's sufficient. That's all that's needed. The I is extra, not required—a redundancy. Can it be taken out? The Buddha said it could.

That fascinates me—that we could see our experience as these five things and not overlay it with any conjecture about I or self. In fact, he said this is the way to the end of suffering. He talked about this overlay as what he called ahankara and mamankara, which literally means "I-making" and "mine-making." So he says we construct the I by concocting a sense of "I" or "mine."

So how do we do that? He talked about this in a number of suttas, and let's go through it a little bit. First, he said, take a look at these five aggregates from the point of view of permanence, happiness, and self.

So he said, "Take a look at form. Is form permanent or impermanent?"

"Impermanent, venerable sir."

"Very good. So then, is what is impermanent capable of giving lasting happiness, or is it ultimately going to be unsatisfactory? If something's impermanent, can it give lasting happiness?"

"No, venerable sir. Ultimately unsatisfactory."

"Very good, bhikkhus. Now, is what is impermanent, unsatisfactory, and subject to change fit to be regarded as 'this is mine, this I am, this is myself'?" In other words, why would we invest ourselves in something that we knew was going to change and not give happiness? Would that be for our benefit?

So the bhikkhus, being very smart, said, "No, venerable sir, that would not be for our benefit."

This is a very succinct way of relating to your experiences with form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness—or for that matter, the six sense bases. What if you find yourself seeing them as "this is mine, this I am, this is myself"? Then we can reflect on that.

So then the question comes: how does the self actually get generated? I want to ask another question. Do you ever find the I all by itself? Looking through the body and mind and sense experience, does it ever just stand out? "This is the I. I've got it." Or is I always coming in in relation to something else?

So there's a thought about being at home, then the phrase comes: "I'm thinking about my home." There's a pain in the leg and there's the thought: "I have a pain in the leg." Is the I only coming into being based on other things?

I want to suggest that for your reflection. Do you ever find the I standing on its own, or is it only being established in relation to other things?

The Buddha taught that this is what constitutes I-making and my-making—taking ownership of or identifying with different aspects of our experience. Yet this I-making and my-making is not necessary, not required.

One of the places we most easily identify is with the body. How can we relate to it without so much sense of I or mine? The body usually brings up many emotions for us. We like our body or dislike certain aspects of it. We feel proud of some things about it, embarrassed about others. But essentially, did you have anything to do with the way your body came out?

Think about emerging from the womb and then growing up. Did you have anything to do with how tall you are, the size of your bones, the overall shape of your frame, the color of your hair or skin, the color of your eyes? We can affect the body somewhat through diet and exercise and care and good cosmetics, but the basic makeup of the body didn't come from us.

We take ownership of it, but how did it come? Our father's sperm met our mother's egg. The cells combined and multiplied. That organism was nourished in the womb. Birth happened, then it grew on food and water and air. The aging process began—we grew up and got bigger, then the aging process continued to where some of us are now. All beyond our control. We didn't ask for it. We didn't control it. It just happened.

Why? Because the body is part of physical nature—just part of physical nature, not under our control, not under our direction, not under our will. So why do we claim it?

Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of my teachers in Thailand, put it this way: this body came out of nature, it's part of nature, it's never departed from nature, and it belongs to nature. So give it back to nature. That will be a big relief for you.

But we claim it, don't we? We think it's I or mine. We didn't have that much to do with it.

Emotions are also part of nature—part of mental nature. We all have all of them. We all have wanting and love and fear and sadness and grief and anger and joy and compassion. They're just part of the mental nature.

This teaching comes from the Buddha on how to see with wisdom: "All form should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom thus: 'This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself.'"

We can apply this. When we see ourselves making I and mine around any experience, physical or mental, we can remind ourselves: not me, not mine, not who I am. We can say that about every aspect of our experience—not me, not mine, not who I am.

This kind of pointing was beautifully summed up in one of the suttas from the Udana. I'm sure many of you are familiar with it—the story of Bahiya.

Bahiya was a practitioner in a different part of India. He had many students and had developed wonderful spiritual qualities. Enough of his students thought he was enlightened that Bahiya himself wondered: Am I enlightened? Of course, that question might have been a clue.

One day he was visited by a deva. Bahiya said, "You know, I have many students and I'm their teacher, but I wonder if I'm enlightened." The deva was very straight with him: "No, Bahiya, you're not enlightened."

You're not even on a path to enlightenment. Sorry to tell you. But there is a teacher in northern India who is fully enlightened, who is fully awakened. He's called Gautama Buddha. And he's residing in this particular town.

As soon as Bahiya heard this, being such a sincere seeker, he immediately picked up and started walking hundreds of miles to find the Buddha. He finally came to the small town where the Buddha was said to be staying. He found some monks and figured that might be where he'd find the Buddha, but the Buddha wasn't there. The monk said, "No, he's out collecting his morning alms. But he's just down the road. You can probably go find him."

Bahiya walked into the town and saw this very dignified, majestic being walking with great poise and equanimity. He thought that must be the Buddha they were talking about. So he approached and said, "Venerable sir, are you Gautama Buddha? I'd like to ask you a question."

The Buddha said, "Yes, I am that person, but this is not a good time. As you can see, I'm on my alms round."

Bahiya said, "Venerable sir, please give me your teaching in brief. I've come a very long way. Please give me your teaching in brief."

The Buddha said, "I'd be happy to meet with you later, but I can't right now. I'm collecting my morning meal."

Bahiya asked a second time, and the Buddha again said no. He asked a third time: "Please give me your teaching in brief. Life is uncertain. We never know how long either of us may be alive."

As these stories often go, by the time you ask the Buddha the third time, he has to agree. So he said, "I will tell you, Bahiya, in brief." This is the teaching he gave him called the Bahiya Sutta:

"This is how you should train. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. And in the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here nor there, nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Bahiya was so ready and his paramis were so well developed that he came to full enlightenment on the spot from hearing that short discourse from the Buddha. He awakened fully to the truth through this door of not-self. When the Buddha said, "In the seen, let there be just the seen," what's missing is the I, the one who says, "I am seeing," or "I am seeing my body." The I is not there. In the seen, let there be just what is seen. On that, Bahiya awakened.

It's said that later in that same day, Bahiya was crossing a field where a cow was protecting her baby calf. The cow felt threatened by Bahiya's presence in the field, charged him, and gored him right in the stomach. Bahiya died that day from the goring. But fortunately, before he died, he had heard the teaching and fully awakened to the truth of the Dhamma, knowing that time was short.

This is the investigation, the inquiry that opens up this field of understanding what's meant by not-self. Self is something we add to a situation. If we don't add "I" or "my," our original relationship to what is seen and heard and cognized can be free of self, free of that burden.

It may sound intellectual or like we're developing some cold scientific view, but it doesn't feel like that. Because the more the burden of self is taken off our shoulders, the more the heart relaxes and opens. The more the heart relaxes, then these beautiful qualities can come through—trust, faith, confidence and joy, balance, love and compassion. When the heart is unburdened, it naturally opens and connects with the world.

So I close with this quotation, which you've probably heard many times, but I find it particularly fitting for this exploration. It's from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who said: "Love tells me I'm everything. Wisdom tells me I'm nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows."

This is the marriage of insight and loving kindness. When we see through the construction of self, we don't become cold or disconnected. Rather, we discover this beautiful dance between the wisdom that recognizes no-thing-ness and the love that embraces everything. Between these two poles, our life flows.

Let's just sit for a moment in this understanding.

When there is no you in terms of that fabricated self, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here, nor there, nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

The Buddha's teaching points us toward this profound simplicity—this recognition that what we take to be our burden, our self, is actually something we're adding to the pure awareness that is always already here. In seeing this clearly, we find not emptiness, but fullness. Not disconnection, but the most intimate connection possible with all of life.

Thank you for your attention to this teaching.

CHAPTER 128

Seven Factors of Awakening

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga) as the mental qualities that propel practitioners toward liberation. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that we must "starve the five hindrances and feed the factors of awakening," Armstrong explains how these seven factors work sequentially and in balance to create the conditions for insight.

The talk covers each factor in detail: sati (mindfulness) as the foundation that maintains balance; dhammavicaya (investigation) as wisdom-based inquiry into present experience; viriya (energy) as heroic effort and enthusiasm for practice; pīti (rapture) as joyful interest that makes meditation delightful; passaddhi (tranquility) as the natural calm that emerges from contentment; samādhi (concentration) as collected awareness rather than narrow focus; and upekkhā (equanimity) as balanced responsiveness to changing conditions.

Armstrong emphasizes the practical balance between arousing factors (investigation, energy, rapture) and calming factors (tranquility, concentration, equanimity), with mindfulness maintaining equilibrium. He illustrates these teachings with stories of accomplished practitioners like Dipa Ma and contemporary examples, concluding with an inspiring account from Thai master Ajahn Liam's awakening experience, demonstrating that profound realization remains possible in our time.

The Seven Factors of Awakening

The subject of the talk this evening is the seven factors of awakening, or beyond the hindrances.

You probably remember the story that Bonnie told in her first talk about the Native American grandfather, the Cherokee grandfather, who was talking to his grandson who'd come home from a day at school where he'd had a hard time with other kids. The grandfather told the boy that he had two wolves who were battling inside him. One was angry and looked for vengeance. The other was kind and wanted to help people. The grandson asked, "Which one will win?" And the grandfather replied, "The one that I feed."

I like this story both for the amount of wisdom it holds and also because it really resonates with the Buddha's language in terms of developing our own mind. In the suttas, you find references where the Buddha says that what we want to do in practice is starve the five hindrances and feed the factors of awakening. This is the way he thought of it and the way that he described it. You start to see that most fundamentally, what our practice is about is shaping our minds in this particular direction. We develop the tools and the understanding and the skills to shape our own minds.

That's a radical understanding. Most people in the world don't have any idea, first, that this would be a desirable thing to do, or second, that it's possible. And yet with the tools of the Dharma, we are shaping our mind. The word in Pali that's used for this work is bhavana. It's the same root as the word bhava as in bhavatanha or the craving for existence. So it's pointing to the fact that there is a kind of development going on, a creating going on, and it's aimed at our own heart and mind. That's the beauty of our practice. Over time, a meditator can develop a great range of skill in this shaping.

I'm sure you all have heard of the Indian teacher Dipa Ma. She first came to this country in 1980. Joseph and Sharon had spent time with her in India and brought her over. Carol and I had the opportunity to spend a month living in a house with her, looking after her while she was here. She was a very impressive being.

People ask, "Well, is it possible to be really deeply awakened in this day and age?" Dipa Ma was someone in whom I didn't see even a flicker of a hindrance. I didn't see a flicker of anger or reactivity or greed or anything that was off. She was very patient. She had a four-year-old grandson with her who was a little bit of a wild being at that time. I remember taking her through department stores where her grandson Rishi would be racing out in front and pulling clothes off the hangers and bringing things down from the racks, and they'd be falling in the aisles. Dipa Ma would sort of be trotting after him with her white skirt flapping behind her and this sweet smile on her face. I thought if she could be patient with a four-year-old, she was pretty cooled out. And she was.

She taught a number of retreats here on her visits to America. At one retreat, someone asked her, trying to get a read, "What is in your mind?" Her reply was, "There are only three things in my mind. There's loving kindness, there's concentration, and there's peace. That's it." That's a beautiful mind. And she manifested that all the time.

For those of you who are interested in her, there's a wonderful book that was written by someone who teaches here, Amita Schmidt. The book is simply called Dipa Ma. It's both a biography and account of some of her teachings. Very inspiring, and you know probably there isn't a surplus of great women teachers in our tradition, I'm sorry to say. It's very interesting because in our pool, the numbers of women and men teachers is just about equal. But coming from Asia, that wasn't so much the case. So among the venerated Asian teachers, Dipa Ma is one of the few women, not the only, but one of the few women. This book connects very strongly, I find, for women practitioners especially. I recommend it to all of you. A very inspiring being.

She was a good example of someone who had developed her mind so well that we could call it tamed. This was an expression the Buddha often used for the mind that was well developed.

A mind that had become tamed and free of its reactive formations. Such a mind becomes a friend and a support to one.

In an earlier talk, Joseph and I described the five hindrances that arise and how to work with them. Of all the Buddha's lists, this is perhaps the most crucial for identifying the obstacles that obstruct the practice of meditation. For those intent on developing the path toward awakening, the hindrances are the factors of mind that block that current until we learn to recognize them and work with them.

Similarly, the seven factors of awakening are the qualities that speed that current along, that truly support and strengthen and propel that movement toward awakening or enlightenment. I'll use these two terms synonymously—awakening or enlightenment—as they're simply different translations of the Pali term bodhi.

As we begin to understand this in our meditation, these factors become our best friends. They are the ones that propel our path. We might say that we can't accomplish this through our own will alone, but as we generate these factors, they do the work for us. They carry out the movement toward awakening.

This quote bears repeating here: "Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future, all will do so by surmounting the five hindrances that weaken wisdom, by firmly establishing their minds in the four foundations of mindfulness, and by correctly developing the seven factors of awakening."

These seven factors are mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. The Buddha said of these factors, "They lead to awakening, therefore they're called factors of awakening." They're all described as maturing in release—meaning when we learn to work with them, strengthen them, and build them up, they lead to liberation. That is their destination.

They can also be understood as the factors present in the mind at the moment of enlightenment. When one is poised on the threshold of awakening, it's these factors in the mind that create the condition for opening to the unconditioned. This opening cannot happen by an act of will. We cannot choose it or dictate it. But what we can do through practice and effort is cultivate these seven factors, nurture them, and bring them into balance. Then such a mind is poised for awakening, poised for insight. That is our task.

The Buddha compared this journey and these factors to the rafters that hold up the roof of a peaked house. Just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline toward the roof peak, so too when a practitioner develops and cultivates the seven factors of awakening, she slants, slopes, and inclines toward nibbana. These factors lead to the unconditioned, lead to awakening. That is their very nature.

The Buddha described the seven factors as sequential—one leads to the next, which leads to the next. That's how I'll explain them tonight. But we also understand that any of the seven factors will support the others. It's not merely sequential development, but somewhat circular. They continue to help each other. One doesn't need to fully develop one factor before beginning to develop the next, but this sequential understanding helps us see their relationship.

The first factor is mindfulness. It not only starts the chain but also serves to keep them in balance. The next three are called arousing or energizing factors: investigation, energy, and rapture. They all pick up the energy. The last three are calming factors: tranquility, concentration, and equanimity. They balance the rising energy and bring in calm.

The overall balance requires the energizing factors and calming factors to be roughly equal. This is why you'll hear us say in the meditation instructions, "Find the balance of mind that keeps you tranquil and alert." The alertness represents the energizing factors, the tranquility represents the calming factors. We suggest finding this balance in the body because that expresses it in the mind.

Let's examine some of the factors. We've talked extensively about mindfulness, so I won't spend much time on it tonight. I do want to repeat, or at least paraphrase, a definition that Andrea gave early in the retreat in her first talk on mindfulness.

A simple way to remember what mindfulness is—and therefore also how to practice it—is understanding what our experience is in the present moment. Or you could say mindfulness is knowing what our experience is in the present moment. Put that way, it's a very simple thing to do. You just look in the moment, what's our experience, and when we know it, that's mindfulness.

What's interesting is this very simple understanding has these profound implications and unfoldings in meditation experience. When we first come upon mindfulness, it doesn't seem like a big deal: Oh, I know I'm breathing in. I know I'm breathing out. I know I'm experiencing a pleasant feeling. I know I'm experiencing the mind affected by desire. I know that the enlightenment factor of calm is arising in me.

This doesn't seem like a big deal, but somehow this is a very important factor of the mind that leads to many, many other wholesome states. Its power is hard to feel at first, but for people who've been practicing for a while, as you have, you can start to see the tremendous power that it generates.

In the Sutta, I want to mention one little thing. The key term in my mind is pajanati. It's the term used again and again in all four foundations of mindfulness that Bhikkhu Bodhi has translated as "understand": One understands breathing in long, I breathe in long. One understands experiencing a painful feeling, I feel a painful feeling. One understands the mind unaffected by desire as the mind unaffected by desire.

This term pajanati is the key operational term in mindfulness. It's simply knowing our experience in these different domains of the four foundations. All the rest starts from there.

When we start to look at what's happening in our experience and we just know it very simply like that, we tend to get interested: Oh, what is the experience of breathing in? What is the experience of breathing out? That looking more closely is the second enlightenment factor, which is investigation. The Pali term is dhammavicaya.

There's a little disagreement within the tradition about what the word dhamma means here. The word dhamma has a number of meanings. It is the Buddha's teaching —as such, it's the second refuge. It refers to the ultimate truth of things. One sees the Dhamma, and that constitutes awakening. It can be used simply as a term that means thing or phenomenon. So all the experiences at the sense bases can be called dhammas —things that are happening. It can also be used to refer to mind states. In the fourth foundation of mindfulness, the word that's used is dhammas, sometimes translated as "objects of mind."

When Andrea gave her talk on investigation, she described it as the investigation of states of mind, and there certainly is justification in the suttas for describing it that way. In a broader sense, I find the factor of investigation wakes up when we bring an interested, alert curiosity to any of our experiences at the six sense doors. I understand it as looking closely at our experience at any of the sense doors.

For example, in developing a relationship with breathing, one could get interested in what is the quality of the in-breath. In bringing the attention closer to the sensations of breathing, investigation is happening. This is a very useful thing to do. One reason is that investigation is a function of wisdom. In the list of the seven factors, it's the most direct expression of the wisdom side of the mind. By activating investigation, we are waking up the natural intelligence that is wisdom in us.

We recall that it's not investigation in a conceptual sense. This investigation is bringing our attention closer to our experience and rubbing against it more intimately so that we know it more fully. For example, with paying attention to an in-breath, one of the things that Sayadaw U Pandita would ask in interviews is: "All right, you're experiencing the in-breath. Tell me three specific sensations that you feel when you breathe in." This is an interesting exploration.

A question like this invites the quality of investigation, and then you'd return for your next interview and report on those three sensations. So you'd better find them. This is wonderful when a teacher makes you accountable for something, because it really makes you look. And then he would say, "Tell me three different sensations you find in the out-breath." This becomes an interesting investigation. And then you have to report that in the next interview.

You could play with this if you like. You don't have to report it to anyone, but you could experiment with it and see what that exploration does to the quality of interest you bring to breathing in. We notice when we get interested in something that it makes the mind more alert and bright. Sometimes that interest comes quite naturally.

I was sitting at home, I think it was two weeks ago when I was preparing a talk. It was a Sunday afternoon, and suddenly two deer appeared in the grass outside the cottage where I'm staying. One of them was acting like I had never seen a deer behave before. It must have been born this year. The other was older and doing regular deer things like grazing. Basically, deer spend their lives grazing.

But this younger deer was doing what I could only call gamboling—something that lambs do in the spring after they've been born. It was running around after the other deer, kicking up its legs and jumping for no apparent reason other than the joy of expressing its bodily delight. It was running back and forth while the older deer kept its head down eating grass.

As I watched them, my whole energy and attention went into seeing those deer, especially the younger one. I must admit, I had a fondness for the younger one. This is what happens when we get interested—our attention collects around that experience. If we can get interested in the process of our body and mind, our attention will collect around that, and the mind will become bright and alert.

This is part of the increase in energy which leads into the next enlightenment factor: energy. The interest of investigation tends to bring up energy. The Pali term here is viriya. This is basically the root of effort, so it's sometimes called effort, or energetic effort. Other aspects of this third factor are expressed by synonyms such as strength, courage, ardor, or my current favorite, enthusiasm. When we have enthusiasm for our practice, this is the kind of inward state of viriya.

The root of the term comes from the Pali word vira, which means hero, or in the feminine, heroine. It's actually the same root as the Latin for virile—the English word virile comes from basically the same root as vira. This is a particular kind of energy, though. It's not just random physical energy. It's energy that's directed toward the path, or you could say toward our meditation.

Again, this is from the Buddha: "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unskillful states and the development of skillful states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the responsibility of cultivating skillful states."

When we tune into viriya, there's the understanding that the journey we're on is a heroic kind of journey. The energy that we are putting into it is a heroic kind of energy. Having watched you all practice so sincerely for almost four weeks now, I'm really struck by this heroic quality and the courage and enthusiasm and ardor that you display in keeping to your practice even when things aren't easy. I really feel that in the interviews. It's moving and inspiring.

This ardor for practice comes out of our motivation and our aspiration, of course. You see it in worldly terms also, although it has a different feeling here. In worldly terms, there's a lot of effort going into worldly pursuits. I think about sports as one area where it's really easy to see this. I'm a fan of tennis, and I really loved the generation about ten years ago when Andre Agassi and Pete Sampras were leading the men's game. I liked both of them in different ways.

But Agassi was working with this very determined trainer from Las Vegas—you might have said he was a Sayadaw U Pandita of the tennis world. He would have Agassi run up the hills around Las Vegas until he became so exhausted that he threw up. He'd have to run every day until he got that tired, brought to that edge of what he could sustain.

And I think about professional bike riders also. I like to watch a little bit of the Tour de France in the summer, and it is amazing what those people do. They ride for basically a month full out every day. One of them said that every time they get on a bike to race, they understand that they're going to be going through eight hours of nonstop pain. They push their body through all these uphills and downhills and flat stretches absolutely as fast as they can go for about eight hours a day. At the end, they are close to passing out. Some of them pass out when they reach the finish line. So I think about that level of virya being put in just for fame and fortune.

And then I think, well, we're after something much more important, right? We're after the purification of heart and mind.

In one three-month course that I sat, virya was really being emphasized. The basic instructions were that one should sleep for four hours a night and do sitting and walking most of the rest of that time. When I went in for my interview every day, seeing Joseph and Sharon at that point, I would report every day how many hours I sat, how many hours I walked, and how many hours I slept. Again, with the accountability, I thought, I'd better work at this. I wasn't used to sleeping just four hours a night—I was used to more like six on retreat. I couldn't just do that overnight, but little by little, I worked my sleep down. I finally ended up going to bed at eleven, getting up at three every day, and finding out I had enough energy to get through the day. That's what I sustained for a long part of that retreat. If you're not getting involved in other activities, the rest of the day is mostly sitting and walking. It was difficult to get going, and then once I got it going, it was sustainable. That's one form of energy.

For me, that was really the courageous form, the most determined form of effort that I put in practice. It was very worthwhile. I'm very glad that I did that style of practice.

This quality of virya also expresses itself not always in straight courage and tremendous forms of effort, but it expresses itself as perseverance. There's this beautiful story from Tibet in the 11th century with one of the greatest yogis in all of Tibet, who was Milarepa. He's still revered as one of the greatest practitioners ever. You'll recognize him in thangka paintings because he's wearing just simple white cotton robes and usually has a little topknot coming out of his head.

Milarepa had several strong disciples, most famous being Rechungpa and Gampopa. There's this wonderful story about his connection with Gampopa, who became a very famous teacher in his own right and has left a number of wonderful texts.

Gampopa had been training with Milarepa for some time, but it was time for Milarepa to push Gampopa out of the nest. He said, "Now you've gotten all the teachings, you need to go off and practice." So Gampopa was very sadly saying goodbye because he had a great love for his teacher, but he was ready to follow the direction and go off and meditate on his own. Gampopa was starting to walk down the mountain trail, having taken leave of his teacher, and finally Milarepa called out, "Wait, wait, come back. There's one more important teaching."

So Gampopa comes back. Milarepa said, "There's one more instruction I need to give you, my son, before you leave. There is nothing more profound than meditating on this pith instruction." And he turned around, flipped up his white robe, and showed Gampopa his buttocks, on which were two very hard calluses.

Milarepa said, "The qualities in my mind stream have arisen through my having meditated so persistently that my buttocks have become as hard as a camel's hoof. You must also give rise to such heartfelt perseverance and meditate."

So, my noble sons and daughters, my calluses have worn down so much I can't give you this pith instruction myself, but I can relate it from Milarepa.

Sometimes this quality of heroic effort seems daunting, but if we just think about it as moment after moment after moment, then it seems more doable. I think we've already heard this quote from Sayadaw U Tejaniya, but I'd like to read it again in this context:

"Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be awake. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort which is simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

When we maintain this level of energy and effort, as the mind collects around our experience in the present moment, there's something new that starts to come in. And I know you all have experienced this at times.

As this quality of calm develops, we discover something quite remarkable. We start to find a deep sense of ease and tranquility that permeates both the mind and body. This isn't simply the absence of agitation—it's a positive quality of peacefulness that feels nourishing and restorative.

When we reach this level of calm, the body naturally begins to settle. You might notice that your breathing becomes softer and more refined. Tensions that you didn't even realize you were carrying start to release. There's a sense of the whole system coming into a state of natural ease.

This quality of passadhi is quite different from ordinary relaxation. It's not the kind of relaxation we might experience while watching television or taking a bath. This is a deeper settling that comes from the mind's contentment with present-moment experience. It's as if the whole being recognizes that it doesn't need to be anywhere else or do anything else—this moment is completely sufficient.

In this calm state, we often discover that we can be alert and peaceful at the same time. This might seem contradictory at first, because in our usual experience, when we're very relaxed, we tend to become dull or sleepy. But in meditation, we can cultivate a quality of relaxed alertness where the mind is both wakeful and at ease.

This tranquility also has the beautiful quality of being self-sustaining. The more calm we feel, the more the mind wants to rest in that calmness. It becomes a refuge from the usual turbulence of thoughts and emotions. We start to understand why the Buddha emphasized the importance of cultivating inner peace—it provides a sanctuary that we can access regardless of external circumstances.

As this factor of calm becomes established, it naturally leads us toward the next factor of awakening: concentration. But before we move there, it's worth noting how these factors we've explored so far—mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, and calm—all work together in a beautiful harmony. Each one supports and strengthens the others, creating a momentum toward deeper states of understanding and peace.

If there are lots of emotions, the body will be stirred with those emotions also. As the mind starts to calm, the body also starts to calm down. So we start to settle into the present moment more without so much desire or aversion. There's not so much agenda for something to happen because we're finding some contentment. There's not so much struggle with aversion because mind and body are calming more and thoughts aren't assaulting us as strongly as they did before.

Early days and weeks of the retreat, sometimes early years of meditation practice, are really dominated by the hindrances. When we first touch this period of calm, it's a little like, what is this? It's so unknown, so foreign to us at first. One meditator said that when they first experienced this, all they could do was say, "Calm?" with a big question mark—like what is this thing? But once we touch it and we realize this is really a possibility for me now, there's something really beautiful about it.

It's kind of like a sailor. You've been out there on your sailboat and you've crossed storming seas and big waves and a giant squid attack and boat almost being capsized on the rocks. And all of a sudden you come through all of that and you come into this port with a big wide harbor. And everything can just settle down. There's something so delicious about that.

Emily Dickinson pointed to this in a poem called "Wild Nights." She's describing the other side of this, and it has this sea-going metaphor in it. "Futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass. Done with the chart. Rowing in Eden." That just expresses this kind of peace where we've been battling for so long, and now all of a sudden we get to float for a while in this calm, safe, broad harbor place.

This is where the experience of meditation starts to reveal this natural peace and ease in the mind. We start to trust that this is something that we can come back to again and again. We start to understand that if we don't stir it up, that is where the mind settles. Of course, we'll keep stirring it up again and again with the hindrances, with thoughts, with emotions and so on. But we understand that there is this natural peace.

This is an instruction that Ajahn Amaro, a British monk and abbot of Amaravati, likes to give in retreats after a few days have gone by. He says, "Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body, and then pay attention to whatever disturbs that." It's a beautiful instruction. Rest in the natural peace and ease, and then pay attention to whatever disturbs it.

So this natural peace is some of what we're looking for through dharma practice, through meditation practice. There's something very satisfying about it. It's a temporary state at this point, so we know that it's not going to last, but there's something satisfying that for me has always drawn me to go further. It's like, wow, this is possible? How much more peace is possible? That's been a pull for me all along the way in my meditation.

One of the things that can happen when we meet this calm is not knowing what to do with it. The main instruction is just to let yourself feel that the way you feel any state of mind. You can rest in feeling the calm and knowing it, understanding this is the mind affected by the factor of calm. We know it's temporary, and yet we can experience it.

Sometimes in this Western culture we are so used to intensity that we think if intensity isn't happening we're half dead or we're missing the boat or it shouldn't be like that. So calm isn't an intense experience and sometimes we think this is not enough, this is not sufficient. It reminds me of that cartoon by Gahan Wilson. He did a whole series on the Zen monastery cartoons.

So in this one, the cartoon shows two monks sitting side by side in the meditation hall—one older, one younger. The older monk leans over and whispers something to the younger monk. Though they're not supposed to be talking, he can't help but share this wisdom. The caption reads: "Nothing happens next. This is it."

This might capture exactly what we feel when we encounter a patch of calm. What's supposed to be happening now? Nothing happens. This is it.

Sometimes boredom can arise at this point because there's such a neutral experience. It can be helpful to note the neutral feeling tone of calm. It can be helpful to generate interest—interest is the antidote to boredom. This interest can emerge from investigation, the second awakening factor.

But soon we learn to appreciate, really appreciate, the presence of calm. It is one of the great blessings of the path and the foundation of contentment in our practice and in our life. One quotation I love from the Dhammapada has the Buddha saying that peace is the highest happiness. This is a literal translation. He didn't say "the unconditioned" or "enlightenment"—he said peace. The word used is santi, which in Sanskrit is shanti.

Peace is the highest happiness. This is a very interesting comment on human psychology, because our culture does not generally hold this as its highest value. It holds stimulation, entertainment, gratification, sense pleasure, enjoyment as its highest forms of happiness. But the Buddha said peace is the highest happiness.

It's fascinating when we start to understand the truth of this in our own experience. It really stops us from looking outside for external things and stops us from looking inside for special high experiences—states of bliss or ecstasy or rapture. All of those will pass and are not truly reliable.

Peace, although in the seven factors it comes and goes, in the deeper depths of understanding draws from the unconditioned nature of stillness. There is something more reliable in this quality of peace than simply a temporary passing state, though that's how we experience it for now.

This is a poem from Rumi called "Quietness":

Inside this new love, die.
Your way begins on the other side.
Become the sky.
Take a ride to the prison wall.
Escape.
Walk out like someone born into color.

Do it now.
You're covered with thick cloud.
Slide out the side.
Quietness is the surest sign.
Your old life was a frantic running from silence.
The speechless full moon comes out now.

This quietness and the trust we feel from it leads into the next factor: concentration. Concentration is the greater collectedness of that calming mood, where the mind can simply relax into itself. Relaxation is the key to the deepening of concentration. Concentration is not brought about through strong, forcing effort, but by trust and relaxing in a sense of ease and allowing.

Concentration is somewhat misleading as a term because in the West it has a particular meaning. When we say "concentrate," we mean to focus our attention narrowly on one part of what we're doing—like trying to focus on homework while asking someone not to distract us with the television.

It's not a translation I like very much, but we're somewhat stuck with it because it's so widely used. A better word would be collectedness. The Pali term being translated here is samadhi, and samadhi does not have this exclusive focus connotation. Samadhi is not about bringing the mind to only one point and ignoring everything else.

Samadhi is about the whole psyche that has become collected in the present moment.

Some of this confusion exists because bringing the attention down to one point can be a way of collecting the mind in Buddhist meditation. But it's not the only way, and that narrow focus is not intrinsic to the experience of samadhi. Samadhi refers to the mind that has become collected. It is not primarily about attention on a narrow focus.

I love this description from Ajahn Sumedho. One of the synonyms that's often used for concentration is ekaggata, which literally means one-pointed. Ajahn Sumedho defines one-pointed as "the one point that includes everything." That's a beautiful way of opening up the narrowness. The one point that includes everything.

So what's the one point that includes everything? How about here and now? The one point that includes everything is the present moment—one way of understanding it.

When the mind is collected like this, it has great power. You have felt it. A number of you have described this in interviews, and I know all of you have touched this at different points. When the mind comes together, it is steady. You know it because it stays in the present moment for a while—not forever, but it stays for a while. As it abides in the present moment, it's not thrown off its present-moment awareness by a passing thought or an unpleasant sensation or a little stirring of one emotion or another. It keeps its collectedness, and that makes it strong.

This coming together of the mind's energy makes it strong, steady, stable, unified, whole. These are really beautiful qualities of the concentrated mind.

I'm sure you know how different teachers transmit different kinds of energy. One of the most dramatic examples I witnessed was Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese master, who came to Spirit Rock a few times before we had built our retreat center. We still had a big open hillside that was a natural amphitheater. We built a speaker's platform for Thay at the bottom of the amphitheater, with about two thousand people spread out on the hillside and a loudspeaker system so we could hear his teachings.

He has an amazing presence if you've ever met him and been around him. For me, he had a kind of stillness that I hadn't felt in any of the other teachers I'd been with—a stillness that radiated. His body language is very still. His mind is very still. His words come out very composed. As I sat there on the hillside listening to him speak, I felt like he was casting a samadhi spell on all two thousand people. You could just feel everybody settle into the stillness of his being.

This is the quality of concentration. It has a couple of benefits. First, it feels whole. It feels healing and it feels good. So it brings an immediate benefit of a sense of well-being and strength and confidence.

The Dalai Lama put it this way: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." This quality of samadhi is a big part of inner peace.

The second benefit is that it serves as the platform for insight to emerge. When we are living our usual life with the untrained mind, everything is going by so fast we can't see clearly. It's a little like we're on a merry-go-round, on one of those horses going around and around, and a friend comes to the side of the merry-go-round with a newspaper. They hold it up and say, "Read the news!" But we're spinning by so fast, we can't read the news.

With samadhi, the merry-go-round starts to calm down, to slow down, and eventually comes to a halt. We're in front of our friend with the newspaper, and then we can read the news. And the headlines say: Life is change. Don't hang on. If you hang on, you suffer. If you let go, you'll find happiness.

We can read the news. And when we read the news from that place of stillness, it really goes in. Insight penetrates deep when the mind is strong and unified and collected. So the message goes right into our heart. We can see things the way they are, and it changes us. Concentration brings the mind into this state of wholeness, peace, stillness, and receptivity.

And because of the strength of that kind of mind, it opens into the seventh factor of equanimity, upekkhā, which Bhante talked about a couple of weeks ago. So I don't need to say a lot more about equanimity. He spoke beautifully about it on that evening. Just to say that it is a state of real balance of mind that is not so moved by the alternating currents of pleasure and pain. It can stay steady in the face of the alternating experiences of the pleasant and the unpleasant.

Sometimes in Western language, equanimity has a little bit of a connotation of unfeeling. It's like looking at the statues of the Buddha. He looks so serene and untouched that you imagine he doesn't feel anything or care or have a heart. But equanimity is not like that.

It was interesting. At the end of a three-month course a few years ago, I asked people in our discussion group what were some of their most significant experiences on the retreat. People spoke about being in a state of such balance that the pain in the body didn't bother them. Their emotional flow didn't bother them. And thoughts didn't disturb them. I said, "Well, you know, that's the state that's talked about as equanimity." And most of them did know that. And I said, "OK, in that state of equanimity, was your heart closed down? Were you shut off from feeling? Did you not care?"

And everybody said, "Not at all. It was just the opposite. When I could be in that state of balance, my heart was much more open and connected. Mettā and compassion came far more easily in that place, and there was a lot more warmth." The state of equanimity is not a state of indifference at all, but with that strength and balance, we can really move into the world out of love and compassion.

So these are the three pacifying qualities—the tranquility, the concentration, the equanimity—which are needed to balance the three arousing factors of investigation, energy, and rapture. It's mindfulness that knows the presence of all the others and can keep them in balance.

As you go about your practice, you can start to look at this balance. And in shorthand, look at three qualities in particular: mindfulness, energy, and concentration. Mindfulness is the balance. Energy is shorthand for the arousing factors. Concentration is shorthand for the pacifying factors. When I practice on retreat, I try to always be in touch with these three to the point that if my teacher came up and tapped me on the shoulder and said, "Where are your mindfulness, energy, and concentration right now?" I could tell them. It's very helpful to know.

Then you start to realize: if your energy is too high for your concentration, you need to bring in more calm. And there are ways to do that. The Ānāpānasati Sutta: "I shall breathe in, tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe in, tranquilizing the mental formation." And so on. Open to expansiveness.

If, on the other hand, the arousing factors are too low and the calming factors are too high, it leads to the quality of dullness or sinking mind. Then bring up the energy factors with investigation or noting or some physical movement to arouse energy. We can start to see how these factors are developing in our practice, in our experience, moment by moment. Because when all the factors come together and are balanced, that's when the mind is primed for insight. And as they come into their maturity, their fulfillment, as the Buddha said, that's when the mind is primed for enlightenment, for the glimpse of the unconditioned that is the awakening process.

Sometimes today one wonders: does this awakening still go on for people to the depths that we read about in the texts? I want to close by reading you a little story from a Thai master named Luang Paw Liam, or Ajahn Liam. He is the successor to Ajahn Chah at his main monastery in Thailand, Wat Ba Pong. Ajahn Liam is a fairly old man now, but I just came upon his biography and autobiography that describes his practice in a special year of 1969. I'd just like to close by reading some of this to you.

Around the middle of the rainy season of 1969, Ajahn Chah encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity. So Luang Por Liam increased his efforts, and as he did so, results became evident. First he described a real growth of happiness and brightness and joy. But he recognized that this was impermanent, so he just kept practicing.

Then he became very, very sleepy. For days, this great sleepiness overtook him, but he saw that this too was impermanent. "Keeping this in mind, I kept on meditating," he said.

"Normally, I would sit meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m., and then stop to have a rest. But on this day, I continued sitting without making the slightest change in posture. A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body, as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, an experience of becoming completely light and at ease. Cool, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness.

"It feels like there are no sankhāras or proliferations of the mind now. All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before—the attraction to the other sex, or all kinds of ambitions that I had before—they all disappeared. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose. There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how any other things exist.

"As concerns dukkha, I don't know what that is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without change."

So this profound awakening is still possible. When we cultivate the seven factors of enlightenment with patience and dedication, when we allow them to mature and come into balance, the mind naturally opens to these deeper truths. The path that the Buddha laid out twenty-five hundred years ago remains as vibrant and transformative today as it ever was.

Let's just sit for a minute together in appreciation of this possibility that lives within each of us.

Guy Armstrong examines the profound freedom available through what Thai teacher Upāsikā Kī called "unentangled knowing" - a quality of mindfulness that remains fully present to all phenomena without getting caught in clinging or reactivity. Drawing extensively on the twelve links of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), Armstrong shows how the chain of suffering unfolds from contact through vedanā (feeling tone) to taṇhā (craving) and upādāna (clinging), creating endless cycles of birth and death of various selves. The key insight is finding freedom in the gap between feeling and craving - not a temporal gap, but a spacious awareness that doesn't react with greed, aversion, or delusion. This momentary nibbāna (tadaṅga-nibbuto) offers a foretaste of the unconditioned, allowing practitioners to touch the deathless quality of mind that's always available when we don't disturb it with reactive formations. Armstrong offers practical approaches including Sayādaw U Tejaniya's "checking the attitude" method and techniques for resting attention in consciousness itself rather than sense objects. Through teachings from Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadāsa, and other Thai forest masters, he demonstrates how this unentangled awareness becomes both path and goal, revealing the unity of inner spiritual work with outer expressions of freedom and justice.

We've talked quite a bit so far in this retreat about how the sense of self gets constructed and the ways that this binds us, limits us, and ties us into suffering. We've also started to talk a little bit about the way out of that. Bhante's talk the other night on the Third Noble Truth was a very clear and complete description of that possibility as described by the Buddha.

So in the talk this evening, I want to focus on both these aspects. Andrea described the construction of the self in some detail with dependent origination. Bhante described the undoing of that with his talk on the Third Noble Truth. I want to draw on both those themes this evening, really to point us even further in the direction of discovering freedom.

I think this word freedom is a very powerful concept for us. Across the world, it evokes a very deep yearning in the human heart. We see it applied inwardly through spiritual life and the teachings of the Buddha. We see it applied outwardly through so many movements for justice and equality and an end to oppression.

Looking at the inner and outer expressions of this search for freedom, a couple of things strike me. One, they both tend to be struggles. As you're discovering here, the inner journey is not always easy because we're coming up against these inner forces. As anyone finds who carries on this work outwardly, there are forces there that oppose us also. When we look closely, they're basically the same forces. So whether we're working outwardly or we're working inwardly, we're confronted by the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. That's the work that we're trying to undo in the world and in ourselves.

One thing I find really interesting is that those people who try to change the world and are most effective seem to do it by recognizing the unity of the outer work and the inner work. I'm thinking of people like Dr. King and his work in the civil rights movement, of Aung San Suu Kyi, who's a very strong meditator in her work inside Burma. I think of Nelson Mandela, whose spirituality was forged through those many years of prison. And I think about Cesar Chavez, who formed the United Farm Workers Union in California in the 1960s and worked really very successfully to bring some basic rights to seasonal workers on the farms through strikes and the unity among his community.

Chavez was also very deeply rooted in spirituality. He was a devout Catholic, and he often used masses and prayer meetings to build a sense of community and really solidarity among his workers. I think his commitment to nonviolence also came from his deep faith in the teachings of Jesus.

These are some of the most effective leaders in the outer world that we've seen in our lifetimes, and I think that it's very significant—that marriage of the inner and outer in all those cases.

Here we're primarily involved in the inner work, and I think this question of freedom is equally important to us as an inward journey as it is in an outer form. One of the things I want to ask about this quality of inner freedom is: where is it, and will you know it when you find it? I think we may not, which is why I raised the question. I think sometimes it's staring us in the face and we may be overlooking it.

So I want to tease out a little bit of that in the talk tonight. How can we recognize it when it comes? Because if we think that freedom is only found in the complete ending of greed, aversion, delusion, that might not happen tonight. That part is a long piece of work, a long struggle. But perhaps there's a way that we can experience freedom in our practice here and now, and in doing that, come to taste some of the fruit in an immediate sense. If we can, I think that can build a lot of confidence that we're gaining the fruit of the practice, which the Buddha pointed to, as we go, as we journey.

The subject of the talk tonight is unentangled knowing. This is a term from a Thai teacher named Upasika Kee. She was a laywoman who taught from the 1950s up until her death in 1978. She used this term, unentangled knowing, which I think is a great pointing.

This word is a little tricky, perhaps, if you're not a native English speaker. Tangle refers to the twisting of balls of yarn when cats play with them or someone's long hair when they go for a ride in a convertible—the knots and snarls that happen when different strands come together. Entangle is the verb meaning to make that happen. And the "un" in front of it means we're not allowing that to happen. So we're not allowing the tangle to form.

This image of the tangle occurs in the Buddhist teachings a lot. I'll just mention a couple from the suttas. Here's one from the Anguttara Nikaya: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn." I like this quote because it points to the way that different desires conflict with each other. When we try to follow them both, we get tangled up. A simple example: we want to be liked and we want to do our own thing.

What do we do when those conflict? Ah, we're caught. We're in a conflict.

This is a lovely quote. It comes from the Samyutta Nikaya and was used as the beginning of the Visuddhimagga, that sixth-century commentary on meditation practices. It's a quote of a questioner coming to the Buddha in his lifetime, addressing him by his family name, which many people did if they weren't disciples—Gotama.

"A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gotama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

It's a great question, isn't it? Today as much as back then.

The Buddha's answer was basically: who succeeds in disentangling the tangle is one who follows virtue, meditation, and wisdom. That is developing the Eightfold Path, which is what we're doing here.

This is how Upasika Kee used it. She was pointing to, in this quote, "an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside." An inward staying, unentangled knowing. And we'll talk more about what that means.

But first a word about Upasika Kee. Women teachers in our tradition in Asia are somewhat rare, so she stands out as being, I think, an exceptional woman teacher in our lifetime. She was also a laywoman, so she wasn't even an ordained nun but taught as a laywoman. The term upasika means a woman lay supporter.

Her talks were recorded sometime during her teaching career, and a number of the best ones were assembled into a book by Thanissaro Bhikkhu. I highly recommend the book. It's called Pure and Simple. I'll write that and her name up on the board after the talk. I find her teachings very accessible and also very deep. She does not pull her punches and gives the straight Dhamma in a very clear and, for me, impactful way. Thanissaro Bhikkhu considers her the greatest woman teacher in Thailand in the 20th century.

So this phrase, "unentangled knowing," is pointing to a kind of mindfulness that is aware of all the phenomena of the momentary experience but is not caught up in holding on, in clinging, in being enmeshed or attached with any of them. There's this sense of full presence, full mindfulness, lots of things happening, all six senses open, but not the tangle of craving and reactivity going on.

I want to suggest that this is actually happening for you at many moments throughout the day. But those moments may be quiet and a little bit subtle and go by often unseen. So in outlining this approach, I want to encourage us all to start to notice those moments, because as we notice them, they will grow and become an important part of our path.

In looking at how we become unentangled, we're first going to take a little review look at how we become entangled. Again, I want to use the model of dependent origination and refer to Andrea's talk from the other night. She explained how the Buddha's teaching is described in these twelve links, which begin with ignorance, go through momentary sense experience, and come around again to suffering, which tends to strengthen the ignorance and sets us on the cycle again.

In terms of our experience as meditators, I think the most important four links are the ones that happen toward the center of the chain. Andrea described these in detail, and I just want to review them briefly: contact, feeling, craving, and clinging.

We're going to leave out the first five links, which tend to get a little philosophical. We're going to leave out the last three links, which also get a little philosophical and get us into those nasty rebirth questions. We're just going to focus on the moment-to-moment experience of these four central links in the chain.

As you know, our basic experience as human beings is that we're constantly subject to sense experience at the six sense doors. This is what's known as contact. This is the impinging, which we feel every waking moment, of sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, thoughts, and emotions. These are happening all the time, whether we want them or not.

Have you ever found a way to turn these off? When you want to go to bed at night and you want things to be peaceful, can you turn off this flow of contact? When you're sitting in the meditation hall and you're searching for some calm, can you turn off contact? Generally not.

As long as we're awake, the six senses are active, functioning, and we're getting stimulated by this flow, which, as we've said many times, is difficult because it's a mix of pleasant, unpleasant, and neither. And it's this mix that can keep us off balance.

From this contact through the six sense doors, feeling arises—feeling tone arises. This is the quality of vedana, which may be pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Feeling tone is conditioned and therefore somewhat malleable, but we can't exactly choose it either.

Based on our conditioning, we tend to interpret contact in certain prescribed ways. This provides that mix of pleasant and unpleasant in our moment-to-moment experience. These sense contacts and feelings then tend to condition the next step in the chain, which is craving. Remember, these are not strictly causal, but they are conditioning factors.

So craving is the unexamined response to pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral. We respond to the pleasant in a conditioned way with wanting. We respond to the unpleasant with disliking or aversion. We respond to the neutral with delusion. The neutral is not very interesting because we're focusing on what we can get or push away. So the neutral doesn't really register on our scale, and that's the activity of delusion. And delusion also reinforces greed and aversion because if we could see what we were doing, we could see it doesn't really work. But delusion covers up the activity of wanting and disliking so we don't tend to see the effect until we start to pay attention.

So craving starts to incline the attention toward an object that's experienced as pleasant. Let's take pleasant or unpleasant because they're easier. It starts to incline the mind toward that. There's a seductive quality to both the pleasant and the unpleasant. One we want to grab, the other we want to push away. And then as the mind continues to incline toward that arising, it more or less matures in one more step, which is clinging, and that is to say that we take a hold of that object.

So the Pali word is upādāna. Sometimes we translate it as grasping, sometimes as clinging. It's the same meaning. We often will use grasping for the act of taking hold, and we'll use clinging when it continues over some time, but it's the same word in Pali. Another way to think of it is we fixate on that with our attention. We do it with both greed and aversion. Obviously we do it with greed in order to draw the object closer, but before we can push an object away, we also have to take a hold of it. So if aversion is the driving force, grasping also takes place.

Simple example: pain arises in the knee. It's felt as unpleasant. The mind inclines, perhaps out of some fear or disliking. And in order to do something with it, we have to fasten the attention there. Driven by aversion, it is a form of grasping.

Then, once we have grasped, we tend to build a self around that thing. Why? Because the mind is fascinated with it, and it means something to me, either gratification or threat. So once we've grasped, thoughts tend to proliferate around our relationship to the thing. So a lot of I-thoughts come in around the things that we've taken a hold of. So this arising of all the I-thoughts born of clinging is what we might refer to as becoming or birth, but it's kind of inevitable once we've gone into clinging.

So this is a brief recap of these four links of contact, feeling, craving, and clinging that we tend to go through until we start paying attention and seeing them. These links happen very, very fast, as I think Andrea mentioned the other night. It's not like we have a contact and then we have a few seconds to contemplate it. The contact comes, the feeling comes almost immediately with it, and then the craving will happen very fast on the basis of the feeling, and then the clinging happens almost necessarily out of the craving. There will be some taking a hold. And all these things happen in less than a second, most likely. If mindfulness is not strong, these things just tend to happen.

So you can see that over the course of a whole life, we've gone through this cycle so many times with so many objects because life is basically about forming relationships to the things that come into our field. So as an infant, one begins to relate to mother, breast, food, father, and growing up, friends, school, homework, high school, attractive people, college, sex, job, career, salary, money, Lady Gaga, Facebook, Twitter, Barack Obama, the global economic crisis. It all lands. It all lands, and we've got to relate to all of it with its mix of pleasure and displeasure.

So anytime we take hold in that mix, suffering is inevitable. Again, just a couple of quick examples. Andrea went through one, and I'll go through another. First, an example based on not liking. Let's say you're on eight precepts. Actually, it is based on liking.

Let's say you're on eight precepts. You come down at five o'clock, planning to have your nice glass of juice and a little hard candy. So you walk by that table and get the glass of juice. But as you're standing there, you notice these wonderful aromas wafting up from the other table, where people who haven't taken the eight precepts are gathering. There's a warm pot of soup and some freshly baked bread.

As you're getting your little glass of juice, you're smelling these things. You happen to be quite hungry because you didn't quite take enough at lunch to carry you through until the next morning. And you start thinking, "I would really like some of that bread and soup. Could I come back later and get some? Oh no, everybody's seen me with my glass of juice. They know I'm an eight precept yogi. I can't do that. Maybe I can sneak in after they've all gone. No, no, the food people take that away too quickly. What can I do? Did I save anything in the fridge from yesterday? Maybe I can go get that, but people will see me eating that too. Oh, and I'm so hungry. I'm not going to get anything until tomorrow morning. I shouldn't have gone on eight precepts in the first place."

As you know, we can spin out about food and eating for quite a while. So, having taken hold of this situation, we might be born into this new birth as the hungry yogi. The hungry yogi can wander off after that little glass of juice and think and think and feel and feel about this for quite a while—could be half an hour, could be an hour. We're sort of caught in this not knowing what to do, not really liking what we've chosen, wishing that we could find a way out. And the hungry yogi has that lifespan. It's not a pleasant birth.

But eventually, let's say you come in for the 6:15 sitting. You settle in, you let go of that. And at some point you will let go of that engagement, that entanglement, and you return to mindfulness in the present moment. At that point we can say the hungry yogi has passed away. That birth has come to an end. The hungry yogi has died.

So here we had a birth that was not too happy. The hungry yogi was not a happy rebirth. But then the death was quite pleasant—happy to let that existence go and move back into good yogi here and now.

So then the good yogi keeps meditating. Mindfulness strengthens, attention settles, concentration develops. Maybe it's the next morning and we've actually had something to eat. But we're sitting, we're feeling quite present, quite steady in our mindfulness, and we like it.

So we realize, "Oh, this is that factor of concentration they were talking about. This is the quality of calm and equanimity. I can sit here. I can be effortlessly with the present moment. Thoughts are going by, but they just don't disturb me. I can be in the middle of my life. I can even think about my relationship and my work, and they just go by."

"Wow, wait till I take this back into the world. I am going to be such a cooled-out person now that I've finally found how to meditate. I'm going to be able to go back into my office and operate from this place of wisdom and compassion with everybody I meet. I know I'm going to get promoted because there are very few people who can do this. And then I'm going to have a much better salary and I'll be able to actually buy a house in this area, which I could never dream about before. And I'll be so warm and loving in a relationship. I know I'm going to find a great partner because I can hold this meditation space."

Now, I know this sounds really naive to those of you who've been sitting all this time, but when I first came upon this space in practice, I really thought it was going to last. I thought I'd discovered what all the books were pointing to, and now I was just going to live in it. So I took hold of it and really thought about it a lot for about an hour. Then I went out and walked, and then I had to come back in and sit again. After all that thinking, I was totally worn out, and the next sitting was a wreck.

So in my case, I'd taken birth as the good yogi, the concentrated yogi, and it was a really delightful birth, imagining all the things that were going to come into my life based on my great spiritual advanced development. It was like a heaven realm birth, really. For that period of time, it was like I was floating. I was imagining my life unfolding in all these great ways, being born in a heaven realm.

But then when I came in and sat again and it all went away, oh, the death was so painful. Letting go of that was really awful. I'd worked so hard to get it. I tried really hard to get it back and couldn't. Very painful.

So if we take hold of something where there's suffering, we have an unhappy birth, but a pleasant death. If we take hold of something that's pleasant, we have a pleasant birth, but because it will change, we have a painful death. Either way, in grasping, we're going to end up in suffering, which is what the chain of dependent origination points to.

This is how we take birth. We take birth by grasping. There's really nothing more to it than that. That's what creates the sense of self over and over and over again. There's no self who does the grasping, but grasping is a function of the mind, and when we do it, we take a new birth. Some of them are brief, some of them are longer, but they're all formed from grasping.

Andrew Olendzki, who's the scholar at the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, put it very nicely in this way: "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something created by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds onto or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

So grasping gives rise to a new self, or we could call it a new birth. This is the way that our untrained mind works most of the time if we're not paying attention.

I don't know if you ever watched a monkey go through the forest overhead. When I lived in Thailand, my hut was out in the middle of a rainforest and monkeys were often passing overhead. They can travel on the canopy of trees, of course, but if they're lower down, the way they travel is by holding onto a vine and swinging until they can find another vine. Only when they see another vine coming into view will they release the first one and grab the next. Then they'll swing on that vine until they see another vine, release the first one and grab the next one.

This is the way the untrained mind usually works. It goes from one form of grasping and won't let go until it finds another. So this is what's referred to as the monkey mind—grasping more or less continuously, moment after moment.

But as meditators, we have another choice. The chain of dependent origination is not deterministic. There is freedom to be found within it. So where for us can that freedom be found? Where can this connected chain be broken so that it doesn't lead to suffering?

I would say that the classical answer is between feeling and craving. When a feeling arises that is pleasant and we don't respond with greed, when a feeling arises that is unpleasant and we don't respond with aversion, when a feeling arises that is neutral and we don't respond with delusion, we have essentially cut that chain right there. Having cut the chain, the other links do not unfold into clinging, becoming, birth, and so forth.

Now of course it takes mindfulness to be able to do this, but I know you all are doing this because we hear it in interviews. This is one of the purposes of strengthening mindfulness—to be able to stop this chain from happening again.

This is a quote from one Buddhist teacher: "The whole of the Buddhist path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving."

Now, I just want to clarify—this is a very profound and significant pointing, but don't think of this as a time gap, as though contact arises and you've got a couple of seconds to figure that one out, and then feeling arises and you've got a couple of seconds to figure that one out. Because contact, feeling, craving, clinging can happen in the blink of an eye. So there's not a time gap between feeling and craving. Don't go looking for one—you'll become very frustrated.

But what the teacher is pointing to is a state of mindfulness where one is aware of the feeling and not falling into the reactive formation of craving. That creates a space in the mind, and that's the kind of gap that is being pointed to here.

This becomes very interesting to investigate—what is that like when a feeling, let's say pleasant or unpleasant because they're easier to see, is there but there's no reactive formation?

What's that like? Look in your own experience and see what language works for you.

I would describe it in a few different ways. There's ease, it's spacious, it's restful, it's peaceful. It's not conflicted, not characterized by struggle, and there's some feeling of lightness. Those are some of the words that come to me. And particularly the word that I want to emphasize this evening is that there's freedom in that moment—because the mind is not being caught in greed, in aversion, or in delusion. That is a kind of freedom.

So essentially what's happening is there's a gap in the causal chain. In that gap, there's a sense that one touches something else—peace, ease, calm, whatever you want to call it. One of the things I want to ask is: let's call it peace. Did you construct that peace? By refraining from greed, aversion, delusion, did you construct or fabricate that peace? Or is that peace a natural part of the mind that's always available if we don't disturb it with greed, aversion, delusion?

I want to suggest that that peace is a natural part of the mind—or our experience, or whatever you want to call it—and that it's not something that we've put together by a lot of hard effort at that point. So what that can give us is a sense of trust that if we don't get involved in these reactive formations, that peace is always available. And that peace being always available points to something that is not so conditioned—not so subject to causes and conditions. Because it's always there as a potential for us to relax into.

So we are starting to intuit, or one could say touch, the realm of the unconditioned, which is what Bhante was pointing to in his talk the other night.

I want to read this quote from Ajahn Chah. It's a little long, but I hope you'll stay with it:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate around these things, dividing them into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself.

The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are—as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

So when we rest in that gap, we are stepping out of the cycle of birth and death. We are not moving forward into grasping and taking a new birth. And because we're not taking a new birth, we're not subject to the death of that self. So not being involved in the cycle of birth and death means that we're opening to something that has the flavor of the deathless, or the unborn, or the unconditioned.

In the time of the Buddha, the dominant religion in the society was Brahmanism, and it was led by the caste of Brahmins who controlled access to the teachings and the rites and the rituals that characterized those teachings. The Buddha was an outsider to that system. He didn't come from the Brahmin caste, and what he was teaching was not derived from Brahmin doctrines. So he was always regarded with a little bit of suspicion by the religious orthodoxy of the day. He was a little bit of an outsider.

Nonetheless, when he would come and teach in villages because his reputation had spread, very often the Brahmins would come down and listen to him, which was a gesture of some humility on their part. And so there are a few suttas in a book called the Sutta Nipata, where these young Brahmins come and question the Buddha. And you can feel the sincerity and open-mindedness of these young men who are not entirely caught in the orthodoxy of their doctrine.

So this one Brahmin youth, whose name is Todeia, comes to the Buddha and asks this question: "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you like to ask the Buddha that? What's liberation like? Tell me.

And so the Buddha replies, "That sage is without desire. They have nothing. They are unentangled in becoming." Resting in the gap between feeling and craving means that one does not get entangled in becoming. One does not take a new identity, a new birth.

Here's Ajahn Chah again. Imagine that this is being given by Ajahn Chah in an open air hall in Thailand.

Imagine that you're sitting in one of these open-air halls where the warm evening air flows freely through the space. Ajahn Chah looks around and says, "The roof is a becoming. The floor is a becoming, but in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness."

Where there's no becoming, Ajahn Chah is pointing out, is like nibbana—this empty space where we haven't taken birth, where we're resting in this natural peace that wasn't constructed and has the flavor of the unconditioned. This is a deathless place because no self is being born and no self is dying away from it. And it's always available.

In fact, I think we all touch it many times during the day. Ajahn Buddhadasa, another great Thai teacher, said that if you didn't touch that many times in a day, you'd go kind of mad, because the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion are so upsetting.

This kind of non-becoming that Ajahn Chah referred to as nibbana is not the final nibbana—the state of being of one who is fully enlightened and has completely exhausted greed, aversion, and delusion. It's not that fullness of nibbana, but it's like a foretaste.

I was very happy the other night when Bhante used a quotation from the suttas, which he referred to as a momentary nibbana. I was familiar with this term from the Thai tradition, but I had not known where it was found in the suttas. He kindly provided me the reference. In the suttas, it's described as tadanga nibbuto, which means basically this approximation of nibbana—this quenching or blowing out of the fire to the extent possible.

This is what's happening in our practice when we come upon these periods of calm between feeling and craving. We are touching into the semblance of nibbana to the extent possible for us here and now. This is the extent to which we can realize that ultimate peace in this moment, and we can start to recognize this.

That recognition is important for a couple of reasons. One is that it's very satisfying when we learn to discover it and rest in it for longer periods. It brings some sense of the fruit of the path. When we can start to recognize that this sense of peace is in some way linked to, related to the unconditioned—which is the final fruit of the Eightfold Path—we start to realize that we are getting there. So we gain confidence.

The other reason it's important is that it becomes something of a path in and of itself. This resting in that gap, that open space, can be seen as the path. This ability to rest there in that peace is onward leading. Not only does it have the quality of the goal, it also has the quality of the path. So in discovering it, we find that the path and the goal are coming together—that where we want to go is to some extent revealed here and now, and by touching it again and again and again, that becomes the momentum of the path.

We are still aware. We are resting, but we've not closed off our senses. The six senses are alive and functioning. We're in touch with phenomena. We have not withdrawn from the world, but there is this sense of peace in which we learn to have more and more trust.

This is from Ajahn Joon, another teacher in the Thai tradition: "The best way to develop a great awareness"—the term being translated as "great awareness" is maha sati—"is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in that pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their nature of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

One of my teachers in Thailand was Ajahn Buddhadasa. I practiced with him when I was a monk—a young monk and a fairly young practitioner. He was very accessible at that time. He was one of the great teachers in Thailand, a great meditator and also a scholar. He gave addresses on radio and television. But to some extent, he was an iconoclast, a little outside the Theravadan orthodoxy. I think because of that, his monastery had not quite been discovered yet. So when I was there, he was very accessible.

He'd have his breakfast in the morning and then often come out to sit outside his cottage on a stone bench, on bare earth with forest chickens running around and picking at scraps in the dirt, temple dogs either lying at his feet or prowling nearby. I swear they had an appetite for Westerners—Thai monks would pass by without the dogs responding much, but when a Western monk walked past, they would tend to rise up and start barking.

I would sometimes go visit with Ajahn Buddhadasa at the front of the monastery in this very informal setting. You'd simply sit on the ground before him, and he was just there, available to answer questions. But I found him intimidating at first. You know how when you meet with a Vipassana teacher, they'll pull out a chair, offer you tissues, ask if you need tea—we try to be friendly in our interviews. Ajahn Buddhadasa dwelt in this place of unentangled knowing. I can see now that he was simply resting in that space of great peaceful mind, and I was just another object arising in his visual field. That's how he related to me—he would just sit back and meditate me.

At first I thought he didn't want me there. If he wanted me here, wouldn't he be more friendly? But as I reflected later, I came to realize that he didn't mind if I sat there asking questions. He was just as content with that as hanging out with the chickens and dogs—I had at least that status. But his apparent lack of communication unnerved me, so I didn't visit as often as I could have. Later, after leaving the monastery, I deeply regretted not taking greater advantage of that opportunity.

This is that space of unentangled knowing—where we are fully present, open, balanced, aware of everything happening, but not clinging to any of it.

One approach I found helpful for entering this space was shifting emphasis slightly from the objects of the senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions—to the knowing quality of mind itself. As we've discussed, there's consciousness or knowing accompanying every sense object that arises. When a sound occurs, there's not only the sound itself, which we've become quite familiar with, but also your consciousness receiving and holding that sound. This is what it means to be sentient. If a corpse lay here beside this bell, the sound would not arise for it, but it arises for us because we have consciousness.

In our experience, we can emphasize either the object or the knowing—the consciousness that knows the object. At a certain point in meditation, when I had thoroughly investigated the objects of my six senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and all the emotions I could find—I became interested in this quality of knowing itself.

What I discovered was that moving attention from objects to knowing created a profound sense of spaciousness. It led directly into this quality of unentangling from objects. By taking that step into consciousness, I was releasing the tendency to fixate on arising phenomena.

It's not possible to create a very clear, simple meditation instruction from this. If this description doesn't resonate with you, don't worry—mindfulness practice based on knowing sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and emotions is liberating in itself. It takes one all the way. This shift isn't necessary, but I share it because some practitioners like myself have found it helpful for moving beyond clinging.

I invite you to explore it through a couple of simple approaches. One is a teaching we've received from Sayadaw U Tejaniya called "Checking the Attitude." His instruction is to examine how you're relating to objects in your meditation experience—the phenomena that arise, your sense experiences—and discover whether you're reacting with greed, aversion, or delusion.

He suggests three simple questions. To check for greed, ask: "Am I wanting something else to happen?" Sometimes this is immediately clear—you can see you're wanting something different to occur, indicating greed at work. To check for aversion, ask: "Am I wanting something to stop happening?" Again, this is often quite apparent. To check for delusion, ask: "Am I not aware of what's happening?" Usually by the time you pose this third question, you're back in touch with present moment awareness.

And so if delusion was there a moment before, it's not now. But often you can identify greed and aversion by asking these questions. Then if you see that there's greed or aversion or delusion in the mind, just become aware of that. Become mindful of that.

You don't need to judge it. You don't need to judge yourself for having it. You don't need to try to push it away because that would just be an additional reaction of aversion. You just become simply mindful and allow that formation of mind.

In the beginning, if you're interested in this practice, you could do this checking like three, four, five times during every sitting or every walking. As you get more familiar with it, you can check more often. Eventually, I developed the ability to just turn and say, "What's the attitude?" And I wouldn't have to ask the questions. I could just see if there was greed, aversion, or delusion. So it made it very easy to check. I could check more often.

Then, if you like, when you're very comfortable with this checking, this can become your primary meditation focus. This can become your primary practice. You just keep your mind on: Are there reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion coming? If there are, you're mindful of it. If there are not, you just rest.

This ties in really nicely with another teaching of Ajahn Chah, which I'd like to read: "If you want to see a train, just go to the central station. You don't have to go traveling all the way up the northern line, the southern line, the eastern line, and the western line to see all the trains. If you want to see trains—every single one of them—you'd be better off waiting at Grand Central Station. That's where they all terminate. Just look right here." He points to his heart. "Just look right here at Central Station. Greed arises here. Anger arises here. Delusion arises here. Just sit here and you can watch as all these things arise. Practice right here because right here is where you're stuck. Right here is where the conditioned arises, where conventions arise, and right here is where the Dhamma will arise."

So this is a very interesting and wonderful way to practice, which is that when the mind is stable, we just take the movements of the heart—greed, aversion, delusion—as what we're paying attention to. And if you want, you can rest your attention in the heart center and just notice those movements of reactivity.

This is Upasaka Ki again: "So your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on."

And by the way, when she says "going out," it also includes events in the body, like going out to body sensations or to pleasant sensations. That's moving away from the central awareness of the mind.

So this is one way of getting in touch with the quality of unentangled knowing. We're just paying attention to the movements of the heart toward greed, aversion, or delusion, and resting when they're not active.

Another way is to directly turn the attention toward consciousness itself. Again, learning to look at this knowing side of experience can be a way of unhooking from the fixation on objects, on sense contact.

I was standing at the pond the other day—the large pond down the road—and it was raining. I was watching the raindrops just land on the surface of the pond. You know how it happens: each one makes a little splash and makes a few ripples. If they're coming often, the ripples start to intersect with each other, but they're all just arising and passing, arising and passing. They make that little impact on the surface of the lake.

For me, what that was like was that consciousness was like the surface of the lake, and all the sense objects make this momentary ripple. But I can turn my noticing to the field of knowing and then feel the ripples, but I don't get so involved in each ripple. I get more involved in knowing that field in which the consciousness is taking place of the changing phenomena. You can practice with this.

How do we become aware of awareness itself, or how do we become conscious of consciousness itself?

One way—this doesn't work for everybody—involves working with the sense of sight. Usually, the eyes are looking outward, focusing on objects that are out there. What happens if the vision were to turn back and look at the source of seeing? Would that put you in touch with this quality of consciousness itself?

Another thing that's helpful for people sometimes is just the phrase, "aware of awareness," or "turn the attention to the knowing." If any of these resonate, you can play with that.

This is again from Upasika Kee: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing. All outward going knowing cast aside. An inward staying, unentangled knowing.

We're with the awareness or we're with the consciousness itself, and we don't latch on to the sense experiences that are arising at the six sense doors. When you practice in this way, the field of consciousness gives a great sense of space in which everything is just allowed to arise and pass.

You may know that when the Buddha left his home, he had a wife and a son. He left to go on his spiritual journey for six years, and his family—his father and mother and relatives—took care of his wife and son. When he returned, his son was seven years old. His son ordained as a novice and received teachings from his father, and at the age of seven became fully enlightened. That's a helpful parent.

This is one of the meditation instructions that the Buddha gave to his son, whose name was Rahula. He said, "Rahula, develop meditation that is like space. For when you develop meditation that is like space, arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Just as space is not established anywhere, so too, Rahula, develop meditation that is like space."

I'll close tonight with another exchange between one of the Brahmin youths and the Buddha, drawn from that same section of the Sutta Nipata. This Brahmin youth's name was Kappa, and he asked the Buddha this question: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir."

And the Buddha replied, "Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Having nothing, clinging to nothing. That is the island. There is no other. That is nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death.

CHAPTER 130

Joy and Happiness

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of joy and happiness as fundamental aspects of Buddhist practice, countering the common misconception that the path focuses solely on dukkha. Drawing extensively from the Upanisa Sutta (sometimes called the Sutta on Transcendent Dependent Origination), Armstrong shows how the path unfolds as "a progressive refinement of joy," beginning with suffering and faith, then moving through gladness, rapture (pīti), calm, and happiness (sukha). He examines various Pali terms for positive mental states including muditā (empathetic joy), sukha (happiness), ānanda (bliss), pīti (rapture), pamojja (joy), somanassa (gladness of mind), and santuṭṭhi (contentment). Armstrong shares personal stories from his monastic practice in Thailand and Burma, illustrating how joy can serve as a crucial ally during difficult periods. He discusses practical approaches to cultivating happiness through muditā practice, appreciation of nature and sense pleasures appropriate for lay practitioners, the joy found in virtue (the "bliss of blamelessness"), generosity, gratitude, and finding truth even in difficult experiences. The talk emphasizes that contentment represents "the greatest wealth" and that happiness provides the stable foundation necessary for deeper spiritual development, ultimately supporting the path toward the "unshakable deliverance of mind."

The subject of this evening's talk is joy and happiness. This is not science fiction.

The vocabulary of the Buddha's teachings, as you know, revolves largely around the word dukkha. This is the pleasure of being in a Theravadan center. But the Four Noble Truths could just as well have been expressed in terms of happiness. The Buddha could have said: there is unhappiness, the cause of unhappiness is wanting, real happiness is possible, and the way to real happiness is the Eightfold Path.

I want to suggest that joy and happiness are essential parts of our path. Despite the talk of dukkha, these elements are truly essential as we progress and develop. Don't worry if you're not completely there today in your practice. These are elements that take a while to mature.

It was a little like Bhante's talk on Nirvana, the Third Noble Truth. We may not have full realization today, but it's helpful to know that's where this is all headed. That's where we're going. Because as Yogi Berra said, if you don't know where you're going, you'll wind up somewhere else. So we want to be sure where we wind up.

It's very helpful to start noticing these qualities when they arise and then cultivate them as a conscious part of our practice path. In the overall scheme of the Buddha's teachings, the cultivation of joy and happiness certainly falls into the four right efforts that Winnie discussed early in the retreat. In two of the right efforts, the instructions are to maintain and increase wholesome states of mind, and joy and happiness are certainly in that territory.

I think there is a deep longing for these states among meditators and the world in general. One of our friends and colleagues in California is James Baraz, who many of you know wrote a book called Awakening Joy. The book received promotion from Oprah Winfrey's magazine, O, and in the six months after it was mentioned, attendance at James's class, both in person and online, reached 2,900 people around the world who were interested in developing joy as part of their meditation practice.

We want to develop the ability to see joy when it arises just as easily as we can see difficulties, the hindrances, and afflictive emotions. Sometimes when we're early in our practice phase or struggling with the hindrances in particular, the mind is almost looking out for them and more apt to notice them. These quiet moments of happiness, joy, or peace can slide by unnoticed.

We want to develop a kind of mindfulness that isn't biased either toward the afflictive or toward the uplifting, but that can really see exactly what's happening in either direction. As the mind comes to completeness, it needs to see joy as easily as it sees difficulty.

When we start to open up to this, this attention on the positive begins to redress an imbalance in the mind, because so often the mind inclines toward what's wrong or what's lacking. The bent of the mind shaped by craving inclines to see what's lacking or what's off, and it doesn't often take into account the positive states that are present. So we need to give equal weight to seeing the wholesome. As the Buddha said, what one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of the mind.

There are many words in Pali, in the Buddha's teachings, that point to this whole range of beautiful qualities of mind. I'll mention some of the ones I'm familiar with.

There's the term mudita, empathetic joy, which Winnie devoted a whole talk to a couple of weeks ago. The term sukha, which I would translate as happiness. It sounds a little bit like sugar, and sukha has this sweet quality in the mind, just like sugar does.

Ananda means bliss. It was frequently used in Buddhist names. Of course, you know the Buddha's attendant was Ananda. My first preceptor in Thailand was called Panyananda, which means the bliss of wisdom. When I took a monk's name the next time I ordained, I asked to call myself Sunyatananda, and my preceptor agreed, which means the bliss of emptiness. You see this in many Buddhist names—it's very common.

Piti, which we discussed in the seven factors, is usually translated as rapture. Pamoja could well be translated as joy—it might be the best word to translate as joy. I think Bhante mentioned this in one of his talks.

Somanasa, which I would translate as gladness of mind. And santuti—I like that word, santuti. It sounds like it comes from an Italian gelato factory, and it means contentment.

All these words are part of the Buddha's teachings, part of the development of the path. They're particularly emphasized in one sutta in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Upanissa Sutta, sometimes called the Sutta on Transcendent Dependent Origination.

This sutta describes the unfolding of the path as an unfolding of joy, beginning with suffering, leading to faith, and then joy, and then the joy leading on to states of concentration, insight, and liberation. It's a beautifully positive description of the path to awakening.

Venerable Analayo, who will be coming here in March to teach with Joseph, is one of the foremost Buddhist scholars writing in the English language. He's a German monk who ordained in Sri Lanka. He has a wonderful book called Satipatthana, which is a long commentary on the Satipatthana Sutta. He's very familiar with the whole range of the Pali suttas. He's also learned Chinese in order to study their counterparts in ancient Chinese texts—a wonderful monk and a scholar of great renown.

He put it this way: "The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." The entire scheme of our training is a progressive refinement of joy. That's what we're doing here, culminating, of course, in liberation, which the Buddha described by saying, "Nibbana is the highest happiness"—from the Dhammapada.

It's very helpful to be able to not only recognize the quality of joy when we find it, but also to bring it in at times, to have practices that develop this quality and bring it in during times of difficulty. Because if we know how to do that, this quality of joy can be a tremendous ally on the path. Let's face it, we all hit times that are difficult, and we can use some uplift.

This came really clear to me when I was practicing in Burma several years ago. I'd been a monk in Thailand in the eighties, and then I went back and ordained again in Burma around 2005 because I wanted to practice with Paok Sayadaw, this concentration master I've mentioned a few times. He has a monastery in Burma about two hundred miles southeast of Rangoon.

I arrived there at the start of the rains retreat, which should have been a clue, but I didn't quite get it. I got there one afternoon, met with Sayadaw about five p.m., and said I'd like to practice for six weeks, and if he was willing, I'd really like to ordain. I told him I'd been a monk before, and he said okay.

So the next morning I was driven into town, bought my robes and bowl and belt—the whole gear. That afternoon, about one o'clock, my head was shaved. I went through the ordination ceremony, took the precepts, and I was a monk again. It was very quick.

The rains retreat opened that day. This is a period when for three months the monks settle in one place because it's the rainy season. In the olden days, they weren't supposed to walk through the fields and disturb the crops that were growing, especially the rice.

I started to practice, and Paok Sayadaw's practice was quite demanding. I wanted to study concentration with him, so I had one object and one object only—the small area underneath my nose where I could feel the breath. That was the only object I was allowed for the six weeks. It wasn't time to investigate interesting sights or sounds, much less the nature of awareness. I had to come back to this point in every sit, in every walk, at every meal for six weeks. It was a very narrow focus, which itself is a challenge.

They weren't kidding about the rains. The rain started pretty much the next day and went on uninterrupted for about the next three weeks, during which time it rained three inches a day and I didn't see the sun.

I was eating one meal a day at the monastery. Breakfast didn't quite work for my timing because the schedule was pretty full. So I was eating one meal a day. The monastery is vegetarian, which I appreciated because I'm vegetarian. But there wasn't a lot of protein. So it was basically stir-fried vegetables and white rice. On that diet, I was losing about half a pound a day of weight. And you can tell I don't have a lot to give up in the first place.

The practice was demanding and the schedule was demanding. The shortest sitting during the day was an hour and a half.

I settled into that schedule, practicing hour after hour, not seeing the sun, losing weight steadily, surviving on minimal food. The bugs in my kuti were amazing—I saw the biggest spider I'd ever encountered right outside my window.

After about three weeks of this demanding routine, I wasn't making tremendous progress in the practice. I grew quite discouraged, and my spirits began sinking really low. It's funny now, but at the time it wasn't amusing at all.

Fortunately, I had brought a small piece of art that I kept on my altar—a photograph of the Dalai Lama with quotes from Shantideva about the bodhisattva's way of life. Facing this beautiful image of His Holiness, I decided to ask for guidance.

"Your Holiness," I said to the photograph, "I'm having a really difficult time. I need some counsel. What advice can you offer me?" I genuinely supplicated to his image.

Quite immediately, a transmission came. It arrived in his voice—that distinctive Indian-accented English—and the message was crystal clear: "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Then the transmission ended.

I figured I'd better follow this guidance from such a revered figure. Whenever I could remember, I would call to mind that advice: stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. Sometimes it worked beautifully. When I could recall what cheerful actually felt like, it truly uplifted my spirits and allowed me to continue with my retreat.

I've continued remembering and practicing this wisdom during difficult periods. After all, what's the point of being anything other than cheerful, optimistic, and confident? There really is no point.

The Dalai Lama himself embodies this beautiful standard for happiness. He carries on his shoulders the weight of the entire Tibetan nation—a people who lost a million of their seven million during the Cultural Revolution, whose monks and nuns still cannot freely practice dharma as they wish, who face ongoing arrests and persecution. Nonetheless, he radiates this amazing joy and happiness.

At a gathering of scientists in Dharamsala, where he loves bridging the scientific and Buddhist worlds, one scientist asked him over tea in a casual setting: "What was the happiest time of your life?" I thought he might say it was in the Potala Palace as a young monk, studying and practicing freely before the occupation. Instead, he simply said, "I think right now."

What a beautiful response—the happiest time of his life is right now.

I want to explore some of the different ways we can cultivate this sense of joy and happiness in our practice. One of the most powerful is mudita, which Winnie discussed—sympathetic joy or appreciative joy. This is the practice of taking happiness in another's happiness.

Among all the formal Buddhist practices I know, mudita is the most joyful and upbeat. It's a wonderful ally. If you develop a good relationship with what we call "the happy person"—the one with the smile on their face—bringing them in as an ally can be genuinely uplifting.

Sometimes you can feel that spontaneous spark of delight in someone else's happiness. One morning the phone rang at my house. It was a friend I hadn't heard from in a while. When I asked how she was, she responded with tremendous enthusiasm: "I'm wonderful!" Without thinking, I immediately replied, "I'm wonderful too!" That was pure mudita—her happiness simply touched something in me.

There's a beautiful standard phrase in this practice: "May your happiness and good fortune continue." It's a lovely way to tune into another's joy.

We can appreciate this profound line from Shantideva, the great Indian philosopher: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy."

Whatever suffering there is in this world comes from wanting only myself to be happy. This practice of mudita serves as a reliable guide to discovering more happiness in ourselves.

This truth became vivid to me several years ago when Carol and I taught a weekend retreat on mudita. We teach many metta retreats here, but I'd never taught or participated in a mudita retreat before. We offered a weekend to explore this practice together.

I didn't have high expectations. Weekend retreats are perhaps the most challenging of all retreats—you begin with the opening day, and the next day is already the closing. There's no time to settle into that spacious in-between place. Yet I was genuinely surprised by how much participants received from the practice. I remember someone approaching us at the end, saying with wonder, "I haven't felt this happy in years." This from just two days of mudita practice.

I've since worked with practitioners who have engaged in intensive mudita practice for ten days at a stretch, and I've done this myself. It proves to be a profoundly uplifting practice.

There are other forms of joy available to us as well. Most of us here live as laypeople in the world, with access to various sense pleasures. In daily life, we watch movies, enjoy foods of our choosing, listen to music, share intimate relations, appreciate art, painting, and sculpture. This represents a natural part of lay life, and these activities do generate a certain kind of joy in the moment. We cannot avoid this fact if we observe our experience closely.

Of course, as sophisticated meditators, we understand that such pleasures are temporary and dependent on conditions. Yet they do uplift us. Consider how your lay life would feel without any sense pleasures—it might resemble the opening day of a retreat here, which offers a crash course in renunciation and often proves somewhat difficult.

It's worth noting that we laypeople structure our lives to include a certain amount of joy from sense pleasures. This doesn't contradict the Buddha's teachings. In fact, one of the terms for householders in the Buddha's language was "one who enjoys sense pleasures." This describes who we are as laypeople. If you wish to eliminate all sense pleasures from your life, ordination might be more appropriate, as monastic life provides much greater support for the practice of renunciation.

Here on retreat, our access to sense pleasures is naturally limited, yet simple pleasures throughout the day still offer brief moments of delight. I think of rising and enjoying a hot shower—when sitting retreat, I love feeling that warmth on my body. After walking on a chilly autumn afternoon, you come inside for a warm cup of tea or hot bowl of soup, feeling the warmth pervade your being with such delight.

You step outside and witness the beauty of autumn leaves, still present after several weeks, or notice how the sky opens into brilliant blue on a morning like today after days of clouds. Perhaps the most precious moment comes at day's end—after the final sitting and chanting, you lie down in bed. Isn't that delicious? That feeling of settling completely. The problem, of course, is that it doesn't last long. You fall asleep and then wake up again. But it remains pleasant while present.

In the retreat environment, our heightened sensitivity makes all these pleasures more vivid than even fine food and experiences typically strike us in daily life. As the Buddha expressed it: "Robes, alms food, a hut, and a straw seat will seem rich and luxurious to one who has renounced." This describes what we enjoy here—the heightening of our senses toward appreciation through simplicity of being.

Another great pleasure available to all of us is the joy of nature. This became particularly clear during my first monastic period in Thailand. After ordaining and spending time in Bangkok securing my long-term visa and learning the fundamentals of bhikkhu life, I traveled north, just outside Chiang Mai, to practice in a fairly remote monastery built at the bottom of a river gorge. It was quite beautiful.

I appreciated that the practice conditions were roughly equal for men and women—monks lived on one side of the river, nuns on the other, with individual huts lining both banks. High cliffs rose on either side, lined with trees, truly out in the countryside.

I had a sweet little hut called a kuti situated on the riverbank. Each morning, the sun would finally crest the cliff and shine down, illuminating beautiful scenery. My hut sat quite alone, creating ideal conditions for meditation in the profound quiet.

Yet difficulties existed there as well. I spoke no Thai, and the teacher spoke no English. During my three months there, I didn't have a single interview or hear one dharma talk. This was before MP3 players, so I couldn't even smuggle in Dharma Seed contraband. I was truly on my own.

The teacher would occasionally come up to my kuti. I don't know if he was checking to make sure I was okay or what, but he'd look in the window, and I'd either be sitting or walking. Honestly, there wasn't much else to do. So he'd look in my window, see me sitting, and he'd just say "Dii, dii," which means "good, good" in Thai. That was the transmission, the seal of approval.

Or he'd come up and I'd be walking. For some reason, I was walking on the bare ground wearing sandals. I can't imagine why. And he would point to my feet and tell me to take off the sandals so I'd walk barefoot, get more sensation, more contact with the ground. So that was about the extent of my instruction for those three months.

There wasn't another Western monk there that I could talk with, so I really didn't have any conversation for those three months. That was challenging. I was really on my own in that setting.

One of the things that sustained me, that kept my spirits up, was the beauty of that nature—the sunshine, the river, the cliffs, the trees. The most striking thing was on my path, the path I would walk from my kuti to the front of the monastery for my morning meal every day. I would pass this huge old mango tree, and it was mango season in the spring. The mangoes were ripening on the tree and falling on the ground, and there would be this delicious, fresh fragrance of ripe mangoes when I walked by that tree.

The only thing that was a little frustrating is I couldn't eat them. As a monk, you can't eat anything that hasn't been put in your hands by someone else. So these mangoes would fall on the ground because they were ripe, and then they would rot, and I would just have to smell them and watch them. But even the smell was a delight, I must say.

So taking time to appreciate the beauty—as I know you all are doing, I hear it from you in interviews—taking the time to appreciate it. This is from Ajahn Sumedho: "Sometimes in Theravada Buddhism, one gets the impression that you shouldn't enjoy beauty. If you see a beautiful flower, you should contemplate its decay. Or if you see a beautiful woman, you should contemplate her as a rotting corpse. That's a good reflection on anicca, dukkha, and anatta, but it can leave the impression that beauty is only to be reflected on in terms of these three characteristics, rather than in terms of the experience of beauty."

This is the joy of appreciative joy, being able to appreciate the beauty in the things around us. So this appreciation of nature, appreciation of the beauty of natural things—one source that we have a lot of access to here for joy.

There's also a real joy in virtue, in maintaining our conduct well. When we're careful with our sila in life, we live through a few years of maintaining good sila, and as we look back, we find we don't have to have regrets about the actions we've done. Because we don't have regret or remorse or guilt, the mind can really settle in meditation in a lovely way. We feel one level of an inner kind of purity from that care with our conduct.

The Buddha had a special word for this. He called it enjoying the bliss of blamelessness. He said that of the other kinds of pleasures that one can have in lay life—enjoying a degree of self-sufficiency, a livelihood, and freedom from debt—these are not one-sixteenth the value of the bliss of blamelessness. He spoke of this very highly.

So one may wonder, to what extent can this be developed? Again, this was an interview with the Dalai Lama. He was being interviewed by Oprah Winfrey, and I just want to say how much I appreciate Oprah's work at bringing real spirituality to a very broad audience. I don't know of anyone else in this country who does it the way that she does it.

So she was interviewing the Dalai Lama personally for an article in O Magazine. She started by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

No major mistakes, Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

I have to believe that part of the reason for the Dalai Lama's success in meditation is his carefulness with his conduct—that bliss of blamelessness.

There's the joy in generosity. Carol talked about this the other night, and I could feel that joy as she described the work that she does in Burma every winter, being able to support nunneries, monasteries, schools for orphans, and so on. I also feel this joy in generosity when you all are serving Bhante his lunch every day. It's just a delight to watch the people line up and he goes through with great stillness, and you all take such care in offering the food that he needs, the portions that he would enjoy. I really appreciate the presence on both sides of that moment. I don't think I'm the only one who has shed a tear in watching that transaction happen. It's very touching for me sometimes.

You do get to see this a lot in Asia, particularly around monastics. When I was going to practice in Burma that time I told you about with Pauk Sayadaw, one of my students wanted to support my trip and support the monastery, and she gave me a few hundred dollars to give away while I was there in the best way that I could see fit.

So I got to the monastery—I was still a layperson—and one morning before I ordained as a monk, I went to see the steward, the lay steward of the monastery who handles the money. I said, "I have some money I'd like to offer to the monastery on behalf of this student. What I'd like to do is pay for a lunch to sponsor for the entire monastery."

At this time in the monastery, there were 750 people practicing. There were 450 monks, about 150 nuns, and 100 laypeople practicing there at the time. I said, "I have a few hundred dollars. Would that cover a lunch for everyone?"

The steward said, "Well, I'm really sorry to tell you this, but all the lunches are spoken for for the next three months."

I was amazed because this is one of the poorest countries on the face of the earth. And yet, every main meal for three months had already been donated by some Burmese people.

So we decided that her money would sponsor special breakfasts, breakfasts that would have especially good food for everyone in the monastery. Then every day I would come down to lunch and they would have a big white board, which is a lot like our meal dana board, and the white board would say who was sponsoring the lunch that day. It would say it in Burmese and it would say it in English. So as I walked by, I could read where my meal was coming from that day.

Generally it was more than one person. Often it would be a family or it looked like quite a lot of a village who would sponsor the lunch because it was a lot of people. So they would often be sitting off to one side. They would come to the monastery wearing their nicest clothes. The whole family or clan or maybe village would all sit together and watch the monks and the nuns and the laypeople file through and be served from these huge pots until all the people had gotten their lunch.

What was so beautiful were the big smiles on the faces of the donors that day. They would sit off to one side and they would watch Pauk Sayadaw being fed from their offering. They would watch the other senior monks and nuns be fed from their generosity. And it brought them so much joy. It was so clear on their faces. It was really a delight to see.

In our own meditation practice, there's a joy of being with the truth, even if it's difficult. I hear this in interviews from people that even when practice is working in a difficult place, there's a joy of learning how to be with it, of learning how to open to this new place in ourselves, this new place in our practice. Even if it's a little bit difficult, there's, I would say, a joy of understanding what these states mean, how mindfulness helps to liberate them, and how the whole path unfolds, even based on the difficulties.

When my mind touches into some of these core issues of personality, of character—and these may be things like, in my case, fear, or for other people, vigilance or rage—as the retreat goes on, we find that we can touch these places, and the mind has the steadiness to be there with them. It may be for the first time in our life we can touch these deep feelings and the mind can stay steady in the middle of that and not need to escape either through fleeing the room or going off into fantasy or flights of papañca. But the mind can really stay and hold it.

That's the key to freeing ourselves. This contact with steadiness with these difficult areas in our mind.

And if you look closely, I'll bet you'll find a joy in that experience where we wouldn't expect to find it at all.

This is from a poet named Michael Lunig:

"When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring."

So as we stay steady with these difficult facets of heart and mind, the studying continues to deepen and we find that the experience starts to open into places of real peace and stillness. And this is the factor of concentration that's developing.

One of the things that kept me coming back on meditation retreats is I would keep touching these levels of peace at what felt like more and more profound places in me. And I thought, wow, if this much peace is possible, if this much stillness is possible, what else might there be in this mind? And I wanted to come back and explore that because being there was so satisfying. Having a period when the dukkha did not arise was so satisfying that I wanted to sort of plumb that depth. Finding that I could live without being assaulted by the hindrances of liking and disliking, of wanting and pushing away was so freeing, so delicious.

There's also a lot of joy in the practice of gratitude. I know Winnie mentioned this also, and I wanted to talk a little more about this quality of gratitude. Sometimes I think that there should be a fifth Brahmavihara and that it should be gratitude, but I'm going to try and convince you that it actually belongs under one of the ones we already know.

So gratitude, as I understand it, is about appreciating what's already in our own life —appreciating the blessings that are in our life. And I connect this with doing mudita practice for oneself.

Some strains of Buddhist teaching say that we're not allowed to do mudita practice for ourself, that that gets too self-centered, and that mudita is only valid for another person. But I don't see it that way, and I don't understand it that way, and I think there's a textual reference for seeing it the other way as well.

For those of you who were here for the practice of loving kindness for all beings that I led about a week ago, we did a little chant about abiding, pervading the quarters with a mind imbued with the Brahma Viharas. So I'd like to read this chant a little bit on the subject of mudita, which is being translated by gladness.

"I will abide pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with gladness, likewise the second, likewise the third, likewise the fourth. So above and below, around and everywhere, and to all as to myself, I will abide, pervading the all-encompassing world, with a mind imbued with gladness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill-will."

This passage comes from a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, so it is the words of the Buddha. And as you can tell, we are pervading the world with mudita "to all as to oneself." So very clearly in this sutta passage, the Buddha is encouraging us to direct mudita to ourself as well as to all other sentient beings.

So I encourage you to play with this. You can use the same phrase, "may my happiness and good fortune continue," or if that seems a little striving, you could use another phrase, something like, "may I appreciate the blessings in my life."

So gratitude is such a beautiful state of mind. Because we're appreciating what we have, we don't slip into desiring something else. And because we're appreciating what we have, we don't slide into aversion to what's here now. So it's a state that avoids both desire and aversion.

And this came through really nicely in a story of one of our friends, a wise practitioner, who was talking to her granddaughter on Christmas Day. Her granddaughter was like five or six years old at this time and was living in a different city. So our friend called her granddaughter, and the granddaughter had gotten presents that day. And so our friend said, "Well, when you get presents, do you feel thankful for what you have, or does it make you want more?"

And feel the wisdom starting to slip in?

And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, I want more."

And our friend said, "That's too bad."

And the little girl picked up on it and said, "What do you mean?"

And our friend said, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, you feel good. And when you're wanting more, it doesn't feel as good."

And little girl said, "Oh Nana, you're right."

So this is kind of the magic of gratitude. All of us here have many things to be grateful for.

I'm going to come back to this in a minute, but I want to tell a story about another friend of ours who was working in a refugee camp in Thailand. I guess this was in the 1990s. And refugees were coming into Thailand from Laos and Cambodia because those countries were still in a lot of turmoil and they could find some safety in Thailand. So he was working near the Thai border with these refugees, and they had often come from very poor parts of the country, often living up in the hills without modern conveniences.

And many of them had been given visas to move to the West. In fact, a lot of these people settled in California. I think Fresno has a lot of Lao and Cambodian refugees. So they were in the refugee camps to prepare them for this transition to the West.

So they were learning about things like dollar bills and quarters and washing machines and toasters and bus timetables—all of these things that they didn't have in their lives in those countries. And so as a way of getting to know people and getting them to talk about their lives, one of the questions our friend would ask them in classrooms was, "What are the most important things in life?"

So he told me there was this one teenage girl, a refugee, and when he asked her, "What are the most important things in life?" she answered, "The most important things are fire, rice, and water." I think that gives a flavor of what her life was like.

In this country, we more or less take those things for granted or their equivalents. In our situations, I think most of us take those things for granted. Of course, many people in this country don't have ample supplies of heat or food or shelter either. But most of us have the opportunity when we go home to stay sheltered, to stay warm, to stay dry, and we can be really grateful for that. Many people in the world don't have that opportunity.

We have ample food most of the time. I appreciate being here on retreat. We have really good food, really good ample food a lot of the time. I was just reflecting on the range of foods that we've eaten in this retreat—how many came from the Native Americans. Europeans may not be aware of this, but Native Americans provided through their agriculture many of the food staples that we eat in this country and now, of course, that are in Europe also.

So some of them that we owe to the native people are corn, maple syrup, squash, potatoes, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, beans, tomatoes, strawberries, peanuts, avocados, and sunflowers—all brought to us from Native Americans. So we generally have access to these choices of foods, but many people don't. Many people around the world and people in this country don't. So we can feel grateful for this.

All of us, in fact, are enjoying what the Tibetans call a precious human birth. And the precious human birth means that we have been born as a human being and have the chance to make our life meaningful. And in fact, all of you are making your lives meaningful. We're born as human beings. Our mind and bodies are in reasonably good shape. We're at a time when a Buddha has appeared in this world. We're at a place and a time when the Dharma is flourishing, when there are practitioners who are following the teachings, when we have heard and understood the teachings, and we have the interest and the time to follow and practice the teachings.

This set of circumstances doesn't occur for a whole lot of people on this planet. And yet all of us have this opportunity, and it's a huge thing to be grateful for. Bottom line, when we think of things to be grateful for, we can always remember the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. And I've heard this in interviews a lot as we come to this part of the retreat when some people are leaving and reflecting back on their experience—a lot of gratitude for the triple gem: Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha.

It's wonderful to practice and cultivate this state of gratitude. The Buddha said, "Three persons are rare in this world. One is a Buddha, and another is a person who is grateful." It's good company to be in.

One retreat I was sitting here, it was in the colder part of the three-month course. And I had arrived from California where the weather was sunny and relatively warm. And I came in—I think it was November—and the rain started and it started to get cold, you know, some frosty mornings. And I was developing some aversion to the weather. I went in for an interview with Joseph and he said, "Don't waste your time on that. That leads nowhere."

So I thought, I better work with this. And so I started a gratitude list. And I just decided to write down every single thing I could think of in my life that I was grateful for. And then every morning when I got up, I would read through that list as a way to kind of set my tone for the day. It was very helpful because it just kept reminding me how many things I had to be thankful for. And it's a wonderful antidote to any kind of aversion—to remind myself of that.

One other kind of nice gratitude practice: I was teaching a group of senior students a few years ago in California, and two of them decided to start this practice where every night, just before they went to bed, they would send an email to the other telling them one thing they'd been grateful for that day. And so we called them gratitude buddies and they had the commitment—just one thing, but every day. And so they just did that steadily.

And they said it really changed their outlook on their life to realize they had something to appreciate every single day. Keeping that up as a practice and appreciating the other person's gratefulness really made a difference. When we talked about it in the senior students group, a bunch more people started doing it. The gratitude buddies practice actually spread for a while.

One of the things I often reflect on with gratitude is the presence in my life of the path of the Dharma. Have you reflected ever, or recently, on what your life was like before you found a path, before you found this path? I know what my life was like. I felt kind of lost. I felt like I was just bouncing around life, going up, going down, not understanding why, feeling at the mercy of the winds—I don't know what winds, but some winds. I didn't have any ideas where happiness came from or why I was suffering. I felt lost and adrift.

Then finding that there is a reliable path to happiness, to a stable kind of happiness, was like an amazing revelation to me. I just knew I was willing to do anything it took to walk that path and find a stable kind of happiness in my life. When I reflect back on how I got connected to this practice and to IMS, it seems like kind of a fluke. I was in a spiritual bookstore in California one day. I'd been doing a little meditation, but I saw a poster for a retreat with Joseph and Sharon and Jack that was happening in New Mexico. I said, "I want to go to that." This was 1976.

That was my connection to them as teachers. I went to the retreat and learned about IMS. About six months later, I came here and did a long period of retreat, then came on staff. That poster totally turned my life around. I made a connection that I don't know how I would have made otherwise to what is, to me, the best force in life that I've ever found.

So it seems kind of mysterious at times. How did I happen upon that poster that day? But then I also feel like there was almost a sense of destiny about it. I don't know if you felt that about your path, but I just feel something was leading me to this place. I felt so ready. I know I've heard many of you say when you first heard the teachings, you felt like you were coming home. There's just some force that has guided us here.

I think about another Native American saying, this one from the Chippewa Nation: "Sometimes I go around pitying myself while all the time I'm being carried across the vast sky by great winds." There are these great winds carrying all of us. As we keep adding our good intentions, moment after moment, these winds pick up force and they keep carrying us down this path, which is so wholesome, so completely wholesome.

This sutta, the Upanisa Sutta that describes the unfolding of the path to liberation in terms of joy, goes a little like this: It starts with suffering, which is where the first chain of dependent origination ended. But then it goes on to a different track, and from suffering it moves into faith. This is a little jarring at first, but it's true, isn't it? Didn't you develop your faith by learning to work with your suffering? Understanding suffering is the avenue to faith, to believing in the practice.

Faith brings about a kind of gladness. Carol talked about this as the gladness or brightness in the mind when this quality of faith or saddhā develops. This quality of joy leads into rapture, which is pīti, this energizing, alert enjoyment of being in the moment. Pīti leads into, as it does in the seven factors, calm or tranquility. The delight expresses itself in this settledness that we feel as calm.

In the Upanisa Sutta, the next step is happiness, sukha. Following the experience of calm is this quality of happiness or sukha. The factors then get more tranquilizing—concentration, insight, liberation, and so forth. What's interesting to me about this is that sukha, which I'll call happiness, is a deeper development than joy. Joy is more momentary, uplifting, beautiful, essential. We have so many avenues to get to it. But as joy rises, it needs to pass through tranquility to settle and steady itself before it lands into happiness.

Happiness or sukha is this quality of joy that's been matured or ripened or mellowed with calm. Because of that calm, it can settle in a more stable way into our being, into our hearts and minds. It brings with it a real quality of contentment as the mind finds it can settle into itself without having to look outside for anything else. This is that word santuṭṭhi, contentment. Of it, the Buddha said—this is also from the Dhammapada—"Contentment is the greatest wealth."

The greatest wealth.

So this kind of happiness, which has some stability to it, brings a real sense of satisfaction. And as it settles, we get the feeling that, yes, it's impermanent to some extent. It does come and go. But we start to trust that life can throw us curves and we'll still go up and down, but we can settle back into this kind of contented happiness. It forms more or less a reliable baseline for us, even though we're bounced around by the comings and goings of life.

If we have that, we have some basic confidence in being able to work with life, in being able to work with our heart and mind, being able to work with others, being able to work with the world at large.

I love this poem from Rumi. When Rumi says "you," he usually means the divine, the way he understands that. But this captures the spirit for me of when this deep happiness is present:

Come to the orchard in spring.
There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers.
If you do not come, these do not matter.
If you do come, these do not matter.

This is also a poem to this happiness. If happiness doesn't come, these other things don't matter. And if happiness does come, these other things don't matter either. This is that stable foundation.

Of course the path doesn't stop at this happiness, but it continues to evolve. One of the teachers whom I respect deeply put it this way: "The main cause of freedom is happiness." So it is this great supportive condition for the final fruition of the path.

And as the Buddha said in the simile of the Heartwood, the goal of our practice is not just sila. It's not just gain or a good reputation. It's not just concentration or the well-being that brings about, happiness being a part of that. And it's not just insight. But he said, "It is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of this holy life, its heartwood and its end." The unshakable deliverance of mind.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Come to the orchard in spring.
There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers.
If you do not come, these do not matter.
If you do come, these do not matter.

The First Noble Truth

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this dharma talk from a February 2014 retreat, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of the First Noble Truth as taught in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11). Drawing from the Buddha's first discourse after enlightenment, he examines the Pali term dukkha and its various English translations—suffering, stress, unsatisfactoriness, unhappiness—explaining why no single word captures its full meaning.

Armstrong details the three types of dukkha: dukkha-dukkha (the pain of suffering), viparinṇāma-dukkha (suffering due to change and impermanence), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (the subtle unsatisfactoriness of all conditioned formations). He emphasizes that the First Noble Truth is not meant to be a depressing philosophical view but a liberating insight to be fully understood through direct experience.

The talk addresses common misconceptions about Buddhist teachings on suffering, showing how proper understanding of dukkha leads to wisdom and compassion rather than despair. Armstrong concludes with an inspiring account from Ajahn Liem about the complete transcendence of suffering through dedicated practice, demonstrating that the end of dukkha remains achievable in our time.

The subject of tonight's talk is the First Noble Truth. You probably remember from hearing Greg and Andrea discuss this that the First Noble Truth is the first of four: the truth of suffering, the cause of suffering, the end of suffering, and the way to the end of suffering. Tonight I'll be exploring the first noble truth, which is the truth of suffering.

Sometimes people hear this and feel discouraged, thinking, "Oh my God, we just had the hindrances last night. Do we have more on dukkha tonight?" I want to share this statement from the Buddha, where he said that the realization of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy. So may you experience great happiness and joy in tonight's talk.

To set the stage for this exploration, I want to base our discussion on the first discourse that the Buddha gave. You probably know the story. The Buddha had been practicing for six years very intensively—probably more intensively than we can imagine. He wouldn't have skipped the late night sitting with chanting, for example. In that, he's a very good role model for us.

After six years of very intense seeking, you know of that night when he sat under the Bodhi tree and toward dawn had the realization that brought him to full enlightenment—the release from all kinds of suffering. It's said that he didn't teach right away, but spent the next forty-nine days in the area of the Bodhi tree, sitting and walking, enjoying what he called the bliss of deliverance.

Can you imagine? After six years of striving to have arrived at his goal and then just to be able to rest in that peace and liberation, the feeling of that liberation. He was enjoying the bliss of deliverance and reflecting on his understanding. He must have been thinking about how he would possibly convey this to someone else.

It's said that he was inclined not to teach because he thought that what he had discovered was so subtle that no one would understand. Then the legend goes that a heavenly being came down and said, "Awakened one, please consider—there are beings in the world with little dust in their eyes. If you teach, they will understand. Please share what you have gathered out of compassion for the world."

The Buddha took that advice, looked around and remembered that there were beings who perhaps could understand. He thought of the first two teachers he'd had in his journey. As he used his psychic powers, he realized they had died. Both of them had died recently. He wasn't able to share it with them.

Then he reflected on his five most recent friends in the course of his meditation practice—a group of five ascetics who had been doing these very austere practices of self-mortification along with the bodhisattva. But when he decided to take food as he was near the town of Bodhgaya, they gave up on him and said, "Gautama is resorting to luxury. He's falling away from the path. We won't have anything more to do with him." They left him, and of course he came to enlightenment.

Again with his psychic powers, he realized that they were now living near the city of Varanasi, and he resolved to travel there. He walked from Bodh Gaya to Varanasi, which is a couple of hundred miles. It would have taken him probably a couple of weeks or longer to get there.

When he found his group of five ascetic friends and they saw him coming, they thought, "Oh, this is the luxurious indulger Gotama. We won't have anything to do with him." But as he approached them, something in his being intrigued them—maybe his dignity, maybe his radiance, maybe his confidence. They decided that they would lend an ear.

Having persuaded them to listen, the Buddha delivered this discourse. After six years of practice, after enlightenment, after forty-nine days of enjoyment and reflection, these were the first words of teaching that came from him. These words are recorded in a discourse in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Dhammacakapavatana Sutta, which in English means "the discourse on setting in motion the wheel of the Dhamma." This took place in the deer park at Varanasi.

The Blessed One addressed the practitioners of the group of five thus: "Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness and sensual pleasures, which is low, the way of worldlings, ignoble and not beneficial. And the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble and unbeneficial. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana.

The Buddha sets aside two courses of action which he had seen in the world. One is the pursuit of sense pleasures. I want to frame this carefully because as lay people, we are all involved in sense pleasures in different ways. As I understand this teaching, the Buddha is really saying: don't follow a path that seeks its happiness through the incessant pursuit of sense pleasures. This is not the path that all of you are on.

Someone who has embarked on that path wouldn't come to a twenty-eight-day or a two-month retreat. So I regard this as like the people that are shown in the film The Wolf of Wall Street. Do you know that one where Leonardo DiCaprio plays this Wall Street scam artist and spends his accumulated millions on drugs and all the other sense pleasures?

But neither is it beneficial to try to torture the flesh in an effort to liberate the soul, which was the view of the ascetic practitioners of the time. So finding a middle way that isn't seeking to find our total happiness through sense pleasures, but also isn't seeking to mortify the body in order to release some kind of spirit.

So this middle way goes between two extremes. There are many other extremes that it goes between. You could say between greed and aversion. You could say between nihilism and substantial creationism.

So having introduced this, the Buddha is basically proclaiming his own awakening and his own enlightenment. Then he announced that the middle way was this Eightfold Path, which we are cultivating here, which we're developing on this retreat. So having introduced the Eightfold Path, then the Buddha started to enunciate the Four Noble Truths.

And you could say that after that enunciation of the Four Noble Truths, the whole rest of his teaching career, all forty-five years, was really just a commentary on this discourse. It was just filling in the details of what he had already transmitted to people. At the end of this discourse, one of the group of five, his old friends, became enlightened to the first stage of awakening called stream entry. So the discourse itself had a powerful effect.

So in introducing the first noble truth, he said, "This is the noble truth of suffering." And then he enunciated what makes up suffering. And he said it like this: Birth is suffering. Aging is suffering. Illness is suffering. Death is suffering. Sorrow, lamentation, pain, grief, and despair are suffering. Association with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not getting what one wants is suffering. In brief, the five aggregates affected by clinging are suffering.

This is the definition of the first noble truth. Sometimes it's stated as "all of life is suffering." But that's a misstatement. Did you hear that within this enunciation? It doesn't say it like that.

And in order to really get the meaning of what the Buddha is pointing to, we want to draw out the Pali word that is being pointed to by suffering, which you probably know as dukkha. It's not possible to translate the term dukkha with one word in English because it really has a range of meanings. So you'll see translators using different words for it.

Bhikkhu Bodhi uses the word suffering. Most translators do. It's the word I'll use most of the time. Thanissaro Bhikkhu uses the word stress. Stephen Batchelor likes the word anguish. Other words that other translators have used have been unsatisfactoriness, unreliability, dissatisfaction, or my current favorite—and I don't understand why more people don't use this—unhappiness.

It seems to me that really what the Buddha is pointing to is this thread of unhappiness that runs through human life. But the sense of unsatisfactoriness is probably the most comprehensive and the one that we can continue to focus on if we have questions about it. And it suggests that in some way the basic circumstances of human life aren't capable of giving us in and of themselves a lasting kind of satisfaction. And the Buddha has pointed to all the various reasons why.

And what I like about his formulation is how universal it is. There's nothing in this formulation that is particularly Indian or particularly ancient. But the way that he described it applies to humans today just as much as it did to people back in his day in Northern India about twenty-six hundred years ago. He's talking about universals like birth and aging, illness and death, sorrow and grief, association with what we don't like, separation from what we like, not getting what we want, clinging that runs through the heart and mind.

So in another way, even though he doesn't say "life is suffering," there is in his description of it the sense that this thread is pervasive and by the reference to clinging is tied to our very own inclinations of heart and mind. As Greg's talk pointed to a couple of nights ago, this tendency to clinging is responsible for the arising of this mass of difficulty.

So Ajahn Sucitto, I thought, had a nice comment on this point that this goes very deep in us. He said, "We may feel that somehow we have to get ourselves out of this predicament. But when we are the predicament, how do we get out?"

So this is kind of the situation that we're in. We are the predicament. This fact of clinging runs very deeply in us. So we recognize the universal nature. But the other thing I appreciate about the Buddha's description is that it's not personalized. He doesn't say, "I am suffering" or "you are suffering." Feel into that when we say something like "I am suffering" and we take that on as a kind of burden. How does that feel? It feels like a weight. It feels like a personal failure, perhaps a personal source of guilt or embarrassment or shame.

He simply says there is this element of dukkha. It's universal, and in that universal way, it's not terribly personal. It's part of the human package when it hasn't been examined. So in this universal nature, in this impersonal nature, this understanding of the difficulty in human life really becomes a source of connection for us. As we investigate this shared vulnerability to suffering, we see that we're all in the same boat.

I love this poem from Naomi Shihab Nye. She's a Palestinian American poet. This is called "Kindness." I'm just going to read a short part:

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness,
You must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road.
You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive.

This is our human condition. We could all be lying dead by the side of the road somewhere and the simple breath had run out for us. This is the condition of all seven billion of us on this planet.

The Buddha went into a more detailed description of the kinds of dukkha that exist for us. He said that there are basically three kinds. The first is called dukkha dukkha. You can get the flavor of that one—the dukkha of pain, the pain of dukkha, whichever way you like to express it. This is the direct experience of the painful nature of life that comes sometimes. The painful states of body, painful states of mind and heart that we sometimes come in contact with that are very oppressive, the source of our most intense kinds of suffering.

We can look around the world and see this, the magnitude of this kind of pain every night on the evening news. The wars that are taking place—the civil war in Iraq or Syria, the continuing strife in Afghanistan, all of our soldiers who've come home wounded, traumatized, lives shattered by their contact with war. We can look at the spread of illness. About a million children a year die of malaria, mostly in Africa—totally innocent victims of a disease that could be controlled if the resources were there for it.

Even around us in one of the richest countries of the world, we hear every day stories of murder, of rape, of sexual assault, of the abuse of children. And one of the hidden stories today for many people is the existence of racism in our culture, really quite prevalent in the culture. As a white person, I had grown up very ignorant about it until I sat down and was educated by films, by conversations with people of color, and got a sense of the magnitude of the impact of this kind of discrimination that afflicts many, many millions of people of color growing up in this culture—something to which I think many white people are completely blind and unaware, yet it's a deeply affecting and troubling condition in our society.

A few years ago I was teaching a group of senior students, and I just wanted to find out in their own lives what was most difficult for them. So we were talking about the Four Noble Truths, and I asked, "What are the real difficult areas of suffering in your life?" These were people who'd been practicing the Dharma in most cases for ten years, fifteen years, had done a lot of retreat practice, a lot of home practice over that time. These were some of the things that they mentioned as being sources of suffering for them:

A sense of isolation and a lack of community and connection with others. The presence of afflictive emotions in their lives—depression, sadness, anger, fear. The pressures of work—the time pressure, the workload, the fear of inadequacy, of not being able to meet the demands. The fact of aging and illness in themselves and their partners and their friends, meeting that day by day. Caring for aging parents who are losing their capabilities, either their mental capacity or their physical capacities as they get into their sixties, seventies, and eighties and near death. And an underlying sense of anxiety about the future, not knowing what was going to come for them economically, physically, emotionally—changes in their life.

These are the different forms of dukkha dukkha, the pain of suffering that we're vulnerable to, that everybody around the world is vulnerable to and has to deal with.

The second kind of dukkha that the Buddha pointed to is called in Pali viparinama dukkha. In English, this means the dukkha of alternation. What it points to is that with the truth of change, even pleasant circumstances don't stay that way, don't stay pleasant. We may be going along in a very pleasant circumstance for some time, but because of the truth of impermanence, at some point it's going to change. It will either disappear—that pleasant circumstance may disappear, such as the physical health we have at present that at some point will not be there—or it will turn into its opposite.

It will turn into directly unpleasant circumstances.

This truth applies to all conditions in the world, including what the Buddha called the eight worldly vicissitudes—the inevitable changes that affect all conditioned existence. We witness this pattern clearly in our meditation practice. One sitting may be deeply calm, collected, delightful, and peaceful. The very next sitting can be agitated, with the body uncomfortable and the mind restless. We encounter these shifting conditions hour by hour as we move through our retreat days.

This alternation is not a mistake on our part. It's not because we haven't been good yogis or because we've somehow ruined our meditation. This is simply what the conditions of mind and body do at this stage in our development—they continually alternate. When we cling to the pleasant experiences, their inevitable departure brings pain, loss, and unhappiness.

Ajahn Chah offered a vivid metaphor for this dynamic. He said that grasping worldly conditions is like grabbing hold of a poisonous snake. If you take the head—the obviously painful end—it bites you directly. If you grab the tail, which appears to be the neutral, safe end, and hold on, the head will eventually swing around and bite you anyway. Either way you grasp that poisonous snake, you're going to get bitten. This is precisely what happens when we grasp worldly conditions—the law of alternation will inevitably bring difficulty.

The third kind of suffering the Buddha identified is called sankhāra dukkha. Sankhāra means formations, and the Buddha used this term in several ways throughout his teaching. In this context, we can understand it as referring to all conditioned things—all formations that arise through causes and conditions. This could be translated as "the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned formations."

This third form of dukkha points to a profound truth: everything that arises has such a momentary nature that it never quite exists as a solid thing in the first place. This characteristic is not easy to perceive until you develop a meditative eye. One of the first places practitioners begin to discover this truth is in the body.

Most people sitting down to meditate for the first time feel that the body is quite solid. They sense the substantial earth element that Andrea spoke about this morning. The body feels definite, really there—after all, we've seen anatomy textbooks showing solid flesh and bones. But when you begin investigating with the eye of mindfulness that has been cultivated through close contact with the present moment, can you actually find anything solid within your direct experience of the body?

Can you locate any sensation that isn't characterized by impermanence on a momentary level? When you observe closely, even a strong sense of pressure—which normally gives us the impression of hardness and earth element—reveals fluctuations in intensity. You begin to feel it as waves of pressure, waves of intensity. This is even more apparent with the pulsing, vibrating, changing nature of what we typically consider neutral sensations in the body.

As you examine closely, you discover that the body has no solidity whatsoever. It's simply arising, changing, and passing away moment after moment after moment. This momentary, arising-and-passing nature characterizes everything that comes into existence. Everything we experience through the senses is continuously arising, changing, and passing moment by moment. This is what gives the world its fundamentally unsatisfactory nature—we cannot find anywhere solid to land because things don't exist in a solid, substantial way.

This is the essential message of emptiness: things do not exist in the solid and substantial manner we imagine them to. A few years ago, the Dalai Lama was giving teachings at Shoreline Theater in Mountain View, and several of us attended. It was a beautiful day in May—sunny, with lovely weather.

He was on this outdoor stage, if you know the Shoreline setup. A bunch of people were sitting in the seats, and then many of us were on the grassy field behind them. On the stage was His Holiness in a big, tall throne so that everybody could see him. He explained that the tall throne was not about making a big deal out of the individual or promoting the person—it was giving respect to the teachings. I thought that was interesting. It's not an egotistical thing.

He was on this big tall throne, and the stage was filled with nuns and monks from many different Buddhist traditions. There were the Tibetans with their bright red robes, Theravadans in their ochre to orange to yellow robes, Koreans in their gray, and Japanese Zen practitioners in their black. The stage was simply filled with all of them. Behind the Dalai Lama was a huge mural of the Potala, the palace where he used to live in Lhasa, kind of illuminated by the setting sun. It was nostalgic because you could just imagine the years when he was actually able to live there and teach from there and be considered the head of Tibet.

There was this splendid assembly, and we were all enjoying the weather and the teachings and, of course, his presence. It was kind of like a Buddhist Woodstock—no drugs going around, but otherwise it felt a lot like that vibe.

He was teaching on the Heart Sutra, which is one of the clear expressions of emptiness. When he got to this point, he took some time to go over it carefully. He said, "If you really want to help others come out of suffering, you have to understand all the reasons that they're suffering. It's pretty easy to see the pain of pain, the dukkha dukkha. It's pretty easy to see conceptually the pain of alternation, how things change. We can all get that. But it's not so easy to see this form of sankara dukkha, the unsatisfactoriness of conditions. If you really want to help other people, you need to understand this also."

It's the most subtle of the three to see, and you need to understand it so that you can really know why people cannot find a solid happiness in this life. There is no solidity there. He said, "If you think that things are stable for a while and then change, that's not the right understanding. The right understanding is that things are falling apart moment after moment after moment. There is no ground in phenomenal existence."

This was expressed in a beautiful quote in the Discourses. This is actually a Brahma, a heavenly being who comes down and makes this comment. I love the way it is put: "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to form." Form is a technical term—the Pali word is rupa. It's one of the five aggregates and it means the whole physical world. So when the word form is used here, it means physical matter or the physical world.

This is what we learn when we investigate the nature of the body with our meditative insight: it is chronically trembling. It is always shifting. It is never continuous.

This is one of the understandings of impermanence that comes through the practice in a retreat. The way these things fall apart was nicely summed up by Joseph Goldstein when he said, "If it's not one thing, it's another." Daily life is kind of like that, isn't it? You just get your relationship in place and then work falls apart. Or you just get work in place and then your kids do something. You know, you just get your kids together and your parents get ill. If it's not one thing, it's another.

This doesn't mean that it's not possible to be basically happy in the world. We all have this vulnerability, but there are a lot of basically happy people in the world. Some of them are Buddhists, some of them are not. Some of them are spiritual people and some of them are not. I find it so delightful and inspiring when I meet happy people, whether it's come out of a path of practice or some people just have it as a native temperament from birth. It's really delightful.

But I will say, looking at these happy people with my Buddhist glasses on, I see three qualities that they share. I want to suggest that these three qualities are kind of like a recipe for worldly happiness. If you want to pursue a path of normal worldly happiness, you can do it by developing these three qualities. And they are generosity, ethical conduct, and loving-kindness.

In Buddhism, these are considered the basis of wholesome worldly action. I think they provide a really good recipe for how to be happy in the world. And don't take my word for it, but check it out. When you meet people who have this native quality of happiness, see if they don't manifest these three areas: generosity, ethical conduct, and loving-kindness.

So this kind of happiness is available to us. It is changeable. And the Eightfold Path is designed to lead to a happiness that is not changeable. So it is a higher aspiration. And many beings have discovered it. Many beings have realized that happiness which is beyond change. I'll talk about one of those beings later in this talk.

So the Noble Truths, all of them, are not just nice philosophical propositions. They're all calls to action. Each of them has something for us to do about it. And the call to action for the First Noble Truth is it's to be understood. That is, the Noble Truth of suffering is to be, and the Buddha's words were, fully understood.

So if we're not fully enlightened, that means we haven't yet carried out that instruction to fully understand the First Noble Truth. It sounds kind of easy, doesn't it? I mean, we can look through this definition. Yeah, I get it. Birth is suffering. Aging is suffering. Illness is suffering. I get that. I understand it. No. We haven't got it yet.

Because if we fully understood the truth of suffering, we wouldn't hang on. We wouldn't cling. That's the power in understanding fully the Noble Truth of suffering. We would understand that there is in all the conditioned world nothing suitable for hanging on to. That's the quote from the Buddha that Greg mentioned the other night. Nothing whatsoever should be clung to, is suitable to be clung to.

But we haven't got that yet. So things come along and they're attractive and so we go, it won't hurt to just go after that one. And so we go after that one, maybe we get it, and then it provides some happiness for a while and then you know what? It always goes poof. It always dissolves, whether it's the new car that loses its smell after a year or so or gets a few dings when you take it in the parking lot. Or it's a new relationship where after six months you realize the partner actually does have a flaw or two. Whatever it is, it doesn't keep that ability to satisfy.

So we cling to the next thing and then it satisfies for a little while and then it kind of goes poof. And you can see this in meditation. Oh, let me just arrange the body in a vertical way and the breath just at that point and a little bit of peace comes along and then it gets disturbed. Let me try again. I'll get it back again.

Or something that we're trying to avoid, some unpleasant thing comes on the horizon. Oh, no, I don't want to experience that. I've got to resist that. Meanwhile, it's still there, association with what is displeasing. It's still there, but we're resisting opening to it. But it's with us. We're feeling it. We're not liking it. We're resisting it to the very last moment, and then it goes. Oh, what was that all about? I didn't have to resist that so hard. It was going to go anyway. And yet we keep doing it, don't we?

Trying to maintain the association with what is pleasing, trying to push away any contact with what is displeasing. This is the struggle we're involved in. This is the round of birth and death that constitutes samsara on a moment-to-moment basis in our practice.

The Buddha put it this way: there is one thing, the not seeing of which keeps you bound, and that is dukkha. Because we keep clinging, we don't see how we keep clinging to what is eventually going to go. The going is its unsatisfactoriness, our clinging and its change is the dukkha.

So how can we open to this truth? How can we work with it? How can we understand it better? How can we relate? This is a very delicate point in practice, I think. Because if we don't open to this truth, we're really going to keep deluding ourselves.

We are a step ahead of the curve because we've seen it doesn't work in outside life, or we wouldn't be here. If we thought we could fix the problem in outside life, it's much more fun out there—we'd be there. But we've seen that, and so we're here.

But sometimes we might think we can solve the problem through generating different states in meditation. So we think, "Okay, if I develop mindfulness strongly enough and infuse it with some loving kindness and then really work on the concentration, I'm going to get to a steady state in my meditation and I'm just going to cruise for the rest of the month." Maybe not. But it's as though we bring that habit of acquisition into meditation and we imagine that we're going to, as we develop our skill, create kind of a cozy little plateau where we can wrap ourselves up with our meditative skills and our concentration and then that will last.

This is a little bit a continuation of what I call a Winnie the Pooh view of the world. You know how Christopher Robin went through his days. He could go out and have these kind of scary adventures in the woods with his friends—Winnie and Piglet and Eeyore and all of that. And then he'd come home at night and his mother would tuck him in and give him some hot chocolate, and then he'd go to bed like a good British lad would. It was all very safe.

But our world isn't quite like that. Our world isn't safe and cozy and predictable like that. Our world is kind of intense. It gets raw at times. It gets very vivid. And sometimes it is just really intense with issues of birth and death and aging and loss and everything else.

So the question really is, how do we stay in touch with that truth—this truth of the pervasive nature of dukkha—but not get it, not fix on it as a view? Because when we fix on it as a view, life is... it turns out something like "life is dukkha." And then we pick that up and we attach to that view and we carry it around like a burden. And if we have that view—life is dukkha—it will be felt as a burden and will develop a resistance and actually an aversion and a fear of life.

You can see this in some practitioners. They've taken the First Noble Truth and they've turned it into a view. The First Noble Truth is not meant to be a view or a belief. It's meant to be an insight. And insight is a living experience of the truth in this moment.

When we have a living insight into the nature of dukkha, it's liberating. Try it sometime. You're in some state of conflict. Things are painful. There's struggle. There's discord. Just name it: "Oh, this is dukkha." And see if that doesn't create some spaciousness, some impersonalizing, depersonalizing of the experience. And then drop it. When the dukkha goes, you drop it.

But if we carry around this view—"Oh, life is all suffering, it's all gloom, nobody's exempt, there's no way out, it's all meaningless, and then we die"—you'll get depressed. I would get depressed if I thought that.

So these are meant to be fresh insights that we discover through our investigation, not meant to become the way we take life to be.

We'll develop a sense of aversion and fear. So that's not skillful. But we want to keep touching into it, keep reminding ourselves. The Buddha put it this way: A bhikku is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm himself with suffering. She does not give up the pleasure that accords with Dhamma, yet she is not infatuated with that pleasure.

There's a great deal of pleasure available through our meditation practice—these states of calm, harmony, acceptance, loving-kindness, peace, relaxation, ease. They're all available moment by moment, and many of you are touching into them already. I know because I hear it in the interviews. There's a delight in our meditation practice that is actually much greater and more reliable than the delight of sense pleasures.

The Buddha didn't object to sense pleasures because they were morally repugnant. He pointed to their limitations because they're not capable of lasting satisfaction. And there's a higher kind of pleasure available through the Dhamma. So the pleasures of meditation are very sustaining, supporting, encouraging. They generate faith and point in the right direction. They're onward leading. They lead us to deeper wisdom, deeper freedom, and deeper happiness.

At the stage we're at, they're not totally consistent yet either, or totally reliable. But they lead in the direction of total reliability and freedom. So we appreciate the pleasure that comes from our Dhamma practice. We learn to cultivate it, grow it, and enjoy it.

And we don't shy away from the experience of suffering. I think the world is mad in a way because it has shied away from the experience of suffering. Freud said something really insightful about this. He said neurosis is basically the refusal to suffer. We're unwilling to open to suffering and so we choose neurotic pathways. We choose neurotic adjustments to keep from feeling this essential part of being alive.

But as a practitioner, suffering can be a great ally. I know it's not something that we welcome easily. It's not probably what you came to the retreat for, but I just ask each of you to reflect on your own practice. Has suffering ever been useful for you in your course of Dhamma? Has it ever brought you greater understanding? Has it made you look more deeply? Has it made you reflect on your actions, your choices, your motivations, your intentions? Has it taught you anything about what leads to happiness and what leads away from happiness? Have you developed courage in relation to difficulty? Have you developed compassion out of meeting your own pain? And has that compassion then translated to being touched by other people's pain?

Suffering has the power to do all these things. It leads most of us to the path in the first place. Some of us come to the path out of intellectual curiosity about a foreign religion, but that's usually not enough to sustain us through a month-long retreat or a two-month retreat. What sustains us is our faith that this practice can really help us come out of our own pain and sorrow. So it's our own suffering that has led to that understanding. It leads us into wisdom. It leads us into compassion. It leads us to that quality of faith because we've verified that the practice has the power to bring us out of suffering.

Otherwise, why could this be called a noble truth? So much of the world is in a state of suffering, and it's not very noble. Mostly in the world, suffering leads to more suffering. It does not lead to beauty. It does not lead to maturity. And it doesn't lead to dignity and nobility. In some cases it does. It's quite amazing—the spiritual nature, I would say, of human beings, that for some people it does.

I'm thinking about Morgan Freeman. Morgan Freeman was born in 1937 and grew up in the state of Mississippi.

Imagine what it was like to be a black man in Mississippi in 1937. Do you think that was an easy path? Do you think that was a path of privilege? I don't think so. I'm sure he experienced many painful episodes of discrimination, abuse, prejudice, racism—maybe in some of its most violent forms. I don't know the details, but I'm sure he felt it.

He didn't become famous until he was fifty-two. It was that movie, Driving Miss Daisy, that really put him on the map. Since then, who has played God in more movies than any other actor? Morgan Freeman. Who has narrated more great nature documentaries? Morgan Freeman.

I really love his presence. Actually, Sally and I were at a play one evening on Broadway in New York City, and we're walking down the street after the play when who should come walking up the sidewalk toward us but Morgan Freeman. He was dressed in this very handsome black wool overcoat and had such dignity and such presence that I wouldn't have known anything else to do except to stand slightly aside and let him pass as a way of honoring him.

So out of that childhood, as difficult as it may have been, came a man with some of the greatest dignity and nobility that I've been around, that I've felt up close. Sometimes it happens, but for us it can happen because of our practice. We learn how to transmute this suffering into nobility.

After Ajahn Chah died in Thailand, the person who became the abbot of Wat Ba Pong—the monastery where he had been abbot for many years, where Jack Kornfield practiced with him and Ajahn Sumedho first practiced with him—was a teacher named Ajahn Liem, who is still alive and still the abbot of Wat Ba Pong.

Ajahn Liem was visiting this country a while ago, and some of the monks at Abhayagiri took him to visit the monastery of Ten Thousand Buddhas, which is also up there in Ukiah. The two abbots got to meet—the abbot of Ten Thousand Buddhas, who I think is Chinese, because it's a Chinese Mahayana lineage, and Ajahn Liem got to have a dialogue.

So the abbot of the Chinese monastery asked Ajahn Liem, "What was the hardest thing in your practice?"

Isn't that a great question? Only one practitioner would think to ask that question of another practitioner. What was the hardest thing in your practice?

Ajahn Liem thought for a moment. He said, "I think the hardest thing in my practice was fear." And then he paused. "But just to say it was the hardest thing isn't quite right. It doesn't really tell the story. It was my worthy opponent. Because without it, there wouldn't have been the growth in wisdom that I came to."

For all of us, whatever form our suffering takes, that's our worthy opponent. That is exactly where we grow.

If we're overwhelmed by the suffering, we need to find a way to change that around. We need to find lots of skillful means—whether it's loving-kindness practice or patience or a cup of tea in the dining hall or a walk in the hills and a gazing at the sky for a while. We need to find lots of skillful means to help us bear that suffering.

But then, when we have the strength, we really need to meet it. We need to touch it directly. And I would say we can even welcome it because it is the messenger of our own growth and therefore of our own movement to greater wisdom and toward freedom.

So suffering is an invaluable companion on this journey. And our attitude can become one of real welcoming of it. Let me learn. Our attitude is: let me learn from this.

Ajahn Chah put it this way: there's suffering that leads to more suffering, and there's suffering that leads to the end of suffering. What makes the difference is this willingness to learn—the willingness to open and the willingness to learn.

So this is our call. We can't understand suffering at arm's length. We can't understand it from a book. We've got to understand it from direct, immediate contact and, to some degree, resolution. We have to understand what led us into it. We have to understand how we're hooked into it.

And we have to understand in our direct experience how to release it. We can't do that except by meeting it head on.

So meditation practice will lead us in one of two directions at different moments. It will lead us into great states of peace and ease and relaxation and insight and warmth and loving kindness. That will come. Those moments are very helpful for giving us the confidence and strength that we're looking for.

Or it will lead us into moments of struggle, of difficulty, of some kind of pain, of conflict, difficult emotions relating with body pain. Then we have the opportunity to develop our insight further, to expand our field of compassion and understanding, to learn how to relate to that suffering and how to release it.

So whichever is showing up for you on any particular day, in any particular sitting or walking, in any particular moment, whether it's ease or difficulty, both are really helpful on this path. Both are great sources of learning. They're sources of strength and sources of wisdom.

You know where the Four Noble Truths goes from here. As we fully understand the way dukkha works, we learn to let go, and that means we are letting go of craving. What I think Greg talked about is the abandoning of craving. And then as we abandon craving, we find that the mind moves into the reduction or the end of suffering, which is pointed to by the Third Noble Truth. And it's by following the Eightfold Path, the Fourth Noble Truth, that all of that takes place.

But this question about the end of suffering—it's a really interesting question today. I hear it from people. Is there anybody today who's fully awakened and has really brought suffering to a complete end? Does that still happen in this world? And I think it does.

So I want to close by reading you an excerpt from the biography of Ajahn Liem, who is now the abbot of Wat Ba Pong. In it he describes in his own words his meditation experience during a rains retreat when Ajahn Chah was his teacher. This is from 1969.

Around the middle of the rainy season of 1969, Ajahn Chah encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity. So Ajahn Liem increased his efforts and as he did so, the results became evident. And the rest of this is a direct quote from Ajahn Liem:

"Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m. and then stop to have a rest. But on this day I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture. A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body as if something was taking hold over it. The body felt cool, a coolness effusing the whole body, an experience of the whole body becoming completely light and at ease, cool, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness. The body felt tranquil, cool, and light.

"This experience continued on throughout the whole year, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued on unchanging for many years, all from that one time. It feels like there are no sankhāras, no proliferations of the mind. All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before, the kilesas concerning sexual desire, or all kinds of ambitions that I had before, I don't know where they all disappeared to. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose. There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without changes."

So let's just sit together for a few minutes and let the words settle. "All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before, I don't know where they all disappeared to. There isn't anything to be concerned about. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like."

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 132

Morning Instructions Day 5

Guy Armstrong · 17 min

> In this fifth day of morning instructions from a February 2014 month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong builds upon the foundational meditation guidance by integrating previously introduced elements into a cohesive practice approach. He reviews the three recommended anchor points for attention: body posture, sounds, and breath sensations, emphasizing how these serve to stabilize and collect the mind.
> Armstrong introduces the concept of fluid attention - the ability to rest with an anchor when nothing particularly draws the mind, while remaining open to other arising experiences such as body sensations, emotional states, and the five hindrances (kāmacchanda, vyāpāda, thīna-middha, uddhacca-kukkucca, and vicikicchā). He emphasizes investigating these hindrances through their bodily manifestations, teaching practitioners to locate where emotions like anger, restlessness, or dullness express themselves physically.
> The instruction emphasizes bare attention without judgment, encouraging practitioners to meet each arising experience with mindfulness rather than trying to manipulate or eliminate it. Armstrong guides students toward understanding that the continuity of mindful awareness is more important than the specific object of attention, laying groundwork for the comprehensive noting practice that characterizes insight meditation.

You may have gathered that our basic instruction for the whole of the month is going to be: sit down and notice what's happening in your experience. But if we said that at the very beginning, it would be hard to do that without a little bit more foundation. And so what we tend to do is break the instruction up into smaller pieces and deliver them a little bit at a time over the first ten days to two weeks of the course.

Typically we begin by encouraging you to pick a home base or an anchor in your practice that you can come back to again and again to help stabilize the attention. As you return to a similar focus, it will help the attention collect. And when you notice you're not with that focus, you're reminded to come back and steady the attention. So we've recommended breath, we've recommended body posture, we've recommended sounds as those kinds of anchor possibilities. I leave it up to you to choose.

Yesterday Andrea opened us up to the whole field of body sensations. We can look at those through the four elements as she introduced. We can look at them just in their bare physical nature. And then Andrea also introduced the hindrances in the Dharma talk as things to pay attention to.

What I'd like to do today is sum all that up in the instructions where we've gotten to today. And then as the retreat goes on, more instructions will clarify other pieces, other sense doors to pay attention to.

Please begin by sitting comfortably, so you can put the relax in "relax, observe, allow." As you bring your awareness into your body as you're sitting, have a sense that the awareness can pervade the whole body, is pervading the whole body. As you notice the experience of the body as you sit, just take a moment to let go of any unnecessary tension or holding.

Let the eyes be soft, relaxed, a little bit downcast. Allow the jaw to drop. Let the shoulders relax. Let the hands not be clenched. Let the belly be soft. There may be other areas of tension that you're not able to release—that's fine. The muscles need to have some tautness just to hold the body up in sitting. We don't relax completely, but we relax what we can.

Again, feel that unification of the awareness with the body posture, recognizing that the posture itself can become our anchor focus. In using the body posture as a focus, what you want to do is take in the whole body with one glance, as much as possible. Sometimes you can't quite get to every joint of every toe, but with one look, feel the whole length of the body as you sit.

We don't want to construct a sense of an observer that's standing behind the experience, watching it. You want to feel yourself in sitting. Feel the body sitting. It's just one experience. There's no observer outside it. We're just it.

Then you might open your attention in a wide way to take in all the sounds that are coming and going: the sound of my voice, sounds of the building, the systems, the sounds of one another. Let your awareness become wide, limitless, just allowing all the sounds to appear and disappear in the big empty space of awareness. If at times you're not noticing any sounds, then just be aware of the extent of the silence, the vastness of the silence.

Notice how with hearing you don't have to make any special effort to hear. You just sit in a relaxed way with a receptive attitude, letting sounds come, and they're all known spontaneously.

Then bring the attention back into the body and see if you can have that same kind of receptive quality in receiving the experience of the body. Sitting quietly, doing nothing, the body is felt. Again, have the sense of the awareness being able to reach every corner of the body from the top of the head to the tips of the fingers and toes. Everywhere the attention looks, awareness is there with the body, in the body.

As the awareness rests within the body, you'll start to notice the changes in the feeling of the body due to breathing. You'll notice how when an in-breath comes, the energy of the body shifts, feels different. How far throughout the body do you feel the impact of an in-breath? When an out-breath happens, the feeling in the body shifts. There's an impact. How far throughout the body do you feel the impact of breathing out?

Just allow yourself to rest the awareness within the whole body and feel what it feels like to breathe in and breathe out moment by moment, sitting quietly, doing nothing. The receptive attention reveals the sensations of breath.

These are our three recommendations for anchors: the whole body posture, sounds, or breath. If breath is your comfortable focus, you can feel it either in the whole body or in a smaller part—at the belly, the chest, or the nose. All of those are fine.

While you're attending to your anchor, other experiences will come from time to time and naturally draw your attention. We're not fixed on the anchor. Our mind stays open to any other experience that comes.

So other sensations arise in the body: a pressure in the knee, a warmth in the chest, a tingling on the top of the head. When you notice one of these arisings, let that become the new focus for your mindfulness. Easily let go of your anchor. Let the attention go to the new sensation. Connect with it directly and feel it just in its bare physical nature.

If you like, you can notice it as one of the four elements. Or you can just feel it, just being in touch with its physical characteristic—pressure, ache, tingling or pulsing, vibration, warmth, coolness.

If that sensation fades and the attention is no longer drawn, you can return the attention to your anchor. Or perhaps another sensation will call the attention. That's fine.

From time to time you'll notice the arising of different states of mind, different emotions, different moods. At this point, pay particular attention to the arising of any of the hindrances that Andrea discussed the other night—the movements of sense desire, ill will, sleepiness, restlessness or doubt.

Bring mindfulness to the direct experience of the hindrance energy, not judging it, not trying to make it go away, just paying attention so we become familiar with it, open to it, allowing it. "Oh, anger is like this. Restlessness feels like this."

If that energy is strong, it will express itself through the body. So find and investigate: Where am I feeling wanting in the body? Where do I feel impatience in the body? Where is this dullness to be found in the body?

If you can locate it, let your attention go to that part of the body. Feel the sensations connected with the hindrance energy. By staying in touch with that part of the body, you'll also be in touch with the hindrance—using the body to ground the attention in order to stay in touch with the emotional realm. Again, not judging the emotion, not judging yourself. Mindfulness simply observes and allows. Knowing what's there with clear seeing—that's the basis for wisdom.

Begin to get this fluidity of attention that can be with your anchor if nothing special is going on, but can easily move to one of these experiences—other body sensations, sounds or breath, moods and emotions—when they arise and you notice them. Make each new arising the direct focus for your mindfulness in this new moment.

Everything that arises is a proper focus for mindfulness because it's the mindfulness that's the key and not the object. So sustain the continuity of your careful attention, moment by moment by moment.

CHAPTER 133

Morning Instructions: Day 9 - Mindfulness of Thinking

Guy Armstrong · 17 min

> In this ninth day of retreat instructions, Guy Armstrong addresses one of the more advanced aspects of mindfulness practice: developing a meditative relationship with thinking. Drawing on the wisdom of Korean Zen master Chinul, Armstrong guides practitioners to move beyond seeing thoughts as obstacles to recognizing them as present-moment arisings worthy of mindful attention.
> The teaching explores the paradoxical nature of thoughts - how they create our entire constructed world yet dissolve under direct observation. Armstrong emphasizes that the goal isn't to eliminate thinking but to develop the capacity to observe thoughts without being seduced by their content. He offers practical techniques for working with repetitive thought patterns, suggesting we label recurring themes and investigate the underlying emotions that fuel persistent mental activity.
> Through guided meditation, practitioners learn to maintain present-moment awareness while observing the arising, persisting, and passing away of thoughts. This approach aligns with core vipassanā principles of seeing the impermanent nature of all mental formations. Armstrong's instructions help meditators discover that even our sense of past and future are simply present-moment thought constructions, pointing toward the liberating recognition that there is only this moment of direct sensory experience.

This morning in the instructions we're going to take one of the more advanced topics for mindfulness, which is the whole realm of thinking.

So far in the instructions you could almost imagine that thought is our adversary because thought has been the activity that tends to take us away from the present moment and take our attention away from breath or sounds or body or emotions. But this has been a temporary settling in direction.

In the long run you don't want to see thoughts as an adversary because you'll always feel like you're doing something wrong. It's not that thoughts shouldn't be arising. So I hope this exercise this morning will help us all get rid of the idea that it's a mistake if you think—that would be really self-defeating. It's not a mistake if you think.

The Korean master Chanul put it like this: "Don't be concerned that thoughts are arising. Only be concerned if you're slow in recognizing them." So this is the point. We want to bring mindfulness to this area of our experience as with all the other areas.

But as you know, thoughts are a slippery slope. Because when we start to pay attention to a thought, it's very easy to get seduced into the content. Thoughts have this extraordinarily seductive quality of leading us into the alternate realm that they construct. And our practice is to keep coming back to the simple reality of the six senses in this moment. This is the whole key to vipassana.

Connecting with the simplicity of our sense experience is what leads us out of the fabrications that thought creates, which include the whole sense of self. So moving away from an immersion in the thought world is the direct route to becoming free of the sense of self.

So it's also an investigation. As we meditate with the arising of thought, it's an opportunity to find out what is this thing that we call a thought. It's extraordinary when you think about it. Everything in this room has been created by thought, including us. Somehow our parents had some kind of thought connection with each other and we came out of that. The clothes that we wear, the wood that's in the floor, the shawls, the cushions, the chairs—were all fabricated by thinking. The world is ruled by thought. Things that go on in the world all start with a thought. Your job, your house, who you're with—all come out of thought.

And yet, when you look at a thought, what in the world is it? It's just this little tissue of words. And often when you have enough mindfulness and you turn and look at a thought, it will just go poof and fall away right on the spot. It doesn't always do that, but sometimes it will do that.

So as we start to really bring a meditative attention to the activity of thinking, we start to see the lightness, the ethereal, transparent nature of any given thought. And yet if we take a hold of a thought and invest in it, then it can structure our whole world. So we want to find another place to come from in living our life.

Most of the world lives in the realm of thought, guided by the realm of thought, doesn't see beyond the realm of thought. Thought constructs our view of the world and of ourselves. As meditators, we can come from a different place. And the place that we're moving to is this silent, non-conceptual awareness. Once we land firmly in that place, we can see thoughts as a present moment arising and not be dragged out of the silent non-conceptual awareness. So mindfulness can encompass thinking without being seduced by it. And this is the kind of steadiness of attention that we want to find.

One of the difficulties with thought is that we tend to take it so personally. "This is my thought. What does it say about me?" But again, when you start to look at the way thoughts come, some of them are so random. Who knows what made that thought appear? So Joseph Goldstein has a nice instruction: imagine that your thoughts are coming from the person sitting behind you. And then you don't have to take any ownership. So play with that.

Some people tend to think in pictures more than in words. I tend to think more in words, so I'll probably use language that refers more to words. But you can think of handling images, relating to images in the same way if you're more of a visual person.

And then there's one kind of thought that I want to single out, and that is repetitive thought patterns that go again and again. And these tend to be about things that you care about a lot. So it could be repetitive thoughts about your work or an argument you had with somebody or a personal relationship or how your finances are, what's going to happen with your new job prospect and things like that.

These are things that we tend to run over and over and over. This kind of thinking will often show up in the middle of a silent meditation retreat quite strongly.

So with repetitive thoughts, what's helpful—you might notice that there's like a top ten list on your jukebox. Develop a label for each of those. You might say "relationship thought," "planning thought," "work thought," "argument thought," "rehearsing thought for an interview." Once you start to see a repetitive pattern, give it a label, and that will help mindfulness make a clearer relationship with it.

Secondly, those repetitive thoughts don't tend to resolve themselves through more thinking. It's just not going to happen. So we want to move with these repetitive thoughts out of the enmeshment with the thought process and into the senses again. A very skillful thing to do is ask: what's the emotion that's driving the thought? If a thought's coming again and again with a lot of energy, there's some emotion that's fueling it. That's the motive force. What's the emotion with it? And then drop out of the thought realm and just feel the emotion. If you can find it in the body, that's very helpful.

Now I'm going to do a little guided meditation to lead us into the mindfulness of thinking, and then we'll leave you to work with thoughts through the remainder of the period.

Please sit comfortably, relaxed in your body, alert. Let's begin this period by just connecting with the anchor—whatever you've been using for that: breath or body or sounds. Just to bring a little bit of stability into the attention at first. You can start to notice if thoughts are present or not, but have the sense that you can keep your attention with the anchor even as thoughts are drifting through. So not yet turning the attention directly to the thought, but just making space for thoughts to be present as you attend to the anchor.

Opening up the attention a little wider, just resting in a receptive way, noticing whatever is arising in the moment—in body, in hearing, in breathing, in mood or emotion. Now we'll play a little bit with thought as an object for mindfulness.

In this kind of open space of attention, imagine that there's just a blank screen in front of you visually. You're in touch with the moment. Now you want to notice the arising, lasting, and passing away of the first thought that comes into this blank space after I finish this sentence.

Having noticed that thought, then return the attention to be with this open awareness or your anchor, staying closely in touch with the present. Steadying the attention again in the present moment. Once again, imagining a blank screen and being mindful of the arising, persisting, and passing of the next thought. Then returning the attention to your anchor or a simple awareness of the present moment.

Notice if in relating to thought in this way, you can still stay with that present moment mindfulness while you're aware of thinking. This is the key. A thought is just a present moment arising. Can your mindfulness stay with it and see its nature of arising, lasting for a while, and passing?

Once again, imagining the blank screen and being aware of the thoughts that arise and pass for a few moments. Make thought the primary object for mindfulness for this short period. I'll say when it will end. Mindful of each thought as it arises and passes.

Now returning to simple awareness of the present moment, reconnecting with your breath, body, sounds, emotion.

Notice in that last exercise if the mindfulness had the power to keep the present moment connection, or if in giving attention to the thoughts it slid away into the content and lost the present moment awareness. This is what we're trying to arrive at—this meditative relationship to thinking that sees it but isn't seduced totally into the content. The more we can find this, the more we can abide in the present even when thoughts are happening. Then thought is not an adversary and does not steal our mindfulness—it's just another object.

We start to see that even the sense of time is just being created by thoughts of the past, which are just present moment arisings, and thoughts of the future, which are just present moment arisings. There is no past and there is no future—just thoughts arising and passing here and now.

If you like, play with this attention to thoughts by making thoughts the primary object for short periods of time in this meditation. You might see how long the mindfulness can hold to this present moment awareness while being aware of thoughts. And then when you feel the seductive power of thoughts taking over, come back to a simple object—anchor, body, sounds, breath.

Reconnect with the present and then when you feel ready, open again.

Just this observation of thought is itself a present moment experience—an interested attention that really wants to understand: what is this thing called a thought? It rules the world, but what is it actually?

Through this practice of watching thoughts arise and pass, we begin to see their ephemeral nature. They come into being, exist for a moment, and then dissolve back into awareness. We start to recognize that thoughts have no more substantial reality than clouds passing through the sky. They appear vivid and compelling, but they are simply temporary formations in the vast space of consciousness.

This understanding is profoundly liberating. When we see thoughts as just another phenomenon arising in awareness—no different from sounds, sensations, or any other object of consciousness—we are no longer enslaved by them. We can observe them with the same interested curiosity we might bring to watching leaves fall from a tree or waves rolling onto shore.

The mind that was once caught in endless loops of planning, worrying, remembering, and fantasizing begins to rest in a more natural state of open awareness. We discover that beneath the constant chatter of thinking lies a profound peace—not the peace that comes from getting what we want or solving all our problems, but the peace of simply being present with what is.

This is the gift of mindfulness practice: to see clearly, to understand deeply, and to rest in the natural awareness that is always here, always now, always free.

CHAPTER 134

Morning Instructions: Day 14

Guy Armstrong · 13 min

> In this day 14 morning instruction from a February month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong provides detailed guidance on transitioning from anchored attention to choiceless awareness practice. He explains how this open awareness meditation relates to the concentrated attention practices introduced earlier in the retreat, offering practitioners a skillful means to work with the natural movement of attention (manasikāra) rather than forcing it to remain fixed.
> Armstrong distinguishes between exclusive focus meditation and the insight practice approach used throughout the retreat, where attention moves fluidly between an anchor (breath, body, or sounds) and whatever naturally arises in awareness. He describes two complementary ways to understand choiceless attention: simply noticing "what's happening now" moment by moment, and deliberately unhooking attention from its anchor while maintaining alert awareness of where it lands. This practice develops both samādhi (concentration) and the flexibility needed for deep vipassanā insight.
> The instruction emphasizes the importance of training attention as a faculty while allowing its natural changeability, using noting practice as optional support. Armstrong provides practical guidance on when to return to an anchor for stability versus when to open into choiceless awareness, helping practitioners navigate between concentration and insight practices skillfully throughout their meditation sessions.

Carol did a review of the instructions yesterday, and there's really not much more that we need to say. But I wanted to go over, once again from a slightly different angle, this practice that we sometimes refer to as open awareness or choiceless attention, and give a little more detail on how to practice it.

We often present it as the open alternative to focused attention on the breath. I'd like to explain a little about how these relate.

There are a few styles of meditation that one can practice, all of which are helpful, and it's important to know how to move between them. In the beginning of the retreat, we encourage everyone to find an anchor—a focus that you come back to again and again. Having that provides a way for the mind to settle. You always know that if anything is confusing, if you feel a little lost or not sure where to go, you have a place like a home base that you can come back to and land on. The returning again and again to that anchor helps to steady the attention, developing this quality of samadhi, concentration.

We offered three specific anchors: breath, body posture, or sounds as suggested ones to work with.

In the beginning, you could take the instruction, "I'm going to be with that anchor no matter what happens. If anything else comes in—a different sound, a different sensation, a thought or an emotion—I'm just going to notice it but not pay any attention to it and come right back to the anchor." This is what I'd call the intention of having an exclusive focus just on the anchor.

We did not give that instruction. I hope everybody is aware that was not the instruction at the beginning of the retreat. That would be a good instruction if you were doing a strict concentration practice, but we've been doing insight practice all along.

Instead, the instruction that we gave was something like: be with your anchor, and then when something else arises, let your attention go there and notice it. If it's strong, naturally drawing the attention, let that new arising be the focus for your meditation, the focus for mindfulness. Then if nothing else is up, come back to your anchor and let the attention connect there.

In this formulation, there's a preference for the anchor, but it's not exclusive. We're being with the anchor while also being open to anything else that naturally draws the attention, letting the attention connect and know all the different experiences that arise at the sense doors. This is a very good way to practice. It includes the steadying, calming, concentrating focus that the anchor offers, but it's not exclusive. There's a sense that we're always open to whatever is there.

As the days went on and we covered the instructions for body sensations and sounds and emotions and thoughts and vedana and intention, we could then move into this practice that we call choiceless attention, where we don't even have a preference for the anchor. Instead, we just notice what's happening now, what's happening now, what's happening now.

This is the technique I want to describe in a little more detail. This technique of choiceless attention is basically noticing what's happening now. There are two ways that it can be explained. These two ways are the same technique; they're just described differently.

The first explanation is simply: notice what's happening now. Whether that's an in-breath, a sound, an out-breath, an emotion, a thought, a pressure sensation—just notice what's happening now. That's where mindfulness locates itself.

The other way to describe choiceless attention starts to highlight a factor of mind that's a really important factor in Dharma practice, but one we haven't talked about a great deal: the quality of attention. The Pali word is manasikaro. Attention is the faculty in the mind that singles out from our broad range of sense experience and different contacts at the six sense doors, that singles out one of those events to focus on at any given moment.

What we find when we start to meditate is that attention is a very volatile factor. It's drawn now here, now there, now there, now there. When we try to bring the attention in a sustained way to an anchor like breath or body or sounds, we might be—especially in the beginning of the retreat—with two breaths and then the attention is somewhere else.

A big part of the discipline of the practice is training this factor of attention so it can be at our disposal. If we want it to stay in the present moment, that becomes more our choice. If we want it to stay with one object, that becomes more our choice. We're training this factor of attention, and finding an anchor and returning to it is one way that we do that.

When we move to the practice of choiceless attention, though, what we do is deliberately unhook the attention from the anchor. We basically say, "No preference for the anchor. Take it off of that where it may be attached by habit. Unhook it from there. Let it go wherever it wants, but notice clearly where it lands."

That's what's so interesting about this practice of choiceless attention. We're not directing the attention, but we have to stay very awake and alert to its movements, and it will continue to move. It's a very changeable factor. In each new moment, the attention could land somewhere else. Our job as meditators is to be really mindful of where attention is landing and to know that experience in each new object that it lands on.

So this is why the noting practice can be such a strong support as we track the free movement of attention. We may notice: in-breath, sound, pressure, thinking, calm, pleasant, out-breath—like that.

It's a beautiful meditation practice because there's no forcing behind it, but it requires a real alertness. You know, with the breath, you can kind of get in a groove. With sounds, you can space out in a really lovely way. But this requires the attention to be very fluid, very flexible, and yet really alert, because the picture is changing all the time. So you can relax with this kind of practice because you're not trying to make the attention go anywhere, but you have to be very awake with it.

What I just described as an example of the noting is optional. But in doing choiceless attention, you should be noticing with that kind of crispness. You should be alert to where the attention is landing and making that connection to that experience, even if it's just for a moment. That's fine, and then the attention may go off somewhere else.

That it moves is not a problem. Where it lands is not your problem. Our only job is to notice where it lands and make that connection of mindfulness for that moment. Sometimes it will land somewhere and stay a while—like a pain in the body may linger for some time. Sometimes it might come back to an anchor, staying there for a while. That's fine as long as there's no forcing with it. But you want to learn this faculty of letting the attention move freely and still being very alert and aware in each moment of what it's doing.

So then the skill becomes: when do you come to the anchor and when do you open up with choiceless attention? Or when do you spend some time with an emotion like fear?

If there's not much happening that's particularly strong in terms of physical pain or emotional difficulty, the general advice is to go to your anchor if the mind feels kind of distractible or a little unsettled, and collect the attention. When the attention is collected, open up in this choiceless way and see if the stability is there to really be with the parade of changing objects that the attention illuminates.

Please begin in a relaxed and comfortable way, perhaps just beginning the meditation period by coming to your anchor—breath or body or sounds—so that you feel you've made a connection to the present moment. Allow yourself to land for a bit in the present.

And then deliberately let the attention go free from its focus on the anchor. Open up to the expanse of phenomena that are our present moment experience. Then just notice where the attention lands in each new moment, making a direct mindful connection with that new appearance.

You might try in the beginning using notes—simple notes to describe the object: sound, a sensation, a thought, a mood, a breath. Or if that seems like too much activity, just be with the clear noticing of each new object that's being highlighted by the attention in this moment.

Morning Instruction - Expansive Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> In this guided morning meditation from a February 2014 month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong leads practitioners through an exploration of expansive awareness. Drawing on teachings about shifting attention from the content of experience to the knowing consciousness itself, this practice invites meditators to recognize awareness as vast, open space - like a clear sky in which all phenomena arise and pass away.
> The meditation systematically guides attention through sounds, bodily sensations, and mental formations (thoughts and images), teaching practitioners to experience each as temporary appearances within boundless awareness. Rather than focusing on the sense objects themselves, the practice emphasizes the field of consciousness in which knowing takes place. Armstrong uses skillful analogies - awareness as sky, sensations as glimmering stars, thoughts as rootless clouds - to help practitioners recognize the spacious, unbound nature of mind itself.
> This approach reflects classical vipassanā teachings on the investigation of consciousness (viññāṇa) and the development of wisdom (paññā) through direct observation of experience. The practice supports both samatha (calm) and vipassanā (insight) by establishing stability in open awareness while investigating the empty, unsubstantial nature of all phenomena. Particularly valuable for practitioners working with the cultivation of mindfulness and the development of non-dual awareness in meditation.

This morning there will be a guided meditation through the sitting period on the theme of expansive awareness, along the lines of the talk last night about this shift that can be helpful for some people—placing the attention less on the sense objects of experience and more on the knowing or the consciousness of them.

In this meditation, the term awareness will be used to refer to the field in which the consciousness or knowing is taking place. Please have a comfortable posture and one that you can be relatively still in for the period of the meditation. In this meditation especially, the stillness of the body will really help support the stillness of the mind.

Begin by bringing your attention to sounds. Any sounds from inside the room, sounds of one another, sounds of the building, the systems, the sound of my voice, and any sounds from outside. When no sounds are arising, just become aware of the vastness of the silence.

In opening your attention to sounds now, let the awareness become expansive and wide, able to take in all the sounds that come and go. The awareness is like a big clear sky or like empty space. All the sounds just appear and disappear in this vast empty space of mind. Awareness is like the sky—it's clear and empty. All the sounds simply come and go within this big empty space.

Not holding on to any sound and not resisting any sound. Just allowing all sounds to appear and disappear in this openness of awareness. This awareness is like the sky—it's clear and limitless. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Now become aware of sensations throughout the body. Sensations are just points of feeling, points of sensing. They arise and change, glimmering like the stars in the sky at night, all in this open space of awareness.

In the direct fact of our experience, there's no head, no shoulders, no back, no chest, no arms, no legs. Just points of sensation arising and changing, all in this open space of awareness. In this awareness, there's no inside and no outside. There are no boundaries, no separations—just sounds and sensations arising, passing, all in this open vastness of awareness.

Let the mind be soft, open, and still, not moving toward or away from any appearance. There's no inside and no outside. Just sounds and sensations arising, changing, passing in this vast open space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Now become aware of thoughts and images. Thoughts and images are just like clouds passing through the sky. They don't have any roots, they don't have any home. They just arise and drift and pass in this vast open sky of awareness.

Look at the nature of this mind. It's clear and invisible like vast space without any form or boundary. It exists, but it doesn't quite exist. It contains all things, but it's not composed of them. This mind is empty without any foundation. It's insubstantial like the sky. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own mind.

For the last few minutes of the sitting, put it all together. Sounds appear and disappear. Sensations arise as just points of feeling, points of sensing arising and glimmering like stars in the night sky. Thoughts and images drift like clouds, rootless and homeless, all within the vast empty space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

CHAPTER 136

Connection to Life

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this retreat talk, Guy Armstrong examines how our sense of self narrows consciousness through grasping and the construction of sakāya-diṭṭhi (personality view), creating separation and suffering. He explores how vipassanā and mettā practices naturally restore our connection to the broader web of life, drawing on the Huayan Buddhist image of Indra's jewel net and Suzuki Roshi's "big mind" teachings. Armstrong shares moving stories of interspecies compassion and human courage, including whale rescuers and civil rights pioneers like Thurgood Marshall, illustrating how genuine care transcends artificial boundaries. The talk culminates in an exploration of bodhicitta - the awakened heart that aspires to liberation for all beings' benefit. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's instruction to observe both internally and externally, and referencing the classical Theravāda teacher Dhammapāla's writings on the bodhisattva path, Armstrong shows how meditation reveals our fundamental interconnectedness and shared humanity, transforming isolation into universal compassion.

The topic for this evening's talk is the connection to life.

We've talked a number of times about how we construct this sense of self through the process of grasping and how that process of grasping, done over and over again, restricts our consciousness, restricts our heart and mind. It narrows and limits our relationship to life, our view of life. And it makes it, in that narrowness, feel contracted and painful. Of course, this is also reflected in the way we understand ourselves, in the way we view ourselves. From the child's very open, wide consciousness, it becomes more and more narrow, and our sense of ourselves gets more and more limiting.

This is based on how we construct a view of ourselves, which the Buddha called sakāya-diṭṭhi, the view about our personality or our being. We've talked about different ways that we do this, and I want to emphasize one other tonight, which is how we consider ourselves to be different.

When we are defining ourselves and our characteristics, we will often say things like, "I'm too tall" or "I'm too short," or "I'm not intelligent enough" or else "I'm smarter than everybody else," or "I'm really not good looking enough," or else "I'm better looking than everybody else," and then we get inflated. Or we make discriminations based on our skin color, or our sexual orientation, or things like that. In all these discriminations, we are, in a way, stepping ourselves into a corner by defining ourselves in these more narrow terms.

I think in a way, this is the project of ego: to make ourselves special with these self-definitions. In doing that, what we end up doing is separating ourselves out a little bit from the whole family of humanity. So it's no wonder that we start feeling alone, isolated, cut off, or disconnected from the world, from life, from the human family, because our thoughts are running over and over about what's different about us.

When was the last time you thought, "Wow, just like everybody else, I've got two eyes and a nose. That's fantastic"? This sounds trivial, but we don't reflect along those lines. We seldom reflect on what we share. We reflect on how we're different. This carries over into many walks of life—politics and couple relationships and work relationships and so on. We so often focus on what's different, and that's what divides us and brings us apart.

But we can correct that imbalance, and meditation opens us to that very naturally by reminding ourselves of the breadth of life and what we share with that breadth of life. This project of ego, which is about making ourselves special, comes with a price tag, which is an increasing sense of loneliness or disconnection. This is especially prevalent in the West today because the extended family has kind of broken down and communities have kind of broken down. So those normal ways of finding connection are not so available for us. In the West, I think we're more isolated than most other cultures.

Researchers in the West are finding that this sense of isolation that we live with is one of the deepest sources of our suffering. Scientific researchers have discovered this, and consequently, healing this kind of disconnection can bring a much more fulfilling sense of human life.

Part of the work of our meditation is to allow the heart to relax its grasping and relax that really narrow focus and open back up to this wider sense that we came in with, and how that wider sense unveils the sense of interconnectedness to life. So that's the theme I want to explore tonight.

In this opening and widening, there's a lot of potential for greater ease, greater peace, greater harmony with life because we're part of the whole flow. We're not stuck out on some isolated margin, but we really see how we're part of the whole flow.

This undoing is accomplished through both vipassana and mettā. Both of them have important roles to play, so I want to talk about how they both do that.

Through vipassana practice, when the emphasis is taken off the contraction, the mind naturally opens, the heart kind of expands, and we sort of have room to look around. A lot of people talk about the openings of vipassana as creating more space. So it creates more space, the pressure is off the heart, and in that we kind of relax and breathe and we look around and what do we see? Oh, there are a lot of other people here. So it opens us up to that.

In fact, the foundations of mindfulness point to this directly. One is encouraged to be mindful internally and externally. So we become aware of our own body and feelings. We're also instructed: pay attention to the bodies and feelings of those around us. So this happens naturally as part of vipassana practice.

Through mettā, we start to tune into other beings' states of happiness and unhappiness, and that becomes of concern to us. We start caring through mettā, compassion, muditā, about how other people are doing and feeling. In that, our hearts get connected. We get put together with others. And we also see some other similarities that are beautiful.

This kind of interconnectedness that exists, but that we often overlook, is summarized in an image from an ancient school of Buddhism called Huayan Buddhism that was popular in China from early years, like the sixth to eighth centuries, somewhat up until the present time.

And the image that they spoke of is called the Jewel Net of Indra. In this teaching, Indra is a great god from the Hindu pantheon, and the image describes how Indra has created this universe as a vast net of rope—strands extending horizontally and vertically throughout all three dimensions of existence. At every intersection where two ropes meet, there hangs a gem: transparent jewels of different sizes, colors, and shapes—some clear, some red, some green, some blue.

The beautiful quality of each gem lies in its clarity and transparency, which reflects all the other gems throughout the net. When you look into any single gem, you see the whole universe reflected within it. This is the profound image of the Jewel Net of Indra—each gem holds and reflects all the other gems because of its transparency, which is another way of speaking about its emptiness.

This serves as a model for us as sentient beings. Every human being, every conscious creature, reflects all the other beings in the world, in the universe. This reflection is possible because of our own intrinsic emptiness.

Our situation begins to become apparent as we deepen our meditation practice and open to this wide, choiceless awareness in which all experiences of the senses simply come and go—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions—all arising within this vast awareness. Among those sights are all the other sentient beings.

In this way, each of us holds a universe. Each of us is a universe because of this transparent consciousness that we embody. This is how we function—our consciousness, our awareness, is like a sky that is essentially empty yet can hold everything that arises, the way vast space embraces all phenomena.

This understanding points toward what we explore in Big Mind meditation. As far as I know, the term "big mind" was coined by Suzuki Roshi and appears in Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, where he writes: "Big mind experiences everything within itself. That everything is included within your mind is the essence of mind. To experience this is to have religious feeling."

I cherish this statement—when we realize that everything exists within our own mind, we have a religious feeling. This realization emerges from our vipassana meditation and provides that profound sense of connection.

You can experience this immediacy anytime you choose to tune into it. You are part of my experience right now, and I am part of your experience. Or we could say that you are in me right now, and I am in you right now. This is how we interpenetrate each other, and this is what the Vietnamese teacher Thich Nhat Hanh means by "interbeing"—we inter-are with each other.

We don't need to reach out to connect with one another; we simply need to recognize how we're already part of each other. Vipassana helps us see this through the open awareness that includes everything. Metta helps us recognize this because our hearts naturally begin to connect—we start caring about each other's wellbeing.

One discovery we make through exploring metta practice is that all beings share the same fundamental wish: to be happy and free from suffering. We are all alike in this essential desire. The many discriminations we make based on body shape, skin color, gender, or even species—while these may be valid distinctions—often obscure this profound similarity, this aspiration we all share.

Sometimes this truth breaks through to us powerfully, even across species. I treasure this story reported several years ago in the San Francisco Chronicle about a humpback whale. You may know that off the California coast, there's a sizable population of humpback whales that migrate seasonally—traveling south to Mexico for winter calving and mating, then north to California waters for summer and fall feeding. They grace our waters during both legs of their journey.

This particular humpback whale was migrating south in early December. She was magnificent—perhaps fifty feet long, weighing something like forty-five tons. Swimming about ten miles offshore, directly west of here near the Farallon Islands, a protected conservation area that also hosts crab fishermen who set their pots—heavy clay vessels suspended by floats on nylon ropes, dangling in the water.

As she swam through these waters, she became entangled in multiple crab pot lines—about twelve lines total, some wrapped around her body four times over.

They went around her back, they went around her tail, they went around her flipper, and one of them went right through her mouth, looped through her mouth. So the problem is that the clay pots are quite heavy, something like 90 pounds each, and she was carrying a lot of them—something like 12 or so pots were weighing her down. So not only was she tangled up, but the weight of them was carrying her down and she was really struggling to keep her blowhole above water so that she could breathe.

A fisherman went by and discovered her. But he didn't know what to do. He was in a small fishing boat. He didn't know what to do. So he contacted the Marine Mammal Center on the California coast and told them what was going on, and they said, "Wow, we've got to take care of this whale." So they sent a boat out with some divers, and they reached her. It was a few hours later, so she'd already been struggling and getting tired and probably exhausted when the divers showed up.

Then they looked at the situation and thought, "Wow, this is kind of a mess. How are we going to free her? This is not easy." The lines were cutting into her skin. So they were embedded in her flesh. And the divers said, "You know, if we go in the water, one flip of her tail could drown us. What should we do? Should we protect ourselves and just let her find her own way?" But they decided to go in.

So four of them dove in and they had these special knives, curved knives, and they worked very carefully around her, sawing, sawing, sawing through each place where the ropes were hanging off her—the body, the tail, the flipper. And one of the divers was working right around the mouth.

This diver who was working around the mouth said, "When I was cutting the line going through her mouth, her eye was there winking at me, watching me. It was an epic moment of my life." Can you sort of imagine that communication and that connection?

All the divers said that as they were working, the whale was just floating very passively—no longer struggling, but just kind of surrendered to what they were going to do with her. They kept cutting, cutting, cutting. It took a couple hours, but they finally cut all the ropes and pulled them away, and she was free.

Then the divers reported: when the whale realized she was free, she began swimming around in circles in apparent joy. She then swam up to each diver, nuzzled him, and then swam to the next one. "It felt to me like she was thanking me, knowing that she was free and that we had helped her," one of the rescue divers said. "She stopped about a foot away from me, pushed me around a little bit and had some fun. She seemed kind of affectionate, like a dog that's happy to see you. I never felt threatened. It was an amazing, unbelievable experience."

I think it's really beautiful, this kind of connection. All of us can feel that. You feel that when you see the deer around here? Someone mentioned running into a group of five deer on a trail the other day and just looking into that glistening eye and the deer not being afraid. The beautiful moment of being touched by that contact, by that connection. We feel their vulnerability because we know our vulnerability. So it kind of opens up into this universal quality of loving-kindness, this universal nature that all of us share.

I want to read a little more from a poem I mentioned earlier called "Kindness" by Naomi Shihab Nye. She says:

"Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say it is I you have been looking for, and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend."

So metta is likened in the text to a gentle rain that falls everywhere without discrimination. And someone else mentioned in an interview that they felt the metta bringing this moisture to the heart, bringing a dampness. And that moisture is the opposite of dry—a juiciness to the heart. This image of the rain is beautiful because it has this universal quality.

The Buddha offered another reflection about this universal quality. He taught often on the theme of birth, death, and rebirth. And he said that all of us have gone through countless lives, being born, dying, passing away, and reappearing in another body, living that life, dying, passing away, reappearing in another body. And he said, because of all the different lives that we have lived in proximity to other beings, "it is not easy to find a being who in some previous life has not been your mother or your father or your sister or your brother or your son or your daughter."

Now I don't know how you feel about your family of origin, or this theory, but what if we all were connected like this? What if we all had been so intimate with each other in lifetimes before? What if I had been your mother? Would you want to care for me? Look after me? I think we might.

This is a line from the sutta that we've been chanting most evenings: "Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world, spreading upward to the skies and downward to the depths."

There's another story that comes to mind about this that I really like. Jack Kornfield was the founding teacher here. He has a daughter who recently completed law school at UC Berkeley and decided to become a human rights lawyer. That's what she's doing now, really great service work.

While she was still in law school, she would travel back and forth between Berkeley and Woodacre. On one of her drives back to Woodacre with a friend, they were driving past Larkspur Landing, where the ferry comes in—a big six-lane road. The traffic was backed up unusually, with honking and everything moving really slowly.

As she got closer, she could see that the cars were stopped because there was a mother duck and five babies trying to get from the shoreline side of the six-lane road over to where the ferry was located so they could jump back in the water. They were trying to cross these six lanes of traffic, and cars were stopping and braking while people grew impatient and honked horns. But they kept trying to drive around the ducks.

So Caroline and her friend pulled up, stopped the car, got out, and blocked the other two lanes of traffic. They just told people to stop. The mother duck and the little ones crossed over to the center divide. Caroline thought, "Cool, all okay." But then they couldn't quite get up on the center divide—the mother could, but the little ducks couldn't quite make it up. So Caroline and her friend went and pushed them up onto the divide.

Then they hopped down on the other side, and the same thing started happening in the other direction. The other three lanes started braking, swerving around, honking, people getting upset. So Caroline and her friend went over to that side, still leaving their car totally stopped in one lane, and stopped the traffic so this family of ducks could cross the other three lanes and head toward the water.

"Just as a mother would protect with her life her child, her only child." I thought that was a beautiful, spontaneous act of metta toward these creatures.

The practice of the brahmaviharas—loving-kindness, compassion, and joy—really opens this channel of connection for us. This is from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche:

"It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to put too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for compassion. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity, or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate.

A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound, which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief."

So this tenderness that's there for us, that opens through compassion and metta, is felt as a sensitivity, as a little vulnerability. It's not always so easy. But this tenderness and connection opens up so many wholesome qualities for us.

Even our practice of sila, of taking care with our conduct, is really an expression of this metta and compassion. We care for others through our conduct. We practice the precepts out of this sense of connection.

There was this beautiful story of the Dalai Lama being interviewed by Oprah Winfrey. I have tremendous appreciation for what Oprah has brought to our world because she takes these beautiful teachings—many dharma teachings—and spreads them to a wider audience than anybody else I know. She has featured, for example, our own James. Her endorsement of his book and his class brought many people to benefit from his teachings. She recently did a TV series with Jack, and she's featured Joseph Goldstein in a discussion on wise relationships—how to be in relationship without too much attachment.

After that encounter, we could affectionately call Joseph "Dr. Love." In this particular case, Oprah was interviewing His Holiness the Dalai Lama for an article that would appear in her magazine, O.

She began by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied simply, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said with surprise.

"An insect, hmm, okay," she continued, trying to process this response.

The Dalai Lama went on, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a good life. That's a great life—to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

That's a beautiful mind. That's a beautiful heart. I really feel that this purity of sila he's describing—this non-harming—is part of what allows his mind to settle in such a deep way and permits that compassion to flow through him so clearly.

As we develop these qualities of metta and compassion in our own practice, we really feel that heartfelt wish for ourselves to come out of our own suffering, and we start to genuinely wish that others come out of their suffering. This is part of the opening of the eye to the rest of the world, to the situation that other human beings are in, that other creatures and animals are in. We open our hearts to the suffering of others and feel we would really like, if we can, to help them come out of their suffering.

When we feel metta and compassion in this kind of boundless way, we can enter a reflection that asks: What would be the best way I could help others truly come out of their suffering? There are many routes to help people come out of their suffering. There are so many needs in the world, so many ways to help people.

One path to help people is to help them awaken. If you really want people to go beyond all forms of suffering and reach the highest happiness—the most stable happiness—the aspiration might come: "I'd like to help other people to awaken."

When that aspiration arises, you can use it as part of your own motivation. Because how can you best do that? It's to awaken yourself. So we can take this aspiration to help others and bring it back as motivation: "I want to become free so I can help others move beyond the bounds of suffering."

This particular wish and motivation has a special name in the tradition. It's called bodhicitta. It's something we can practice, something we can develop. Bodhicitta literally means—bodhi means enlightenment or awakening, and citta means heart or mind. So you could call it the awakened mind, or what I prefer: the heart of awakening. We develop this quality, which is the heart of awakening, to awaken for the benefit of other beings. This can become part of our practice.

Sometimes when you're having trouble finding your own personal motivation, you can reflect: "It's difficult for me right now, but I really want to wake up to be in a position to help others wake up." That can help beautify and dignify the work we're doing.

This aspiration is not necessarily a huge flame in the beginning. It can be just like a little candle flame compared to our motivation to come out of our own suffering. But there's something quite beautiful about it. Even the Dalai Lama expresses it this way: "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration. Deep inside me, I realize how valuable and beneficial it is. That is all."

So this is an aspiration that we can develop. Carol spoke about it when she discussed the three excellences.

At the beginning of every sitting or walking or day of practice or retreat, we can make this aspiration: "Through the benefit of my practice, may I awaken for the welfare of all sentient beings," or something like that. You can say this at the start of every sit to remind yourself, if it's true for you, that part of the reason we practice is to benefit other beings.

Trungpa Rinpoche put it this way, continuing from the earlier quote: "There's also an inner wound called Tathagatagarbha, or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize our whole being is made up of one complete sore spot altogether. This is called bodhisattva fever." That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore.

So this is the development of bodhicitta, the sense of a compassion and care that can encompass all beings everywhere. And it really starts to matter to us. This is from the hermit monk Ryokan, who was a Japanese Zen teacher: "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all the people in this fleeting world" – that wish that we could gather up all the suffering in this fleeting world.

So our practice takes on a flavor – it may not be the central element, but it takes on a flavor of motivation that we're really involved in this work for all beings, for the welfare of all beings. And it moves from being a nice phrase to being something that we feel in us.

I was sitting a long retreat at IMS one year in Massachusetts, and it was getting into wintertime. It was a November-December time period, and I liked to walk outdoors. The cold was coming in, the nightfall was coming early, the rain and occasional snow flurries were coming. It was late November, and I was feeling a little lonely. You know how autumn comes in and you start to feel, wow, it's really dark and the leaves are falling. I was starting to feel a little lonely.

But there was this stone wall that I was walking along, right beside my walking path. Very often this little chipmunk would poke up on this stone wall. He'd sort of pop up and look around a little bit. If I was still, he'd hang out there a little bit. If I moved too quickly, he'd just run away. And chipmunks are incredibly cute, you know – they sit up like this and they've got that little stripe, black stripe running down their back. They look around and then just dash into a hole to stay safe. So occasionally I would violate all wildlife warnings and bring him down some peanuts from tea and leave them out for his winter stash.

Then one day, a friend came to visit the center. He knew some of us who were on the retreat, and he'd brought us a little gift. So there's a note on the board: check the box where the managers leave things, there's something for you. I go to the box, and there's this piece of chocolate cake, which he had brought as a gift for a few of us who were on the retreat. That was very heartwarming. And delicious.

But something that was equally heartwarming was the note he wrote, just sending his love and expressing his wishes that I have a good retreat. His love for the Dharma really came through in the note. And then the last line really hit me. It said, "All beings are cheering you on."

And I really thought about that. All beings are cheering you on. And of course, some of them aren't. But if they knew what we were up to, they would be. It's just that they don't understand. But if they understood, all beings would be cheering us on. So I had this image then of the chipmunk sort of standing up and going, "Go, guy, go!" as I was walking. Very moving.

Sometimes this compassion really comes across from a very tender and soft and vulnerable place. And sometimes it comes out really strong. Sometimes it has to be very, very firm. So I'm thinking about the people who were in the civil rights movement in the fifties and sixties and actually before that. We know a lot of these names – Dr. King and John Lewis and Ralph Abernathy. They've become somewhat famous.

And somebody that I didn't know a lot about until recently, but who I really think is a great hero of that movement, is Thurgood Marshall. So Thurgood Marshall was a lawyer who started working for the NAACP at their headquarters in New York in 1936. And he was very thoughtful about the way he approached his work. He wanted the NAACP to limit their legal cases to issues that he thought would really transform the welfare of especially African Americans in this country. And so he said, we want to focus particularly on education issues, on voting rights, and on capital punishment cases, because that's where he saw clear discrimination going on in the society and in the court systems.

So he went on to be the lead counsel for the NAACP, and he was the lead attorney who won the decision of Brown versus Board of Education, which overturned segregated schooling in this country—that 1954 Supreme Court decision that opened the way for school integration. And then in 1967, he was nominated by Lyndon Johnson to be on the Supreme Court. So he became the first African-American member of the Supreme Court.

When he was a rising star on the NAACP legal team, he would go down south, because that's where the most egregious violations of rights were going on, and he would go to trials to defend black people in the midst of these white communities that would have a white judge, white prosecutor, white police, and often all white juries. And he said of many of his cases, he never expected to win them. But he went down hoping to find some mistake on the part of the courts that could later be overturned on appeal. And he did that often. He would maneuver the prosecutor into making some overstep that could later be grounds for a retrial. So he was very successful on getting cases appealed.

But every time he went, he began to realize his life was in danger. There's this one case in 1946. He was defending 25 black men who had been accused of rioting and attempted murder in a small town in Columbia, Tennessee. And in fact, they had been provoked and they weren't really attempting to murder anyone, but they were on trial again with white judge and all-white jury.

So Marshall was a very skilled lawyer. And one by one, he managed to win the release, the acquittal of every one of the 25 defendants. So he was down there with other members of his team, and at the end of the case, they freed the last defendant. And they said, wow, now we can celebrate. Let's go back to Nashville where we have supporters. Let's go back to Nashville and we'll really celebrate.

And they were leaving town at night to drive to Nashville. As they were driving down the road, they were pulled over by the local police, who of course were white. And the police chief said to Marshall, you're drunk. I'm going to arrest you. Get in this police car. Marshall hadn't had a drop to drink. But they pulled him into a police car and they told the other two lawyers, you go on your way. Keep going wherever you're going. You're going to Nashville. Keep going. Get out of town. We don't want you around here.

And they took Marshall in the police car. And where they drove him was down to this river where a bunch of other white people had assembled. And they were probably carrying Ku Klux Klan symbols and so on. And Marshall had happened to know that that site was the site of a number of killings of black men and lynchings. So there he was, all on his own, surrounded by this angry white mob who hated the fact that he had come into their town and gotten 25 men freed. And he was quite sure that he was going to be killed. In 1946, it would have been the end of his career.

And as he's standing by the river and getting intimidated by the police, another car starts coming down the lane. And it's his two lawyer friends who had not gone on to Nashville but had turned around and followed the police car and showed up on the scene. And where that mob felt they could get away with killing one person, they didn't feel they could do it in the face of two witnesses. And so they let him go.

So Marshall lived to fight another two decades of court cases for the NAACP, knowing every time he went to the South that his life was in danger, that he could face hostility, assault, murder. And yet, he cared so deeply about the suffering that was going on, he never hesitated. Never hesitated to show up and do what he thought was important to be done.

So this is a kind of compassion that's so strong that one is willing to put one's life on the line for what one believes, as difficult as it is to do that.

There's one other story I'll tell along these lines. I'll try to make this one brief.

Mahagosananda was a Cambodian monk. He died a number of years ago. When the Khmer Rouge took power in the 1970s, you probably know they killed most of the educated class in Cambodia, and they killed off most of the monks and nuns. They killed about two million people while they were in power under Pol Pot in the 1970s.

Maha Gosananda was not killed because he was practicing in Thailand. He was living in Thai monasteries doing Buddhist practice and was out of the country. But something like sixteen or seventeen members of his family were killed in that genocide while he was away.

The Khmer Rouge were pushed out in 1979, and refugee camps had been established along the Cambodian border with Thailand. A lot of Cambodians had fled there to seek safety from the genocide. Gosananda then went to the refugee camps and started living there, ministering to the people who had fled, who were all Buddhists by upbringing, by culture. He was one of the few senior Buddhist teachers left because most of them had stayed in country and had been killed in the genocide.

Gosananda started teaching and people started coming in large numbers to hear him. What he started teaching was having them chant the stanzas from the Dhammapada. He passed out leaflets that had a chant in Pali and a Cambodian translation. He got all these huge numbers of people chanting. And the chant that he had them do was: "Hatred never ceases by hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is an ancient and eternal law."

These were people who had lost their families, their property, to the Khmer Rouge. And he's teaching them to chant, "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love."

The Khmer Rouge had infiltrated the camp as well. They were still active, even though they weren't the head of government. And he began to receive death threats. So his supporters said, "We want you to seek asylum in France. We're going to take up a collection. We want you to take a train to Bangkok and then a flight to Paris. Otherwise, we think you're going to get killed."

They gave him the money, put him on a train, sent him up to Bangkok and thought, "Great, now he's safe." About five days later, he shows up back in the camp. He'd taken the money they'd given him and bought ten thousand more leaflets that said, "Hatred never ceases through hatred." He got more and more people chanting at the risk of his own life.

This is the kind of compassion that's really dedicated, that is really strong.

Other ways that we separate ourselves out: body image is one. We often think about our body with quite a lot of different feelings. We might be proud of the way it looks. We might be more likely a little embarrassed about the way it looks—it didn't come out quite right. And we often take it very personally. We can take our body really personally.

But when you think about it, did you have anything to do with the basic way your body turned out? Whether you're tall or short, your shoulders are broad or narrow, the color of your eyes, your hair, your skin—did you choose any of that? We kind of forget that, don't we?

The body's just part of physical nature. Think about it: your mother's egg met with your father's sperm, and it gestated for a while, and then it popped out, and it got food and water and sunshine and air. Then all by itself, it just grew up to be whatever it's going to be—a little influenced by diet and exercise and things like that, but basically, it's just a physical process.

And yet we take it very personally. We can. And on the basis of that, we separate ourselves out: "I'm not good enough. It's not good enough. It should have come out different." Not ours.

Not our problem.

So that's why Ajahn Buddhadasa said, and I think Greg mentioned this quote earlier, this body came out of nature. It's part of nature and it belongs to nature. So give it back to nature. That'll be a great relief for you.

And similarly, really, with our thoughts and emotions. We can take some of our emotions very personally, thinking we're the only one in the world who knows this kind of embarrassment or shame or fear or grief or loss or sadness. And yet, again, if we look around, we see every human being has this same range of emotions—all the beautiful ones of love and joy and happiness and contentment and all the difficult ones. They're in this whole package. They're all there together.

Can we open and just allow them to be part of our mind's nature? There's a mental nature just as much as there's a physical nature. And for human beings, mind's nature includes this whole range of emotions. So can we just let them be there? Some of them are beautiful, some of them are painful. Whatever they are, can we let them be as part of what nature has offered? We didn't create them. We didn't ask for them. Nature delivered them.

So if we can hold this physical body, hold these emotions in that space of metta, letting them assume their own nature, then they open up and transform.

This is from an Australian poet named Michael Leunig: "When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring."

So we open our heart to the forces of nature and that heals us. Loving kindness heals us. Compassion heals us.

We can turn our attention to this underlying unity that's below all the differences. Are we really fundamentally more different or more alike? Which is bigger? We all have basically the same body—they're just these small variations. We all have basically the same emotional package. It's just different combinations.

So the way it feels to me is we're all one organism that just takes different forms. Or you could say it's like one heart that's been poured into different vessels and then put through different life experiences. But that quality of heart, I think we all share. We all have that vulnerability. We have some fear. We have some tenderness. We have some love. The heart is very, very similar.

I'm sure you know Rumi very well, and his teacher was said to be a man named Shams who came from the town of Tabriz. Not much is known about Shams, but one poem supposedly has been preserved, and I'd like to read that:

"I, you, he, she, we—
In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

I'll read it again: "I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

In the garden of metta and vipassana, these are not true distinctions either. The true distinctions are qualities of heart and mind and body that we all share.

So we can remind ourselves of this. We can remind ourselves of this deep unity that is always there underneath all the perceived distinctions. And in fact, we can start to choose whether we want to perceive distinction or unity, which is probably more healing. Perceiving the unity is probably more healing, and that's one of the reasons that the Brahma Viharas are such beautiful practices, because we come back to these simple wishes we all share for safety, for happiness, for health, and for ease.

And then as our hearts and awareness open up, we see we're all in the same situation. And to the extent that we can help one another, we want to help one another.

If it really is the same heart, but just in different packages, don't we want to free it everywhere? We don't have to stop with one package, because it's the same problem everywhere. Don't we want to free it everywhere?

This can become part of our motivation—the aspiration to free the heart wherever it appears. This is the journey of bodhicitta. One who is carrying out this journey is said to be a bodhisattva—one who aspires to awaken for the benefit of all other beings.

I want to close with this quotation from a Theravadan teacher, Acharya Dhammapala, from somewhere around the sixth century. He's not very well known, but he was a Sri Lankan teacher whose work appears in a beautiful book called "Treatise on the Paramis." Sometimes people say the bodhisattva ideal is not found in Theravada, but here is a Theravadan teacher from 1,500 years ago where the bodhisattva ideal is clearly articulated.

Dhammapala writes: "Through wisdom, the bodhisattva brings himself across the stream of becoming. Through compassion, he leads others across. Through wisdom, the bodhisattva understands the suffering of others. Through compassion, she strives to alleviate their suffering. Through wisdom, he aspires for nibbana. Through compassion, he remains in samsara. Through compassion, the bodhisattva trembles with sympathy for all. But because compassion is accompanied by wisdom, her heart is unattached."

Let's just sit for a minute together with this beautiful teaching: Through compassion, the bodhisattva trembles with sympathy for all. But through wisdom, her mind is unattached.

CHAPTER 137

Delighting in the Wholesome

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this dharma talk from a February month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses the unique challenges of extended practice and introduces 'delighting in the wholesome' as the essential energy (vīrya) needed to sustain deep spiritual work. He outlines three fundamental aims of practice: brightening the mind, finding inner peace, and developing understanding. Armstrong explores the Buddha's three bases for meritorious action - dāna (generosity), sīla (ethical conduct), and mettā (loving-kindness) - as practices that naturally uplift the heart and create sustainable happiness. He then examines the path to liberation through samatha (tranquility) and vipassana (insight), focusing on sammā-samādhi (Right Concentration) and sammā-diṭṭhi (Right View) as doorways to freedom. Drawing from personal experiences in Burmese monasteries and teachings on the Four Noble Truths, Armstrong demonstrates how understanding dukkha (suffering) and its cessation forms the foundation of the Noble Eightfold Path. The talk concludes with an inspiring account of Ajahn Liem's awakening, illustrating the genuine possibility of complete liberation from suffering in this very life.

The subject of tonight's talk is delighting in the wholesome.

At the end of the second day, as Sally pointed to last night, it's quite easy to remember that what you are undertaking is not an easy thing to do. With a week-long retreat, you can kind of blast through because the end is in sight. But when you start a month-long retreat, the end is too far out there. You lose track of it. You get into a month-long retreat and you can't see the end. It's sort of like you're here forever, for a while. It's going to feel like this retreat goes on forever, and that presents its own challenges and difficulties on top of the normal retreat experience.

I remember coming to the end of my first month-long retreat. There was one fellow who was finishing at the same time, and he'd gotten to the center a couple of months before me. I thought, "Wow, he's been practicing for months longer than I have. He must be really far along by now." So at the end of the retreat, I went up and asked him the only thing I really wanted to know: "Does it get any easier?" He said, "Not as far as I can tell."

But that was just after a few months. After a number of years, I can tell you it gets a lot easier, and retreats become a lot more delightful than painful. But it takes a while. You just have to trust in the evolution of the practice.

Even for veteran meditators, when we go into retreat, at some point we usually get challenged to the limit of what we can do or hold or bear. It challenges our patience, our courage, our determination, and our ability to tolerate what's going on. Because of that, often in retreats during the first days, I would find myself thinking, "What would I rather be doing?" The list got fairly long—there are many things I would really rather have fun doing than this.

But the good news is we're here because we want to come out of suffering. If you're able to bear the difficulties and pain of the retreat experience, this experience does lead us out of suffering. It's just a question of whether we can stand it while it's going on, and whether we can find the inner resources to bear it. If we can—and I'm confident all of you will for the time you're here—you're going to feel at the end what it has brought you. It brings such great gifts that don't come any other way that I know of.

In tonight's talk, as in Sally's talk last night on mindfulness, I want to remind us why we're doing this and what we're up to in being here, because it does take a lot of work. Classically, this is a factor of the path. Effort is one of the path factors in the meditation section of the Eightfold Path, and it means, in classical terms, letting go of what we can that's unwholesome and developing what we can that's wholesome in the mind. It's those wholesome factors that lead us into happiness and eventually into freedom.

At several times in my practice lifetime, I've spent time with Tibetan teachers whom I really appreciate for the breadth of their vision and the openness of their hearts. I had the opportunity to practice with Tulku Urgyen Rinpoche, who was one of the great Dzogchen masters of the past century, while he was still alive, and took refuge with him in that lineage.

When you take refuge with a Tibetan teacher, you get a Tibetan name. My name was Urgyen Sandrul—Urgyen after him and his lineage, and Sandrul as the second word. Sandrul is the Tibetan word that corresponds to our word virya, which means energy for the practice. It's one of the factors of enlightenment, so it's a really important factor—energetic effort, something like that. But the way they understand it in Tibetan, it means delighting in what is wholesome.

So the energy that we apply to the practice is to delight in what is wholesome. That's all of what we're doing here, and that's what I want to talk about tonight: What are we doing here?

And I think we can all agree, whatever your aspiration, whatever your view of your Dharma practice, what we all share—demonstrated by our commitment to being here—is a deep love for what is wholesome. Without that deep love, you could not sustain yourself for a month's retreat or for a journey of a lifetime on the path. So let us all together delight in what is wholesome that we're doing here together.

While I was on retreat recently, I stepped back and took a high-level view of what practice is about for me and therefore what I understand teaching to be for. And things got really simple in a way that I wondered if I'm deluding myself. So I'm just going to tell you what I think. This is not from the Pali Canon. It's just from my own thoughts. See what you think of it.

It occurred to me that everything that we do in our practice and everything that we as teachers say to you is for one or more of three aims. There are really just three things I think that we're doing here.

The first is to brighten the mind. Brightening the mind means bringing about clearly wholesome qualities that bring joy, that bring energy, that uplift our spirits, that give us confidence and the energy to carry out this path. So that's the first part. Some instructions are to brighten the mind.

Another set of instructions has to do with finding inner peace. This is one of the greatest immediate benefits of our meditation practice. We find access to levels of peace that most people only touch for moments in a busy daily life. But we find a way to access them regularly and more and more to rest there, to abide with that peace. And that peace brings a great quality of contentment into our life.

And the third thing is that we are trying to understand more deeply the nature of things. We want to understand the nature of our human experience in a deeper way because ultimately it's the wisdom of seeing the way things are that frees our hearts and minds.

So I'm going to suggest that you think about your practice in these terms: brightening the mind, finding greater inner peace, and developing understanding. And you might keep these in mind over the whole month and see if they resonate for you. See if these are in fact where your practice is heading. All of these three are very wholesome factors. And they are factors that grow directly out of our meditation practice.

I also think that the first level of brightening the mind might be sufficient for finding what I'd call normal human happiness. There is a way of being happy and content in the world that's available to anyone who develops these factors of brightening the mind. And I'll talk more about the details when we get into that topic.

And then the qualities of peace and insight are really on another track, which is more than normal human happiness. It's the path to liberation. It's the path to really freeing the mind from the deepest roots of human suffering or the suffering of sentient beings.

So as I think of it, there are these two directions that one can take meditation practice and Dharma practice. One is toward normal human happiness and there are specific practices for that. And the other is to liberation and as much freedom as you care to reach and there are practices for that. And so one can orient one's path in one direction or both directions.

In fact, if you orient your path to liberation, to freeing the heart and mind, you will cultivate the qualities for normal human happiness as you go. So you might almost say that normal human happiness is a side benefit of the path to liberation. But if your approach is more about just finding a happy life in the world, then there is a way for that as well.

Both paths are respected in the Buddhist tradition. It's not that you have to sign up for the PhD course in our practice. Both paths are respected and wonderful things to do because bringing a life into the world that is a genuinely happy life is a great contribution to the world. The world needs your happiness. It needs your care and positive energy. It seems like especially now, but I don't know that the world has ever been any different. But certainly it needs it now. It feels to me like we're going through a dark era right now. But maybe it's always felt like that. I'm not sure.

All right, so I want to talk a little more about both of these directions. First, the path of brightening the mind.

The Buddha said that there are three activities that are what he called the bases for meritorious action. That means action that's really, really wholesome to do. So one of these is giving. One of these is virtue or sila or ethical conduct, whatever you'd like to call it.

And the person I was talking to about organizing this said, "Oh yes, that's wonderful. A lunch for the whole monastery would cost about $35."

$35 to feed 750 people lunch! I was just astonished. I said, "Well, my donor gave me several hundred dollars. What else could we offer?" And he said, "Well, we could sponsor lunch for a week, or we could sponsor breakfast and lunch for several days."

So we ended up sponsoring meals for quite a while with this donation. But what really struck me was the simplicity of their needs and how little it took to make such a meaningful offering.

And then I got to witness something extraordinary during my time there. Every single day, laypeople would come to the monastery to offer food. Not just once in a while - every single day. There would be families, individuals, sometimes groups of people who would arrive with enormous pots of rice, curries, vegetables, fruit. They would come at dawn to prepare the meal, and they would serve it to all 750 people with such joy and devotion.

I watched grandmothers bent over from age still insisting on serving the monks their food personally. I watched families who clearly didn't have very much materially speaking offer what they could with such genuine happiness. Children would come with their parents, learning this practice of generosity from the earliest age.

And what was so moving was to see how much joy it brought them. They weren't giving reluctantly or out of obligation. They were radiant. There was this quality of delight in their giving that was unmistakable.

This is what the Buddha was pointing to when he talked about dana as a basis for meritorious action. Generosity naturally brightens the mind. When we give - whether it's our time, our resources, our attention - something in us opens up. The tight, grasping quality of the mind relaxes. We feel connected to something larger than our small self and its endless wanting.

And it doesn't have to be dramatic gestures. It can be as simple as offering your seat on the bus, bringing flowers from your garden to a friend, volunteering an hour at a food bank, or listening deeply when someone needs to be heard. The scale matters much less than the spirit behind it.

Seven hundred and fifty people—about four hundred monks, one hundred and fifty nuns, and the rest a mix of laywomen and laymen. So we thought it would be nice to offer a lunch.

As you know, Burma is one of the poorest countries on the face of the earth. Because of the corrupt military dictatorship that has taken all the funds, they're rich in natural resources, but these have been controlled by the dictators and their cronies. So the people are very poor, generally very poor. And this monastery was out in the country.

I spoke with the clerk of the monastery, wanting to offer a lunch for dana, and he said, "I'm sorry, all lunches have already been sponsored for the next three months." The poorest country—one of the poorest countries on the face of the earth—and people had already pledged to provide lunches for seven hundred and fifty practitioners because they so valued what those people were doing.

Every day, I would come down for the meal, and there was a big whiteboard with the name of the family or village—sometimes it would be a whole clan that had offered the lunch for that day, because it was not cheap feeding seven hundred and fifty people. The donors would be sitting off to the side, watching the monks and nuns go through the line and fill their bowls with the food they had provided. Many of them were rural villagers who came dressed in their best clothes, and they would be so happy to witness this. They'd see Pauk Sayadaw, the head of the line—a monk with basically sixty years in robes, an acknowledged master all over the country—as the first to take his meal from their offering. And they would look so happy.

So this is the joy and the brightening that generosity gives. Where Buddhism has been implanted in the culture for a long time, you really feel this very strongly. The reason it's such an important part of dharma practice is that we might represent clinging or attachment like this with a closed fist, and generosity is the open fist that offers what we have to share with others. So it actually is a practice that undoes grasping and clinging and attachment. It also generates empathy because it makes us tune into other people's situations. We have to think about the needs of the people that we're offering to. And that brings happiness in itself.

I don't know if you see it this way, but one of the reasons I love the holiday season—whether it's Christmas or Hanukkah or Kwanzaa, they all are connected with giving gifts—is that it's a time of year when a lot of us are thinking about what we can get to give somebody that they will really enjoy having. And I find there's just this uplift of spirit around those times because of the practice of generosity. Of course, as a kid, I felt an uplift of spirit from a different motive, but the adults seemed happier then too, so that was nice.

If you think about giving to someone or think about a gift that you've given that was appreciated, how does it make you feel? You feel bright, don't you? Feel happy, a little bit uplifted. That's the beauty of generosity.

The second part of the brightening practice is about ethical conduct, or sila, sometimes called virtue. I don't think there's a great word in English to translate this quality, so I'm going to use the word sila a lot. That's the Pali term for it. Virtue sounds a little Victorian, and ethical conduct sounds a little too much like it came out of a philosophy class, so I just kind of like sila.

We took the five precepts together when we arrived, and this is the basis for sila for us as laypeople. Monks and nuns take many more precepts than this, but for us this is a good start. It involves, as you know, the commitment to not killing, not taking what isn't given, not using our sexuality in ways that will harm others, not speaking falsely, and not using drugs and intoxicants that cause heedlessness for us.

These are called and understood in our tradition not as commandments but as training precepts. In other words, we undertake these as part of dharma training to learn the habit of being considerate in our conduct. Sometimes it's not our natural inclination. There are many times when the forces in our own heart of greed, aversion, and delusion would lead us to break these precepts. But because we've taken the precepts as commitments, we restrain the acting out of greed, aversion, and delusion, which can cause suffering to us and suffering to others. So we hold back or restrain these forces from the mind that can cause harm so they don't come out in actions.

But we know we're not going to do it perfectly because these forces are strong in us. So we don't take the precepts thinking that we're going to keep them perfectly. We take them knowing we're going to break them. But that's okay because then we learn, "Oh, this is what happens if I don't follow the precept." So they're kind of like our educators. They're our guidelines to learn from. We just do the best we can. It protects others and in that it protects us also.

We were at a Christmas gathering with some friends and the invitation was just tossed out: "Do you have an aspiration for the new year?" This could be like a resolution, but being Buddhists, we tend not to take resolutions. So our aspiration—we were just asked to state our aspirations. Just on the spur of the moment, I said, "I'd like to go through the year without getting verbally angry at anybody." And so that's my intention or aspiration for the year. So far, so good, but we're only a month in. And United Airlines came really close to testing me on that one.

But so far, so good.

So we take the precepts to avoid causing suffering to others, and it benefits us as well. This is from the Buddha again: "The purpose of sila is for freedom from remorse." That means we don't reflect on our actions and feel bad about what we've done. And freedom from remorse is for gladness. So when we can look back at our actions and feel we haven't done things in violation of the precepts, that also brightens the mind. That brings a quality of joy to the mind.

And then the sequence goes on. The purpose of gladness is to let us settle into the present moment, and settling into the present moment is to see things as they are, and seeing things as they are is to awaken. So sila ties directly into the path of awakening.

Here's another thing the Buddha said about this. He said there are four kinds of bliss available to lay people. I think there are more, but here are his four: having enough money to get by, enjoying the money that we have, not being in debt, and being free of blame in our conduct. And he said of these, the greatest is the bliss of blamelessness—the bliss of reviewing our conduct and feeling it was not blameworthy.

The third of the brightening factors is loving-kindness. You could say generally it's about developing a really good heart. And loving-kindness is a good place to start. Loving-kindness leads naturally into other qualities like compassion and joy. So we see it as a beginning, and then it develops further.

All the brahmaviharas, which I think Bonnie introduced this afternoon, are states that uplift the heart and mind and bring gladness and brightness to us. So it's interesting, isn't it? Because metta is the quality of caring about ourselves, yes, but also others. It's interesting that caring about others brightens our own mind. This is an interesting thing to learn about—that caring about others brings satisfaction, fulfillment, gladness to ourselves. That's a beautiful discovery.

Once we have developed these qualities like love, compassion, and joy, if we practice them a lot, they get stronger, and then they become allies in times of difficulty. There are going to be times that we need the support of love, compassion, and joy. And if we've developed them well, that brightness of mind will be a really good ally for us.

To continue the Burma monastery story: I ordained at the start of the rains retreat. I was right back in robes, very quickly. I didn't have much time to adjust to the environment. And in the years since I had not been a monk, I'd sort of forgotten how to tie my robes. You may know that if you're wearing Theravadan robes, it's basically just a big sheet that you've learned to wrap around yourself and tie with a kind of sleeve. Part of it gets formed into a sleeve, but that's a roll that can easily roll off your left shoulder. So that was happening to me.

It's called the Rains Retreat for a reason. So the first two weeks that I was there, I hardly saw the sun. I think it was raining on average three inches a day. The meditation hall was about a fifteen-minute walk uphill from my cottage, so I had to do that something like six times a day for the scheduled sittings.

The practice was difficult. We were doing meditation on the breath just at the upper lip. This was the only place one was allowed to go twenty-four hours a day if you were awake that much. In sitting, in walking, and in anything else, we were just following the breath here. There was no other instruction. I came to Sayadaw and I said, "Well, what about when hindrances come up?" He said, "Oh, if you're sleepy, pull your earlobe. And if you're having aversion, do some metta. Otherwise, just stay here." So it was a very narrow focus. You couldn't really go to explore emotions, much less do loving-kindness or beam out energy at the trees. So that was very narrow.

The schedule was difficult. We were sitting eight hours a day. The shortest sitting was an hour and a half. The longest sitting was two hours. The biggest spider I'd ever seen in my life was building a huge web right on the porch of my cottage, which I'd see every time I went out.

In those moments of struggle, walking back from the dining hall in the rain, juggling my bowl and umbrella while Burmese devotees bowed by the muddy path, everything felt overwhelming. The meditation practice wasn't progressing as I had hoped—it was adequate, but far from inspiring. When I asked the Sayadaw about working with hindrances, his only advice was to "pull your earlobes," which felt insufficient for the depth of discouragement I was experiencing.

I had brought with me a photograph of the Dalai Lama, who represents for me one of the most inspiring human beings I have ever encountered. This image sat on a small altar I had created in my cottage. In my moment of greatest need, I turned to him with genuine supplication. "Your Holiness," I said, "I'm really struggling now. Do you have any advice for me?"

What happened next was extraordinary. An answer came, crystal clear and unmistakably in his voice—that distinctive, high-pitched, Indian-accented English that is so characteristic of his speech. I could hear him perfectly: "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Then, as suddenly as it had begun, the transmission ended.

The wisdom of these words struck me immediately. When would staying cheerful, optimistic, and confident not be helpful? This became my refuge during the remaining difficult moments. When discouragement arose, I would remind myself: stay cheerful, stay optimistic, stay confident. It will work out. While I couldn't always remember what cheerfulness actually felt like, this guidance provided an anchor.

What made this practice accessible was my previous cultivation of loving-kindness, compassion, and joy. Because I had spent time developing these wholesome mental factors, I retained some memory of their texture and quality. Even in my depleted state, I could sometimes call these bright states back into awareness.

This points to something profound about the practices of dana, sila, and metta—generosity, ethics, and loving-kindness. These practices genuinely bring brightness to the mind. When sustained over time, they create an ever-increasing sense of happiness and well-being. But what's most significant is that all three are fundamentally relational practices.

These are not solitary exercises conducted in isolation. They are practices that unfold in relationship—with other beings, with people, with animals, with life itself. They connect us to the web of existence, and it is precisely through these connections that brightness emerges. This is not merely coincidental; it reveals something essential about the nature of happiness and spiritual development. The sources of true brightness are found not in withdrawal from the world, but in our compassionate engagement with it.

And because they're relational practices, they're available to anybody. You don't have to be Buddhist to do these. You can find these same expressions, the importance of these, in all major religions that carry these as important values. This is also why some of these practices are getting so widespread in the world. Mindfulness is becoming—it's the new yoga. Just as yoga was in the nineties, mindfulness is now. It's in hospitals, it's in schools, it's in prisons, it's in sports.

This is a quote from Steve Kerr, the coach of the Golden State Warriors: "There are four values I try to instill in my team. They are joy, mindfulness, compassion, and competition." When I read that, I thought he was channeling James. I thought he'd taken James' Awakening Joy course when he said that. Of course, we don't have to do competition, but if you want to get into it... no, we won't go there.

Those are the qualities that brighten the mind. If you think about people you know who are truly happy, see if they don't embody generosity, conduct, and loving-kindness. In my experience, they do. These are the sources of human happiness.

Then we have this whole other track that's about freeing the mind. Of course, all of you are here for a long retreat, a month or two months. We're going to talk a lot about freeing the mind. We're going to assume that this is a track that you're interested in and a track that we will be encouraging you to be interested in for the time that you're here.

To the extent that we walk it, we free the mind to that extent. It can be walked to such an extent that the mind becomes fully liberated. In our tradition, that means from the forces—the internal forces of greed, of hatred, and of delusion. This is possible for a human being: to liberate the mind to that extent that those forces no longer operate within us.

The first of these I mentioned was the deep sense of peace. Traditionally, this is called the development of samatha. I think Sally mentioned that this morning. Samatha is usually translated as tranquility or serenity. The development of insight, which is the complementary half of that, is called vipassana. That's the name given to our meditation practice generally and is translated as insight meditation—the understanding that seeing things as they are is what frees the mind.

The Buddha said that this freedom from greed, hatred, and delusion is the highest form of happiness. This is what he called nibbana. This is where the path of mindfulness and the Eightfold Path is leading. It's heading in that direction. We can choose to walk it as far as we want, but for all of us, that's the direction that it's going in when we apply the factors of the Eightfold Path.

Let me talk briefly about the quality of peace and the quality of insight by focusing on two factors in the path. With peace, I want to talk about the path factor called Right Concentration, samma samadhi. This refers to a mind that has become composed, collected and stable in the present moment.

You've all experienced this to greater or lesser degrees. When you feel yourself really arrive in the present moment and you can connect with two or three breaths in a row and thoughts aren't shoving you away out of the moment for a while, that is the first indicator of this quality of samadhi or collectedness. I invite you to examine that experience because I think what you'll find is there's a strength and a stability in that way of being that is very satisfying, because it is starting to touch into this quality of inner peace. It gives the mind a great source of strength and that is satisfying.

Concentration develops just from frequent moments of mindfulness. The more continuous the moments of mindfulness are, the sooner the quality of steadiness will develop. You don't have to press for concentration. You don't have to think, "Oh, I'm going to try for concentration now." All you have to do is be mindful in each moment when you have a choice. The moments of mindfulness do the work of concentration.

Concentration can't be willed, can't be forced, can't be brought about by active volition. But by volition, you can pay attention. And moments of paying attention lead to this quality of being present.

This is just like a law of gravity—this is the way it happens. So don't think, "I can't do this. I'll never know concentration; it's beyond me." All you have to do is be mindful as much as you can, and this will develop.

I love this quote from Joseph's first teacher, Munindraji: "If you sit and know that you're sitting, the whole of the Dharma will unfold for you." This is the trust in mindfulness, just simple mindfulness. So this will bring about that sense of stillness and peace that then becomes the foundation for understanding. When the mind is still, it can see more clearly.

The insight piece is about understanding the nature of things. In the Eightfold Path, it's represented by the first two path factors, which are right view and right intention. Of these, I want to talk specifically about right view. It's the first step in the Eightfold Path, and it's the most important. All the eightfold path is there to generate the factor of right view. But we have to start with it so that we get on the right track from the beginning. Then everything else feeds into it. Concentration feeds into seeing things the way they are.

Classically, right view is defined as understanding the Four Noble Truths. Sometimes it's a little tricky—what does right view mean? Think of it as understanding the Four Noble Truths. We'll talk a lot more about these as we go, but the Four Noble Truths are suffering, the cause of suffering, the end of suffering, and the way to the end of suffering. Obviously, suffering and its end are the aim of the Eightfold Path. That's what the path is all about. That's what the Buddha's liberation teachings are all about.

Of course, this is a big field. The field of suffering is huge in our world, and it's always been huge. I want to read this from a research project: "According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed by positive logic that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be, given everything it must put up with. Nine out of ten of the respondents identified by just their initials for the purpose of the survey stated that they would give up completely if they knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail. In a personal note in the afterward, researchers stated that statistically speaking, life is, quote, 'just too much,' and as yet they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through it at all."

So, science confirming what we already know. You may feel like this sometimes—life is just too hard, or practice is just too hard. Unfortunately, your chance of getting something in the mail has gone away. Too bad.

The Four Noble Truths are all about understanding suffering and coming to its end. But the noble truths are not just things that we believe in. These aren't just concepts that we're supposed to adopt. The Four Noble Truths are calls to action, and every truth has its own call and its own action.

The first noble truth, the truth of suffering—the Buddha said it's to be understood. That's our call: to understand what creates suffering. Of course we want to understand it for ourselves. Where does our own personal suffering originate from? How is it created and maintained? This is a key focus for our practice during this period, during this month or two months. How does suffering arise in our direct experience, moment by moment? This is our call, especially on retreat. You all have generated the time and space in your life to devote to the examination of this question: How can I understand suffering and therefore hopefully release it?

In the world, and to some extent here too, we want to understand this on a broader level, not just our personal suffering. We also want to understand the social suffering and the suffering in the world that is avoidable if we understand correctly. I think some of the really important issues of our time involve understanding how our attitudes, which we haven't examined closely, may be helping to perpetuate racial injustice in the world.

For all of us to understand how our actions and our use of resources are contributing to the climate crisis that could overwhelm many human beings, many creatures, and change the environment for a long time to come. For us all to understand how our habits of eating are landing on the animals who have some role in the production of that food. What is the suffering like in their realm as they are slaughtered or as they are used for milk or eggs? These too are the direct result of our own actions.

So we want to understand these issues socially and in the world, and in retreat we especially want to look at our own suffering.

The second part, the second noble truth, tells us that the cause of suffering is to be abandoned, and that is identified as craving. So we are encouraged to abandon craving, which is a synonym for greed, hatred, and delusion. They cover the same ground. We're asked: how can we give up greed? How can we give up hatred? How can we give up confusion? First comes the acknowledgment that these are forces in our own hearts and minds. We are being asked to give up deep forces that are part of us.

There's this very moving scene in the movie Kundun, Scorsese's film about the life of the Dalai Lama. In it, he shows the young Dalai Lama being tutored when he still lived in the Potala Palace before the invasion of his country. His tutors were grilling him on the meaning of the second noble truth.

"The second noble truth is the cause of suffering is craving," he said.

"No, no, no, make it more personal. What does it mean to you?"

"The second noble truth—that's because I have craving."

"No, no, no, that's too general. What does it mean to you?"

Finally he said, "The cause of most of my suffering are the habits of my own mind."

"Oh, very good. Very good."

This is the pointer of the second noble truth. The cause of most of our suffering comes from the habits of our own mind. In this retreat we'll be led to see this again and again.

Now our own mind may have been shaped by forces way beyond our control or wish. It may have been shaped by childhood abuse or mistreatment, by prejudice and discrimination and the oppression of racism, by gender discrimination, homophobia—all sorts of forces in the world have shaped our minds. The world is generally not going to fix that. To fix that, we are going to have to look at what we have been left with. This is the area of the second noble truth.

The third noble truth is that the end of suffering is to be realized. This applies both long term—we are to realize the complete end of suffering in our path—but in the short term, any time we're suffering, that end of suffering is to be realized, is to be reached. How does that happen? By abandoning craving.

So in any moment in which craving has gripped us—which is the second noble truth, causing suffering—can we learn to release that and move temporarily into the third noble truth, the opening to freedom from that particular instance of craving? In this way, the third noble truth, the truth of the freedom from suffering, gets realized again and again and again in our practice. That's what we're here for: to learn how to move from the second noble truth to the third noble truth, from being caught to being free.

The way to the end of this suffering is the Eightfold Path, which we've talked about some and will continue to talk about. Specifically here, the development of the meditation portion supported by sila, leading to wisdom.

So, Right View. Sariputta, one of the Buddha's two great disciples, said that there are two conditions for the arising of Right View. The first is hearing the voice of another. That's all he said, but I find this really interesting. What I understand it to mean is we hear the voice of a spiritual friend or a teacher who comes from Right View. We hear someone like the Buddha or disciples speaking the correct understanding.

What this means to me is that Right View is contagious. We get it from other people. We get it from people who have walked the path before us and who have gone further on the path than we have. By listening to them and their understanding of the world, themselves, us, the path, and practice, that draws us into alignment with Right View—which is, as I understand it, the way the Buddha saw the world and saw our situation, centered around the Four Noble Truths. How do we orient our lives around suffering and its end as calls to action?

This is what Right View is about—orienting our lives around these truths. And this is the best environment I know of to do that. So, continuing to really listen as we attempt to talk about these truths as best as we understand them and can communicate them. Not that you have to agree with us on everything, but just to understand that part of what we're trying to do is share right view and align us all in that direction.

The second part is wise attention. Wise attention means: is your attention going into something that's going to be helpful for you? Because where we give our attention, there we give our energy. There we invest our care and the resources of our heart and mind. So a simple question is, where was your attention today? Was it on the Four Noble Truths? Could you see the suffering of the moment as a noble truth? Or was it going into a lot of thinking about personal problems?

Personal problems naturally arise—they have kind of the pull of gravity when we get into silence. If you've chipped a part of your tooth off, your tongue goes looking for it all the time, just keeps wanting to feel that chip that's absent. Personal problems are like that. When there's a personal problem in our mind, thoughts want to go there and try to figure it out. But thinking seldom gets us through personal problems. What tends to get us through personal problems is dropping to a deeper level of silence and having a new understanding.

So I want to recommend that as thoughts come up centering around personal problems, see if you can say, "Not now." Return the attention to the present moment. Giving attention to the present moment is wise attention, even if the attention is on a hindrance. In this moment, I'm feeling confused. Good. Mindfulness knows confusion. In this moment, I'm feeling worry. Good. Mindfulness knows worry. This is wise attention. But dwelling with thoughts isn't so helpful. We want to learn not to give all our attention in that direction.

So this is the unfolding of Right View and the Eightfold Path. And this is the way to free the mind, either a little bit or all the way. One of the things people ask, in retreat and in daily life, is: is that really possible, to free the mind all the way? Which is asking, is full enlightenment a real possibility today?

I want to close with this reading from the autobiography of a teacher named Ajahn Liem. Ajahn Liem is the current abbot of Wat Ba Pong in Thailand, which is the monastery founded by Ajahn Chah, who was Jack Kornfield's teacher and Ajahn Sumedho's teacher. This is a story of his practice when he was a monk under Ajahn Chah, going back to the year 1969. Ajahn Liem is older now, but this is from his practice when he was a younger monk, still practicing under the direction of Ajahn Chah.

"Around the middle of the rainy season, Luang Por Chah—Luang Por just means spiritual father, another word for Ajahn—encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity, so Ajahn Liem increased his efforts, and results became evident. Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit in meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m. and then stop to have a rest, but on this day I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture.

"A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body, as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, an experience of the whole body becoming completely light and at ease—cool, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness. This experience continued on throughout the whole year, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued on unchanging for many years, all from that one time.

"All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before—I don't know where they all disappeared to. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose. There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. The experience of this feeling has lasted continuously all the time since then."

There has been no change all the way up to the present day."

Let us sit together for a moment and allow these words to settle deeply within us. "Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any." This same state continues to last—stable, continuous, and without change.

What we have witnessed in Luang Por Chah's account is nothing less than the complete transformation that comes with the ending of suffering. This is not a temporary peak experience or a fleeting glimpse of peace, but the permanent establishment of the unconditioned. The kilesas that had tormented him simply vanished, leaving behind a peace that knows no disturbance.

When he says "questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any," we hear the voice of one who has crossed to the far shore. This is not the absence of pain or discomfort in the body, but the complete extinction of the mental suffering that comes from our resistance to life as it is. The heart that was once agitated by the endless arising and passing of phenomena now rests in unshakeable equanimity.

This teaching reminds us of what is truly possible through the path of Dhamma. It points beyond the gradual reduction of suffering to its complete cessation. Luang Por Chah's experience stands as a beacon, showing us that the Buddha's promise of liberation is not metaphorical but utterly real and achievable.

As we reflect on these words, let them inspire our own practice. The same potential for complete freedom lies within each of us, waiting to be uncovered through patient cultivation of mindfulness, wisdom, and letting go. The peace that Luang Por Chah found—stable, continuous, and unchanging—is the birthright of every sincere practitioner who follows the path to its ultimate completion.

May his example encourage us to practice with unwavering dedication, knowing that the goal is not merely the management of suffering, but its total transcendence.

CHAPTER 138

Day 3 Morning Instructional Sit

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> In this third day morning instruction from a February month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong provides comprehensive guidance for establishing mindfulness meditation practice. He begins by emphasizing panoramic awareness - recognizing that being present involves all six sense doors functioning together: bodily sensations, sounds, thoughts, emotions, and visual awareness. This broad field of experience becomes the foundation for developing sati (mindfulness) as an awake, alert intelligence.
> Armstrong introduces the concept of yoniso manasikāra (wise attention), explaining how choosing what to pay attention to skillfully shapes our understanding and insight. He guides practitioners through establishing different possible meditation anchors: whole-body breathing awareness, localized breath sensations at the nostrils or abdomen, sounds as objects of awareness, or body posture itself. The instruction emphasizes receptive attention rather than forced concentration, allowing natural stability to develop.
> Practical guidance addresses common meditation challenges including working with thinking mind and physical pain. When pain arises strongly, Armstrong suggests investigating it directly as a mindfulness object, observing its bare physical qualities while noticing any mental reactions like aversion or fear. He emphasizes how mental contraction around pain often intensifies suffering, while relaxed awareness can help soften both physical discomfort and emotional reactivity. This approach reflects the Buddha's teaching in the Sallatha Sutta about the difference between unavoidable physical pain and optional mental suffering.

Beginning as you sit here, just notice in a panoramic way everything that's in your experience. Notice that being in the moment is a situation where all the senses are alive and functioning.

As you sit, you can feel sensations through the body. You can hear sounds in the room or from outside. Thoughts are coming and going. There's a certain mood in the heart or mind. If your eyes are gently closed, there's maybe a grayish screen in the visual field, perhaps a few flecks of light or changes in color. This is the basic field for our meditation.

The key element at this moment is that you are alive and awake to all of it or any of it. That awake quality is the heart of mindfulness. Although we'll give different instructions about what to pay attention to within this broad field of awareness, never forget that the awakeness within the field is the main thing that we're emphasizing and developing.

As I talked about last night, wise attention means choosing intelligently what to pay attention to. What we pay attention to shapes our experience and will shape our understanding and insight. We'll give more specific instructions, but remember that they're all in the context of this awake, aware intelligence that takes place within the broad field of our whole sense experience. Body, mind, heart, and environment—it's all here in every moment.

As you sit within this broad field with your awake alertness, let that attention first fill the whole body. Have a sense that the awareness is pervading the whole body. The body is immersed in this awake awareness. Just connect with what it feels like to be sitting. If there are any obvious areas of holding, you can relax them. Let the eyes be soft, the jaw dropped, the shoulders not held, and let the belly be soft.

We want to have a mental attitude of relaxation in the experience of the moment, because we're not trying to make anything else happen. We're not trying to force any particular experience. We just want to be alive and awake to the experience as it's happening in this moment. So we can relax and trust that. You can trust your body to sit. You can trust your mind to do what minds do. And you can trust that awareness to know it. We're just sitting with this openness to the body, aware and in touch, letting the body be just as it is.

Now reconnect with that broader space of knowing by attending for a while to sounds. Let the awareness open in a 360-degree way, aware of any sounds that are coming and going. Sounds near you. Sounds throughout the hall. The sound of my voice. Sounds from outside. When things are very quiet, you can pay attention to the extent of the silence, the breadth of silence.

When sounds come, notice that you don't have to make any effort for them to be heard. You're just sitting in this relaxed way with an attention in the present, and every sound is known effortlessly, spontaneously.

Now reconnect with the sense of the body and the sitting posture. As you sit feeling the body, start to notice the impact of breathing. The body's experience changes every time you breathe in, every time you breathe out. We're just present with this same relaxed attention—not so much watching the body as feeling the body as it breathes.

There's not a separate watcher or observer, but we're feeling the body from within because the awareness is right with the breath. Just one experience of breathing and we're there to feel it.

If you like, you can continue to feel the breath through the whole body. If this is a comfortable anchor for you, it can be a very integrated way to develop this stability of attention. Or if you're comfortable experiencing the breath and it's clearer in a small area like the nose, the belly, or the chest, that's fine too. You can let the attention settle in one of those areas.

In this sense, the attention can just rest there. Again, in a very receptive way, just feeling the experience of breathing in and breathing out. Sometimes it can be helpful to add a soft mental note of "in" and "out" at the nose, or "rising" and "falling" at the belly or chest. But let the experience be 90% with the physical sensations of breathing. Just keep a fraction of the attention—10%—on the soft mental note.

If the breath serves as a good home base for you, a good anchor, then keep returning to it. Keep it in the forefront of awareness. Keep your attention there as much as possible. This will help stabilize the ability to be present.

If you find yourself getting tight around the breath, you can open up to feel the whole body again. Make the body posture your anchor. Or some people find that attending to sounds is a good anchor for them. The spaciousness and receptivity of hearing really helps the mind to relax and soften.

Hopefully over these days, you'll have found the best anchor for you in the sitting meditation—something that you can come back to again and again. It becomes your home.

Of course, as you're attending to the moment, thoughts will come that are seductive enough to carry us away with their content. We'll follow a train of thoughts for a few seconds, a few minutes, or twenty minutes. This is natural. This happens as the meditation develops.

So when you notice that you have been thinking, appreciate the return to the present moment. Acknowledge that the thoughts are there, and then choose to reconnect with what's happening—breath, body, or sounds. Reconnect with your anchor.

Other times you might find it hard to stay with the anchor because of some pain in the body. When pain becomes strong, it has a powerful call on the attention, and you might feel that you'd have to struggle to keep attention with the anchor. If that's the case, don't struggle with it. Let the attention go to the physical sensation of the pain. Let your awareness go right into the experience of pain.

The pain isn't actually a threat, but it can feel unsettling. So take the pain as the focus for mindfulness. Let yourself open to feeling it in its bare physical nature—pressure or aching or stabbing, tightness, contraction.

When you've been with the pain enough that there feels to be some space around it, some ability to accommodate it, you can return the attention to the anchor and settle again. Or if the pain continues to be strong and naturally calls the attention, let it be your object for however long that is. That's fine.

As you're attending to the pain, see if you notice any emotional or mental reaction to it. Is there aggravation or irritation? A judgment that it shouldn't be there? Disliking? Fear of the pain? If there is, also notice the mental reaction and see how a reaction of disliking or fear will cause a contraction in the body. The contraction doesn't help to soften the pain.

So if you can, stay open to the pain in a soft, relaxed way. The mental relaxation, if anything, will help the pain to soften as well.

What's happening now? As you connect again with the present moment—thought, body posture, in-breath, sounds, discomfort in the body—again refine that alert, awake intelligence that knows what your experience is. That is mindfulness.

CHAPTER 139

Day 6 Brahmavihāra Instructions: Mettā for Self, Benefactor and Dear Friend

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

In this sixth day of brahmavihāra instructions, Guy Armstrong introduces the practice of mettā (loving-kindness) for a dear friend, building upon the foundation established with self and benefactor. Using the traditional metaphor of cascading pools flowing down a mountainside, he explains how mettā naturally develops from where it's easiest—beginning with ourselves—and then overflows to benefit others. The teaching emphasizes that unlike vipassanā practice which often directs us toward difficulty, mettā cultivation starts where caring feels most natural and accessible.

Armstrong offers practical guidance for selecting an appropriate friend—someone with whom there's genuine warmth and connection but minimal complication. He introduces a four-step technique: visualizing the person, feeling the heart connection, sending the phrase with genuine intention, and returning awareness to the heart center to feel the resonance. The instruction stresses that sincere caring, rather than mere repetition of phrases, is what transforms the heart and develops our capacity for genuine concern for others' welfare.

The talk addresses common challenges in mettā practice, including the impermanent nature of loving feelings and the importance of not forcing emotions. Armstrong explains how this practice ultimately cultivates an intention of caring that infuses all our interactions, changing not just our emotional responses but our fundamental orientation toward others in daily life.

Meditation on loving kindness, we're going to introduce a new individual, new category called the friend or the dear friend.

So you'll notice that we're expanding the categories as we go, starting with self, moving to benefactor, and today moving to friend. And we'll move on from there as the next week unfolds. The reason that it unfolds like this is that we start with all the brahmavihāras—mettā and compassion and joy, equanimity, when we get there—where it's easiest. Isn't that nice? Vipassana always seems like we have to go where it's hardest, you know, we go for the hindrance, we go for the pain, we go for the burn, but in mettā we go where it's easiest.

So we start with the person that's considered easiest to care about and that's ourselves. Now it doesn't always mean that the mettā flows the biggest or the warmest or the juiciest for ourself. Sometimes it's a little dry doing mettā for ourself. But we care more about ourself than we care about anybody else. That's just the truth of things generally.

The image that's used in the text is that there's a mountain that has a stream of water coming down, a little stream that collects the rain when it falls. So at the top it starts to run down and then it fills up a little pool on the way down. And that pool takes a while to fill because the rain has to accumulate. When that pool fills, then it runs over, and then the water continues down the stream, down the hillside to the next pool. When that one fills up, then it runs over and runs down the hill to the next pool, and so on, until each pool down the way gets filled up.

So this first pool represents ourself. The idea is that we do mettā for self until it gets full enough that it runs over and we can extend it to somebody else. And that person, the next nearest person, is our benefactor. Somebody who's been kind to us, somebody who's been good, taken us under their wing, showed us help, and so on. When the benefactor fills up and it naturally runs over, then it goes to the third pool, which is the dear friend. So that's where we are today. We're going to be in the third pool of the dear friend. And as the week goes by, we'll fill up the other pools as it goes downhill.

One thing to say about this is that the pool for ourselves needs to fill up before we can really extend the mettā in a sincere way to someone else, to anyone else. Sometimes people come into the loving kindness practice and it's as though there's been a lack of love for self. It's been difficult to care for ourself. And sometimes that pool takes a long time to fill up. So people have come into the mettā practice and all they've wanted to do is mettā for self for like a couple of years or three years. And after that much time of mettā for self, that pool starts to fill up and then they're happy to extend to others.

So if it feels like that for you, if it feels like mettā for self is really the right place to be, then spend most of your time there. Let that pool fill up until it can naturally overflow to somebody else. For the purposes of learning, I'd suggest you try each of the categories anyway. Try the benefactor, try the friend. But in your own mettā as you do more during these days, let that pool fill up if that's where it feels the need is.

Today we're going to move on from the benefactor, and I hope people have said that if you don't have a personal benefactor that's a living human being, you can use somebody like a child, you can use a pet, you can use a friend in the benefactor category, somebody that's really easy to feel a lot of warmth for.

So that's the benefactor and today we're going to open it up to the dear friend. I'll invite you to pick a friend, somebody that you know well enough to have a real bond of connection and affection, but somebody with whom hopefully there's not too much complication. You know, when friendships go on for a while there tend to be little problems that come up sometimes, big problems that come up, and those can color our ability to just open our heart to the friend. That's just the reality of close friendships. So try to pick someone in the friend category where when you think of them you really feel this warmth and affection. And the first thing that comes isn't, "Oh, I wish they hadn't said that last week."

Some of that will be there with a friend. And because it tends to come, these old hurts—oh, they hurt me or I hurt them—these tend to come with friends. Tomorrow in this Brahmavihāra period, we're going to offer instructions in forgiveness meditation. So the friend often leads into the need to ask for forgiveness or offer forgiveness or forgive ourselves. So that's what we'll do tomorrow. But today is just for the friend. Hopefully it will be a positive experience.

So you can start to think about who you would like to bring in as your friend. You may have a number of friends that you could choose from. We recommend for these afternoon sessions, choose one, stay with that person, develop the meditation with that person. You see that it will go through ups and downs.

You know, you start, and there's a lot of warm feeling for the friend and it's really juicy. And then after a while, you just can't feel anything. You think, "Oh, I should switch my friend." Not necessarily. Allow the friend to stay and you'll see that the metta feeling is impermanent too. It will go through ups and downs. And it's kind of natural, isn't it? The heart has a rhythm. Sometimes it's open, sometimes it's closed. Sometimes open, sometimes closed.

What we're doing here, part of what we're doing here, is learning about the heart. Metta is a way of educating ourselves about how the heart works. It's got its own laws, its own principles. Sometimes it's a little bit like a shy child—doesn't want to be leaned on too much. Sometimes it's a little bit like a wild animal. If you try to force it, it'll run away.

So with the heart, we have to listen. We're really in the position of listening and not dictating to the heart. We just want to offer it this opportunity to care and then listen to how it responds. Sometimes it will care, sometimes it may not. That's okay. We're just here to listen, not to force, not to put pressure.

So you may think about some friends that you might like to bring in. In fact, in the first minutes of the meditation, you can audition a few people. You can bring them on the stage, let them dance, see how they step. "No, off stage. You're not the right one for this role." Bring on somebody else. That's fine.

The phrases, intention, and everything will be just like with yourself and benefactor.

I just want to make one more comment. The most important thing in the metta meditation is the moment where you send the phrase to the person and try to give it as much sincerity as you can. In other words, to mean the phrase as much as you can. It's the sincere, genuine caring that makes the practice come alive, that makes it work.

If you just repeat the metta phrases like a mantra, it won't really do anything except quiet your mind down. You have to imbue the phrase with meaning. Meaning, "I really do care about your welfare. I really do care about your happiness." And to the extent you can feel that in a genuine way, that's what will open the heart and change the heart.

And most deeply what it changes—sometimes it'll be warm, sometimes it'll be cool, that's okay—but most deeply what it changes is our intention. That when we look at somebody, when we're in contact with somebody, we care about what their experience is like. That's what this practice is really meant to do: to bring that caring attitude into every interaction.

So we practice it by caring. If you want to change the mind, you manifest that quality. So we're manifesting this caring.

I want to say one more thing about the practice. I'm going to offer this as a technique as we're doing the friend, and I'll introduce it now. Sometimes people say, "Oh, metta practice, too many words. Mine gets too busy. I just want to feel the metta. I want to feel what's there."

So I'm going to suggest a way to do the loving kindness practice that's more about feeling and space than about words. And that is to break it into four parts. Each phrase, you're going to break into four steps.

So, first step: call up an image. You've been told about working with image, right? That's a good thing to do, if you can. It's good to bring up an image of the person.

So the meditation begins by connecting with yourself through the heart center, that tender space in the center of your chest where emotions naturally arise and settle. Place your hand there if it helps create that connection. Remember what you genuinely appreciate about yourself—perhaps your humor, your capacity for empathy, your dedication to service, or simply your wisdom in choosing to be here on retreat.

These good qualities you recognize are not manufactured or forced; they are expressions of an innate goodness that has been with you since childhood. If you can touch that innocent, open period of your early life, you'll find that same fundamental goodness, that natural capacity for love that remains unchanged at your core.

There's a mysterious relationship between goodness and happiness—they seem to follow each other naturally. So connecting with this sense of your own inherent goodness becomes both the foundation for genuine caring and the wellspring of authentic happiness.

From this place of self-recognition, you can offer the metta phrases to yourself with sincerity:

May I be safe and protected from harm.
May I be happy and live in the world with joy.
May I be healthy and my body support me with strength.
May I live with the ease of well-being.

Stay rooted in that felt sense of yourself as you send these intentions inward.

When you feel ready, bring your benefactor to mind. Connect with them however feels natural—through an image, speaking their name silently, or remembering a meaningful moment together. Let yourself really appreciate their good qualities, the specific ways they have helped and supported you. Feel the genuine gratitude and affection you hold for this person.

From this clear recognition of your benefactor's goodness, begin offering the same phrases:

As I wish to be safe, may you be safe from harm.
May you be happy.
May you be healthy.
May you live with ease.

As you offer these phrases to your benefactor, release any expectation about what you should feel. Don't try to manufacture warmth or recreate some previous experience of metta. Simply speak the phrases authentically, allowing whatever natural feeling might arise to be present—whether that's obvious love, subtle appreciation, or no particular emotion at all.

What matters is the genuine moment of caring about their welfare, that simple wish for their wellbeing that arises from recognizing their goodness and remembering their kindness to you.

And then if you're ready, bring in a good friend. You might need to try one or two or three different people to see who's a good fit, but you can bring them to mind. See what feeling comes. Try to find a friend who, when you bring them to mind, there's a sense of liking, loving, warm, friendly feeling.

A friend is like the benefactor in being somebody that we already care about, but usually more of a peer relationship. And generally it's not so helpful to bring in a friend if there's a strong physical attraction, because then the metta gets mixed up with some other emotions.

So as you connect with your friend, try to visualize them or say their name. Get a feeling for their being, almost like they were in the room with you, sitting in front of you. And think about the qualities that you really appreciate in your good friend. You've shared so much with them. What can you see of their character? What are all the different facets you really like?

So in touch with your friend's goodness—all their beautiful qualities. Because it's said that seeing someone's goodness is the proximate cause of feeling metta for them.

So as you see your friend's goodness, let that feeling of caring come, and then start to express it through your phrases toward your friend:

May you be safe, happy, healthy, at ease.

And if you'd like to try this four-part metta, I'll just review the instructions briefly. You can play with it if you'd like.

So try bringing up an image of your friend. And then notice how you feel on seeing the image. Don't have to put it in words. Just notice the feeling that's there. And then let your phrase go out from your heart center toward the image. I like to do this on an out breath, but that's up to you.

And having said the phrase, return the attention to the heart center and just feel the resonance of that, the echo. What was it like to have wished your friend well?

And if you like, one more time: Image. Feeling. Phrase. Heart center. So you come back, rest in the body. And then carry on in whatever style you like.

It can help to have an image of your friend as smiling so that you feel their potential for happiness. But if they're in a hard situation right now, maybe what comes through is their sadness. That's okay. You can stay with the same phrases. The metta takes on a little of the flavor of compassion. You see some difficulty—it's okay, keep sending the same phrase. Notice if the metta feeling is a little bit different, that's okay.

Sometimes some memory might come up of something that happened between you and your friend—might bring some regret, some fear, some hurt, or some resentment. So that's fine. You can let that other emotion, which is not exactly metta, be there as well. Let it just be in the space. And just keep directing your attention to the phrase and the real wish for their happiness. And then the other emotion can be there. It's not a problem, but you keep turning your intention to their welfare.

If the connection with a friend starts to feel weak, then you can renew it by calling them to mind again, bringing up an image, remembering their good qualities, remembering times you spent together so that they stay alive in the moment to receive your metta.

If metta for the friend ever feels difficult or too complicated, you can just go back to doing metta for yourself or metta for your benefactor for a while. Go where it's easier. And then if you feel reestablished in that metta, you can come back and take up the friend again.

And for the last minutes of the sitting, just opening the attention in a wide way, aware of all the beings on the planet, living a human life, living an animal life, and all of them just wanting to be happy and not to suffer. So we have a wish that it's like that for all of them.

We're just closing and sending your metta phrases to all the beings on the planet:

May they all be safe and protected from harm.
May they be happy and live with joy.
May they be healthy and their bodies support them with strength.

May all beings live with the ease of well-being.

You can certainly incorporate metta into your other sittings—as much as you like. It's nothing but beneficial for all of us. As you bring loving-kindness into other practice sessions, you can continue working with yourself, your benefactor, and your friend. These are the three categories I work with most in my own practice. While we'll eventually move on to different categories, these three can serve as reliable allies in developing your loving-kindness practice. Cultivate metta with all of them and use them as they prove helpful.

Questions? Phoenix, then Joe.

Phoenix raises an important point about the traditional approach of starting with a benefactor, developing that loving feeling, and then directing it toward yourself—which differs from what I've described. She's absolutely right. While I've spoken about the image of cascading pools beginning with yourself and flowing to benefactor and friend, you can indeed start with whomever feels easier and then bring that metta back to yourself. This is an excellent technique.

The cascading pools isn't a rigid structure. As I mentioned, sometimes the metta feeling for ourselves isn't as strong as what we can generate for others. If you find that loving-kindness toward yourself feels thin or difficult to access, you can warm up the metta with someone else first. Then borrow that feeling and bring it back to yourself. This is a very skillful approach.

Joe asks about working with the four steps in relation to yourself and how to know when that pool has been filled sufficiently. Let me address some additional techniques for self-directed metta first, then return to that question.

You can absolutely use the four steps with yourself. When I'm practicing metta extensively, I'll hold a different image of myself for each phrase. When contemplating safety, I might imagine myself at home, engaged in something I enjoy, feeling completely secure. For happiness, I'll envision myself in an activity that makes me light up with joy. Try this approach—different images for each phrase. This keeps the mind bright, active, and engaged. While it might feel slightly busy initially, it's worth experimenting with, as each phrase can evoke its particular feeling.

Another beautiful way to work with self-directed metta involves emphasizing the receiving rather than just the sending. Usually when practicing with ourselves, we focus on sending metta but don't take time to receive it. We excel at giving—"I want you to be happy, I want you to be happy"—but when it comes to ourselves, we often think, "Well, I don't need it."

Here's a powerful technique for emphasizing reception: imagine all the people you care most about in your life seated in a semicircle before you. They're offering the metta phrases to you, so your only task is to receive their love. Because these are your closest people, you know they genuinely mean it as they speak to you. You might have six or eight people sitting there, and while you say the phrases—"May you be safe," and so forth—it's all flowing toward you. You simply rest in the position of receiving.

That's a beautiful practice. Another approach that people find nourishing is walking with your benefactor or friend—imagining, particularly during walking meditation, that you're walking together to the end of the path, arm in arm, sharing the phrase "may we be happy." Or you might visualize sitting peacefully with a benefactor or friend, offering the same shared intention: "may we be happy." In this way, you're truly sharing the metta between the two of you.

All of these approaches are skillful ways to work with loving-kindness toward yourself, and they all tend to generate more genuine feeling.

As for how you might know whether that inner pool of self-love needs more filling, I think it really comes down to a phrase that Sally likes to use: "May I love and accept myself just as I am." When you say these words, is there a sense that you already do love and accept yourself just as you are—more or less, or at least during your better moments? Or does something in you respond, "No, I really don't. I don't have that self-love, that self-acceptance."

If the answer that arises is "I really don't have that self-acceptance yet," then it can be tremendously helpful to spend more time filling that pool. Because when genuine self-acceptance is present, loving-kindness flows much more naturally toward everyone else.

This self-acceptance isn't an easy thing to cultivate. Many of us enter practice without a real love or affection for ourselves. But this can genuinely transform—sometimes completely—through the practice of metta and vipassana. It truly is possible, even if self-love feels entirely absent at the beginning, to develop this capacity in an authentic and lasting way.

In fact, I was speaking with someone in an interview recently who shared that lately in her practice, a big chunk of anxiety had simply dissolved. She said it had also helped her learn to relax for the first time in her life. Then she mentioned that her self-loathing had gone away—she had worked clear of it entirely.

I told her I thought the anxiety and the self-doubt were intimately connected. For many of us, when anxiety becomes a persistent pattern, what we're really anxious about is that we're not good enough. It expresses itself as this constant underlying unease. But when we genuinely feel our own goodness and trust in our fundamental okayness, much of that pervasive anxiety can simply fall away.

So this metta toward oneself isn't a small matter. It can profoundly transform our entire relationship to life.

A practitioner offered this observation: "When I'm on retreat and my body feels light and empty, I naturally feel love. When I feel stuck, I don't. It seems to flow from that relaxed state rather than the other way around."

That's absolutely true as well. When we come into retreat and the body can truly relax, some of that habitual anxiety releases, and then love becomes accessible. And conversely, when we feel love as a reliable presence in our lives, it naturally enhances our sense of self-worth. We look inside and recognize that this goodness is there, and that recognition of our own goodness becomes the proximate cause for metta toward ourselves to arise spontaneously.

Another question arose about the visualization practice: "In your third step, you emphasize extending the heart toward another. Could you also bring the other into the heart, thereby expanding that inner space?"

You absolutely can. While I suggested letting the phrase flow from the heart center toward the image of your benefactor, you could certainly experiment with visualizing your benefactor or friend directly within your heart center. We typically visualize people as separate from us because that's our ordinary experience of relationship. But what if you were to hold the image of your benefactor right in your heart space? This can create a beautifully intimate quality in the practice, so it's certainly worth exploring.

So the comment was, if you're sending to a benefactor or a friend and there's someone who has difficulty receiving the metta, you might imagine a few people sending to them at the same time as we did on the receiving circle for ourselves—people who are close to your benefactor or friend. Sure, you could do that. Yes, that's fine.

As I mentioned, you might be directing metta to someone and what's really apparent as you call them up is a difficulty they're going through. Then the feeling that comes through may be compassion. And that's okay. You can say the metta phrases and just notice, oh, this feeling has the flavor of compassion—and that's okay.

Okay, so we'll end there. We have half an hour for walking. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 140

Day 7 Morning Instructional Sit

Guy Armstrong · 44 min

> In this seventh day of month-long retreat instruction, Guy Armstrong provides a comprehensive review of the foundational mindfulness practices introduced thus far. He offers a clear and accessible definition of mindfulness as "knowing what your experience is in the present moment" and guides practitioners through the primary meditation anchors: body posture, sounds, and breath awareness (ānāpānasati).
> Armstrong emphasizes the receptive quality of attention, teaching how to rest awareness effortlessly while remaining open to whatever arises naturally in experience. He systematically covers mindfulness of body sensations, emotions (including the five hindrances: kāmacchanda, byāpāda, thīna-middha, uddhacca-kukkucca, and vicikicchā), and thoughts. For emotional awareness, he presents a practical three-part framework: noticing bodily sensations, recognizing the mental tone or flavor, and observing accompanying thought patterns.
> This instruction exemplifies the comprehensive approach to satipaṭṭhāna (four foundations of mindfulness) practice, showing how to establish a stable meditation anchor while maintaining openness to the full range of present-moment experience. The teaching is particularly valuable for understanding how different meditation objects work together as a unified system rather than separate techniques.

We've given a lot of instructions already, starting with the body, breath, sounds, emotions, thoughts, and attitudes. It may all have gone by in a bit of a blur. So this morning, before we add anything else—and we do have a few more things to add—I just want to review where we've been so far so that it starts to feel like it might be a coherent set of guidance.

Please sit comfortably. Find in your posture that expression of upright firmness and alertness, and also relaxed softness and receptivity. The mind and the body both are balanced between these two qualities.

Bring attention first into the body, just feeling yourself sitting here and now. Have a sense that your full awareness in the present can fill your whole body. There's no corner in the body that isn't pervaded by this conscious knowing. Remember that this alert knowing is the key thing we're cultivating in mindfulness practice. Whatever it's directed to, of the many aspects of our experience, what we're most interested in is this alert, aware attention.

I want to offer a really simple definition of mindfulness that you can take with you and keep checking as you go through the retreat. All the miracle and power of this practice comes from this simple activity, and it is knowing what your experience is in the present moment. That's all we're asking you to do. What's happening now?

We offer these different objects so that everything that comes in the range of your experience can be a comfortable object for you to know thoroughly. We break it up in the instructions, but really the experience is unified and you might be noticing any of these at any time.

We begin just being comfortable in the body. The body as it sits, the body posture, can be an excellent anchor in meditation. This can be the one thing that you come back to again and again to stabilize your attention. It can be your home base.

In practicing with the body posture as the main focus, what you do is take the whole thing in at a glance, as far as you can. Obviously there are different parts, different sensations—you might not quite get it all. But see about seeing the whole body sitting in one glance. That can be where you rest your attention.

Then if you like, you can let your attention open in a panoramic way, just aware of all the sounds that are coming and going. It could be sounds in the room of each other, sound of your own breathing, sounds from outside or the sound of my voice. Use sounds to give a breadth of attention that can give a sense of ease and relaxation.

Also notice as you pay attention to sounds, you don't have to do anything to hear. If your attention is open, the sound will be heard. It's like sitting in a concert hall, listening to a symphony. You just rest in the middle of all the sounds and they're known effortlessly and spontaneously. You don't have to send the attention out. The sound comes to you. Sounds are the second possible anchor for your practice.

Then return the attention to the body and just again let it rest within the whole body. As it rests there, you'll feel the impact of breathing. The body will change as you breathe in. It will change as you breathe out. What does that feel like breathing in? What does it feel like breathing out?

Again, let the attention be really receptive. You're not trying to control the breath and not doing pranayama breathing. We're letting it come and go on its own and we're just there to feel it. You might like to keep feeling it throughout the whole body, or there might be one area where it's clearer for you. It might be clear in the belly or at the nose or in the chest. If it is, it's fine to let the attention settle in that part of the body.

Have the attention just rest there. As it rests, let it effortlessly receive the sensations of breathing, just as you received sounds. There's no struggle, just resting and feeling. Breathing in, breathing out. This is the third possible anchor for practice.

So make your home in one of these anchors, but then be open to anything that comes and naturally draws the attention away from the anchor.

As you sit in touch with body posture, sounds, or breath, notice when something else arises that naturally calls the attention. It could be a sensation in the body. Let the attention move to that new sensation. Make a connection to it with your attention and feel its bare physical nature. Is it tingling or pulsing, vibrating, twitching? Is there pressure or heaviness? Lightness? Is it warm or cool? Is it aching or stabbing? Just know clearly what the sensation is as you feel it directly. This is mindfulness of sensations.

If the sensation is painful, notice if there's a mental reaction—fear or anger, judgment, frustration. Be mindful of the mental reaction. Just allow it to be there. As far as possible, soften the mind to allow the discomfort in the body.

The attention may be drawn to a mood or emotion. You might notice one of the hindrances: sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, doubt. You might notice other emotions: joy, loneliness, embarrassment, contentment, anger, happiness.

When you notice a mood or emotion, let that become the new focus for mindfulness. This means just letting yourself feel it without judging it, without trying to hold on or push it away. All the emotions are part of our human nature. They come and go like clouds. Like the weather, they're impermanent and changing. We don't have to make a big fuss when a cloud covers the sun. We don't have to make a big fuss when an emotion comes and displays for a while. It's just what it is. We know it. We feel it. We recognize it. We allow it.

Let the attention become close to really feel the experience of the emotion. You might notice three aspects of it.

How does it feel in the body? Where do you feel it? With happiness there might be a bubbly, uplifting sensation in the chest. With fear there might be a contraction in the belly. With anger, there might be a burning around the neck and throat. Just feel the sensations and allow them as part of the emotion.

Second, notice the mood or mental tone, the flavor of that emotion. Sadness has a different tone than anger, than joy, than compassion. Notice and allow the mental tone.

And third, what kind of thoughts accompany the emotion? Fearful thoughts tend to accompany fear. Happy thoughts tend to accompany contentment. When you notice any thought, when attention is drawn to a thought, just notice its presence as thinking. Find that meditative relationship that can see the thought arise, persist, and pass away. We don't have to get so involved with its content. Let it come, let it go, be mindful of it.

So anything that's arising now in our experience can be food for mindfulness to grow from: body, sounds, breath, sensation, emotions, and thoughts. Resting the attention in the anchor is our home, but being open to being mindful with any of the other arisings that we find, knowing them clearly in their nature. And when they subside and pass away, just return the attention to be with the anchor, resting again in our meditative home.

One of the things you'll discover about our instructions is that they're wonderfully varied. This presents a challenge not only for you as practitioners, but for us as teachers, because there's a vast territory of practice to explore together.

It would certainly be simpler if we offered only one technique—like meditation on breathing, anapanasati. Some teachers make this their entire focus, and they teach it beautifully. But for us, breath awareness is just one object among many in the rich landscape of mindfulness practice. And we haven't even completed the full range of objects we're presenting to you.

This variety reflects the Buddha's skillful means—offering different doors into the same essential understanding. Some of you will find your home in breath awareness, others in body sensations, still others in the spacious awareness that holds all arising phenomena. The invitation is to explore with curiosity and patience, discovering which practices most naturally support your awakening.

Remember that this multiplicity of approaches isn't meant to overwhelm, but to honor the unique ways each of us connects with the dharma. Trust the process of exploration, and know that whatever arises in your practice—confusion, clarity, resistance, or ease—is exactly what you need to work with right now.

CHAPTER 141

The Power of Loving-kindness

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this comprehensive exploration of mettā (loving-kindness) practice, Guy Armstrong presents five key powers that emerge from cultivating this brahmavihāra. Drawing from his decades of practice and teaching, he shows how loving-kindness makes the heart tender and responsive, purifies consciousness by working with hindrances and self-hatred, develops samādhi (concentration), creates deep connection with all beings, and generates reliable happiness. Armstrong addresses common philosophical concerns Vipassanā practitioners have about mettā practice, explaining how it supports rather than conflicts with "taking refuge in reality." He shares inspiring stories from the Dalai Lama, Aung San Suu Kyi, and Nelson Mandela to illustrate how mettā practice transforms both personal suffering and relationships with difficult people. The talk includes practical guidance on working with the "near and far enemies" of loving-kindness, the purification process that can arise during practice, and how mettā develops from patience through allowance to genuine love. Armstrong emphasizes that love is our innate nature—not something generated by Buddhist practice—and that mettā simply helps us incline the mind toward this natural capacity for caring and connection.

The talk this evening is on the power of loving-kindness.

There's a quote from Rumi that I like here. Rumi, you know, is the poet laureate of Spirit Rock, so we quote him whenever possible: "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives."

This is part of our path, the allure of love. And I am so grateful that we have the practice of loving-kindness within our tradition—well-established, clear instructions, easy to follow, reliable, and trustworthy.

When I was a young man in my early twenties, I had a lot of access to love. But it came and went like nobody's business. My emotions were in a lot of flux at that time, and so I could make strong connections with people, nature, music, and art, but I couldn't stabilize in it. I didn't know how it came about or how it went away. So actually finding the access to love became a really important motivation in my dharma practice.

And what I discovered, of course, is probably what you all know too. It needs the wisdom from vipassana in order to make it more stable. It needs the wisdom of non-clinging to have regular access to love. And then it's possible.

So we have a practice within our tradition that gives us an avenue to developing this quality of love in our hearts. And I'm very grateful that I found it. I've done a lot of metta practice over the years, and it has changed my life and my practice tremendously.

I want to talk tonight about some of the great things that come out of metta practice. There's probably a really long list, but I'm going to talk about five tonight. These are the powers of metta.

It makes the heart responsive, or you might say tender. It purifies the heart—that is, it cleans it up, it scrubs it. This leads to concentration. It connects us to all of life, meaning that we develop an inclusive sense of what being alive means. We allow all beings into our hearts. And it brings happiness in a very reliable way.

When we say it makes the heart tender, what we mean is that it lets us feel the joys and sorrows of life—our lives and others'—more readily. Things land on us with more impact because the heart is being trained to be responsive. And you can see this in the practice itself. What we're doing is going to different individuals and offering: "I hope you're happy. I hope you're well. I hope you're peaceful. I hope you're healthy."

So it trains us to keep looking into the inner experience and inner welfare and inner well-being of everyone we come in contact with. The emotions of metta will go through lots of ups and downs, but this movement of caring and interest—you could say the empathy of metta—is what continues. This is how we're shaping the mind, and this is what we learn as a practice and as a habit from doing loving-kindness.

Now, not everybody who does vipassana does metta. Nor do you have to do metta. Nor should you feel guilty if you're not doing metta. If you don't want to run to the allure of love, that's your business.

Some personalities, I feel, open up to metta in a big way just through vipassana. I think about Dipa Ma, a wonderful Indian teacher, whom somebody mentioned—I think John mentioned in his talk. She was a very deep vipassana practitioner. I don't know that she ever did much formal loving-kindness practice, but she just had the heart qualities that when her suffering went away through vipassana, her big heart was right there. And metta was one of the things that people felt in her most strongly. She just had a very loving attitude to everyone she met. Joseph and Sharon used to say that when they visited her in Calcutta, they would just walk into her little house—part of an apartment—and just feel the space filled with love, which was simply her way of being.

But for other teachers who don't have a natural heart quality in personality, they can come out of vipassana practice, and I'll put it this way—their metta feels a little distant. So personally, I really gravitate to the teachers who have developed both wisdom and loving-kindness. Those teachers have shown me the possibility of development that is there for us as human beings.

So take a look at your personality. If loving-kindness is a natural flowering through vipassana, that might be plenty. On the other hand, if you feel a little dryness of heart, a little cerebral inclination, loving-kindness is a really wonderful supplement to vipassana to draw out those heart qualities.

One of my teachers was a Tibetan teacher who was giving heart advice at the end of a retreat. Tibetans have a way of doing this—they kind of sum up pith instructions they want you to take with you.

And he said, "I want you to carry three things out into the world. The first," he said, "is be natural. Just be yourself. Don't be pretentious. Don't put on big spiritual airs. Just be a nice person. Be natural.

"The second thing," he said, "is be wise. Go out, conduct yourself well. Don't make big fusses for people. Don't make mistakes in your conduct and your speech. They want to understand that good qualities come out of Buddhism. Good actions come out of Buddhism.

"And the third thing," he said, "is be juicy."

Because that's what will communicate to other people and let them know about your inner development. Now, juice is a technical term in Buddhism. It covers a wide range of qualities: love, reverence, joy, compassion, faith, kindness, humor, humility, devotion, awe. All those things are under this technical heading of juice. And it's lovely to take those qualities back and share them in the world because our world needs more juice.

So these are the things that come out of our practice of metta. And I like the perspective that Alice Walker enunciated when she said, "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good heartedness." If we come out of Buddhist practice with good heartedness, that is going to communicate to the people we're in contact with. It will be meaningful to them and it will be our contribution to the welfare of the world.

So loving-kindness is the first of the four Brahma Viharas. In our tradition, it's the foundation for the other three. So the other three are compassion, joy, and equanimity. Loving-kindness is learning to care for the welfare of the beings that we bring to mind or come in contact with.

Compassion is not so far removed. It's what loving-kindness moves into when it looks on suffering. So if you're caring for someone and you notice suffering in them, the quality that comes out naturally is compassion. So compassion is connected with the suffering in the world.

The third quality of appreciative joy or sympathetic joy—mudita—is like the mirror image of compassion. It's beautiful how the Brahma Viharas are balanced in this way. And that is when the open heart looks upon someone who's happy, the response becomes a resonance with that happiness which makes us happy and joyful. So this is the movement of the heart in response to seeing happiness. It makes us happy to see others happy.

Then equanimity is the state that's a balance of mind that supports the other three. If equanimity isn't present, the other three aren't stable, and they also move into qualities that are not as wholesome. We'll talk about that later. So equanimity supports the other three.

If you go to teachings from Tibetan teachers or Zen teachers, they might have this same arrangement of the Brahma Viharas, but for them, compassion may be primary. And I think the Mahayana schools tended to adopt this because compassion really ties into the Four Noble Truths. Four Noble Truths are all about suffering. Buddha's teaching is all about suffering in the end. So compassion ties nicely into that.

Don't think of them as so different. Don't get into a war with a Tibetan student saying, "No, metta's the foundation," and they say, "No, compassion's the foundation." Need more equanimity. They're very, very similar. The Dalai Lama expressed this well. He said, "Compassion is basic human warmth." That's what loving-kindness is also—basic human warmth.

Sometimes Vipassana students have a little bit of a philosophical problem with metta. It seems a little bit phony, like we're trying to contrive something or forcing ourselves to feel something that's not there. And you know, philosophically, Vipassana is very elegant. Just be with what is. It's kind of like: take refuge in reality.

You don't need to change it. Isn't that beautiful? It's very elegant, and metta seems a little bit like we're trying to get in there and interfere with reality. We're trying to put something in or push something out with this quality of loving kindness.

Vipassana is really our foundation. Taking refuge in reality, aligning our understanding and our mindfulness with exactly what is—this is the foundation of practice. And loving-kindness can really help us open to that in a very easeful and relaxed way.

So we say that we do loving-kindness in support of our Vipassana practice. We think they go together well because it's bringing in right effort, it's bringing in a wholesome state. And when loving kindness grows up, the mindfulness quality that we meet our experience with becomes very warm. So that's where we're aiming—to bring the warmth of metta with the clarity of mindfulness so we have this warm, loving attention that we bring to everything we meet.

And when you can bring a warm, loving attention to every part of your experience, conflict kind of goes out of life. So we're expanding the field where we can bring this warm, caring attention.

And then sometimes philosophically people complain, "Oh, but metta is diluted. May I be happy? But there is no I," they'll say. "Or may you be happy? But I know happiness is impermanent. What do you mean?"

So we have a solution for that. Here's a phrase for you all who have this doubt. I'm going to use it in an example: In this ever-changing stream of mental and physical phenomena, conventionally designated as Sally, may the mind state of happiness arrive ever more frequently.

So if you'd like, you can use that phrase in metta practice. Or you could just say, "May Sally be happy." That might be simpler. But actually, the way I understand "may Sally be happy" is the long phrase that I just said. So from a Vipassana point of view, we understand not-self, we understand impermanence, and still we want Sally to be happy as much as possible. And she does too.

Because when you meet somebody who has really developed this kind of loving heart, it's kind of amazing, isn't it? And I think about the Dalai Lama a lot in this regard because he has such a good heart in the face of all the difficulties that he carries in life. He has more or less sole responsibility for the welfare of the six million remaining Tibetans. There used to be seven million, but a lot died since the occupation. So the fate of his people rests on his shoulders. And that's a huge weight to carry. And yet he still has this joyful temperament that you see when you meet him.

And you've probably heard that he'll say something like, "You know, my true religion is not Buddhism. My true religion is kindness." And you feel that around him. That's what he cares about—making this kind human connection.

So he was being interviewed by Oprah one time for the magazine. And I really appreciate what Oprah has done to bring spirituality into the mainstream. I don't know of anyone else who has brought good Dharma to so many people. Oprah has a great reach through her TV shows and through her magazine.

So she was interviewing the Dalai Lama and started the interview by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

And he said, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said.

"Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued, "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about."

That's a great life to have no regrets.

Regarding service to Tibet, the Dalai Lama said, service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind.

That's a beautiful mind. And what people like the Dalai Lama are doing is reminding us of our true nature and our true capacity. Love is not something that gets generated by Buddhist practice. It's not something that's only found when we start metta meditation. It's in all of us.

One of the most loving people I ever knew was my grandmother, who was born in 1890 and had no Buddhist training at all. And yet when we were kids and came to her house for a visit, she gave us the most warm and loving embraces. So mostly it's a matter of inclining our mind in that direction and letting this innate quality come out. We're encouraging it, we're inviting it, but it's already there in all of us.

So this is the aspect of responsiveness. We train the heart to be responsive in this direction of caring.

Another big way that loving-kindness meditation works is in the area of purification of heart. And this starts with this simple intention. We connect with someone and we wish them well. That's a very pure intention. So we're developing over and over again this intention that is wholesome and caring. As we talked about—I think Aaron talked about the other day—intention is the seed for karma. This is the most transformative mental factor in all our practice: intention. The Tibetans say everything rests on the tip of motivation. So we take care to set our motivation in a wholesome direction. And the intention of metta is a very wholesome direction. We're training ourselves to care. That's an intention that comes up again and again.

It's kind of like by turning to caring over and over, we're planting little seeds. These are karmic seeds from intention. And we continue to water them. And then eventually they sprout. They grow big and sprout.

Those of you who are gardeners know if you plant seeds, you can't tell the seed when to come up. You plant a tomato seed in early summer and you water it and you put it in a sunny place. Maybe you put some plastic over it to heat it up a bit. You can't tell the tomato, now it's time for you to come out of the ground. And if I don't see you popping up, I'm going to reach down in the dirt and pull you up. That's how I'll get my tomato plant.

But you just trust that the seed is right, the elements you add are right, and nature will take care of the rest. And that's the way it is when we plant the seeds of intention. We can't say when it's going to flower as a strong feeling of love or connection or caring, but we know that if we keep planting the seed and giving it the right conditions, it will—because this is a natural law. Metta will flower based on that intention.

The Buddha put it like this: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." This is metta. We're just dripping it moment after moment, and we let that jar fill up.

We begin with loving-kindness for ourselves because classically it's said to be the easiest, but as you may have found, it's not always the easiest. Sometimes metta for ourselves is the most difficult because it brings up feelings that we're not so comfortable with.

Some of the things that can happen are bringing up old memories of past events in our life. Every time we bring a new person into loving-kindness, we might review what's happened in that relationship. And there can be beautiful moments of friendship and caring, and there can be painful moments where we've been hurt or we may have hurt someone else. So those memories can come up. We may get in touch with feelings of not liking ourselves very much, of self-hatred, of judgment, of doubt about ourselves.

This doesn't mean we're doing the metta wrong. Rather, it indicates the purification is happening. Because the metta is a strong force, we're aiming this strong, beautiful force right at the heart. And as we do that, it's going to draw out everything that's its opposite.

That's how we get purified. If those feelings are in us but we can't feel them, we can't ever understand them and release them. As they emerge, we have the chance to hold them within this whole framework of loving kindness. The metta can then work on them, and hopefully they get released. That karmic knot unwinds and dissolves in time.

So when you find yourself doing loving kindness practice and some of these other qualities are arising—we'll call them hindrances for now—don't worry that your practice is going off track. This is part of the natural process.

How do we work with them? It depends somewhat on the strength of the hindrance. If you can leave the hindrance in the background, recognizing that it's there while still connecting with the intention to care, do that. Just keep the metta phrase going, connect with as much sincerity of loving kindness as you can, leave the hindrance back there, and the metta will start to work on it. It will be held in the metta field and will start to partake of the metta.

We often speak about how when a hindrance is present, we move through recognition into allowing as parts of the steps of RAIN. It's important to understand that metta has a range of expressions, and allowing is part of it.

The first inkling of metta might be the quality of patience. Perhaps before we started metta practice, when something arose—whether a hindrance or something external—our first reaction was irritation. We would move to annoyance or judgment, resistance, condemning, and so forth. When metta is present, that same stimulus can be met with a quality we call patience. The Pali is khanti.

Patience here doesn't mean "I'm just going to wait. If I wait a couple hours, that will go away." That's not what patience is about. Patience is bearing what's not pleasant while keeping our mind in a wholesome place—an okay place, let's put it that way.

So the first sign that metta is happening is that we become more patient. Things that ordinarily irritate us, we meet with "okay, it's not pleasant, but now I can bear it."

The second step in the growth of metta is that we have a real allowing of it. More than "I can bear it"—it really becomes okay. As it warms up, it moves from patience into allowance and acceptance. Then it moves from there into affection. And then it moves from there into love. And then it moves from love into what you might say is passion and devotion in a really selfless way.

So metta has this whole range of flavors and intensity, and it starts with patience. The affliction comes, the hindrance comes, and there can be patience with it.

All the standard hindrances can arise, and then there are special hindrances that come with metta called the near and far enemies. You'll find that each of the brahmaviharas—and somebody in the afternoon probably mentioned this—each of the brahmaviharas has a near enemy and a far enemy. The near enemy is a state that looks like the brahmavihara, but it's not wholesome. It's an imposter masquerading as the real thing.

With the brahmavihara of loving kindness, the imposter is affection with attachment. So you like somebody, but it's very conditional. It's only if they act a certain way. Sometimes it's conditional affection or friendship: "I'll befriend you if you'll befriend me. And if you go back on your part of the bargain, I'm going to take away my part of the bargain." So it's looking for a deal.

There's another way this comes out. Let me give an example. I was teaching a metta weekend one time. I didn't think people would get much in a metta weekend, but actually they did. It was amazing to see the opening. We used the phrases we're using now, including "may you live with ease."

I took questions, and a woman said, "Well, I was using my son as my benefactor because I really love him a lot. And I came to the phrase 'may you live with ease.' And you see, he's in college and he's living with way too much ease. He sleeps late in the morning. I do all his laundry for him. I go in and clean up his room."

And you know, he's not even doing that well in his studies. And so what I wanted to say is, "May you acquire some backbone and do your work better."

This is not entirely metta. This has a little bit of fixing in it. And so when we say metta for someone, we want to really accept them as they are, not conditionally based on their changing or living up to our ideas. We're not trying to use it to fix people.

And in fact, we're not even waiting for an outcome. We say to someone, "I hope you may be happy," but our hope, our care for them is not dependent on that outcome, on that result. Maybe they're not happy. We can still wish that for them. So we don't attach to the result of our wishes. And it's equanimity that gives that support to not attach to the result.

So how to work with the hindrance? The first is if it's weak enough, leave it in the background, continue with the intention of loving kindness, and it will be affected by the field of metta that you're in. If it gets stronger, it can feel like it really blocks or prevents the shift of caring. When you're really burdened with a strong hindrance—you know, could be desire, could be fear, could be worry—you're not going to be able to move into caring for someone.

So when it's like that, it's more helpful to shift away from metta and you have two options. The first that I would recommend is you go to compassion. Because in compassion, you're staying within the Brahmavihara family. So you're not moving very far away. And you have a phrase either, "May I be free from this pain and sorrow," or "May I hold this pain with compassion." Either of those is a good phrase for compassion. So you recognize the hindrance that's there and you say something like, "May I hold it with compassion." Continue with that until it subsides and return to metta.

Or, and this may be if the compassion doesn't feel right or it doesn't seem to engage properly, then move to vipassana. Open to the hindrance with mindfulness. Let yourself feel it. Do the exercise of RAIN. Feel it in your body. Allow it to be there. And sometimes that will just give it enough space that it can kind of, if it's fairly new, not too rooted, can kind of wash through. And then you can go back to the loving kindness.

This quality of meeting our own self-hatred or self-doubt is really common in doing metta practice. It's a deep conditioning often in us that goes way back to childhood, and it's something that can take years to become free of. But the combination of vipassana and metta really can let us become free and transformed from that.

So I want to read this poem. It's a well-known poem, but I hadn't heard it for a while, and maybe you haven't heard it for a while, so I'm going to read it. It's called "St. Francis and the Sow" by Galway Kinnell.

"The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower. For everything flowers from within of self-blessing, though sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness. To put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing. As St. Francis put his hand on the creased forehead of the sow and told her in words and in touch, blessings of earth on the sow. And the sow began remembering all down her thick length, from the earthen snout all the way through the fodder and slops, to the spiritual curl of the tail, from the hard spininess spiked out from the spine, down through the giant broken heart, to the sheer blue milk and dreaminess spurting and shuddering from the fourteen teats into the fourteen mouths, sucking and blowing beneath them. The long, perfect loveliness of sow."

So sometimes it's necessary to reteach ourselves our loveliness. And that's what the practice of loving kindness is doing. It's showing us that possibility.

Now, of course, one of the challenges in purification comes when we pick up the difficult person. And this is going to be your treat tomorrow in loving kindness. It's probably the most challenging part of the practice, but then there's also good learning.

So I was doing an intensive metta retreat one time. I was practicing it for six weeks in a container a lot like this, and I was quite settled when it seemed to happen that I started running into one other person on the retreat a lot, and that person was my difficult person. It's someone that I'd known before the retreat, and they were also on the retreat, and it just seemed at this point we crossed paths a lot.

So my practice would be going really well, and I'd had a lot of love and energy and brightness. And then I'd meet this person passing in the hall. And I'd go, "I can't believe what they did. What they said and how they treated me."

I can't believe they did that. And I'd start winding myself up thinking about all the things that had happened. I'd get really growly about it.

I'd go back to my cushion and try to practice: "May my friend be safe, may my friend be happy"—but I can't believe what that person did. I would spin out for half an hour and be really worked up about it.

Then I'd sort of remember: oh, you know, they talk about loving-kindness for the difficult person. Maybe I should try it. But I said, "No, no, no, I don't want to love the difficult person. That's not part of the program that I came for."

But the anger was so annoying and unpleasant, I thought I'd better try it. So I did. And surprise of surprises, it worked.

Something really interesting came out of that. When I could generate a real wish for their welfare, the anger went away. That's all it took. I didn't have to like them. I didn't have to love them. I didn't have to approve of what they'd done. I didn't have to condone their conduct or think they were a great person. All I had to do was wish them well. And if I could sincerely wish them well, the anger went away.

As I looked into why that was, I saw that a piece of anger, for me anyway, is usually something called ill will. In ill will, it's the opposite of goodwill—we actually want the other person to suffer. I started to see that within my anger was a wish that my difficult person suffer. That is really close to cruelty. Cruelty is enjoying somebody else's suffering, but ill will is wanting somebody else to suffer. They're not that far apart.

Although I could think, "Oh, it's okay for me to be angry," I couldn't think it was okay for me to be cruel. That didn't feel acceptable. I saw how close I was getting, and I didn't want to be in ill will toward them. I realized that I now have a way to come out of ill will, and that is to replace it with goodwill.

That was a real opening for me. I recommend it as a skillful means with anger. If you can just wish well for the person, the anger can really lift.

I want to read something from one of the discourses of the Buddha. This is a text called "The Simile of the Saw." The Buddha talks about how to deal with difficult people. Difficult people have by and large said something unkind to us. The Buddha said this might happen in five ways:

They might say it at the wrong time. Have you ever been with somebody you really like and hope will respect you, and a friend comes up and gives you some feedback or says something disrespectful? It feels awful to be hurt at the wrong time.

Or somebody says something about you that's just not true, but other people hear it and believe it. That's hurtful.

Or they come and speak to you harshly. It's really clear they're angry and they blast you with that harsh energy. That hurts.

Or you know that their speaking is coming out of ill will—a wish to cause you harm—and that doesn't feel good.

Or you know that the mind they're speaking from is one of anger or hatred, and that doesn't feel good.

So the Buddha said if any of these five things happen—somebody speaks to you at the wrong time, they speak something that's not true, they speak harshly to you, they speak in a way that harms you, or they speak from hatred—you should still maintain loving-kindness for them.

This is what he actually says: "Herein, bhikkhus"—and bhikkhu means practitioners, means us—"you should train thus: Our minds will remain unaffected and we shall utter no evil words. We shall abide compassionate for their welfare with a mind of loving-kindness without inner hate. This is how you should train, bhikkhus."

This is a challenging directive. Reflect on it with people who have hurt you with their speech.

This is not easy to do—to maintain loving kindness toward those who have wounded us with their words. Yet this is precisely what the Buddha calls us to practice.

This teaching offers us a good reminder when we encounter difficult people: see if it's possible to open with some care.

I want to share the story of Aung San Suu Kyi, who was placed under house arrest for close to seventeen years by the military dictatorship in Burma. As you know, she is now free and serves as an elected member of parliament—quite remarkable.

During her house arrest—and I say "house arrest" though she lived it partly as a meditation retreat—she received visits from very well-known and respected Burmese Sayadaws. We know some of the teachers who visited her and the instructions they offered during her confinement. One of the central practices they taught her was loving kindness.

When she emerged, you could observe how she remained balanced in relationship to the military dictators, able to work with them politically. She had been cultivating metta throughout her long years under house arrest. Upon her release, she reflected: "When I compared notes with my colleagues in the democracy movement who have suffered long terms of imprisonment, we found that an enhanced appreciation of metta was a common experience. We had known and felt both the effects of loving-kindness and the unwholesomeness of attitudes lacking in loving-kindness."

She had witnessed this contrast clearly, and her determination was to approach all circumstances with love.

Nelson Mandela expressed something remarkably similar. When the white government of South Africa was considering his release from prison, their primary concern was whether he would encourage the black population to rise up against whites in retribution for years of oppression, cruelty, and false imprisonment.

They arranged a meeting to assess this risk, essentially asking whether he would incite people to turn against the white population. Mandela's response was clear: "No. I am not going to do that, and my government will not do that. Why? Because we have seen in you what brutality and fear look like. And we don't want to live like that. We are not going to repeat that."

I believe this reflects Aung San Suu Kyi's intention as well—not to repeat the mistakes of the dictators. This is the realm of purification of heart.

The third power of loving-kindness is the power of concentration. Concentration concerns the unification of mind, and we typically approach it by choosing an object around which the mind can center. In Vipassana practice, that object is often the breath. In loving-kindness practice, the primary object is the phrases themselves.

You return again and again to the phrases of loving kindness, and the mind collects around them. As the mind gathers in this way, stray thoughts, wishes, desires, and fears arise less frequently—a genuinely wholesome development. As Bonnie mentioned last night, this represents one of the seven factors of enlightenment: the factor of concentration.

As you develop greater sophistication in your metta practice, you'll begin to notice that the mind collects not only around the phrases, but around other objects as well. There's the image of the person you're sending metta to, if you use visualization, or the felt sense of their presence if you work without images. There's the feeling of metta itself—as it grows, you can attune to it and allow yourself to be aware of it. And there's something I often recommend: returning to the heart center and feeling the body's response to the metta.

You might say there are really four objects you can be aware of during loving kindness practice, and each serves as a focus for concentration. Concentration builds with each of these elements. In fact, the more aspects you hold simultaneously, the stronger your concentration must become. It's rather like juggling—to keep all those elements moving in the right sequence, you must be genuinely present. These four aspects stretch you, and in stretching you, they build this power of concentration.

Metta is a beautiful concentration practice. We use it on long retreats to teach concentration to the depth of jhana—this is one of our approaches during extended practice periods.

Concentration unifies the mind. As you probably know, love itself unifies the mind.

Love is a really powerful unifying force. It brings families together, friends together, countries together. There's a beautiful quote from Martin Luther King where he says, "Love is the only force capable of transforming an enemy into a friend." So we hope that it will bring the nation together eventually.

Love is unifying, concentration is unifying. In the metta practice, we're using both love and concentration to build that force of unity. This is a double power of unification.

I want to read this passage from a Russian Orthodox saint from the 19th century whose name was Theophan the Recluse. I very much doubt that he had Buddhist training, but here you'll hear it coming from a Christian perspective, something that I think will be familiar:

"For as long as the mind remains in the head where thoughts jostle one another, it has no time to concentrate on one thing. But when attention descends into the heart, it attracts all the powers of the soul and body into one point there. This concentration is immediately reflected in the heart by a special sensation that is the beginning of warmth. The sensation grows gradually stronger, firmer, deeper. And so it comes about that whereas in the initial stages the attention is kept in the heart by an effort of will"—have you noticed that with metta? It takes an effort of will to stay in the heart—"in due course, this attention by its own strength gives birth to warmth in the heart. This warmth holds the attention without special effort. From this, the two go on supporting one another and must remain inseparable because dispersion of intention cools the warmth and diminishing warmth weakens attention."

This is exactly describing the way metta and concentration support each other in this bringing about of warmth in the heart.

And another Dipa Ma story. She was teaching a three-month course at IMS on the East Coast. People were struck by her character and her being and her presence. One time, somebody had the idea to ask her what I think is a great question. They said, "What's in your mind?" I'm really glad somebody asked that.

And she said, "I have only three things in my mind: concentration, peace, and loving-kindness. That's all that's there."

That's a beautiful mind.

The fourth aspect, the fourth fruit of loving-kindness is this quality of connection. It really opens us out into a connection with other beings, beginning with a circle of friends and close people we already have, extending outward to people we don't know, extending outward to people we have difficulty with, eventually extending to all beings everywhere—human beings, animals. We care for their suffering. This is where the practice is opening up to, and there's a joy in that. There's a joy in this connection.

This is from Shantideva, who was a great sage in India and author of Guide to a Bodhisattva's Way of Life:

"Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

So this is the beauty of the path of metta. As we connect with others, that connection is really satisfying. It satisfies something deep within us because it offsets our sense of isolation. I read somewhere—so many of these things go by and I didn't note it, I can't give you the reference—that neuroscience researchers have found that one of the deepest sources of suffering for humans is feeling isolated, disconnected, lonely, not part of a community and not belonging.

Metta overcomes that sense of isolation. It puts us in touch with all sentient beings. Why? Because we find out all beings have the same basic wish we do. Every being that takes life experiences pleasure and experiences pain. Every being that takes life only wants to experience pleasure and doesn't want to experience pain. This is our common predicament. So we're all alike in this.

Any being you bring to mind, you'll find that common thread of humanity or even cross-species connection. Animals are the same—all want to be happy and don't want to suffer. When we start to see it like this, we find that that unifying force of connection is bigger than the distinctions we've made.

What thought does is it makes lots of distinctions. It makes distinctions among us of age and race and ethnicity and class and education and sexual orientation and gender identification and ability or different ability and so on. These distinctions are real.

We are not trying to deny them. We acknowledge them. We can celebrate them as our diversity. But we don't have to obsess about them to the exclusion of seeing what we have in common. And what we have in common is more fundamental and unites us rather than providing a possible ground for separation.

What unites us is this fundamental humanity. We all have access to the brahmaviharas. We all have access to the difficult emotions. They're part of our human package. The way I feel it is we all have the same heart. It responds in the same way to pleasure. It responds in the same way to pain.

It's kind of like that one human heart has just been poured into all our different packages. And then it's been subject to really different life experiences. It's been shaped by those life experiences. So our hearts have been conditioned by the different circumstances we've been in. But underneath, that same heart is there in all of us. We're the same organism, basically. We've just been conditioned and shaped differently.

There's Rumi, and then you may know his teacher was from the area of Tabriz whose name was Shams. He's known as Shams of Tabriz. Not much is known about Shams, but he left at least one poem. Here's a poem from Shams of Tabriz: "I, you, he, she, we, in the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions." These are not true distinctions. In the garden of loving kindness, these are not true distinctions. There's one heart. It's just beating in different chests. Same heart.

So this is the force of connectedness that undoes our isolation, undoes our loneliness, and opens us up to a really deep inclusivity with life.

And the last beautiful quality of loving kindness is this force of happiness. When this caring is there, when this sense of connection is there, when the mind has become unified through love and concentration, there is a sublime quality to our experience. That's why the brahmavihara is called a divine abiding. It's sort of like the Buddha was saying, if you're going to hang out in a state, this is like the highest state to hang out in. You can hang out in Nibbana, and that has no flavor, essentially. And that's really free. But if you're going to be in the world, and you're relating, these are the states, heavenly states, that you can learn to relate from.

So metta opens this up really directly. And one of the places that you might feel that the strongest is when you're really connecting with a dear friend or a benefactor. When the quality of real care and deep affection is there in that moment and it comes to life, see what that feels like. It's kind of like there's such a richness and enjoyment to that. It's satisfying on so many levels that there's just the sense that we can drop into and rest in the contentment of that place. We can abide in that quality of loving kindness. And it's kind of like it's a place we can feel we're home in.

So one of the reasons metta is such a good counterpart to vipassana is vipassana kind of takes us apart. I don't know if you felt this in this retreat, but vipassana kind of breaks us down into the six senses or the five aggregates, which John will talk about soon. Our experience, when we look at it closely, is just these momentary arisings of in-breath, sound, emotion, thought, sensation, out-breath, sight. There's nothing else there.

So this can make us feel like we're in pieces. Vipassana reveals this great space where these little bits of action are happening. Metta fills that space with warmth and puts us back together. We hold all those bits in the embrace of loving kindness, of acceptance, of warmth, of love. And when we're held there, we feel that goodness. We feel that goodness within us, and that becomes the source for loving ourselves, really caring about ourselves deeply. And that's something that, as practice evolves, we want to share with others.

This is another quote from Shantideva: "For as long as space endures and as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the misery of this world." We find this source of reliable happiness and sublime abiding, and we want to share that with others. And that is deeply satisfying.

So this is sort of the close of this interview between Oprah and the Dalai Lama.

And I just want to mention that compassion and metta can be used interchangeably in discussions like this. They're not very far apart. Compassion is primary in Tibetan Buddhism, while metta is primary for us in the Theravada tradition—the same basic principle expressed through different cultural lenses.

As this interview between Oprah and the Dalai Lama drew to a close, Oprah asked him a final question: "In my magazine I do a column called 'What I Know For Sure.' What do you know for sure? The one thing on which you have no doubt."

The Dalai Lama did not hesitate. His answer came immediately, with complete certainty: "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For happy life and happy world, there is no doubt."

Metta is too.

So let's just sit for a minute and let the metta fill the space. Let this truth settle into our hearts: Compassion is the best source of happiness for a happy life and a happy world. There is no doubt.

CHAPTER 142

Day 11: Morning Instructional Sit - Choiceless Attention

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> In this instructional talk from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong explores three distinct approaches to working with meditation anchors, culminating in an introduction to choiceless attention practice. He distinguishes between concentration-based samatha practice that maintains unwavering focus on a single object, the balanced vipassanā approach that uses the breath as a home base while remaining open to whatever calls attention, and finally choiceless attention where no preference is given to any particular object.
> Drawing from the Mahāsi Sayādaw tradition, Armstrong explains how choiceless attention involves completely unhooking from the anchor and simply noticing where attention naturally lands moment by moment. Whether attention rests on breath, body sensations, sounds, thoughts, or emotions, each becomes an equally valid object for mindfulness. He frames this as asking "What's happening now?" and attending to whatever is predominant in awareness.
> The guided meditation demonstrates this uncontrived approach, encouraging practitioners to let attention roam freely while maintaining mindful awareness of each new experience. Armstrong suggests soft mental noting as a support for staying connected to the constantly changing field of experience. This practice cultivates alertness, freshness, and receptivity while building on all the foundational instructions previously taught in the retreat sequence.

In our meditation practice here, there are three ways to relate to the anchor.

One way—and I'll use breath as an example, but understand it could also be body posture or sounds—is to use the anchor as a focus for developing primarily concentration. In this approach, you fix the attention on the anchor, let's say the breath, and you do not take notice of anything else that comes. So a sound comes, you don't move your attention voluntarily. A different body sensation arises, you don't move your attention. A hindrance arises, a storm of thinking and feeling, you don't move your attention. This is the instruction from U Ba Khin Sayadaw: just keep the attention right here on the upper lip. This is a concentration style of practice specifically designed to develop samatha, tranquility. A few people are doing this practice now in this retreat.

Most of you are not. Most of you are doing a vipassana practice. In vipassana practice, the way we've been unfolding the instructions, we've had a preferential attitude toward the anchor, toward the breath. That is, if nothing special is going on, come back to your home base and allow the attention to rest there, experience the breath, and that will help develop the concentration. But when something naturally calls the attention, you go there. Connect with sounds, with sensations, with thoughts, with emotions, intention, feeling, and so forth. Then when nothing is drawing the attention, come back to the breath. This is a great way to practice, could be for the duration of your retreat. It's a wonderful style that balances concentration and openness. But there's still in that approach a preference for the breath. We make a choice. We're choosing the focus.

We're going to open up today to a kind of meditation called choiceless attention, where there's no preference for the anchor. There's no preference for the breath. Instead, you unhook from your anchor and you just notice where the attention goes. Everywhere it lands, that becomes the focus for mindfulness. If it lands on the anchor, that's fine, but we're not choosing it. If it lands somewhere else, that's fine. If it stays with a body sensation for sixty minutes, that's fine. We let the attention go loose.

Notice what happens when you let the attention go loose. It wanders. It'll go first here, then there, then thought, then a mood, then a sight, then a sound, then a breath, then a sensation. That's what attention does when we're not trying to control it. So that's fine. That is not a problem. The challenge in choiceless attention is being with each new thing it lands on.

This is really the practice that we'll be introducing today. Let the attention go and notice where it's landing in each new moment because it will tend to move. This is a beautiful way to practice because it's so uncontrived and uncontrolled. You just let the attention do what it's going to do. Your job is just to notice: Where is it landing now and what is that thing? Connect with that new experience.

This is the foundation of Mahasi Sayadaw's meditation instructions. He was probably the best known and most influential vipassana teacher of the twentieth century, and our instructions basically derive from him. You can see how we've been building up from body posture, breath, sounds, emotions, thoughts, feeling, and intention, to come to the point where everything that happens in your sitting, you now know how to relate to mindfully. So in a way, the instructions today are putting that all together in this choiceless approach.

There are two ways you can think of it. One is you notice where the attention lands in each new moment. The mind, you'll see, has to be very fresh and alert to do that. In some ways, it's simpler to just say, "Okay, I'm just going to notice the breath. I'm there, I know the object, in, out, in, out." Fairly simple. When the attention is moving around quite freely and somewhat randomly, you really have to be alert to stay with it. Every moment is something different.

You don't know what to expect. But it brings an alertness and a freshness and a real receptivity to the meditation.

So that's one way to describe it. Where does the attention land? The other way to describe it is something that we've said a number of times. You just ask the question, "What's happening now?" And the answer to that question is whatever's predominant. That's what we call it. Whatever's standing out from the whole field of experience as the single thing that's drawing your attention, that's what's happening now, and you go there. Lots of other things, of course, are happening, but the attention can only land on one thing at a time. So that's what's happening now in terms of what we notice.

So you can think of it either of these two ways. They come to the same thing, and this is the technique of choiceless attention. This is the technique we're going to introduce this morning, and it can be a wonderful practice for you to start to work with.

So we'll now go into meditation, and I'll give the instruction as we go. First settling into an awareness of the body, relaxing the mind, relaxing the body, just resting easily. That move to relaxation reminds us we're not trying to produce anything. We're not trying to get anywhere else. We're just trying to get here. We don't have to change here. We don't have to fix here. We just have to arrive here. So we do that by relaxing.

And as we land with the attention, with the awareness in the body, we also notice the mood. How are you feeling right now? Making space and allowing that. And then is there any train of thought that you're bringing in from the period before? Just making space for the thoughts to come, not needing to pick them up, and then they'll go.

So as you land in the present moment with your body, your mood, and your thoughts, connecting first to your anchor, feeling the breath in the body, aware of the wide space for sounds, or simply feeling the body posture as you sit. Let the attention settle into your familiar anchor.

And now consciously let go of your anchor and let the attention just take in the breadth of your moment's experience. The body is there manifesting its life. Sounds come and go in the big space all around you. Thoughts and moods come. Not so locatable, but they're there. And in that big space of awareness encompassing all the senses, what are you noticing right now? And now.

And now, notice how in this broad space, the attention, if left to itself, roams around, picking up different experiences moment after moment, allowing the attention to wander as it will. It tends to settle momentarily on something that seems predominant, a stronger experience that draws it. But it may not stay long and then gets drawn somewhere else. So each time the attention notices something new, you're there with that noticing. You're mindful of the new experience.

Sometimes it can be helpful in this style of practice, especially to use the soft mental noting can help keep us directly connected to our experience in the moment. So you might every two seconds, three seconds, make a soft mental note that labels where the attention has gone. And as you do, feel that thing. So your noticing might be something like: in-breath, sensation, out-breath, sound, sensation, aversion, contraction, unpleasant, relaxing, ease, in-breath. Just in a very relaxed way, knowing in each moment what your experience is. Naming it if you find that helpful to stay connected to the moment. Be very open, very relaxed, and quite choiceless as to where the attention goes. The mindfulness will develop moment after moment in this approach.

If in this choiceless open space you ever feel lost or confused by there being too many places to pay attention, just come back to your anchor. Drop the open choiceless approach. Refocus the attention where you're comfortable. And then when you feel stable again, try letting go of the anchor and again opening up to the wide space of appearances.

Noticing in each moment what attention is highlighting.

This practice of choiceless awareness invites us into a profound intimacy with the present moment. Rather than directing our attention with willful effort, we learn to receive whatever arises in the field of consciousness with gentle recognition. Each moment becomes a teacher, each sensation a doorway into deeper understanding.

The beauty of this approach lies in its simplicity and naturalness. We are not forcing the mind into any particular state, but rather creating the conditions for awareness to reveal its own inherent clarity. Like a clear mountain lake that reflects whatever passes overhead—clouds, birds, the changing sky—our awareness can learn to mirror the flow of experience without disturbance.

As you continue this practice, remember that there is no perfect way to do it. Some moments the attention will feel scattered, other times deeply focused. Some sessions will feel spacious and easeful, others restless or unclear. All of this is the natural rhythm of practice. What matters is the gentle returning, the patient cultivation of this open, receptive awareness.

Trust in the process. Trust in your own innate capacity for wisdom and clarity. Each time you settle into this choiceless awareness, you are strengthening the very foundation of mindfulness itself—the ability to be present with what is, exactly as it is, without the need to change or fix or improve anything at all.

May this practice serve you well on your path of awakening.

CHAPTER 143

Day 14 Brahmavihāra Instructions: Mettā - All Beings-Pervading Mettā in All Directions

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

In this final guided mettā meditation of the retreat series, Guy Armstrong leads practitioners through the traditional Buddhist practice of pervading all quarters with loving-kindness. Drawing from classical sutta instructions, the meditation begins with cultivating mettā for oneself and loved ones before systematically extending compassion through the four directions—north, south, east, and west.

The teaching emphasizes the boundless nature of the brahmavihāras, explaining how mettā can extend infinitely to include all beings everywhere. Armstrong uses the beautiful metaphor of a lantern with four doors, allowing practitioners to visualize their loving-kindness as light radiating outward. The guided meditation includes practical techniques such as imagining specific beings in each direction, from local wildlife to people across continents, making the abstract concept of 'all beings' tangible and heartfelt.

This practice represents the culmination of mettā cultivation, where practitioners learn to extend genuine care beyond personal preferences to embrace all sentient life. The session includes traditional Pali phrases and chanting, connecting modern practitioners with the ancient wisdom of boundless loving-kindness as taught in the early Buddhist texts.

This afternoon will be the last of our guided meditations on loving-kindness, so we'll do another variation on metta for all beings. It might overlap a little bit with what Aaron and Bonnie have done, covering the same terrain but maybe a little differently. Did either of them talk about pervading in the four directions? That's what we're going to do today.

But first we want to warm up to the metta for all beings. It's a very inspiring concept that it's possible to have this attitude toward all beings. We verified this with the neutral person—that we really can care for those we don't know very well. They're good objects in a way because we don't have a reason to dislike them yet. That always helps. There are a lot of beings we don't have any reason to dislike, and we can really wish for their welfare.

But before we go from the neutral person to all beings, as you know, before getting out to that unbounded space, we have to go through the asteroid belt, as Sylvia Boorstein calls it, which is the difficult person. We can't conceptually go to all beings without going through the difficult people, and then the spaceship might get beat up a little. That's okay because then we go through it and we're out in this vastness of all beings.

This is the stage at which we realize the boundless nature of the Brahmavihāras. Each of them is said to be boundless in the extent to which they can be extended. The number of beings is boundless and we can extend to all those beings.

I want to give you a little chant. It's a quotation from the suttas, the words of the Buddha, but it's been made into a chant by the monastics at Amaravati. I don't remember it entirely or exactly, but I hope this will give you the flavor.

We are going to practice in such a way that we pervade each quarter of the world by directions. So we'll do north, south, east, and west one quarter at a time. And this is the way in which it is to be approached. I'll chant a little bit:

"I will abide pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with loving kindness. So above and below, around and everywhere, and to all as to myself, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will."

This is the nature of it. This is the instruction to pervade the four quarters of the universe with a heart of loving kindness, extending to all the beings there just the way we would extend to ourselves.

The risk in extending loving-kindness to all beings is that it can become a little abstract. We're just saying words, and it helps if you can have a sense of actual beings that are included. This is the beauty of extending in the four directions.

Just so you know the orientation of the hall: That wall to your left is north. The wall behind me is east. That wall to your right is south, and the wall at the very back of the hall is west. When we turn to those directions, one thing that's lovely to do is to imagine all the beings who are to the north of us. If you know people in Novato or Seattle, or you can imagine people in the Yukon and the polar bears and the seals and the Inuit and the caribou who roam up to the north, it's beautiful to send loving kindness to beings that you can imagine. And similarly to the other four quarters.

Because there's a little risk in loving kindness for all beings being a little abstract, we like to warm up the space first with individuals. We'll do that by going through first ourself, and then a benefactor or friend, wherever you feel the warmer connection, and then we'll extend to all beings in this pervading way. So we'll go through a little bit of guiding.

Since I mentioned last time this metaphor where one surrounds oneself with one's dearest people and imagines them sending love so that you can just purely receive it, we'll do that as a little guided meditation on the way to all beings.

So let's begin.

Sit comfortably. Be relaxed. Let your attention come into your heart center so that you have a place to feel the metta in a grounded way in the body. You can put a hand on your chest if that is helpful to connect.

As you connect with your heart center and any warmth that you find there, bring to mind your sense of yourself. This could be through just feeling yourself sitting here and now. It could be remembering a photograph of yourself that you like. It could be imagining yourself in some place you feel happy, content, or safe.

As you connect with yourself, turn your attention to your good qualities. Remember the things that you appreciate about yourself. Seeing your good qualities is the key to evoking the loving kindness. At this point in the retreat, if nothing else comes to mind, just think of all the hours of good intention you've put forth here when it wasn't easy. You didn't want to sit or didn't want to walk or didn't even want to pay attention.

But you kept coming into the present moment because of your commitment to this journey—purifying your heart, and bringing forth wisdom and love. This is very noble and very rare in the world.

And so with that sense of your own goodness, your unquestioned goodness, begin saying the phrases of loving kindness to yourself:

May I be safe from harm.
May I be happy.
May I be healthy.
May I live with ease.

Now I'd like to invite you to bring into the room with you the people that you love the best in the world. Have them sit in a half circle in front of you. You can invite them in maybe one by one so that as each person enters, you make that connection with them. It could be your benefactor and your dear friend. It could be your children. It could be your parents, other close friends, partners, family members. Let them come in one by one and take a seat in front of you. Let them be smiling at you, happy to be with you today, happy to join you in the loving kindness. Take a minute to bring your people in.

As you look out on your little circle of loved ones, remember that they've come here to be with you. You're at the center and they're here for you. Each of them is looking at you with a lot of love, a lot of appreciation, because they all know what a great person you are—even if there are just two or three people. They know you and love you.

Now imagine that your phrases for loving kindness, the ones you've been using for yourself, are being spoken by them, being sent as their wishes to you. You might want to hear them in the voices that are there. You might want to just imagine the chorus. But of course, change the words from "may I be happy" to "may you be happy" because they're wishing you this well-being.

Start repeating the phrases that you've been using, imagining them coming from this circle of dear people. Their metta wishes are entirely sincere and they're just streaming from their hearts into yours. It may be hard to take in all their loving wishes, and just continue to open one by one to each wish from each person. You might even feel you're not worthy of their love, but they keep sending it. They're not asking for anything back. They're just offering and ours is just to receive.

When you feel ready, you can thank your circle of friends for their visit and all their kindnesses. Or if you'd like to invite them to stay a little longer, that's fine too. You can allow them to go, or if you want to continue with this, you can allow them to stay a bit more.

If you feel ready to move on, you can bring in a benefactor or two or a friend or two and send your loving kindness to them, feeling the warmth of the connection you have and seeing their goodness.

As I wish to be safe, may you too be safe and protected from harm.
May you be happy and live with joy.
May your body support you with strength.
May you live with the ease of well-being.

Continue to connect with your benefactor or friend or a few, sending out wishes for their loving kindness, for their welfare.

Now we'll open up the field a bit and become familiar with the four directions by first noticing the feeling of metta directed just within the hall—everyone who's within the hall right now, but we'll do it by one quarter at a time.

First, the people who are in front of you. You might remember from when you came in the room, who's there? Remember familiar faces, the backs of their sitting posture, back of their heads. Have a sense that your loving kindness can reach out and touch all the people in front of you and send your metta phrases to them.

May you all be safe and protected from harm.
May you be happy.
May you be healthy.
May you live with ease.

As you do this, let the images of certain people come into your mind and stay there for a while so that the metta becomes personal for them. You can remember times you've seen them here, in the dining hall, around, seen them sitting, walking, practicing. Times they may have looked happy, times they may have looked sad.

All the people in Central and South America. Penguins and whales in Antarctica. Let particular beings come to mind so your loving kindness has a place to rest. Maybe someone you know who lives in that direction. Hold them in the light for a few moments, wishing them well.

If you have dear friends or family members to the south, let them receive this radiance of care. Let them feel held by your good intentions. The light of metta knows no boundaries - it can reach across any distance to touch hearts that need it.

And now close the southern door and open the western side of your lantern. Let the light shine to the west, behind you. Beings in the Pacific Ocean - the great whales, the sea otters, the vast schools of fish. Islands in the Pacific. People in Japan, China, Southeast Asia, India. All the practitioners around the world who sit in meditation at this very moment.

Think of particular people if they come to mind. Maybe someone you've never met but heard about, someone whose story touched you. Let your metta reach them. Let it span the oceans and continents to find them where they are.

The light doesn't diminish as it travels far. If anything, it seems to grow brighter as it meets other hearts, other beings who also wish for happiness and freedom from suffering.

Now close the western door and open the northern side. Let your loving kindness shine north. Beings in Oregon, Washington, Canada, Alaska. The great forests, the mountains, the arctic regions. Polar bears and caribou. Indigenous communities. Cities filled with people going about their daily lives, each carrying their own hopes and struggles.

If there's someone special to the north that you care about, let them rest in this light for a while. Send them your wishes for safety, for happiness, for ease in their lives.

And now, slowly, open all four doors of the lantern at once. Let the light shine in every direction simultaneously - east, south, west, and north. Feel how your heart's capacity for loving kindness can radiate boundlessly, touching beings in all quarters of the earth.

There's no limit to this care. It doesn't get used up or depleted. The more we offer it, the more abundant it becomes. Feel this infinite quality of metta as it streams from your heart center to encompass all life everywhere.

Continue sitting with this sense of boundless loving kindness filling all directions, touching all beings, near and far, known and unknown.

Central America. South America. Penguins in Antarctica—all wishing for safety, happiness, health, ease.

And now all beings to the west, behind you. Close the door on the south, open the door on the west side of the lantern. The light is pervading that quarter, however far it goes. All the beings to the west—Point Reyes, all the seals and sea lions, to Hawaii, Japan, Korea, China, Southeast Asia. On to Burma, Thailand, India. All the humans, all the creatures wanting to be happy, not to suffer.

Close the door to the west, checking that the lantern is still lit. If the lantern becomes dim, you can do some loving kindness for people that are close to you—friend or benefactor—just to strengthen the light a little.

And then open the lantern door to the north, to your left. Let the brightness of your loving kindness shine north, however far it goes. All the beings in Northern California, Shasta, the coast, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, into Canada, Vancouver, Alberta, all the First Nations people of Canada. All the wildlife—the eagles, bears, deer and elk.

And then finally, take the doors away from all four sides of the lantern and let the light pervade the space in all directions so that the loving kindness can reach as far as it will. For all beings everywhere. Beings in states of suffering, beings in states of gladness. Beings in states of good health, beings in states of ill health. Human beings, creatures of the land, the sea and the air, rivers and lakes. All beings everywhere wanting to be happy and not to suffer.

Let the loving kindness be abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will.

May all beings be safe and protected from harm.
May all beings be happy and peaceful.
May all beings be healthy and strong.
May all beings live with ease.

CHAPTER 144

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

> Guy Armstrong offers a profound exploration of one of Buddhism's most challenging teachings: anattā or not-self. Drawing from the Anattalakkhana Sutta (SN 22.59), the Buddha's second discourse where all five ascetics achieved enlightenment, he examines how our conventional sense of 'I' is constructed through identification with the five khandhas (aggregates): rūpa (form), vedanā (feeling), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness).
> Armstrong illuminates how we mistakenly equate ourselves with these aggregates in various ways - sometimes identifying as the body, sometimes as the owner of the body, sometimes as emotions, sometimes as their observer. Using accessible examples and personal stories, including his sister's death, he demonstrates how these aggregates are merely conditioned phenomena that arise and pass away, lacking the permanence and unity we attribute to 'self.'
> The talk reveals how the sense of self emerges through upādāna (clinging) to any of the aggregates, creating dukkha through separation and fear. When we see these processes clearly without grasping, we experience the freedom and spaciousness that comes with wisdom - what one teacher called 'no self, no problem.' This exploration offers both intellectual understanding and practical guidance for recognizing selfing in meditation and daily life.

The subject of the talk this evening is the five aggregates are not self. As you might deduce from the title, this is going to be a talk about one of Buddhism's central teachings—the teachings on not-self.

The teaching on not-self is one of the most powerful teachings that the Buddha gave, and it's a teaching that's unique, I believe, to Buddhism. It is often paired with two other pointings: impermanence and unsatisfactoriness. Together these three—impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self—are considered the three characteristics of things that exist. Tonight we're just going to look at the last of these, the teaching on not-self. Impermanence you're probably fairly familiar with. Bonnie is going to talk about unsatisfactoriness or dukkha in a couple of nights, so this will round out the three characteristics.

The teaching on not-self is a powerful teaching, a profound teaching, but it's also one of the hardest to understand in all of Buddhism. So welcome to the evening. In that it is not easy to understand, I just want to offer this as an exploration of the theme. It's not that you are supposed to get it all tonight. Some of you may already have a very good understanding of this topic, and hopefully this will be a refresher and maybe a little deepening. If this is somewhat new to you, then don't strain too much conceptually. Just kind of take in the drift of it and don't bother thinking too much about it. Don't worry if it doesn't all make sense. It's not supposed to on first hearing. And also notice if there's any resistance to hearing it. We are a little bit attached to the self, so there might not be an interest in hearing about not being there. Just notice that.

What the Buddha said is that the sense of self is not really intrinsic to our experience of being a human being, but it's something that arises based on our concepts and our beliefs. So in meditation, we want to look at what that means. Is it possible for us to have experiences where the sense of self isn't present or isn't really intrusive? How does that feel? And how would it feel when the self comes in again?

This belief in self, the Buddha more or less equated with this fundamental factor of ignorance. One of the fundamental ways that ignorance manifests is that we don't understand the truth about the sense of self. And this is a cause for a lot of self-concern. The more we dwell on self-concern, the more we isolate ourselves from the wider field of humanity, creatures, and nature. That isolation, which is engendered by our thinking, leads to a sense of separation. The separation leads to a sense of fear. We create this strong duality between the self and the other, between self and the world. And then we live in that tension. Once we've created the duality and firmly established it and believe in it, there's a tension that we live within that creates a fundamental anxiety in us.

There's this wonderful teacher from India, who passed away twenty or more years ago, named Nisargadatta Maharaj. He was a Vedanta teacher who lived and taught in Bombay. He wrote a powerful book called I Am That—highly recommended if you haven't encountered it. And this is one of his comments: "All yogas"—and yoga is a word that just means joining or union, so he would see our way of practice as another yoga in his system—"All yogas, all real spiritual practices, have only one aim: to save you from the calamity of separate existence."

So right now, we are kind of in that calamity. Most of us are living from that sense of separation. And the teaching on not-self is to bring us out of that, to see clearly the way things are and bring us out of that. Because when we release the self-concern, we can open in a much broader way to life. We have a much more inclusive vision of life. The boundlessness of the brahmaviharas are one expression of that. And the expression of wisdom leads to spaciousness, openness, lightness, and ease.

So in the talk this evening, we want to look at how the self gets formed and how it might be to see things without it. This notion of "I"—basically self—appears whenever we say the words "I," "me," "my," "mine," and really believe in them. I mean, it's possible—the Buddha talked about "I." He used it, but he wasn't caught in it. But for the most part, when we use it, we believe in it.

And that's a problem.

So this sense of I appears frequently in our thoughts. It's the center of our life. It's kind of our North Star. Everything revolves around the I—our thoughts, our views, our actions, our speech, our decisions, our values, our life's direction. And so we want to understand what it really means.

This I seems so self-evident, but have you ever found it? Have you ever come across it in meditation? You've been exploring mind and body in a very dedicated way for these two weeks and a long time before. Have you ever found this I?

So William James, the philosopher, said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." And the Dalai Lama said, "When you think something is real, but you can't find it, that's a sign of delusion." It may not be as real as you think.

So the classical analogy is you're walking in the forest and you come upon this thing on the ground that is colored—it's white, red, and green, and it's about this long and it's in a coil on the ground. And as you're walking along, you're convinced that's a snake. And so you jump back in fear. And as you get a little closer, you look at it more precisely. Oh, it's a piece of rope. I thought it was a snake, but it's actually a piece of rope. Your perception has become clarified. Now you're no longer afraid. The rope's not going to bite you.

So it's just this way. We think that this human body and mind and heart contain a self. And that's scary. That's separating. It leads to isolation. We're afraid of dying. When we understand it the way it is, it takes that fear away. So it's a matter of correcting our perception.

This use of the word I comes with some what I would call faulty logic. We use it all the time. We've used it since we learned to speak. It's been a very common word for us. And we've just kind of built our views around the conventions of language. But we've never really stopped to think about it.

So let's look at some of these ways language is just kind of funny. So let me ask a simple question: How tall are you? And you can answer that pretty easily. I would say I'm five feet, ten inches tall. So what I really mean is the body is five feet, ten inches tall, right? My thoughts aren't five foot ten, my mood isn't five foot ten, but the body is five foot ten. So here we're using I to mean the body. "I am five foot ten" means the body is five foot ten. We're equating I with the body.

Okay, now let me ask: What color are your eyes? Again, easy question. I'd say—this is not a trick—so I'd say, my eyes are brown. So now I'm not the body. That would be the eyes. You know, if I were to say, "I'm brown," that would mean I'm the eyes. But I'm saying my eyes are brown. That means now I'm the owner of the body. And that means something separate from it that possesses it.

So which are you? Are you the body or are you the owner of it? And can you be both? Does that really make sense?

That you're both the body and the owner of it?

Let's examine the mind. We might speak of our emotions and say, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." Here we're equating the "I" with the emotion of happiness or sadness—so here I am the emotion. But we can also speak of "my joys" and "my sorrows." Now we are the owner of the emotion. So which are you? Are you the emotion or the owner of it? Can you be both?

Another way we commonly think of ourselves—at least I do, and you can tell me if you do—is that we feel the "I" is really a small being located in the head, behind the eyes and between the ears, kind of in the center here, looking out at the world and having all kinds of experiences. This "I" is doing the seeing, the hearing, the observing. It's somehow separate from what is being seen and heard and observed. There's a separate little being that's like the essence—the little guy right in the center of things who's observing, watching, hearing, experiencing it all. This is the sense of "I" as observer.

There's also the sense that this "I" should be able to control things. We should be able to make our body feel better when we sit. We should have a better mood when we wake up in the morning. It's this kind of experiencer and controller that has that responsibility.

So these are five ways we use the word "I"—as the body, as the owner of the body, as the emotions, as the owner of the emotions, and as a separate observer somewhere inside the head. Can all those be true? Or have we created a really confused concept that meditation might help us straighten out? Maybe. Maybe. Maybe.

Here's a quote from the Buddha: "In whatever way they conceive of the self, the truth is ever other than that." We may be conceiving it a little bit wrong.

I had a teacher who put it even more bluntly. He said, "Everything you think is wrong." That's a good wake-up call. It reminds me of something someone said on a talk radio show. Talk radio shows are not generally the font of wisdom in this country, but one incisive comment was about the mind: "The mind—often wrong, seldom in doubt."

This is how it is about the self. We really believe it's like this, and we seldom doubt it. But it may be helpful to question this belief, because as long as we believe in the self in this way, we're bound up with separation, we're bound with fear.

So how did the Buddha see—how did an awakened being see—our process, our existence? When you and I look at one another, typically we see a person. Certainly before we get engaged in meditative insight, we look at each other and we see a person.

There's a sixth-century commentary from Sri Lanka called the Visuddhimagga. It was a compilation of meditation techniques and insight practices from that time. It's still used today as a manual in Buddhist countries. In the Visuddhimagga, the text says that imagining you're looking at someone and seeing a person is not the way a trained meditator would see it.

The analogy it uses is with a butcher. Now, personally, I've been a vegetarian for many years. I'm committed to animal welfare, and I don't like to talk about the suffering and slaughter of animals. Nonetheless, this text uses the analogy of a butcher. So please excuse that, but this is the classical reference.

When a butcher carves up the carcass of a cow that he's going to sell for meat, he doesn't think to himself, "cow, cow, cow." He thinks, "rump, sirloin, tenderloin, ribs." Because he's so familiar with the cow, he knows what those parts are. He doesn't just see cow—he sees the details of cow.

So the Visuddhimagga said that one who has looked deeply into the mind-body process doesn't just say "person." They see the particular parts that make up a person, both in the mental sphere and in the physical sphere.

When the Buddha talked about what a person is, he used two different models. You could say he saw in two ways. One of them is six types of sense organs and six objects.

So this is from a discourse called the Sutta on Totality from the Samyutta Nikaya. Let me read a section of it:

"Bhikkhus"—and this applies to you all because you're practitioners—"what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully and I will teach you the totality of life. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality would not be speaking of something they knew about."

This is pretty exhaustive, isn't it? It describes our experience as human beings—the six senses, including the mind as the sixth, and their corresponding objects. That's what our experience is made up of. It's beautiful because this is so simple. At any time there are only six things happening: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects with their organs.

This maps really nicely to our meditation practice. You may have noticed that many of our instructions follow this schema. The Buddha mostly used the map of the six sense bases to cut through craving by highlighting where we get desirous of pleasant experience at these sense doors.

But there's another model that he used just as often—the model that John talked about a couple of nights ago called the five aggregates. The five aggregates also describe this totality of experience, but they divide it up differently. This device the Buddha used to cut through wrong view—wrong view meaning the sense of belief in a self.

So we're going to examine this a little tonight by looking through the false way that we create a sense of self. And I want to say that this can sound abstract. Perhaps in listening to the talk the other night and perhaps in listening to this talk, you'll think, "Oh, this is just intellectual theory. This is Buddhist jargon. It doesn't have anything to do with me and my real experience of life."

But I want to share that the five aggregates really became alive for me and meaningful when one of my older sisters died. She was five years older than me and she died when she was fifty-one, quite unexpectedly. She had an illness for a long time, but it wasn't life-threatening. And then all of a sudden one evening, she had an attack of some kind. She went into cardiac arrest and the medical technicians were not able to bring her back.

I had talked with her on the phone just a few days before, and she was bright and vital and energetic. She was a big personality. I had a close connection with her—she had a lot of humor and a lot of heart. And to hear that she had passed away so suddenly was really a shock to me.

I'm sure you have probably all come into contact with this around death—that somebody can seem so alive, so real, so solid, such a strong person, and then at some point they're just gone. And I couldn't make sense of it. She had been there, and then she was just gone.

The thing that helped me understand it was looking at her experience through the five aggregates and understanding the different elements that make up a human being. And by understanding her, I came to understand myself a lot more deeply. It brought me a great deal more peace and ease with the process of dying.

So the five aggregates can be very meaningful in our exploration of them. They are really a description of life and, by extension, a description of the ending of life.

The Pali word is khanda. It covers five elements: form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. The first aggregate is physical—it means all physical matter in the five senses: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch. The other four are mental.

I don't want to go through those in detail because I think John probably covered them quite well. I do want to highlight a little bit this factor of perception, because perception is something we don't spend a lot of time talking about, but it's a really powerful quality.

I may have mentioned in a morning discussion that what we see in the visual field is just patches of form and color. It's quite interesting, especially if you take out the added dimension of depth. If you cover an eye and just look with one eye, you take away the depth perception. And what we really see are patches of form and color.

When artists come to learn to paint accurately, they have to learn to see this two-dimensional view of things—this play of light and shape—in order to represent it correctly. So in this model of form and color, we have learned over time to draw elements out and assign names to them: cushion, floor, person, chair, lamp, door, ceiling.

Well, we had to learn that perception. We might think it happens automatically, but it's not like that. This is a description from Oliver Sacks, the neurologist who had been involved in treating a man who had been blind from the time he was very young—blind almost from infancy—and then found out that he could have an operation to restore his sight.

The man's name was Virgil. He was lying in the hospital bed, his sight having been restored. Sacks was there and the surgeon was there, and they were peeling off the bandages from his eyes. Everyone thought he would exclaim, "Wow, this is fantastic, I can see again! Here you all are and it's just wonderful!" It didn't happen like that.

This is Sacks' description of Virgil's first moments after the surgery: "He seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing, at the surgeon who stood before him still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke—saying, 'Well?'—did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face." Virgil told Sacks later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, meaningless—a blur. Then out of the blur came a voice that said, "Well?" And only then did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face, and indeed the face of his surgeon.

Virgil had gone through the years when the perceptual wiring gets developed in the brain, and he hadn't learned how to do that. So as a grown man, he couldn't recognize things. With a lot of training, some of that perception started to occur for him naturally, but it never came back fully the way it is for us. He went through the rest of his adult life struggling to perceive objects out of the blur of form and color.

For us, we do this perception almost automatically. I'm going to add a little postscript here because it ties into what for me is an interesting question. There was a question this morning about whether mindfulness is a conceptual activity. The Abhidhamma says that the proximate cause for mindfulness to arise is strong perception. Can you get that? When you perceive clearly what your experience is—in the nature of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, in-breath, out-breath, mood, feeling tone, et cetera—mindfulness happens. Mindfulness happens with the recognition of what we're experiencing, and that is perception. So when there's strong perception, mindfulness follows.

Now, is perception a conceptual activity? When you walk into the room and you see Sally and you recognize her as Sally, does it require words to do that? Or when you look up at this altar and you see the statue of the Buddha, you recognize that's what the statue is of. Do you say words every time you see that? It doesn't require words, does it? If you see a good friend, do you say to yourself, "Good friend is coming"? No, you just recognize that's a good friend.

So perception is built on names. We recognize it's in the category: mat, chair, statue, painting, door, et cetera. But the recognition, when it happens, doesn't require the concepts to come up again. In this way, perception doesn't have to be a conceptual activity, and mindfulness doesn't need to be a conceptual activity, though it is built on our prior familiarity with those categories. I hope that's clear.

Perception is very powerful because once we perceive something in the world, we form a view about it and then we act in the world based on that view. If we perceive someone as friendly to us, we act toward them based on that view and we tend to respond with friendliness. If we perceive someone as hostile or critical to us, we form a view about that person and then we tend to respond to them out of that view. So the moment of perception is a very powerful moment in forming our mental structures and then conditioning our actions.

One of the kickers about perception is it's not always reliable. I was practicing on a meditation retreat on the East Coast. It was a fall morning, and I was doing my walking meditation outdoors when all of a sudden I heard a brass band coming up the street. I distinctly heard horns and trumpets, and they were coming closer and closer as I was walking. This is a little bit unusual in a small town in the middle of Massachusetts—to have a marching band come up the street on a fall morning. So I stopped my walking and just listened.

Gradually the marching band transformed into the bumps and rattles and squeaks of a garden cart that was being pushed down a gravel track on two bicycle tires. I thought I had heard a brass band. I was convinced I heard drums and trumpets, horns. And I hadn't. I'd heard a garden cart on bicycle tires. So perception is not always reliable.

But I might have reacted out of thinking there was a brass band coming.

So one of the ways the Buddha said we don't perceive things correctly is that we think things are permanent when they're not. We think things are going to be satisfying when they're not. We think things have a self when they don't. And we think things are really beautiful when they may actually be a little dangerous. So these are our misperceptions that go on a lot. And part of the difficulty I'd had with my sister's death was some assumption of her permanence, of her continuity, that hadn't taken into account the way she actually was.

So perception is also interesting because sometimes when we put a label on things, we stop seeing it correctly. Notice this if you label something as pain in the body—sometimes that word forms a block and makes it difficult to feel exactly what's there. Or there may be a strong emotion like hurt or regret, and you think, oh, that's either hurt or that's guilt. Maybe the word "guilt" colors it so much you can't get in and actually feel it. So perception can cloud our ability to be with a direct experience. Just to be aware of that.

For example, this big metal thing in front of me—I assume most of you perceive it as a bell because we strike it at the end of sittings and it makes a sound and it's very useful. So you look at it normally, you perceive it as a bell. Could it be a begging bowl? Could there be a big monk or nun who would like to carry it around and have you fill it up with rice and curry? Sure. If you had a big statue, could you turn it upside down on the statue and it'd be a really nice little chapeau? Sure, it could be. If we get attached to the word "bell," we don't see all those possibilities. We don't see the thing just in its bare suchness because the word has conditioned us.

So a Zen koan—they might hold this out, a Zen master might hold it out and say, "What is this? If you say it is a striker, I will hit you. But if you say it is not a striker, I will hit you too." I heard a lot of stories like that, and that's why I ended up in Vipassana instead of Zen. I had a feeling I would get hit a lot.

There was this nice dialogue kind of along these lines. In the late seventies, these two really respected Buddhist teachers came together. They were both in Cambridge, Massachusetts at the same time. One was Kalu Rinpoche, who was a great master in the Tibetan Kagyu lineage. The other was Seungsahn Sunim, who was a Zen master from Korea. Some friends were in touch with them both and thought, wow, it'd be really great to bring these two enlightened beings together. You know those stories about how enlightened beings totally recognize each other's enlightenment—they're just like two mirrors meeting each other, they're both so empty, and there are these tremendous heart openings of recognition for kindred spirits. They thought it would be something like that.

It wasn't.

So they sat them down, they served them tea and put out some fruit for them. And as they were still just settling in and chatting a little bit, Seungsahn Sunim, the Zen master, picked up one of the oranges and held it out to Kalu Rinpoche and said, "What is this?" Because that's the way he was used to checking someone's enlightenment from the Zen tradition. "What is this?"

Kalu just kind of looked at it, smiled a little bit, kept doing his beads—he was doing some mantra on his mala. Seungsahn Sunim didn't get an answer, so he held out the orange again. He said, "What is this?" And Kalu just turned to his translator and said something, and the translator said, "Oh, Rinpoche asked, don't they have oranges in Korea?"

So it's all about perception, right? It's an interesting story because sometimes cross-culturally, dharma doesn't exactly translate that easily. Even expressions of dharma are culturally conditioned. Helpful to remember.

So this is the area of perception and how it can be sometimes accurate, sometimes not so accurate. The fourth aggregate is volitional formations—mostly thoughts and emotions, movements of mind. And then consciousness, the knowing quality that receives all the different sense objects, that holds them and knows them in that very basic way.

So our human experience is made up of form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

That's it.

Why is that freeing? Why is that significant? Because there's one element there that we think about a lot that's not in that list. There's no "I" in that list. There's nothing in the center that they all belong to. There's nothing in the center that controls them. There's nothing in the center that is the essence of those aggregates. Our experience is just form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

If you want to condense it a little bit and make it more approachable, think of it as three aggregates. Collapse feeling, perception, and formations all together. Call those formations. This makes it more immediate for me. So our experience is: we have a body, we have consciousness that reveals sense objects, and then we have thoughts and emotions, feelings, perceptions, meditative states like calm, concentration, equanimity. These are all the mental formations that happen inside us. This is what a human being is—these three things. There's not a separate self in the middle of all that.

It's kind of like—can anybody see what this is? This is a pen, right? Everybody would agree this is a pen. We have no trouble identifying it and naming it. But suppose I start to take it apart. Suppose I deconstruct the pen for us to look at. Now I've got a cap, I've got a barrel, I've got an end, I've got a cartridge, and I've got a tip. Is this still a pen? Would you call this a pen? It's not really, is it? It's just pieces. When they're put together in a certain way—we put it all back together—then we call it a pen. But when the pieces disassemble, it's no longer a pen.

This is the way it is with a human being. We're so accustomed to seeing these pieces joined that all we can think of is "human being" or "pen." But when we apply meditative insight to our experience, we see that we are only made up of these different pieces. They are not intrinsically bound together.

This is what my sister's death revealed. Her formations and her consciousness were not intrinsically bound to her form. At death, they separated. That's what I hadn't understood before. I thought they were intrinsically bound as one thing. But in death, the pieces come apart. And then we understand the human being is made up of different pieces. It's not just one thing.

So we still use the pen. It's still quite useful. I can describe it to you. It's a ballpoint pen. It's gray and black in its barrel, and it writes with black ink. It's a medium tip. That's a useful designation. It's useful to know that. But we don't deceive ourselves that the pen is one substantial entity. We see how it's just been put together. It's a collection of pieces that we conventionally designate as pen.

So this is what we want to see about ourselves. We're a collection of pieces—form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. That's all.

But when you really look at it honestly, we feel ourselves to be relatively permanent and substantial. We expect to continue in some recognizable form. We expect to be happy if we arrange things properly. We think of ourselves as unified and coherent. And we feel ourselves to be fundamentally separate from the rest of the universe—that I am here and you are there, and there's some basic separation between us.

These are the assumptions we operate from, but they're all contrary to what investigation reveals. When we look closely, we see that everything is impermanent. We see that trying to make impermanent things give us lasting satisfaction is a recipe for suffering. We see that what we call "self" is actually multiple processes happening simultaneously. And we see that these processes are deeply interconnected with everything else.

So the spiritual path is really about coming to see clearly what's actually happening, rather than operating from our unconscious assumptions about what's happening. It's about waking up to reality as it actually is, rather than continuing to live in the story we tell ourselves about reality.

The Buddha's insight was that when we see clearly—when we see the impermanent, unsatisfactory, and empty nature of all phenomena—we naturally stop grasping at them so tightly. We stop trying to extract permanent satisfaction from impermanent things. And in that letting go, there's tremendous freedom and peace.

This doesn't mean we become nihilistic or that nothing matters. Remember, conventional designation is still useful. We still say "pen" and we still say "Sally." We still take care of our health and pay our bills and love our friends. But we hold it all more lightly. We're not desperately trying to solidify and protect something that was never solid to begin with.

You know, I'm a male, I'm a certain age, I'm a certain height, I have this background and these characteristics and this conditioning. It kind of makes up this person. We think that.

But we attribute some things to the self that are over and above that. The central one is we attribute continuity. We think that there's some permanence or ongoing nature to this thing we call I. A simple question: don't you feel like the same person now who went to third grade? If you link up all your memories, doesn't it feel like you've been there for all those years? Or just over the course of this retreat, don't you feel like the same person who walked in the door a couple of weeks ago? Well, of course you feel different in many ways, but there's this continuity we attribute to self.

If we didn't have this assumption of continuity, you wouldn't be afraid of dying. We're afraid of dying because we see the continuity coming to an end. What's going to die? Me. Me is going to continue up to the point of death, but then there's this cliff that ends it. And that's scary to me, because the assumption is the me no longer continues then.

The second thing is that we feel ourselves at the center of experience, and in a way, separate from the experience. When we say something like "I have joys," we feel ourselves separate from the experience of the joy. "I have sorrows"—we feel ourselves separate from the experience of the sorrows. So there's this assumption of a self in the middle of everything. That's actually, if you look at it closely, an identification with the fifth aggregate of consciousness. It's consciousness that receives joys. It's consciousness that receives sorrows. And when we identify with consciousness, then we say, "I am receiving joy. I am receiving sorrow."

We think that we should be unitary, right? The self should be unitary. Otherwise, how many selves do you think you are? Usually people who think they're more than one self—somebody calls the paramedics for them. This is not generally considered a sign of mental health. So we think we're one, not many. So are you both your liver and your compassion? How many selves are we? Liver, compassion, toenail, perception, pleasant feeling tone, joy, eyeballs.

And we think we should be unique, right? My self is different from your self. Some of the aggregates fail on this count. We'll get to that in a minute.

So just think about this body. If we claim it as I or mine, we can either have a lot of pride about that or we can have a certain amount of embarrassment, even shame. We maybe don't really want the body that we've got. But did you have anything to do with how it came out? Did you choose it? Did you shape it? You know, by diet, by exercise, by healthcare, we have a little bit of influence, but did you choose how tall you are? How broad your shoulders are? Whether you're dark or fair? We didn't choose any of that.

What did? Well, our father's sperm met our mother's egg. They connected. They lived in the womb for nine months. The cells multiplied and specialized. Something popped out into the world. It was nourished by milk and water and food and air and sunlight. And it grew, grew, grew.

Here it stands today, totally beyond our control. This body is simply a physical process that initiated at the moment of conception and has unfolded into what we see now. Can you really take responsibility for how it has turned out? Yet we do this constantly, don't we? We assign "I" to the body and feel either proud or embarrassed about its appearance or condition.

Actually, this form is completely beyond our control because the body is simply part of physical nature. It's nature itself that has done this work—not our will, not our choice. This body is the result of processes within physical nature.

One of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, expressed this beautifully. He said, "This body came out of nature. It's part of nature. It never departed from nature and it belongs to nature. Give it back to nature. That will be a big relief for you."

You can understand emotions in the same way. Emotions are simply part of mental nature. Every human being has the same range of emotions—we all experience fear and joy, anger and happiness, sadness and contentment. We all have access to this complete spectrum. This emotional range is simply part of the mental nature that accompanies being human, so we don't need to claim these feelings as "I" or "mine."

Consciousness itself is a particularly interesting faculty because it too is just nature—part of mental nature. What makes it especially intriguing is why it doesn't make sense to identify with consciousness either. One common approach is to say, "I am just the observer," or in more sophisticated meditation terms, "I am vast awareness. Everything comes and goes within me. I am not the comings and goings—I am the vast awareness that holds it all."

This could become a philosophical view, but that awareness isn't actually different between you and me and everyone else. That awareness is fundamentally the same. Since there's nothing unique in it, there's nothing that can be called a separate self, a distinct "I."

So the sense of "I" is not intrinsic. How then is it generated?

Shortly after Ananda ordained—he was the Buddha's cousin and attendant for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life, very close to him—another monk was giving Ananda instruction. This monk told him, "It is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging. And by clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness."

This is a profound observation. The "I" isn't present until we cling to one of the aggregates. It's this grasping hold of a part of our experience that constructs the "I" and gives us that sense of self.

The Buddha expressed this in similar terms. When asked how the belief in a self comes to be, he said, "An untaught ordinary person"—this is a key phrase from his teaching, referring to someone who hasn't heard the Dharma, hasn't understood its pointing—"regards form as self." This would be like saying, "I am the body."

Or self as possessing form—"I am the owner of the body."

Or form in self—"The body is part of me." You might think this makes sense if you believe you're the vast awareness and the body is part of that vast awareness, so the body becomes part of you.

Or self is in form—"I'm really inside the body, inside the head, looking out at everything that's happening."

These represent four ways of identifying with form alone. You can multiply this by five for all five aggregates, giving us twenty different ways we construct a sense of self. I'll let you work through the other sixteen on your own.

You have another two weeks or a month to explore this, so continue your investigation.

But more simply, the "I" gets built when we grasp at any phenomenon at a sense door. A simple example: let's say there's a pain in the knee while you're sitting. If you're just very clear and mindful, you'll simply note "unpleasant sensation." But if grasping comes upon it—maybe there's some fear, some worry, some frustration—you go, "My knee hurts." The "my" is extra. Even the "knee" is extra, truth to tell. All you really know is unpleasant sensation.

But when we turn to it and go, "Oh, that's my knee and that's my pain," we create a sense of self that wasn't there before. So that's the turning toward and taking hold of something out of some kind of fear or desire, generally.

You can take a look at this with any experience at the sense doors where you start hearing the word "I" or "my." For instance, some fear arises and the thought is, "Oh, that's my old pattern." That's a form of grasping and a form of identifying—it links through time, creating a belief about the self: "I'm the owner of that old pattern."

So what if the fear just arose and all you knew was fear, and there was no "I" or "my" connected? Then the sense of self isn't arising.

This momentary grasping and creating a sense of "I" or "my" is the activity that we call selfing. We construct a self moment by moment when we take hold of something and claim it. That's all. If you don't do that, sense of self never has to arise.

So this is the Buddha continuing: "Therefore, all form should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom thus: This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself."

When there's no grasping and self is not created, how does that feel? If you've had that insight or that understanding, it feels good, doesn't it? It feels open, spacious, peaceful, free, easy.

This is a very interesting place to examine and pay attention to in meditation practice. When is the mind simply open, receiving sense impressions at the six sense doors, and when does grasping take place that claims one of those—driven by greed or aversion typically? Then contraction comes in. Then struggle comes in. Conflict comes in. The self comes in—sense of self.

Notice for yourself: when are things free of that sense of self? How does that feel? And then when does a grasping moment take place that gives birth to a sense of self? It's very helpful to notice.

This opening of the door to seeing not-self is not a cold intellectual experience. When we are able to see without the contraction of self, the world is more open, the heart is more open, and we feel less burdened. We feel lighter, easier, without that pressure.

Jack Kornfield tells this story of visiting an old monk in Sri Lanka when he was still a monk. He was a young guy and a Westerner, and the monk thought, "Well, I'll check this young monk out." The monk said, "Oh, what do you understand as the central teaching of the Buddha?" And Jack said, "Well, my understanding of the central teaching is that there really is no self within the field of our experience—no separate self." And the monk said, "Oh, very good!" He said, "No self, no problem! No problem!" And he just started laughing.

So this is the experience of no-self. Check it out. Take a look in your own practice and see what it feels like when this grasping insistence isn't happening.

This kind of makes sense of this famous saying of Nisargadatta Maharaj, whom I quoted earlier. You may have heard it before. He said, "Love tells me I'm everything. Wisdom tells me I'm nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows."

So please let the metta carry you to this connected feeling with everything.

Please let vipassana carry you to this wisdom of not being anything particular.

Let's just sit for a minute.

In this gentle space between everything and nothing, we find the true flow of our lives. When metta opens us to the boundless connection with all that is, and vipassana reveals the transparent nature of what we think we are, we discover a profound freedom. This is not the freedom to be something special, but the freedom from needing to be anything at all.

The practice invites us into this delicate dance—embracing our interconnectedness while simultaneously releasing our grip on any fixed sense of self. In this release, we don't become diminished or lost. Rather, we become available to the natural unfolding of each moment, no longer trapped by the exhausting project of maintaining and defending a particular identity.

This is where wisdom and love meet—not in grand philosophical understanding, but in the lived experience of letting go while remaining fully present. Between the poles of everything and nothing, life simply flows, and we flow with it, no longer swimming against the current of reality.

The invitation is simple: let your practice carry you to these discoveries again and again. Allow metta to dissolve the barriers between self and other, and let vipassana reveal the spacious awareness that remains when all our constructions fall away. In this place, the heart naturally opens, and wisdom naturally arises—not as something we achieve, but as what we already are when we stop trying so hard to be something else.

CHAPTER 145

Day 16: Brahmavihāra Instructions: Compassion: Suffering person, benefactor and dear friend

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong offers profound instructions on karuṇā (compassion), the second of the four brahmavihāras. He explains compassion as the natural movement of loving-kindness when it encounters suffering, emphasizing that the brahmavihāras function both as concentration and insight practices that teach us to relate skillfully to the First Noble Truth.

Armstrong addresses the common difficulties practitioners face when opening to suffering - both their own and others' - exploring various defense mechanisms like avoidance, denial, rationalization, and the urge to immediately fix problems. He discusses the near and far enemies of compassion: pity (condescending attitude) and overwhelm (tipping into grief), explaining how equanimity serves as the essential balancing force that prevents compassion from becoming destructive.

The guided meditation systematically works with four categories of beings: a suffering person, oneself, a benefactor, and a dear friend, using phrases like "May you be free from your pain and sorrow." Armstrong emphasizes the crucial importance of maintaining inner balance throughout practice, advising practitioners to narrow their focus or return to mettā when feeling overwhelmed. He concludes by describing authentic compassion as having a sober, slightly sad quality - like watching a beautiful sunset - that contains both the pain of suffering and the beauty of caring, referencing the bodhisattva Kuan Yin as an embodiment of balanced compassion.

This afternoon we will have the second in the guided meditations on the theme of compassion, karunā. Sally probably explained what we mean by this yesterday, but I want to mention that it's the natural movement of the heart of loving-kindness when it looks upon suffering. So it's not very different—I don't think of it as very different from mettā—but it's mettā when it looks on a difficult situation.

One year I was doing a six-week retreat and decided to do ten days of intensive practice on each of the four brahmavihāras. So I did ten days of mettā, ten on compassion, ten on joy, and ten on equanimity. I found them all really illuminating. As you probably know, the brahmavihāras are not just concentration practices, they're also insight practices, so we learn a lot from doing them.

One of the things I learned from doing compassion is how hard it was for me. The reason the compassion practice was difficult—it wasn't difficult to feel it—it was difficult to be in touch with suffering eighteen hours a day. Because in the compassion practice, we bring people to mind and look on the difficulty in their life, the suffering in that being's life. And that connection to suffering is not an easy thing, I think, for us as people.

There are so many ways in daily life that we don't open to suffering. Freud said that neurosis is the refusal to suffer. We can sort of see that, right? When we can't open to our own suffering, we find ways to compensate through neurotic behavior. But the difficulty we have opening to our own suffering is the same difficulty we have opening to others' suffering because it reminds us of our own.

When we meet suffering in the world or in ourselves, we have a lot of different defenses against it. We avoid touching it. We deny that it's taking place. We rationalize it and explain to ourselves all the reasons why it's happening. We find ways to defend with escapes, whether it's television, alcohol, drugs, sex, whatever. We blame the person for their own suffering. We justify it to ourselves why they might be suffering or we might be suffering, or we try to fix it. I don't know if you've ever found a friend who, every time you try to just unburden your heart a little bit and talk about your problems, what they really want to do is make it go away by fixing you. So this is another way of avoiding just feeling the impact of suffering.

The beautiful thing about the compassion practice is that it lets us make a direct relationship with suffering and not be unnerved by it. We come to be comfortable in being with the truth of suffering in our own life or someone else's. And this is the first noble truth: there is suffering in life. This is the way that we learn how to relate to it skillfully.

There are unskillful ways of relating to suffering, generally expressed as the near and far enemies, which I think Sally talked about yesterday. Sometimes the near enemy is described as pity—this is not pīti, the Pali word for rapture, but pity, looking down. It's kind of like looking down on someone. Pity is not quite compassion because it comes from a superior attitude. It's like, "Oh, I'm so sorry you have this problem, but I don't have this problem." And that's a way of taking ourselves out of the equation. There's a condescending attitude in pity, whereas compassion says we're all in the same boat. This could be happening to me also.

The other form the near enemy takes is overwhelm by suffering. And this is possible for all of us at any time. We may be overwhelmed by our own suffering. We may be overwhelmed by the suffering in the world. There is enough suffering in the world that it can overwhelm any of us if we want it to. If we open and bring to mind the extent of suffering in this world, any of us could be overwhelmed in a minute. We can't hold, I don't believe, the full extent of the suffering of the world. And so we learn through the compassion practice just to open to it a little bit at a time, say in one individual at a time, and then it becomes more manageable, more bearable.

This tendency to be overwhelmed, or sometimes we call it tipping into grief for the world or for ourselves, is the far enemy. And the only thing that can support us in staying with compassion is equanimity. Equanimity is the fourth of the brahmavihāras, and if it doesn't grow up alongside mettā and compassion, then mettā tips over into attachment, affection with attachment, and compassion tips over into grief.

Sometimes people may feel, "Oh, you should be opening to all the suffering in the world or you're not a caring person." But I don't think that's quite a good instruction.

I think we should open to the suffering in the world to the extent that we can keep some inner balance. Because if we're crushed by the suffering of the world, we can't be helpful. We can't be helpful to others. If we don't open to the suffering of the world, then we're acting out all those defense mechanisms and we're closing ourselves off and we're being indifferent. But if we open too much and we get crushed by the suffering, we can't be useful for people. We can't be useful for ourselves. So we have to open just the right amount.

The compassion practice stretches our ability to open. The Vipassana practice also stretches our ability to open. Do you find yourself being accepting of things that you couldn't at the beginning of the retreat? Pain in the back, shoulder pain, knee pain, a hindrance. Do you find you're able to be okay with it now that you couldn't two weeks ago? This is also the opening moment of equanimity to unpleasant, painful experience.

So both Vipassana and the Brahmaviharas play a role in giving us the strength to open to what is difficult. Little by little, we expand our ability to be with what is suffering in the world. So we want to keep doing that and we also want to recognize, especially in the retreat, where our limit is. If some aspect of suffering feels too much, we want to find a way to make our focus smaller and open to the extent we can stay in balance.

This word balance is a really important word in our meditation practice. It is in life and we learn about it here. And I would say maybe the most important instruction as you go through the days of this long retreat is to keep yourself in balance. If you find yourself getting discouraged or overwhelmed by your own hindrances, find a way to open up and take a break. Do what you need to do to come back into a balance where you can relate, where you feel some courage, where you feel some possibility, where you feel, again, some inspiration and willingness.

Because if we lose that inner balance, our practice can go adrift for a while. So stay in touch with this. We're here because we're willing to open. All of you have done incredible work so far in this willingness to open. So keep your heart tender and engaged.

Maybe you need to take a cup of tea. It may be you need to take a walk. Maybe you need to rest and miss a sitting or a walking to come back into balance so that you can face again the work with balance. Compassion practice is the same way. If you feel overwhelmed, make the focus a little more narrow so that you can hold the suffering or go back to metta. I'll mention this again as we're doing the compassion. Go back to the easiest place you know of in the Brahmaviharas. Go to loving-kindness for yourself, a benefactor or a friend. Do what is necessary to stay in balance. This will help you open and it will help the world when you return to it.

So today we're going to take up two new individuals. Well, they're familiar individuals, but we'll work with them with compassion. I think Sally yesterday did the suffering person and yourself. So today we'll bring in our good old benefactor and our good friend and invite them into the compassion practice as well. We'll move through all four of these individuals today.

Please sit comfortably. Get in touch with yourself through your sitting posture, relaxed attitude, coming into your heart center, having a sense of warmth and brightness around the heart center.

First, bring to mind the person that you chose yesterday to be the suffering person—someone in your circle of acquaintances who may be going through some difficulties. Hopefully not such strong difficulties that you feel overwhelmed by looking at the person, but bring the person to mind. Remember your connection to them, your friendly relationship to them and your care. You've seen them in times of happiness and enjoyment. You've seen them in times of struggle and challenges.

Let yourself focus on the difficult aspects of their life that you know of right now. It could be a few areas of difficulty.

You can let each one come to mind. You might look over their areas of mental and physical wellbeing, their work and family and friends life, to see where the challenges might be.

So as you hold them and let yourself feel their difficulties, notice if there's any resistance to feeling that. Notice if there's an attempt to avoid or defend, letting that suffering touch you. Rather than thinking too much about how to fix it or how to assign responsibility, just feeling the suffering.

And then sending toward this person your phrase for compassion. Something like, "May you be free from your pain and sorrow," or "I care about your pain and sorrow," or "May you hold your suffering with compassion." If there's a particular difficulty, you can replace pain or sorrow with that difficulty. It could be their illness or their loss, their unhappiness, their grief. You can use one of those words if it makes it more specific for you.

When you're ready, move on to yourself. Let go of the suffering individual and connect again with yourself as you sit here. Perhaps connecting with an image of yourself. As you connect, let your reflection bring to light the areas that are difficult for you now. It might be things that are presenting themselves here in the retreat. It might be situations in daily life, in relationships, in your work. Could be health concerns, aging concerns.

Reflecting as you connect with the areas of difficulty, remember that suffering is an integral part of life. It's not that suffering is a mistake. Suffering is to be understood. This is how we learn to be free. And so in touch with the suffering, allow yourself just to feel it, to feel the pain of it. Not to blame yourself, not to judge yourself, but feel it.

Then repeat your compassion phrase toward yourself: "May I hold this pain with compassion," "May I be free from this pain and sorrow," "I care about my suffering." Continue to repeat the compassion phrase for yourself, staying in touch with what's difficult for you.

If it feels like the contact with the pain is too much, turn to loving kindness. Focus on your good qualities, bring metta to yourself, or bring in someone who uplifts you—a benefactor or friend. When you feel balanced again, you can return to compassion for yourself. If any blaming comes in, include that with the compassion. Hold that with compassion.

When you're ready, let go of the connection to self and bring in your benefactor. Bring an image of your benefactor or say their name, getting in touch with their character, their being. Remember your connection to them, your care for them, their goodness.

Then bring to mind what you know of the difficulties in their life. Every human being has some difficulties. Sometimes benefactors are happy people and it's hard to find the suffering, but there is always some—either in health, work, family, and friends. So connect with the suffering of your benefactor, whether it's large or small, and send your compassion phrase to them: "May you be free from your suffering."

If it feels like the connection to your benefactor is weak, then call them up again. Feel their presence more strongly. Remind yourself of the difficulties, the suffering they're experiencing.

When you're ready, let go of the benefactor and bring in your good friend. Invite your friend in. Get a good sense of them. Imagine them where they are right now. Remember times you've been together. Let yourself get touched by the feeling you have for them—friendship and care, appreciation for their good qualities.

Because you probably know your friend fairly well, you can look into their life with some knowledge, some detail. You can look at their physical health, their emotional wellbeing, the tug of partners, children, parents and friends, and their work life.

the satisfaction and also the challenges in their work.

So as you connect with the pain in your friend's life, just let your heart feel that and send your compassion phrase to them. If it appeals to you, you could try this four-part phrasing that I mentioned earlier: calling up the image, noticing what you feel, saying the phrase, and coming into the heart center to feel the response, where you might know the compassion in the body.

If at any time your friend's pain seems a little too hard to bear, just return to metta for yourself or a benefactor. Let the mind come back into balance.

And for the last minutes of the sitting, just let the compassion extend to all beings, recognizing that every being that takes birth is going to face struggle, difficulty, and pain. It's part of life, part of existence. And so recognizing our unity with all living beings that we share in this vulnerability to suffering and wish for happiness. Extending the compassion in an unbounded way: may all beings everywhere be free from suffering. May all beings hold their pain and sorrow with a compassionate heart. May all beings find peace and ease and acceptance.

I want to say a couple more things about the quality of compassion. It's not a state of suffering. When it tips into the near enemy of grief, it becomes a state of suffering, but it's not itself a state of suffering. If you look at the beautiful statue of Kuan Yin on the back altar—Kuan Yin is the bodhisattva of compassion—take a look at her face as you go out.

Kuan Yin is said to hear the ten thousand cries of joy and the ten thousand cries of sorrow in the world. She's listening all the time and hears that. But she has a deep inner balance that lets her hold it with compassion. So if you find compassion becoming a place of suffering, maybe adjust—go back to metta for a little bit. See how much you can hold with balance.

But compassion is a sober kind of state. Like metta can get really happy, right? Sometimes you can get almost exuberant practicing metta because you're focusing on well-being and the potential for welfare. With compassion, because we're looking at suffering, it's a sober kind of experience and there can be a tinge of sadness in it. That's okay. It's okay if compassion has a little bit of sadness.

One of my teachers said it's like being up on a hill and watching the sunset. You know, the day is coming to a close. It's been a beautiful day. The sun is setting. You know that day is ending. A little tinge of sadness in that. But there's also beauty.

So look in compassion for the quality of beauty. It's the care that you have that makes the beauty. And the suffering adds this tone of sadness. But it's okay, because when we're able to be with suffering in the world without needing to move away from it or to try to fix it or make it go away, it's a gift that not everyone gets to enjoy. So if you can take that back into the world, it's a real gift for your own friends, family, people you come in contact with, students, and so on.

Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddhist understanding of how suffering arises through our tendency to grasp at experience. Drawing on the central links of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), he traces how sense contact leads to vedanā (feeling tone), then to taṇhā (craving), and finally to upādāna (clinging/grasping). This process creates momentary selves that are born, live briefly, and pass away - always involving some degree of dukkha.

The talk introduces the concept of "unentangled knowing" taught by the renowned Thai laywoman teacher Upāsikā Kee, describing a form of awareness that remains present with experience without getting caught in reactive formations of greed, aversion, or delusion. Armstrong suggests that moments of this unentangled awareness already occur naturally but often go unrecognized. He offers two practical approaches: checking our attitude for the presence of the three unwholesome roots, and shifting attention from sense objects to the knowing awareness itself.

Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Jemnian, and other Thai forest masters, Armstrong points to the gap between feeling and craving as the crucial place where freedom can be found. This space of non-reactive awareness offers a taste of the peace of nibbāna - not the final liberation, but an approximation that serves as both path and goal. The talk concludes with the Buddha's teaching that the island of safety in the flood of existence is "having nothing, clinging to nothing."

We talked a few nights ago about how the sense of self gets created over and over again, moment by moment, through the act of identifying with one of the aggregates, taking hold of one of the aggregates and claiming it as "I" or "mine."

In the talk tonight, I want to look at this process in a little more detail and also to look at where within it we can find a sense of freedom. This concept of freedom exerts a very strong pull in the human heart. Spiritual paths are directed to it, and outer work is directed to it. In the spiritual path, we come to find that it means freeing the heart from the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. And in the outer work, we find actually it's the same forces that need to be transformed in order to find great freedom in our societies, in our world.

I find it interesting that some of the most effective leaders in creating outer change have been those who've been able to combine the spiritual inner work with the political outer work of moving to freedom. We think a lot about leaders like Martin Luther King and Aung San Suu Kyi. Someone we don't mention as often or maybe think of as often is Cesar Chavez, who was the leader of migrant farm workers in the 1960s who formed the United Farm Workers Union and brought decent basic rights to farm workers throughout the state of California and the West Coast. Something interesting about him that I didn't know at the time is that his activism was grounded in his devout Catholicism. He used prayer meetings with the workers to build a sense of community and solidarity. That's how he joined people together. And his commitment—a deep commitment to nonviolence in protests which could have turned quite violent—came out of his deep faith in the teachings of Jesus.

So it's very interesting that the same forces need to be conquered inside as well as outside to bring this sense of freedom. And in both cases, there's a struggle, because these forces of greed, aversion, and delusion are very deeply conditioned in us who are on the path and in the humans who make up the society that we find ourselves in.

Coming back to the spiritual journey and the inner freedom that we're discovering here, I want to ask a couple of questions. Where is freedom to be found on our journey? Is it only at the end of the path when the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion have been totally uprooted from the heart? Is that the first time we're going to have a sense of freedom? Or is it possible to have a sense of freedom along the way before that? And if it is, will you know it when it comes? Do we know enough to recognize the freedom that we might touch before we get to that final freedom?

The subject of the talk this evening is unentangled knowing. This term "unentangled" may be a little difficult if you're not a native English speaker. Tangle refers to the way that lines of things get twisted, like if a kitten is playing with a ball of yarn, the yarn gets all knotted up and snarled, or the way that if you have long hair and you go for a ride in a convertible, it's hard to comb out afterwards because it's gone into all kinds of tangles. So "entangle" is the verb that describes forming a tangle, and "unentangled" means that we're going to prevent the tangling from happening. This is a kind of knowing that prevents tangling from happening—that's unentangled knowing.

This was a term used by a great teacher in Thailand in the last century named Upasika Ki, one of the foremost women teachers. I'll say a little about her in a few minutes.

The Buddha referred often to this concept of tangle as part of our life, as part of spiritual practice. Here's one quotation from the Anguttara Nikaya: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn." I like this reference to how craving or desire puts us in all sorts of tangles within ourselves. You can see how this happens because our desires sometimes run counter to each other. Just a simple example: we may want to be liked—that's one desire. We want other people to like us. But we also want to do exactly what we want to do, and nothing else. Sometimes those two don't go together so well, and that creates conflicting desires or a tangle.

Here's another great quotation, this one from the Samyutta Nikaya. This is a questioner who's coming up to the Buddha and addressing him by his family name. The name of his family was Gotama—he was Siddhartha Gotama. So people often referred to him by the family name Gotama: "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gotama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?" It's a great question, acknowledging the inner conflict, the outer conflict. Who succeeds in disentangling?

The Buddha said it's one who develops the Eightfold Path—one who cultivates virtue, concentration, and wisdom—who disentangles this tangle. This quotation, by the way, is so central in the history of Buddhism that it forms the introduction to the Visuddhimagga, the sixth-century manual from Sri Lanka that compiles the meditation techniques of that time.

Upasīkā Kee was a noted teacher in Thailand, remarkable first because she was a woman. This was quite radical, since most teachers in Thailand had been men, and mostly monks. Not only was she a woman, she was also a laywoman who remained in lay clothes throughout her life and never took formal ordination.

She started very simply with a piece of family land in the Thai countryside. There she had some meditation huts constructed, went into retreat, and when others joined her, they all practiced together while she taught. Her teachings span from about the 1950s to her death in 1978. Fortunately, some of her talks were recorded, transcribed, and then translated. The best of these have been compiled into a beautiful book translated by Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu called Pure and Simple—highly recommended.

This is a quotation from her book:

An inward staying, unentangled knowing.
All outward turning, cast aside.

This points to a form of mindfulness that doesn't get caught up with the objects of our experience through the force of craving or through greed, hatred, and delusion. It's an awareness of our experience that remains free from reactive formations.

What I want to suggest is that moments of this unentangled knowing are happening for you many times during the day, but you may not recognize them yet. In this evening's talk, I want to show you how to begin recognizing when those moments are happening, to feel what that feels like, and to appreciate the freedom—the degree of freedom that may already be here. Then I want to discuss a couple of approaches to meditation that make this more accessible.

But before we get into that, I want to understand in more detail how we become entangled. How do we get caught in the factors of our sense experience?

The Buddha described this generation of suffering in detail in a teaching called Dependent Origination, which traces twelve links—causal links within our experience that start with ignorance, progress through ten other links, and culminate in suffering. It's considered perhaps his most profound teaching, his deepest insight.

I'm not going to discuss the entire teaching tonight since we have a different focus, but because it explains entanglement in such clear detail, I'll examine the central four links of that sequence. The first five links venture into somewhat philosophical territory we don't need to explore. The last three links also get philosophical and lead into that challenging question of rebirth—which we'll stir up in a few more sessions, but not tonight.

So, returning to our basic experience as human beings: What is it to be human? Remember that discourse on totality where the Buddha explained that there are only ever six things happening—sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touches, and mind objects. That's all that's ever going on, experienced through their corresponding sense organs. These are the facts of our experience as people.

This impingement from the sense doors on our experience is known as contact—sense contact. There are six types. This is the first of the Dependent Origination links I want to examine.

Contact includes our becoming conscious of the sense experience that has occurred. It's the meeting of the sense door, sense consciousness, and sense object. When you hear a sound, that's contact. The sound is present, your ear is functioning, and hearing arises as a result. That's a moment of contact at the ear door, happening constantly.

Each contact, as you know, carries an associated feeling tone—the vedanā quality—which can be pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. These contacts, with their varying feeling tones, arrive in our consciousness moment after moment after moment, and we have no control over the pleasantness of the experience.

We want it all to be pleasant all the time, don't we? Who has ever wanted an unpleasant sense contact? Yet we have no control. The body gives us pain, thoughts bring worry, emotions cause us to suffer and contract, and sense input varies dramatically. This is our basic situation, and this is precisely why being a sentient being is problematic.

We want things to be pleasant, but we can't control that. So contact gives rise to feeling, and this is the second link in dependent origination that we're investigating tonight.

I think we've talked quite a bit about how when there's pleasant feeling, there's a habit, a conditioned habit for us to react with desire or greed. When there's an unpleasant feeling, there's a conditioned habit for us to react with aversion. And when there's a neutral feeling, there's a conditioned habit for us to overlook it with delusion.

These reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion are collectively known as craving. You probably know this is the origin of suffering in the Four Noble Truths—it's the second noble truth. The craving is the source of suffering. So this is a powerful force to become aware of.

Now the word craving indicates a desire force. But aversion also comes under craving. Why is that? Because craving is basically wanting things to be different than they are. This is how we get into conflict with the present moment. The present moment arrives with its varying sense contacts, but we don't always like it just that way. We want more of this and less of that.

So wanting it to be different—if there's craving, we want more of the pleasant. If there's aversion, we want to push away the unpleasant. Both of these are part of the force of craving.

Now, how does delusion get wrapped into craving? That seems odd because delusion is kind of neutral. It's just a spacing out quality. The way I understand it is twofold.

One is when we're preoccupied with gaining the pleasant and pushing away the unpleasant, anything neutral doesn't excite us. And you can feel this as you're sitting. The antennae are up in a vigilant way: what's going to threaten me? And I'm going to push that away as quickly as I can. What's going to gratify me? And I'm going to pull that to me as quickly as I can. Sometimes the more intense, the better, right? Because we find a strong identity in relating to what's intense. Anything better than that neutral, boring blandness of neither pleasant nor unpleasant feeling tone.

So delusion is born out of a mind that is craving the pleasant and wanting to push away the unpleasant because the neutral doesn't hold stimulation. So we just ignore it. We overlook it. Whereas in fact, the neutral is as much a part of our experience as pleasant or unpleasant. So we should be as much in touch with it. But if craving is operating, we're not. It looks uninteresting.

So craving includes greed, aversion, and delusion. The other reason it includes delusion is that we don't see clearly the activity of greed and aversion. Because if we did, we would see they weren't satisfying. So when delusion starts to tune in to the activities of greed and aversion, we tend to give them up. For greed and aversion to be operative, we have to keep ignoring the suffering of those activities. So delusion is always paired with greed and aversion.

This is the third link in the chain. Contact leads to feeling. Feeling often leads to craving—the reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The last of the four links we're exploring is clinging or grasping. Very quickly, I would say pretty automatically, craving goes into grasping. The way I understand it is like this: We're meditating, we're paying attention to the details of our experience. We see something that has the opportunity either to draw us or repulse us. And the attention inclines that way because we're picking up on its pleasant or unpleasant vibe. It's like that pleasant or unpleasant stimulus draws the attention there.

And if it's at all strong, the next thing that happens is we glom onto it. In order to pull toward us the pleasant, we have to first take hold of it. In order to push away the unpleasant, we first have to take hold of it.

You can feel this in your practice. If there's a pleasant sensation in the body, notice how the attention is drawn there and it fixates on it. Fixation is the sign of grasping, the sign of taking hold. If there's an unpleasant sensation, the attention fixates on that in order to solve it. I can either push it away, or I can manipulate the energy with mindful attention, or I can do something to try to break it up and make the unpleasantness go away.

So very quickly from craving, the mind moves into grasping. The Pali word for this is upadana. Sometimes we translate it as grasping, sometimes as clinging. It's the same word in Pali. The way I think of it is that grasping is the first act of reaching out and taking hold. As we continue to hold on to it—because we usually do—then it becomes clinging. So first we grasp and then we cling, but in Pali, it's the same word.

Because there's no self in this whole process, no real self in this process, the question "who grasps?" isn't answerable. Grasping happens. It's a faculty of the mind to fixate and take hold. So there's no one doing the grasping, but grasping happens. Then we develop an "I" and "my" around it because we get fascinated with it.

You can notice this. With anything you take hold of, the self is going to build around that with words of "I" and "my." We'll dwell on it with our thoughts and think about it with "I" and "my." Check it out and see if this is not true.

All this happens really quickly. These four links—contact, feeling, craving, clinging—can happen within a second. Boom, boom, boom, boom, boom. And we're there. So it's a very quick process and it's not so easy to see the individual pieces, but by paying attention again and again, you'll pick up different ones at different points and you can see how they fit together.

So in life, how does this work? Life is basically about making relationships. That's what human experience is about. We come out of the womb, we pop into the world. There's mother, breast, food, father, school, sports, high school, sex, college, job, money, taxes, Lady Gaga, Instagram, Twitter, Barack Obama, global economic crisis—it's all flying by. Some of it's pleasant, some of it's not. But who's going to resist taking hold of that juicy mix of stuff? Right? We do. We take hold of it all as it flies by.

If we take hold, suffering is inevitable. Greater or lesser, suffering follows from taking hold. Because when we grasp, we form an "I"—we in a way give birth to a self. And then that self lives a life, maybe brief, maybe longer, and then it passes away. So in that process of being born as a new self and then living and then passing away, there's some suffering, maybe small, maybe big.

Let's look at some examples. You know, this is such a simple environment, and yet there are so many things that can frustrate us on retreat. How many things in a day can you get irritated about? That's a lot, isn't it? There's nobody cutting you off on the freeway. There's nobody pulling into a parking place ahead of you. But so many things can come up. There's noise in the dorms. There's noise in the halls. Teacher says something that you just don't agree with. The interviews are running late and you're having to wait outside.

The food is not what we want this particular day. The team we're doing work meditation with is moving too fast or too slow or they're not doing their jobs. The mind is restless. We want to take a walk, but it's raining outside. Somebody has gone through the line and taken too much food and there's not going to be enough for us. All these things we can find ourselves getting irritated about.

And sometimes that irritation can last a while. We find ourselves still going an hour later about something that happened earlier in the day, here in such a simple life. It can happen like that. So something comes along, we take hold of the situation, we think it shouldn't have been like that, and we get annoyed. This irritation can go on for a while. We're taking birth as the irritated yogi.

Then we'll dwell on that thing. How could they do that? I can't believe—the rules are posted. People have said it so many times. They're not supposed to be doing that. Should be more considerate of others. On and on for quite a while. So we've taken birth as the irritated yogi. And this is not a pleasant birth, because irritation is not that much fun. I mean, we enjoy parts of it, or we wouldn't do it. But when you look at the direct experience, it's really not that pleasant.

Eventually, we let go of that flare-up, and we come back into some kind of balance. This balance, Upasaka Ki calls the natural mind. We return to our natural mind. And then that birth is over.

That's one kind of birth. Here's another kind of birth.

We come into the hall. We've been practicing quite steadily. Things have been up and down. We come into the hall. We sit. All of a sudden, we're really present. We're connecting well, one moment after another without much forcing. The object is clear. The mind is steady. Our confidence is high. Thoughts go through, but they don't grab us. Some emotions may come, but they're seen and pass out again. As we continue to practice, we start feeling concentrated. The mind feels stable and strong and really centered. We're able to pay attention moment after moment for a while.

When I first hit this point in meditation, I thought, "Wow, I've solved it." I started thinking, "I'm going to go back after the retreat to my life and it's always going to be like this now." I thought it was linear like that. "I'll go to work and I'm going to be able to deal with people from this place of centeredness and strength and steadiness. I'm going to get promoted because of that, because not many people can do that. Then I'll get more money and I can buy a house." And relationships—I thought, "Wow, people are going to want to be in relationship with me because I'm going to be so cooled out. Nothing can bother me."

I actually thought like that for a while. So I got up from the sitting and went out to walk. I thought, "I'm going to take this thing for a walk." I just kept thinking about how much fun it was going to be for the rest of my life because I was going to be living like this. I got spun out in all these pleasant fantasies.

I can't wait to get back in the hall and sit again. I came back in the hall and sat. Oh, I was totally stirred up. That thought stream had just become a whirlwind that took me over. The concentration was gone, my energy was all over the place, my body was in contraction, and I was miserable.

So I had taken birth by grabbing onto the concentration and claiming it as mine, building up a lot of fantasy about it. It seems really naive now. This was my first experience and I was very naive. I'd taken birth as the concentrated yogi, the good yogi—claimed it, fantasized about it, and then it crumbled. It went away, as all those states do. It died.

So eventually, I let go of that stirred-upness. I let go of being the good yogi, and my mind returned to balance again. Natural mind returned. The good yogi had to die, and he did die. So we've had two births and two deaths.

In the first case, the irritated yogi—the birth was unpleasant. That's a suffering state to be angry. But the death was a happy one because that being passed away. Unhappy birth, happy death.

But in the second one, the birth at first was happy. Good yogi. That's like living in a heaven realm—to think we're always going to live like this. A little deluded, but kind of heaven realm place. And then the death was really painful when that good yogi went away. First one, painful birth, happy death. Second one, happy birth, painful death.

It's always like that. If we grab hold of the pleasant, it's pleasant at first, but we suffer when it goes. If we grab hold of the painful, it's painful immediately, and then there's some release when it goes. So either way we grasp it, pleasant or unpleasant, there's going to be suffering. Taking birth involves suffering, one way or another, due to the fact of change.

This taking hold of is the act of grasping. It's just a faculty of mind. There's no one who does it. But once the grasping happens, self builds on top of that. It builds on top of what has been fixated on by claiming it in some way as I or mine.

This is expressed beautifully by Andrew Olenski, a Pali scholar: "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something created by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds on to or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

So this grasping is the source of selfing. And it comes out of a sequence—it always comes out of a sequence. Contact, feeling, craving, clinging or grasping, whichever you like. This is the heart of dependent origination. And this sequence always leads to suffering.

If you look at our typical conditioned approach to life, whether it's in retreat or outside, it reminds me of the monkeys I used to see in the forest. When I lived in Thailand, I had a hut out in the rainforest, out in the middle of this large forest. A lot of monkeys would go by overhead in the trees. Often they would travel through the canopy at the very top, but sometimes they would come lower down and swing from one tree to another using vines that hung down.

What the monkey would do is grab hold of a vine and swing until they got close enough to grab another vine. Only then would they let go of the first and jump over to get the second. Then they'd swing from that vine over to another, and they'd only let go of it when they saw a third vine that they could grab hold of.

This is why we refer to these restless movements of clinging as monkey mind. Because a monkey won't let go of one thing until there's another one to take hold of. And that's the way so often we're conditioned to live in the world—we don't let go until there's something else to grasp.

But as meditators, you have another choice. You have the choice of letting go and not picking up anything new. And maybe this is where freedom lies—in letting go and not picking up.

So let's explore this. We've traced the chain: contact, feeling, craving, clinging. Is this inevitable? Because clinging always leads to suffering. If this is inevitable, we're doomed, aren't we? As long as there's contact, it's going to lead to suffering. Could this be accurate? Or is it possible to interrupt this chain at some point, and if so, where?

Let me ask: have you ever been with an unpleasant feeling and not moved into aversion? Have you ever been with a pleasant feeling and not moved into greed? Have you ever been with a neutral feeling and not moved into delusion?

That's the power of mindfulness. Mindfulness gives us the ability to feel the pleasant, the unpleasant, and the neutral and not move into a reactive formation. That's a great skill, and that is where the chain can be broken.

Classically, this is the understanding with dependent origination. The chain is broken between feeling and craving. What it means is that a feeling comes, but we don't react with greed, aversion, or delusion. If we don't do that, then there's basically an approach of acceptance. We've allowed, accepted, opened to—whatever you want to call it—relaxed into that feeling, and no self is being born and no suffering has to take place from it.

This is what gets us off the wheel of dependent origination where ignorance usually leads to suffering. This is how it gets interrupted, and this is the opening to freedom. One teacher put it like this: "The whole of the Buddhist path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving."

This is significant. The whole of the path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving.

When we talk about a gap here, please don't get the idea that there's a big time gap. Feeling can move into craving just like that. So it's not like contact comes along and you have a couple of seconds to contemplate that, and then feeling pops out and you have a couple of seconds to contemplate that and decide whether you really want to go into craving or not. And then craving arises and you have a couple of seconds to figure out if you want to go into clinging or not. No—it's like boom, boom, boom, boom.

So there's no time gap really between feeling and craving. The reaction or lack of reaction is pretty instantaneous. If mindfulness is there, there doesn't have to be a reaction. And then that space can go on for a while. That's what feels like a gap. The feeling is there, but there's no reaction. Then there's this space that opens up in the mind.

So this is what's so interesting to explore: when it's like that, when there's not the reaction of greed, aversion, and delusion, what does that feel like? Explore this in moment-to-moment experience. What does that feel like?

When I look at my own experience, the way it comes across to me is spacious, ease, peace, non-conflicted, no struggle, and a feeling of lightness in the experience. Not heavy. It's not weighed down. It's not burdened. So the main word I want to put in here is: it feels free.

When we're in the gap between feeling and craving, there's a real sense of freedom at that moment. That freedom that opens up—another way to describe it is peace. There's peace of mind at that point.

Did you construct that peace?

Did you construct that freedom? Or was it just there when you didn't grab? When you didn't grab, was that just what was already there? Perhaps that peace is a natural part of the mind that's there all the time, that's always available as long as we're not grasping. And that we always have the choice to rest in it by not reacting with greed, aversion, and delusion.

If that's always available, it points to something that is maybe a little less impermanent or a little less fragile or a little less conditioned than these momentary sense contacts. It's as if there's always that potential, and then there are these conditioned things coming and going.

I want to read something from Ajahn Chah. It's a little long, but I hope you'll stay with it:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that these things are oneself or belong to oneself. The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

"The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are, as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

When we rest in this gap, we're not taking birth. And we are said to be abiding in something that has a flavor of the deathless. It's not subject to being born and dying. It's something that's always available if we don't disturb it.

At the time of the Buddha, the predominant religion in India was Brahmanism. The Brahmins were a high social caste who more or less represented the religious orthodoxy of the day. It was founded on ancient texts and a lot of rites and rituals. The Buddha was not part of that group, of that caste in India. And once he became a wanderer, he was definitely outside the religious orthodoxy.

Yet, after he became enlightened and wandered around and showed up in various places to teach, some of the Brahmins were interested enough to come and hear him. Even though he wasn't part of their gang and he wasn't part of the orthodoxy, he had a good reputation. So they would come and lend an ear.

There are many suttas in the collection called the Sutta Nipāta where these young Brahmins are coming to ask questions of the Buddha. I find it a very beautiful part of the suttas because they have to be quite humble to leave their own orthodoxy and caste to come and ask questions of this poor mendicant wanderer. So there are some very nice dialogues between them.

In one such dialogue, a Brahmin youth named Todeyya has come to ask a question. Todeyya says, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you like to ask the Buddha that? What's it like in there? What is the liberated mind?

This is the Buddha's response: "That sage is without desire. They have nothing. They are unentangled in becoming." Unentangled in becoming means they're not taking part in this momentary birth and death anymore.

This is again from Ajahn Chah. You can just imagine Ajahn Chah giving this teaching in a hall in Thailand that's basically outdoors. There are so many halls in Thailand where the weather is quite warm, which have a floor—usually a concrete floor—and a roof that's supported by pillars that go around the outside with no walls. So it's completely open air. It's a place, a sala, where many Dhamma talks are given in Thailand.

Ajahn Chah, you could imagine, was giving a talk in a setting like this. And this is what he said: "The roof is a becoming. The floor is a becoming. But in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbāna is this emptiness."

So nibbana, the freedom that the Buddha was pointing to, is in this place where there is no becoming, where there is no birth or death.

When we rest in that gap, we are in that state temporarily. It's not the final nibbana. It's not the final liberation. But you could say it's like a little foretaste of it, of the peace of nibbana. An approximation of nibbana, as it's called in one sutta.

Explore this and see what it feels like. It's not overwhelming. It's not overwhelmingly pleasant. But there is a peace in it that's very satisfying. And the more you rest in that peace and allow it to deepen, the more satisfying it becomes.

So that satisfaction brings a sense of the fruit of the path. You're finding the fruit of the path, the sense of freedom as you go. We might say that the goal of the path is felt here before we reach the final end. We're feeling the goal as we go.

But also resting in this place is the path. As that teacher said, the path is resting in this gap. That means it's onward leading. So in this approach, we're resting and we're allowing ourselves to settle, and that continues to deepen and incline toward the final liberation. The path and the goal have become basically the same. Where do we want to go? Peace. How do we get there? Peace. We rest in this peace, allow it to deepen, and it leads in only one direction. And that is that final or ultimate peace of nibbana.

We're still aware. When you rest in that gap, it's not like you close off the sense doors. Not at all. Quite alert. Present. Sense contact is still happening at all the doors. So you're in touch with the world. You're not withdrawn. But you're meeting it all from a different place.

This is from Ajahn Jemnian, who's another master in the Thai forest tradition. "The best way to develop a great awareness"—and the words he used for this were maha sati. Maha means big, sati is mindfulness. And by the way, he gave this little talk here at Spirit Rock to a group of Spirit Rock teachers, 1997. "The best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have their nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their nature of impermanence, and this other is the Dharma of the deathless."

So you'll find this way of looking a lot in the Thai forest tradition.

One of my teachers in Thailand was Ajahn Buddhadasa, great teacher in the last half of the 20th century, one of the greatest Thai monks. He was both a deep practitioner and a scholar of the texts. He combined them to teach and comment on ways of practice. When I was with him, he was very well known in the country. He gave radio addresses throughout the nation on Sunday mornings. But his monastery was not a big scene at that time, and it meant that he was very accessible.

In later years, he became more famous, and big tour buses would pull up to the monastery, and hundreds of tourists would come out and visit, and it kind of got overrun. But when I was there, it was still pretty low-key.

So every morning after his morning meal, he would go out and sit on a bench in front of his cottage, his kuti. It was at the front of the monastery. It was a stone bench just set on a big patch of earth, of dirt. And around him, forest chickens would be walking by and just pecking at things that were on the ground. The temple dogs would be lying around. And generally, if Thai people went by, the temple dogs wouldn't move. But somehow, if a Western monk went by, they'd sit up and bark at us.

Always seemed to happen. But nonetheless, he was completely accessible—just sitting there on his bench. You could approach him at any time. I would go up, make my bows before him, sit on the ground, and ask him any dharma questions I wanted. He would simply sit and answer.

But I have to say, at the time I found him rather intimidating because he was such a great teacher. Even then, he was well-known, and his demeanor was not overtly warm and welcoming. When you visit a vipassana teacher, they typically say, "Oh, pull up a chair! Do you need tissues? Can I get you some water? Come on in and sit down"—trying to be friendly and accommodating.

Ajahn Buddhadasa was not quite like that. He simply was himself, just sitting there. I felt put off because I thought perhaps he didn't want me there, which was a little unnerving. I held back from visiting him more than I wish I had in retrospect.

Because as I reflect on it now, what I realize is that he was simply abiding in unentangled knowing. I was just another object arising and passing at his sense door within his meditation. He didn't care whether I was there or not. He would have been equally content for me to sit down and ask questions for a while—it didn't disturb him at all. He would have been equally content if I had gotten up and returned to my kuti. He was simply resting in this balanced knowing, meditating me as I appeared in his awareness.

But I didn't feel that welcoming energy, so I remained somewhat hesitant to approach him.

What we want to discover is a way to move into this space of unentangled knowing, where we can open to all the arisings at the sense doors without getting caught in them, without grasping.

In our meditation instructions here, we've progressed from focusing on objects one by one—body, breath, sounds—to this choiceless attention that opens to all of them. Now we want to take one more shift within this open attention, moving into unentangled knowing.

This is not a technique per se. Unentangled knowing is a frame of mind, a state of mind free from grasping. But I want to discuss a couple of approaches that can help us move in that direction together. It involves taking a step back from objects into other facets of mind.

Let me mention two approaches tonight. The first is a practice from Sayadaw U Tejaniya that we've discussed several times, which we call "checking the attitude." As you relate to the events in your experience, you periodically check to see whether greed, aversion, or delusion is involved in your relationship—how you're relating to them. You'll notice this is the same point of examining the presence or absence of craving that we explored in dependent origination. It's the same central juncture.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya recommends checking for greed by asking, "Am I wanting something to happen?" Take a look and see what emerges. To check for aversion, ask, "Am I wanting something to stop happening?" To examine delusion, ask, "Am I not in touch with what's happening?"

If you find any of these three present, you don't judge it or try to push it away—that would be another form of grasping. You simply become mindful of it. "Okay, greed is here now. Greed feels like this." Just become aware of it. "Aversion feels like this. I'm knowing aversion."

I think you'll find that when you ask these questions, it creates space around the direct experience of whatever sense contact is occurring. It's almost as if you step back and observe in a witnessing way: "How am I relating?" This creates spaciousness in the mind that can open up the gap between feeling and reactivity. You begin to look at the reactive formations of mind as a central focus of meditation.

As you develop this practice, you might check your attitude two, three, or four times during a sitting or walking period. As you become more familiar with it, you won't need to ask the three separate questions. You can simply inquire, "What's the attitude?" and it will become clear because you've practiced with it sufficiently.

Once it becomes clear that you can just look and see if there's greed, aversion, or delusion, you can make this more of a primary practice, meaning you can rest your attention and just notice any disturbance of greed, aversion, and delusion.

This is another quote from Ajahn Chah. "If you want to see a train, just go to the central station." So here a train is a symbol for a movement of mind. Just go to the Central Station. You don't have to go traveling all the way up the Northern Line, the Southern Line, Eastern Line, Western Line. If you want to see trains, every single one of them, you'd be better off waiting at Grand Central Station. That's where they all terminate.

"Just look right here," and he pointed to his heart, "at Central Station. Greed arises here, anger arises here, delusion arises here. Just sit here and you can watch as all these things arise. Practice right here, because right here is where you're stuck. Right here is where the conditioned arises, where conventions arise, and right here is where the Dhamma will arise."

So we simply settle into the heart and we feel any reactive formation of greed, aversion, or delusion. All the trains leave central station right there, and we can become mindful of that. This stops us from getting on board the train and riding it all the way out one line.

This is from Upasaka Ki: "So your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on. Is the mind being affected by the objects of sensory contact? Are we getting entangled with greed, aversion, and delusion? Or are we not? Keep checking on that. Don't send the mind out latching onto things."

This is the same message. So this is the first approach: checking the attitude, resting in the heart center, looking for the movement of greed, aversion, delusion.

The second approach is to turn to the dimension of consciousness or awareness rather than the experience of the sense object. You know how every moment of sense contact has both the object and the knowing of it? Object and knowing together. Turn to the knowing instead of focusing on the object.

So we're going to do a guided meditation tomorrow morning—I'll warn you now in case you want to skip it—that will give clear instruction for how to move to being in touch with this knowing. But for tonight, I'll just give some suggestions.

I was outside not long ago and I was standing by a pond, and it was raining. So I was looking at the surface of the pond as the raindrops were falling. It wasn't a heavy rain. It was kind of a light rain. And if you've ever done that, you know that you can see the impact of each raindrop on the surface of the pond. It goes "blip," and it makes a few ripples. And then another goes "blip," and it makes a few ripples. And then the ripples run into each other, and the drops are falling close to each other. And you get this beautiful moving pattern of water and wave and raindrops coming in.

And it struck me that that surface of the pond was kind of like a sensitive membrane, a sensitive plane that's like our consciousness, right? And the raindrops are like sense contact. So we're sitting here and moment after moment, there's just this little bit, bit, bit from sense contact. But the surface of the lake is like our consciousness. These contacts are landing in, let's say, the field of awareness moment after moment after moment. And if we're sensitive, we can feel each little blip.

Can we keep our attention on the big open plane—say, of the surface of the pond—the big open plane of our awareness, where we'll feel the little blips of the drops, but we don't get obsessed with each drop or any drop? We let the sense contact come and go. We don't fixate on any of the individual drops that are landing in the consciousness.

So what happens when you do this—you'll practice with it tomorrow—is it's as though we find a dimension within ourselves that's a step less entangled or less enmeshed with the objects of the senses. And this is a beautiful place to meditate from. We're clearly in touch with what's happening. We know the impermanent nature of the sense objects as they're landing moment by moment, but we don't fixate on the raindrops.

We keep our attention in this broad plane of knowing.

This is again from Upasika Kee: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward-going knowing cast aside. This is the meditation that we want to develop.

We can stabilize our attention on this plane of awareness. We stay in touch with the phenomena that are coming and going, but we don't get enmeshed with grasping at them.

So I'll close with a quote, again from the Sutta Nipāta, one of these other Brahmin youths who has come to talk to the Buddha and ask questions. This is the youth named Kappa: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir."

The flood is a very frequent reference in the old texts to the storms of birth and death that we are all vulnerable to. And the island is—where do I step out of the floods to find safety? "Tell me the island, dear sir."

And this is the Buddha's reply: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing—that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbāna, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

So let's just sit together for a moment, please.

[Period of silence]

In the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir. Having nothing, clinging to nothing—that is the island. There is no other. That is Nirvana.

Big Mind Meditation

Guy Armstrong · 42 min

> In this guided meditation, Guy Armstrong introduces the practice of "Big Mind," directing attention toward the conscious quality itself rather than specific objects of consciousness. Drawing on teachings from various Buddhist traditions, Armstrong uses the term "awareness" to refer to the entire field in which all six types of sense consciousness operate, rather than focusing on individual sense doors.
>
> The meditation systematically guides practitioners through expanding awareness to encompass sounds, bodily sensations, and mental formations (thoughts and images), all experienced as arising and passing within vast, open space. Armstrong draws on metaphors of sky, stars, and clouds to illustrate how phenomena appear and disappear within the boundless field of awareness. The practice emphasizes non-resistance and non-grasping, allowing all experiences to come and go naturally.
> The session concludes with wisdom teachings from notable masters: Ajahn Jumnian's instruction to "rest the attention in the pure knowing space of consciousness" as "the dharma of the deathless," Suzuki Roshi's guidance to "live in the utter darkness of the night sky," and Upasaka Ki's teaching on "inward staying, unentangled knowing." This meditation offers both beginning and experienced practitioners a way to directly investigate the nature of consciousness itself, supporting both samatha (calm abiding) and vipassanā (insight) development.

So we're going to do a meditation this morning, a guided meditation called Big Mind that directs the attention toward this conscious quality, encouraging us to notice the faculty of consciousness as it happens.

In this meditation, rather than talk about the six types of sense consciousness, I'm going to use the term awareness to refer to the whole field in which consciousness is happening. Awareness is more or less a synonym for consciousness, but not the specific knowing of one object, but rather the whole field in which consciousness of all the appearances is taking place.

As you begin the meditation, please take a comfortable posture. In this meditation especially, the stiller your body can be, it will help the mind to also become still. Be comfortable not in a stiff way, but just as a way to encourage a posture that you can sustain for some time in the meditation.

Please begin by bringing the attention to sounds. Let your awareness become expansive and wide to take in the sounds all around you—in front, behind, to the right or left, above or below—so that the awareness is felt like a big clear sky or like empty space. All the sounds are just appearing and disappearing in this vast and open space of awareness.

Because the hall is very quiet this morning, I'll introduce a sound from time to time just to let the attention know that. And sometimes I'll hit the big bell, sometimes other bells. But you'll know the sitting ends when there are three strikes of the big bell.

Not resisting any sounds and not holding on to any sounds. Just letting all the sounds come and go in the open space of awareness. Awareness is like the sky. It's clear and limitless. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Now becoming aware of sensations throughout the body. Sensations are just points of feeling, points of sensing. They arise and glimmer like stars in the sky at night, all in the big empty space of awareness. In the actual fact of our experience, there's no head or shoulders or back. There's no chest or arms or legs. Just sensations arising and changing, all in the big open space of awareness.

Awareness has no inside or outside. There are no boundaries or separations. Just sounds and sensations arising, changing and passing in this one empty space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Let the mind be soft and open and still, not moving toward or away from any appearance. There's no inside and no outside. Just sounds and sensations arising and passing in this one open space. Not resisting, not holding on. Allowing them all to come and go in the open space of awareness.

Now becoming aware of thoughts and images. Thoughts and images are just like clouds passing through the sky. They have no roots and no home. They just arise and drift and pass away in this vast and empty space of awareness.

Look at the nature of your mind. It's clear and invisible, like vast space. It doesn't have any form. It doesn't have any boundary. This mind is, but it doesn't quite exist. It contains all things, but it's not composed of them. This mind is empty and without any foundation. It's insubstantial like the sky. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own mind.

Now to put it all together. Sounds are simply appearing and disappearing. Sensations in the body arise and change, glimmering like stars in the night sky. Thoughts and images drift like clouds, rootless and homeless—all within the vast and empty space of awareness. To see if it's like that, look directly at the nature of your own awareness.

Ajahn Jumnian: Rest the attention in the pure knowing space of consciousness. That is the dharma of the deathless.

Suzuki Roshi: Always live in the utter darkness of the night sky.

Upasaka Ki offers this teaching: an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside.

In this practice, we discover that awareness itself is our true refuge—not the objects that appear within it, but the pristine space of knowing in which all experiences arise and dissolve. Whether sounds, sensations, thoughts, or images, all phenomena are like visitors in the infinite guest house of consciousness, appearing momentarily before returning to the vast silence from which they emerged.

This is the invitation: to rest in that which never comes or goes, that which remains untouched by the constant flux of experience. In the words of these great teachers, we find the same pointing—toward the deathless nature of pure awareness, toward the profound darkness that is simultaneously luminous knowing, toward the unentangled presence that recognizes all yet clings to nothing.

May this practice support you in discovering the peace that is already here, the awareness that is your deepest nature, and the freedom that comes from recognizing what you truly are.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 148

Day 20: Brahmavihāra Practice: Muditā for the neutral person and the difficult person

Guy Armstrong · 44 min

> In this guided meditation from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong leads practitioners through muditā (sympathetic joy) practice, focusing on extending appreciative joy to the neutral person and difficult person. Armstrong describes muditā as "the happiest practice within our tradition" and explores how it serves as a powerful ally for the challenges of vipassanā practice.
> The talk provides a comprehensive framework for understanding the four brahmavihāras through their divine states, near enemies, and far enemies - creating what Armstrong calls "a roadmap of the heart's responses to the world." For muditā specifically, he examines how envy (the far enemy) and over-exuberance (the near enemy) can obstruct genuine sympathetic joy. The teaching emphasizes that everyone, even those in difficult circumstances, has access to some form of happiness.
> Armstrong introduces the concept of "precious human birth" - the rare confluence of being born human, encountering authentic dharma teachings, having the capacity to understand them, and possessing the resources to practice intensively. The guided meditation moves systematically from self-muditā (which naturally connects to gratitude) through beloved persons to the more challenging neutral and difficult people, offering practical guidance for working with resistance and cultivating genuine appreciation for others' wellbeing.

Continue the practice of muditā or sympathetic joy in this afternoon meditation. I want to offer a few words of introduction.

Today we're going to work with the two people you've already encountered—the neutral person and the difficult person—but we'll warm up with other individuals you've touched on with muditā so far.

Let me offer a few additional comments. I know Bonnie and Sally have both spoken about this practice, but I'd like to add some further reflections.

I think muditā is the happiest practice within our tradition. As you know, we don't do a lot of ecstatic chanting and body dancing. Given that, this is the practice that really directly uplifts the heart. I think we often overlook it in our instructions, but to compensate, a few years ago I taught a weekend retreat on muditā at IMS on the East Coast.

I thought people would just get a little instruction on how to practice it, but I didn't realize how deep it would go for people. Someone at the end of the retreat—two days of muditā practice—said, "This is the happiest I've felt in years and years of my life."

So if you feel drawn to this practice, I really encourage you to do more of it. It has a great capacity to uplift us, and because of that, it's a really good ally for all the ups and downs that vipassanā practice will take us through. It's a great friend to discover on the path.

Some classical texts say that muditā is the most difficult of the four brahmavihāras to practice because of the tendency to go to the far enemy. I assume someone has talked about the far enemy of muditā—envy—because it's hard to allow other people to have their happiness as though it takes away some of ours. It sets up comparing mind: "Well, if they have that much happiness, how come I don't have that much happiness? Are they a better person than I am?" This is the danger in muditā practice. But if you account for it and just allow it to be there, returning the attention to appreciating, then you can deal with it.

I'm not sure if I'll lead another guided brahmavihāra this retreat, so I want to say something about the brahmavihāras and the near and far enemies. There are four brahmavihāras. Each one has the state itself—which is a heavenly state, a divine abiding—the near enemy, which masquerades as it, and the far enemy, which is an unwholesome state that's the opposite.

Taking these three states across four brahmavihāras, you have twelve different states contained within this teaching. I personally have found that those twelve states make a really good roadmap of the heart's responses to the world. As we encounter different situations, we're going to respond mostly from one of these twelve states. It's pretty well an overall map, and it's brilliant the way it's structured because the brahmavihāra is the way the awakened heart responds, or the selfless heart responds—perhaps the most profound response that we're capable of.

The near enemy is the normal ego, egoic response—when we're just based in self, this is the neurotic way the self responds to the world. It's not far off the mark, but it's very much identified with selfhood. And the far enemy is the unwholesome response—you could say the dark side of the heart.

I invite you to explore that roadmap as a way to respond, and all the different moods and attitudes that it reveals.

With muditā, a beautiful response to someone else's happiness is to just appreciate it for their benefit. The response of what I would call over-exuberance is like, "Oh, how's that going to help me? My friend just inherited a lot of money—they can take me on a trip to Mexico." That's just the normal ego-based response. The far enemy is envy: "Oh, I wish they hadn't gotten that money. I don't have that kind of funds or resource. How come they got it? Are they a better person than me?" So it sets up suffering for ourselves, and then we can't appreciate their good fortune.

You can look through all the other brahmavihāras as you reflect on this and see how the beautiful state, the egoic response, and the unwholesome response play out.

We'll do some muditā for self as we lead into this meditation. Some classical texts say you can't do muditā for self—it's only supposed to be for other people. But the Buddha never said that. The sutta that we've referred to says something like, "Let the muditā be abundant, exalted, immeasurable, to all as to myself, pervading the all-encompassing world." So in the Buddha's instructions, we are not left out of the feeling of muditā.

When we practice mudita for self, what comes through, in my experience, is gratitude—or even if it's not exactly gratitude, it's very close to it, because we're feeling the blessings of our life and letting ourselves appreciate that. So it's very close to a gratitude practice, which, as Aaron talked about, is a really beautiful state of mind that fits within the Brahma Viharas.

One of the things that we sometimes don't think about to be grateful for is what in one tradition is called the precious human birth. All of us are enjoying right now this precious human birth. And it doesn't just mean being born a human being, which itself is very fortunate—more fortunate, say, than being born in the animal realm. Although animals have many beautiful and noble qualities, they're not considered to have the capability for mindfulness, which is the basis for awakening. We all have that capability, being born in the human form.

Not only that, but we've been born at a time when the teachings have been declared and the teachings are being followed. So that's a rare opportunity. How many people in history have had this opportunity to liberate the mind through following an authentic path? Not so many.

Then not only have we heard the teachings, we've understood them enough to make a commitment to them. Not only have we understood them, but we have a mind and body that are in reasonably good shape to practice them. Everyone here has these fortunate conditions.

And not only do we have a mind and body that are in reasonable shape to practice them, but we have the opportunity—we have the time, the interest, and the resources to be able to devote a whole month or two months of our life to practicing the Dharma. This constitutes precious human birth. Everyone here is enjoying those conditions, and those conditions very rarely come together for a human being on this planet. You look over the whole planet and you see very few people who have all those conditions together. So we're all really, really fortunate, and it's something really helpful to consider in the gratitude reflection.

There may be other things in your life that are difficult—there usually are. And as we turn to our situation, sometimes we focus on those and we forget all the blessings that we do have. And practicing the Dharma is a big one for all of us.

Then we will move into the neutral person. You may not know the neutral person so well. You may have to do a little imagination to reflect what might be their sources of happiness. Maybe you can know them a little bit to be able to feel some of that and let your imagination fill in the rest. But it's important to know everybody has some access to happiness.

This is hard to believe when we get to all beings. You might reflect on it again: all beings have some access to happiness. At least that's my experience. Even for someone who's suffering physical pain, there are generally times of the day when it lifts somewhat and the mind can brighten with an appreciation of that.

I was teaching a metta retreat one time. We got to mudita in the afternoon practice period, and there was a woman on the retreat who was a social worker in Manchester, England. Her job was tending to refugee women who had come to Manchester because of fear of persecution, imprisonment, torture—whatever—in their home country. And this was the place that they had landed in their asylum seeking. Most of these women were from Third World countries, from the Middle East or Africa, from climates that were much warmer than Manchester, England.

I don't know if you've ever been to Manchester, but it's one of those northern industrial cities that used to be a mill town and is still full of old red brick buildings crowded together. It has a kind of Dickens-era vibe and is not a beautiful, uplifting spot for the human spirit.

So here are these women coming from their homes and communities and transplanted into Northern England, having to create a new life from a very difficult situation. I asked the social worker, "Do you detect happiness in these women?" And her face lit up. She said, "Absolutely. The resilience of their spirit is just amazing. They are so determined to make a life for themselves here and they have so much courage and strength and joy in what they're doing."

So that told me that if someone from a warm country can come to Manchester and find happiness, everybody can find some happiness. This is helpful when we reflect on the neutral person.

When we come to the difficult person, then you might run up against a similar vibe as in metta, which is finding it really difficult to appreciate their happiness. In metta, sometimes in the beginning, it can be difficult to wish for their happiness. Now we're being invited to reflect on their happiness—to call to mind the happiness of your difficult person and celebrate it. The heart may go through a little roadblock there.

Notice if that happens. This is, again, a little bit of a function of ill will at work. It's not exactly—it may be called envy here. It's a little bit of a far enemy feeling, maybe envy, but there's a little bit of ill will in it.

So if that arises, just notice it. As with the metta, you allow that feeling to be there—the resistance to their being happy because they're such a terrible person, they don't deserve it. Just notice if that thought is there, if the roadblock is there. Let that be in the background. Continue with the intention to appreciate their happiness.

I think that's enough for an introduction. We'll move into the neutral and difficult person, but we'll warm it up first.

So please sit comfortably. First, just bring your attention into the heart center, the center of the chest. Let this be the avenue that you can connect to yourself through. Feel your own being through sitting here or through an image. Connect with your own goodness, remembering qualities in your character, good things you've done. Think of all the moments on this retreat when you've committed to being present, to making right effort, to showing up, to allowing what's difficult, to developing love and compassion—strong, wholesome intentions.

And then reflect on your life, your general situation, both here and at home, and reflect on what's going well for you. What are the things in your life you feel good about? And as you connect with those, say your mudita phrase to yourself. I'll just mention a few possibilities: "May my happiness and good fortune continue," or "I appreciate the blessings in my life," or "I'm grateful for my happiness and good fortune." Continue to stay in touch with those blessings and repeat your mudita phrase for yourself, remembering that we all share in the rare good fortune of this precious human birth.

And then if you're ready, bring in either your happy person or benefactor or dear friend—wherever you feel the most uplifting connection. As you connect with this person, make them alive in the room with you right now. Feel their presence, feel their character. Remember their good qualities. What do you like about them? What's noble in them?

And then connect with the things that you know are going well in this person's life—whether it's their mental state, work, family, friendships, hobbies, practice. Take in all the blessings in their life. As you connect with them, some of the difficulties may come through too. Pass over those and return to connecting with the things that are going well.

And then send your mudita phrase to this person: "May your happiness and good fortune continue." If you like, you can add this subclause: "may they increase, may they never end." Or "I appreciate the blessings in your life." Or most simply, "I'm happy that you're happy."

As with the metta practice, from time to time just stop and feel in your body whatever you feel there, perhaps in the heart center, noticing whether there is a feeling of resonant joy for their happiness, or any other emotions that can come. Make space for any feeling that's there and return to the intention to appreciate their happiness.

And then bring to mind now your neutral person—perhaps the same person you've been using through metta and compassion as well, so that you're familiar with them. Connect with them as best you can, remembering what they look like, remembering places and times you've seen them, and getting as much of a feeling for their character as you can.

You don't know them well, but you can intuit some things. Feel into what you've intuited about their personality or character. If you've ever seen them looking happy, remember them with a smile on their face and fill in a bit about what they might have been happy about. It's okay to imagine a little bit with the neutral person.

Whatever sense you can get about what might be going well in this person's life—any things you know they might enjoy, anything you've seen them appreciate, expressions of friendliness, cheerfulness. Remember that every human life has some happiness in it.

And so send your mudita phrase to your neutral person: "May your happiness and good fortune continue."

May they increase. May they never end.

Remember that you can try the four-step process with mudita as well as with metta: recalling the image, checking the feeling, sending the phrase, and resting in the heart center. If the connection with the neutral person feels too thin or too dry, return to one of your other people—the happy person, benefactor, or friend. Connect again with the warm feelings for them, and come back to your neutral person when you feel ready.

When you're prepared, you can bring in your difficult person. Bring this person to mind—say their name or see them, feel their personality. If it's more comfortable to have them at a little distance, perhaps across the room, that's perfectly fine.

As you connect, notice any feelings that arise at their coming into your space. If there's unease, anxiety, or resentment, simply notice that these feelings are present. Allow them to be there in the space without resistance.

Connect with your difficult person and see if you can call to mind any of their good qualities. Sometimes this is not easy, but you may know, or you might imagine, how their mother would see them. Someone could probably find good qualities in them.

As you connect with their good qualities, also bring to mind all the things that may be going well in this person's life—whatever sources there are for happiness, enjoyment, and contentment that are wholesome. If this is someone who enjoys being unkind, that's not a true source of happiness, so don't bring those to mind. Focus instead on any wholesome sources of enjoyment: friendships they cherish, family, work.

Notice as you focus on the things going well for them, what mood comes with that. Is there a sense of sharing in their happiness? Is there some contraction around their joy, some wishing that they would limit their happiness, that circumstances weren't quite so good for them? Notice the presence of those feelings without judgment, without trying to push them away. Simply make space for them to be there.

Now begin to say your phrase for sympathetic joy to the difficult person: "May your happiness and good fortune continue. I appreciate the blessings in your life." Continue to say it as you've said it for the other people and yourself, then see what comes. Check on the feeling, connect with the heart center, notice what you feel regarding their happiness. See if there's any judgment—thoughts that they're not deserving of it. Let that pass through.

In the last minutes of the sitting, extend this sense of resonant joy to all beings everywhere. Feel it going out from your heart center to all four quarters of the world, touching the beings in this hall, the beings on this land, beings on the earth and beyond. All beings near and far, seen and unseen. All beings having a mix of pleasure and pain in life. All beings wanting only to be happy and not to suffer.

For all beings: May your happiness and good fortune continue. May you appreciate the blessings in your life. May you grow in happiness, peace, and freedom.

Muditā for the Neutral Person and the Difficult Person

Guy Armstrong · 31 min

> In this guided meditation from a February month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong leads practitioners through muditā (sympathetic joy) practice, one of the four brahmavihāras or divine abodes. The session systematically works through different categories of people - beginning with oneself and a beloved person before moving to the more challenging territories of neutral and difficult individuals.
> Armstrong provides practical guidance for cultivating genuine appreciation for others' good fortune, even when it feels emotionally challenging. He offers various muditā phrases such as "May your happiness and good fortune continue" and "I appreciate the blessings in your life," while acknowledging the natural resistance that can arise when extending sympathetic joy to difficult people. The teacher emphasizes the importance of recognizing wholesome sources of happiness and making space for whatever emotions arise without judgment.
>
> *The practice concludes with extending muditā to all beings everywhere, touching on the universal desire for happiness that connects all life. CHAPTER 150

Four Noble Truths: An Overview

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this foundational dharma talk, Guy Armstrong offers a detailed exploration of the Four Noble Truths (Cattāri Ariyasaccāni) based on the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), the Buddha's first teaching after his awakening. Armstrong contextualizes this pivotal discourse within the historical setting of the Buddha's enlightenment at Bodh Gaya and his journey to teach the five ascetics at Sarnath's Deer Park.
> The talk systematically examines each truth: dukkha (suffering/unsatisfactoriness) as the universal human condition; taṇhā (craving) as the root cause; nirodha (cessation) as the possibility of freedom; and the Noble Eightfold Path (Ariya Aṭṭhaṅgika Magga) as the Middle Way leading to liberation. Armstrong emphasizes the practical dimension of each truth's three aspects - recognition, action, and completion - forming the twelve-fold framework that constitutes setting the Dhamma wheel in motion.
> Drawing from personal experience and contemporary examples, Armstrong demonstrates how these ancient teachings remain vitally relevant for modern practitioners. He concludes with an inspiring account from Ajahn Liem, a contemporary Thai master who reportedly achieved full awakening, illustrating that complete liberation remains possible today. This talk serves as both intellectual foundation and practical guide for deepening one's understanding of Buddhism's core insights.

In this evening's talk, I want to give an overview of the Four Noble Truths and base it in the discourse, the sutta. Sutta means discourse in Pali. This was the Buddha's first teaching after his awakening.

I'm truly happy that we can explore this topic with a group of experienced students. Sometimes when we introduce this in a regular retreat, people respond with, "Four Noble Truths? Oh no, I don't want to hear any more about dukkha." But the Buddha said—and I think you all know—that the realization of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy. So we hope this will be the message of tonight's talk: the happiness and joy of the possibility of freedom.

This discourse was given by the Buddha over 2,500 years ago in northern India and was truly the beginning of the movement that has come to be known as Buddhism, the major world religion. It was a comprehensive teaching, and you could say that all the rest of his forty-five years of discourses were footnotes or amplifications to this discourse, making it absolutely central. It's called the Discourse on Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma.

The idea is that this wheel of the Dhamma was set in motion 2,500 years ago and has rolled across many countries and continents, and has now come to the West, where it is beginning to roll and pick up considerable momentum. We want to look at the discourse tonight, passage by passage, and talk about the themes within it. Then in the rest of the retreat, we will develop each of the Four Noble Truths in more detail. We'll have one talk on dukkha, one talk on craving, two talks on nibbana, and a talk on aspects of the Eightfold Path.

But I want to provide the setting for this discourse before we begin, because I think it's remarkable. The Buddha left home when he was twenty-nine years old. He was living near where he had been born. His birthplace is one of the first pilgrimage sites—Sally mentioned going on pilgrimage to India. His birthplace is actually in Nepal, but it's very close to the village where he grew up, which is another of the pilgrimage sites. That's usually one of the first areas people visit on pilgrimage: the Buddha's birthplace and his childhood home.

When he was twenty-nine, he became dissatisfied with his worldly life and wanted to seek what he called "an unailing, unaging, deathless and sorrowless security from bondage," which he called nibbana. This was a concept that was in vogue at that time in India. There were many philosophical schools, and many of them were trying to find this release, this security, this peace of nibbana, but no one had charted a clear course to it. The Buddha said he wanted to set out to find this for himself.

He left a very luxurious life at his home and went off into the forests of northern India, where he met with many teachers, listened to their advice, and practiced with great diligence and austerity for six years. Take the schedule you're doing here, multiply it by two, then extend it for six years, and you'll get a sense of what the Buddha did during that time of his own pilgrimage.

He described his effort in these terms: "Let only my skin, sinews, and bones remain, and let the flesh and blood dry up in my body, but I will not relax my energy as long as I have not attained what can be attained by human strength, energy, and exertion." He had tremendous determination.

In the course of this, one of the prevailing philosophies was that if you torment the body, the soul will become freed and will be able to find the path. So he engaged in great austerities where he ate very little. He said that at one point his skin was almost falling off, and when he touched his stomach, he could feel his backbone. He came very near to dying and decided that this wasn't going to be the way.

Near the town of Bodh Gaya, a young woman named Sujata offered him a meal of rice gruel. He took it, ate, felt stronger, and said, "This is what's needed in order to find the release that I'm looking for."

He traveled a little further from the site of the meal and sat down under a Bodhi tree in an area now known as Bodh Gaya. Bodhi means awakening or enlightenment—it was near the town of Gaya. He sat under the tree, a Bodhi tree, which is just a form of ficus called a peepal tree. He made the resolve at that time: "I'm not going to get up until I attain this release of awakening."

He entered the evening with very strong determination: "I'm either going to die on this spot or I'm going to find what I'm looking for." It's a good thing to keep in mind the next time forty-five minutes of sitting seems a little too long. This kind of determination is possible.

He began his meditation. There are a couple of discourses in the middle length discourses of the Buddha that describe his practice that night—number four and number twenty-six in the middle length discourses are very inspiring descriptions of that practice. As he practiced all night long, toward morning, just as the sun was rising, he had the insight that freed his heart and mind from all forms of suffering. He came to complete awakening and liberation called enlightenment. Only at that time did he become the Buddha, which simply means "the awakened one."

It was such a revelation to him that it brought on a great quality of bliss. The bliss of release was immense. Rather than go out and do anything, he stayed around the Bodhi tree for the next seven weeks, doing various reflections and mainly just abiding in the bliss that he had discovered of liberation.

At that point, he thought about teaching, but he was inclined not to. He said, "The world is so caught up in confusion and wanting, there won't be people who will understand." Then it's said that a heavenly being came down to him and said, "Venerable one, enlightened one, there are those who will understand. There are those with little dust in their eyes."

Please teach what you have discovered for the benefit of beings.

So the Buddha looked around with his awakened vision and saw there were indeed those with little dust in their eyes. The first people he thought of teaching were his two former teachers, who had instructed him in states of meditative concentration. But when he looked with his psychic vision, he saw they had passed away. Too bad for them.

Then he thought of a group of five renunciates, ascetics with whom he had practiced. "They have little dust in their eyes. Let me teach to them." But where were they? Again using his psychic vision, he saw they were living near the town of Benares—actually quite a major city in northern India—staying in a park called the Deer Park outside what is now Sarnath.

That was about two hundred miles away, and there were no Tesla motor vehicles back then. The only way he could reach his friends was to walk that distance. So he set out, traveling by stages from Bodh Gaya to Sarnath.

There he found his five old friends, who had continued practicing. When they saw him approaching, they said, "Oh, here comes Gautama. But he looks fat. He's been living a luxurious life. He's been eating food. We know that's the wrong way to go. You can't eat food—that's going to trap the spirit in the body. So we're not going to listen to him."

But as he approached, something in his bearing and his face was dignified and radiant. They couldn't help themselves; they were drawn to listen to him. So they finally did. He sat down with them, and here we pick up the discourse you have a copy of.

Let me read it section by section so that the words enter into our talk as well. Beginning where it says on the upper left, "11, Setting in Motion the Wheel of Dharma," please follow along if you can:

Thus have I heard. On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Baranasi in the deer park at Isipatana. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus of the group of five thus: "Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness in sensual pleasures, which is low, vulgar, the way of worldlings, ignoble, unbeneficial; and the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, unbeneficial. Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana. And what, bhikkhus, is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata? It is this noble eightfold path: that is, right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. This, bhikkhus, is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

The Buddha's teaching is often called the Middle Way. He was pointing out to them that freedom is not reached by looking for one's happiness in sense pleasures, nor is it reached by torturing the body in the belief that this will free the soul. But there is a middle way between indulgence in sense pleasures and mortification of the body, which is the Noble Eightfold Path he outlined to them.

So the Middle Way is this Eightfold Path, and it leads to vision—another word for insight—knowledge, peace, direct knowledge, enlightenment, and nibbana. This is his enunciation of the path and the core of his teachings, stating from his direct experience that it leads to enlightenment and nibbana.

Then he begins to explain the Four Noble Truths, which are at the heart of his insight:

"Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of suffering: Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering. Union with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not to get what one wants is suffering."

In brief, the five aggregates subject to clinging are suffering.

The word being translated as suffering is dukkha, the Pali word. The meaning of dukkha is wider than simply suffering. It refers to the whole range of inconvenient experiences in this life, from intense pain—emotional or mental—to mild inconvenience. The fact of the shuttle breaking down on the way to the retreat yesterday was one form of dukkha, not necessarily the greatest anguish. When things don't go according to plan, that also is dukkha.

We may often use this word untranslated because there's no one English word that really renders it. We may well just say dukkha when we talk about the First Noble Truth, but you understand it includes a wide range of experiences.

Notice that the Buddha is not saying that life is suffering. Sometimes that's a gloss of the first noble truth—oh, it means life is suffering, it's so pessimistic. It's not saying that. But it describes these really universal experiences. Birth is suffering, isn't it? Aging has suffering in it. Illness has suffering and death has suffering. This is something that we all share. In it, we're all alike. We're united in this kind of suffering.

Association with what is displeasing—finding body pain as you sit during the day is dukkha. Separation from what is pleasing—not being in a comfortable home, not being with companions that one might like to visit with—is unsatisfactory sometimes. Not getting what one wants is dukkha. One wants a concentrated sit. It doesn't happen. There's some frustration.

So there are these many forms of unsatisfactoriness, but I think the beautiful thing is how universal this statement of it is. These are things that everyone on the planet can relate to. Often when we are in suffering or unhappiness, we feel isolated because of it. We think no one else is having this kind of experience. But if we look at this definition, everybody has these kinds of experiences. So suffering shouldn't isolate. It can join us to one another. And it comes in so many forms from big to small.

Joseph Goldstein was teaching here one year, and it provided the inspiration for one of his little mottos. He has a lot of little meditation mantras, so I'll share this one. He was going for a walk, probably just down the walk that goes south of here, down the river. On the way, I think he sprained his knee and had a hard time hobbling back up to the meditation hall. When he got here, he couldn't sit cross-legged anymore. It was difficult to sit, but he could not fold his legs up to sit cross-legged.

He went into a lot of personal grief about it. Talking about association with what is displeasing—he had it in spades. And it was painful. So he had to sit in a chair. He hobbled around to complete the retreat. And he was thinking, why me? Poor me. How can this happen to me? I'm a healthy person. I shouldn't be having these kinds of physical problems.

Then this phrase came to him spontaneously: "Oh, if it's not one thing, it's another." And that's the message of dukkha. If it's not one thing, it's another. That's a really useful phrase to drop in when you find yourself frustrated with any given situation. These little inconveniences in life pop up.

So on the first day of retreat, we often encounter many of these little inconvenient experiences of dukkha. The body isn't comfortable. The mind is wandering. We can't sleep well at night. Someone is in the shower when we want to use it. The food is not exactly to our liking. These are all part of settling in. But rather than simply turning to them as sources of complaint, we can see them as expressions of the universal nature of dukkha.

One of the ways that dukkha manifests is when we're separated from what is pleasing, or when what is pleasing changes. Things we've grown accustomed to don't stay the same. And when they change, that's often disappointing or frustrating or difficult for us.

Organizations manifest this dynamic quite often. Spirit Rock is a very complex organization, always going through countless decisions and turning this way or that. Some recent decisions haven't made me very happy—I've been frustrated by them. I would sit in meditation, stirring around in my mind the things different people had said that I didn't agree with, some of the decisions that had been taken that I didn't support. If you know organizations, you know this happens all the time.

Sally and I recently taught a retreat in Durango. It's lovely to see some of you from that retreat joining us here as well. After the retreat—some of you might remember—a few members of the local sangha took Sally and me on a river trip, a canoe excursion down the Green River in Utah, which was a total delight. I'd never done a canoe trip down a river before.

We were in three canoes, six people total, and Sally and I, being the least experienced, sat up front and let the person behind us do the steering. We paddled, but they did the steering. The current was quite good, so we could cover—one day I think we traveled eighteen miles without working all that hard.

What was beautiful about the river is that it was broad and flowing. It was set at the base of Labyrinth Canyon, which has walls of sheer rock that rise five hundred to a thousand feet. It really is a wonderful experience if you ever have the chance to make that trip. Not only were we unplugged from cell phones and email and internet, which was a great blessing, and there were just the six of us sangha members, but we were in a different timeframe altogether.

We were floating down one sunny morning, and I turned around and asked my friend who knew the area well, "How old are these rocks that we're looking at?" And he said, "Well, the oldest ones we can see are two hundred to three hundred million years old."

I just let my mind expand into that geologic time. It put everything I'd been dealing with into great perspective. Two hundred to three hundred million years. And I'm worrying about changes that have unfolded over six months. Come on, Armstrong. This whole meditation center isn't going to be here in another million years, most likely. And that's just a fraction of these rocks' age.

Going back into geologic time was fantastic for putting perspective on our human experience. You get a taste of that here at Vallecitos as well. Sally and I took a walk this afternoon, went up the ridge to a spot where you get a 360-degree view, and it's very expansive. The river trip expanded time, and some of the views and walks around here really expand the sense of space. This gives great perspective on our moment-to-moment struggles and reactions—dropping into that wider view of things.

Because these difficulties of being human exist within a big field. Being human is not an easy thing to carry out. Everyone struggles in different ways with human life. This is from the New Yorker:

"According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1,200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed by positive logic that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be, given everything it must put up with. Nine out of ten respondents stated that they would give up completely if they only knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail."

This is kind of our human life, and you may feel like this at times here. Unfortunately, you've given up the chance of getting something in the mail.

We simply notice that being human involves us with dukkha in many different ways. We can feel it in subtle form, in moment-to-moment experience. Sometimes life presents us with big examples of it.

We can use that dukkha in our practice. We can use it to make us more compassionate. We recognize it in ourselves and open to it with some tenderness. Knowing that other people are experiencing the same, we open to them with tenderness as well.

This is from Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian-American poet: "Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive."

Meeting our own dukkha can make us more compassionate. It can also make us stronger. We learn so much from meeting, understanding, and working with our difficulties. This is the first noble truth.

The second noble truth is phrased this way in the sutta: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the origin of suffering. It is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight here and there. That is, craving for sensual pleasures, craving for existence, craving for extermination."

This last is more often translated as craving for non-existence. This is where one simply doesn't want the experience to go on any longer. This is the movement that results in suicide, and in lesser ways, it's a movement to reject.

Craving is the source of dukkha. This was really revelatory for me. When I first started hearing this, it was very liberating. I came into the practice at a time in my life—in my twenties—when I had a lot of confusion, unhappiness, uncertainty about direction. I wasn't sure what was up. I went through a lot of highs and a lot of lows. Many of us do that in our twenties.

What was alarming, looking back, is that I didn't know what led to happiness and what led to unhappiness. I didn't know the cause of my unhappiness. Here the Buddha spells it out so clearly—both the truth of unhappiness and the truth of its cause. If there's a cause, there's a way out. That's what was so amazing to me.

Craving is the translation of the Pali word taṇhā. Its original meaning was simply thirst. I like that because you can feel that—you can quench a thirst, but it keeps coming back. You can't ultimately quench a thirst. You can't ultimately satisfy craving by continuing to feed it. You can get temporary release, but it cannot be satisfied permanently in that way.

Craving is this deep-rooted tendency of mind, a very deep movement of mind that wants things to be a certain way. Generally, the way the moment is isn't that way. So craving is looking at the moment, looking for it to be one way and complaining because it's not, or wanting something different. It expresses itself both as pulling toward us with wanting, as Sally mentioned this morning, or pushing away with aversion, which she also mentioned.

Normally in life, we think that the problem is outside of ourselves. The reason we're unhappy is due to causes and conditions outside of us and beyond our control. The second noble truth says something different.

I don't know if you saw the movie Kundun. Martin Scorsese made a film about the life of the Dalai Lama. It must have come out fifteen years ago or so—a really beautiful movie. If you haven't seen it, it's worth a look. It traced the Dalai Lama's life growing up as a young monk with his tutors in the Potala Palace. He was recognized at an early age and trained from about age four.

In this particular scene, he's probably around ten years old, and his tutors are teaching him the Four Noble Truths. They say to him, "Now, explain in your own words the meaning of the Second Noble Truth."

He said, "The second noble truth is that the cause of suffering is craving."

They said, "No, no, no, that's too formulaic. Express it in your own words."

And so he thought for a moment and said, "I suffer because I want things."

They said, "Oh, that's still a little too traditional. Put it really in your own words."

And so the young Dalai Lama sat there, reflecting for a few more moments. Then he said, "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind."

And the tutors said, "Very good."

Most of our suffering comes from our own habits of mind. And that's what meditation is for—to release us from these habits of mind. We have to trust in that. Otherwise, we keep complaining about the external conditions. But the source and the release is within us.

So then we come to the Third Noble Truth as described in the sutta: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it."

So the Buddha is talking here of the ending of suffering, the ending of dukkha. And this is generally understood in a permanent way—the remainderless fading away of that craving, meaning it doesn't arise again. This is what he discovered under the Bodhi tree. It's a possibility that the source of dukkha can be uprooted and not arise again. That is the essence of full awakening or full enlightenment. That is a human possibility. And this is the direction that our Dharma practice leads in.

So this was a radical discovery. According to the recorded literature, no one else had proclaimed it in this way before—that it was possible to find an end of suffering through the ending of this psychological habit of craving.

We can explore this in two different senses. There's the permanent end that the Buddha pointed to that is reached with full awakening. This is the state of what is called in our tradition an Arahant. One who is fully awakened is called an Arahant—reached the very end of craving, and it's said never to arise again for that person. That person's life will still continue, but there won't be psychological suffering in it.

But the other way that we can understand this is that there can be a temporary end of suffering when there's a temporary end of craving. This brings it much more home to us in our moment-to-moment practice, and it makes freedom available here and now. A degree of freedom is available here and now by the relinquishment, the letting go, the abandoning of this movement of craving.

So in practical terms, this is what's very helpful to explore, to recognize, and to learn how to move into. We'll be spending a lot of time talking about this—both the permanent state and as a practical, immediate experience for all of us to discover.

And then the discourse continues: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the way leading to the cessation of suffering. It is this Noble Eightfold Path, that is right view to right concentration."

So this is the statement again of the same path that he described as the Middle Way. These eight components—right view and right intention constitute the wisdom portion in Pali called paññā. Right speech, right action, right livelihood constitute the portion of conduct called sīla. Right effort, right mindfulness and right concentration constitute the meditation portion called samādhi.

To have a path that gives us step-by-step instructions to come out of dukkha and move into any degree of freedom that we might aspire to is such a gift to the world. This is the Buddhist gift to the world. There is not only the possibility of happiness or freedom—there is a clear, concrete path to reach it.

And that's what we're doing here. We are walking the path that leads in that direction. Whether we finish it in this week or not, I don't know. But this is one more movement of momentum that heads just in that direction.

Just to talk a little bit about the meditation portions of this: right effort basically means keep the mind in a wholesome place. That's all that right effort is about. So you can watch right effort going into annoyance or going into hindrances or going into craving. And when you see that, as far as possible, you want to interrupt it and bring back wholesome factors of mind.

So the most immediate wholesome factor that we're going to keep bringing back again and again is mindfulness. Mindfulness is one of the most wholesome factors of the whole path, and it's something that we can bring about in a moment of intending it. That's why mindfulness is the next step.

Effort is meant to remind us: okay, move back into wholesome. How do I do that? I become mindful. I start paying attention.

I want to give a really simple definition of mindfulness. You can read long, complicated definitions on the web. MBSR has its own definition and different teachers have their own definition. I want to offer a really simple, practical definition: mindfulness is knowing what your experience is in this moment.

All you have to do to become mindful is to answer the question: what's happening to me right now? Oh, there's an in-breath. Oh, there's a sound. Oh, there's a mood of irritation. Oh, there's an unpleasant sensation in the lower back. Knowing that is your experience—that's mindfulness.

Now it can grow up and become more mature and refined and stronger and unshakable. But this is enough to activate the path. So this will be the essence of our meditation instruction: what's happening right now? And all you have to do is notice it. It's really simple. Connect to the direct experience of the way things are. This is what's happening.

Out of right mindfulness, when we string enough moments together with enough frequency—or you could say continuity—the mind starts to collect in the present moment. Because what we're doing in mindfulness is taking it out of the spin of conceptual proliferations. All the things we think about—work and home and past and future—we're taking it out of that spin and we're just coming in and saying: what's happening now is there's a pain in the knee. What's happening now is there's an in-breath.

As we accumulate these moments of present moment orientation, it builds to collect the mind in the moment, and that's a source of strength. When the mind becomes collected, that's concentration. And concentration brings a steadiness, a strength and a stability to the mind. So all of a sudden we can observe the way things are going—even thoughts, even hindrances, even movements of wanting or hating. We can observe those without being so shaken by them.

And having found that stability, we can start to see clearly. The purpose and benefit of concentration is to see things as they are. That's the ground for insight. So you can think of it like this: what's this awake awareness that we've been talking about? What's the purpose of it? It's to see things the way they are. That's what frees us.

And when we can abide in that awake awareness, we discover that it itself has a quality of freedom. So it leads in the direction of freedom and it embodies, it carries with it the quality of freedom. And then this seeing things the way they are comes back around to the start of the path, which is right view.

So the sutta continues. And this is where it gets kind of interesting in a way that isn't talked about so often. The Buddha is going to break down each of the noble truths into three phases that he wants us to understand and focus on. So he's going to express it differently now.

He takes the first one: "This is the noble truth of suffering. Thus, Bhikkhus, in regards to things unheard before, there arose in me vision, knowledge, wisdom, true knowledge, and light." In other words, he's saying this was an original insight. I didn't get this from somebody else. I saw this for myself. This is the noble truth of suffering.

And then it continues: "This noble truth of suffering is to be fully understood, thus because in regard to things unheard before there arose in me vision, knowledge," etc.

This is a really important line in the whole sutta: "This noble truth of suffering is to be fully understood." The noble truths aren't just philosophical concepts that we're supposed to believe in. If that's all it was, everyone could pick up a book on Buddhism in Religion 101 and reach the Four Noble Truths.

Each of the Noble Truths is a call for us to take action. The action in regards to suffering is we are to fully understand it, fully understand it. When we fully understand suffering, that is what brings release.

The Buddha said on another occasion, "There's one thing the not seeing of which keeps you bound. What is that one thing? Dukkha." It's because we haven't fully understood dukkha that we continue to be bound.

And then he continues, "This noble truth of suffering has been fully understood." So now he's speaking as the fully awakened Buddha, saying that he has fully understood the first noble truth of suffering. And this is what has released him.

There are these three aspects with each of the noble truths. There's the statement of the truth, there's the call to action, and then there's the expression of its completion—the action having been completed. And when all three of those are brought to fullness of development, that is the ground for awakening.

And then he continues, "This is the noble truth of the origin of suffering. This noble truth of the origin of suffering is to be abandoned." So the meditation instruction is craving is to be abandoned. Now we may have abandoned craving on many, many occasions, and that's fully in line with the Buddha's instruction.

But then he continues, "This noble truth of the origin of suffering has been abandoned. Thus there arose in me vision, knowledge, etc." So his statement is craving has been completely abandoned, relinquished, let go of, not to arise again. And that's again a statement of his full awakening.

So we understand dukkha. We release or abandon or let go of the craving. And in truth, sometimes we can let go of the craving. And sometimes we can't. Ajahn Chah has this great line. He said, "Seventy to eighty percent of spiritual life is knowing that you're holding on and not being able to let go."

So we will see that a lot. We know we should let go. And we just can't. But eventually we do. And this is so helpful to notice the moment when the craving has been held and is then released. Really helpful to see directly.

Then the third noble truth. "This is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. This noble truth of the cessation of suffering is to be realized." This is our task. And then for the Buddha, "This noble truth of the cessation of suffering has been realized."

So we are to know in our direct experience, the cessation of dukkha. We can know it on a momentary basis, the temporary release, the temporary freedom, the temporary liberation. And at some point, hopefully we will recognize it in the complete release.

And then in the fourth noble truth, "This is the noble truth of the way leading to the cessation of suffering. This noble truth is to be developed." And then his statement, "This noble truth of the way leading to the cessation of suffering has been developed."

So dukkha is to be understood. Do we always understand our dukkha? No. Often we won't even acknowledge it. There's so many ways we are so defended against letting ourselves even feel the dukkha directly. We deny it's happening. We blame it on someone else. We blame ourselves for it as a way of distancing. We want it to go away. We try to push it away. All these are complications of mind that mindfulness helps us to undo.

Freud said that neurosis is the refusal to suffer. And he's just pointing to all the defense mechanisms that we create against feeling it and understanding it. So we open to our suffering through this practice of mindfulness. And through that, we can understand it.

So we have the Four Noble Truths, each with its call to action: to understand dukkha, to abandon its cause, to realize the cessation of dukkha, and to develop the path leading to the cessation of dukkha. Each of these Four Noble Truths has three aspects—this is the truth, this is the action, and this is the statement that we have done the action, at least partially. We have three aspects times the four noble truths, which generates the number twelve.

This is where the Buddha continues: "So long as my knowledge and vision of these four noble truths as they really are in their three phases and twelve aspects was not thoroughly purified in this way, I did not claim to have awakened to the unsurpassed perfect enlightenment in this world. But when my knowledge and vision of these four noble truths, as they really are, in their three phases and twelve aspects, was thoroughly purified, then I claimed to have awakened to the unsurpassed perfect enlightenment in this world. The knowledge and vision arose in me. Unshakable is the liberation of my mind. This is my last birth. Now there is no more renewed existence."

This is his proclamation of his own liberation and deliverance from the realm of birth, death and rebirth known as samsara. He ties it to these twelve aspects. This setting in motion the wheel of the Dhamma is described in detail as these twelve aspects.

This has been represented in the art of our tradition for a very long time—the symbol of the Dhamma wheel that the Buddha started rolling. When you see it with twelve spokes, those represent these twelve aspects: the noble truths times their three phases. Often the Dhamma wheel is represented with eight spokes, symbolizing the Eightfold Path. This is perhaps more commonly the way we think of it. But in Asia, more often we see the Dhamma wheel with these twelve spokes symbolizing the Four Noble Truths in all their three aspects. You might see the Dhamma wheel in either of these forms, but in either case, it symbolizes the teaching of the Four Noble Truths and the path. The implication is that this wheel was set in motion and cannot be stopped—has not been stopped and cannot be stopped.

"This is what the Blessed One said." Kondañña was one of the five ascetics, and in this moment, he had a direct realization of the Four Noble Truths. This is a stock phrase that occurs throughout the suttas to indicate this moment of glimpse into the truth of what the Buddha was pointing to: "All that is subject to origination is subject to cessation." He had apparently seen at least the cessation of craving and suffering fully in that moment.

This is what's referred to as stream entry. This first glimpse of the depth of the Four Noble Truths is a moment where the mind has been temporarily completely liberated, and one knows without a doubt that liberation is possible through this teaching and through this path. Kondañña received this from one short discourse that the Buddha taught. Things like this still happen today. People still get awakened on hearing the Dhamma being spoken. It is a powerful means of communication, listening to the Dhamma.

The next section describes how "the earth-dwelling devas raised a cry. At Baranasi in the deer park at Isipitana, this unsurpassed wheel of the Dhamma has been set in motion by the Blessed One, which cannot be stopped." This goes through many layers of Buddhist cosmology where all the high heavens proclaim their joy at this setting in motion the wheel of the Dhamma. I'll leave you to read that at your own pace and make of it what you will. It's not essential to believe in this cosmology, but it is a way of saying, as Asian religious texts often do, this was a big deal. And it's still a big deal today.

These Four Noble Truths are something that all the meditative schools of Buddhism agree on as their foundation. If you go into Zen, Chan, or Tibetan Buddhism of any school, you'll find the Four Noble Truths underlie the teachings as they underlie ours. It's what joins all these schools together.

The sutta concludes with this lovely paragraph: "Then the Blessed One uttered this inspired utterance: 'Kondañña has indeed understood! Kondañña has indeed understood!' In this way, the Venerable Kondañña acquired the name Añña-Kondañña, Kondañña who has understood."

Not only did the Venerable Kondañña get it—the Buddha saw that he got it. He saw that Kondañña had momentarily awakened and received in the deepest possible way this teaching. But Kondañña wasn't fully awakened. The Buddha had this insight seven or eight weeks earlier and had fully awakened from it. Kondañña's mind wasn't that strong or that clear.

He didn't fully awaken, but he knew the path. He had complete faith in the possibility of full awakening. Then the Buddha continued to instruct the group of five over the next two weeks. During that time, Kandanya and the other four all reached full awakening. So at that time, there were six Arahants in the world, six fully awakened beings, two weeks after the Buddha began teaching.

We might ask ourselves this question about full awakening: Is that just a 2,500-year-old Asian fairy tale? Or is that still possible today?

I want to close by reading a short passage from a biography of a teacher named Ajahn Liem. Ajahn Chah was a great Thai master of the last century. He was Jack Kornfield's first teacher and Ajahn Sumedho's main teacher. He passed away in the mid to late 1990s. But before he did, he gave transmission and anointed as his successor Ajahn Liem, another Thai monk who lived in the northeast of Thailand. This is from Ajahn Liem's biography, which you can find on the web.

Around the middle of the rainy season of the year 2512—that's 1969 to us—Ajahn Chah encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity. So Ajahn Liem increased his efforts, and as he did so, results became evident.

"Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m. and then stop to have a rest, but on this day I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture. A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body, as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, an experience of the body becoming completely light and at ease. Cool, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness.

"This experience continued on throughout the whole year, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued on unchanging for many years, all from that one sitting. It feels like there are no more proliferations of the mind. All the suffering that arises with defilements that had bothered me before—the thoughts concerning the other sex or all kinds of ambitions that I had before—I don't know where they all disappeared to. There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And this experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change all the way up to the present day. The same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without change."

This is very rare in Theravadan circles—that a senior monk, a senior practitioner, basically declares his ending of all suffering. But he is considered in Thailand to have genuinely reached this state of full awakening. He sometimes comes to teach in the West. He still teaches in Thailand and sometimes also comes to the West.

So this is a possibility of the Four Noble Truths manifested in the current day and age, where the cessation of suffering has been fully realized by someone.

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose. There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 151

Third Noble Truth & Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive overview of the Third Noble Truth and its relationship to Nibbāna, drawing from classical Buddhist texts and the Four Noble Truths framework. This dharma talk examines Nibbāna as both the cessation of suffering described in the Third Noble Truth and as an unconditioned element already present within us, referencing key passages from the Udāna and various suttas.

Armstrong explores the literal meaning of Nibbāna as "extinguishing" the fires of craving, greed, hatred, and delusion, while discussing the four stages of awakening from stream entry to arahantship. He shares inspiring stories from the Therīgāthā and accounts of contemporary masters like Ajahn Chah and Dīpamā, illustrating how different personalities can manifest full liberation.

The talk concludes with practical meditation guidance, emphasizing "liberation through non-clinging" and directing attention toward the deathless element through the stilling of formations, relinquishment of attachments, and cessation of craving. This foundational teaching prepares practitioners for deeper engagement with the ultimate goal of Buddhist practice.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the Third Noble Truth and conjoin it with the topic of Nibbāna. We're going to have two talks on this topic, and tonight what I want to do is present an overview of the classical meaning of Nibbāna as it's found in the discourses of the Buddha. At times this may seem a little theoretical to you or a little remote, but then Carol tomorrow night is going to talk about how we can make it approachable and relevant in our own practice and find elements of this quality in our direct experience here and now. So we'll have both a theoretical background, an overview, and then tomorrow night a more practical approach to the Third Noble Truth.

You remember we talked last time about the Buddha leaving home at age twenty-nine, embarking on this quest for what he called "the unaging, unailing, deathless, sorrowless security from bondage"—Nibbāna. He found what he was looking for on the night of his awakening under the Bodhi tree in Bodh Gaya.

There was a poem that he spontaneously uttered right after his awakening. It goes like this:

"Through many a birth I wandered in saṃsāra, seeking but not finding the builder of this house. Painful is birth again and again. O house builder, now you are seen. You shall build no house again. All your rafters are broken. Your ridge pole is shattered too. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving."

His comment is "painful is birth again and again." He's reflecting on the thousands and thousands of lives that he saw that he had lived in this cycle, and the attendant dukkha in each one. In this evening's insight, he had found a way to be free of all that. The house that he was talking about—the builder of this house—the house is the body that takes birth again and again. The house builder is craving. The ridge pole that gets shattered is ignorance. Then as he says, "my mind has attained the unconditioned." Unconditioned is a synonym for Nibbāna and "reached the very end of craving."

This brings us back to the statement of the Third Noble Truth that we talked about on the first full day of the retreat: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, non-reliance on it."

Through the poem and the Third Noble Truth, we are getting this equation, this correspondence between the Third Noble Truth, the end of suffering, the end of craving, Nibbāna, and the unconditioned. What we want to do in this talk is explore all these different ways of talking about the Third Noble Truth and how they relate.

This brings us immediately to the question: what is Nibbāna? I'd say that this is the hardest topic to talk about in all of Buddhism. Yet fools will rush in where angels fear to tread, and so I'm going to talk about it tonight.

It's hard because, one, the Buddha was deliberately vague on the details here. He didn't want to paint detailed pictures of it, because people could get a misleading impression from words. He just wanted to show people the way, and then when people followed the way, they would find it and know for themselves what it is.

A second thing is that the ultimate kind of experience that one can have in religious terms is beyond words. All the great religious traditions say this, and this is true in Buddhism also. Different people will put words to the insight into Nibbāna, but the descriptions may sound different. It's very interesting to listen to two different teachers describe it, and you'll hear entirely different descriptions, and yet both may have undergone similar degrees of liberation. The descriptions and the views on what constitute it will differ, but the liberations can be the same.

It is indescribable. The ultimate cannot be put into words because words discriminate, and the ultimate is beyond discrimination. The Buddha said this about it: "This Dhamma that I have attained is profound, hard to see and hard to understand. It's subtle, to be experienced by the wise."

The talk tonight may not be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. So don't try too hard to figure it out. This is not really a conceptual thing. Get the feeling of it. Let the feeling come through. Even though some of the descriptions may seem a little remote right now, let the principle of it guide your practice. I'll explain some practice directions tonight. Carol will talk about more tomorrow.

The literal meaning of the term Nibbāna is extinguishing or blowing out or quenching. It's a fire that has been put out. Now, when a fire is put out, where is it to be found? It's nowhere, is it? It ceased to be. So the fire in this case is the fire of clinging or of craving.

And when it is extinguished, it's gone. The mind experiences a great coolness that is the relief from the burning energy of craving or clinging. So nibbana is often described in terms of coolness and peace—this is the experience of it.

Sariputta gave perhaps the most concise description of it in all of the suttas when he said, "The destruction of greed, the destruction of aversion, the destruction of delusion—this is called nibbana." We realize that craving encompasses greed, aversion, and delusion. When craving is destroyed, these tendencies of mind, these deep-rooted unconscious tendencies are also ended.

So the one who has released greed, aversion, and delusion has come into a state of great freedom. These forces no longer afflict one. Craving no longer afflicts one. Suffering no longer afflicts one. And the experience is one of a great freedom—unshakable freedom.

Nirvana is pointing to a state of mind of an enlightened being, a liberated being. But it's also usually understood as a deathless element that's already present in each of us. This becomes very interesting—an unconditioned element that's already here and now within our being. That makes it not so remote. That means some aspect or flavor of this unconditioned element may be felt in this very moment.

But why is it hard to see? Why is it hard for us to discover and touch? The reason is that its vibration is very subtle, and the vibrations of greed, aversion, and delusion are very gross and they mask it or obscure it. When the mind is active with greed, aversion, delusion, it's too busy, too active for this very subtle vibration of nirvana to come into the foreground.

That's why the path of meditation is to calm down the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion, so that the very nature of the mind becomes closer to that of nibbana. When it becomes very close, then there's the possibility of opening to it and seeing it directly.

The most reliable guidelines I know for a meditative approach to nibbana are the seven factors of enlightenment. I understand their purpose as shaping the mind so that it is as close as possible to the vibration of nirvana. With that convergence, there's a possibility that it can be revealed, that we can know it directly.

This unconditioned element is already present. The aim of practice, according to the Third Noble Truth, is for us to realize it. This expression of the unconditioned element as something present in us was most clearly stated in this passage from a text called the Udana. These are the words of the Buddha:

"There is, bhikkhus, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded. If there were not this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, then there would be no deliverance here visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded. But since there is this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, therefore a deliverance is visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded."

What the Buddha is pointing to here is a contrast between all the conditioned elements of our experience—which include all the mental states, all the sense contact, all the impermanent things that come and go and catch us in craving—and this latent element, which is unborn, meaning it hasn't come into creation in the same way as sense objects. It's uncompounded in that it doesn't arise from prior conditions. It's said that it is not subject to arising and passing. That's why it's available at any time.

These are some synonyms that the Buddha gave for this element—also called the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the shelter, the harbor, the refuge, the beyond.

This is considered nibbana—the highest kind of happiness available to us. It's above sense pleasures. It's even above yam burgers with chipotle sauce, which is a very high form of sense pleasure. I thought that was like the best retreat dinner I've maybe ever had tonight, so many thanks to our cooks. It's even above the blissful states of meditation, jhana states, which can be very blissful and pleasant, because it's so happy because it's a place of safety. We're no longer subject to the torments of mind—of greed, aversion, and delusion. We are sheltered from all that, and that peace comes as a huge relief.

It's said also in the Dhammapada that peace is the highest happiness. Whether you consider it the ultimate peace of nirvana or relative peace, I think this is a really interesting comment on our psychology. Do we believe it? Because peace is available in any moment when we let go of our activities. There is a relief in that kind of peace. If we believe that's the highest happiness, wouldn't that incline us to stop pursuing all the worldly, impermanent things that we pursue? Because they all stir us up. But we can contact this peace that we can rest in, in any moment in which we give up all those pursuits, all that activity of striving and pushing and pulling.

So this is really, I think, a very profound psychological insight that is not well understood in the West. Peace is the highest form of happiness. It's not a bubbly kind of happiness, peace. It's not like always coming out as this great bubbly joy. But the very peaceful nature of it is satisfying in a way that sense pleasures aren't.

So how do we get in that direction to the unconditioned, to liberation, to freedom? Again, from the Buddha: "Just as the river Ganges slants, slopes, and inclines toward the ocean, so too a practitioner who develops and cultivates the Noble Eightfold Path slants, slopes, and inclines towards nibbana."

You're only going in one direction. I hope you want to go there because that's where this is heading. And as Yogi Berra said, "If you don't know where you're going, you might end up somewhere else."

So this is where we're all going. Some people are surprised by this when they, just somewhere down the way, they thought, "Oh, I thought I was going for this bliss and uplifting joy. No, you're going to peace. Oh, I'm not sure I want to go there."

Trust us. This is the place to go. This is the highest happiness. This is where the Buddha was pointing us to.

This path is outlined in many discourses. There's one where it's described very beautifully in kind of two stages. There's one stage that goes from suffering to contentment, or you could say to normal happiness. And then there's another part of the path that goes from happiness to liberation.

So Munindra-ji, Joseph's first teacher, likes to say, "If you aim for the highest happiness, all the others will follow in the wake." So normal human happiness, worldly happiness, joy and delight all come in the wake of aiming for the highest happiness of peace.

Now, there are two ways that the path can be understood within all the Buddhist traditions. You'll hear these different flavors. Our approach is very much along the lines of strengthening the positive qualities of mind, developing them to such a degree, especially the seven factors of enlightenment, that they converge on awakening. They converge on nirvana. So this is a path of effort where factors are cultivated deliberately and brought into maturity and strength so that the mind is poised for awakening to take place.

There's another view of the path which says that the natural purity of our being is already here. And you can think of the unconditioned element in this way—that natural purity within us is already here. And all that has to happen is that we thin out the clouds or the clouds thin out through awareness. And then this natural purity comes through.

I think this is interesting because one way stresses effort. The other way stresses trust. And things unfold best, I think, when you put both together. You make the effort to cultivation and you trust that that purity of nature is there as well.

Effort can take us very close, but effort can't do the work to take us to the fullness of the third noble truth. Why? Because nibbana is desireless. Nibbana is aimless. And any kind of effort directed toward a goal is not of the nature of nibbana. So effort can build the mind to this beautiful balance of conditioned peacefulness, but it can't open the door to the unconditioned element. That only comes from grace, some uncontrollable, unpredictable element.

So in our meditation, what we want to do is to develop all the factors to get us as close as possible and then trust. Because at some point we have to stop trying because trying does not align with the energy of the desirelessness of the unconditioned.

So there's this nice story about Ananda. You all probably know Ananda is like the sweetest guy in the whole of the Pali Canon. He was a cousin of the Buddha's who was his attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life. Very loyal, devoted, and friendly. It's said that Ananda had a big part in the establishment of the bhikkhuni order, the nuns' order, which the Buddha initially refused because it was just not done at the time to have women practicing seriously in India of that age. But Ananda pleaded their case to the Buddha, who eventually agreed. So Ananda is like everybody's best friend.

But he devoted all his time to serving the Buddha, and he hadn't had a lot of time for his own practice. So after the Buddha's death, there was a gathering. It was said of five hundred fully awakened beings, and their purpose was to collect the teachings so that they could be passed on to other generations. But the gathering was only for fully awakened beings and Ananda was not one.

However, Ananda possessed an extraordinary memory and had spent twenty-five years at the Buddha's side, hearing all the teachings and developing the ability to recite them perfectly. So the assembly found themselves in a dilemma: they desperately needed Ananda's presence, but he had not yet awakened.

Ananda felt this conflict deeply. He understood that he needed to attain awakening to join his fellow practitioners. So he resolved to practice with utmost dedication until the council began. This gathering became known as the First Council.

Through the night before the meeting, Ananda sat and walked in meditation, practicing with tremendous fervor and staying awake in his determined effort to reach enlightenment. Yet despite all his striving and intense effort, awakening eluded him. As morning approached, he realized he wasn't going to succeed.

"I guess it's not going to happen for me this time," he thought to himself. "Well, I might as well take some rest and perhaps I can be helpful in some other way tomorrow."

In that moment, Ananda simply relaxed his effort. He sat on his bed and prepared to lie down for rest. But just as he was about to place his head on the pillow, the final moment of enlightenment dawned for him. He went to sleep as an ordinary practitioner and awakened the next morning as an Arhat, fully liberated, ready to join the council.

All the suttas you encounter that begin with the phrase "Thus have I heard" were recited by Ananda from his perfect recollection. It was his extraordinary memory of the Buddha's teachings that preserved these texts for us. This story beautifully illustrates how effort carries us to a certain point, but then relaxation and grace bring the final opening.

It's important to understand that Ananda was not a beginner. In our tradition, there are considered to be four distinct stages of awakening, and each stage releases some of the fetters that bind us. These fetters—ten in total—keep us bound to continued existence, to spiritual blindness, to fundamental misunderstanding.

The first stage is called stream entry, characterized by the same experience we encountered with Añña Kondañña in our opening sutta. When the Buddha delivered his first teaching, Kondañña immediately understood. The phrase describing his realization has become standard in the suttas for this preliminary enlightenment: "While this discourse was being spoken, there arose in the Venerable Kondañña the dust-free, stainless vision of the Dhamma: whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation."

Stream entry means the practitioner—whether woman or man, as both are described in the suttas—has experienced their first direct realization of the deathless element, the unconditioned, nirvana itself. This opening of mind to the ultimate reality is profoundly transformative, constituting what we call an enlightenment moment. It transforms us because it permanently uproots some of the fetters that blind us.

Stream entry eliminates three specific fetters. The first is personality view—essentially the belief that there truly exists a self within this mind-body process. This first contact with the unconditioned removes the fundamental belief in selfhood. While the sense of self will continue to arise for a stream enterer, they can examine it closely and see through its illusory nature. The belief itself has been extracted.

The second fetter eliminated is doubt—specifically doubt about the path and whether the Buddha's teachings actually lead to ultimate freedom. This doubt dissolves because one has directly experienced the truth of the unconditioned, that momentary but unshakable peace. Having tasted this reality personally, one knows with absolute certainty that complete liberation is possible through developing the factors of the path.

The third fetter is attachment to rules and observances, sometimes called rites and rituals. While this may seem less relevant to Western practitioners today, it was tremendously significant in the Buddha's time. The Brahmin caste maintained elaborate ritual systems—sacred bathing, priestly chants, animal sacrifices, and countless ceremonial practices—all believed to purify the mind. The Buddha declared these ineffective. Similarly, while sila or ethical conduct serves as valuable support for the path, moral behavior alone cannot liberate the heart and mind.

The tradition teaches that a stream enterer is destined to reach full enlightenment within at most seven more births. This represents a kind of spiritual guarantee—having reached this milestone, one's eventual liberation becomes assured. Before this point, one might wander from birth to birth for countless lifetimes. Such is the profound power of this particular insight.

This is not merely an ancient Indian legend. Practitioners today, both in the West and perhaps even more commonly in Asia, do reach this stage of understanding. These openings happen primarily during extended retreats—the two-month programs at Spirit Rock and the three-month course at IMS. Dedicated practitioners who have been cultivating their practice over time do experience these realizations in our current era. Those who do feel deeply inspired and gain tremendous confidence in their spiritual journey.

It's sometimes not possible to know whether an experience is a valid enlightenment experience. You're a practitioner who has heard many stories and words, but when the actual thing comes, is it that or something else?

Ajahn Sumedho had a question like this. He was practicing under Ajahn Chah, having been ordained with him in Thailand in the late sixties—I believe the first Western monk to ordain with Ajahn Chah. After practicing very diligently for several years, he had an experience that he thought might be stream entry. So he went to ask Ajahn Chah about it, wanting confirmation. He described what had happened and asked, "Was that stream entry?"

Ajahn Chah replied, "How should I know? I wasn't there."

This is a great reflection. Western Vipassana teachers tend to have this same humble attitude about students' enlightenment experiences. We don't confirm or deny because we can't really tell. Only the person who has had the experience can truly know, and sometimes only after time passes can they determine whether it has actually purified the heart and uprooted some of the fetters of the mind. According to the suttas, the Buddha could tell, but we cannot. So we don't tend to make those kinds of evaluations.

The next stage of enlightenment is called a once-returner, meaning one will return to the human realm only one more time before full enlightenment is assured. In a once-returner, no fetters are completely uprooted, but the primary defilements of lust, hatred, and delusion are greatly weakened. The characteristic of a once-returner is greatly reduced lust and aversion. I believe some Westerners we know have probably reached this stage, though I don't query my colleagues about it. Even if I did, I'm not sure I would always trust their evaluation. This is not easy to achieve and remains an uncommon occurrence, at least in the West.

The third stage is called a non-returner. Here, significant fetters are uprooted—sense desire and ill will are ended. The possibility for anger is gone. Lust is gone. Dipa Ma was said to have reached this stage of awakening. She was a Bengali woman who also practiced under Munindra, developing a very strong meditation practice and high levels of attainment.

One of Dipa Ma's comments about the third stage was that family life is no longer possible after reaching it. Family life, I believe, is the Indian euphemism for sex. After the third stage, because sexual desire and sensual desire are no longer present, there's no purpose to intimate physical relationship.

But she said the reason it's so hard to reach the third stage—why so few people do—is because it requires opening to the truth of dukkha on such a deep level. We spoke today about how opening to the First Noble Truth is an important ingredient in activating the path, meaning we really need to feel the suffering. Someone called it penetrating the suffering, which is a fine way to express it. We really have to feel it, feel the hurt of the suffering. Dipa Ma's comment was that to reach the third stage, one has to feel the unsatisfactoriness of our existential condition in a very, very deep way.

Yet the degree of freedom at this stage is immense. Carol and I both had the chance to spend about a month with Dipa Ma when she first came to the States. We were looking after her, cooking for her, taking her shopping. I never saw a flicker of any reactivity in her during that entire month. She was always peaceful, equanimous, untroubled—a very impressive being.

If you haven't read her biography, simply called Dipa Ma, it's a wonderful read. It's especially inspiring for women because there are a limited number of strong women teachers in our lineage. Dipa Ma is someone in our lifetimes who truly manifested great awakened spirit—a very inspiring person.

The fourth stage is what's called the fully awakened or fully enlightened one, known as an Arahant.

So in this final stage, all the earlier fetters have already been removed, leaving only the five remaining fetters to go. Some of these are quite subtle and refined. There is attachment to fine sense realms and attachment to immaterial realms—these are more purified ways of being that are cultivated through states of concentration and jhana than the ordinary human realm, which is a mixture of pleasure and pain. These are very refined states developed on the basis of strong concentration that can be quite satisfying and blissful, but not ultimately so. At a certain point in meditative development, these refined states can themselves become attachments. The Arhat has let go of even these most refined states as objects of clinging.

But here are the three most significant fetters that fall away. The Arhat has completely ended conceit, which means any sense of self at all—not just the belief in a self, but any residual sense of selfhood whatsoever. There's a story about an Arhat who was captured by bandits who were planning to kill him. I'm not sure why—that's just what bandits did in India in those days. If they caught you, they killed you. The bandits were shocked that he wasn't afraid when they told him of their intention. He said, "What should I be afraid of? There's no owner of this body and mind. What should I fear?" The bandits were so impressed with his character that they let him go, as these stories always end happily.

Here's another fascinating fetter that only disappears at this final stage: restlessness. You might think that when you're sitting quietly in meditation, your mind shouldn't be restless. But only in the Arhat's mind is there true freedom from restlessness. We can concentrate our mind and restlessness can be temporarily absent, but the underlying tendency toward restlessness continues to exist within us. What this restlessness really represents, I believe, is the persistent sense that there must be something better somewhere else—the constant searching, the inability to be completely at peace with what is. Let me see if I can find it, or think about it, or move toward it. In the Arhat, this is completely gone. There is no longer any looking for anything else.

Finally, ignorance is gone. Any confusion about the way things are, about the nature of impermanent conditioned formations, the nature of craving and clinging, the mechanisms by which we enter into suffering—all of this is seen clearly. There is complete clarity and wisdom about the fundamental nature of existence. This wisdom is what prevents one from ever again falling into those states of suffering.

It's said that the fully enlightened one will no longer be born in any realm, will no longer take birth again. There's this beautiful quote from the canon: "The sage at peace is not born, does not age, does not die. He or she is not shaken and they are not agitated, for there is nothing present in them by which they might be born." The urges that would lead to rebirth are extinguished. This is the meaning of extinguishing—those fundamental urges are gone.

This is what the Buddha referred to as "an unshakable deliverance of mind." Because the fetters that cause restlessness or craving are completely gone, the mind can't be shaken by anything. This is what he declared to be the goal of his teaching—this unshakable deliverance of mind.

He said: "This holy life, friends, does not have gain, honor and renown for its benefit, or the attainment of virtue for its benefit, or the attainment of concentration, or knowledge and insight. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of the holy life, its heartwood and its end."

Even in the modern age, some of our masters continue to experience this degree of liberation. I read recently Luang Por Liam's remarkably candid account of his own awakening, where he describes how dukkha was no longer present. There's another Thai forest master, Ajahn Maha Bua, who has also recounted his awakening. He had been a monk for ten years when he decided to make an extraordinarily strong effort during one rains retreat—the traditional three-month practice period in late summer. What he committed to do was sit up all night, every night, without moving.

He developed this profound fearlessness, this complete loss of fear of death. The pain from death couldn't possibly be worse than the pain he had experienced sitting through those nights without moving. From that point forward, he said, he kept making progress until his mind was like rock—skilled enough in concentration's stability that it became like a slab of stone, unable to be easily affected by anything at all.

Can you imagine having a mind that stable and firm? No restlessness, no craving. But he wasn't yet awakened. He said he remained stuck in that concentration for five years. It was so satisfying, so peaceful, that he didn't look for anything else. But then he realized he was trapped.

So he turned to wisdom and began investigating—craving and the absence of craving, suffering and the absence of suffering. But he saw that all of these were changing. He came back to basic mindfulness and wisdom, paying simple attention. He watched as these faculties became steady, impartial, and impassive. The mind was not tending toward anything.

At that moment, he said, the cosmos in the mind over which ignorance held sway trembled and quaked. Ignorance was thrown down from its throne in the heart. In its place, the pure mind appeared at the same moment that ignorance was toppled and eradicated through the power of mindfulness and wisdom.

This eradication of ignorance was his declaration of liberation—a very beautiful account.

One never knows in practice when a moment of opening might come. There's a collection called the Therigatha, verses of the elder nuns collected around the time of the Buddha and shortly after. Reading these accounts of women practicing in that era is remarkable. There's a wonderful book called First Buddhist Women that weaves together these stories, combining the verses with their biographies.

One nun was called Siha, and this is her practice story: "Obsessed by sensuality, I never got to the origin, but was agitated, my mind beyond control. I dreamed of great happiness. I was passionate but had no peace. Pale and thin, I wandered seven years, unhappy day and night."

Imagine—seven years as a nun, wandering through the forest seeking peace. "Pale and thin, I wandered seven years, unhappy day and night. Then I took a rope into the forest and thought, 'I'd rather hang than go back to that narrow life.' I tied a strong noose to the branch of a tree and put it around my neck. Just then my heart was set free."

Amazing. Someone brought right to the edge, and there must have been some profound letting go, and then liberation.

One fascinating aspect of this awakening process is that enlightened beings can have remarkably different personalities. You might think that once the self goes, once greed, hatred, and delusion disappear, everyone becomes identical. It's not like that at all. These people can be real characters, and they often manifest much the same personality they had for years, though in a purified form.

For instance, Mahasi Sayadaw, one of the greatest meditation masters of the past century—Carol and I had the chance to meet him and practice with him at IMS in the late seventies. He embodied tremendous equanimity. You could feel the unshakability of his mind, but there wasn't a huge amount of metta radiating from him. You didn't feel like you wanted to crawl up and cuddle with him like a grandfather. He was quite remote, but profoundly cooled out.

Dipa Ma, on the other hand, you would have loved to have as your grandmother.

When she came to the States, she brought her grandson, whose name was Rishi, and she was so warm and kind and loving with him. She was loving with everyone that she met. She just always had a smile for people.

Ajahn Chah had the most amazing sense of humor of any monk I've ever encountered. He was very playful and could use his humor to poke at people, but what he would be pointing to were the character traits that needed development. So he was a real person-oriented Dharma teacher with tremendous wisdom that he shared about managing families and businesses, training children, and all kinds of practical matters. Very practical and very funny.

But his teacher, Ajahn Mun, was very fierce. If you see photographs of him—and you can look him up online where there are just a handful of photos—he always looks very serious and stern. It's said that he would make his students sit through the whole meditation schedule even if they had malaria. If you've ever had malaria, that is not a pleasant disease—high fever, your body feels awful—and he would make practitioners continue sitting so they would lose concern for pleasure or pain.

And then you have someone like the Dalai Lama, who I don't know what level of awakening he's at, but I think it's really high. He has this amazing manifestation of joy and compassion. To me, he's the most inspiring person on the planet, even though he's not Theravadan. He's still pretty remarkable—a very free, very free heart.

So this fourth stage material can seem really far off, but even in the suttas describing arahants, we can find excellent pointers for our practice. Carol will give more tomorrow night that will be relevant for us, but I want to highlight a few things to head us in a certain direction.

One phrase that appears frequently in the suttas is "liberation through non-clinging." This is mentioned repeatedly, and when you think about it, it's actually a practice instruction. When we practice non-clinging and not holding onto things, that becomes a path. Where non-clinging leads is to this experience of liberation.

Ajahn Chah said it quite succinctly: "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. And if you let go completely, there's complete peace."

So play with this as a meditation instruction. What does it feel like if you let go? You're just sitting there. Maybe there's a little holding, maybe there's not. But simply bring to mind non-clinging—letting go, abandoning, releasing, however you want to think of it. Just see what happens in that moment. It's an instruction you can give yourself. See what the effect is. See what your experience becomes.

I find that it opens the mind and brings back some kind of expansiveness that has an element of greater freedom and ease in it. This can obviously be carried to quite some depth.

Here's a dialogue between two of the Buddha's greatest disciples, Anuruddha and Sariputta. Sariputta had already become an arahant and was helping Anuruddha, who had not yet become fully enlightened but was a great practitioner, as you'll see. Anuruddha was asking Sariputta for meditation advice.

He said, "Friend Sariputta, here's what's going on for me. With the divine eye, which is purified and surpasses the human, I survey a thousand-fold world system." That's his first point. I'm still waiting for a yogi to come and report that in an interview—hasn't happened yet.

"Second report: energy is aroused in me."

My mindfulness is established without confusion. My body is tranquil without disturbance. My mind is concentrated and one-pointed.

Third report: yet my mind is still not liberated from the taints through non-clinging. This is why he's looking for advice.

This is Sariputta's reply: "Friend Anuruddha, when you say that the divine eye surveys a thousandfold world system, that is your conceit. When you say that energy is aroused and mindfulness is established and your mind is concentrated, that is your restlessness. And when you say your mind is still not liberated from the taints, that is your remorse. It would be good for you if you would abandon these three qualities and stop attending to them. Instead, direct your attention to the deathless element."

That's a sort of wisdom. Sariputta was basically saying, "Don't wander off into these thoughts and evaluations about what's going on in your practice. Quiet your mind. Direct your attention to the deathless element," which is a synonym for the unconditioned or nibbana.

It's likely Anuruddha knew the deathless element from prior experience. He may have been a stream-enterer, although it doesn't record that for sure, but it's quite likely. Once one has reached stream-entry, one knows the flavor of the unconditioned, one knows the flavor of the deathless element, and one can incline the mind toward that. So Sariputta is saying that would be the best meditation instruction for you: direct your mind to the deathless element.

So Anuruddha went off and practiced, and it said a short while later he realized for himself the liberation for which he was practicing, and Anuruddha became one of the arahants.

Now that's great if one is a stream-enterer and already knows from direct experience what the deathless element feels like, you might say. But suppose one doesn't know what the deathless element feels like?

Then there's another sutta that gives some more direction toward this end. The Buddha was talking to a group of monks, including one called Malunkyaputta, and so this sutta is named after Malunkyaputta. This is one of the more beautiful and concise pointings in the canon. It's in the Majjhima Nikaya.

The Buddha says: "Whatever exists of sense objects and states of mind, one sees those states as impermanent, as suffering, as void, as not-self." In other words, one sees the three characteristics of all conditioned phenomena. "One turns the mind away from those states and directs it toward the deathless element thus."

So again, the instruction is: move away from conditioned things because they're impermanent and unsatisfactory. Turn toward the deathless element. Direct your attention there.

"Direct it toward the deathless element thus: This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishment of all attachments, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

The way I read this, it's like the Buddha's up in the air traffic control tower and you're flying in for a landing. You're not quite sure where the landing strip is—your instruments aren't quite tuned—and he's telling you how to land in nibbana.

So you discover what's peaceful. You find what's sublime. And that is the stilling of all formations. That means the mind stops moving toward the sense objects. How does one get there? Through the relinquishment of attaching, through letting go.

And then two other qualities come in. The first is dispassion. That means one is no longer caught up in lust for any of the sense experiences. And why would one be? Because one has seen them all as impermanent, unsatisfactory, and void. Any ones that we run after are just going to crumple. So this is the quality of dispassion. You might call it also equanimity. The literal meaning of the word is "without lust"—viraga, without lust. One ceases to lust after the sense experiences.

And that leads into the state the Buddha calls cessation.

Now, cessation has many applications in the Buddha's teachings. We see it in the Third Noble Truth: the cessation of craving is the cessation of suffering. So here we can take it as the cessation of craving and the cessation of suffering. The formations have stilled. Lust has gone away. All attachments have been let go. And one practices the cessation of craving. One does not give rise to greed, aversion, or delusion in any direction. And that is what opens the door to the deathless element of nibbana.

So these are instructions that we can reflect on: the stilling of formations and the relinquishment of attachments, the peaceful, sublime quality of that, not lusting after anything and discovering the cessation of craving. That's what can open us to that unconditioned deathless element.

I want to close with just one more quotation. This is from the Udana, also about nibbana. This is from the Buddha: "One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering."

Here, dependent means dependent on something in the present moment. When we're leaning on something or attached to something, pushing or pulling, we are dependent on it. One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

So let's just sit for a minute and let the words settle. "She turns her mind away from conditioned states and directs it toward the deathless element thus: This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishment of all attachments, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

CHAPTER 152

Entering the retreat: refuges and precepts

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

In this dharma talk marking the formal beginning of a long retreat, Guy Armstrong explores the profound meaning of taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, along with undertaking the five precepts. Drawing from the Pali Canon, he presents both the outer historical understanding of the refuges and their inner spiritual significance for practitioners.

Armstrong offers an inspiring portrait of the historical Buddha as embodying purity, transcendental wisdom, and compassion—qualities available to all practitioners through awakening. He describes refuge in the Dhamma as both the recorded teachings and the inner truth of present-moment experience, while Saṅgha represents both the monastic community and the fellowship of all sincere practitioners supporting each other on the path.

The talk concludes with taking the five precepts (pañca-sīla) as training rules that create the foundation for clear conduct, freedom from remorse, and the conditions necessary for deepening meditation practice. Armstrong emphasizes how these ethical guidelines, including noble silence, create simplicity that allows practitioners to clearly see the workings of their own hearts and minds during retreat.

This evening we're going to make the formal entry into the retreat space, and the full noble silence will start tonight. We normally make this entry with a short ritual—one of the few rituals we do here—called Taking of the Refuges and Precepts. We'll do that tonight as our way of entering the space.

I want to recognize and remember the events of September 11th, 2001. This is the 15th anniversary of the attacks on the World Trade Center. There's much observance in New York City today, of course, and I imagine many of us have felt the memories of that day and its impact on our lives and in the world. So much sympathy for the people who were killed, much sympathy for the lives that were touched, and for all of us who were affected by that event.

The Buddha was asked many questions after his awakening. One time a being approached him and asked, "Venerable sir, how did you cross the flood?" And that means the flood of existence with all the stormy waves that life brings. The Buddha replied, "I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away."

I think this is really good advice for starting on a long retreat. This is a good attitude to set. You don't have to hurry in this practice, but you also don't want to tarry. Take it at a steady, continuous pace, and that is the way that the floods of existence will be crossed—one step at a time, one breath at a time.

Tonight we'll make the first entry by taking together the three refuges and the five precepts. In this evening's talk, I want to discuss what those are for us. I'm sure you've all taken these a number of times. For many of you, you've taken them countless times and are very familiar with these reflections. I just want to amplify things we often say at the beginning of a retreat.

So I'll start with the question: what does refuge mean? When we say "I take refuge," what does that word refuge mean? What comes to my mind is that it's a place where we feel safe—a place of safety for beings.

One of the nice things in the walks around here is that you'll see much land that's been designated as wildlife refuge. That means that hopefully all the animals who enter those terrains will feel safe, because there's no hunting and no fishing allowed in the areas of wildlife refuge—a place where the deer can relax, where the turkeys can make all the noise they want, even around Thanksgiving, and no one will shoot them.

In old Hawaii, there were places of refuge. The Hawaiian name was Pu'uhonua. There's still a quite famous one on the Big Island, which is also a great snorkeling spot if you get down that way. The place of refuge was a place where, if a person was considered to have committed a crime—and a crime could be something rather small, like for a common person to let their shadow fall on a member of the nobility—then that crime was often met with the penalty of death. Once a person was considered to have committed a crime, their death was fairly assured, but they had one out. If they could get to a place of refuge, then they couldn't be captured or killed from that spot.

In addition, it was considered sacred space. The places of refuge were sacred space, and there were priests there who could hear the person's confession, absolve them of the crime, and consider them purified. Then they could be released back into society.

For us, IMS works a little bit like a place of refuge. We come here, we remember some things we wish we hadn't done. We get a little scrubbed clean with mindfulness and then we get sent back into the world. All is forgiven. So the center is a place of refuge for many. I hope it will feel that way for you.

One of the other implications of refuge is that the world in general is an uncertain and sometimes dangerous place. We need places of safety because not every place is safe. Sometimes our health is at risk. Sometimes our body is at risk. Sometimes our emotions are at risk. Sometimes our very life is at risk because the world is uncertain. Of course, this is a key teaching of the Buddha's.

We all need places of refuge at times. And retreats often remind us how uncertain the world of body and mind is.

We can't control what happens in the body. We can't control what happens in the mind. And on retreat, this becomes very clear—sometimes it's delightful, sometimes it's difficult. A long retreat especially has a way of taking us somewhat near the limits of what we are comfortable with. It could be with physical comfort. It could be the comfort of emotions that arise—sometimes loneliness or hopelessness during long retreats, or fear. It can be where our thoughts lead us, into memories we'd rather not revisit or projections about the future.

This uncontrollability of events, the uncertainty of our experience, often comes through clearly in a long retreat. And in times like this, when we're getting close to the edge of what's comfortable or what we think we can bear, we all need to recall what is our refuge. We all need to find refuges in times like that.

Of course, traditionally in the Buddhist teachings and all the Buddhist traditions, there are considered to be three genuine refuges. Among them are not a lot of money, or a comfortable home, or a position of power or status in the world. But the three true refuges are the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. These are what we want to talk about tonight.

In our lineage, we often talk about "taking refuge"—we take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, or Sangha. But the literal translation of the Pali is "I go for refuge." I go to the Buddha for refuge. I go to the Dharma for refuge. I go to the Sangha for refuge. That's the meaning of this word gacchami in our chant—"go to."

This ties back into ancient Indian culture, where the uncertainties of life—which poor people were exposed to a lot back then—could be defended against if one came under the protection of either a powerful political figure or a very wealthy landowner. People talked about "going for refuge" to those persons. If one came under their wing, so to speak, one had a better chance of dealing with everything that life brought. It's a little bit like taking refuge in Barack Obama, for instance, who I think actually is a great refuge for many, many reasons.

So we understand that we can find some real sense of safety in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. And as we start to turn to these refuges more and more often, we find they provide another element, which is giving direction to our lives. We don't just turn to them in times of need or uncertainty, but we start to recognize these are the reliable avenues for a human life. We start to orient our life choices and our life direction around the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, because these represent three really important values for us as practitioners. They tell us how we should orient our life—our thoughts, our speech, our actions, our choices, our values, our direction.

So I want to talk about all three tonight, and then we'll take the refuges together. Then I want to talk about the five precepts, the five lay precepts, and we'll take those together. That will be our content for this evening.

First, the refuge in the Buddha. We often say that the refuges have two meanings—one is outer and one is inner. With the Buddha, for instance, the outer form of the refuge is taking refuge in the historical person: the historical Buddha who lived 2,500 years ago in northern India, whose given name was Siddhartha Gautama. The clan that he was in was the Sakya clan, living near the border of India and Nepal, near a town called Kapilavatthu.

You know his life story. He grew up in a life of luxury, sometimes said to have been a prince, but I think that's an overstatement. There was a king in the area, but that was not his father—his father was wealthy. So he grew up in a life of luxury, at age 29 left home as the Bodhisattva to discover the path to freedom, discovered what he was looking for at age 35, and then taught for 45 years until he died at 80.

I was brought up in the Christian tradition. Actually, I was brought up Presbyterian, which is kind of to say with as little religion as possible, but a touch of religion. I studied the Bible a bit when I was growing up. As I recall, in my edition of the Bible, all the teachings of Jesus occupied maybe 30 or 40 pages in my King James Bible. So when I started looking into Buddhism, it was really interesting to find that the words of the Buddha occupy about 20 volumes in the Pali Canon. Even though it happened 500 years before Jesus, there was much better recording apparatus—which was memory at that time. And because he lived such a long life and had so many teachings, they were remembered and later written down. So there are 20 volumes about the historical Buddha and his teaching. We're able to get a much fuller portrait of him that I believe is reasonably accurate.

It's not a hundred percent accurate, but I believe it's reasonably accurate. Based on the stories I know from those readings about the historical Buddha, I consider him the most amazing person who's ever walked on the face of the earth. And what I want to do this evening in talking about the historical Buddha is to talk about some of his qualities that made him so amazing.

In the West, we have tended to present the Vipassana teachings without a lot of historical overlay or cultural overlay. But in fact, there is a lot there if one becomes interested. So the way I see it is that for a lot of Vipassana practitioners, we grow up without a strong sense of connection to the person of the historical Buddha. My connection to that figure became much deeper after reading many volumes of the recorded teachings. He has become a very inspiring and important figure for me in a very personal way, and I want to talk some about that tonight—what I appreciate about him.

It's fine if you don't have a connection with the historical figure because there's also an inner refuge that is equally important. But if you get connected to the outer figure, it can be a great source of inspiration and faith and confidence.

The Buddha taught and died somewhere around 500 BCE, 500 years before the Christian era or the common era. The teachings spread from northern India really throughout Asia, so that at one time or another virtually all of Asia was entirely or mostly Buddhist. It's very interesting if you look at the history—from Afghanistan, do you remember when the Taliban blew up those two big standing statues? That was the extent to which Buddhism had traveled west, and it happened a long time ago. It was very influential in Afghanistan, and then moving eastward through Pakistan, northern India, quite a bit in Nepal, spread of course to Tibet through the Silk Route, Southeast Asia—Burma, Thailand, Laos, Cambodia—and even Indonesia ages ago was largely Buddhist, and then up into Korea, Japan and China and Taiwan. Mongolia too. That whole reach of Asia was mostly Buddhist at one time or another. Now it's shrinking a bit. But that shows the effect of one person's impact in this world.

For those of you who've traveled to Asia, I'd ask you to reflect on the quality of the cultures you've been in that were under that Buddhist umbrella. The places I've been that have a big Buddhist imprint, I find myself really enjoying the culture. I find a lot of kindness and compassion—places like Thailand and Burma, for example.

After his awakening, the Buddha totally devoted his life to teaching others. He didn't have any other interests or activity. Forty-five years was just service and giving and teaching.

So what was he like as a person? This really interests me. One of the traditional meditations in Asia is to reflect on the wholesome qualities of the Buddha. It's a good meditation because we realize that all those qualities are within ourselves also—they just need to be developed or grown up. So reflecting on those qualities can be a reflection that really brightens the mind. Oh, this is really possible for a human being because it's really clear the Buddha was simply a human being like you and me. He made it very clear he was not considered to be a god or an angel or anything like that—simply another human being who developed beautiful qualities that are there within all of us.

One Pali chant expresses these qualities in a very short form. It says, "The Buddha endowed with such excellent qualities whose being is composed of purity, transcendental wisdom, and compassion." So if you're looking for a short form to understand who the Buddha was, I like this expression: purity, wisdom, and compassion.

The purity part meant that his whole mindset was just wholesome. He had ended greed, he'd ended hatred, and he'd ended confusion in his own mind stream. So that just allowed all the beautiful qualities to come through. That's the purity.

Through that opening of his awakening, he opened the door for what's called transcendental wisdom. This can be understood in two ways. One, he understood the wisdom that transcends suffering. He understood the cause of suffering and he understood how to abandon the cause of suffering and come to the end of it. So he had transcended suffering.

The other way to understand transcendental is that he had touched this unconditioned element called nibbana, in which the direct realization uproots unwholesome qualities. It's a quality that transcends the sphere of the six senses. So that is the wisdom piece.

And then compassion. Once he had awakened, he never stopped working for the welfare of other people. He just continued teaching really until the day he died. Even on his deathbed, he continued to teach and give advice. His life wasn't about anything else.

Some of the great qualities that he manifested when he was alive out of this mind of purity—one was great determination. You really see this in his practice life as the Bodhisattva. He spent six years doing nothing but intensive meditation practice. For us, six weeks is a long time, and it is a long time.

His time scale was a little bit bigger—six years until his awakening. And he tried everything that he could think of and that others recommended. So you probably know that at that time, the ascetic practices were very strong in Northern India. And people thought, oh, if you starve the body, you'll release the soul. So he tried really starving the body. He said that he took to eating just once every two weeks, and he became so thin that his hair was falling out. And when he touched his belly, he felt his backbone. There was nothing between his skin and his backbone left. But then he saw that that wasn't leading anywhere. Finally, he took food and that was what helped him awaken. Great determination.

Even after his awakening, he lived with complete simplicity. After his awakening, he had many wealthy supporters and donors. The two biggest kings in the north of India, King Bimbisara and King Pasenadi, were both students of his. They offered him gifts. They offered him tracts of land for the community. They supported him in many, many ways. If he had wanted, he could have retired to a palace, been given great food and lived very comfortably for the rest of his life. But he chose not to do that. He continued living in the forest, which is not an easy life through the seasons of Northern India. There's winter, there's rain, sometimes it's very cold, close to snow.

So they asked him, why are you living in the forest still? He said, for two benefits. I see a pleasant abiding for myself here and now, and I have compassion for future generations. He wanted to set an example for future practitioners because he considered the simple lifestyle to be the most conducive for waking up.

So 2,500 years later, we have our version of living in the forest. It's much more comfortable than his. We actually have mattresses, we have roofs, we have heat in the winter. But our life is really simple here. So the way the Buddha lived, even after his awakening, is still a model for us, is still an inspiration for us in our practice. And that was his compassion.

There's one story that really touches me. It's just a small story. It's not like a huge teaching story. But, you know, he used to walk around northern India. He made many trips all by foot, sometimes going hundreds of miles to give teachings in one spot or another. So on one of these trips, it was close to wintertime, and someone who was living locally was walking out in the morning and found the Buddha sitting on a pile of leaves —it was not very thick—on the ground, which was covered with frost.

And this person approached, the Buddha recognized him and said, "Bhante, did you sleep well?" And the Buddha replied, "Yes, I slept well. I am one of those in the world who sleep well."

And then this lay person said, "But Bhante, the winter nights are cold. It is the time when snow falls. The ground trampled by the hooves of cattle is rough. The spread of leaves is thin. The leaves on the trees are sparse. Your ochre robes could leave one cold and the gale wind blows cold. Yet the Blessed One says, yes, I slept well."

So he says, "Well, then let me ask you a question. Suppose a lay person has a house with a peaked roof plastered inside and out, free of drafts, with shutters closed, a couch spread with robes, blankets and covers, and an excellent cover of hides with a canopy above and red bolsters at both ends. Would he sleep well?" And the lay person says, "Yes, of course."

And the Buddha said, "Oh really? What if he was tormented by wanting? What if he was tormented by hatred? What if he was tormented by confusion? Would he sleep well?" And the lay person had to say, "No, he wouldn't." All those luxuries would be no guarantee that he could sleep well.

And the Buddha said, "Well, for me, the fires of lust, hate, and delusion have gone out."

Therefore, I sleep well. Even on frosty ground, even just covered with his three robes, he sleeps well.

The Buddha, as you can imagine from some of the stories, had a very strong presence. And I think it came from the combination of stillness and complete attention in the present moment. If you've met people who have this combination, they radiate something very powerful.

Thich Nhat Hanh used to come to Spirit Rock once every couple of years before we built our retreat center. The retreat center is on a hill that provided a kind of natural amphitheater, and now that amphitheater is filled with buildings and walkways, and he didn't come anymore. But before that time, he would come and we'd build a platform for him and a loudspeaker system. And he would talk to about 2,000 people filling the hillside and the land around there.

I don't know if you've ever seen him speak, but he has one of these kinds of presence. He's very still. When he speaks, there's almost no movement of his body. And his words are coming from a place of deep wisdom, reflection, and stillness—concentration. When he spoke, it was as though he could cast a spell of stillness over those 2,000 people just by his presence, his stillness, and the Dharma that he talked. It was really something amazing to see. So I think that was a small indication of the power that the Buddha had.

One of the things that was clearly communicated in the Buddha's presence was his loving kindness. There was a physician to one of the northern kings. The physician's name was Jivaka. The king asked him to attend to the Buddha when the Buddha had a health problem. Jivaka was very strongly drawn to the Buddha's presence, to his personality. What he said about the Buddha was: "Just like there are some said to be in the Brahma realms who abide in loving kindness, so the Blessed One abides in loving kindness."

This was the physician's main read on the Buddha's character, on his personality—that he abided in loving kindness and greeted the people who came to him with that kind of friendly attitude.

In his teaching, he obviously had a very strong transmission power. Again, I don't know if you've met teachers like this, but their words and their presence can spark insight really directly. In the first discourse that he ever gave, called "Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma," he gave it to five old friends who he had been practicing with. One of them was partially enlightened from that discourse. Then he had them all practice for another couple of weeks. He gave another discourse. All five of them were fully enlightened by that discourse.

A while later, he was in the company of a group of yogic practitioners. Today we would call them Hindu practitioners, but that word wasn't really applicable back then. They were yogic practitioners who followed a path of fire sacrifice. If you're going to talk to yogic practitioners of the fire sacrifice, what topic should you talk about? Well, fire might be a good idea.

So the Buddha invented a Dharma talk on the spot, which has come to be known as the Fire Sermon. The gist of the Fire Sermon is that the world is on fire. The senses are on fire. The heart is on fire. The mind is on fire with greed, hatred, and delusion. At the end of that discourse, it said that there were a thousand practitioners in front of him and all thousand became awakened from that discourse. So he clearly had this amazing transmission quality that I think was based on his wisdom, his stillness, and his way with words.

Another ability he had that was quite amazing is he could be in a group and just by tuning into people's vibes, he could tell who was close to awakening. He would then direct his teaching to that person and lead them step by step. He would sort of understand where they were and lead them step by step with just the questions and instructions that they needed to bring them to the point of waking up. Then he would give that pointing and the person would awaken. So he seemed to know the right teaching to give for each person whom he met, which is an incredible quality that I wish we had—but not yet.

He never seemed to be afraid. He was about to walk someplace on a mountain path near where the killer Angulimala was known to be hanging out. Angulimala had killed 999 people and was going to kill one more. The Buddha was about to walk that way. All his friends and all his advisors said, "Don't go there. The bandit's going to come out of that mountain refuge and he's going to come and kill you." And the Buddha said, "Don't worry about that. I'm going to walk there."

He walked there. Angulimala tried to kill him, couldn't do it, instead asked the Buddha what he taught, was converted on the spot, later became a member of the Sangha, practiced, and of course awakened.

So this is just a bit of the historical Buddha and the qualities of his heart and mind. What I think is important to understand, and this is what leads into the inner teaching, is that all of us have this potential. We have this potential for awakening and freedom, just as the Buddha had it. I think these qualities that came through the Buddha are not particularly personal to Siddhattha Gotama.

They are aspects of the human mind that get unlocked by the depth of our own understanding and freedom. So the wisdom, the purity, the compassion are waiting there for the veils to drop away, for those deep treasures of the heart and mind to flow out. And you will feel this day by day and moment by moment on this retreat. As the clouds lift, more of those beautiful qualities start to come through.

So this is not a personal unfolding. It's a universal human unfolding that the Buddha happened to develop to a really high and beautiful degree.

For me, one pointing to what the inner meaning of the refuge is about is this awake quality. The word Buddha means awakened one. So this awake quality that we can bring in any moment—when you bring this attention in a fresh way into the present moment, that is activating that refuge, the refuge in the Buddha. This is the direction. Anytime you feel close to discomfort in body and heart and mind, remember that awake quality is always available. When that awake quality meets the present moment, something special happens. This is how, step by step, awakening takes place. So our practice is just to return to that refuge of this awake attention moment after moment. This is the refuge in the inner Buddha.

The refuge in the Dharma in the outer sense means the teachings of the Buddha. They're often called the Dharma. So one of the beauties of the long retreat is that we are really steeped in the teachings of the Buddha day by day through the instructions, the discussions, the meetings with teachers, the evening talks. The Dharma is really all we're hearing, so it just starts to permeate. These teachings start to permeate as they go in really deeply below the surface, so that they become more and more available and more and more of a refuge.

When I turn to the outer meaning of refuge in the Dharma, I like to reflect on—well, if you had to sum up the teachings of the Buddha in a really short and simple way, it might be the teaching on impermanence. This is always helpful to reflect on in times of discomfort. Everything changes, nothing stays the same. So whatever difficulty you're in, it's going to pass. When we're in the middle, the hindrance tells us it won't. The hindrance says it's going to be permanent, but it isn't. So this reflection on impermanence is a short way to recollect the outer refuge in the Dharma.

In the inner refuge, Dharma means truth, or nature, or law—or I like "the way things are." The Dharma is the way things are. So when we talk about practicing the Dharma, we mean practicing with the truth of things. When you combine the Dharma as truth with the inner Buddha as awareness, attention, then when the inner refuge in awareness meets the inner refuge of the truth of one's experience, that's where freedom comes from. That's the key that unlocks things.

Ajahn Sumedho has a nice way of phrasing this. He says, "The Buddha knows the Dhamma." I used to think, of course the Buddha knows the Dhamma, he made it up. But really what it's pointing to is that inner Buddha of awareness meets the inner Dhamma of our direct experience, the truth of our experience. That's where freedom comes from because we see the way things are, and it's seeing how things are that liberates the heart and mind. And that alignment can happen in every moment. Refuge in the Buddha meeting refuge in the Dharma can happen at any time.

The Sangha. I want to talk about two meanings of Sangha. Traditionally, the word Sangha has two significances. One is the monastic Sangha—those women and men who have committed their whole lives to the path of awakening through taking on the robes and renouncing all the aspects of lay life, considered a refuge for us due to the strength of their commitment and the development of their practice through that form. The second meaning in the traditional sense is the community of awakened beings, those who have partially or fully awakened, sometimes called the Noble Sangha or Ariya Sangha. And they are appropriate grounds for refuge because of the depth of their understanding and degree of freedom.

In the modern sense, Sangha has come to mean the community of all of us together who are practicing and committed to the path of awakening, journeying together with commitment on this path to waking up. So we'll use Sangha in all three ways here.

We especially appreciate as we're practicing together in this community aspect how much support we draw from one another. If you thought about doing these six weeks or three months on your own, it would be really daunting. But because you're doing it with ninety other people, that support is always there as a felt thing, and you support them as well as you practice. So we support each other through this outer representation of Sangha.

In the inner Sangha, what I like to think about are the qualities that we manifest as practitioners.

What are the qualities that you draw from to inspire you when you see one another? What are the qualities that you manifest that can inspire others as we practice together?

A few qualities that come to mind are determination—understanding that this is the path to freedom and manifesting that through our actions. Courage to keep sitting when you may not want to sit, to keep walking when you may not want to walk. The compassion for one another becomes very sweet at times, in the way you look upon each other. You don't have to do big things—it's probably best not to—but you'll feel that kind of intimate connection to each other. The compassion and loving-kindness are present abundantly as the community grows together.

These are all facets of the awakened mind that emerge from the falling away of veils and the arising of wisdom and compassion.

Having gone through the refuges, let's chant those together to begin. I hope you picked up a sheet from the front. We'll chant the refuges first. Later I'll talk about the precepts and then we'll chant those as well. With the homage and the three refuges, I think we'll chant them in unison since quite a few of you know these. When we get to the precepts, we'll do call and response.

Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Samma Sambuddhassa
Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Samma Sambuddhassa

Now I'd like to say just a few words to introduce the five precepts. We'll take just the first five tonight. We'll talk about and offer the eight precepts in a few days, but for this evening we'll start with the five.

Of course you understand the five precepts are really about non-harming. They're an outward expression of what the compassionate or loving heart would do in its actions in the world. They're not moral commandments—they're considered training rules. The way they work is they train us to keep our conduct fairly straight so that we don't have cause for regret.

The Buddha said that when our conduct is proper, we enjoy freedom from remorse. The benefit of that is gladness. The benefit of gladness is joy. The benefit of joy is happiness. The benefit of happiness is concentration. The benefit of concentration is knowing and seeing things the way they are. And the benefit of knowing and seeing things the way they are is liberation.

This is the foundation: keeping the heart and mind clear from regret, confusion, conflict, and disturbance, so that the deepening of meditation can take place, leading to happiness, insight, and freedom.

You're probably quite familiar with these five precepts. I'll mention them briefly.

The first is to refrain from taking life. Anything that lives—we respect that it wishes to live just as deeply as we wish to live. For all beings, their life is their most precious possession. When you look upon beings with a heart of kindness, you recognize their attachment to their life and do everything you can to honor that, not taking the life of any living being.

The second precept is framed as not taking what isn't freely given or freely offered. For you as yogis here, that probably mostly comes down to things like food. We take food when it's put out and offered from the kitchen, and we don't take it when it's not put out and offered.

This sounds simple, but it hasn't always been observed that clearly here. One evening about midnight—this was when I was on staff—one staff member walked into the kitchen and noticed that the door to the walk-in fridge was slightly ajar. They went and opened the door and found one of the three-month yogis in the walk-in fridge with their hand in a box of figs. The staff person, being compassionate and thoughtful, said, "Can I help you?" The yogi looked up and said, "Oh, I was looking for the maintenance office."

To avoid that kind of embarrassment, simply don't take what isn't freely offered. In terms of yogi needs, if you take things from the closet, pay for them. Don't borrow other people's cushions, blankets, and so forth. Really stick to what is yours.

The third precept in the context of retreat is not engaging in sexual activity. This is not so much a non-harming precept, although it has that implication too—not to disturb another yogi's meditation—but also not to become distracted through activities that don't support the basic move toward present-moment self-sufficiency. It's contentment with what already is here. This is the direction of the practice: not looking for more than that.

The fourth precept in lay life is not saying what isn't true. Here we observe that and extend it to include noble silence.

Noble silence, as I think Sally and Bonnie talked about this afternoon, is not meant to be a cold or distancing or isolating thing. It's meant to be actually the creation of a warm and safe container that allows each of us to go through our own journey without interference. So being able to settle into one's own process and realize, I don't have to communicate to anyone else. I don't have to try to be pleasant or say something funny or endearing. I can simply let my process be the way it is. It really simplifies things and that's what's ennobling about it. It lets us get deeper into our own journey.

So I think of noble silence as we give up unnecessary talking. If you need to talk to Roberta about anything logistical, if you need to call on Jared or John, feel free to do so. Of course, you'll talk to your teachers in the practice meetings. That's all completely appropriate. But please don't talk to one another. Please don't make contact with one another through notes or conversation. I think Sally and Bonnie mentioned that this afternoon also. Please don't write notes to one another. It can be very disturbing in the sensitivity of a long retreat.

And then it extends, of course, to telephone, emails, text, internet. If you need to use the internet for a plane reservation or a medical situation, please talk to Roberta, who might ask you to check it out with your teacher. And we can work out if there is an actual need. But otherwise, we ask you to renounce those activities. Just on a recent retreat I taught, someone had really intended to renounce communication, happened to turn on their smartphone, got one text from a partner that was very upsetting, and it blew their meditation out of the water for several days. So please keep that container really clear and firm for yourself. It will really protect your practice.

Sometimes people come on retreats with a partner or a really good friend. And sometimes couples like to support each other during the retreat by hanging out together. It might be sitting together at meals. It might be walking side by side in the walking meditation. And I really recommend, if you're here with your partner as part of a couple, that you really try not to have contact like that. Because what usually happens, because I've talked to a lot of couples on retreat, is that one partner starts to want less contact than the other. Ever seen this dynamic in daily life? It happens on retreat also. And if you're not speaking, it's very hard to work that out. So one partner starts withdrawing, the other partner starts feeling very insecure or rejected, and then things become tense, and it's difficult for both.

So the simplest thing, if you're here with a partner, act like you don't know them. Sally and I have sat a lot of retreats together, and if you came in and were sitting with us, you'd never know that we were a couple. So pretend you're not while you're here, and that will be simplest for you. And it will also keep from stirring things up in other yogis, like, oh, I wish my partner was here. I wish I had a partner who was connected with the dharma. I'd like a little company from time to time. So let it be the individual experience for each one of us here.

Now, in terms of the renunciation of devices, we're going to have one more meaningful ritual in a couple of days, and that's what we call the cell phone renunciation ceremony. That will be on Tuesday morning. You will be invited to actually turn in to the manager your cell phone or tablet or laptop so that it will be removed from temptation's reach for the duration of the retreat. And we'll put more details out tomorrow about how to do that. And Tuesday morning, we will actually have a little ritual in here to celebrate the renunciation from those who wish. It's not obligatory, but it is a great support. And it's a really happy thing to do. It lifts a lot of worry to do that.

The fifth precept is not to use recreational drugs or intoxicants while you're here. The meditation process does enough mind shifting that we don't need to cloud it with other intoxicants. So please refrain from the use of alcohol and other drugs. If you're on prescription medications that your doctor has recommended, please do continue with those. We're not asking for you to give up drugs that you need for your health and well-being, only recreational drugs. So please continue with the medications that you've been advised to take.

These precepts create a condition for a lot of simplicity in our life together as a community. And what that simplicity allows is the revealing of what's underneath. So it's a little bit like when autumn comes, which it's already starting, and the leaves start coming off the trees, you can really see the structure of the limbs and branches.

The leaves fall away and everything else is exposed and becomes really clear. So when these external activities fall away, what we're left with is the workings of our own hearts and minds. That's what we see. The external situation is fairly simple, but what gets added to it—or layered on top of it, you might say—are our own emotional and mental reactions. And that's what we're here to learn about.

We don't need to learn about how other yogis are doing. We're here to learn about how our own hearts and minds relate to the situations of life. So when things become really simple, that's exactly what gets exposed, just like the bare branches of the trees. And that's what we want to learn from.

So that is the short explanation of the five precepts, and now let's take these together. Because these are a little longer, let's do these in call and response. I'll say a phrase and then ask you to repeat it back to me.

Panatipata veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Panatipata veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Adinnadana veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Adinnadana veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Abrahmachariya veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Musavada veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Sura-meraya-majjapamadatthana veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

Sura-meraya-majjapamadatthana veramani sikapadam samadhyami.

And then the dedication, call and response:

Idam me silam magga-phala-nana-ssaha.

Idam me silam magga-phala-nana-ssaha.

Thank you all for your attention and participation. With that, the retreat is formally underway, and we've entered into the period of noble silence, which will continue for the remainder of the retreat until integration time, either at six weeks or three months.

Just one announcement this evening: At the nine o'clock sit, which will happen every night, we'll begin the chanting tomorrow night. So tonight there will be the nine o'clock sit, which will be led, but there won't be chanting tonight. The formal instruction will start tomorrow night as well.

Time for walking, then nine o'clock for the next sitting.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 153

Morning Instructions—Mindfulness of Moods and Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong expands on the previous day's teaching about the five hindrances to explore the broader territory of the third foundation of mindfulness—cittānupassanā (mindfulness of mind). He provides clear definitions distinguishing between moods (light, background emotional tones), emotions (stronger feelings like joy, fear, or compassion), and mind states (including subtle meditative qualities like samādhi, upekkhā, and passaddhi).
> Armstrong offers a systematic approach to meditation practice, suggesting practitioners establish an "anchor" (body posture, sounds, or breath) while remaining open to whatever becomes predominant in awareness. When moods or emotions arise, he teaches how to investigate them using the RAIN technique (Recognize, Allow, Investigate, Non-identification) discussed previously. He emphasizes that strong emotions manifest both as mental qualities and bodily sensations, encouraging practitioners to explore both dimensions.
> This teaching addresses common concerns about emotional meditation practice, clarifying that both highly emotional and calm practices are equally valid paths. Armstrong highlights how developing skill with difficult mind states offers profound opportunities for freedom from suffering, since our emotional reactions—rather than external circumstances themselves—are the primary source of dukkha. The instructions provide practical guidance for anyone seeking to deepen their understanding of the mind-heart (citta) and cultivate greater ease in daily life.

Yesterday in the meditation instructions and in the dharma talk, Bonnie talked about how to work with these five hindering energies that the Buddha said can obstruct our meditation and weaken wisdom if we don't know how to relate to them skillfully.

In the instructions today we're going to extend that field of mindfulness to take in, in addition to the five hindrances, the whole area of moods, emotions, and states of mind.

I want to talk a little bit about the vocabulary I'm using here. All these terms—mood, emotion, state of mind—are all pointing to experiences that happen on the mental level, but they have slightly different significance.

A mood is an emotion that's kind of light and a little bit in the background. I don't know if you've ever noticed sometimes you wake up from a dream and even though the images of the dream may not be clear, there's some kind of lingering feeling from the dream. It's like a pervasive or ongoing mood. Sometimes we'll pick up one of those from different places. It could be a mood of being a little nostalgic. You could be feeling just a little blue. There could be a mood of being pleased, waking up and seeing a sunny day. There could be a sense of a little bit of apprehension, just not sure how the day is going to unfold—which of course we never know. But moods tend to be light, kind of cloudy and in the background, not as strong as a clear emotion.

One level up from that, what we call emotions—the whole field of affect—would include things like feelings of happiness, feelings of sadness, feeling of joy or love, a feeling of fear or anger, feeling of loneliness, feeling of compassion. These are stronger expressions that come into the heart and mind. You notice how Bonnie used those terms together a lot last night—heart-mind or mind-heart. The word in Pali is citta, and this is the third foundation of mindfulness. To me, I think the best translation in one word might be psyche. The psyche contains both thoughts, emotions, moods—a whole range of experiences. So this is the area we're moving into today, the whole range of the third foundation: moods and emotions.

This third term that I'll use, states of mind or mind states, is the broadest. It encompasses moods and emotions, but it also extends to what I'd call subtle meditative states that aren't so familiar to Western culture necessarily—states like mindfulness, concentration, calm, equanimity. These states that are developed out of our deepening mindfulness we also want to take in in this third foundation, and we'll include those in states of mind or mind states. They're usually quite subtle and it takes some learning to tune in and to recognize them. Some of them are similar. I know the difference between calm, concentration, and equanimity may not be clear until you've practiced with them all for a while.

In the instructions this morning, I want to go through a review of what we've covered so far in a way that I hope will make it clear how you can be practicing. Sometimes when we offer many different instructions over several days, people say, "What am I supposed to do? Just tell me what I'm supposed to do and I'll do it."

So this morning, I'm going to tell you what I think you could do. It's not what you have to do, because many of you have come in with a practice you're familiar with, or you may be doing a specific practice that you've talked about with your teacher, and that's fine. But I'm going to suggest one path that I hope will be a clear set of instructions for you to follow if you'd like.

Please begin by sitting comfortably and also at the same time upright, finding this balance that we've talked about. If you can, begin with a mental attitude of relaxation as though your work is already done right now. You just have to be here and feel what's here. No real task to accomplish. You're not trying to get from here to there; you're just trying to get more here. However here is, is fine.

We may notice a certain mood, may notice the body being a certain way, may notice certain thoughts that have come along from just before. That's all fine. Just relax into the experience of being here now.

Let the body relax as much as possible. Let the forehead be smoothed. Let the eyes be soft. The jaw can be dropped. The shoulders can be let go. The belly can be soft. The hands don't need to be tight.

First, just settle your awareness into this experience of the body and sitting. The mind is relaxed. The body is relaxed as possible. Then let the attention open in a wide way to take in all the sounds that are coming and going.

Sounds all around you, front and back, left and right. Notice that hearing doesn't require any special effort, but if you just rest in the present moment, all the sounds are known spontaneously. All you have to do is be present and receive.

Now bring the attention back into the body, letting the attention still stay very receptive. Receive all the sensations connected with breathing. Each in-breath feels a certain way in the body. What does that feel like? The out-breath feels different. How does that feel?

We don't need to control the breath. We don't need to make it long or short, shallow or deep. Just let the breath come and go as it will, and we're just there to feel it, to know it. Some people like to feel the breath at the tip of the nose, others at the belly or the chest. Sometimes you like to feel the breath through the whole body, staying in touch with the whole body and feeling the impact throughout. All these are fine.

Generally what we've been recommending is that one of these three styles—body posture, sounds, or breath—become an anchor for your sitting practice. What that means is if there's nothing else special going on, you have a comfortable place for your attention to come back to, to rest in. Or if the mindfulness has been interrupted by a stretch of thinking, a comfortable place to reconnect to.

Let's say that you're practicing in this way. If nothing special is going on, you're with your anchor—body, sounds, breath. As you're doing that, other things will naturally take your attention. That's what it means when an experience is predominant. Something arises that naturally draws your attention. Could be a sound, could be another body sensation, an ache in the knee, a pleasant feeling in the chest.

When you become aware of that new object, that new sensation, let that become your meditation focus. Easily let go of your anchor and let the attention begin to relate to this new experience. For a sensation in the body, connect with its bare physical nature. You don't need to make a concept, but just feel its elemental quality.

Is it pulsing or vibrating or tingling or itching? Is it warm or cool? Is it pressing or stabbing? Is it heavy or light? Is it aching or throbbing? Let the attention stay with that object, letting the mindfulness be established there for as long as that sensation seems strong, seems to naturally draw the attention.

At some point it may fade or the attention will be drawn to some new arising, a new sensation. If a sensation is strong, you could be with it for most of a meditation period. If it's somewhat fleeting, you might only be with it for five or ten seconds. Either way is fine.

When the attention lets go of that sensation, you could return to your anchor, or there could be a new sensation that draws the attention and becomes predominant. Then easily move to that, letting the mindfulness be established there.

From time to time, the attention will be drawn to the mood or emotion or mind state that's present. There's always some state of mind that's present. A lot of times we don't pay attention to it, but there's always something there. You might just check right in this moment: What is the mood, emotion, or state of mind? Could be a light emotional flavor, could be a strong emotion, could be one of the meditative states like calm or equanimity. Just notice there is always some state of mind going on.

From time to time that arena will come into the foreground. You'll notice, "Oh, this is what's happening now—a mood, emotion, or mind state." When that happens, make that new experience the focus for mindfulness.

It could be one of the five hindrance energies: sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, or doubt. Could be a subtle mood—nostalgia, apprehension. Could be a strong emotion—joy, love, anxiety. Could be recognizing the meditative state of interest.

These states of mind are not always easy to attend to because they can feel so light and insubstantial. When you check in with the mood in the mind, it can feel very cloud-like, almost ethereal. If you connect with it and find it difficult to sustain attention, that's perfectly fine. You can return to the anchor and notice what's predominant.

When emotions are strong, however, they will have a clear impact in the body. With emotions like fear or anger, or strong happiness and joy, feel where they're expressing themselves physically. Let your attention go to the bodily sensations and allow that to be the place where you feel both the sensations and the mood or emotion together.

What you'll discover is that strong emotions have two distinct aspects. There's a physical expression through the body, which manifests as certain sensations. And there's the coloring or mood or flavor that exists in the mind—the pure mental quality of the mood or emotion.

With difficult emotions, it's particularly helpful to use the RAIN practice that Bonnie described earlier: Recognize or name the emotion, Allow or accept it, become Interested and investigate, and see it as Nature with non-identification. As we become familiar with difficult emotions, we discover we don't need to fear feeling them. We can completely allow ourselves to let them in, touch them with mindfulness, envelop them with mindfulness, penetrate them with awareness. They cannot harm us as long as we remain conscious and present.

We begin to notice that all emotions have the natural quality of impermanence—they arise and pass away. We don't need to force them to leave because their very nature is to change and dissolve. We simply open to them, feel them fully, recognize and allow them, then let them go when they're ready to go. From there, we either return to the anchor or turn attention to whatever is next most predominant—breath, sound, sensation, emotion, or mood.

In this way, meditation becomes quite natural and organic. You simply allow the attention to go where it's drawn and notice where it's going. You establish mindfulness there. If nothing particularly compelling is happening, there's always your anchor to return to for restabilization.

What's happening in this moment? Where is the attention naturally drawn? Can mindfulness be established in relation to that natural part of our experience? This approach allows the practice to unfold with ease and authenticity.

This meditation on emotions and mind states is tremendously important for several reasons. First, we come to know our inner terrain intimately. We learn how to direct the mind, to skillfully shape consciousness and cultivate wholesome mind states while abandoning those that are unwholesome.

Additionally, difficult mind states are responsible for much of our suffering in life. You might say that all of our suffering actually emerges from these challenging mental formations. Even our relationship with illness, physical pain, aging, and death—the real difficulty lies in the emotions that these experiences evoke rather than the experiences themselves.

Learning to bring mindfulness to these states offers us profound opportunities for freedom. It's one of the most significant pathways to greater happiness and ease in living. I encourage you to work with these states directly, to explore this terrain and discover what's contained in this aspect of human nature that we all share.

Sometimes when people are introduced to this practice, they worry that if they're not experiencing strong emotions, the meditation isn't working properly. This isn't true at all. Meditation paths unfold in remarkably different ways. Some practitioners have very emotional practices, while others experience very little emotional intensity. Both approaches are perfectly valid—it's deeply individual.

If you're not having strong emotional experiences, it doesn't mean the practice isn't effective. It may be working beautifully. Take time to appreciate what is actually present. Perhaps you're experiencing a state of calm or equanimity. According to the Buddha, calm was indeed a very positive quality worthy of cultivation and appreciation.

We have time for a few questions this morning. I'm going to try something different with our question period. I've noticed over the last few days that I've had difficulty hearing some questions, especially those from the back of the room or when voices are particularly soft. So I'm going to ask that if you'd like to pose a question, please use the microphone. Jared has kindly offered to serve as our mic runner today.

Working with Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong addresses one of meditation's most immediate benefits: learning to work skillfully with difficult emotions. Drawing on the third foundation of mindfulness (cittānupassanā) from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Armstrong explores how afflictive emotions—whether called hindrances (nīvaraṇa), kilesas, or disturbing emotions—cause suffering when we don't understand how to relate to them wisely.

Armstrong presents a framework for understanding five primary difficult emotions: desire (wanting pleasant future experiences), fear (aversion to unpleasant future experiences), sadness (grief over pleasant past experiences), anger (resentment about unpleasant past experiences), and self-judgment (anger turned inward). He emphasizes investigating these emotions through three aspects: their mental quality, their bodily manifestations, and the thoughts and storylines that sustain them.

The talk offers practical guidance on shifting from rejecting difficult emotions to accepting them as temporary visitors that can be met with mindfulness. Armstrong shares personal retreat experiences and teaching stories to illustrate how mindfulness creates space around emotions, providing choice in how we respond. He discusses loving-kindness (mettā) as the long-term antidote to aversion and emphasizes that these challenging states, when met with wisdom, become our greatest teachers in developing patience, strength, and freedom.

The subject of tonight's talk is working with difficult emotions. This array of states goes by different names in the Buddhist lists—sometimes called the hindrances, or the kilesas, or afflictive emotions, or disturbing emotions, or the taints. By whatever name, they cause a lot of suffering. It doesn't matter what you call them, but they are responsible for the primary sufferings in our life. When we don't understand how to work with them or to relate with them skillfully, we feel we are the victim of their onslaught. Coming to learn some skills in relating to these emotions is one of the avenues to open up a huge amount of new feelings of freedom in our life through the direct application of our vipassana practice. This is one of the biggest, most immediate benefits I think people can see from mindfulness practice.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every dark hole and bright spot, whether it's murky, creepy, splendid, spooky, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing." There's a lot of encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method.

It's interesting when we look at children—they are not worried about their emotions. Whatever comes up, they're just right there with it and they don't hold back. It's not necessarily mindfulness, but there's a fearless quality with children that's really beautiful. By the time we've grown up, we may have been harmed in different ways by the world, by society, or by our own emotions, and we become more tentative in relating to these emotions. But before children are harmed, they're very open to experiencing their emotional life. So as meditators, we can regain some of that kind of openness and fearlessness in the emotional field.

As Joseph talked about this morning, if you can simply let emotions arise, pass through, and fade away, that's great. There's no problem. However, at this point as adults, we've generally become tangled up in certain emotions. We resist them, we're afraid of them, they make us uncomfortable, and we really struggle with them. So learning how to find the right relationship to these emotions is a really important part of our dharma path. You might say that becoming free in relation to disturbing emotions is the central journey of the path that we're on.

At first, as we get to know the terrain, we want to make these things go away. But we soon learn that's not possible in the short term. There is the possibility of that with true liberation. It's said that all these afflictive emotions go away—the Buddha said, "cut off like a palm stump, never to arise again." This is the possibility of the path, but for most of us that's still some way off. But we can find much greater freedom in relation to them even when they arise by learning some pretty basic skills.

Again from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run 100 miles an hour to the other side of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

So this area of work is very central. The Buddha talked about this in terms of meditation as the third foundation of mindfulness. The third foundation is known as the foundation of citta, which is often translated as mind, but as Bonnie has been translating it in her talks and instructions, she's been calling it heart-mind, or sometimes mind-heart. What that points to is that in the Pali word citta, both affective or emotional elements and cognitive or thought-rational processes are both involved in the field of citta.

In the West, if you ask somebody where their mind is—an ordinary person in the street—where do you think they'll point? Up here, right? In the West, we tend to take the mind to be equivalent with the brain. In Thailand, if you ask somebody where the citta is—the Thai word for citta is jit—they'll point here, to the center of the chest, what we call the heart center. So they'll point to what's known as the heart area, emphasizing the heart aspect of citta, heart-mind. So it really is both of these.

Just a little postscript for those of you who are interested in this: The Western concept of the brain as the ruler of everything is quite deep for us. I was sitting with a Tibetan teacher, a bright young Rinpoche, and he was describing a human being with an analogy to an airplane. He said the stomach is kind of the engine and the legs are like the jets and the wings. He said the fuel is the food that we eat. And he said the brain is just the computer—the brain is the airplane's computer. The pilot is awareness. And awareness is often equated to citta at the heart center.

So I thought that was interesting. His view: the brain is just a computer. Nothing special.

So citta encompasses moods, emotions, and states of mind. I mentioned this the other day in the instructions, so I'll just repeat it briefly.

Emotions are the kinds of feelings that we often talk about—feelings we can experience strongly. Things like love and jealousy, loneliness, despair, joy, and so forth.

Moods are similar to emotions, but they're more toned down. They're more subtle, maybe more cloud-like in the background. So we might say that we're feeling a little melancholy, we're feeling a little nostalgic, or we're feeling tender right now. It's not quite strong enough to be called an emotion, but it's definitely in the affective realm and we feel it through our heart-mind.

And then states of mind include moods and emotions and also all the more subtle meditative qualities: mindfulness, concentration, interest, equanimity, peace, and so forth. So citta includes all of these. In fact, when I say states of mind, it includes everything you can notice as a quality of mind or heart—this entire mental range.

In Buddhism, as most of you are familiar, the states of mind fall into two basic categories: wholesome and unwholesome. Now this might sound moralistic or judgmental, but it's not meant that way. It requires discernment, for sure, but discernment is not the same as judgment in my vocabulary. For me, judgment implies a sense of condemnation, a strong moralistic outlook that says it's bad. So discerning wholesome and unwholesome is not necessarily to be taken as bad, but it's more understood as not skillful. These are not helpful states.

The unwholesome states lead into suffering for ourselves and others. The wholesome states lead toward happiness for ourselves and for others. So of course it's skillful to cultivate the wholesome states and to decrease the unwholesome states. This is essentially the heart of our Dharma practice: grow what is wholesome and leads to happiness, decrease what is unwholesome that leads to suffering. This is in fact the definition of right effort. If you look at right effort as part of the Eightfold Path, this is basically what it says: grow the wholesome, decrease the unwholesome. And there are many meditative tools in order to do that.

In fact, one of the things I think is so beautiful about the Dharma—I had no idea of this before I encountered Buddhadharma—these tools give us the ability to shape our heart-mind in any direction we choose and to shape it to any depth that we want. We have tools and practices within our tradition to do that.

Do you want to become more loving? There's a practice for that. Do you want to develop compassion? There's a practice for that. Do you want to develop liberating insight and become as free as the Buddha? There's a path for that. Do you want to develop psychic powers through concentration? There's a path for that.

So in whatever direction we would like to shape this heart-mind, we can do that. The tools are there. We just have to pick the path and do the work.

I find this amazing and part of the genius of the Buddha—that he could see the mind so clearly that he could separate out these wholesome and unwholesome qualities and direct us to the cultivation of any one of them or all of them.

This process of cultivation is what's known in the tradition as bhavana. Bhavana is often translated as mental development, sometimes cultivation. It literally means bringing into being. So we can bring these wholesome qualities into being. That's the purpose of our effort.

We'll talk more about wholesome states as we go. In the beginning, we tend to lay the foundation with working with what is difficult. But just briefly about wholesome states for now, two things.

One: notice them when they come. Sometimes we take them for granted, like, "Oh, this is what's supposed to be happening." When things quiet inside, how often do you note clearly, "Oh, the calm, peace, tranquility, serenity"?

Not so much. We tend to take that for granted—"Oh, this is what should be happening. Now I'm peaceful. This is what it's supposed to be." We should notice that because peace is also conditioned, the outcome of prior causes and conditions. And as we notice it more, we appreciate it. Then we learn how to steer there. That's one thing: notice the wholesome states.

Second, of course it's obvious—don't cling. Or be mindful when you do cling, because we will tend to. But clinging to the wholesome leads to suffering as well.

With the difficult states, we also need two things. The first is a shift in attitude. When I was first practicing in long retreat, some difficult emotion would come up—for me a lot it was fear and anger. I side on the aversive personality type, so it was a lot of fear and anger. Desire wasn't so strong for me. And when one of those emotions would come, I'd think, "This shouldn't be happening. This is wrong. This is a mistake. Meditation's not going right. This thing should go away." That only led to more conflict because it was there and it was real.

So the first thing to notice is we need not to have a judgmental attitude toward these difficult emotions. They're part of the human package. They come about because of causes and conditions. They don't come because you're a bad person. They come because of their own conditioned life. And when they come, it's not a mistake. As Pema Chödrön said, they will come until we've learned from them what we need to know, which is how to be free in relation to them.

The attitude often to these states is very rejecting: Don't want it. It's not what should be happening. I'm bad if I have it. They're bad for coming. And we try to push them away. So we really need to work toward an attitude of acceptance. This is an important thing to check: What's your attitude when these states arise? Work with acceptance, which is the A in RAIN.

The second thing we need is a greater understanding of their nature. Once we can just start to observe these things pass through—like Joseph said, like clouds, they don't have roots, they don't have homes—we can start to see that their nature is to come, to persist for a while, and then to pass away. When we trust in that, we see they're not problematic. They may not be pleasant, but they're not problematic. We don't have to try to make them go away because their nature is to go away.

This is seeing the emptiness aspect of the emotion. Empty here doesn't mean that the emotion is meaningless. Emotions are a rich source in our life, but it means they're ephemeral. They're as light as clouds. They come, they persist, they pass away. This is their essentially empty nature. They're not fixed in us and they're not who we are. They're temporary visitors.

So the first step in working with these emotions is to know what they are. It's like there's this terrain in here that if we haven't been trained, we have to learn about. And I wasn't trained when I came into meditation. My upbringing hadn't taught me to know and understand these states.

Wouldn't it be wonderful if children learned these skills from the start? There's a beautiful movement spreading across this country through organizations like Mindful Schools and others, bringing mindfulness teachers into elementary and middle schools to teach children how to recognize their emotions and observe their effects.

One of our sangha members in California, who ran a preschool for many years, discovered she could teach these fundamental principles to three- to five-year-olds. Of course, they wouldn't sit down for traditional meditation instruction using terms like mindfulness, stillness, and concentration. Instead, she would begin with yoga sessions—children naturally love moving their bodies, stretching, and feeling into their physical experience.

After yoga, she would have them lie on the floor with their heads pointing toward the center, creating a sense of community. Then she would offer meditation instructions that went something like this: "Your awareness is like a big pond of water. Within that pond, all kinds of fish are swimming through. Start noticing what fish are swimming through your pond. There are happy fish, sad fish, angry fish, loving fish, friendly fish. Just open up. You be the water and let all the fish swim through. No problem."

The children could relate to this imagery beautifully. After one session, she asked them to share their experience. A five-year-old said, "I could let all the fish swim through, but I couldn't let the mad fish swim through." When she asked why not, he replied, "When you don't know you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt people."

Five years old.

This understanding can indeed emerge when children are young, and there's a growing movement in this direction. But if we didn't attend that preschool, we can learn these skills now. It's essential we do, because the mad fish can make us act unskillfully too.

Understanding our emotions begins with recognizing what we're feeling as we're feeling it. Without this awareness, our emotions act unconsciously through us. This practice sounds simple, but it's more challenging than it appears.

Let me share an example from my early years of practice. I was sitting a three-month retreat here, about two weeks in, and had developed reasonable concentration. My mindfulness felt fairly strong. When the 9:15 morning sitting bell rang, I walked out the back door for walking meditation. In those days, I practiced on the lawn below what's now Bodhi House.

I had walked in the same spot every period for two weeks, so I was very mindful—noting lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing as I walked slowly outside. But when I looked down at my walking path, someone else was there.

"What are they doing in my walking path?" I thought. "They must have seen me walking here every period for two weeks. Did I cut in front of them in line this morning? Are they trying to play games with my head?" All the while continuing: lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing.

I walked down there anyway, internally steaming. I found another patch of grass which, to my great surprise, worked just as well as my original spot.

And I continued with my walking practice, but internally, I was still stewing about why that person had stolen my walking path. Honestly, I thought I was being mindful, but it was thirty minutes into the period before I realized, "Oh, I'm angry."

I thought I was mindful, but these thoughts had come in. The hindrances sneak in like under our mindfulness radar. We've got our mindfulness radar up. We think we're really present, and these things slip under and take us over.

So once I saw that I was angry, then I could start to relate with it. "Oh, I know how to work with this. This is anger. I'll feel it in my body. I'll make space. I'll look at the thoughts. I'll open to it with allowance." And then it just sort of passed through. But until I could identify it, I couldn't relate with it. I had no way to work with it, and subconsciously it was just pushing me. I had no freedom. I was compelled by the force of it.

So we see that when we don't know what we're feeling, we tend to just react blindly out of it. And this is what the Buddha called unwise attention, misdirected attention. I was putting all my attention on the other person and the story that I'd created about them. The story was they shouldn't have been there. They were in my path and they were wrong and I was right. And when I believed that story, I got all worked up.

But as soon as I turned the attention back inward to the experience of anger, then I could relate to it with mindfulness and it could be released.

So when the hindrance comes, when an afflictive emotion comes, the most important thing is to notice that the story is taking your attention somewhere else and direct the attention back to the direct experience of the emotion that's there. Because when we're with the emotion, with mindfulness, there's not just the emotion. There's the emotion plus mindfulness, which carries a bit of wisdom. When mindfulness even recognizes, "Oh, this is anger," there's a bit of wisdom or intelligence coming in. So now you're not just caught with the afflictive emotion. There's the afflictive emotion plus your own wisdom. And that shifts everything.

The first thing it does is it lets you feel more space around the emotion that you're feeling. And discovering space around these emotions gives us choice. We can choose how to act in the world. We can choose how to respond through our meditation tools. So as soon as we can name it with mindfulness, we create some space and that makes it workable.

It's a very interesting fact. There are so many research studies now on mindfulness and the tools of mindfulness. One study took a group of people who were working with anger management techniques—and there are a lot of them out there in the psychological world. But this one took a group of people and what they had them do was very simple. They just instructed them that every time they were angry, just note by using the word "anger." It's all they were instructed to do. And they found that that simple technique of noting the emotion they were feeling was as effective as any other technique and more effective than most. Just naming the emotion they were feeling really helped the people to restrain actions based on that anger.

So there are these different lists of the difficult emotions. Bonnie talked about the hindrances. Of course that's a central one in the Buddha's teaching. When I look at my experience and the experience of meditators that I talk to, I come up with a little bit different list of what I'd call maybe the top five difficult emotions. And four of them I want you to tell me about. I'm going to ask you some questions and I want you to tell me.

One of the curious things about difficult emotions is that they rely on grasping. Beautiful emotions don't rely on grasping. You can see someone in the moment, have an outburst of loving kindness or compassion that's not tied with grasping at all. But grasping means we've taken a hold of something in the past and we're still hanging on to it. So that implies continuity over time. So the afflictive emotions are bound up with time in a way that beautiful emotions are not.

We're going to take a look at time as one axis.

We're going to do an x-y graph. Do you love algebra? You've come to the right place.

We're going to do a chart with the horizontal axis, the x-axis, being time. And of course time is usually seen as moving from your left to your right, so that'll be the movement of time. The past is this way, the future is that way, the present is right in the middle.

The vertical axis is going to be from pleasure to pain, because a lot of our emotions revolve around what we like and what we don't like, what's pleasant and what's painful. So the vertical axis is from pain at the bottom to pleasure at the top.

We've now created four quadrants. Let's look at each of those four quadrants.

Let's start with the future—sometimes future is more fun, it's more open. So there's something pleasant that may be happening in the future. What emotion would come up around that? Excitement. Anticipation. Joy. What would you feel towards something that's out there that's not quite there yet? Craving. It's wanting, isn't it?

Pleasant things in the future evoke wanting—some form of desire. "Oh, we're going to have cookies for lunch tomorrow." I don't know that, by the way. Probably we're not, but that's just an example. So this quadrant, pleasant in the future, evokes desire, and this is one of the primal forces in our minds, in our lives.

What if there's something that's unpleasant that's coming in the future? Fear. After you get home, you're going to talk to your boss and you're going to have to do a big presentation. Fear, anxiety, nervousness about unpleasant in the future. So fear is another very fundamental force.

Pleasant in the past. Something that was there in the past, very lovely, satisfying, agreeable, dear, not there anymore. What's the feeling? Regret. Sadness. It's gone. That beautiful thing we had isn't there anymore. Sadness, grief. You really feel this with the loss of a relationship, loss of a job, loss of a person in your life. There's sadness or grief—another very primary emotion.

And then what about something painful in the past? And let's say, to zero in a bit, connected with another human being. Resentment, anger. It's in that field, isn't it, when someone has done something unpleasant to you?

So these are, I think, as I see it, the big four that move us: wanting, fear, sadness, and anger. I see these come up a lot in myself. They're very powerful, and I think they're very primary for us as humans.

And then one wrinkle around the anger piece—if it gets directed at ourselves, it comes across as self-judgment. So we judge ourselves, we're angry at ourselves for something that we did that was not skillful in the past.

So these are the big five that I want to talk about a little bit more tonight.

So the first thing is to say, as we meditate with these, when these states come up, start to investigate them in three aspects.

All these difficult emotions will impact us in three ways. The first is that each of these is just a mental quality on its own. Desire feels a certain way, fear feels a certain way, sadness feels a certain way. Each of these has a distinctive quality, which is a quality of the mind.

Then second, when they're felt strongly, they'll impact the body. Body and mind are very closely intertwined—they feel as though they're merged in us. But with training we can start to separate out what's mental and what's physical.

So when we feel a strong emotion—I'll take fear as an example—when it's there and strong, it often feels like a clenching somewhere. Could be in the belly, could be in the chest, could be a contraction through the whole body. So we feel the impact of fear in the body somewhere.

The meditation instruction is this: in order to remain mindful of fear, go to the point in the body where you feel it and pay attention there. And you might just alternate between feeling the physical sensation of contraction and tuning into the mental flavoring or color that is fear.

Now sometimes people say, "I don't see the mental side of what you're talking about. I go in the body and there's this contraction and I feel the mood there also. I don't see two things. I just see one thing."

But let me ask this: Have you ever had fear in a dream? When you didn't necessarily feel the body at all? And yet you knew, oh, this is fear. So when we feel these emotions in dreams, we're not necessarily connected with the body. But we feel the emotion clearly and we know it. That's the mental component.

Another way to think about it is that the fear and the contraction are there together. It's a little bit like mixing cream in your coffee. If you can feel contraction from another source—maybe anger has a contraction that feels like that too, maybe you're doing an isometric exercise at the gym and you feel that contraction—then you notice what the contraction feels like on its own. That's the coffee. Then you pour a little bit of fear in there, they get stirred together, and that's fear plus contraction. And that's what you come to know as the emotion of fear.

So take some time and explore. See if you can find the flavor or the mood or the coloring in the mind of each of the emotions. Happiness has a flavor. Joy has a color. Fear has a flavor. And they're all different. You'll feel these in dreams. You know them just as they are. And then you notice how it mixes with the body. So go back and forth. Feel the body. Feel the mental mood or color.

And then the third aspect to pay attention to are the thoughts. When you're in a happy state, you tend to think happy thoughts. When you're in an angry state, you tend to think angry thoughts. So watch the thoughts that come that are connected to the emotion.

There's one kind of thought that's especially important. Sometimes it's not even conscious, but it's like a subconscious belief. So like with my walking meditation, when somebody was in my path, I hooked onto the anger because I had a belief. And the belief was, "They're wrong and I'm right." When I let go of that view, the anger couldn't stand.

So also, the afflictive emotions all have storylines or unconscious beliefs that we hold. So we'll look at those for each of these.

Okay, so let's talk about desire. This is a movement of mind that wants to have a pleasant experience. It can happen really frequently in a retreat.

For things outside—people, places, your home, food, drink—this can happen inside the retreat as well. You want to repeat a concentrated sit, you want calm, you want an insight to come again. It can happen in both ways, but it comes up a lot in retreat.

I was teaching a retreat in Italy some years ago, which was a blast. I loved teaching Italians because I found they seemed really fluent with their emotions. They knew what they were feeling when they were feeling it.

I was having an interview with a young Italian man on about the fourth day of the retreat. I asked him how the retreat was for him, and he said, "It's not going well. I don't want to be here."

"Oh, okay. Well, why are you here?" I asked.

"This is August. This is my holiday time. I could have taken a vacation—this is my vacation. Some friends of mine were going to the Caribbean and they asked me if I wanted to go with them. Or I could have come to the meditation retreat."

"So why did you come to the meditation retreat?"

"Well, I thought about the Caribbean, you know—beautiful beaches and warm water and great food. I really wanted to go there, but all the tickets were sold out. I couldn't get there, so I came to this retreat."

"Okay, have you been thinking about the Caribbean?"

"Oh, yeah. Oh, yeah, a lot. I keep thinking about all my friends on the beach having a good time, and I'm here."

"Okay, now I understand why you're having a hard time at the retreat. What if you stopped thinking about the Caribbean? Then what would it be like being here?"

"I don't know, but I can try that."

So he went back into the retreat, and I saw him again a few days later. "How are you doing?" I asked.

"Fine. I let go of the Caribbean. I arrived here. And since then, everything's been going fine. I've been very happy to be here."

This is the way desire works. When we want to be somewhere else, we can't be happy here, because we're wanting something that we don't have. Do you ever find yourself wanting something you do have? "Oh, I want a hand at the end of my arm"—not usually the way it works. We want things we don't have, and that very wanting of what isn't there sets up dissatisfaction.

This is the problem with craving, with desire, with wanting. The unhappiness isn't from the absence of the object. The unhappiness is from the wanting. Let go of the wanting, and the moment is usually fine. Most moments in this retreat will be fine. There may be some physical discomfort. There may be an unpleasant mood. But overall, if you take a big view, the moment is not necessarily problematic. And yet we struggle because we want something different.

The storyline for the young Italian man was: if he'd been in the Caribbean, he would have been happy. That was the underlying assumption—he couldn't be happy because he wasn't in the Caribbean. So with desire, the storyline is something like that, and you can feel into it for yourself.

With anger, the challenging aspect is that our thoughts may indeed be accurate. The other person might genuinely be wrong, and we might genuinely be right. But here's the crucial insight: even when we're right, the anger still burns us. Even when our assessment is correct, the aversion still creates suffering within us.

This is where we need to distinguish between being right and being at peace. We can acknowledge that someone has acted inappropriately or that a situation is genuinely problematic without carrying the burning quality of anger in our hearts. The wisdom lies in recognizing that our rightness doesn't justify our suffering.

When we hold onto anger, even justified anger, we become like that person who grasps a hot coal with the intent of throwing it at someone else—we're the ones who get burned. The other person may not even know we're angry, while we sit stewing in our own painful emotions.

This doesn't mean we become passive or fail to respond appropriately to situations. We can take skillful action, set boundaries, or address problems without the internal fire of anger consuming us. In fact, we often respond more effectively when we're not clouded by the reactive energy of aversion.

The practice is learning to see anger clearly—feeling it in the body, noticing the thoughts that feed it, understanding its nature—without either suppressing it or acting it out unconsciously. We can say, "Anger is here. There's burning in the chest. There's tension in the jaw. There are thoughts about how wrong they were." We acknowledge it all without necessarily believing that our anger is telling us the whole truth about what we need to do.

Sometimes the most radical thing we can do is simply not pick up the hot coal at all. Even when we're absolutely certain we're right.

Somebody may have done something to us that's really inappropriate, awful, rude, or cruel. That may well be true. When you look at the impact of individual actions, when you look at the impact of systemic racism on people of color, you see that people have been harmed many, many times from childhood on by these factors that are widespread in the society, in the culture. So that harm has been real, and there are real grounds for saying, "Wrong was done to me. I was harmed by individuals, by the system. I've been harmed." So that is true. And so especially the work with anger is important for all of us.

There's a story from the Dalai Lama. He had known a monk back in Tibet in 1959, before he fled the country. He'd left and gone to India, but this monk had been captured by the Chinese and put into prison for the crime of being a monk. Especially when the Cultural Revolution was happening in Tibet, a lot of monks and nuns were put in prison for being monks and nuns.

The man was eventually released from prison and escaped from Tibet and made his way to India. The Dalai Lama likes to meet people who have come from Tibet and made it to India. So he had a meeting with this monk, whom the Dalai Lama had previously thought was a pretty ordinary guy, an ordinary monk.

In talking to him, the Dalai Lama asked how his time had been since he'd last seen him. And the monk said, "I really felt myself to be in danger." So the Dalai Lama said, "Oh, do you mean you were in danger of being tortured?" And the monk said, "Oh no, that's not what I meant. I was tortured many times. I was in danger of becoming angry about it. But I didn't. I worked with loving-kindness and compassion and I didn't."

The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of that monk's practice. He was much more developed than he had thought.

As we investigate the phenomenon of anger, especially if we're thinking of acting out the anger towards someone who has hurt us, the texts say that it's helpful to investigate how the process goes. They say that becoming angry with somebody is like picking up a hot coal to throw at them. But when we pick up the coal, we burn ourselves first. It's also described as drinking poison and expecting the other person to get sick.

It's really important not to suppress anger, whatever its source or cause. It's really important to let ourselves feel it and to work with it as skillfully as we can with mindfulness, to go through the steps of RAIN: to recognize, to allow it to be there, to become interested and investigate, and not to identify with it. Because this form of anger is very universal.

Sometimes we have to practice strongly with metta and compassion in the face of anger. I was doing a long metta retreat here one time and my difficult person—you know that's one of the categories in the metta practice—was also on the retreat. So I'd be going through my day: "May all beings be happy, may all beings be peaceful." And my difficult person would walk in front of me and I'd start growling about what they did during that last year. "That was really not right." And I'd start winding myself up with being angry at them.

About thirty minutes later, I'd be spinning, spinning, spinning, and finally it would pass away. I'd go back: "May all beings be peaceful. May all beings be happy." And then later in the day, I'd see my difficult person again. I'd get all angry again. And I thought, "There must be a way to work with this."

I thought, "Somebody's told me I should do metta for my difficult person." And I thought, "I don't want to do that. That would mean I'd have to like them. I don't like them. I don't want to do that." But I was desperate. So I thought, "Okay, I'll give it a try."

So I started doing metta for them. And very interestingly, the anger did go away. And I found out I didn't have to like the person. All I had to do was wish that they could be happy. And if I could wish that they could be happy, the ill will went out and the goodwill replaced it.

So it was very interesting for me. And I really recommend it with difficult people and difficult situations. Try the practice of loving kindness or compassion. If you can just see a glimmer of possibility that maybe they could be happy and it would be okay, that can take the anger out of the moment.

When anger gets turned against ourselves, it manifests as self-judgment. We feel we're not good because we've done things we regret, or we don't measure up in some way to standards that have been put in us by parents, teachers, siblings, or society. Self-judgment often starts with rational thoughts.

I was having an interview one time with a student who was a psychotherapist. The therapist had just been dropped by a client—this happens all the time—but it was becoming very personal for the therapist. They traced the thoughts they had after being dropped by the client. They said, "Okay, the patient dropped me and I thought, I guess I just wasn't the right fit for that person. I thought that for a while. Then it moved to, 'Oh, I really didn't have enough compassion or warmth.' Then it moved to, 'I'm really not a very loving person.' And then it moved to, 'Well, actually, I've never loved anyone and no one loves me.'"

It started out rational and specific, then became more and more general and judgmental. That's when it felt really heavy. So one thing—if you notice judging thoughts, try to make the thoughts become specific. You might have to ask the judge, "Tell me something specific about myself." Then it comes out: "Oh, well, I was unkind to someone last week in a group meeting that we had." Oh, okay. Well, everybody does that. We're not perfect. Everybody does that. So come back to what's true.

The storyline underneath self-judgment—the reason it's so oppressive—is that it feels like we're not good enough or we're not lovable. We question our very worthwhileness. Can we have the space to exist as a human being and take up space on the planet? Are we worthy enough to do that? We all are.

There's a lot of self-judgment in Western culture today. I'm not so familiar with other cultures, but in Western culture there's almost an epidemic of self-judgment. A group of about twenty Western teachers were meeting some years ago with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala, India. They were having a meeting just to talk about how things were going—"How's the Buddhism going where you are?" "Yeah, pretty good. How's it going where you are?"—and learning from His Holiness.

Someone brought up this quality of self-judgment, or even in some cases self-hatred. The Dalai Lama had this mystified expression on his face. He couldn't understand what people were talking about. He had no personal experience or cultural reference point for it, because in Tibet, children are brought up with so much love from the extended family that they feel really valued and cared for and lovable from early on.

So he couldn't understand what it meant, but he went around to the Western teachers and asked, "Do you know what this is?" "Yes." "Do you know what this is?" "Yeah." He went around to all twenty Western teachers—they all knew what it was because it's so widespread in the West. I think it's because our community systems and our family systems are breaking down, and we don't have that coherent upbringing to hold us so that we know we're valued and really loved.

We may hear ourselves judging ourselves, putting ourselves down. Sometimes it comes out toward others, but it's more destructive toward ourselves. Joseph has this very nice practice when judging is happening. He hears a statement like "You're never going to be good enough," and he adds the phrase, "and the sky is blue." "You really messed up in that meeting last week, and the sky is blue." "That person at lunch took too much food, and the sky is blue." That just puts a different container around it.

With self-judgment, I've found that especially the long-term practice of loving kindness is the best way to undo it. It doesn't even have to be loving kindness toward oneself, although that comes out of this. But when there is real goodwill and affection for others—and friend and benefactor are very good people to work with—then we look inside and we see, "Oh, there's something beautiful here."

There's this friendly spirit toward others. I can feel good about myself because metta is alive for me. So in the long term, the practice of metta really, really undoes the tendency to self-judgment.

Briefly, with sadness, often we're afraid to open to feelings of deep loss, disappointment, and grief because we fear that they'll be overwhelming. Sometimes we feel, if I open to this sadness, I'll never come out of it. I'll never move through the grief and so we hold it at a distance. But that's just a belief - just a belief. We've got to have faith in the practice, faith in ourselves to open to that loss, to that missing, and we'll find out it does have an end.

One of the really moving things that's been happening at Spirit Rock is that a few parents have come on long retreats who have lost children in their teens, generally lost their children to drugs or to suicide. And that's, I think, one of the worst losses that a human being can suffer - to lose a child when they're still young and promising. And what's been amazing is to watch the parents go through the retreat cycle over a number of years and watch the grief slowly fade and be replaced by real acceptance, real warmth, real love. And then those parents are able to share that experience with other parents who have more recently lost children in the same way. So they become models and teachers for others who have gone through that kind of grief and that kind of loss. So grief is limited in time if we can let it come and be felt.

And then fear. With fear, usually when it arises, the first thing we feel is more fear. Oh, I'm afraid of the fear. So the first thing we have to do is come into the present and start to feel the fear directly and see, can we bear it? Because with fear, the storyline is something like, this moment is bearable, but the next moment is going to be unbearable. So we have to come into this moment, feel it, let go of that projection about the future. That's just the storyline. The next moment isn't going to be unbearable. And see, is this moment bearable?

I worked with this a lot. I came in first to the body sensations. Body sensations with fear are not pleasant, but I had to ask myself, can I bear them? Moving to allowing, moving to accepting, can I just bear them? And I found after touching them many times, I could. You know, contraction in the chest, fluttery feeling throughout the body, light, ungrounded feelings. I found I could bear those.

Then I had to open to the mood in the mind. It's hard to get in touch with the mood of fear because fear is to escape. So the mood of fear is moving away from, escaping. It was hard to touch that. But then I could. It was the fleeing impulse that is the heart of that mood. Then I could bear that and I could let go of the thoughts.

Slowly, slowly, I began to open to the whole experience, this kaleidoscope of fear. And it got to the point that I could totally accept it. I reached a point in my meditation where I didn't care one bit whether fear arose or not. I was completely equanimous with it. And when I reached that point of acceptance with fear, it lost some grip over me that it had had before out of my fear of fear. I got over my fear of fear. And when it came, it was okay.

Now, since then, I've had to meet it a number of times, but I now know that I can come to terms with it. I know how to meditate, allow it, be with it so that it's not overpowering and it's not fundamentally threatening to me. And that came out of the fullness of the movement to acceptance.

So whatever difficult emotion might be the strongest for you, this is really an encouragement to allow it in and even welcome it. Because what you'll find is you'll learn so much by working with it. You'll find levels of wisdom you didn't know you had. You'll find degrees of patience that you didn't imagine were possible. And you'll find you have a core strength that had never been brought to light before.

One Arhat in Thailand, a fully enlightened person, was asked late in his life what had been his biggest difficulty in practicing. And he said, "I'd have to say that it was fear for me personally. But to say it was a difficulty doesn't say it rightly."

It was my greatest adversary, but it brought out my greatest strengths. And I learned the most from being with it. So it was my greatest teacher as well.

This is the promise of these difficult emotions. We learn so much in coming to freedom in relation to them. We transform our ability to be with what's difficult. So in that meeting of mindfulness—greeting desire, sadness, anger, fear, judgment with kindness, with compassion, with courage, with interest—we're transforming a moment of suffering into a moment of clarity. We transform the unwholesome into the wholesome through this meeting. And there's a great liberation that comes out of this work.

I want to close with one prayer from the Tibetan tradition. This is called the supplication of Gampopa, who was a disciple of Milarepa, one of the great Tibetan yogis. He put this supplication to the Dharma—not to any one person, but to the Dharma itself. These are the four blessings of Gampopa:

Grant your blessing so that my mind follows the Dharma.
Grant your blessing so that my Dharma practice becomes the path.
Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion.
Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Let's sit together for a moment with these words: Grant your blessing so that the path clarifies confusion. Grant your blessing so that confusion dawns as wisdom.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 155

Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong introduces the practice of choiceless attention, a central technique in the Mahāsi Sāyadaw method of Satipaṭṭhāna Vipassanā. Drawing from classical instructions outlined in 'Practical Insight Meditation,' Armstrong explains how this approach differs from using an anchor as either an exclusive concentration object (samatha practice) or as a home base for attention.
>
> The teaching explores three ways of working with meditation anchors, culminating in choiceless attention where practitioners completely unhook from their chosen object and allow mindfulness to follow wherever attention naturally lands moment by moment. Armstrong explains the Pāli term manasikāra (attention) as the pivotal factor being released from our control. This practice transforms everything in experience—sensations, sounds, thoughts, emotions, feeling tones—into potential objects for mindfulness rather than distractions.
> The talk includes practical guidance on implementing this technique, including how to use noting practice to maintain moment-to-moment awareness and when to return to an anchor if spacing out occurs. Armstrong emphasizes that this approach embodies the genius of Mahāsi Sāyadaw's method by making clear that nothing in our experience can be an obstruction to mindfulness—everything becomes workable material for awakening.

This morning we're going to extend the meditation instructions a little more to take in the practice or technique that I would call choiceless attention. Some people commonly refer to this as choiceless awareness. I prefer the term choiceless attention, because Krishnamurti coined the term choiceless awareness and used it to refer to quite a refined state of mind in which greed and aversion were not operating. Choiceless attention highlights the fact that it's the attention that is the pivotal factor we're letting go of control of.

Our meditation instructions have been adapted from the classical instructions that were given by Mahasi Sayadaw. They're clearly outlined in a little book, which I think is available online, called Practical Insight Meditation. He called his method Satipatthana Vipassana. When you would come into a retreat in his style, he would give all the instructions on the first day. What we have done is take his basic set of instructions and expand them over thirteen days of instruction. We've taken out the pieces that he had assembled and we're giving them out in a longer time sequence with a little more detail on each one.

But the main practice that he was pointing to is this choiceless attention that I'm going to describe this morning. It's made up of all the parts that we've talked about: body sensations, breath, sounds, sights, tastes and smells, moods, emotions, intentions, and feeling tones. You now have all the foundational instructions to practice this style of choiceless attention.

When we take an anchor—and I'll use the breath as an example, but remember we've talked about anchor as body posture, as sounds, or as breath—we can approach it in one of three ways.

The first is we can use it as the exclusive focus in a concentration practice, often called a samatha practice, which is designed to strengthen the factor of tranquility and the accompanying concentration. When you make a commitment to an anchor for a samatha practice, you don't take any other objects. If you wanted to take the breath as a concentration or samatha practice, you basically don't attend to anything else. There are a few people here who are doing the practice in this way. So sound comes up, you do not become mindful of it. Another sensation comes in the body, you do not consciously pay attention to it. The style of practice taught by Paok Sayadaw, for instance, which begins with anapanasati at the upper lip, emphasizes this technique of not taking any other object. This is one approach to your anchor.

The second approach, and this is what I think a lot of you have been doing, is to use the anchor as a kind of home in meditation that you stay with if nothing else particular is drawing your attention. If nothing else strong is happening, you have a place to rest the attention. You become more and more familiar with it, you establish a good connection with it, and it's an easy place to come back to in meditation. This is the use of the anchor as a chosen object, such as the breath. When nothing else particular is drawing the attention, you have a place to rest.

But it's not exclusive. If another phenomenon arises that draws the attention—strong sound, strong sensation, an emotion—you easily let go of the anchor. The attention moves to the new phenomenon, you connect the attention there, you sustain it long enough to get a feel for its nature. It's sometimes called rubbing—you sustain the attention long enough. Then you can either let go of that and return to the anchor, you can stay with that new phenomenon for longer, or you can let go of that new phenomenon and go to where the attention is drawn to another new phenomenon. This is the predominant experience, but with the anchor as a home that you come back to. That's the second way to relate to the anchor.

But the third way is what we're going to explore today. You have no preference at all for your anchor. This is when the attention becomes truly choiceless. Notice that the key factor that we're talking about here is attention. What phenomenon are you singling out from the overall field in which things are arising and passing? What phenomenon are you singling out to focus on and give attention to? In Pali, the term for this is manasikara. It's an important factor to know in meditation because most meditation techniques are about where the attention is going.

In choiceless attention, we unhook the attention from our anchor and we let it go wherever it will. This is something interesting to notice as you just sit here. Where is your attention landing moment after moment? It's probably not fixed in just one place. You might notice the sound of my voice. You might pay attention to the meaning of the words. You might feel the pressure of your seat on the cushion. You might notice the air temperature. There might be a mood of interest. There might be a mood of confusion. You come back to the sound of my voice.

Left on its own devices, attention moves around. A lot. In choiceless attention, we don't try to interrupt or control this moving around. We let the attention go where it will, and we make that new landing spot the focus for mindfulness.

However long the attention stays there, that remains the focus for mindfulness. As soon as it moves away to some new phenomenon, we make that the new focus for mindfulness in this new moment.

The quality of concentration is still developing in what we call a moment-to-moment way in choiceless attention. It's not developing off a single chosen object, but it's developing off the mindfulness that grows moment after moment with changing objects. So it's important to understand that concentration still develops from changing objects. It's not a problem.

So this is the basic approach to choiceless attention. Unfix the attention from your anchor. Sometimes it's not so comfortable to unfix that attention because you become very habituated in the relationship to the anchor. Sometimes unhooking it brings some uneasiness, a little nervousness. How am I going to be steady in my attention if it's not locked on to my chosen object? So this is an experiment. This is an interesting learning.

But the beauty is that the meditation takes on an unforced quality. You're not trying to steer the attention anywhere at all. You're just remaining alert to where it lands and then becoming mindful there. So there's no resistance, for instance, to a thought arising. Thoughts aren't seen as a distraction because the thought can be a focus for mindfulness. There's no resistance to a sensation, whether pleasant or unpleasant, because it can be the focus for mindfulness.

This is the practice of choiceless attention.

There's one other way I want to describe it which is equivalent. This is kind of the technical explanation based on this factor of manasikāra, or attention. But there's another way you can approach this. Choiceless attention simply answers the question, "What's happening now?"

If you ask yourself in any moment the question, "What's happening now?" normally what you'll notice is what we call the predominant sense experience in that moment. There are a lot of sense experiences going on in every moment at the six sense doors. But generally in a moment, one of them will stand out and become, let's say, foreground.

So anytime you ask yourself the question, "What's happening now?" the answer to that becomes the new focus for mindfulness. This is just another way to describe choiceless attention.

So in whichever of those descriptions appeals to you, this kind of practice is a very natural way to be mindful. We're not trying to direct the practice in a particular direction, except to be mindful.

So I'll encourage you to, in the instructions in a minute, I'll encourage you to begin with the relationship with your anchor and then at a certain point to unhook the attention and just let it go where it will. You'll see that there's a kind of ease that comes when you let go of this choice. You're not trying to steer the factor of attention, but you have to be careful to maintain the moment-to-moment mindfulness. It's not forcing to do that, but you have to be mindful.

The risk in letting go of a chosen object like an anchor is that it's a little easier to space out sometimes. So notice if that begins to happen.

Okay, so please sit comfortably, finding in your posture that ease and alertness. And please connect first with your chosen anchor. Could be body posture, could be sounds, could be breath. I'm just settling in this comfortable relationship to stabilize the attention.

And now letting go, deliberately letting go of your connection to the anchor. And just looking with a kind of fresh and interested curiosity, where is the attention going to land next? Noticing where it lands in terms of the categories we've been working with: sensation, sound, mood, emotion, thought, feeling tone, intention. And then the next new moment, where is the attention landing? Being mindful of that.

You're not forcing anything or any direction in the meditation, but just a sense of resting with an openness to all the sense appearances. You've learned to work with each type over the sequence of instructions over days. And this is in a way putting them all together in this open, choiceless way of being mindful.

You might find it helpful to sustain the moment-to-moment noticing by using the noting technique. Just using a short word to identify where the attention is landing in each new moment. Might sound something like: "In. Hearing. Thinking. Sitting. Touching. Out. Hearing." Maybe make a note every two to three seconds just to remind yourself what the experience is.

Remember that from time to time what may be apparent is the mood or state of mind.

So noting that as well. Wanting. Calm. Sadness.

If you ever start to feel lost or confused about what to pay attention to, then just return the attention to the anchor for a while. Let it stabilize again with that familiar experience. And when you feel steady again, let go of the anchor and open again to choiceless attention. What's happening now? Keeping the attention open with interest to the whole range of experience.

I think this particular approach to meditation, this choiceless approach, is kind of the genius of Mahasi Sayadaw because it makes so clear that everything in our experience can be the subject for mindfulness. Nothing can be an obstruction because everything that happens we can relate to as a new focus for our attention and for mindfulness.

Just one word about continuing this practice. If you find it helpful, no one is obliged to practice in this way. Some people have a good relationship with an anchor and want to keep that as a preference or focus. But if you'd like to practice in this open way, what I'd recommend is recognizing that part of the art is learning when to open up and be in this easy, unforced way with everything. The lack of single focus sometimes leads more easily to spacing out, however. If you notice you're spacing out, then it's a good time to come back to the anchor, recollect the attention, and when you feel you've stabilized again, then open up once more.

So the art is moving between when it's skillful to have a more settled focus and when to open to the choiceless field. This fluid movement becomes part of the practice itself—developing the wisdom to know when to gather and when to release, when to focus and when to open.

CHAPTER 156

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) and their relationship to the doctrine of not-self (anattā). He introduces the five components that make up human experience: material form (rūpa), feeling tone (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa), explaining how each can be observed in direct meditation experience.

Drawing from the Anattalakkhana Sutta and other early teachings, Armstrong demonstrates how our sense of self emerges not from any inherent essence, but from clinging to these aggregates. He explores the "faulty logic of I" - how language creates confusion about selfhood - and shows how investigation of the aggregates reveals their impermanent, conditioned nature. Through personal reflection on his sister's death, he illustrates how understanding the aggregates brings freedom from the fear and separation that arise from belief in a solid self.

The talk emphasizes that realizing anattā is not merely intellectual but requires meditative insight developed through sustained practice. Armstrong concludes by connecting the wisdom of not-self with the natural arising of love and compassion, showing how these two aspects of awakening support each other in the path toward liberation.

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

The subject of tonight's talk is the five aggregates are not self. I'll be exploring two aspects: first, the formula or model of the five aggregates used to describe our human experience, which I'll introduce and explain; and second, how this relates to the teaching on not-self, one of the central and most powerful teachings that the Buddha offered, unique in his time.

This teaching on not-self—anatta in Pali—is often paired with impermanence and unsatisfactoriness as the three characteristics of all existent things, summed up as anicca, dukkha, and anatta. This is one of the central pointings in the Buddha's teachings, and a place where, as we come to understand it, we can experience a great degree of freedom even short of enlightenment. I believe this is one of the most liberating insights available to us before full awakening.

But it's also one of the hardest to understand. So don't worry if it doesn't all make sense tonight. I simply want to introduce some of the concepts. This is a theme that we need to live with over years of dharma practice and meditation. It cannot be understood purely on a conceptual or intellectual level. The understanding of it relies on meditative insight, which in turn relies on the stilling of the mind and a strong degree of presence and concentration—qualities you are all developing in this long retreat.

This understanding needs a combination of inquiry and reflection, which are rational activities, and the meditative balance and stability that can begin to see the truth of what the Buddha was pointing toward. This is something we investigate over time, and it deepens in understanding gradually. If these concepts are new to you, don't try to think them through too hard tonight. Rather, let the general approach sink in, as it will take time to integrate.

Also notice if there's any resistance to hearing this, because you may have a little attachment to the self—we all might. This teaching undermines one of the central building blocks of our psychology, so notice if there's a little unease with that. That's perfectly natural.

Very interestingly, the Buddha said that the sense of self we carry, which reveals itself constantly through words like "I," "me," and "mine," is not intrinsic to the experience of being human. Rather, it is something generated out of our beliefs and views. An interesting question to explore through this talk is: What is our experience when the sense of self is being generated? What does that feel like? And what is the experience we have when the sense of self isn't being generated? The Buddha said these are very different human experiences.

Child psychologists tell us that when an infant comes into the world, it has a very expansive sense of the world, or you could say self. The division between self and world is not so strong; the infant experiences things through an oceanic sense of connectedness. Then as we grow up—even in childhood years and certainly by teens and early adulthood—that oceanic sense has dwindled down and the sense of self has become quite narrow.

This restriction in our sense of what's happening brings suffering with it—inevitable suffering. As we crystallize out of this whole field of experience, we crystallize a sense of what we are and what we're not. That leads to a duality with the world. Creating self also creates other. Once we create a self and differentiate it from what we call "other," then we become separated and isolated. That separation is one of the deep sources of our unhappiness when we believe it thoroughly.

This crystallization into self also leads to a deep-seated anxiety, sometimes a strong fear, because of the imminence of death. We see this self that we have cherished and been concerned about, protected and fed and defended, coming to an end at some future date. As long as we believe in the reality of that self, death is going to be a fearful experience in one way or another. So one possible development and freedom in understanding not-self is becoming much more comfortable with the possibility of death and removing some of the fear that we normally carry.

The self tends to have many concerns. When we dwell on those concerns, we become more separated, more isolated, and in general, more fretful and worried. This strong belief in the self leads us into different kinds of suffering and provides, I would say, the root of our basic fearfulness in approaching life.

There's a wonderful Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj whose teachings were collected in a book called I Am That, which I highly recommend. He was a Vedanta teacher who died in the 1990s and taught in Bombay. He made this comment (and in this context, "yoga" is simply a generic term for spiritual discipline—he taught in the Vedanta tradition, but in his view, Buddhism would be considered one of the yogas): "All yogas have only one aim, that is to save you from the calamity of separate existence."

This is where we find ourselves now. We are all embroiled in the calamity of separate existence. The teachings of the Buddha and the possibility of liberation show us the way out of that calamity of belief in separate existence.

When we open to what is beyond self, we find ourselves opening to a way of being that's much wider, broader, more inclusive, open, kind, generous, thoughtful, and loving. This is the promise of opening up the restricted sense of self that we have built ourselves into—something not intrinsic to our human nature.

For most of us, this sense of self is the center that everything revolves around. You can simply notice how often the terms "I," "me," "my," and "mine" come into your thinking. Even on retreat when we're not relating much to others, these make up the content of our drifting thoughts much of the time.

So the self becomes the focus of our thoughts, our speech, our actions, our decisions, our emotions, values, directions, purpose. It's like the North Star that everything else revolves around in our world when we're not seeing through it. It seems, to use a phrase, self-evident.

But have you ever found it? This is quite curious, isn't it? It seems like the most obvious fact of our existence. Have you ever located it? William James, the philosopher, said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." That was good. That's a good start. Most of us can't locate it anywhere.

The Dalai Lama said that when you think something is real but you can't find it, that's a sign of delusion. So this belief in self is one of the most fundamental delusions that we have. In the texts it's compared to walking down a path in the woods and seeing something brown coiled up and believing it's a snake. One jumps back in alarm in the belief that it's a snake. But as you get closer and look at it more precisely, you see it's just a coil of rope.

So the understanding about self is like that. When we're burdened with the belief that the self is something real, we live with fear and anxiety, separation and isolation. When we examine it more closely and those beliefs dissolve, we can relax much more into the flow of life as a process of nature. When our perception is refined and corrected, we see that there's just the process of nature going on.

We can look at our language to see some of the confusion we have around this sense of "I." We've grown up as children in this culture, and the words get tossed around a lot—I, me, mine—but without real clarity about what they're pointing to. So as children, we absorb the language of the culture, and it's led us to believe that there's something real and precise being pointed to with these words. This isn't necessarily the case, and I would call this confusion the faulty logic of "I." Things aren't necessarily the way they seem.

Let me ask some questions that might draw some of this out. Suppose I were to ask how old you are. This is a really simple one to answer. So I'd say I'm 68. In saying "I'm 68," which doesn't strike an odd note for any of us, the question is: what is 68? Are my thoughts 68? Is my mood 68? Is my hair 68? No, generally the body is 68, right? It came out of the womb 68 years ago. So here we're equating "I" with the body. We're basically saying "I'm 68," meaning the body's 68, so we're saying I am the body.

Now let me ask you: what color are your eyes? So I'd say my eyes are brown. Now the "I" is not being equated with the eyes, but the "I" is being equated with the owner of the eyes. They're my eyes. That implies that the "I" is something that stands apart from the body and possesses it. So which are you really? Are you the body or are you the owner of the body? Can you be both? Does that really make sense? How many selves are you?

We can do the same thing with emotion. Sometimes we say, "I'm happy, I'm sad." Here we're equating the "I" with the emotion. I am happy. At other times we talk about my joys and sorrows. There we become the owner of the emotion. So are you the emotion? Are you the owner of it? Again, can you be both?

Or here's another one. This is what I felt for years to be most essentially who I am. I felt there was a little observer inside the head.

Behind my eyes and between my ears, there was a witnessing presence looking out at everything unfolding—seeing sights, hearing sounds, thinking thoughts, making choices. This felt like the real me. Let's call this the observer—the one at the center of everything, experiencing it all. Have you found that one?

How many of you have practiced Goenka-style body scanning? Quite a few. Have you spent considerable time investigating sensations and experiences in the head? Ever find a little person in there? That's what it feels like—as though the essence of who I am is this little being inside, looking out and experiencing everything. I never found one.

So that's the fifth way we conceive of "I," and there's another I'll mention later. Can all of these be true? Can all of these point to something that actually exists? The Buddha would say no, and he said this quite explicitly: "In whatever way one conceives of self, the truth is ever other than that."

This is worth remembering. However we conceive of self, the truth is always different from our conception. It's interesting that this verb "conceive" is closely related in Pali to the quality of conceit—māna—that Bonnie discussed the other night. So conceiving of self and the conceit she described are intimately connected. One way to understand māna is as the way we conceive that we are a self, that we are something particular.

One of my teachers put it even more bluntly: "Everything you think is wrong." That's quite a wake-up call—everything you think is wrong, especially regarding self-view and self-image. It reminds me of something I heard on talk radio. I don't listen to much talk radio—I think it's rather chaotic in this country—but here's an incisive observation: "The mind, often wrong, seldom in doubt."

We need to question these assumptions, particularly around this concept of self. Something deluded is happening here, and undoing this deception is one of the primary aspects of Buddhist meditation practice.

So how did the Buddha see? If we attune ourselves to his way of seeing and describing us, we can approach a more awakened understanding of what's actually occurring.

When you and I look around this hall, I'm guessing we mostly see persons—a person here, a person there. Around the hall we see persons. When the Buddha looked at someone, I don't think he primarily saw a person. I think he saw more precisely than that.

In the Visuddhimagga, a fifth-century text that compiled many of the meditation techniques and understandings current in Sri Lankan monasteries, the commentator monk Buddhaghosa offers an analogy. Though I'm uncomfortable with it as a longtime vegetarian who deeply cares about animals, it comes from the old text, so I'll share it. He said that when a butcher carves up a cow's carcass for meat, the butcher isn't thinking "cow, cow, cow." Being intimately familiar with anatomy, he thinks "rump, tenderloin, sirloin, ribs"—his understanding is more refined.

Similarly, when the Buddha saw us, I don't think he primarily saw a person. I think he perceived something more fundamental, more detailed. In the teachings, he described a person in one of two ways. The first is what Joseph mentioned a few mornings ago: the six sense bases. Remember Joseph saying something like "there are only ever six things happening"?

This comes from a discourse in the Saṃyutta Nikāya called the "Discourse on Totality." It asks: "Bhikkhus, what is the totality of things?" This is quite a bold statement. I don't know many Western philosophers who have made such a claim—certainly not Freud.

I don't think Marx said this. I don't think Einstein said this. But here's the Buddha: "Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of things. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality of things would not be speaking of something they knew about."

I love this because it's really simple, and it's really true, isn't it? When we look at our experience, that's all that's there—the sense base and the sense object. This also maps beautifully onto our meditation practice. Vipassana practice is concerned with mindfulness of these six objects as they arise and pass at the sense doors. So this is a good field map for meditators. The Buddha used this formula frequently when he talked about cutting through craving, because we generate desire for pleasant experience in each of these six modes of the senses.

But there's another format that the Buddha used just as often in his teachings, and that is the model of the five aggregates. It's another way to describe the totality of things, but it divides them up differently. And he used this teaching device to cut through wrong view, particularly the wrong view that concerns the belief in self. So that's why we're going to talk about this tonight—the five aggregates as a way of seeing through the self.

When we start to see through the model of the five aggregates, we see people the way the Buddha saw them. And that means we see them without the false overlay of self. And first, of course, we start to see ourself without that false overlay.

This sounds quite technical. You know, "aggregate" is a technical term, and as we get into the five, they may seem unfamiliar. But to me, this is not just an idle philosophical conversation. I got very interested in this scheme when one of my older sisters died. She was 51 at the time—I'm five years younger than she was. She'd been ill for a while, but she was very functional in her life, still raising children, and she was not anywhere near a life-threatening disease.

But one night at home, she came down with something very quickly. Consciousness was fading, she suffered cardiac arrest, and the medical technicians could not pull her through. So she basically died that night quite unexpectedly, with one of her sons in the house with her at the time.

I heard the news the next day, and it hit me very strongly because I'd been talking to her on the phone just a few days before. She was someone I was close with—we had a very good relationship. And she was somebody I enjoyed a lot. She had a big personality, a great sense of humor, a big laugh. She liked to have fun. She was passionate in both directions—she could also get upset about things. But when she was in the room, you knew it. So much vitality.

For that to have gone on for the 46 years that I'd known her and then come to such an abrupt stop was something I couldn't comprehend. She had been so full and so alive a few days earlier, and then she was just gone.

I'm sure most of you have had this experience with the puzzle, the real mystery of death. How can someone who is so alive all of a sudden just be gone? What has happened?

So I began investigating this as I lived with the grief that touched me for a while. There were a couple of months where I would go into grieving spaces and come out a little bit, then go back into darkness and come out a little bit, reflecting on the Dharma implications of this. The model I used to understand what had happened to her was the five aggregates. It helped me a great deal to understand as much as I could of the mystery of her death. And in doing that, it helped me come to much greater peace around her dying, but also around my own dying, because I came to understand how this being has been put together. I'll say more about that later in the talk.

The Pali word for the aggregates is khanda—a simple word.

that just means heap or bundle. You could talk about a khandha of twigs or branches or something like that. We translate it with the word aggregate because that's the way it's been used for a long time, but that sounds too technical to me. Aggregate sounds like road paving material, like what they're going to be doing out on Pleasant Street in hopefully a few days. Another way you could say it is components. There are five components that make us up. But even that sounds a little technical, so what I like is "kinds of stuff." There are these five kinds of stuff that make us up. And that's really how I take it. But I'll use the word aggregate because in Buddhism it's become very common.

So the five aggregates are material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. This is what makes up a being. I want to go through each one and talk about how we can find them and feel them in our direct experience.

Form—the Pali term is rupa—means all material form. All the matter that you see in the universe goes into this one aggregate. Our bodies, other bodies, the floor, the trees, the forest, the earth—this is all part of the material form aggregate. Not only that, but the sense objects that come from physical interactions are also part of material form. Sights, sounds, smells, tastes, and sensations are all part of that material form aggregate. You could say this is the physical world, including the physical sense objects in our experience. For example, that sound is in the realm of rupa, one of the physical sense objects that's part of rupa.

The second aggregate is feeling tone. You know this is vedanā. We covered it—I think Carol covered it in the meditation instructions a few days ago. This is the quality that every sense contact has of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. You'll remember that the feeling tone, as Carol described it, is a mental component because the same physical experience doesn't translate for everybody with the same degree of pleasantness or unpleasantness.

For example, beets. We had beets, I think it was yesterday at lunch. I saw a lot of people helping themselves very happily to the serving of beets. I didn't take any because I don't like beets. And now that my mother isn't around anymore, I don't have to eat them. Some people really love the flavor of beets. To me, they taste like dirt and it's not very pleasant. And I don't have to eat them anymore.

The feeling tone is a mental quality that gets projected onto the physical experience. In that way, as one teacher described, it's kind of like we feel our way into our experience of the thing. The feeling tone is mental, even though the object is physical. For instance, with the sound of the bell—generally, most people here would experience that as a pleasant tone, just in and of itself. But because it marks the end of the sitting, it's really a pleasant tone. That is generally felt as pleasant, but not everybody might.

The third aggregate is perception. Again, all the rest are going to be in the mental field because rupa has taken in the whole physical world. Perception is another feature of mind, and it refers to our ability to recognize objects and place them in a category that we've known previously. As you look around the room, quite automatically, the mind is putting things into categories of recognition. You will see woman, man, zafu, mat, floor, tree, statue, light, chair, and so on. This happens pretty automatically. You don't have to think about it a lot. But you recognize the things that are here because you've seen them before and you've put them in a category and then you remember that.

Perception is based on memory, on prior cognition. It's a re-cognition of something you've known before. We think it just happens automatically, but in fact we've learned to perceive. It happens without our thinking about it now, but it might not have happened that way. The neurologist Oliver Sacks tells a story of a patient that he was working with. The man's name was Virgil.

Virgil had lost his sight when he was very young, perhaps as a child. But as he grew up, surgical techniques were developed that could restore vision. So in early middle age, Virgil underwent surgery to regain his sight. Sacks was consulting with the surgeon, and the momentous occasion arrived when Virgil lay in his hospital bed, about to have the bandages removed from his eyes so he could see again.

Everyone expected this to be a moment of pure joy. They imagined Virgil would exclaim with delight at being able to see once more. But when the surgeon peeled back the bandages, something quite different happened. Let me read from Sacks' account of what occurred:

"No cry, 'I can see!' burst from Virgil's lips. He seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing at the surgeon who stood before him still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke, saying, 'Well?' did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face. Virgil told me later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, all meaningless, a blur. Then out of the blue came a voice that said, 'Well?' Then and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face, and indeed the face of his surgeon."

Because Virgil had lost his sight so young, he had never been able to wire his brain to process visual information and perceive the objects of sight. As Joseph mentioned, what's really happening in sight are just patches of form and color. You can see this more clearly if you close one eye—if you reduce the visual field to two dimensions, it becomes much clearer that patches of form and color are all that's actually there. But we've learned to recognize those patches as different objects. Virgil never had that learning.

By the time he was older, those neural circuits were much harder to establish. Virgil did learn, with considerable training, to recognize and perceive a number of things in his world, but there were many things he never learned to perceive fluently. He lived the rest of his life at a perceptual disadvantage.

This illustrates the nature of perception, and one of the things that's particularly challenging about it is that we don't always perceive accurately. The Buddha described these inaccuracies of seeing as distortions, both in perception and in view, calling them vipallāsas. Someone may give a talk on this later, but he taught that we tend to see things as permanent when they're not, to see things as offering lasting happiness when they can't, to see things as being a self when they're not, and to see things as beautiful when they're actually somewhat dangerous. These are distortions of perception that we gradually unlearn through meditation.

As an example of perception's limitations, consider when you have a sensation in your leg. If you immediately label it with the word "pain," that perception can hold you back from meeting that sensation freshly and exploring it without fear. If you explore it without fear, you might discover it's perfectly okay to experience. But as soon as we call something pain, we might hold back. Or we might not see things quite as they are if we perceive something and think we've understood it completely.

For instance, we see this bell, and because we're familiar with it, we normally think, "Oh, it's a bell"—and that's the end of it. But could this be a begging bowl for a well-appointed monk or nun? Certainly, that would work quite well. Could you see this turned upside down as a charming little hat on a statue of appropriate size? Yes, that might be rather nice. Could it be a flower pot? It would be expensive for a flower pot, but it would make a beautiful one.

We want to be able to look at things as they are without necessarily burdening them with conceptual overlays. Zen makes quite a lot of this point. You may know about the koans in Zen tradition. The Zen master will say, "What is this?" If you say it is a stick, I will hit you. If you say it is not a stick, I will hit you.

That's actually why I ended up in Vipassana—I figured if I went to Zen, I'd get hit a lot.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 7/12). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

So I came to the softer school.

There's a delightful story about this. In the late seventies, two really venerable masters were both in Cambridge at the same time, giving teachings. Some of their students knew one another, and when they discovered the other teacher was in town, they thought, "Let's bring these two enlightened masters together. We'll have this wonderful encounter where enlightened mind meets enlightened mind and recognizes itself—like an empty mirror looking into an empty mirror. And we'll all get enlightened too!"

So they brought together the Tibetan master Kalu Rinpoche and the Korean Zen master Seung Sahn. They invited them into a friend's home, offered them tea, and set out a platter of fruit. Both masters were sipping tea and conversing through translators.

Seung Sahn thought, "Okay, I'm going to check this fellow out." He picked up an orange from the fruit plate, held it toward Kalu Rinpoche, and asked in his good Zen master voice, "What is this?"

Kalu just sat there doing his beads, saying his mantra and moving through the mala, smiling a little, very peaceful. He didn't reply.

Seung Sahn wanted an answer, so he held it out again. "What is this?"

Kalu quietly turned to his translator, who then said to the group, "Rinpoche asks, 'Don't they have oranges in Korea?'"

Apparently nobody got enlightened that night.

It's a wonderful story about perception—you never quite know how it's going to turn out.

When you hear the sound of the bell, you normally recognize it as the bell ending a sitting, so you know it's time to get up. This perception happens automatically. That's recognition at work.

The fourth aggregate is called mental formations, sometimes called volitional formations to emphasize that intention is involved. I don't want to go into great detail tonight, but you'll recognize that intention is central to the Buddha's teaching. Based on Winnie's instruction and Sally's dharma talk from a couple nights ago, intentions are key to the formation of karma. The intentional aspect is important in the fourth aggregate, though we won't spend much time on that tonight.

Mental formations encompass thoughts, moods, emotions, and meditative states of mind. We've been discussing these extensively in the meditation instructions, so you're familiar with how to know them and practice with them.

When you hear the bell at the end of a sit, you may think, "Oh, the sitting's over." A feeling of ease may arise, followed by the thought, "Now I could sit forever"—you know, like a moment before the bell rings when you can't wait for it to end, and as soon as it rings, you think you could sit forever. These emotional or volitional formations that arise upon hearing the bell are mental formations. In Pali, the term is sankhara.

The fifth aggregate is fascinating. It's called consciousness—vijnana in Pali. We haven't explored it much during this retreat, but it's very interesting to investigate in your direct experience.

Consciousness means many different things in Western philosophy and psychology, but in Buddhism, the meaning is fairly simple. Consciousness is the faculty of mind that reveals, holds, receives—or best put, knows—sense objects. When you hear a sound, you're a conscious being, so the hearing takes place for you as sentient experience.

If the bell rang in the forest and nobody was around, would it make a sound? Depends how you define sound, right? The sound wave would be created, but if no being were there to receive it, there would be no conscious experience of hearing.

What we all have when the bell rings is a conscious experience of hearing. The sound is being known by our consciousness. Each of us receives it in consciousness.

Consciousness reveals the bare data of that mmm—before it knows it's a bell, before it knows it's A-sharp, before it even recognizes it as a sound. Consciousness knows that mmm and reveals it to us.

Consciousness is present in each moment. It has revealed the sound, revealed the feeling tone, revealed the perception that it's a bell, revealed the feeling of ease at the end of sitting, revealed the thought "Now I could sit forever." Consciousness is there with each of the other aggregates too.

Consciousness is this basic cognition happening all the time while we're awake. It's what marks a sentient being. Birds have consciousness.

Dogs have consciousness. Insects have consciousness. And humans have this kind of consciousness.

So these are the five aggregates that describe our human experience: form, feeling tone, perception, formations, and consciousness.

Something to explore—we won't do it right now, but for you to explore—is there anything in your experience that's outside this list of five kinds of stuff? Is there anything else going on? It's kind of important that you do that review to convince yourself that everything that's happening is in one of these five categories. But I'll leave you to do that.

And I'm just going to say, I think you'll find that it's complete. The Buddha thought it was complete. I think you'll find it's complete.

But why is this important? Because in our whole experience, there's only form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. There's nothing else. In particular, there's a kind of important noun that isn't on this list, and that is self. There's no I on this list. There's no me, there's no self. There's only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. That describes the whole thing.

So there is no one at the center to whom these are all happening. There's no owner of these kinds of stuff. There's no controller of these kinds of stuff. There are only these kinds of stuff.

And in fact, one of those versions of the self that we talked about—remember that the one who's sitting at the center in the head, looking out, seeing sights, hearing sounds, thinking thoughts—that is only an identification with consciousness. That's basically saying, I am the experiencer. I am the knower of all these things. Consciousness is doing the knowing. But we identify with that and say, oh, I'm the knower. I'm the observer. But it's just an identification with consciousness.

So there are only these five things. And what's the relationship to the human being?

Probably most of you can see the item I'm holding up is just a common pen. It's a ballpoint pen. Everybody can recognize that. It's a physical object. It's in the area of rupa. And your knowing it as a pen is simply a perception—it's a commonly agreed thing.

But I can take this pen apart. So as I take it apart, there's a tip, there's a cartridge, there's a spring, and there's a cap. Now I'm holding up these four parts. Is this a pen? It's not a pen anymore, is it?

To make a pen, I have to take these four parts and fit them together in a way that it can be used for writing something. Now that I put it back together, everybody says, oh yeah, now it's a pen.

Pen doesn't point to any one thing. The word pen is just a conventional designation that points to an assembly of certain parts put together in a certain way.

The word human being doesn't point to any one thing. It only points to a collection of aggregates that have been put together and assembled in a certain way that works.

Another way to say it is in the center of all the components of pen, there is no one thing that is a little pen. In the center of the collection of all the parts that is each of you, there is no one thing that is the essence of you. It's just an assemblage of parts that put together in this way work in the way that they work.

So to say human being is just a conventional designation. To say Guy or Sally or Winnie is just a conventional designation. When you look closely to what is being pointed at, it's just a collection of parts.

This was the part that was so freeing in investigating my sister's death. I had assumed that her personality, which is mostly these mental formations—you know, her sense of humor, her kindness, her irritability, her love for her family—I had assumed her personality and her form were one.

That was a mistaken perception. It was almost accidental that that personality and that body had come together. When I saw that, when I could separate them, I could see how when life ended, the body remained. Whatever the personality was, that had gone on. That was not there any longer. But the separation of those two components wasn't so startling anymore.

This let me see how my death was going to happen. What I took as my personality was going to get separated from this body. All these components that we have assembled here are conditioned, and we need to look in and see that conditioned nature and its limitations.

The Buddha addressed this directly in one of his discourses. You probably know his first discourse was the Four Noble Truths. One of the people he delivered it to—a group of five old friends who had practiced with him—got partially enlightened from that first discourse. Then a couple of weeks later, they all practiced together. The Buddha gave his second discourse, called "The Characteristic of Not-Self." When he delivered this second discourse, all five of them became fully enlightened.

This characteristic of not-self is significant. The first five arahants in the world after the Buddha were created from a discourse like this one—probably a little better than this one.

The Buddha was asking about the five aggregates. He said, "This body, is it permanent or impermanent?" Of course they knew. They said, "It's impermanent, venerable sir." So the Buddha said, "What is impermanent—is it going to give you lasting happiness, or at some point is it going to become unsatisfying?" They said, "At some point it becomes unsatisfying because it changes, venerable sir."

So the Buddha said, "Is what is impermanent, unsatisfactory, and subject to change fit to be regarded thus: 'This is mine. This I am. This is myself'?" You might remember this line from Bonnie's talk the other night, because "This I am" is the pointer to māna—conceiving oneself. In other words, why would you put yourself onto something that is going to change and is not going to give lasting happiness? That's not a good bet.

Then the Buddha went through the same series of questions with feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. At the end, the practitioners had all been led to investigate their body, their feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness, and realized that none of them were fit to be regarded as "This is mine. This I am. This is myself."

In that recognition, there was a great letting go. In that great letting go, their minds opened to the unconditioned and they were enlightened on the spot.

This is an important investigation because self is not just a neutral concept without associations. Self has assumptions embedded in it that constrict us. There are three or four really important assumptions we carry about the self that we haven't investigated.

One is that it has continuity. That's why in some way we feel like the same person now as the one who went through high school or the one who entered the door two weeks ago to join this retreat. We feel in some way it's the same me through all those different experiences of life. If we didn't feel that sense of continuity, we wouldn't worry about death, because death would be happening to somebody else. It wouldn't be happening to me. That would be a different person then. Oh, that person can deal with it—I don't have to worry about it. But we do worry about death because we assume this continuity of the self over time.

A second thing is we think there's just one self. When you ask about where your self is, how many different ones do you expect to come up with? It's really just one, isn't it? People who really think there are two or three or four—usually we call the medics for them, because that's considered not very healthy mentally.

Then also we feel our self should be unique. I'm unique in this whole created universe. There's only one like me.

You have your own unique self and I have my own unique self. But each of us is very different in that self piece. Yet when we examine this more closely, we begin to see the contradictions.

Seeing that the aggregates are all impermanent destroys the illusion of continuity—there is no real continuity to a human being. And as we investigate the aggregates, we'll see that clearly. Nagarjuna, who's the preeminent Buddhist philosopher of emptiness, said: "If mind and matter were me, I would come and go like them." So if you really think you are these aggregates, then you need to feel yourself arising and passing moment after moment. But we don't, because we assume that the I is ongoing.

You have to think that the self is unitary. So how can you be both the liver and compassion? How can you be the toenail and loving-kindness? Those are really different pieces. How can that be one self? It doesn't make sense.

And you have to assume that you're unique. Is your love really different from my love? Is your anger really different from your friend's anger? And what about consciousness? But we'll get to that in a moment.

So first of all, let's think about this body. We want to explore the aggregates and their conditioned nature.

First we'll think about this body and how it came to be this way. As Bonnie said in her talk the other night, we can have definite mana about our appearance. We can have pride about our appearance or we can be embarrassed about our appearance. But when you think of it, did you have anything to do with your appearance?

Overall—okay, diet, exercise, health care, how you cut your hair—that makes a little bit of impact. But did you have anything to do with your overall appearance? How tall you are or how short, whether you're dark or fair, whether your shoulders are broad or narrow? Did you have a say in any of that? Did you choose by volition any of that?

Well, let's review how this thing got here. Your father's sperm met your mother's egg. They joined. The cells multiplied and specialized within the womb. Nine months later, something popped out into the world. It got milk and water and food and air. It grew, grew, grew, grew, grew. And then it's here today.

Did you have a choice in any of that? So why do we take so much responsibility for it? It's just a physical process. The whole thing was a physical process from the moment of conception until now. Our choice had nothing to do with the overall way we came out. And yet we take a lot of pride or embarrassment around it. It's just part of physical nature. The body is part of physical nature and it will follow the laws of physical nature.

One of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, said it like this: "This body came out of nature. It's part of nature. It never departed from nature and it belongs to nature. Give it back to nature. That will be a great relief for you."

You can also reflect on that with emotions. We've talked about how our emotions are part of the whole human package. For everyone who's not highly enlightened, we have the same range of emotions. We all feel at times the same happiness or sadness or joy or loneliness or anger, whatever. We all have that because it's all part of human nature.

And then consciousness, the fifth aggregate—that's just nature also. We all have this ability to know sense objects, and that's really all it is. All humans have this same type of knowing of the objects of the senses.

Sometimes we can identify with consciousness as the observer. But we can reflect on that and realize there's not really a little person behind that observing function.

Yet there's another way in dharma language we might identify with consciousness. We might say something like, "Okay, I get it. I'm not the body. I'm not the emotions. I'm not the thoughts. What I really am, my fundamental identity, is this vast awareness that it's all happening in." This vast awareness just always seems to be here. It includes all the comings and goings, but that's really me. The vast awareness—oh, that's what I am.

What's wrong with this view? First, the "I" is unnecessary. The vast awareness may be there, but there's no need to claim it. It's just part of nature. And the vast awareness is no different between me and you. So there's nothing unique or self-like about it. This identification doesn't stand up either.

So there's no place within the aggregates that the sense of self really stands up under investigation. We examine each one, and it's not found anywhere. So how does it come about? Because we keep having this sense.

Ananda was a cousin of the Buddha who became the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. He's one of the most sympathetic characters in the Pali Canon—a lovable, humble, devoted practitioner. When he was newly ordained, he relates this story. He had just ordained and a monk came up to him offering advice. This is the wisdom that this monk transmitted to Ananda: "Ananda, it is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging. And by clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness."

You can check this out in your meditation. Ask yourself: does the "I" ever arise on its own? Does it ever just go, "I"? Or does the "I" only arise in relation to other sense experience?

There's a pain in the knee. All of a sudden we think, "I have a pain in my knee." We could just say "unpleasant sensation." But if we get a little worried, and out of that worry we grasp the pain, look how soon the phrase will come: "I have a pain in my knee." The "I" and "my" are unnecessary, but the worry gives them potency. It gives them a charge.

Take a look when the sense of "I" arises and see if it hasn't come out of clinging to some kind of sense experience. This is what the Buddha referred to as I-making and mine-making. The Pali words are ahankara and mamankara. We construct the sense of "I" over and over by grabbing hold of experience at one of the five aggregates, or you could say one of the six senses. If we don't grab hold, no "I" arises. No sense of self arises.

Start to pay attention to this in your meditation. When is there the fixation and grabbing hold of a sense experience with the attendant feeling of "I" and "my"? And when is it that in your meditation you're not grabbing hold of anything? What's that like?

What is it like when you're grabbing hold and self is being born? And what's it like when there's just a spacious, open, non-grasping attention and the self isn't being formed? What do those two feel like?

Explore that, investigate, and tell me where you'd rather meditate from. I think you'll find the experience without "I" to be much more easeful, peaceful, open, spacious, balanced, equanimous. Start to investigate and see what it feels like.

The seeing into not-self is not a cold, intellectual, academic exercise. It is to remove the excessive self-concern that we generate when we feel the tight constriction of self.

When we remove that excessive self-concern, the heart can open easily into love and compassion. This is why we investigate self—to discover that open space where love and compassion can flow very easily.

These two experiences, the absence of self—sometimes described as the emptiness of self—and the movement into love and compassion, support one another. They need one another. One naturally flows into the other.

This understanding brings us to a beautiful quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj that captures this perfectly: "Love tells me I am everything. Wisdom tells me I am nothing. Between these two poles, my life flows."

Let loving kindness carry you into a deep connection with all of life, and let Vipassana carry you into the wisdom of not being anything particular at all.

So let's just sit for a minute.

Love tells me I'm everything. Wisdom tells me I'm nothing.

CHAPTER 157

The Power of Mettā

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the transformative power of mettā (loving-kindness) practice within the Vipassana tradition. Drawing on the Dhammapada and teachings on the brahmavihāras, he outlines five essential developments that arise from mettā practice: cultivating a responsive heart that learns to care, purifying the mind by bringing hindrances to awareness, developing samādhi through unified attention, connecting us to all sentient beings through recognition of our shared wish for happiness, and generating profound contentment. Armstrong skillfully addresses common obstacles in mettā practice, explaining how apparent hindrances like self-judgment or anger are actually part of the purification process. He demonstrates how mettā serves as the foundation for all four brahmavihāras - with compassion arising when the open heart meets suffering, sympathetic joy when it meets happiness, and upekkhā providing balance for all three. The talk weaves together inspiring examples from figures like the Dalai Lama, Nelson Mandela, and Dīpā Mā, showing how this 'basic human warmth' can transform both individual practice and our relationships with others. Armstrong emphasizes that while Vipassana reveals the emptiness of phenomena, mettā fills that space with warmth, creating what one teacher called 'empty, empty, happy, happy' - the perfect fusion of wisdom and love.

The talk tonight is on the power of loving kindness.

I'll start with a quote by Rumi, who is kind of the poet laureate of the Vipassana lineage, so a suitable opening. He said, "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." This spoke to me deeply.

When I was in my twenties, I had many openings and considerable access to love. It came through connections to people, to nature, to music, and to art. Those experiences were very meaningful and satisfying for me, but what they weren't was stable. They seemed to come and go with no logic that I could see. I didn't know what the conditions were that led to that availability, or what conditions made them unavailable. That was a significant part of my motivation for entering Dharma practice—I wanted to understand how to have love be a more frequent part of my life.

Of course, I found out what probably many of you realize already: the key to any kind of stability in loving kindness or mettā is the wisdom of non-clinging. The process of clinging or selfing blocks the opening to love, while letting go into non-clinging opens the channels to love. In addition, our lineage has a very powerful practice that inclines the mind in this direction—the practice of loving kindness itself.

I'm very grateful that this exists within our tradition. One of the beautiful things about the tools that the Buddha offered is that we have the power to shape our heart and mind in almost any wholesome direction that we choose. We can direct it toward wisdom, toward equanimity, toward joy, toward compassion. We can direct it to love using specific practices and specific tools that the Buddha offered.

Within our tradition, the practice of loving kindness is the primary way to develop this openness to love in all its wholesome forms. There's much that goes on with the practice of loving kindness in addition to just the appearance of the quality of mettā, and that's what I want to explore tonight—the benefits and powers that are implicit within the practice of loving kindness.

There are five particular developments I want to discuss this evening. First, the practice of mettā makes the heart more responsive. It trains us to care, and in doing that, makes us respond to and feel, with an empathetic attitude, the happiness or suffering or welfare of the beings that we come into contact with.

Second, it purifies the heart. That is, it cleans it up, scrubs it—sometimes with quite a stiff brush—but it's a very powerful agent for the purification process.

Third, mettā practice is an excellent avenue to concentration. It's described in the Visuddhimagga, that fifth-century text compiling many techniques of the time, primarily for its benefits in developing concentration or samādhi.

Fourth, it connects us to life. It connects us to the whole breadth of what lives, and so in that way makes our practice more inclusive. It teaches us our relatedness to all sentient beings and gives us a way to bring all sentient beings really alive in our meditation.

Finally, the practice of mettā brings a lot of happiness. It's one of the most direct routes to happiness that I know of.

Let me talk about each of these five developments in detail, beginning with how the practice makes the heart more responsive. This is perhaps the most obvious thing that happens as a result. What we're really doing in our formal mettā practice is training ourselves in how to care. We learn how to care about our own well-being and we learn how to care about the well-being of any other being that we direct the loving kindness to. This is a training in heart connection.

The very phrases of mettā point us to caring about people's safety, happiness, health, and ease in life. It's easy to go through our days meeting people as they come and go without having to look very deeply into their experience. But using the phrases of loving kindness, we start inquiring: How are you? How are you doing? These are the areas that make up happiness—how are you doing in those areas? This becomes an important training in taking beings in.

In our lineage, Vipassana is the primary practice. We often say that we do the loving kindness in the context of the Vipassana practice and as a support for it. The wisdom practice is to see things as they are, and out of that seeing comes an unburdening of the heart with greater freedom.

And out of that unburdened heart, love and compassion flow more easily, flow more naturally.

In my observation, some people have a temperament such that just from Vipassana practice, a big heart opening takes place. As their personality inclines to the emotional side or to the loving side, just the freedom that opens through Vipassana allows that loving kindness to come through.

But with some other personalities, the Vipassana practice removes a lot of obstacles, but it doesn't so strongly accelerate the opening of the heart. For myself, my upbringing and temperament were such that I was probably on the cerebral end of the spectrum. I was not terribly emotional as a young person growing up. And so for me, the introduction of the Brahmavihara practices created a wonderful avenue to really bring the development of the heart to the forefront.

There was a period of time in my practice when I did a lot of Brahma Vihara practice. I would come here to the three-month course every year. I would sit for six weeks, and I would do Brahma Viharas—metta, or compassion, or sometimes all four Brahma Viharas. That brought beautiful qualities to be more accessible in my life, in my practice, and in my relationships.

It's not necessary that everyone do metta practice. It's not necessary that all Vipassana practitioners do metta practice. Usually within a group of 100 yogis, there's a very solid club called the I Hate Metta Club. So if you're part of that, that's okay too. You don't have to run toward the allure of love. But if you want to, here's the path. And it really works.

I was sitting in a retreat with a Tibetan teacher, and you may know that often at the end of retreats, they give heart advice to their students as parting instructions. So this teacher said, "As you're going back into the world, I suggest that as you take the teachings back into the world, let people know how the teachings are manifesting in your life. You're a representative of the Dharma as you go back into your life. The way you carry yourself and conduct yourself will express to people what's going on with your Buddhist practice."

He said, "I have three pieces of advice. When you go back, be natural. Just be a natural, easy person. Don't put on spiritual airs and try to be precious about the fact that you're a meditator. Just be a natural down-to-earth person. The second is, be wise. When you go back into the world, be careful with your choices. Be careful with your conduct. Don't do things that are going to be really upsetting to other people. Don't harm people. Take care with your interactions and your relationships. And the third thing: be juicy."

Juice—this is a technical Buddhist term. And it includes qualities like love, reverence, joy, compassion, faith, humility, devotion, humor, awe, wonder. "Go back and manifest this juicy heart quality, and that will be an immediate way of transmitting to people the benefits of your practice." So be natural, wise, and juicy. That was the instruction.

These qualities not only communicate to other people, they make our life so much sweeter. As these qualities come alive in us, they bring forth the beautiful emotional side that is in our human potential. Life becomes so much richer on account of them. And they also touch others.

I appreciated this comment from Alice Walker, the author, who said, "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness." So as we go back into the world, let's manifest that good-heartedness to the people that we come in contact with.

We have four specific ways of development through the Brahma Viharas. In our lineage, metta is the foundation for the other three. There's loving kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity. Metta is the foundation because with metta, what we do is develop the heart that is open and caring. That's the foundation for everything in the Brahmavihara realm.

When that open heart looks on someone who's suffering, the natural movement is to compassion. That's naturally what comes through when the open heart looks on suffering. When that open heart looks on someone who's happy, what naturally comes through is sympathetic joy—a happiness in the other's happiness.

And when that open heart can just rest in the center of things, the way it expresses itself is through the balance of equanimity.

So all four of these states are intimately related. And I love the symmetry here. With metta as the foundation, suffering gives rise to compassion, happiness gives rise to sympathetic joy. There's a beautiful symmetry in that. And then equanimity, you could say, is the support for all three. Because if equanimity is not present, the mind tips out of the balance of the brahmavihara into an unwholesome state—either the near enemy or far enemy.

If you read dharma that comes out of a Mahayana lineage, Zen or Tibetan, they will usually talk about compassion as being primary among the brahmaviharas. Tibetan Buddhism definitely has the same four brahmaviharas as our lineage, but they tend to emphasize compassion as the foundation. And this is beautiful in a way, because compassion really relates to the heart of the dharma as expressed in the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths are all about suffering and its end. And so the brahmaviharas can be focused on suffering and, through practice, its end.

But you don't need to argue with the Tibetans about this. It's not that metta and compassion are so very different. We see metta as a foundation; compassion is just what comes through when it sees suffering. So they're very closely allied. And whichever one you regard as primary works just fine.

The Dalai Lama defined compassion as "basic human warmth." And that's what our definition of metta could be also—basic human warmth. This is the stance of the caring heart.

Now sometimes from a vipassana perspective, people have a philosophical doubt about metta practice. Some people don't want to get too close because they don't quite trust it. Vipassana is so elegant—just be with what is. It's kind of impeccable, right? Who could argue with just being with what is? And in a deep way, we're taking our refuge in reality. The dharma means the truth. Our refuge is in the truth of things the way they are. That's very beautiful.

And so from this point of view, metta can seem a little suspicious. It can look contrived, sound too much like a Hallmark card, be a little sentimental, or have a feeling that it's somehow fake.

But even the faking has a good quality to it. As Carol Wilson likes to say, "Fake metta is a lot better than real aversion."

With the brahmavihara practices, we incline the mind in a certain direction, and then slowly the natural quality is evoked by that inclining. It becomes very unfabricated, very natural, very unforced.

And then other people complain that metta is deluded. You know, you say, "May I be happy," but there is no I—we know this from vipassana practice. There's no I. Or you say, "May you be happy," but happiness is impermanent. Why should I wish for something that's impermanent?

So for all you vipassana practitioners who have this view, I want to offer a different meta-phrase for you. The phrase goes something like this: "In this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena, conventionally designated as Sally, may the mind state of happiness arise ever more frequently."

I think this would satisfy even the Abhidhamma purists in the group. So you could say that phrase in your metta if you like, or you could simply say, "May Sally be happy." You can choose.

But truth to tell, when I say, "May Sally be happy," I understand that other phrase. My understanding is that she's empty of a self and happiness will always come and go. But we understand that, and we can still say, "May Sally be happy."

And it's so moving, I find, when I meet somebody who's developed the heart to a strong degree. I often think about the Dalai Lama in this regard. He will say to large groups, "My religion is kindness." And I think he means this in a very profound way: My religion is kindness.

In that famous interview, the Dalai Lama's responses revealed something profound about a mind cultivated in loving-kindness. When Oprah asked if he'd ever had to forgive himself for anything, he replied simply: "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah pressed, clearly incredulous.

"My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable," he admitted. "Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

The awe in Oprah's voice was palpable as she reflected: "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet, service to Buddhism, service to humanity," he replied, "I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators—even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind—I don't lag too far behind."

What a beautiful mind and heart. And it only took him seventeen lifetimes to get there, so we still have a way to go. We might catch up.

Someone like the Dalai Lama reminds us of our nature and our potential. This quality of love is not something fabricated through practice—it's something natural in us. We draw it out and strengthen it over time.

I think about one of the most loving people I've known: my grandmother. She was born in the countryside of North Carolina in 1890, and she had one of the most loving hearts I've ever encountered, with no formal Buddhist training whatsoever. She was just a naturally warm, kind, loving being. When we touch someone like that, we realize: oh, that's my possibility too. That's my potential.

The next of the powers of loving-kindness is purification. This purification begins from the intention that we put into our metta practice. When you express a phrase like "may you be safe" or "may you be happy," you're expressing an intention. Intention is at the heart of karma and has powerful impact in our hearts, minds, and eventually our lives. So we're working directly with a very wholesome intention as the seed of metta practice.

We reiterate this wish again and again—in different forms, the basic message of "I hope you're well and I hope you're happy." This creates an interesting situation because we're wishing someone else happiness, but we can't control whether they experience it or not. And for our metta practice, whether they do or not isn't really the point.

We're not wishing this to make that outcome happen, because we can't. If we could, we would, but that's beyond our power. We're wishing it as a way of strengthening this wholesome seed—the intention of caring. It's the repetition of that moment after moment that grows the feeling of metta in us.

Just as in vipassana practice we have the moment-by-moment intention to pay attention to the present moment, in metta our intention is to express that wish of caring. That's what we're doing time after time.

The metta practice doesn't work like a mantra practice. It's not enough to just say the phrase mechanically.

The more meaning you put into saying the phrase, that's what will give it the power. So we want to mean the phrase as we say it. That's where the sincere caring comes in.

And then you don't have to worry if it doesn't feel like anything's happening yet in metta. Sometimes people get impatient. "I've been saying the metta for five minutes and I'm not overcome by unconditional love." Be patient with it.

What the intention is doing—the intention is a karmic seed. We're planting the seed, but we can't make the plant grow. Just like if you're a gardener, you can plant a tomato seed, but you can't tell the plant when to push up out of the soil and start bearing fruit. All you can do is put it in the ground, water it, give it sunshine, give it fertilizer, and trust nature to do the rest.

So that's what's happening with our metta practice. Each of these intentions is a little seed. We water them with our care and our sincerity, but we trust nature, we trust the Dharma to grow it up in its own time. So sometimes as you're planting the seeds, it might feel mechanical, it might feel repetitive, the feeling may be dry. Don't worry about that. You're just planting seeds and the fruit will come in its own time.

The Buddha said it this way in the Dhammapada: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness saying this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." Just one drop at a time, and those seeds will grow.

With the Brahmavihara practices, we're instructed to start where it's easy. And in loving kindness, this is considered to be oneself. But as you may have found out, metta for oneself is not always the easiest to do. Sometimes the feelings are just not as strong toward oneself as toward a benefactor or friend. That's quite natural.

And then also as we do the metta for ourself, we may come up against obstacles that tell us, "Oh, you're not really worthy of being loved. You're not really worthy of being cared for." And sometimes memories will come up of things that we've done that were unskillful or ways that we've been hurt or harmed. And it's almost like the metta intention starts to show us ways that we can't really be loved or loving.

Sometimes when that happens, we might think, "Oh, I'm doing it wrong," or "I can't do it, I'm not a good metta practitioner," but that's not the right understanding. These feelings that come up—whether they're guilt or remorse or self-judgment or blame or even self-hatred—may be in there already and the metta is bringing them to the surface. That's part of the power of it.

It's as though the metta intention is this very strong positive pole that we run up near our heart. And what it does, it's kind of like a magnet. It brings to the surface everything that has the opposite charge. So it can bring up anger, guilt, blame, resentment, and so forth, but that's part of its power. Because when those things come into awareness, then we can work with them. If they're just hidden and we don't feel them directly, we can't work with them. They can't be seen, they can't be understood, we can't become free from them. But when they're brought into the light of awareness, then they can be worked with and to some extent release our fixation on them.

So how to work when these qualities come up, as they are likely to in doing extended periods of loving kindness? The first thing is to recognize the hindrance that has appeared. This is a little bit like the practice of RAIN. We want to recognize what's present. So anger, resentment, hurt, blame, self-judgment—just know what's there.

If it's fairly light, keep repeating the metta phrases and keep saying the metta intention. Keep connecting with that intention of caring, maybe for yourself at that point. And let the hindrance be kind of in the background. And what's interesting about that is that the hindrance sort of gets enfolded into the metta energy. As you continue to incline the mind to caring, the hindrance—even if it's self-related, even if it's self-judgment—starts to be touched by the intention of caring. And that makes it much more bearable.

So we start to see that metta actually has different levels of intensity. The first level of intensity, I would say, is the quality of patience. And here, the Pali word is kanti. It's one of the paramis. And it doesn't quite mean what patience means in English, which is just waiting until the bad stuff's over.

You're waiting in line at a supermarket—when will it be my turn? Patience, as khanti, has more the sense of how can we stay in a balanced and open frame of mind when circumstances aren't really to our liking? Or even more, as it develops, how do you maintain a sweetness of mind in the face of unfavorable circumstances? This is really what the term khanti means and why it's one of the paramis.

So when a hindrance comes, the first sign of the metta being active is that we can simply be patient and endure the hindrance without being too upset by its presence. The metta is active if there's an attitude of patience with the hindrance.

The next level of development in the metta is a real spirit of acceptance. This is the A that we've talked about in RAIN—true acceptance and allowing of the presence of that difficulty. So it might be self-judgment, it might be guilt, it might be remorse, but we simply allow it to be there in all its fullness. We don't fight it. We don't resist it, we don't judge it, we don't say it ought to go away. When we can bring that spirit, the metta has grown up yet another level.

As we've talked about with difficult emotions, this movement into a real allowing—meaning non-resisting of the difficult emotion or the hindrance—is a really important step in finding freedom with it. It's the full acceptance of these difficult states that undercuts their conditioned power. So the move to acceptance is part of loving kindness.

Then the next level, and this is where people usually start looking for metta, there's a feeling of affection. You'll feel this most readily with people you're close to—friend, benefactor, and so forth. Or if you pick a neutral person, you can really fall in love with your neutral person. It's quite a delight. We haven't gotten to the neutral person yet in the instructions, but see what happens if you pick a neutral person who's on the retreat and practice for them steadily.

So this feeling of affection—that's the first sign that most people would recognize: oh, this is loving kindness. This is visible. This is felt here and now. And then the feeling of affection can become stronger. It can grow into a deep sense of love for the person or for yourself. And then even stronger into a quality of devotion that's almost like a passion as love is magnified—such a strong connection.

So these can all come out of allowing the hindrance to be in the background, and qualities of affection can develop even toward the hindrance. They become like an old friend.

If you can leave the hindrance in the background and still connect with the caring intention, that's the first suggestion. But sometimes the hindrance becomes so strong we can't really connect with that caring. If that happens, then you have two choices.

One is—and this is probably recommended because it stays within the Brahmavihara family—switch to compassion. And you say something like, "May I hold this difficulty with compassion?" So you drop the metta phrase and move to a compassion phrase. The classical compassion phrase is, "May I be free from this suffering?" You could try that one, that's fine. The one I use these days is, "May I hold this pain with compassion?" And try just saying it repetitively, just like you were doing a metta practice—fifteen minutes, twenty minutes—and see if it doesn't shift your relationship to that hindrance. Compassion is a very powerful way to hold a difficulty.

If it feels like compassion isn't quite fitting for you, doesn't feel quite appropriate, then switch to vipassana. And as you switch to vipassana, just let yourself open to the hindrance with mindfulness. Think about the sequence of RAIN—recognition, allowing, investigation, non-identification. And often just that gesture of openness, willingness to meet, application of mindfulness will let the hindrance just open a little bit and sometimes wash through. In which case, if it gets weaker, kind of passes through, you can just return to the metta phrases again.

So these are the three levels: hindrance in the background, continue with metta; switch to compassion; or move to vipassana and just relate mindfully with the hindrance that's there. One of these will usually bring some degree of greater ease with the hindrance that has appeared.

One other thing you can do is move to a person who's easier for you. If you've been doing metta for yourself, move to a benefactor or friend—take an easier person.

And then what this does, when we can even surround our hindrances with this loving-kindness energy, is it puts us together. You may have noticed that vipassana in looking at the six sense objects and the five aggregates is kind of taking us apart. We might say that it deconstructs the idea we have of what a self is. And in doing that, it takes us apart into these momentary arisings and passings that make up our sense-based experience.

What metta does is it introduces this unifying energy. Love unites.

And so metta introduces this unifying energy that holds all the different pieces together and sees them all as part of ourselves—acceptable parts of ourselves. It tends to end the psychological fragmentation and brings the being back together.

Another aspect of purification can come up when we work with the difficult person, which we'll get to in another week. I was doing one long period of metta practice here—a six-week metta retreat. Interestingly, my difficult person from the year before was also on that retreat.

So I was settled in and the metta was going well. I was feeling a lot of openness and joy and connection. Then I'd cross paths in the dining room with my difficult person. All of a sudden, all that love and connection would just be out the window. I'd start thinking about the way they treated me during this past year. How could they have done that? How could they have said that? And I'd start getting into angry complaining about the difficult person. I could spin out on that for like half an hour, thinking about the past and what had been difficult in this past year.

I thought, "How am I going to work with this?" I tried a lot of different things. Finally, somebody suggested I should send metta to the difficult person, but I didn't want to do it. I thought, "If I send metta to the difficult person, that's going to mean I have to like them. I don't really want to like them. I certainly don't want to love them." But I was desperate, so I tried it.

I would run into the difficult person, start complaining, the anger would start growing, and I would immediately turn to start doing the loving-kindness phrases for my difficult person. What was interesting is that when I did that, the anger went away. Then the thoughts calmed down and I could just get back into the rhythm of my loving-kindness practice. So basically it worked—much to my chagrin.

But what was most interesting was what I learned from that. I saw that the way my anger was forming—and I think this happens a lot with anger—there was an element in it of ill will. Ill will means we want the other person to suffer. Metta, which is goodwill, means we want the other person to be happy. So I saw that in my anger there was an element of wanting the other person to suffer.

When I could replace the ill will with goodwill, there was no grounds for the anger. All I had to do—I didn't have to like the person, I didn't have to love them, I didn't have to excuse their actions—all I had to do was wish that they'd be happy. If I could sincerely wish for their happiness, the ill will couldn't coexist with that. So it was a really interesting learning.

As I started to examine this ill will, something struck me about it. I acknowledged that I was wanting the other person to suffer, and that came as kind of a shock to me—to see that this was an integral piece of my anger. Wanting somebody else to suffer. Because that is very close to cruelty. Cruelty is enjoying someone else's suffering. Ill will is wanting someone else to suffer. And they're very close.

I could sort of be okay being angry at somebody, but when I looked closer, I could not accept that I could enjoy being cruel or accept being cruel to someone. And because ill will and cruelty are actually so closely related, I didn't feel good about generating ill will anymore.

So this was a real wake-up call for me to look more closely at my anger to see if there was within it the seed of wanting someone else to suffer.

The Buddha talked a lot about how to relate with people who have harmed us and for whom we might get angry quite easily or quite naturally. And he gave this piece of advice: "When someone speaks harshly to you, train like this. Train in this way. Our minds will remain unaffected and we will utter no evil words. We shall abide compassionate for their welfare with a mind of loving kindness without inner hate."

This is not so easy. But I think about some beautiful examples in the larger world who have struggled with big burdens. Nelson Mandela was imprisoned for twenty-seven years by various white regimes in South Africa. Finally, in 1990, the government began to realize that they might have a real problem on their hands if they continued to keep him in jail. So de Klerk, the president at that time, brought Mandela out of prison to meet with him and a few senior cabinet ministers to explore the possibility of releasing him.

But the main fear of the white government was that if they released Mandela and he became a popular leader in the country, he could incite so much anger in the black population—who had been oppressed and violated and harmed for so many years—that the whites were really afraid of the retribution.

So de Klerk and the ministers sat down with Mandela and basically put it to him: "If we let you out of prison, would you want to incite the population to violence against whites?"

Mandela was very clear in his answer. He said no. He said, "I would not at all try to do that. We have been observing you and we have seen in you what brutality and fear look like and what it does to you as people. And we do not want to live like that. So we are not going to engender that in the population if you release us."

And he didn't. It was one of the most beautiful demonstrations of the capacity for forgiveness that we've seen in our lifetimes. And that came out of a deep spiritual place. That was not just a political move.

Aung San Suu Kyi said something similar. She was released from house arrest after about seventeen years. It's interesting—she was under house arrest and she used the time to do a lot of meditation practice. We've heard stories because we had connections to some of the noted Burmese Sayadaws who went in to visit her and taught her while she was under house arrest for those seventeen years. She was doing serious practice during that time. And one important component was this practice of loving kindness.

So at the end of her years of imprisonment, she said, "When I compared notes with my colleagues in the democracy movement in Burma who have suffered long terms of imprisonment, we found that an enhanced appreciation of metta was a common experience. We had known and felt both the effects of loving kindness and the unwholesomeness of natures lacking in loving kindness." And she too has emerged from those years of imprisonment and mistreatment with a very generous attitude of healing the divisions within the country.

The third area of power of loving kindness is the realm of concentration. Bonnie talked about this factor the other night when she talked about the seven factors of awakening. It's a really important part of the Eightfold Path built on developments of mindfulness.

One way to understand concentration is that it's about the unification of mind. One of the synonyms for it, ekaggata, really means unification of mind. So in concentration, the mind comes together into the present moment. And when the mind becomes unified in the present moment, it acquires a strength and stability that it doesn't have when it's chasing after past and future. This unification of mind is a very powerful factor.

So we will use the loving-kindness practice as one way of teaching concentration. Often in a retreat like this, there will be several people who are doing exclusively loving kindness practice, partly as a way to develop the heart and partly as a way to develop concentration. We will teach it in long retreats as a way to develop concentration to the level of jhana. So loving kindness has that potential.

And when you think about it, it makes sense because there's a clear object that we keep coming back to, which is the phrase or phrases. We keep repeating them, and in that repetition the attention has a very clear point to collect around.

So in the beginning we see that the phrases are the primary object and the mind collects around that. As the mind gets more settled and the loving-kindness develops, we start to see there are actually up to three other objects that are going on in the metta practice.

One of them is the connection to the other person or yourself—the connection piece. And often we suggest that people bring up an image of the person you're directing the metta to, and the image becomes another focus for concentration.

We also want to tune into what's the mood or emotion that's coming as a result of the metta practice. And it can be a form of metta—patience, acceptance, affection, love, etc.—or it can be one of the hindrances that the metta practice is drawing out in its work of purification. So we look at the feeling that comes through as well.

And then I like to encourage people to have the metta be a really embodied experience. So to come back into the heart center regularly and feel whatever sensations are there at the center of the chest.

As the metta develops, we can have these four separate objects of concentration. And if you say a phrase and go through contact with all four of these objects, it gives a very clear path for concentration to develop.

What's so interesting about this is that love unifies the mind and concentration unifies the mind. So when we bring them both together, we get very strong forces of unity.

This was described in a really interesting way by a Russian Orthodox Saint who lived in the 19th century. His name was Theophan the Recluse. As far as I know, he didn't have contact with Buddhism or the practice of metta. He was a Christian contemplative. And yet, listen to how similar this is:

"For so long as the mind remains in the head, where thoughts jostle one another, it has no time to concentrate on one thing. But when attention descends into the heart, it attracts all the powers of the soul and body into one point there. The concentration is reflected in the heart by a special sensation that is the beginning of warmth. This sensation grows gradually stronger, firmer, and deeper.

"And so it comes about that whereas in the initial stages, the attention is kept in the heart by an effort of will, in due course, this attention by its own strength gives birth to warmth in the heart. This warmth then holds the attention without special effort. From this, the two go on supporting one another and must remain inseparable because dispersion of attention cools the warmth and diminishing warmth weakens attention."

Isn't that beautiful? The way the love and the concentration support one another in this meditation.

Sometimes you meet meditators, masters, who have an incredible power of manifesting this loving kindness. Dipa Ma is one of the most inspiring women teachers in our lineage. She had this capability. She had this kind of force of transmission. If you haven't read her biography, which I think is just titled "Dipa Ma," I really recommend it to you, especially to women practitioners, because I think for the women in our lineage, she is one of the strongest figures that you can relate to.

She came here in the late seventies, early eighties and taught some different courses. She was someone whom everyone felt when they were in her presence they had a very strong feeling of her love. Joseph and Sharon used to visit her at her small apartment in Calcutta and they would describe walking in there and just feeling that the whole space of her home was filled with the energy of love.

One time—I love this question—one time she was teaching at IMS and one of the meditators asked her, because she was an amazing being, the meditator asked her, "What's in your mind?"

And she said, "I only have three things in my mind: peace, concentration, and metta."

That's a beautiful mind.

Then connection. The practice of loving kindness opens our connection out to embrace all living beings, everything that lives. When we get to the loving kindness for all beings, this comes through really strongly because we find that whomever we direct the loving kindness toward, we discover they're a lot like us.

Every being that we bring to mind wants to be happy and doesn't want to suffer. You see this so clearly in all of us. You see it in the chipmunks who are running across the road and don't want to be struck by you or a car or anything. You see it in the birds who look for food as the days grow shorter. Every living being has the same most fundamental wish as we do: a wish to be happy and not to suffer.

And as you tune into beings, you can feel their vulnerability. You can feel how all of us are exposed to this changing set of circumstances that can be helpful or dangerous for us. So we start to feel like every being has got some piece of our heart alive in them. This heart that is looking for happiness, this heart that shrinks from pain and suffering—it's our connection to every being that lives.

What thought does is thought and concepts grow on distinctions. So we make a lot of distinctions, and they're valid ones, but we make a lot of distinctions based on gender, gender identification, age, race, ethnicity, class, ability or lack of ability, culture, sexual orientation. These are real distinctions. And each one of them shapes our life in a certain way. And people with one set of these qualities will go through life with one set of experiences and people with another will go through life with a different set of experiences.

But sometimes because these distinctions come so easily to the conceptual mind, we lose sight of the fact that there's an underlying unity that is just as important. We're so used to dividing that we sometimes forget how strongly we're united underneath all that. And when we start to look at this human heart that we all share, we all have the same package of emotions and we're all vulnerable in very much the same ways.

And I start to feel that it's really—there's only one human heart. And it's been poured into all our different bodies and then goes through life subject to different conditions and experiences and gets shaped in different ways. But it's still the one human heart that is there in all of us. Metta brings this out as we hold people with this sense of care.

We see this deep sense of connection to everything that lives. Rumi had a teacher whose name was Shams, and he came from a town called Tabriz in that part of the world. Rumi wrote a lot of poetry. Shams did not leave much behind. But of the one poem that I've heard from Shams, it's quite beautiful, and I wanted to share it. This is from Shams of Tabriz:

"I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

There is a way of seeing that is deeper than all the distinctions that we can draw with our concepts. But it needs the spiritual eye to be open to see that underlying unity. And this is one of the things that metta reveals to us.

And finally, happiness. Metta leads to a lot of happiness. One of the things it does is overcome our sense of separation and isolation through this connection. Separation and isolation are very difficult for us to bear. They're a source of some deep unhappiness.

When I was doing a long period of meditation on my benefactor, and I'd picked someone who was wise and happy, I really felt that in that meditation, I was just soaking up their energy, their mind, their heart, day after day, hour after hour, by holding them in my loving kindness. So I really recommend picking a benefactor who has these qualities. It could be someone you've met, it could be a teacher you've known from a distance, like the Dalai Lama or Thich Nhat Hanh or Deepa Ma, someone you really feel inspired by. But the joy can really come as a transmission through them.

One teacher who came to Spirit Rock over a number of years was a Thai teacher named Ajahn Jumnian. Ajahn Jumnian had done a lot of loving-kindness practice and also a lot of vipassana practice. So what we say is vipassana reveals emptiness and loving-kindness fills it with warmth. You can feel this in your practice. The space grows from the vipassana and the metta can fill that space with warmth so that we bring this warm attention into our mindfulness with every object or person that we meet. This is the merging of mindfulness and loving-kindness.

Ajahn Jumnian didn't know a lot of words of English. He spoke Thai through a translator. But he knew a couple. And when people would ask him to sum up some of his teaching, he would go, "Empty, empty, happy, happy." That's the fusion of vipassana and metta. The emptiness of vipassana, the warmth of metta.

As those two start to come together and we feel it pervading our meditation, we feel it pervading our heart and mind, it provides a home that we can start to trust in and rest in. This gives the sense of relaxation and ease that we're looking for. We don't have to strain for something other because the peace and the warmth are right there together. And there's just a sense that if we just let go and feel what's in the heart, we're already home. We're already home and it will grow from there. So this is a way into our own trust in our own basic goodness. And it brings a lot of satisfaction, a lot of happiness.

Oprah had one more question for the Dalai Lama. And in his reply, I just want to remind us again that compassion and metta are more or less the same. It's different flavors, same thing. Her last question for the Dalai Lama was, "In my magazine, I do a column called What I Know for Sure. What do you know for sure, the one thing on which you have no doubt?"

The Dalai Lama did not hesitate. "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For happy life and happy world, there is no doubt."

Metta also.

Let's just sit for a minute. Compassion is the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world.

CHAPTER 158

The Five Aggregates Are Empty

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this profound Dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddhist teaching on suññatā (emptiness) as it relates to the five aggregates (pañcakkhandhā). Building on previous teachings about anattā (not-self), he illuminates two essential aspects of emptiness: the absence of an abiding self within the aggregates, and the fundamental insubstantiality of all phenomena.
> Drawing from key suttas including the Suñña Sutta and the Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta (SN 22.95) from the Saṃyutta Nikāya, Armstrong presents the Buddha's powerful similes—form is like a lump of foam, feeling like a water bubble, perception like a mirage, formations like a plantain trunk, and consciousness like a magician's illusion. He shares the moving story of Bāhiya, who attained full awakening through the Buddha's brief instruction: "In the seen, let there be just the seen." Personal experiences, including witnessing autopsies as a monk in Thailand, illustrate how direct investigation reveals the dreamlike, insubstantial nature of all experience.
>
> The talk demonstrates how understanding emptiness naturally gives rise to compassion rather than nihilism. When we see that nothing is solid enough to grasp, clinging loses its foothold and suffering cannot take root. Armstrong quotes the Visuddhimagga: "There is suffering, but no one who suffers. Empty phenomena roll on." This wisdom, embodied by the bodhisattva Kuan Yin, allows us to hold life's joys and sorrows with both tenderness and equanimity.

The subject of the talk tonight is the five aggregates are empty.

Two weeks ago I talked about the five aggregates being the components of experience that make us up: material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. In that talk we went into how none of these can be a ground for confirming a true self within the mind-body process. All there is is these five aggregates. There is no one to whom they belong. There is no one at the center that constitutes an essence of the aggregates. This was the teaching on not-self. The Pali word for that is anatta.

Tonight I want to look at the five aggregates in terms of their quality of being empty. Emptiness in the Buddhist tradition is known as sunyata. It's a very important term and has been for the 2500 years that Buddhism has been around. It has become central in every lineage of the Dharma, every practice lineage since the time of the Buddha.

In the talk tonight, I want to look at two aspects of the meaning of emptiness in relation to the aggregates. The first aspect is this absence of self—that within the five aggregates there is no abiding or continuing entity that can be called a center or self. This is put very succinctly in the Buddha's answer to a question from Ananda. Ananda, you remember, was his attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life, a very devoted, loyal, and kind person.

Ananda asked the Buddha, "The world is empty. The world is empty. In what way is the world empty?" And the Buddha said, "The world is empty because it is empty of a self and of what belongs to a self." In other words, the world is empty of "I" and it is empty of "mine." In this sense, anatta or not-self and sunyata or emptiness mean the same thing in this context of the world being empty of self.

I want to talk about this a little bit more. These words "I" and "mine" don't have an ultimate reference. They're conventionally useful, but they don't point to any single thing that endures. And yet we can see that, but the sense of "I" keeps coming back. It's very curious. We can see many times this absence of self, and yet we continue to be fooled by the sense when it comes, and we think, "Oh, it feels like it's there." So how does that happen?

This is a quote I mentioned last week, another from Ananda. Another monk told me when we were newly ordained, "It is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging." And by clinging to what does "I am" arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. In other words, the sense of "I am" arises when we hold on to one of the aggregates or to a sense object.

The Buddha put this another way, saying the same thing: "When there is form, by clinging to form, by adhering to form, one regards things thus: 'This is mine, this I am, this is myself.'" And then he repeats that for the other four aggregates. Basically, by grasping something, we give rise to the sense of self, either as "I" or as "mine."

But when this doesn't take place, this seeing of the absence of self can be completely liberating. There's a very nice story of a visitor named Bahiya. Bahiya was a sincere spiritual practitioner who lived in the south of India. He lived very simply. He had strong renunciation. He had many followers. And yet he was unsure whether he was fully enlightened or not. That might have been a clue, but he held it as a question: maybe I'm fully enlightened.

It so happened that one of these celestial beings, a deva, came down and told him, "Sorry, Bahiya, you are not fully enlightened, nor are you on the path to enlightenment." What a message. And so Bahiya said, "Well, do you know of anyone who is an Arahant?" The celestial being said, "Yes, there is one named Siddhartha Gautama, and he lives in the north of India, and he is teaching now, and he is a fully awakened Buddha."

Bahiya immediately resolved to go there and receive teaching. He traveled from the south to the north, a long distance, hundreds of miles, and caught up with the Buddha. He immediately went to seek him out.

And he found him when the Buddha was on alms round. The Buddha was walking slowly, mindfully through the city, and Bahiya came up to him and said, "Are you the one I have heard of called the Blessed One, Gautama Buddha?"

The Buddha acknowledged that he was, and Bahiya said, "Please, Venerable Sir, I've traveled a long distance to see you. Can you give me the teaching, your Dharma, in brief?"

The Buddha said, "No, Bahiya, this is not the right time. I'm on alms round and this is not a convenient time for me. Please come later."

But Bahiya wouldn't accept that. He said, "Venerable Sir, I so want to hear the teaching. Life is short. Who knows what might happen? You might die or I might die. Please give me the teaching in brief."

Again the Buddha declined: "No, Bahiya, this is not the right time. I am on alms round now."

Bahiya was persistent. He asked a third time: "Please, Venerable Sir, this is urgent. Who knows how long each of us might live?"

As often happens when the Buddha is requested a third time, he acceded. He said that he would teach Bahiya in brief. And this is the message that he gave him:

"Therefore, Bahiya, this is how you should train: In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

In other words, when we stop making "I" and "mine" through the medium of sense contact, suffering stops.

When he said this, Bahiya fully awakened. Bahiya was well prepared, and his mind just opened on that brief instruction. He fully realized what the Buddha was pointing to. Later, the Buddha referred to him as his disciple foremost in quickness of learning, quickness of understanding.

Bahiya withdrew, and the Buddha continued on his alms round. Later that afternoon, walking through a field, Bahiya came close to a cow who probably had a calf nearby. The cow attacked him and gored him, and he died on the spot. But the Buddha confirmed for all his disciples that Bahiya had fully awakened before he died, and therefore his journey was complete. That message of "who knows how long you may live or I may live" turned out to be very prophetic. But Bahiya realized.

This was the insight into not-self that completely freed Bahiya's mind. When there is no grasping after the objects of the senses, there is no creation of "I." And in that no creation of "I," suffering has no grounds to arise.

So this is the first meaning of emptiness within our tradition: the clear seeing that this mind-body process, as described by the aggregates, is empty of a self or what belongs to a self.

The second meaning of emptiness is around the notion of insubstantiality—that the aspects of our experience, our sense experience, described as the six kinds of sense objects or as the five aggregates, are not solid, not substantial.

I'll read a passage from one of the key discourses in the Pali Canon. This is from a volume called The Connected Discourses of the Buddha—in Pali, it's the Samyutta Nikaya. Bonnie thought I should ask: have you all read this book? At least to suggest that it's a good idea. But we'll read a little tonight.

There are not a huge number of suttas that point to this insubstantial nature, but it is clearly there in the Pali Canon. There is more emphasis on the aspect of not-self, but the teachings on the emptiness of phenomena are clearly present from the early days of the Buddhist teachings.

This is a sutta called "A Lump of Foam":

On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: "Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam."

You have to imagine that this is a frothy mixture of water and air that has been stirred up by the river. Sometimes we might think a lump of foam would be a block of styrofoam, but 2,500 years ago, that was not the case. This is a bunch of frothy bubbles carried along on the river.

"A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is, a bhikkhu inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?"

This is the first aggregate that he is talking about—material form. And he is saying, what substance could there be in form? It is like a mass of foam.

This is radical. Because we normally take the body and this physical world to be very solid. In granting them reality, we have also attributed solidity to them. And so the Buddha is saying that this very body and all the world that we see is just like a lump of foam. Could that be accurate? Could he really mean it? He is meaning it. And this is a very clear pointing to this nature of insubstantiality or emptiness of matter.

We know from twentieth-century quantum science that matter mostly consists of space. The amount of substance in the form simply of protons, neutrons, and electrons occupies a very small volume of all the matter that we see in the universe. It is overwhelmingly empty space. And yet the Buddha had this intuition, had this insight from his direct experience 2,500 years earlier.

How else can we see form as being like a mass of foam? A few years ago, I was teaching at Spirit Rock on our month-long retreat in February. In the middle of the dharma talk one evening, as I was talking, there came this loud cry from outside the meditation hall. It sounded like a baby wailing really loudly. Of course it was a little disturbing to hear that, so a couple of the staff members who were in the hall went out to see what was happening. Otherwise I continued with the talk and people continued listening.

When the talk ended we all went outside to see what had happened, and we found the staff members standing over the dead body of an adult deer, which was just laid out on the ground near one of the residence halls. One of the staff members reported that they had seen a couple of large dogs running away when they came out to check on what the sound was. It is not uncommon in the countryside where Spirit Rock is located that packs of dogs will attack a deer and kill it, but it had never happened on the Spirit Rock land before.

So there we were, a number of us—staff and teachers and some of the yogis—standing around this dead body of the deer. Of course it was very powerful and shocking. In the middle of a retreat, we did not really know what to do, but we knew to stand around and send metta to the deer, wherever its being might be at that point. So we did that for a while, formed a circle, sent metta to the deer.

After doing that, we went about our business, continuing with the retreat. The caretakers called the Marin Humane Society, who said, "Yes, we understand this happens in Woodacre from time to time. We'll come out tomorrow and pick the deer up. Please take it down near the entrance to the property, and we'll come by and pick it up." So the caretakers bundled up the deer and put it into a pickup and drove it down near the entrance and left the body there.

The Humane Society never came. They probably had more pressing things to do. So every day, as we continued to go and come from the retreat, we could observe the body. Interestingly, every day there was a bit less of the deer there to observe because overnight the different animals would come and start to pick it clean. Within about ten days, all that was left of the deer were the bones, the fur, the hooves. All the flesh had been picked completely clean by vultures, by raccoons, by insects—all kinds of scavengers that came.

It was just so shocking. Here was a body that had been complete ten days ago, and now it had completely disappeared.

Form was like a mass of foam. There and then gone. Gone into energy. Gone into food. Disappeared. So that was one way it was demonstrated—this body is like a mass of foam.

Another way comes out of dharma teaching. Some years ago, the Dalai Lama was giving teachings on the Heart Sutra at an outdoor amphitheater in Mountain View in the Bay Area, and a lot of us went. It was a beautiful May season. The teachings were over a few days, and we were spread out in this kind of natural amphitheater, Shoreline Amphitheater. The Dalai Lama was up on a stage up front with what must have been about a hundred monks and nuns from different Buddhist lineages. The Tibetans were on one side with their red robes, and the Theravadans were on another side with their brown and ochre robes. And then the Zen monks from Japan and Korea were there in their black and gray robes. So the whole stage was filled with this very respected monastic presence.

The Dalai Lama was perched on a throne so that everyone could see him better. And the backdrop was a big canvas painting—where the Grateful Dead would have had an array of hundreds of speakers, instead the Dalai Lama had a big painting of the Potala Palace in Lhasa in the days when he would have been living there, before the occupation. It was this very beautiful setting, and on the hillside were thousands of people, some in seats and others spread out on the grass. It felt actually like a Buddhist Woodstock—a kind of gathering of the tribes, with great energy.

So he gave these teachings on the Heart Sutra, which is all about emptiness, as you probably know. And he came to a section where he was explaining dukkha, unsatisfactoriness. He talked about the third type of dukkha, which I think Winnie probably talked about a little while ago. The third type is called sankhara dukkha, which is the unsatisfactoriness of formations.

The way he explained it was like this. He said, you know, we think impermanence means that something goes along for a while and exists as a kind of solid thing, and then it disappears—sort of the gross view you might have of a creature going along living, then dying, disappearing. But he said that's not the meaning of this third type of dukkha. The dukkha of formations is that things are always dissolving. Nothing exists as a solid thing from one moment to the next. When you look closely with the eyes of meditation, everything is dissolving in the area of the senses moment after moment after moment.

This is something that we can understand through our meditation practice—this unsatisfactoriness of formations, of all conditioned objects, all the sense objects. You can take a look at material form in your direct experience and see this unstable nature.

One of the places we might look first is in the body directly. I know a lot of you have seen this, sometimes many times. When you look closely at a body sensation, is it characterized by solidity or is it characterized by change? If you haven't explored, take these next days and explore. When you look closely at a body sensation, even if it's one of pressure or heaviness, you can see moment-to-moment variation in it—changes in intensity, changes of pulsation, changes of vibration. You'll feel that as you look closely at things. As we start to investigate this material form, the body from inside, there's nothing really solid that we can find and hold on to. It's all in a process of flux.

Then we look at the other aspects of material form—sounds, smells, tastes—even less substantial. Can you grasp a sound? When you're listening to music, can you stop it and grab a note? As soon as you perceive a note, it's already passed and the next note is there. Sound is also characterized by variation, by change in volume, in pitch. Sound is ungraspable. Smells and tastes around the meal table—can you lock onto that lasagna from a couple of days ago? Tastes are very ephemeral. Smells are hard to even catch in the first moment.

That's why this quote, again in the Samyutta: "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise one takes no delight in form."

Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling—we see it in the body, in sound, smell, and taste. The last of the senses that make up material form is sight, but it's the hardest to penetrate, to see the changing nature, so we'll come back to that one.

This discourse goes on. Form is like a mass of foam. And then the Buddha goes on to say that feeling tone is like an airy bubble—just a bubble in a stream, like when a raindrop falls in it. Plop, gone. Perception is like a mirage, just a vision in a desert somewhere. Formations are like the trunk of a plantain tree. Plantain is a variety of banana, and if you've ever watched a banana tree growing in the tropics, what you'll find is it only flowers or fruits once, and then it dies because the trunk is not solid. The trunk of a banana tree is just coils of green vegetation. There's no heartwood, there's nothing solid there. You uncoil it, and the tree is just soft. So formations are as empty, as insubstantial as the trunk of a banana tree.

These are the comparisons for the other aggregates. And as you explore, you can ask: Is feeling tone solid, something you can take hold of? Can you grab a perception and hang on to it? And what about thoughts in the area of mental formations? It's just a poof of energy, isn't it? Just a blip. Emotions are so cloud-like that sometimes we can hardly tell they're there. These are the signs of the emptiness of all the other aggregates—insubstantial, ungraspable. I encourage you to continue to look in your actual meditation experience and check this out. Investigate and see if any of the aggregates—form, feeling, perception, mental formations—are graspable. See if you can find anything solid to hold onto in them.

This brings us to the last aggregate, which is consciousness. Here's the analogy for consciousness: "Suppose, bhikkhus, that a magician should hold a magic show at a crossroads, and a keen-sighted person should inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it. It would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance could there be in a magic show? Even so, monks, whatever consciousness there is, a person inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it. It would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance could there be in consciousness?"

So consciousness is being compared to a magic show—basically an illusion, a magician's illusion. Consciousness, this knowing quality that reveals, that illuminates all the sense impressions: a magician's illusion.

Why would this be of interest? If you think about magic tricks, they're really cool when you first see them, aren't they? Kind of unbelievable. How did they do that? A hundred years ago, the best-known magician in the world, as far as I know, was Houdini. He would draw many people to watch his performances. Here's one of the typical things he would do. He would have people tie up his hands with ropes and chains. Then they would wrap more ropes and chains around his whole body. Then they would place him in a wooden box, someone would hammer down the lid to the box, and then they would toss him in a deep river. That would be fun, huh? People would wait and think, "There's no way he's going to get out of this. He's dead. He's never going to come up from this water." And then a few minutes later, Houdini would swim to the surface, break the water with a big smile, and people on the shore would be wild with disbelief.

Magic tricks are really impressive—until we know that it's a trick. And then what happens? Well, I'll tell you the story of how Houdini did it, because this is a dharma talk and not a magic show.

When they tied his hands up, they tied them really loosely. It looked like they were tight, but they weren't, so he could wriggle his hands out of those bonds. He had tucked into his cheeks several little wrenches, like little Allen wrenches, and he pulled them out. He was an expert lock picker, so using the Allen wrenches, he would pick the locks that were on the rest of the chains that tied his whole body up.

Once he got those done, there's one more trick coming, but there's a big piece of skill in the middle: he had trained to hold his breath for up to three minutes underwater. This is not easy to do. Usually after about a minute we start panicking, and there's this strong desire to swallow, which is not a good idea. So he trained himself to hold his breath for three minutes.

He was doing all this while holding his breath. He'd gotten rid of the ropes around his wrist. He'd gotten rid of the chains around his body. He was still in a wooden box. But the trick was that one side of the box was very lightly tacked on. So he just kicked that side of the box, he was out in the water, swam to the surface, took a deep breath of air. Everybody was amazed. That was magic.

So once you know the trick, it's not as impressive, is it? It brings in this element that we call disenchantment. Disenchantment is a factor—in Pali, the word is nibbidā. It's a wholesome factor of mind that is an important part of the journey to liberation when it's described as the building up of wholesome factors, because what it leads to is dispassion. When we see how the trick is performed, we're not enchanted by it any longer. And then we're not as stuck to the belief in the reality of it.

Consciousness is a magic show, but we don't know that. We don't know that it's a trick of sorts, that it has embedded within it, in the way we hold it, a kind of illusion.

So then the Buddha went through all of these. He said, "Form is like a mass of foam and feeling but an airy bubble. Perception is like a mirage and formations a plantain tree. Consciousness is a magic show. All these similes were made known by the kinsmen of the sun"—which is another word for the Buddha.

So the magic is that through consciousness, we think the world is solid. Consciousness reveals a world and we think it's a solid reality. And then by taking it so seriously, we think we can hold on to it. This is the sad part. Because it's not solid, we can't hold on to it. Seeing that is the same message as seeing impermanence—everything goes, and we can't really grasp. But emptiness takes it a step further, which we'll get to.

We live in a culture where this is not well understood, the lack of solidity in the world. We live in a culture that takes this material world as the ultimate reality. This worldview, which has been around in philosophy for thousands of years, is called materialism. It says that this is the true reality. Everything else comes out of this matter, including us. Somehow evolution made it possible for bodies to grow and then bodies generated consciousness. But everything fundamentally depends on matter. So our fundamental view is that this world is the ultimate reality. We came into this world at birth. We're trapped in it for however many years. And when we die, it continues, but we don't. This is one view, and it seems to be the dominant view in Western culture right now, the dominant view of materialism.

But if you look at ancient Indian philosophies, for example, some of them took consciousness as primary and said basically the physical world was an invention from consciousness. Everything that's physical just appears as a blip in consciousness. And consciousness will endure even if the physical world doesn't.

So this is interesting to consider, isn't it? What's the reality? In the Buddha's teachings, it's interesting—he sort of follows a middle way.

Consciousness and form lean against each other. He said like two sheaves of reeds. If you take one away, the other collapses. Take away consciousness and form will collapse. Take away form and consciousness will collapse. So this is interesting.

But in any case, what we do have is a situation where everything in our experience arises in consciousness, and this has implications. Let's apply this to the world of sight, because this is the hardest to penetrate, isn't it? You look at a wall, it seems very real and solid. You tap on it, it feels very solid. So we might think, well, the other senses might be flimsy, but sight is really giving us solid and real impressions. Let's see if that's true.

We can call on a little bit of the science we know to understand how the sight of wall occurs for us. We know, and this is not too sophisticated, that for us to see a wall, light has to fall on it. The light has to be reflected from the wall to land on our eye. The light that falls on our eye triggers a signal to the brain. That signal gets interpreted in some way that no one understands—scientists aren't even close to figuring this out. And then, boom, the sight of wall appears. Take away the light, take away the eye, take away the nerve, take away the brain—no sight appears.

In order for that sight to keep appearing, if you see the front wall right now, in order for that sight to keep appearing to you, light has to continue to land on it and reflect to your eyes. So that sight is not ongoing. You know that. If you think about the seventh-grade physics of it, you know that millions of photons are hitting that wall and therefore hitting your eye every second, and that impingement of photons is what's recreating the image of the wall over and over and over. There's no solid image anywhere in your visual experience. The image is only being recreated over and over and over, many times a second.

Could that kind of image be said to be solid? No. It's only being recreated by our sense organ, our brain, and our human consciousness, which are all conditioned and go into fabricating this image of wall that we see and believe is solid, but really isn't. The image is not solid.

So when we look closely at the mechanism of sight, we can see the insubstantial nature there too. Everything is changing moment by moment. The problem is we think we're seeing a world, but we're only seeing a representation of it constructed by our sense organs, brain, and consciousness. We don't live in a real world. We live in a fabricated representation of something. Who knows what's actually out there? I don't. But we think we do. We think it's real and solid, and it's only a representation through the senses.

Here's another thing that intrigued me. I used to reflect on this. If I ask you what color this book is, it's pretty clear, right? You would say that it's blue. So let's think about that with the question: where is blue? Is blue really in this book?

Again, if you know science, you know that what's happening is white light falls on this, absorbs the other colors, and reflects blue back to your eye. So that's why you're seeing blue—because you're seeing the reflected blue light. But the other colors, the other end of the spectrum—red, orange, yellow—are being absorbed. So if the book is anything, it's red, orange, yellow, not blue. In fact, you could say this book is really not blue. What it's reflecting back is blue.

So where is blue? It's only in your experience, isn't it? It's just an arising in consciousness. That's the only place blue exists.

It doesn't exist in the book. It only exists in your consciousness.

So we live in a representation of the world that's created by our senses, brain, and consciousness, but we mistakenly give it a solidity that it has never had. And we think we live in the real world.

One way to undo this a little bit is that instead of talking about objects—sense objects—we should talk about appearances. Sometimes I'll use that language, sometimes I'll use "objects," but you have to do the translation internally. We're just talking about things that appear.

One of my teachers said, "Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever"—meaning substantial existence. They are only appearances. That's why consciousness is like a magic show. In Tibetan Buddhism, they call this the magical display of the world through consciousness. Sometimes you get that feeling, don't you, with the autumn leaves? That is really a magical display going on out there. Who knows how it happens? But it's incredible.

So everything in our experience is just an arising in consciousness. There's no solidity there.

This is from the Diamond Sutra, a key text in the Mahayana:

Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world: like a star at dawn, a flickering lamp, a bubble in a stream, an echo, a mirage, and a dream.

This reality is like a dream. When you think about that, is there any real difference between a moment of experience here and a moment of experience in a dream? Is there any real difference? How can you tell the difference? It's truly as insubstantial as a dream. It does seem to have more continuity, but that relies on memory. But in a moment of experience, can you tell the difference?

The nice thing about comparing it to a dream is that it really brings out the fundamental message of seeing emptiness. If you were in a dream, would you cling? If you were in a dream and knew you were in a dream, would you cling to the things of the dream? Not if you were smart.

One time I was about ten years old and it was the night before Christmas. I went to sleep and had a dream that my basement was full of these racks from floor to ceiling, and the racks were full of presents for me. I was very disappointed when I woke up because I had clung to those things in the dream. But if we know it's a dream, we don't cling. And this is like a dream.

So this is the sense of the emptiness of appearances, or the emptiness of sense phenomena. Emptiness doesn't mean a place of nothingness. It doesn't mean a vacancy. It doesn't mean a meditative state where there's no contact happening. It means understanding the insubstantial nature of everything that arises.

When we start to see this insubstantiality through and through and through every sense experience, we start to see that nothing actually lasts long enough to be called a thing. These appearances, as you really look closely, they're really fleeting. Nothing is actually there enough to be a solid thing. And that's why Nagarjuna, the great philosopher of emptiness, said, "That to which language refers is denied." I think that's brilliant. What language refers to is denied. The nouns that language refers to—there aren't any nouns. There's only process.

This is from the Heart Sutra:

While practicing deeply the perfection of wisdom, the Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was saved from all suffering and distress.

There's a key text of the Mahayana. The perception of the emptiness of the five aggregates removes all suffering and distress. Why? Because it undoes grasping.

Impermanence shows us that if we hold on to something, eventually it's going to pass, and that holding will have been futile. But emptiness shows us, if we understand it deeply enough, there's nothing there to hold on to in the first place. There's no solid thing, even temporarily, to hold to. So when one sees that, there is no inclination to grasp.

At this point we see that we're actually empty in two ways.

They're related and they build on each other. They're powerful in building on each other.

The first way is that this mind-body process is empty of a central essence or self that's ongoing. This is anattā. The second way is that every component that is real in this process—the five aggregates or the six types of sense objects—are all insubstantial and therefore empty. So there's no center, therefore empty of self, and there's no solidity anywhere in the components, therefore insubstantial and empty. We're empty in both those ways.

One of the things that really brought this home to me happened when I was a monk in Thailand. One of the great things about being a monk—there were a lot of great things—but one of them was that we got to be very close to dead bodies on a number of occasions. I was thirty-two years old, I think, and I'd never stood next to a dead body before. People in my life had died, but it seemed as soon as they died, either medicine or law just took them away. So I'd never been next to a dead body.

In Thailand, we had the opportunity to do this in different ways. One was outdoor funerals. Sometimes villagers would bring a body into a monastery, build a big pile of wood as a pyre, set the body on top of it, and we could visit the body before the fire was lit. Then the fire would be lit and we could observe the cremation. But in the urban setting, we had another alternative, which was the morgue. Monks and nuns were allowed to visit the morgue at a downtown hospital in Bangkok and observe autopsies being performed. So I did that.

The first thing when I walked into the morgue, I stood next to a dead body that was laid out on a steel table. I had never been so close to a dead body before. Then the body was wheeled into the coroner's theater, basically. We took seats in the elevated rows around the theater—a few monastics and then medical students—and watched the coroner perform an autopsy on this body that I had just been standing next to.

I don't know if you've ever seen an autopsy. If you're queasy, you might not want to listen to this. But the first step was that the coroner made a deep incision from one ear going across the top of the skull through the skin to the other ear, right down to the bone. Having made that incision, with his two hands he took hold of those two flaps of skin and peeled them in opposite directions. So the face of the person came off and the back of the skull was exposed as the skin was peeled in the other direction. What that did was cleanly expose the skull itself. Then he took a saw and started cutting through the skull all around the outside until he could take off the top half and expose the brain. Once the brain was exposed, he took it out, examined it to see if there were any diseases, to see if it might be related to the cause of death, and he weighed it and recorded the weight.

Then he made a deep incision down the person's front from about the neck down to the navel and started opening up first the skin and then cutting through the ribs and opening the rib cage so that he could take out those organs—the heart, the lungs, the liver, spleen, and so on. He took out each of those organs, examined them for any disease, weighed them, recorded it. When he was done, he put everything back in its right place, including the brain and scalp, and he sewed it all up again so that the body looked, more or less from the outside, like it had when he brought it in. That was the completion of that autopsy. It took about thirty minutes. I sat there and then he did two more autopsies just in the same way—brought out two additional corpses and went through the same procedure.

I'd been sitting in my monastery for several weeks at that point in retreat. I was pretty still, very present, and really open. So this kind of blew my mind. I'd never really stood next to a dead body before, and the way they were cut up and opened and kind of invaded was shocking to my sensibilities. It really stunned me, but it was too interesting to turn away from.

I exited the coroner's office, left the morgue, and went back into central Bangkok to catch a bus back to my monastery. I was just in this very altered place from what I'd been observing. It was near the parade ground, Sanam Luang, if you know Bangkok. So there were a lot of people going by—old women walking by with their groceries, young couples walking by hand in hand, children kicking a ball around a big grassy field. And I would look at them all, and they seemed just like the bodies I'd just seen under the autopsy. The word that came to my mind as I hung out with this, because they just didn't seem very far apart, was "walking corpses." We're all just walking corpses.

Then I started to reflect on what that meant, because it doesn't make a lot of sense—corpses don't walk. But I started to reflect on what that meant to me, and I saw that we're very similar to those bodies I had just seen. The difference was there was like this light shining out of people's eyes who were still moving around, something that was somehow related to consciousness. There was still that spark of consciousness in the ones who were living and walking and moving. It just struck me that what most fundamentally they were, what we were, was a body plus this consciousness. That's what I was seeing: body plus consciousness.

Of course there were mental states present too, but they seemed less fundamental than body and consciousness. So I started looking at people as being mostly body plus consciousness. And that became very interesting because the body is totally of the moment. Of course it's had a history, but right now the body is totally of the moment. Consciousness is totally of the moment, with no tie to the past.

But we have this peculiar faculty of memory that lets us store up conscious experiences and hold them, then call them up and project them into the future in some way or another. This very peculiar thing called memory—it has a lot to do with constructing the belief in a self. But if you simply see a person as body plus consciousness, you don't have that history.

Try it as you look around the room if your eyes are open right now during the talk. When your eyes land on somebody, see them as just body plus consciousness, totally in this moment. Or if you're doing reflection on a friend, see them as just body plus consciousness.

Then try seeing them with all the personal history you know of them. There's a body plus consciousness, plus they have a long past. They have successes and failures, things in their life that they've loved, times they've had conflict, whole family relationships, parents, possibly children, livelihood, careers, fortunes won, fortunes lost. See how it feels to bring in all of that. Which is lighter? Which is freer?

When you just see the present moment—body plus consciousness, and maybe there's a little mood there, a mind state—it's so light. This is the liberation of the five aggregates. We can learn to see others and we can learn to see ourselves just in the present moment. We don't need the history, we don't need the projection into the future. And when we see in that way, it's really freeing.

This is an exercise you can do with yourself and with other people. Learn to see as body plus consciousness. It's very light and it's very free. This is what opens up through the seeing of emptiness, through the seeing of insubstantiality of all the aggregates—the magic show of consciousness, the lightness of being that we all carry when we don't attribute solidity to ourselves and the world.

This is from the Visuddhimagga: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers." I wonder if you can get the sense of this. There is no one at the center who is doing the suffering. There is suffering, but no one it's happened to. One meditator put it really beautifully when they said, "Suffering is rope burn. It comes from trying to hold on to something that's passing through." It's the holding on that causes the suffering when we cling to what's passing.

Empty phenomena roll on—also from the Visuddhimagga. The aggregates are doing their thing. They're all aspects of nature, physical nature, mental nature. Empty phenomena rolling on. This way of seeing is very freeing, but it's not a cold way of seeing. It actually evokes a lot of compassion.

In the Tibetan realm, they say emptiness is the womb of compassion. Why? Because it shows our vulnerability. There isn't anything solid to hang on to. Therefore, we're all subject to change on every level at any time, all subject to change.

We were talking about this in a senior students group at Spirit Rock some years ago, and one of the students wrote this afterwards. She said, "It's spooky. I would look at everything like this Japanese lamp that I love and I'd see it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When I went from an object and said it's an appearance to a person and said they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But it's true, and it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're all so fragile."

In Mahayana Buddhism, in Chinese Buddhism, Kuan Yin is the embodiment of the quality of compassion, the bodhisattva of compassion. There's a beautiful representation of her at the back of this hall and another beautiful representation in the walking room next door. It's said that Kuan Yin hears all the cries of beings in the world—the ten thousand cries of joy and the ten thousand cries of sorrow. But Kuan Yin is a bodhisattva, and that means she's not a beginning meditator. She understands that there's suffering, but she also understands there's no one who suffers.

And that's the wisdom that lets her hold the suffering of this world with equanimity as well as compassion. It's what lets her hold it in the balance that gives rise to the equanimity on the face of the statue of the Buddha.

Through seeing emptiness, the heart becomes less burdened. We release a lot of self-concern, and compassion and loving-kindness open up toward the whole of existence. Out of this freedom, we also see the causes of suffering and that it's not necessary. The suffering, to a large degree, comes out of an illusory understanding of the world and its components as abiding in self and solidity.

So Kuan Yin understands that there is not a true source for suffering within the conditioned world. There is not an inevitable source of suffering. And so this is a quotation that's been attributed to Kuan Yin:

The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?

Let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 159

Transcendent Paticcasamuppāda

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the lesser-known sequence of transcendent paticcasamuppāda (dependent origination), drawn from the Upanisā Sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya. Unlike the traditional twelve-link chain that describes how suffering arises from ignorance, this transcendent sequence traces the positive path from suffering to complete liberation. Armstrong guides listeners through each of the twelve links: suffering, saddhā (faith), pāmojja (gladness), pīti (rapture), passaddhi (tranquility), sukha (happiness), samādhi (concentration), yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana (knowing and seeing things as they are), nibbidā (disenchantment), virāga (dispassion), vimutti (liberation), and the knowledge of the destruction of the āsavas (taints). Through personal stories from teaching meditation in juvenile detention, monastic experiences in Burma, and encounters with Ajahn Chah's teachings, Armstrong illustrates how each factor naturally gives rise to the next. He emphasizes that this sequence offers a comprehensive overview of the spiritual journey in positive terms, showing how suffering itself can become the foundation for faith and eventual awakening. The talk provides both theoretical understanding and practical guidance for recognizing and cultivating these wholesome mental factors along the path to nibbāna.

The subject of tonight's talk is transcendent dependent origination. This may sound like a mouthful, but breaking it down, it's actually not that complicated. Transcendent simply means "goes beyond." Dependent means one thing arises based on another, and origination refers to how things come to be.

The Buddha spoke extensively about dependent origination, and I want to begin with the general principle he stated many times: "When this exists, that comes to be. With the arising of this, that arises. When this does not exist, that does not come to be. With the ceasing of this, that ceases."

This is a principle of mutual dependency, and you can see its application in the Four Noble Truths, which concern suffering and its cause, the end of suffering and its cause. This principle has very broad applicability. At one point, the Buddha is said to have declared that one who sees dependent origination sees the Dhamma, and one who sees the Dhamma sees dependent origination. That's how fundamental it is to his teaching—everything arises based on something else.

You probably also know that this general formulation is used in a specific case to indicate a chain of twelve links which begin with ignorance and proceed through related links to craving and clinging, ending in suffering. This is essentially a very detailed description of how suffering comes to be. The undoing of suffering, the Buddha said, comes with the undoing of ignorance. When ignorance ceases, all the other links collapse and no suffering arises. This is the second most famous expression of dependent origination.

But the chain we're exploring tonight consists of twelve other links. This is called the transcendent chain because it transcends suffering, but in a different way. In the original dependent origination, suffering is removed by removing ignorance. But this chain traces the development of the path to the end of suffering in positive terms, which I find quite remarkable.

This teaching is taken from a discourse in the Samyutta Nikāya called the "Discourse on Proximate Cause." In it, the Buddha states the typical chain leading from ignorance to suffering, and then presents this other chain which starts from suffering and proceeds through liberation. This chain picks up where the more common traditional chain leaves off, tracing the journey as a comprehensive overview of the spiritual path in positive terms. I find it deeply inspiring to examine these steps, beginning with suffering and leading to liberation.

Let me state this chain of transcendent dependent origination in its twelve links: suffering, faith, gladness, rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, knowing and seeing things as they are, disenchantment, dispassion, liberation, and knowledge of the extinction of the taints. That final link—knowing the taints have been extinguished—represents the end of the path.

Let's trace how this unfolds. The first connected links show that suffering can give rise to faith. This is a truly interesting connection, where the chain departs from the original sequence and begins moving in a genuinely positive direction. Suffering, it is said, leads to faith.

This is rather a surprising connection because there's abundant suffering in the world, yet not necessarily abundant faith. So how is it that for each of you, suffering transformed into faith? This requires a very unusual turning.

I invite you to examine your own journey and see if there isn't some truth to the fact that you embarked on the path out of suffering and a desire to find resolution to that suffering. Some people may take up meditation out of intellectual curiosity, but intellectual curiosity doesn't usually sustain someone through a three-month retreat. I believe that for all of you here, there was a deeper realization of unsatisfactoriness in life—in your own personal experience—and that this unsatisfactoriness led you to seek something more. The Buddha taught that there are two kinds of search...

There's a search with wisdom and there's a search without wisdom. We see the world embarking on the search to find happiness through external means, and that doesn't lead to real happiness. But the search with wisdom leads us to examine the causes of suffering and can lead to great happiness—the Buddha said to the highest happiness.

There are two conditions for someone to turn that corner. One is the awareness of suffering in their life, the clear recognition of the difficulty and pain in their own existence. And the second is to hear the teachings, to hear teachings that can lead one out of suffering.

At some point, each of us in this room has had to become open to looking at our lives and investigating them in a new way to resolve this basic existential question of pain and sorrow. It's not always clear what will lead one person to this investigation while another remains untouched. There's something—I hesitate to say destiny—but there is something that seems fated about our journey.

A number of years ago, a friend and I were invited to teach meditation in a juvenile hall in California. For those unfamiliar with this system, juvenile hall is where young people are placed when they've been arrested and accused of a crime if they're under eighteen. These are people who are not yet adults but have been picked up for some suspicion of a serious crime.

We were brought into the maximum security part of this juvenile prison in the Bay Area, invited by people who worked there to lead a class on meditation. We were meeting with young men—it was a segregated dorm with just males in that wing—aged fifteen to seventeen who had been arrested for things like assault, assault with a deadly weapon, grand theft, murder, attempted murder, and similar charges. These were suspected crimes that, if they ended up being convicted, could put them in jail for a very long time.

When we went in, we wanted to give them instructions first on how to calm their minds and second on how to open to the difficult emotions they were facing. You can imagine a group of young men tossed into this holding facility, awaiting trial, not knowing what direction their lives would take, dealing with huge amounts of fear and anxiety, cut off from contact with their parents, cut off from their community, their whole futures uncertain.

It was very interesting to see how much they took to the instruction. We couldn't call it Buddhist meditation—we thought that wouldn't fly. So we called it "mind power," and that they could more readily relate to. We gave them the same kinds of instructions that we've given here. We started them with the breath, and then we took them into the area of difficult emotions.

The meditation instructions on working with fear were really helpful for people. One positive aspect was that they had a lot of unscheduled time during the day, time on their own that they could use for practice. Some of them found a truly transformative relationship to the fear they were experiencing. This gave them a new way to find—I won't say ease—but some relief from the direct experience of fear.

In the end, we also decided to teach them about karma, putting it in the context of karma as the science of happiness. We taught the five precepts, and toward the end, we taught loving-kindness to them. It was reported later, after the class when other teachers took over, that some of the people had been members of gangs and they had started to send loving-kindness to people in rival gangs because they said, "Oh look, they have mothers and sisters also. We should hope for their welfare."

It was very moving that they also discovered a certain amount of faith. I can't say they kept up the practice afterwards—I don't know what happened in their future lives. But in this setting, they were highly motivated, a very highly motivated group of young men, and really found out that it could work.

At the end, we gave them a certificate for completing the course in mind power, and we signed our names to it. One of the young men asked, "Can I take this to the judge when I go up for trial?"

Something like this happens to some of us. The suffering in our life puts us into some kind of extreme situation where we feel we need to find a way through. In a way, the extremity of our suffering sometimes forces us to dig so deeply that we find this way through.

Ajahn Chah, who was one of the modern founders of a school in the Thai forest tradition, talked about his own practice as a younger monk. One of the traditional practices they were encouraged to do in the Thai forest was to go meditate at night in a charnel ground.

So you can imagine this is something that will bring up a certain amount of fear and anxiety—to sit at night in a place where dead bodies have been brought.

So Ajahn Chah was sitting there and what he didn't realize is that a corpse from a nearby village was being brought that very day and a pyre had been built and the corpse was going to be burned. And it was right next to where he had taken his seat to go into the evening meditation.

So he didn't move. The body was placed on the pyre. It was set alight. The body was cremated and then the villagers left. So he was there all on his own at night next to the body that had just been burned. And he was sitting with his back to the fire and his eyes were closed. This was spooky. You can imagine the feeling. He was scared. He was not an enlightened master at that point. He was a young monk.

And he recounts it this way. He said, "I forgot about sleep. My eyes were rigid with fear. Then about 10 p.m., there came a sound of shuffling from the fire behind me. It walked up behind me. The leaves crunched under the footsteps as it made its way round to the front. It got closer and closer until it stopped right in front of me and just stood still."

This was really it. I forgot all about Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. There was only fear welling up inside my chest until it completely filled me.

So there he was, totally immersed and filled in this panic of fear. And then he said, "After some time, the fear reached its peak and began to overflow. A voice inside me asked, 'What am I so afraid of?' And then another voice answered, 'I'm afraid of death.' And then the first voice said, 'Where can you run to escape death? Whether you are afraid or not, there's nowhere to escape death.'"

And Ajahn Chah recounts, "As soon as I thought this, all the fear completely disappeared. It was amazing, so much fear, and it could disappear just like that. Non-fear arose in its place. Now my mind was lighter and lighter until I felt as if I was in the clouds."

This is very interesting. Sometimes the practice will take us to the edge of what we can bear. And then sometimes there's this amazing opening from, you could say, the wisdom—our inherent wisdom in our minds.

This is a story from the nuns at the time of the Buddha, a nun called Siha. And this is from a volume in the Pali Canon called the Therigatha, the verses of the elder nuns. She recounts her story in verse form:

"Obsessed by sensuality, I never got to the origin, but was agitated, my mind beyond control. I dreamed of a great happiness. I was passionate but had no peace. Pale and thin I wandered seven years, unhappy day and night. Then I took a rope into the forest and thought, 'I'd rather hang than go back to that narrow life.' I tied a strong noose to the branch of a tree and put it round my neck. Just then my heart was set free."

So this is Siha's account of her own full awakening. She fully awakened at the point at which she was going to hang herself. That extremity and the proximity to death brought something else forward for her.

So you all have had your own versions of these insights, maybe not quite as dramatic. But we've all had something like this, where in a time of extremity, something else came through. And that degree of suffering and then openness becomes the basis for our faith.

So this is what convinces us that the practice actually can work, that the teachings are true. The word for faith in Pali is saddhā. And the literal meaning is to place one's heart upon. So faith in this sense is not a series of beliefs or doctrines. It's what can you put your real being and trust in? What can you place your heart upon?

And when you find that you can place your heart into these teachings, as all of you have found at many different points, that becomes verified faith. You know for yourself that the teachings work and that you have the ability to carry them out.

So this brings in aspects of faith or saddha which have to do with confidence. It's another meaning of saddha. We begin to develop the confidence that we can walk this path ourselves and we can come out of our own suffering because we've seen it happen. We also then trust—we trust in two things: we trust in our own innate wisdom to find the way, and we start to trust in the path as the way that will lead us beyond suffering. Traditionally, this is summed up as saying that one has faith—one discovers faith—in the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.

When one finds that faith is a part of one's life, it brings a certain gladness into the mind. When we don't know that this is possible, there's an element of anxiety in life. I look back to my early life before I found this path, and one of the things that's most alarming is the mixture of happiness and suffering and not knowing what way to go. There was a basic kind of confusion, and finding the path was a great relief to that confusion.

So the discovery of faith really leads us into a determined effort, a persevering effort on the path. In terms of the five spiritual faculties, which I think Winnie talked about earlier, faith is the first of the five. When faith grows, it leads to effort. And effort is what then carries us along the path.

In this particular sequence, faith is said to lead to the next factor, which is gladness. Sometimes translated as joy, but I'm going to use the word gladness because it's a little different than the other joy we've talked about. The Pali word is pamoja.

One of the things this highlights is there are a lot of words for joy and happiness in the Buddha's teachings. We've got a few words for dukkha—we've got dukkha, we've got the hindrances, we've got craving, we've got the kilesas, we've got the taints. But there are also a lot of words and a lot of lists for happy qualities. There's pamoja, there are other words we'll reach tonight, there are the brahmaviharas, there are the factors of enlightenment, there are the spiritual faculties. The wholesome lists are bigger than the unwholesome lists.

So we want to get really tuned into these wholesome qualities because they are really what propel us along the path. I think it was Sally who mentioned this quote from Analayo: the entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy, or you could say gladness.

So this is an important and essential part of our journey along the path. If you can find areas of joy and gladness in your practice, they become a tremendous ally. It's necessary. We all need to find these.

One example is loving-kindness for the benefactor. When you hang out with someone that you love, that becomes a source of uplift. Another is the practice of sympathetic joy, or mudita, where we focus on the happiness of various beings that we bring to mind, and their happiness lifts our heart.

This need for an ally of joy came clear to me when I was practicing in Burma a few years ago. I was originally a monk in Thailand for a year. I really enjoyed that time. Due to circumstances, I left a little too early. I hadn't really lived out my monastic inclinations. There was always that little bit of leftover desire to be back in robes again.

Some years ago, I had a chance to do that. I went to Burma. I wanted to practice with Pauk Sayadaw, who's a great master of both concentration and vipassana. I wanted to learn his concentration practice.

So I went and he allowed me to ordain. I arrived at the monastery about 5 p.m. one day in my lay clothes and my suitcase. I asked him if I could ordain, and he said, "Yes, you'll ordain tomorrow after lunch."

I said, "Whoa, that's kind of quick. I just landed here. I don't know where anything is. I don't know how to do anything."

So in the morning I went into town and got my robes and bowl. I came back and right after lunch someone shaved my head. I went through an ordination ceremony and put on the orange robes again. It felt great to be in the orange robes, but in the meantime I'd forgotten how to tie them. As I was walking around, they kept falling off my shoulder.

I should have known what was coming, but I ordained at the beginning of the rains retreat.

You know, there's this period of three months every year in Asia where the monks and nuns go into seclusion in the monasteries because the rains are happening and you don't want to be trampling through the fields. So I should have known by its being called the rains retreat that something was about to happen.

And it did. It rained steadily for about the next three weeks. I hardly saw the sun and I think it was raining about three inches a day because it was a tropical monsoon that just kept coming down. The meditation hall was a fifteen-minute walk uphill from my kuti, and that was through the rain. There were six sittings a day up there, the shortest of which was an hour and a half, the longest of which was two hours. And the practice was very simple—just staying with the experience of the breath on the upper lip all day long, sitting, walking, nothing else. There was no choiceless attention. There was no opening to sounds to get a sense of relaxation. It was on the breath all the time, every day.

The practice was challenging. The weather was really challenging. The biggest spider I'd ever seen was building a huge web right on my porch. And the food was very simple—just one meal a day, mostly steamed vegetables and white rice. At the end of the retreat, I found out I was losing about half a pound a day during that time.

All of this came to a head one day when I was down at the dining hall. I'd gotten my bowl filled with rice and curry, and I even had a little dessert, which I put in the bowl lid turned upside down on the top. I was holding that in one hand, and it was raining like crazy, so I had my umbrella in the other. I was walking back to my kuti, and my robe started falling off my shoulder. I was walking up this muddy path when there were a few Burmese lay people who knelt in the dirt by the side of the road to bow as I went by—that's what they do to honor monastics there. And I was trying just to keep my clothes on at that point.

I made it back to my kuti and had my meal, but these were the most challenging conditions I'd ever practiced in. The meditation was difficult. It was going okay, but it wasn't going great. So I reached a real low point in the middle of that period due to all those different conditions, and I felt I needed some support. The teacher was not psychologically trained, so I had to look for my own inner resources.

I had brought along a picture of the Dalai Lama, who's a great inspiration to me, and I turned to the picture with a real spirit of supplication. I was feeling very humble at that point. I turned to the picture and said, "Your Holiness, what advice do you have for me? I need some help right now."

It was very interesting because as soon as I said it, the voice of the Dalai Lama popped into my head with his Indian-accented English. There was a very clear transmission. The Dalai Lama said, "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." And then the transmission just ended. It came on—boom—and it was gone. That was all I was getting from His Holiness on that day.

But I thought, what a beautiful message. Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support. When would that not be helpful? I took the message in, and I really brought it to mind many times in the rest of that retreat. When I could remember what cheerful felt like, it really picked me up.

So I recommend this to you—find sources of gladness, whether they're internal or external. Another great source, of course, is nature. We're so fortunate here to have access to nature because very often we can go out, especially on a day like today, and let this incredible autumn beauty in the woods, on the trails, on the roads, around the grounds, just lift our hearts. I know a lot of you take advantage of that, and it's a wonderful resource that we have. Don't look down on beauty.

It is very, very helpful. This is from Ajahn Sumedho: "Sometimes in Theravada Buddhism, one gets the impression that you shouldn't enjoy beauty. If you see a beautiful flower, you should contemplate its decay. Or if you see a beautiful woman, you should contemplate her as a rotting corpse." That's a good reflection on anicca, dukkha, and anatta, but it can leave the impression that beauty is only to be reflected on in terms of these three characteristics, rather than in terms of the experience of beauty. This is the joy of mudita, appreciative joy—being able to appreciate the beauty in the things around us.

So don't forget opening yourself to the beauty of what's around us. Sometimes I tune into light and radiance as just a reminder of that beauty. There's something really special about the quality of radiance in this world. And when the mind relaxes and opens to that joy, just an ordinary moment can have a tremendous amount of uplift.

This is from Thomas Merton: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fountain of action and of joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created being." All created being is speaking of this beauty and the gladness that it brings.

So then gladness leads to the next factor, which I'll translate here just for lack of confusion as rapture. It's the Pali word pīti, which when Bonnie talked about in the seven factors, she called joy. That's also a great translation. Just to differentiate it, I'll use the word rapture this evening.

Rapture is kind of an intensification of the gladness of pamojja. And particularly, it brings that sense of delight into the meditation itself. So the gladness may be triggered by an external reflection or contact with nature, inspiration of a person, but we bring it into our meditation and we start to find a delight in the meditation object. One teacher in Australia talks about finding a relationship to the beautiful breath. So to discover that the breath can be beautiful is a sign of that delight in the meditation itself. That's a sign of pīti.

Another synonym for pīti is rapt attention—R-A-P-T—rapt attention, because we're so enjoying what we're seeing. So this is one of the seven factors of awakening that Bonnie talked about. It's one of the five jhanic factors that Sally talked about. I won't talk a lot more about it because they covered it really beautifully. But we'll just note that it's a mental factor that is accompanied often by physical energy. So the energy connected with pīti can be felt as swelling, as trembling, as uplifting, as pervasive throughout the body. And this is generally experienced as pleasant. The quality of rapture generally has a pleasant tone, although sometimes it can be a little too strong.

But the pleasant nature of it leads into the next factor of this chain, which is tranquility. I think we may have talked about this as one of the seven factors of enlightenment, as calm. It's the same Pali word, passaddhi. So tranquility calms the energy of rapture. Sometimes rapture is felt as a little too strong, a little too turbulent, but as this moves into—mellows into—tranquility, the turbulence of the rapture settles down. Sometimes this is translated as tranquility, could be translated as calm, sometimes it's been translated as relaxation, and it's felt both in the body and in the mind. So in this the body is settling as well as the mind, and that lets us settle into the moment without either wanting something different or resisting what's there. But the tranquility is very inviting. It lets the mind really settle.

So this discovery of calm is sometimes new territory. It's something we often don't find in daily life. And so one meditator who first felt this in their practice noted it tentatively and said, "Calm? Like, unbelievable, right? Calm? Is this what they're talking about?" And so you may have that feeling. It's a little unfamiliar. But as you recognize it and trust in it, it's a beautiful quality to settle into.

It's kind of like we've crossed the stormy ocean with all the hindrances—you know, rocks and waves and giant squids coming up—and we found a quiet harbor in the middle of this stormy ocean. And that quiet harbor is tranquility or calm.

And I love, in connection with this, this poem from Emily Dickinson. It's just an excerpt from a part of one of her poems called "Wild Nights." For those of you who don't know Emily Dickinson, she lived just about a half hour away from here in the town of Amherst, and her house is still available there to tour. From "Wild Nights":

Futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass, done with the chart, rowing in Eden.

Let me read that again. Futile—that means useless—futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass, done with the chart, rowing in Eden.

It has this feeling of just being beautifully settled in this kind of primeval terrain, peaceful and restful.

So in the factor of tranquility, the mind discovers its own natural peace and ease. There is a natural peace and ease to the mind when we don't disturb it. When the mind isn't being stirred up by random papañca and emotions, there is a natural peace that is there.

Ajahn Amaro, abbot of Amaravati, has this really nice meditation instruction. When you've discovered this quality, he says, rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body, and then pay attention to whatever disturbs that.

I like this: rest in the natural peace and ease. This is the territory of tranquility, of calm. And as we settle into it, it opens the doorway to a new kind of contentment because the mind has found its own peacefulness and satisfaction.

This leads to the next of the factors, which is happiness. The Pali word here is sukha. In this sequence of transcendent arising, this is not a terribly bubbly or exuberant kind of happiness. It's a very settled happiness. The kind of thrill of rapture has been mellowed out through the peace of tranquility and settles into this calm kind of happiness that might be better described as contentment.

As contentment starts to be felt, it really tends to do away with the longing for anything else. Sukha has this quality. Actually, I like the term because it sounds a lot like sugar. I've been curious if there's an etymological connection between the two. But I think of sukha as very much like sugar for the mind, but healthy. Maybe it's agave nectar. It brings this sweetness into the mind that also really helps to settle the body. The sweetness combined with the calm gives a very warm and stable kind of settledness.

Whereas the gladness we talked about is evoked by certain conditions—by nature, by a benefactor, by an inspiration—at this point, the sukha of happiness doesn't depend on conditions. It has flowered of its own. It doesn't depend on external conditions to be continued. The mind has found its own way in.

There's a sense of coming home at this point in the presence of the sukha and the tranquility together. It's like we found a big piece of what we've been looking for. I think people come into meditation practice looking for peace of mind. When we find this combination of tranquility and contentment, we feel like we've discovered that.

We can't secure it as a permanent resting place. We recognize that it's still impermanent and subject to arising and passing, but at least we have opened to that possibility. We've seen that possibility as one of the outcomes of our meditation practice. We know that practice leads in this direction. We trust in this.

This kind of peace of mind is a friend and an ally that makes a lot of life much more acceptable. When we can rest in this place, it feels like we have the inner quality to deal with the ups and downs that life brings. It's almost like if that's there, everything else is workable. If that's not there, sometimes it feels like nothing else is satisfactory.

This reminds me of a poem of Rumi's. When Rumi says "you," he usually means the divine, the presence of the divine. But I think of it in terms of this beautiful kind of contentment.

Rumi said: "Come to the orchard in spring. There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers. If you do not come, these do not matter. If you do come, these do not matter."

When we have this stable contentment, the external conditions don't matter so much. We're not drawn to need things in the outside world because there's a self-sufficiency that is inward.

This stage of happiness is very pleasant in itself, but as you know, the path doesn't stop there. I think Carol mentioned this quote from the Buddha: "Two things I never lost track of in my own practice—not to be lazy in my efforts and not to settle just for wholesome states of mind."

So even this level of deep, peaceful contentment is not the end of the path. It leads on to the next link, which is concentration or samādhi.

Concentration is that unification of mind that Bonnie talked about, Sally talked about, the jhanic factors that make it up. And that unification of mind, bringing together all the mental energy that is in us, brings a sense of steadiness, of stability, of firmness, and of strength.

When we give away our energy to thoughts of past and future and all the emotions that come with that, we're giving away that inner strength. But when the mind collects through this contentment and relaxation, that strength is recollected. So the concentrated mind is a mind that's come together and that strength gives us more and more ability to accept all the ups and downs of life.

So this is still a deeper settling, a deeper collection than even the happiness brings. The mind just continues to collect because it's simply settling within itself, not being pulled by desires outwardly. But this is also just onward leading. As the Buddha said, the purpose and benefit of concentration is to know and see things as they really are. So concentration has its value in opening the door to insight, seeing things as they really are.

So this is the next link in transcendent dependent origination. The Pali is yathabhuta-jnana-dassana, knowing and seeing things as they truly are. Jnana means knowing in the sense of wisdom. It's the same root word as the Greek gnosis. Dassana means seeing, and it's the same root as the Pali vipassana. So those are based on seeing. Yathabhuta means things the way they are, or as Carol sometimes likes to say, things the way they have come to be. Both point to seeing reality in its characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness.

So seeing the three characteristics is an important piece of yathabhuta-jnana-dassana. Or we could say seeing the emptiness of things. What we get from this insight —the three characteristics are emptiness—is that the things of the world don't have the power to offer lasting satisfaction. Sense objects can't give ongoing satisfaction because none of them last. None of them in truth are solid enough to hang on to from the beginning. As we talked about in the emptiness of the aggregates, this insight leads to the next step, which is that we see the display of the world as a kind of magic show.

In that Sutta on the lump of foam, the Buddha talked about how consciousness reveals the world as a magic show or as a magical illusion. And when we see that way, the insubstantiality, we can't believe in it so thoroughly as capable of satisfying. This is the sense of disenchantment. Disenchantment doesn't mean depression, it doesn't mean cynicism, it doesn't mean negativity. It just means we recognize the sense objects have enchanted us for a long time. We've been drawn out of ourselves toward them thinking that they were the source of happiness. Now that enchantment, the spell that they have cast, is broken. The illusion is broken. And we see these things can't give lasting satisfaction. So we're just not that thrilled anymore.

As one teacher says, this is the stage of the withdrawal of the projected promise of pleasant sense experiences. They offer one thing, but you can't cash it in. It doesn't work that way. So with disenchantment, there is a step back from the objects of the senses. When we realize they don't have the ability to satisfy, there's a deeper letting go that starts to happen.

There was a particular period in my practice as a monk where this was the most alive thing for me. I'd been in retreat for some months at that point, fairly calm. And I just started seeing how every experience that came through didn't last very long. And a number of you have reported this in our meetings here. Pleasant things happen, unpleasant things happen, and they just all cycle through. None of them last very long. And so there's no real gratification from the pleasant and there's no real obstruction from the unpleasant.

And yet, how much do we continue to focus on the pleasant and unpleasant nature of those transitory experiences? They still have the power to captivate us, don't they? To fascinate us. We really want the pleasant and we really don't want the unpleasant. But as we see the kind of rapid cycling that is their nature, we sort of go, why am I bothering holding on or pushing away? They're going to go of their own nature anyway. Why am I bothering?

And so this leads into the next of the factors which is called dispassion. The Pali is viraga.

So I want to explain dispassion a little bit. It basically means equanimity. We're not strongly drawn to sense experiences and we're not strongly turned off. We're not much pulled one way or another.

So this is the balance that we see in the statues of the Buddha and Quan Yin, this equanimous mind state that still cares and is still compassionate. So dispassion doesn't mean that we become cold or uncaring. It doesn't mean that on the path we give up all our fire. That's not what's being pointed to here.

In classical Buddhist language, from all the traditions, this word passion has a certain meaning. It's a synonym for lust, for greed, and for craving. And so when passion is used in the Buddhist context, it's always an unwholesome state. But in the West, we use passion in a way that's often very wholesome. And we can continue to use it in that way as long as we're clear with the meaning.

In Buddhism, we have different words that refer to this kind of strong feeling. And these words are such as ardor, which is atapi, zeal, which is chanda, or enthusiasm, which is virya. And in the Satipatthana Sutta, it's said very clearly that one abides ardent and resolute, dwelling on each of the foundations of mindfulness. And in another discourse, Sariputta says, one cannot attain enlightenment without ardor.

So this is what we might call passion, this quality of ardor or atapi. Actually, the root of it was a practice of fire, fire worshiping or fire devotion in ancient Indian culture. So this is a fiery quality, this quality of ardor.

Zeal is a translation of chanda, is one of what's called the iddhipadas or a basis of power when combined with concentration. We have to have a zeal, an energy for what we're doing or it won't move forward. And virya, of course, is what we've been talking about as energy or effort, one of the seven factors and one of the ten paramis.

So these are all wholesome qualities that we could call in our Western language different forms of passion—our caring and love for and devotion to the practice. But dispassion in this sense is something different. And in its fullness, dispassion literally means the absence of lust.

And if you remember when Carol talked about Nibbana last night, she talked about it—I can't remember if this is the exact same quote, but here's a very similar quote: "Insofar as the practitioner has abandoned greed, aversion, and delusion, insofar is nibbana realizable, immediate, inviting, and attractive." In other words, when the mind is released from lust, from hatred, from confusion, it is immediately next door to nibbana, to the immediate discovery of this unconditioned element. This is the pointing of dispassion at this point. When lust has been temporarily ended, the mind is very close to the opening to nibbana. This is the precondition for the direct realization or what we call enlightenment.

So there's another discourse where the Buddha says—and as I hear it, it almost is giving meditation instructions to lead us into this realization. This comes from a discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya: "This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

This is like a temporal sequence of how one gets there. So peaceful and sublime—we've kind of encountered this through the maturing of sukha. The stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, and the destruction of craving—this is the deep letting go. We are not pursuing any of the objects that come to us through the contact through our senses. Craving being destroyed means greed, aversion, delusion are being destroyed. Then dispassion is the natural outcome of that movement.

So it's kind of like the Buddha is directing us how to land. He's in the air traffic controller booth and we're coming in on the runway. Still the formations. Relinquish the attachments. Destruction of craving. Now we're landing. Dispassion is what the runway looks like.

And then this final word, before nibbana: cessation. It's a really interesting word in the Buddha's vocabulary, and it's used in a number of different contexts. One of the contexts is in the Four Noble Truths. The cessation of suffering results from the cessation of craving. The word for cessation is nirodha. So tanha nirodha is the cessation of craving, and that leads directly to dukkha nirodha, the cessation of suffering. So that is being pointed to here—the end of craving, the end of suffering.

But there's another context in which nirodha is used that I find really interesting, which is the cessation of consciousness, vijnana nirodha. And specifically what's pointed to here is the cessation of the six bases of sense consciousness, the six types of sense consciousness. So the Buddha said in one discourse, that sphere should be realized where the eye ceases and the perception of forms ceases, and so on through the other six senses. That sphere should be realized where the six classes of sense contact cease.

Wow, what's that about?

So this is a very interesting investigation. What I found when I was in that period in the monastery and I was starting to lose interest in sense objects, that means I was losing interest in contact. And contact is the meeting of the object with the organ and the consciousness. I was starting to lose interest in that because it was not satisfying and it wasn't threatening. When I started to lose interest in that, I could feel the very factor of consciousness slipping away due to the lack of interest.

Why should we be so fascinated by these temporary blips that can't satisfy and can't harm us? And yet we're totally tied to them most of the time, moment after moment. Let go, let go, let go, relinquishing all attachments, even to contact. And what is discovered as one releases the attachment to even contact itself is that consciousness fades as well. And in that cessation of the sense consciousness, the door is truly opened to the realization of what transcends them—nibbana.

So this contact with nibbana is the next step in the sequence described by the term liberation. The Pali word is vimuti. So this contact with the unconditioned, if it's at a certain depth, a certain depth of realization of nibbana, is what liberates the heart and mind. And this is when the practitioner will say something like: "Birth is destroyed. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more coming to any state of being." This is the fullness of liberation. The work is completed. The mind has been released from all the unwholesome factors.

What partakes of nibbana, what gets us close to this territory? There are a number of ways that we talk about it and have talked about it in this retreat that give the closest mundane descriptions of what is beyond the mundane, what is beyond worldly conditions that transcends suffering that is beyond the world. And these are concepts like acceptance, deep acceptance, full acceptance, full awareness in the present moment, steadiness of mind, stilling of all formations, equanimity, and deep trust. When these come together, we are in the mundane territory leading to that realization.

And then after liberation, it is said there's the knowledge of the destruction of the taints. One realizes that the most fundamental impurities of the heart and mind have been eliminated, have been eradicated, never to arise again. And these are the asavas, what's often translated as the taints: the taint of sense desire, the taint of becoming, and the taint of ignorance. So when these are gone, the work is done, it is said.

So when I first heard about this possibility, I got really impatient. And I went to my teacher in the next interview and I said, "But how long will it take?" Because I really wanted to get there quickly. But we don't know how long it will take. What we do know is that this practice is leading that way. The Buddha said the practice of mindfulness in the four foundations—that is right mindfulness—only leads in one direction, and that is to this full liberation. And he said we don't know how much of our fetters wear away each day, but we do know that they're wearing away.

And he compared it to an ocean-going ship that's been brought up on the land after a season out on the seas. And the sun and the wind and the climate factors just slowly erode the riggings and the ropes and the sails that are just left out in the open air. So all those things are rotting away under the influence of mindfulness. We don't know how fast, but we know that they're rotting away.

This is how Ajahn Chah put it: "The practice has to develop naturally according to conditions. You allow things to develop according to your accumulated wholesome karma and paramis. This doesn't mean you stop putting effort into the practice, but you continue with the understanding that whether you progress swiftly or slowly, it's not something you can force. It's like planting a tree—it knows by itself the appropriate pace to grow at. If you crave to get quick results, see that as delusion. Even if you want it to grow slowly, see that as delusion."

And so this also reminds us of another quotation from the Buddha, which I think somebody may have mentioned earlier, but I'll read it again.

When a deva came to the Buddha and asked, "How did you cross the flood of existence?" - meaning, how did you find security and release and safety, how did you become liberated? - the Buddha answered with profound simplicity: "I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away."

Let's just sit for a minute with this teaching.

I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away.

This is the middle way of practice - neither forcing nor being lazy, neither grasping for quick results nor becoming complacent. Like the tree that knows its own natural pace of growth, our practice unfolds according to its own wisdom when we maintain this delicate balance of effort and patience, of engagement and letting go.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 160

First and Second Noble Truths (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat at Spirit Rock, Guy Armstrong offers an in-depth exploration of the First and Second Noble Truths as presented in the Dhamma-cakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11). Drawing from the Buddha's first teaching to the group of five bhikkhus at Sarnath, Armstrong contextualizes these foundational teachings within the framework of the Noble Eightfold Path as the Middle Way between sensual indulgence and self-mortification.
>
> The talk examines the First Noble Truth of dukkha, exploring its three dimensions: dukkha-dukkha (the suffering of pain), viparināma-dukkha (the suffering of change), and saṅkhāra-dukkha (the suffering inherent in conditioned existence). Armstrong emphasizes that dukkha encompasses a spectrum from subtle dissatisfaction to intense anguish, connecting all beings in shared vulnerability while opening pathways to compassion rather than isolation.
> Addressing the Second Noble Truth, Armstrong explores taṇhā (craving) as the root cause of suffering, encompassing craving for sensual pleasures (kāma-taṇhā), existence (bhava-taṇhā), and non-existence (vibhava-taṇhā). He demonstrates how craving includes both greed and aversion, showing how the constant mental corrections we make to improve our experience actually disturb our natural peace. The teaching concludes with the practical application: the First Noble Truth is to be fully understood, while the Second is to be abandoned through insight rather than willpower.

I'd like to talk this evening about some of the most classic teachings from the Buddha, which is part of the Four Noble Truths. Because it's a longer retreat, we want to go into a little more detail, so I'm just going to talk about the First and Second Noble Truths.

Sometimes when people hear this topic, some resistance comes up. "Oh, I don't want to know anymore about suffering." But what the Buddha said about it is that the understanding of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy. So I hope this will be your experience in the talk this evening.

I will base this talk in part on the discourse in the suttas that relates this teaching. It's part of the Connected Discourses of the Buddha from the Samyutta Nikaya.

You may know the background to it. The Buddha had spent six years in very intensive meditation practice, seeking the liberation of heart and mind. When he finally came to that realization that freed him underneath the Bodhi tree in Bodh Gaya in Northern India, he didn't do anything for forty-nine days. He just sat under the Bodhi tree and in the area and delighted in the bliss of deliverance. He soaked in the joy of liberation.

He thought that he probably wouldn't teach. He said, "People won't understand. What I've seen is subtle and hard to get. I don't want to bother trying to put this out." Then it is said that a heavenly being came down and said, "Venerable sir, there are those with little dust in their eyes. Please make the effort to teach for the benefit of beings." So he said, "Okay."

He looked around to see what beings might have little dust in their eyes. He came upon this group of five people that he had been practicing with earlier. He had been on a very ascetic path, and these five other men were his companions in that journey. With his psychic vision, he saw that they were now residing near Benares in Sarnath, in the deer park. So he decided to walk there. It was 150 miles, and it was apparently in the springtime. He just set out walking, collecting alms along the way.

Days and days later, he reached there and found this group of five. They saw him coming and thought, "Gautama looks too fat. He's eaten. That's no good. So he's fallen off the path. We don't want to listen to him." But he approached them. He said, "You should listen to me." And they said, "No, no, no, you're too fat now. We don't want to hear you."

But they were struck by his bearing and his dignity and his radiance. They said, "Well, maybe he's got something to say, so we'll give him a chance."

So after six years of practice, full liberation, forty-nine days of reflection, and a 150-mile hike, this is what he said:

"There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus of the group of five thus..." In this context, bhikkhus refers to—serious commentators say—any serious practitioners. Normally it means a monk, a mendicant. But in this context, it means a sincere and dedicated practitioner of either or any gender. So you are all bhikkhus by this term as we're practicing here together.

"Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness and sensual pleasures, which is low, the way of worldlings, ignoble, unbeneficial. And the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, unbeneficial.

"Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way." Tathagata is the term that the Buddha most often used to refer to himself, so it's synonymous with Buddha. "The Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

He is staking out a new spiritual vision in this teaching, which avoids the extreme of indulgence in sense pleasures or making sense pleasures the central focus of one's life. He's not saying that lay people shouldn't enjoy sense pleasures—we enjoy a lot of sense pleasures.

We experience music and food, relationships and entertainment, clothing and art, travel and countless other pleasures. The Buddha is not saying we should reject these entirely. Rather, he is cautioning against making the pursuit of such pleasures the central organizing principle of our lives.

When we look around the world today, we can observe countless people whose existence revolves entirely around chasing these kinds of sensory experiences. We see individuals addicted to substances, to entertainment, to food, to endless acquisition. This represents one extreme that the Buddha advised we avoid.

The other extreme to be avoided is self-mortification—those ascetic practices the Buddha himself had pursued during the earlier years of his spiritual quest. He discovered that inflicting pain upon the body does not lead to genuine health, happiness, or freedom. We encourage this same understanding here in our practice: do not punish your body through excessive sitting, walking, sleep deprivation, or over-effort. Do not become rigid or tense in your practice. The middle way embodies harmony and ease.

The Buddha continued: "And what, bhikkhus, is the middle way awakened to by the Tathagata, which gives rise to vision and leads to nibbana? It is this Noble Eightfold Path: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration."

This marks the Buddha's first declaration of his path. He presents it as the middle way and delineates the eight components we are practicing and developing together during this retreat. We are cultivating all eight aspects of this path in our time here.

Carol spoke extensively about right view recently, and it bears noting that the classical definition of right view encompasses the Four Noble Truths. To truly align ourselves with the Buddha's understanding—which is the essence of right view—we must orient ourselves toward these Four Truths. This is why they hold such central importance in the entire framework of dharma teachings.

Tonight we will explore the first two truths, with the others to follow as our retreat unfolds. I wanted to offer this teaching now to establish a common vocabulary we can carry forward together. The Four Noble Truths form the foundational framework of all the Buddha's teachings, and this language will resurface throughout our time together.

Let me briefly outline these truths: The first truth acknowledges suffering. The second identifies craving as suffering's cause. The third proclaims that suffering's end lies in the cessation of craving. The fourth reveals that the path to suffering's end is the Noble Eightfold Path itself.

This structure possesses an elegant symmetry. The first pair addresses suffering and its origin, while the second pair presents suffering's cessation and the means to achieve it. We can imagine the Buddha, with his profound wisdom, compassion, and clarity, contemplating how best to share his discovery and creating this beautiful framework.

What strikes me as particularly significant is how causality rests at the very heart of this teaching. When you examine the Buddha's core teachings closely, you discover that cause and effect permeates everything—the Four Noble Truths, the law of karma, and dependent origination all rely on this principle.

Why does causation hold such central importance in Buddhist understanding? We will return to this question, but I suggest it is because when we remove the notion of a controlling self as the agent behind all events, we must explain reality's unfolding through selfless processes. This happens through the interaction of causes and conditions operating according to natural laws. In Buddhism, these causes and conditions replace both the concept of a controlling self and the idea of a creator deity orchestrating every detail of existence.

This provides our overall framework, which will likely resurface many times throughout our retreat.

Now let us hear what the discourse reveals about the first Noble Truth. The Buddha continues directly: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the Noble Truth of suffering. Birth is suffering, aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering. Union with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not to get what one wants is suffering."

I find this formulation deeply moving because of its universal applicability. Is there anyone who has not encountered these experiences? While you may not remember your birth...

Well, I can't remember that actually, but I bet my mother did. So there is definitely suffering in birth. Aging is suffering, illness is suffering, death is suffering. I can attest to aging and illness. I can't yet attest to death, but I suspect. Union with what is displeasing—has that occurred since you've been here? Probably. Separation from what is pleasing—we experience that a lot. Not to get what one wants—it happens all the time, doesn't it?

So these are very universal statements. We can see how true they are for us. And then he sums it up by saying, continuing in brief, "the five aggregates subject to clinging are suffering." The five aggregates are a description of the mind-body process of a human being. And when there is clinging involved with the five aggregates, they're suffering in that experience of living. So that's a very broad and universal definition of suffering.

But actually, there's a Pali word that's being translated as suffering, which most of you probably know—the Pali word dukkha. It's a word that is not really translatable into English. So most translators use this word suffering, but it's not quite the right fit because other translators have used for it anguish, stress, unsatisfactoriness, unreliability, unhappiness, and dissatisfaction. Because in fact, dukkha points to a range of the unsatisfactory aspects of life that go from very subtle friction to the most intense physical and mental pain imaginable. So dukkha encompasses that whole spectrum.

And it also has an underlying quality—you might say that it's impossible to put it all right, that this unsatisfactoriness is an integral part of our experience of living, and it's impossible to fix that part.

Now, sometimes people say that the first noble truth says life is suffering, but it doesn't say that. That would be a very gloomy statement for a religion, and Buddhism does not say that. But it does say that unsatisfactoriness is an integral part of life and will continue in all these different ways.

But it is kind of interesting that for a religion that has suffering as the first truth, there are a lot of happy people in the Dharma. And there are a lot of happy people in life generally, but Dharma practice leads to a lot of happiness. This is kind of interesting. So it's almost pointing that the more we open to suffering and accept it, the happier we become. And even though dukkha is unavoidable in different ways, it is true that one can live life as a basically happy person and that the outcome of our dharma practice leads in that direction.

So don't be misled by the emphasis here on dukkha—that a huge amount of suffering is always intrinsic to every human life. It's not like that. As we understand more and more with wisdom, the baseline of life becomes happiness and contentment. And the obstacles that come along can be accommodated more and more easily.

But it does point to something about human life that has a quality, when unexamined, of a lack of fulfillment, a lack of satisfaction. And of course, this is very widespread. We may see it, but the whole world feels it. This is a wide, wide truth.

This is from an article in the New Yorker: According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1,200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed by positive logic that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be given everything it must put up with.

Nine out of ten respondents—identified by just their initials for the purpose of the survey—stated that they would give up completely if they knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail. In a personal note in the afterward, researchers stated that, statistically speaking, life is, quote, "just too much," and as yet they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through it at all. From Duke University.

So you may feel like that here sometimes—life is so hard, I don't know how I'll get through it. Unfortunately, your chance of getting something in the mail has now gone away. You're stuck.

This can be a little bit of a daunting picture when we start to take in the width of unsatisfactoriness. And yet it is an integral part of our practice to open to this and unfold in it with wisdom.

This is a comment from Ajahn Suchitto that stresses the difficulty of the work. Ajahn Suchitto says, "We may feel that somehow we have to get ourselves out of this predicament, but then we realize we are the predicament. So how do we get out of that?"

So it's a very interesting process, coming to terms with this first noble truth and the truth of suffering. Often before we meet the Dharma—and even after—we may think "I am suffering," and that suffering tends to isolate us. But if we can see it in the context of the first noble truth, we realize that suffering is everywhere. Rather than separating or isolating us, if we understand it rightly, it connects us, because every human being, as we understand this truth, is dealing with the same realities that we are.

This both opens a doorway to compassion and overcomes feelings of isolation or loneliness. This is from a poem by Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian American poet. The poem is called "Kindness": "Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive."

All of us are in this situation together. We all share this vulnerability of human life.

The Buddha talked about three particular kinds of dukkha that we should investigate. The first he called dukkha-dukkha. This is like when you go get a double shot of espresso—this is the double shot of dukkha, which means it's the pain of pain. The pain of pain we see all around us on the evening news at night. We read or hear reports of the wars in Syria. It got to the point where I couldn't turn on the evening news because I couldn't stand to see another hospital full of bleeding children in Syria. It was too much for me. The war in Iraq continues. Flare-ups in combat in Afghanistan are still ongoing. On those massive scales, people are undergoing horrendous suffering in that part of the world.

Illness is rampant. Malarial deaths in Africa are about half a million a year now—something that should be easy to fix with mosquito nets, but still 500,000 people a year are dying from that disease. Closer to home, we read frequent accounts of murder, domestic violence, and child abuse. As we start to wake up to the social aspects of this country, of the United States, we start to understand how racism has oppressed and harmed people of color, how homophobia has oppressed and harmed the LGBTQI community. Often from very young—as soon as people are able to perceive themselves as different from the dominant cultural norm—there is often an overlay of not being quite good enough. That message, communicated again and again, is its own kind of trauma for people who grow up marginalized and excluded from what looks like the mainstream.

Even in a sangha like ours, we talked a few years ago in a group of senior students about the most common forms of suffering, the most difficult forms that people were experiencing. These were people who had good jobs and health care and reasonable health. They cited things like loneliness and lack of connection with others, the frequency of difficult emotions like depression, sadness, or anger, pressures at work, fear of inadequacy, fear of not being able to perform to standards, their own aging and illness, looking after aging parents, looking after children who were having a hard time coming out of their teens and into young adulthood, and anxiety about the future. All these forms of difficulty are part of the pain of pain, the suffering of painful experiences in life, and they meet all of us. None of us are free yet from these.

The second kind of suffering that the Buddha talked about is called the unsatisfactoriness of alternation—in Pali, viparinama dukkha. This just means that even when conditions are good, they will eventually change. When they change, if we're clinging to them, we'll suffer with their change. This really highlights the problem in clinging. If conditions are difficult and we hold on to that, we suffer right away. If conditions are good but we cling to that, they're subject to change and then we'll suffer when they change.

Ajahn Chah said it's like grabbing a poisonous snake. If you grab it by the head, you get bitten right away—and that's taking hold of the painful parts of life. But if you grab it by the tail, the head will swing around and bite you—and that's taking hold of the enjoyable aspects of life because they will change. So this is the suffering of alternation or change.

The third kind is the most subtle, and it's called the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena—in Pali, sankhara dukkha. This is a very interesting one to explore. What is being pointed to here is that all conditioned phenomena are unstable. We were at a set of teachings from the Dalai Lama some years ago down in Mountain View.

We were outside at the Shoreline Amphitheater. It was a beautiful spring day, and Shoreline is set up to have a number of seats toward the front of the amphitheater and a big grassy area at the back. They had the stage arranged to accommodate the Dalai Lama on a high throne, which he emphasized was not because he's vain or egotistical, but because these are high teachings, and he wanted the respect for the teachings. Actually, what he was teaching on was the Heart Sutra, a central discourse about emptiness.

The stage backdrop, where all the speakers for the Grateful Dead would have been, was filled with this huge canvas painting of the Potala Palace back in the days when that was the Dalai Lama's home before the invasion and occupation. Seated on the floor of the stage were monks and nuns of every different Buddhist background. There were the black robes of the Japanese Zen monks and the brown robes of the Koreans and the ochre robes of the Theravadans, and there were monks and nuns and then of course many of the red robes of the Tibetan monks, all seated side by side on the stage.

Honestly, it felt like a Dharma Woodstock. I was just delighted to be sitting on the grass and feeling the vibes of all these beautiful people and hearing these teachings. But our minds stayed clear. So that was cool. Unlike Woodstock.

The Dalai Lama was talking about emptiness and he got to this part of talking about the three kinds of dukkha. He talked about sankara dukkha, and he said, "You have to understand this teaching on impermanence deeply. It's not that things go along solid for a while and then change and that that's impermanence." He said, "Things aren't solid for even a moment. Everything in our sense sphere is dissolving moment by moment as we experience it."

So the connection to emptiness is that not only should we not cling because eventually something will change into its opposite, there is in truth no thing there to cling to in the first place. There is nothing solid in our field of sense experiences that is hard enough to be taken hold of. Everything in the sense sphere—and you can look at this directly in your own experience in meditation—is dissolving moment after moment after moment.

The first two kinds of dukkha, the dukkha of pain and the dukkha of alternation, we can kind of see conceptually and we can understand by just reflecting on our experience over a long period of time. This third kind, the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena, we can only penetrate through meditative insight. And yet this is ultimately the most fundamental and the most freeing of the understandings of dukkha. So this is what we develop our meditative stability and investigation to learn about—this constantly dissolving nature of things.

There's one line in the discourses where a heavenly being comes down and is talking about their understanding of the Dharma. The heavenly being, talking about bodies, says, "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to form." So this could include actually all matter. Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to form.

Of course it's not just form that is dissolving, but our mental states are as well. So the hindrances arise and pass quickly. Beautiful states arise and pass quickly. Even meditative states—mindfulness and concentration arising, passing, arising, passing.

So this is what we need to understand: these three levels of dukkha. And the Dalai Lama said that if we truly want to help others, we need to understand all three ways in which people are affected by the truth of dukkha.

This sometimes seems like unhappy news, right? Because we think we'd like something to be steady and stable, something that we could hold on to that would be permanent and lasting. But it's not just bad news. This is from the Buddha: "If there was one speck of permanent form, the holy life for liberation would not be possible." So if permanence was an aspect of this universe, real permanence, we couldn't transform our hearts and minds and come to liberation. So it's not all bad news.

Now the Noble Truths, as it continues in this discourse, are not just philosophy. This is not something that we're supposed to believe in. Each one has a call to action. And this is a really important piece to understand.

So Right View is not just, "Oh, I believe that there is dukkha in life." There is a call to action. And what the call to action is for the First Noble Truth—this Noble Truth of suffering—is to be fully understood. This is our job, this is our work: to be fully understood.

The implication is we don't understand it fully yet. We may conceptually, but we're not living out that realization. Because if we saw clearly the insubstantial nature, the dissolving nature of things the way they are, we wouldn't try to hold on. But we do.

The Buddha put it this way: there is one thing because of the not seeing of which keeps you bound, and that is dukkha. In other words, we keep holding on because we don't fully understand the unsatisfactoriness of things. So we need to reflect on this truth again and again in our direct experience. We need to understand how dukkha is showing up in our immediate experience and recognize it as an aspect of the First Noble Truth.

Here's a question: When difficulty comes along, do we see it as an aspect of the First Noble Truth? When you're in struggle, when you're in suffering, do you note, "Oh, First Noble Truth"? I would say seldom. Because we do a lot of other things with that difficulty. We have a lot of stories about our suffering, about our pain.

Sometimes we deny it. Sometimes we blame ourselves for it. I remember doing this a lot before I met the Dharma. I thought, "Oh, there's something wrong with me." I took the pain really personally. I invalidated myself. I judged myself for the suffering that I was having. Or we might blame our parents or our teachers or society or our partner for it. Or we distract ourselves—we watch TV or have a drink. If we're in meditation, we turn to a pleasant fantasy.

But there's always the opportunity to just come and feel the pain and say, "This is the First Noble Truth. This is what the Buddha was pointing to." When we can do that, we put it in the context of practice, the context of understanding, and it also connects us to every being that lives today.

It's a delicate point because we want to open to and recognize the direct immediate experience of dukkha as the First Noble Truth. This is a practice point—an important one. Essentially, this is freeing. It's meant to be freeing to see this in its universal aspect and in its connecting aspect.

But if we make up a view or a belief about our life or about life in general, that it's all dukkha, that just gets depressing. That's taking it out of direct experience and making a belief about it. I hope you can feel the difference. This is not something to be believed in as a solid thing that is applied to all of life. "Oh, all of life is suffering." If we hold on to that view, that's depressing. We're going to get averse to life. We're going to get afraid of life. We're going to get negative. But that's not the way it's meant. If we can see the truth of it in the moment, that's what is freeing.

So we want to not deny this truth, and we also don't want to cling to it as a view. Clearly this was not the Buddha's intention in teaching—for us to cling and become depressed. The Buddha said, "A bhikkhu is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm herself with suffering. She does not give up the pleasure that accords with Dhamma, yet she is not infatuated with that pleasure."

So we have to open to the suffering and even, I would say, embrace it. Let me ask: Has suffering ever been useful in your practice? Have you learned from it? Would you be the person you are today if you hadn't had that suffering? Has it developed strengths in you? When we bring wisdom to our difficulties, it's a tremendous source of learning and growth.

I was practicing at IMS one year, working with Joseph Goldstein as my teacher, and I was about five weeks into a long retreat when I hit a really difficult patch. I was becoming very agitated. Some fear was coming up. A lot of physical energy was arising. A lot of thoughts and emotions were just racing through. I couldn't stabilize my mind on the present moment, on the breath or the body or anything. I was getting very discouraged. I went into Joseph and explained what was going on.

And he said, "Well, are you upset about this?" And I said, "Yeah, I'm upset about this." And he said, "Why?" I said, "Because I feel like my practice was deepening and now that stopped. I've lost the deepening of my practice. I've lost the thread."

And Joseph just sat back and smiled and said, "Guy, this is the deepening of your practice."

And then I got it. That's what I had to work with next. So I learned a lot from working with that. It opened a lot for me.

You all probably know who Ajahn Chah is. He was Jack Kornfield's first teacher and Ajahn Sumedho's teacher, a very revered monk in Thailand and great teacher. When he died, he passed the leadership of his monastery, which was Wat Ba Pong in the north-east of Thailand, to a senior monk at that time named Ajahn Liam or Lungpao Liam. Lungpao means spiritual father.

Lungpao Liam had been practicing with Ajahn Chah for a long time, and now he is still the abbot at Wat Ba Pong. He occasionally travels to the US and does a little bit of teaching. Well, Lungpao Liam was asked by another abbot of a monastery, "What was the hardest thing in your practice?" And he replied, "I would have to say that fear was the hardest thing for me." But then he paused. He said, "But just to say that it was hard isn't quite right. I would have to say that it was a worthy opponent. Working with fear brought about the growth of a lot of wisdom."

So this is part of the deal for all of us. These hindrances that come and the different forms of pain that arise really are our worthy opponents. And in this setting, we have the environment and we have the tools to learn to work with them. And I'm going to make a bold statement here: to master them, to find ways to overcome the suffering that these things could catch us in.

So these are challenges to our practice, but they are also the sources of a lot of wisdom. And we find through working with them strengths that we didn't know we had. So this is really what grows us up as human beings and opens us to a lot of understanding and a lot of compassion, lets us be able to help others going through the same thing.

The second noble truth. Don't worry, I'm not going another forty-five minutes. Just briefly, we'll go into the second noble truth. I'll read what the discourse says about that:

"Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the origin of suffering: It is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight here and there. That is, craving for sensual pleasures, craving for existence, craving for non-existence."

I was so relieved when I heard this second noble truth because it said the suffering you're experiencing has a cause. At that time, I thought my suffering was just a solid block that I couldn't understand. And this said, no, there's a cause to it. Because where there's a cause, there's a possibility of taking out that cause. So this statement really shows a way to freedom, a way to release.

Craving is the translation of the Pali word taṇhā. And in the Buddha's time, that was just an ordinary word that meant thirst. So you could say the cause of suffering is thirst. I like this expression because it suggests something about the craving. It suggests that it's a kind of natural thing that comes up, that it can be satisfied, but only temporarily.

Right? You're thirsty, you drink some water, thirst is gone. How long before it comes back? It comes back.

So that's the way it is with craving. We crave something, we give ourselves that thing, it ends the craving, we feel satisfied, but in not too much longer, craving comes back. So what is being pointed to here is that craving is a very deep-rooted tendency in the mind and will fasten on different objects, seeking delight now here, now there. But the fact is that it will keep coming again and again and again.

When thirst arises, do you tend to feel satisfied or unsatisfied? You tend to feel unsatisfied, don't you? When craving arises, do you tend to feel satisfied?

No.

So craving itself and its frequent reoccurrence engenders this frequent feeling of discontent. There may be nothing wrong in the situation as such, but when craving comes again and again, it feels like there's something missing. I need something more or I need something to go away. That's the meaning that comes when craving arises.

So one thing I just want to point out here is that craving, although it's a desire word, is not just about desire. Craving is essentially wanting things to be different than they are. Sometimes that means I want something pleasant to come in. Sometimes that means I want something unpleasant to go away. So craving, the word tanha, although it's a desire word in English, actually encompasses both wanting and aversion. Greed and aversion are both included in craving.

And delusion is also included in craving. This may not be clear why delusion is included, but I want to explain it in two ways.

One is we don't pay attention to the forces of wanting and pushing away. Because if we did, if we saw them with wisdom, we would see they don't work. These things keep us stirred up all the time. Take a look when you're sitting and some craving is there. You want the experience to be different. You want a little less body pain or you want a bit fewer thoughts or you want a little more concentration or you want back the bliss of the sitting that you had two days ago. We do things to make that happen. You've probably seen this. That's why our sittings are not peaceful—because we're fidgeting mentally and sometimes we're fidgeting physically due to the force, this frequent force of craving, wanting things to be a little bit different, more positive, less discomfort.

But we don't see that clearly and so we keep doing it. Are all those little adjustments that craving wants you to keep making ever really successful? Check it out. They keep us off balance, but rarely do they satisfy. So we don't see that. And so we keep doing that. We keep trying to make it a little bit better, a little bit better, a little bit better. But the very activity of that is what disturbs our natural peace.

The Tibetans have a saying: the essence of samsara is correcting. Samsara is the wheel of continued existence—birth, death, next birth, next death, and so on. It can be understood over many lifetimes, but it can also be understood moment to moment: forming a new sense of self, dissolving, forming a new sense of self, dissolving. That's what keeps us on the wheel. We want to make the moment just a little better. The moment's not right the way life has given it to us. We've got to correct the moment. That's what greed and aversion keep trying to do. But we don't see that we're doing it and we don't see how that disturbs our basic peace. So that's how delusion is wrapped up in craving.

The other way delusion is wrapped up in craving is this: when our vision is set on bringing in pleasure and pushing away pain, that's all we're interested in. The pleasurable things stand out strong in our field of experience. The painful things stand out strong in our field of experience. What about the neutral things? We blow those off. They don't register.

The Buddha has this nice statement: "Lust is a maker of measurement. Hatred is a maker of measurement." So we measure things by their ability to bring us pleasure or bring us pain. We're constantly measuring our sense experiences through that filter.

That's delusion because clarity is to see pleasant experiences, unpleasant experiences, and neutral experiences all with equanimity, with the same amount of clarity and emphasis. But when we're so focused on pleasure and pain, an element of delusion comes in and we don't see the neutral clearly. It doesn't have a charge for us, so we write it off.

This sutta talks about three different kinds of craving: craving for sensual pleasures, craving for existence, and craving for non-existence.

Craving for sense pleasures means pleasant experiences in the five physical senses. This is obviously a huge area of pursuit for human beings. I was curious about the statistics, so I looked on the web this afternoon. The restaurant industry in the United States generated $783 billion in 2016. Now, of course, people have to eat, but it's a lot cheaper to eat at home. $783 billion in the restaurant industry. Movies—the sense pleasure of seeing—$11 billion in the US in 2016. Recorded music, $15 billion in 2015. These are dipping, by the way. You probably know the music industry is in trouble. That's pleasant sounds, dipping.

But this one got me: the perfume industry. Pleasant scents. And this is just one kind of pleasant scents. This doesn't include deodorant and moisturizer and such. The perfume industry alone, worldwide, $29 billion a year on pleasant scents. Unfortunately, they're not wanted here because we are scent-free. But that's a lot of money for pleasant scents.

This is clearly a big pursuit for human beings. Why? Well, sense pleasures do bring some happiness. I love eating a warm chocolate chip cookie. It brings a real hit of happiness for me. But it doesn't last. They're temporary. It's not like a good meditation—it doesn't always last either, but it lasts longer. So there's craving for sense pleasures. They provide a temporary hit, but they don't bring lasting satisfaction. If we orient our lives around trying to get more and more of them, we're caught up in some level of frustration.

Craving for existence basically means wanting to be alive. According to the Buddhist teachings, we are all here because we wanted to take birth again. There was some unfinished urge from a past life that led us to want to be experiencing things again, and that's why we're here.

You notice how this plays out for us today—we don't want to die, by and large. Every being that lives does not want to die, and that's because of this deeply rooted craving for existence. In some ways, it's not all that rational. What if you went to bed tonight and just didn't wake up in the morning? Would that be a problem? It might be a problem for other people, but would it be a problem for you? If this train of consciousness just finished, there'd be no one to feel the problem. Yet we'd be terrified if we thought that was going to happen. This is just a very deeply rooted wish to be in this form, to have the sense experiences that we're having—one of the most deeply rooted wishes in our being.

Bhavatanha, the Pali term, also means craving for becoming. It means the wish to be something, to have an identity that we can coagulate around and identify ourselves as being something. We may want to have a particular career. We may want to be in a relationship. We may want to be a parent.

rich. We may want to be famous or athletic or something like that. Those are wishes for a particular form of existence that we call becoming. I like this quote from Lily Tomlin: "I always knew I wanted to be someone, but I guess I should have been more specific." So this is bhava taṇhā also.

And then vibhava taṇhā, craving for non-existence—this is basically the wish to turn it all off. When life becomes too much, when it's painful, this is the impulse to non-existence that is the motive for suicide. Don't want to experience anymore what's happening in the body, what's happening in the mind, what's happening in the senses. So this is based on a deep aversion to life.

So these are the forms of craving. And the second noble truth also comes with a call to action. And that call is this: the noble truth of the origin of suffering is to be abandoned. Abandoned.

So suffering was to be understood, and the cause of suffering, craving, is to be abandoned. This is our work. When we meet craving and its forms of greed, aversion, and delusion, we are to learn how to let go of those.

So you can talk about it in terms of the three kilesas, greed, aversion, delusion. You can talk about it in terms of the five hindrances that Bonnie talked about. You can talk about it in terms of the taints or āsavas. They're all pointing to the same letting go of these impurities that are deeply rooted in our mental habits.

Because they are so deeply rooted, we can't get rid of them through an act of will. We can't just decide, "Oh, I'm not going to have any more aversion today." It doesn't work that way. The abandoning of these forces comes only through deep insight. And in the Buddhist tradition, the understanding is that it comes through the direct realization of the unconditioned element or nibbāna. And that is what constitutes enlightenment.

So it is the direct realization of the unconditioned that has the potential for uprooting these forces in the mind.

So just really briefly, the second noble truth of craving is to be abandoned. The third noble truth, as I mentioned in the beginning, is that the end of craving is the end of suffering. The call to action there is that the third noble truth is to be realized. And the fourth noble truth of the Eightfold Path as the way to the end of suffering—the fourth noble truth is to be developed. So that is what we're doing here. But we will spend a lot of time looking at especially the second and third noble truths.

Some form of craving expressed as greed, aversion, or delusion. The abandoning of that means that in the moment that craving goes out of the mind—it disappears—in that moment, we move into a momentary experience of the third noble truth of the immediate end of that particular suffering.

So we could say that the heart of our dharma practice is to move from the second noble truth of craving momentarily into the third noble truth of the end of craving. This is the heart of the dharma. This is the heart of our practice. And as one teacher put it, our practice is to change the habits of mind that lead to suffering. There is no other practice.

Second noble truth moving into third noble truth. This is what we want to find again and again and again. And the more often we're able to find it on a moment-to-moment basis, the more often that quality of peace becomes established as the baseline of our meditation and of our life.

Okay, let's sit together for just a minute, please.

This noble truth of suffering is to be fully understood. This noble truth of the origin of suffering is to be abandoned. This noble truth of the end of suffering is to be realized. This noble truth of the way leading to the end of suffering is to be developed.

So we have about thirty minutes for walking and then we'll come back.

CHAPTER 161

Kamma and the End of Kamma (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

> In this retreat talk, Guy Armstrong presents kamma as "the science of happiness," offering practical guidance for understanding how our actions shape our lives and spiritual development. Drawing from the Buddha's teachings, he explains that kamma is action with volition (cetanā), where the underlying intention determines whether an action is wholesome or unwholesome. Wholesome actions arise from generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom, while unwholesome actions stem from greed, hatred, and delusion.
> Armstrong discusses the ten unwholesome actions of body, speech, and mind, and addresses common Western resistance to karmic teachings. He emphasizes that kamma operates as a universal law while acknowledging other causes of suffering such as illness, accident, and social conditions. The talk explores how karmic results manifest in six ways, from immediate feelings to habitual mind states and mysterious future consequences.
>
> The discussion integrates the teaching of anattā (not-self) with kamma, explaining how our personality is simply the flow of karmic patterns that can be transformed through practice. Armstrong concludes with the profound teaching that the Noble Eightfold Path leads to the end of kamma itself, where even wholesome actions cease in the stillness of nibbāna. This teaching connects directly to the retreat's equanimity practice and the classical phrase: "All beings are heirs to their kamma."

The talk tonight is on karma and the end of karma.

As you probably know, one of the central philosophical concepts in Buddhism is the concept of emptiness. A number of years ago, some Western teachers were meeting with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala, discussing dharma matters. They asked him what he thought they should really be teaching Westerners about. He said it's more important that you teach Westerners about karma than to teach them about emptiness. Why? Because it's so practical. Karma is so practical for our understanding of how to live and conduct ourselves in the world. That's what I want to talk about tonight.

This word has entered our Western vocabulary, but it's not very well understood in the West. James and I, some years ago, were teaching a meditation group at a juvenile hall in the Bay Area. We went in with some trepidation because we weren't sure if they would be interested in listening to two middle-aged white guys. But we were there for six weeks, one class a week, and it was very rewarding for us and for some of the people there too.

If you're not from this country, you may not know Juvenile Hall is a jail for people who are under the age of eighteen who have been charged with fairly serious crimes. People were accused of things like assault with a deadly weapon, grand theft, murder, and attempted murder, and they were awaiting trial. There was a huge amount of anxiety and worry on their part while they were in this facility. So we shared meditation techniques, much as we've shared with you, to give them some tools to meet the fear and anxiety and come to some calmness. Many of them really appreciated it. That work has since continued in a couple of other projects, both in the Bay Area and on the East Coast. It's good work.

When we were nearing the end of our class series, we said, should we talk about the precepts? We decided yes. And then, should we talk about karma? Yes, we thought we might as well talk about karma too. So on our last class, that's what we talked about—the precepts and karma.

We presented karma in the way that I'd like to present it this evening as the science of happiness. Whatever level of happiness you want to aim for—the three kinds: human, heavenly, and nirvanic—the teachings on karma give you instructions for how to get there. So karma as practitioners becomes our best friend, our most sincere and trustworthy friend on the path.

The teachings on karma get into mysterious areas, as you've probably been feeling as you've been doing the practice with the equanimity phrase these last few days. Some of these areas are not things that I can verify from my present experience. They are things that the Buddha said he could verify from his experience and his insight. I'm going to share some of that with you tonight. I don't think it's my job to tell you what you should believe, though I think it would be to your benefit to believe it. But I think it is really my job to tell you what the Buddha said on this topic. Then, as adults, you can form your own views and take it where you will, but it won't be because you haven't heard it.

We're going to look at this topic from a few angles. We're going to look at karma itself. We're going to look at the results of karma. We're going to look at the relationship between karma and the understanding of not-self. And we're going to look at the end of karma. So we'll come at it from a few directions, so please be patient as this unfolds.

First, what is karma? Karma is a Sanskrit word that originally simply meant action. That's all it meant at the time of the Buddha—action. The Pali term for it is kamma, with a double m, k-a-m-m-a. This evening I'll use the terms karma, kamma and action interchangeably.

In the time of the Buddha, there was a lot of debate from all these different philosophical schools about what action meant, what constituted significant action. Some teachers said that actions didn't mean anything. You could do anything and there were no results. Some said that results of actions were very important and had theories about what constituted them. Some philosophers said that actions were predetermined. There was no free will. Everything you were going to do in this life was already laid down by existing laws. Others said, no, there's free will and what you choose does make a difference. All these different theories were going around.

The Buddha said they're all speculative. He said that what he saw with his own direct insight from an extremely concentrated mind led him to a new formulation of the meaning of karma.

And this is how he described it. He said karma means action with volition. The Pali term for volition is cetanā, and we've been using it in our instructions with the translation "intention" — looking at the intention before we adjust a posture, before we walk through a door. This can be extended before we speak or act.

This is a direct quote: "Volition, O bhikkhus, is what I call action, for through volition one performs the action."

We could think of a few different synonyms for this word volition. Sometimes you could call it intention, motivation, urge, impulse, or will. I hope you can see that it's the underlying energy that makes an action happen, that pushes it forward.

In the Buddha's understanding, an action becomes wholesome or unwholesome depending on what this underlying motivation is. If the underlying motivation is wholesome, the action is wholesome. If the underlying motivation is unwholesome, the action is considered unwholesome.

Unwholesome volition, the Buddha said, is that which is influenced by greed, hatred, and delusion. We can see this in our personal lives, we can see it in the lives of individuals around us. These three motivating forces lead to the suffering of the world. That's why they're called, in the Buddha's language, roots of the unwholesome — these three factors.

We also see it in society and the institutions in society. Consumerism promotes greed. Racism promotes hatred. Biased media promote delusion. These forces are rampant in our world today, and they're all extremely destructive.

Wholesome volition comes out of the opposite of these unwholesome roots. So the opposite of greed is letting go, or the generic term the Buddha used is renunciation, sometimes relinquishment, and it's more often seen actively as generosity. Renunciation or generosity is the undoing of greed. Aversion or hatred is undone by loving-kindness, by mettā, and delusion is undone by wisdom.

So these are the wholesome roots: generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom. When actions come out of these motives, the act is considered wholesome.

Now, you can describe an action — someone takes a sharp knife and slashes open another person's stomach. Unwholesome? It depends on the volition. What if it's a surgeon removing a burst appendix? Then it could be a very wholesome action. If it's a robber trying to steal someone's money, it would be a very unwholesome action. So the volition is what we judge the action by.

Another example: if a baby is asleep, rolls over in their sleep, knocks over a candle, and the candle burns the house down — but somebody rescues the baby — that act has no karmic weight at all because there was no intention behind it. It was purely accidental rolling over, so there's no karmic result from an action like that.

And then there are actions that have mixed motives. We give something to someone, which is generosity, but we do it because we want something back, which is desire. So that has mixed wholesome and unwholesome motives, and many actions in the world have that mix, so they have mixed results as well.

The important thing here is that actions coming out of our volition have moral force based on the value of the volition. There are wholesome volitions and there are unwholesome volitions.

These actions in the Buddha's view happen in three areas: body, speech, and mind. Body and speech I think we can clearly see as actions. We may not have stopped to consider that our thoughts and emotions also are active and so carry karmic weight. However, the karmic weight of a thought or a feeling, if not acted upon outwardly, is much less than if that same thought or feeling is acted upon outwardly. So don't get too worried about the bad karma of seeing unwholesome thoughts because mindfulness is there to see them — they may actually be reducing. Don't get too concerned about the weight of that karma, although we'll talk about it more later.

Fortunately, the Buddha was very clear with us about what constitute wholesome and unwholesome actions. In specific, he listed ten types of unwholesome action — three of body, four of speech, and three of mind — that give us really clear guidelines on what not to do in the world.

The three unwholesome actions of body are killing living beings, taking what is not given, and sexual misconduct.

And you'll recognize these as the first three of the five precepts that we chant regularly.

The four unwholesome actions of speech are first, saying what is not true. And this is the fourth precept of the five that we regularly take. The other three are using angry or harsh speech, speaking maliciously of others, or entertaining ourselves with idle chatter and gossip.

There are three unwholesome actions of mind: covetousness, which means wanting what belongs to someone else; ill will or hostility; and wrong view. This is very interesting. If we misunderstand the nature of the way things are, this leads us to act unwisely in the world. So having the wrong understanding about the way things are is actually considered an unwholesome action. It's one reason that understanding right view is so powerful.

So the ten wholesome actions are to refrain from these ten unwholesome. And of course there are other wholesome actions that you can extrapolate, such as generosity, loving-kindness, and so forth.

A number of you will be heading back into daily life soon, and then the relational field becomes very, very important. So it's very helpful to reflect on these wholesome actions as you head back into daily conduct. We have a lot of choice in our actions in the world. And sometimes people ask, well, if everything is conditioned, that means my motivations are conditioned, how can I change?

Just because motivations are conditioned doesn't mean that they're determined. And they're not. Because as influence comes to bear in the moment, wisdom starts to change the habit of our intentions. So the wise approach is to act as though you have a choice. Act as though you have free will and bring as much wisdom as possible and kindness into that moment.

So then this leads—the actions then lead to future results. The result of karma is called vipāka, vipākakamma. And the basic teaching is that wholesome actions lead to wholesome results, or put briefly, happiness. And unwholesome actions lead to unwholesome results, or unhappiness.

When James and I were teaching at Juvenile Hall and we started to explain this concept of karma, we asked them, "Do you get this? Does it make any sense to you?" And one of the young guys raised his hand and says, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around?" And we said, "Yeah, yeah. That's pretty much it."

Put simply, here's the way the Buddha put it at the start of the Dhammapada: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

You may know that in Tibetan Buddhism, they also have the brahmavihāras, but they call them a different name. They call them the four immeasurables. And I want to read you the phrases that the Tibetans use for mettā and compassion and see if this sounds a little familiar.

Here's the phrase for loving-kindness: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." And this is the phrase for compassion: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue." This is their meditation on love and compassion.

Here's another way the Buddha expressed it, and you'll see how this ties into our equanimity meditation: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of that they will be the heirs."

So this is stated as a universal law. One of the things the Buddha stated that applies to all beings. So it doesn't matter if you know this law or not. It doesn't matter if you believe this law or not. It doesn't matter if your religion believes this law or not. It doesn't matter if your culture believes this law or not. This law applies. It's a universal law that operates for all beings. And the fact is that your growth in the path depends on this law, which we'll explain in more detail as we go.

So this reflection becomes the basis for our equanimity meditation.

All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own past actions more than on my wishes for them. The phrase "more than on my wishes" is somewhat optional, but I like including it.

This is obviously something that takes time to understand deeply, so I want to explain it carefully. There's often resistance to such a blanket statement, especially in the West, and I want to qualify it in ways that may make it more comprehensible.

I mentioned earlier the beautiful scene in the movie Kundun, the biography of the Dalai Lama, where the nine or ten-year-old Dalai Lama receives teachings from his tutors about the Four Noble Truths. They ask him to restate the Second Noble Truth in his own words. After a few formulaic attempts, he arrives at: "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind." The tutors respond, "Very good."

Most of our suffering does come from our own habits of mind. So another way to frame this equanimity wish is: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own habits of mind"—because our habits of mind are also karmic actions. They influence not only our thoughts and feelings, but our speech and actions as well. If this formulation makes it more reasonable for you, this is also an excellent equanimity phrase.

The Visuddhimagga, the Path of Purification, offers another perspective on this phrase, describing the four brahmaviharas in detail. Here's their explanation: "Beings are owners of their deeds. Whose, if not theirs, is the choice by which they will become happy or will get free from sufferings? Whose is the choice if not ours by which we will become happy or get free from suffering?"

This suggests a more forward-facing formulation: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness will depend on their own actions." This orientation helps because the backward-facing interpretation becomes problematic.

Consider the children in the Holocaust who died in the camps or watched their parents, sisters, or brothers die. Do we imagine that those four, five, or six-year-old children had created such negative actions in their short lives that they were destined for such suffering? Personally, that's difficult for me to accept.

We must question whether all visible suffering can be traced to individuals' past actions. Even in our society today, some people are born into favorable conditions that give them advantages throughout life, while others are born into circumstances that create obstacles and social headwinds in their development.

I'll share an example from a training on undoing racism by the People's Institute—highly recommended if you're interested in understanding the roots of racism in this country more deeply. One presenter was Diana Dunn, a white woman who had been with the organization for years. Diana had two children from two marriages. Her first marriage was to a white man, and their child was obviously white—perceived and recognized as white by society. Diana described how this child moved through the world with tailwinds at their back. All kinds of opportunities opened up in terms of schools, relationships, jobs, and so forth.

After her first husband died, Diana married Jim Dunn, the founder of the People's Institute, who was a black man. She had a child with Jim—as she put it, "went in the same way, came out the same way." But this child was perceived as black by society. This mixed-race child, raised with the same care, love, and wholesomeness of heart, faced headwinds as they moved through the world. The same doors did not open for them in school, relationships, work, and other areas.

Personally, I have no inclination to call such a situation karmic. It might be—I don't know. It might not be. We'll explore other causes in a moment. We simply cannot perceive such things clearly. To judge a situation we don't fully understand as purely karmic is a misunderstanding and misconstruing of reality.

The Buddha identified the workings of karma as one of four "imponderables"—things we simply cannot understand through reasoning. The others are the range of a Buddha's mind, the beginning of the universe, and the power of concentrated mind. The Buddha warned that whoever speculates about these four would go mad and experience vexation. Not recommended.

Yet speculation about karma continues extensively, doesn't it?

Have you ever gotten sick and had a friend say, "Oh, that must be your karma"? I don't know how you feel when you're told that, but I don't feel very happy when I hear this because it's simply a speculative view and it doesn't really help. Someone like a Buddha may be able to see the effects of karma, but generally we are not. So it's not helpful to speculate.

The Buddha never said that everything that happens is the result of past actions. He was once asked to endorse this view, and he would not. He said that philosophers who make such claims are overshooting themselves—meaning, it's a polite way of saying they're talking about what they don't know. He explained there are many other causes for painful and unhappy conditions we see in the world, mentioning illness, diet, climate, accident, and assault.

As I understand it, there are many causes for the way our lives unfold—physical causes, biological causes, chemical causes, as well as karmic causes. All these different kinds of causes flow together and create the life we live. But the Buddha never said that everything about our life is due to past karma.

The way I read this teaching on karma is in a very broad view: wholesome acts lead to wholesome results, unwholesome acts lead to unwholesome results. It's much more helpful to think about it going forward. We don't have the vision to see karma as a rear-view mirror. We can't tell what acts got us here, and to speculate about them would be futile.

So let go of any judgment about the situation you find yourself in—thinking, "Wow, I must have done something really awful to get here." Over time, we've probably all done everything. We have all done everything. Trying to figure out what particular actions led to one particular result is not possible to do. I would let go of using karma as a rear view mirror and try to use it going forward. Let it guide your path and your life looking ahead.

Westerners often feel resistance to the teaching of karma. Perhaps it's because we have very strong democratic ideals of equality in the West, and it seems as though saying people are to some extent responsible for their own welfare is being cold or cruel or heartless or uncaring. But one thing not implied here is that beings deserve to suffer or deserve punishment for their actions. That sense of deserving and punishing is not at all in the flavor of the teaching on karma.

I believe if the Buddha had had the ability to reach into other human hearts and pluck out the cause of suffering, he would have done that for everyone who came to him, even the most hardened criminals. There's this beautiful story of Angulimala, who had killed 999 people—what's sometimes not mentioned is that this was under directive from his former spiritual teacher, a misguided teacher. He had killed 999 people and needed to kill a thousand. The Buddha was going to be his last victim.

So he stalked the Buddha and met him in the woods, intending to kill him. But the Buddha turned away from him, and Angulimala could not catch him. Finally Angulimala was so taken by the Buddha's presence that he asked why he had not run away out of fear. The Buddha said, "It's because I have stopped, Angulimala. But you have not stopped. You are still running."

At that, Angulimala asked to be taken as his student, and the Buddha assented. He gave Angulimala the teachings, the Four Noble Truths, led him to practice. And as these stories go, in a very short period of time, he was liberated. This was someone who had done many unwholesome actions out of deep wrong view, and yet the Buddha's relationship to him was entirely compassionate, leading him completely out of his suffering.

So the teaching on karma doesn't have any aspect of punishment, but it is a law. Expecting to do an unwholesome deed and not have any karmic result would be like expecting an apple to come off a branch and not fall to the ground. You can't interrupt the law of gravity and you can't interrupt the law of karma, according to the Buddha's teaching.

Another reason people sometimes resist is they think that karma, putting some responsibility on the individual, gives us an excuse for not caring—as though we would say, "Oh, that problem is their fault. They created that, so I don't have to worry about it."

That's not equanimity—that's indifference. Indifference is the near enemy of equanimity. It closes our heart off to others' suffering. True equanimity has to go along with metta and compassion.

So when we see suffering, we don't really care where it came from. If beings are suffering, compassion wants to alleviate it. We recognize the source could have been societal, internal, parental, or physical. We don't really care. If beings are suffering, then love and compassion want to alleviate that. And equanimity needs that infusion to be complete.

If equanimity leads to coldness of heart and not caring, it needs to be balanced with more metta and compassion. The four Brahmaviharas really need to work together.

When we look at the results of actions, we can see at least six ways that they happen. Let me name these and give examples.

First, there are results before we act. When you're thinking about doing something generous, how does it feel? It feels good, doesn't it? It feels uplifting. If you're thinking of doing something unkind, how does that feel?

I was on a conference call with a committee of a retreat center not long ago, and I had a conflict of opinion with someone else on the call. After the call, this person sent me an email and was still kind of taking on the argument in a tone that I felt was really disrespectful, not acknowledging any validity in my position.

My first impulse was to forward this email to the other committee members so they could stay current on our discussion. Something just didn't quite feel right. Although normally that's a reasonable thing to do, I saw that my motivation was actually to expose their disrespect to the other members and therefore undermine their status a little bit. Once I saw that, I couldn't send it. So I just picked up the phone and called the person and talked it through. That was a much happier solution.

When we're thinking of doing something unkind, if we look into the feeling as we're planning, it doesn't feel so good. We can pick up on that.

Second, in the moment that we do the action, we get a certain feeling from it. Doing something kind feels good in the moment. Doing something that hurts another, if we're sensitive, we feel the hurt ourselves. Sylvia Boorstein has this very nice saying: "Someone causing great pain is themselves in great pain"—even though they may not know it. As we tune into that, we feel how it is to be kind, feel how it is to be unkind.

Third is when we remember our past actions. In metta practice, we're encouraged to start metta for ourselves by remembering things we've done that have been kind or generous. As we do that, we really rejoice in those memories. We appreciate having done those things and it aids the metta.

The other side is that in long retreat, often there will come to mind ways that we've hurt other people. We sometimes go through this process of a life review. When I first sat a long retreat, many memories came up of unskillful things I'd done—some when I was very young, some when I was in my teens. Each one landed with a strong hurt as I reviewed them from this place of caring about people.

This life review is important, and it's important to feel that we're open enough to feel that remorse for the things we've done that were unskillful. Gradually, by allowing the remorse to be felt, we still regret the actions, but the intensity dies down. It's as though we've taken that into account and we strengthen the resolve not to act that way again.

Fourth, our actions come back to us in the way people relate to us. If we're warm, generous, caring, and loving, people will respond with warmth and generosity and care and love. If we're often angry, critical, and judgmental, people will shy away and not want contact with us. Our relationships are often mirrors of our own moods and mind states.

Fifth, we see actions come to fruition in habitual states of mind. Where does your mind go when it's left alone? Often we have deeply ingrained habits and tendencies that vary from person to person. Some will be in the loving direction, some may be in an angry direction, some may be in a generous direction, some may be in a desirous direction. In many ways, what we're seeing when we sit and these moods and thoughts come, we're seeing the effect of past investments of energy and volition.

These habits have gotten created in our minds like grooves—well-worn grooves that very easily, left to their own devices, allow thoughts and emotions to fall back into familiar patterns out of habit.

The Buddha taught: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, or cruelty, their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of renunciation, kindness, and compassion."

This was 2,500 years ago—the Buddha describing the neural wiring and patterning of our reactions. There's a lovely quotation sometimes attributed to him, though I don't believe he actually said it. Still, it captures something very accurate: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit, and habit hardens into character. Therefore watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

The sixth way that results come, according to the Buddha's teaching, is through the mysterious workings of karma—events that happen to us in the future springing from past actions where we cannot see the connection, but which the Buddha says are happening nonetheless. We may not see the immediate result of our generosity, love, or compassion, but the Buddha says: be assured that those actions will bear wholesome results. Don't doubt that this is the case.

I find this deeply interesting because it suggests that morality is woven into the very fabric of the universe. If this is a universal law applying to all sentient beings wherever life exists, then morality is fundamental to how the universe is designed. It cannot be avoided.

For me, this view brings heart, warmth, and care. I don't want to live in an immoral or amoral world. I want to live in a moral universe. Karma as a teaching points to the essential nature of morality as being woven into the way existence itself is structured. It's more than just an evolutionary adaptation—it's in the heart of sentient life itself.

I don't know how that happens. I think it's a huge mystery. But I think it's a beautiful mystery, and for me, it's a heartwarming one. It tells us we don't live in a cold universe.

When someone says, "I don't believe in karma," they usually mean this sixth kind—mysterious things happening based on our present actions. The first five kinds of results are quite verifiable. You can observe all of these from your own experience over time. The sixth one isn't really verifiable unless you're very developed, as the Buddha was.

So I would simply say: keep an open mind and consider that it might be true. If you take a stance today saying it's not true, you don't know that for a fact. You're closing off a possibility based on something you don't really know one way or another. If you keep an open mind, you can investigate and observe over time—yourself and your friends—and see if long-term results of people's actions begin to make sense through this lens.

And if you're willing to keep an open mind about this, then you can keep an open mind about the next topic: rebirth.

When I came into dharma practice, I was skeptical about rebirth. I had a scientific background in college, and it didn't land naturally for me. But I kept an open mind and remained open to the possibility.

There are discourses where the Buddha speaks very specifically about actions and how they influence future life. He says that generosity leads at some point in the future—perhaps in some future life—to abundance in material things. Non-killing leads to having a long life. Non-injuring of living beings leads to health of body. Inquiry, asking questions of wise people, leads to growth in wisdom.

These are instructions for how to act now with the possibility that future wholesome results will come into our lives either now or in a future birth.

Here's another quotation from the Buddha—you'll recognize that he comes from an agricultural culture: "Grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, servants, workers, and dependents—none of these can you take with you. You must cast them all aside when you die. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner. Therefore, do good actions."

Therefore, do good actions. Gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings after death.

I'm not saying you have to believe this, but you might want to consider what the Buddha said. If it's true, you'd really want to live carefully, right? And if that turns out not to be true, you wouldn't have wasted your life either. So it's a good wager.

The next teaching is not-self. How can karma and not-self go together? This was pointed up by a question that someone asked the Buddha in his time: "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" If there's no self, where do these actions come back and land? There's no self in the action, so where do they land?

The Buddha basically said, "You haven't been listening to me," and he didn't explain it any further. As fools rush in where angels fear to tread, I'm going to explain it a little further.

Here's how I understand it. The teaching on not-self simply means that there's no fixed entity within this mind-body process. But it doesn't deny individuality. This mind-body process is labeled Guy. That mind-body process is labeled Guru. They are different. The Buddha's enlightenment solved his problem, but it didn't solve mine. So we each have our own individuality that we live with and work through.

The metaphor that's often used for this is of a stream. A stream is a flowing body of water. If you step out here, the stream is flowing really strongly with all the winter rains. If you look down in that water, is there anything fixed in it? No. That water is changing every moment. There's new water, new pebbles, new twigs flowing past in every moment. It doesn't stay the same for one second.

Similarly, with what our experience is, does anything stay the same in the objects of the senses moment after moment after moment? It's all changing, isn't it? So this is called a mind stream. And we have in this room roughly a hundred different mind streams this evening, all carrying their own karmic patterns or whatever we want to call them.

There's a flow of experience that constitutes every sentient being. But just as we can call this the Spirit Rock stream, and it's different from the Mississippi River, so the mind stream we call Carol is different from the mind stream we call Sally. Those are useful designations.

So what's personality? Often what defines our core idea of self-image—who we take ourselves to be—is our personality. We think, "I'm a happy person" or "a caring person" or "a sad person" or "a fearful person." But what is personality really? Is there anything fixed in personality? Isn't it just the changing stream of thoughts and feelings and speech and action? Isn't that how you know someone? How they act, how they speak, how they feel and how they think? Isn't that roughly what describes someone's personality?

This is all karma—actions of body, speech and mind. That's our personality. That's all it is. And it's always changing. Our personality isn't fixed. Just as you've seen, your thoughts and feelings aren't fixed. They can change in a finger snap. So they're always changing, but they do have a patterning. Each of us has a sort of recognizable personality, which is the kind of patterning that we've developed in actions of body, speech and mind.

And as you know, it's not so easy to change one's personality. This is what Dharma practice is about—changing our being, transforming our being. But it's not so easy.

This is the profound meaning of this quote from the Buddha: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin." We're bound to our karma by the way it shapes us. We're conditioned by these patterns that we've invested in over and over again by reinforcing the volitions that are playing out in us.

These patterns are strong, but the beautiful thing is they're not fixed. Nothing in our being is fixed—not the patterns, not craving, not even ignorance. These are all still just arising and changing moment after moment after moment. And anything that has arisen can also pass away. Any patterning that has been established can be undone. This is the karmic principle that makes Dharma practice transformative.

The path itself is a karmic unfolding. We start with the conditioned habits of mind that we bring into practice from perhaps lifetimes of not understanding, craving, ignorance, and so forth. But as we encounter the Dharma, we start to bring in wholesome mind states: mindfulness, loving kindness, renunciation, tranquility, concentration, equanimity. And all these start to change us little by little by little.

It's as though we've got one big mind stream—let's call it our karmic river—that currently is flowing into Lake Samsara. Samsara is a very curious lake where what flows out just feeds right back into the source again. Lake Samsara is just this endless cycling of currents, and that's where we are when we come into Dharma practice.

But now some other streams start to come in from the side: mindfulness, compassion, factors of enlightenment, brahmaviharas, paramis. All these new karmic effects start to steer the stream in a different direction. They start to move it away from Lake Samsara directly toward the nirvanic ocean. That's the only place this leads. And it's important to know this because, as Yogi Berra said, if you don't know where you're going, you could end up somewhere else. We want to know where we're going, and we want to end up in Nibbana.

If there was anything fixed in us, the streams of Dharma practice could not change us. They couldn't turn us in that other direction. That's why the teaching on not-self—meaning there is nothing fixed at the center—is the avenue by which karma can unfold in us and we can change the patterning of our actions. They can liberate us because craving is not fixed and ignorance is not fixed. And that's the truth of not-self.

If you don't believe in karma, how could you explain the development of the path? We really can't.

Our situation is this: all of us are afloat on a sea of changing conditions. Most of them are outside our control—external things like the weather, to some extent our body, the interactions we have with people, the successes or disappointments we have in life. A lot of these are really beyond our control. But we have one really important thing: we have a rudder. We know how to steer.

The rudder for our journey on this unpredictable, uncontrollable ocean is karma. We steer through the force of our wholesome intentions. And the Buddha said that intention repeated over and over and over again is what takes us to a safe harbor—the safe harbor of peace, of safety, of security, of release, and of liberation. It's the only reliable rudder: loving kindness, mindfulness, wisdom, compassion, equanimity, concentration.

There's a quotation from a teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj, a great Vedanta teacher in India in the last century. He mostly taught through dialogue. In one conversation, Maharaj says, "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny." The questioner responds, "Well surely karma interfered." And Maharaj replies, "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

Your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character. These are the wholesome intentions of Dharma practice.

This brings us to the end of karma. In this very mysterious statement, on a number of occasions, the Buddha said for the arhat, there is no more karma. For one who is fully liberated, that person has come to the end of karma. It's not that the enlightened person doesn't act anymore, but somehow that person has stepped out of the cycle of karma.

How does this come about?

There are a few quotations in the Anguttara Nikaya that point to this. The Buddha asks: what karma is neither painful nor bright, with neither painful nor bright results, which leads to the destruction of karma?

He's outlining that there are painful actions that lead to unwholesome results. There are bright actions—positive actions like generosity, acts of loving kindness, acts of compassion, positive outgoing expressions of wholesome intention. But he's saying there's another type which is neither painful nor bright, and it leads to the destruction of karma.

What is that kind of action? It is this Noble Eightfold Path: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. This Noble Eightfold Path is the action that leads to the destruction of karma.

Because even positive actions like generosity or loving kindness can be done from a base of self: "Oh, look how good I am. Oh, they'll really like me for this. Oh, I'm really a good person if I do this kind of action." They can sustain a self-image. But the Buddha isn't after a beautiful self-image.

And so here's what he says about peace: "This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

The stilling of all formations. So at a certain point in practice, we're not even attempting to do loving kindness. We're not even attempting to do generosity. All formations are coming to stillness. And this means that at a certain point in practice, meditation moves into more an arena of non-doing, of stillness and of rest.

This is the gateway at a certain point. We abandon any kind of self-oriented activity because at some point we see that all the urges are not helping at that point. And we trust more in the rest and the peace and the stilling and the non-doing. We trust in a deep stillness from which the mind may lean into the realization of the unconditioned, which is the root of liberation.

And as the Buddha said, it is this Noble Eightfold Path that is the way leading to the cessation of karma—the peaceful, the sublime, the stilling of all formations, the end of karma.

So let's just sit together for a moment. "This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

CHAPTER 162

Brahmavihāra Instructions

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

In this dharma talk from a month-long retreat, Guy Armstrong offers comprehensive instructions for mettā bhāvanā (loving-kindness cultivation), one of the four brahmavihāras. The teaching begins with appreciating one's own spiritual progress and beautiful qualities developed through dedicated practice, before moving through the traditional sequence of sending loving-kindness to oneself, benefactor, good friend, neutral person, difficult person, and all beings.

Armstrong introduces a refined four-step technique for deepening mettā practice: visualizing the recipient, noticing the heart's response, directing the phrase toward them, and resting in the heart center to feel the resonance. He emphasizes the importance of sincere intention behind the traditional phrases "May you be safe from harm, may you be happy, may you be healthy, may you live with ease," explaining that the power comes not from mere repetition but from genuine well-wishing.

The instructions conclude with extending mettā to the retreat community, staff, and all beings everywhere, emphasizing our shared human desire for happiness and freedom from suffering. This practical guidance offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners clear methods for cultivating one of Buddhism's most fundamental heart practices.

So we'll simply review the instructions and some of the refinements that we've introduced.

Please begin by connecting to yourself once again. Just as you're sitting here, know yourself through this familiar experience. Bring to mind some things that you appreciate about yourself. In addition to all the qualities that you show in the world, remember all the ways that you've manifested beautiful qualities here during these past four weeks: your perseverance and courage, your dedicated effort, your willingness to look at whatever's in the mind and body, your care for the other yogis and empathy for them, times of spontaneous presence and being fully here, times of stillness and insight.

Even amidst the difficulty, so many beautiful qualities have been developed over these four weeks. Appreciate that it was your own wise efforts that brought those about. With deep appreciation for your dedicated work, wish yourself all the flavors of loving kindness: May I be safe from harm. May I be happy. May I be healthy. May I live with ease.

From time to time, come into the heart center, letting the practice be embodied, and just notice whatever feelings are there—a flavor of metta, patience, acceptance, friendliness, warmth, or anything else.

Now move into this practice that really emphasizes the receiving of the loving kindness thoughts. Imagine that all your closest friends and family, the people you feel most affection and trust for, are sitting in front of you in a half circle. Bring them into the room one by one or as a group. Look into their faces. Notice that each one of them is smiling at you with tremendous love and care. Then they repeat as a group your metta phrases to you, sending them as expressions of their sincere and deep caring about your well-being. If there's one person you're particularly connecting with, let them come into the center focus as they say the phrases for you.

Now thank your circle of friends, let them go, and bring in your benefactor. Remember how you've looked at them through the eyes of metta, compassion, joy, and impartiality. Come back to this wish for their welfare. Stop to appreciate all the things that you really like about this person—their good qualities, the ways they've reached out and supported you. With that sense of the great goodness of their heart, send your wishes of loving kindness to them.

I'm going to suggest a slight refinement of technique in sending metta to a benefactor or anyone. You can try it out if it suits you, or simply continue as before if it doesn't feel helpful. We'll break each phrase down into four parts.

First, call up an image of your benefactor. Second, notice what you feel when you see them. What's the immediate response of the heart? Third, have a sense that your phrase goes out directed toward the image. The image is a little in front, and the phrase travels from your heart center toward the image to reach them. Fourth, come back and rest for a moment in the heart center, the center of the chest, and see what's there. What did it feel like to offer that phrase to your benefactor? There might be a little resonance, a little echo of the metta offering.

Then again for the next phrase: image, feeling, phrase sending toward the image, feeling the echo in the heart center. Try this for a few minutes and see if it is helpful—image, feeling, phrase, heart center.

If there is some metta feeling toward your benefactor, you might play with a sense of radiating. Have a sense that the benefactor is in front of you. Rest your attention in the heart center and simply let the metta flow out toward the benefactor, quietly radiating that caring.

And then if you're ready, bringing in your good friend. Having a clear sense of their presence, perhaps seeing them or saying their name. And as you connect with them, remembering their good qualities—what is it that you like about them so much?

With that sense of your friend's goodness, then directing the phrases of loving kindness to the good friend. May you be safe from harm. May you be happy. May you be healthy. May you live with ease. Keep a clear sense of your friend's presence, and feel the meaning of the words as you say them. It's not just a mantra. The power of the practice comes from the sincere intention of wishing well.

If you like, you can also try with a good friend this four-step process for each phrase: bringing up the image, feeling what you feel for them, sending the phrase toward the image, resting in the heart center to feel that echo. You might see if it helps to synchronize these four steps with the breath, so that a phrase takes one or two breaths to complete the four steps. What I find helpful is to have the phrase go toward the person on the out breath—so you're breathing the phrase toward them. You don't need to rush this process or rush the steps. Let it be a slow, gentle offering. Find your own rhythm.

If there is metta present for your friend, again play with the radiating—just resting the attention in the heart center. Then it's like opening a door so the metta can just radiate out to touch your friend, just like there's a little lantern and you open the door and the light bathes your friend.

And then bringing in your neutral person. Feel their presence, see them—maybe you know their name, maybe you don't. If it's someone on the retreat, perhaps thinking back to when you first set eyes on them, had no special feeling for them, and then having meditated on them for some time, how that shifted. Remember whatever you have intuited about the neutral person's personality, joys and sorrows, their humanness, whatever you've seen of it.

Reflect that like all beings, they just want to be happy and don't want to suffer. This is our common thread—this unites us. So appreciating their humanity and sending your phrases of well-wishing to them.

Then bringing in your difficult person, if you feel ready. If there's an openness. Feel their character. Keep them at some distance if that's more helpful—that's fine. Notice what emotions come when you bring them in: any fear, resentment, hurt, drawing back. Allow all those feelings to be there in the space of caring.

See if you can find one or two good qualities in your difficult person. How would their friends see them? Send to the difficult person the same phrases you've used for the others, knowing they too are just trying to be happy, trying not to suffer—not needing to like them or want to be with them, just seeing if there can be a real wish that they be happy, that they be peaceful. If not, just repeating the metta phrases is enough.

If the difficult person stirs up too much fear, resentment, or hurt, then just go back to someone easier—yourself, benefactor, or friend. Settle with them, renew the metta.

And then letting go of the difficult person and opening up to all the people who are in the hall right now. You probably noticed some of the faces as they came in, some of the people sitting around you. Have a sense that you can open your awareness and let it encompass all the people who are in the hall—in the front and behind, to right and to left.

As you open your attention, let some of the faces and images of those people come into your mind. This has been part of our community for the past month. We've spent time in the hall, in the dining room, walking. All of us here for the same reason: finding happiness and seeking not to suffer.

With a lot of appreciation for what everyone has done this month, extend to them your same genuine wishes for their welfare. Feel their goodness, let your care pervade the space, and also send your wishes to them: May you all be safe and protected from harm. May you all be happy and live with joy in the world.

May you be healthy and strong. And if that's not possible, may you accept your limitations with grace. In your outer life, may you live with the ease of wellbeing. And may the force of loving kindness unite us through this retreat and the next. May we always look on each other with kindly eyes, appreciating our shared love for this dharma.

And then also extending the loving kindness to those who are down the hill right now, our other dharma brothers and sisters, still following the dharma path, doing a little speaking, a little listening, thinking of all their sincere intentions and efforts over these weeks. May those efforts lead them to the deepest fruits, the deepest happiness. May they all be safe and protected from harm. May they be happy and peaceful. May they be healthy and strong. May they live with the ease of wellbeing.

And then thinking of our managers who have looked after us—Anna, Diane, Carrie, Ramona, and Beth—here because they love the dharma also. May they be safe and happy, healthy, at ease. And all the other staff who came, who you met on that morning early on, must have been about thirty of them in here. And there are some forty to fifty total, making it possible for us to be here, and the cooks who have fed us so lovingly, so carefully. May they all be safe from harm, happy, healthy, and at ease.

And then letting the sense of loving kindness radiate in all directions—around us, above and below, all the human beings across the earth in states of happiness and states of suffering. And all the creatures of the land, of the air, of the lakes and rivers and oceans. May all beings everywhere be safe and protected from harm. May they be happy and peaceful. May their bodies support them with strength. May they live with the ease of wellbeing.

And may all beings be liberated.

CHAPTER 163

Suññatā: A Practical Introduction for Meditators

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this introductory talk on emptiness (suññatā), Guy Armstrong explores one of Buddhism's most central yet misunderstood concepts. Drawing from the Suññatā Sutta and the famous teaching given to Bāhiya, Armstrong explains that emptiness doesn't mean nothingness or nihilism, but rather points to the insubstantial nature of both self and phenomena. He examines how our conventional sense of 'I' is created through identification with body, emotions, thoughts, and the observer, showing how this creates suffering through attachment and clinging.
> The talk covers four main areas: emptiness of self (anattā), emptiness of phenomena, the spacious quality of awareness, and how understanding emptiness naturally leads to compassion (karuṇā). Armstrong illustrates these teachings through personal stories, including observations from his time as a monk in Thailand, and references the Buddha's radical definition of totality as simply "the eye and sights, ear and sounds..." He explains how seeing through the illusion of solidity—both in ourselves and the world—allows us to let go of the 'rope burn' of trying to grasp the ungraspable, leading to greater peace, freedom, and awakening.

The theme of this evening is the concept of emptiness—suññatā—which is the subject of my book whose official publication date is tomorrow. This is actually the first public talk I've given on this theme, as I usually teach it in the context of week-long retreats. There's a great deal to say about it, and we'll only hit the highlights this evening.

Emptiness is a central topic throughout all of Buddhism, from the very early days of the Buddha himself 2,500 years ago, through the evolution into later Indian Buddhism, Tibetan Buddhism, and Zen. If you search for it on Amazon, you'll find hundreds of titles on the topic in a Buddhist context. Why does it occupy such an important position in the history of this major world religion?

First, it's not a very appealing word, is it? Hinduism has bliss and devotion, Christians have love and charity, and Buddhists have emptiness. Why would anybody pay attention to this? Yet these understandings throughout the centuries have brought practitioners and meditators to the greatest depths of freedom, peace, and happiness. Emptiness is the common doorway among all traditions that leads into this deepest kind of understanding. It's a very important and revered concept in the tradition, though not widely understood, especially in the West where we're still learning about it. And it's not a simple topic.

I was visiting with the esteemed Tibetan Lama Mingyur Rinpoche, a young lama who recently returned from a four-year retreat wandering through the wilds of the Himalayas, far from any buildings or people, meditating in caves in solitude. He's a devoted follower of meditation, just like the ancient Tibetan practitioners and lamas. He's a very impressive being.

I had the chance to meet with him on his first trip to California in 1997 or 1998. My wife Sally and I drove him up to the top of Mount Tamalpais, thinking he'd enjoy the view and nature. As we drove up, I tried to make conversation. "How do you find the West?" I asked. "Square and clean," he replied. End of conversation. I tried another angle: "Do you think Tibetans are happier than Westerners?" "Yes." End of conversation.

At the top of Mount Tam, there's a path around the summit that takes about twenty-five minutes to walk and is only about six feet wide. I thought I'd better try a different approach, so I asked about the difference between two schools of Tibetan Buddhism—Dzogchen and Madhyamaka. Then his eyes lit up. "Ah," he said, "the first thing you have to understand is there are eighteen different kinds of emptiness." He sat right down on the path and launched into a discourse on the eighteen different kinds of emptiness.

I won't discuss the eighteen different kinds of emptiness tonight—that would take far too long. But this was a pointer to the fact that this is a broad topic, and we'll only touch on some basics this evening. I hope it might interest and inspire you to learn more.

What is meant by this term? The basic meaning of emptiness in the Buddhist context is that the world—which includes us—is not as solid or substantial as we normally take it to be. The understanding of that, when properly integrated into our life, our hearts, and our minds, leads to great spaciousness and freedom.

A couple of things to note: First, there's a way in which we haven't yet quite understood the world or ourselves.

So this pointing to emptiness, even with this jarring and provocative title, is meant to be a wake-up call. It's meant to provoke us to wonder, well, what's going on here? What is it we're not quite seeing? And what is it we could understand differently about ourselves and about the world?

The second thing is that our tradition that we teach at Spirit Rock is a tradition called insight meditation. The Indian term for it is vipassana. And what vipassana means is to see things as they are. So the idea is that we haven't quite fully seen things the way they are. And because of that, we're caught up in unhappiness and suffering.

So this is not just a philosophical exercise or an intellectual exercise. The purpose of looking into emptiness, the purpose of talking about it and reading about it is to free our hearts and minds so that we are on a path moving away from suffering and into greater happiness. So please remember that as the foundation of everything we're talking about tonight. It's a way to happiness.

Because it's a way to happiness, the sort of common way that we hold emptiness in the West—which might be of vacancy or total absence or nothingness or nihilism or despair—are not what the Buddha meant by the term emptiness. So I want to clear that at the very beginning. It's not about nothingness, it's not about going into a meditation where nothing happens as though that's the final result. Because any meditation you go into that's special in that way, you have to come out of and live your life again. But it's to change our understanding so that we relate to life in a freer way.

Now, a lot of you probably know that the Buddha talked a lot about impermanence. Everything changes. And the reason he talked a lot about impermanence is so that we wouldn't hold on so tightly to things. When we know things are changing, we tend to not clutch so tightly. We tend to relax, let go a little bit.

So emptiness builds on impermanence but takes it a little further. And I'll talk about that a little later. With impermanence, we see everything's changing. But when we see emptiness, we see it's changing so fast, there's nothing there to hold on to in the first place.

So emptiness doesn't mean that we're not supposed to have experiences. And it doesn't mean that the things of the world don't exist in some way. Suzuki Roshi said, the bird we see and hear exists. We're not denying that. But what I mean by exists may not be the same as what you mean by exists. And so this is what we want to look into. How do things exist? How do we exist? What is it about our life that we haven't quite seen yet?

So there are four main areas that I'll just touch on tonight. The book goes into more detail. One is emptiness of self. The other is emptiness of phenomena in the world. The next is this empty quality of awareness, which we pointed to in the meditation this evening. Could some of you connect with that? Could you feel that spacious quality through the meditation? Getting in touch with that emptiness is a way to hold things. And the fourth is compassion, because emptiness and compassion are closely related.

So I'll talk a little bit about emptiness of self first. Again, emptiness of self doesn't mean that we don't exist. But this is a quote from an Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj. And when he uses the word yoga, he means any spiritual teaching that leads to freedom. He said, "The aim of all the yogas is the same, and it's to free you from the calamity of separate existence."

This is something to reflect on. When we feel separated from the rest of the universe, we feel vulnerable. We feel at risk, we feel exposed, we feel distant, and we can feel afraid due to that. Seeing through this duality where we separate ourselves from the world lets us feel connected and not afraid any longer. So this is a big part of the motivation to understand the emptiness of self.

Now the Buddha pointed to this really directly. He had an attendant named Ananda, who was his cousin, and looked after him for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. He was a very sweet man. He's kind of the sweetest man in the old Buddhist texts.

Ananda was always a little behind some of the other monks, so he frequently came to the Buddha with questions. One day he approached the Buddha and said, "Venerable one, you speak of the world being empty. What do you mean when you say that?"

The Buddha replied, "The world is empty because it's empty of a self or what belongs to a self."

This is quite a strong statement. Does it feel like your life is empty of a self? Probably not. So this is, again, a provocative teaching that points to some fundamental misunderstanding in the way we hold the self.

Let me ask you some simple questions to see if some of this misunderstanding might reveal itself. First, how old are you? That's straightforward enough, as long as you haven't forgotten. So you say, "I'm thirty-nine," or whatever your age might be.

But when you say "I'm thirty-nine," what's really being pointed to here? Is your mood thirty-nine years old? Are your thoughts thirty-nine years old? Is your hair thirty-nine years old? Your hair keeps growing, doesn't it? It keeps changing. Your thoughts simply come and go in this moment. What exactly is thirty-nine years old? It's the body, isn't it? So when we say "I'm thirty-nine," we really mean "I am the body and it's thirty-nine years old." Here we are the body—I am the body.

Now let me ask you a different question. What color are your eyes? That's pretty simple. I'd say my eyes are brown. But notice—now I'm not the body. I'm the owner of the body. It's not "I am the eyes"—I own the eyes. They're my eyes.

So which are you really? Are you the body? Or are you something separate from it that owns it? Can you be both? How many selves are you in any given moment? Usually people who think they're more than one self in a moment get medicated. We generally think we're just one self, but look: are you the body or are you the owner of it?

Let's examine emotion. Sometimes we say "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." Here we take the "I" to be the emotion itself—happy or sad. But then we can turn around and speak of "my joys" and "my sorrows." So again, are you the emotion, or are you something separate that owns it?

This isn't mere wordplay. We genuinely feel both these ways inside. Sometimes when observing the body, you'll say "my knee hurts," and there's a real sense of ownership in that statement. At other times you'll say "I'm sick," and there's a suffering in that "I" that is sick. These are authentic feelings we experience, but they're sometimes confused. Are you the body or the owner of it? Are you the emotion or the owner of it?

Here's another perspective: Don't you often feel like who you most truly are is an observer located inside the head, looking out at the world? This observer seems to be seeing everything, hearing everything, feeling everything, positioned perhaps two inches behind the eyes and between the ears.

So this is a fifth way that we create the sense of I. All these ways are what in Buddhism is called identification. We're creating an I by identifying it with some aspect of experience—the body or the owner, the emotion or the owner, or the sense of the observer.

Can you be all those things? Can one entity be all those things? If you are your body, that means you're your liver and your toenail. If you are your emotions, that means your compassion and your anger. Is your liver the same thing as your compassion? Is there one self there?

I toss all these out just to encourage you that the way we use I doesn't quite make sense. We've used language like this since we were able to speak. And by using it that way and not examining it, we've come to believe that the word I points to something that actually exists, but it doesn't. There's only this collection of parts—body parts, thoughts, emotions, feelings, consciousness. There's no entity.

I invite you to look. See if you can put your finger on what feels like the real you in this field of experience. I just want to raise a question in your minds so that you might be encouraged to look. And these kind of confusing ways we hold I can do that.

William James, the philosopher, said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." It can be like that. We've used I in a lot of different ways in our language. Ludwig Wittgenstein, the philosopher, said that the I is just a shadow cast by grammar. There's nothing really there—just a collection of body, emotions, feelings, thoughts.

It's not a problem to use this language as long as we understand what we mean. There's a way in which each of us is a different being. We have qualities, characteristics of age and height and ethnicity and sexual orientation—all those things that are accurate. We can describe ourselves in those ways, and that's all fine. That's what we call the conventional sense of I, but it doesn't point to something inside here that exists as a single entity.

That's where we get misled. We think that there's a core in here, an unchanging kind of core. Because of that, we think it goes on over time. When we believe that, we're afraid of that continuity ending. It's the I that we worry about ending. When we really believe there is an I, we get scared. We're scared of death. When we take the I out of the picture to a greater or lesser or total degree, the fear of death goes away. You'll find this in spiritual writings all over.

So if the self isn't real, what is? There's this quite wonderful discourse that the Buddha gave about what really is here. I want to read it. It's very brief:

"Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of things." First of all, this is a bold statement, isn't it? Somebody's going to teach us the totality of things. Did Einstein ever say that? Marx ever say that? Did Freud ever say that? But here's the Buddha 2,500 years ago saying, "I'm going to teach you the totality of things."

"What is the totality? It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. If anyone were to proclaim a totality beyond this, that person would be speaking of something outside their knowledge."

This is a very interesting and radical kind of statement. If Einstein was going to talk about totality, would he use this description?

I don't think so. He would talk about space and time and the objects of mass like the sun and how they warp space and time. If Marx was going to talk about totality, would he talk about it like this? I don't think so. He would talk about socioeconomic systems and classes and the struggle over wealth.

So the Buddha is doing something really interesting when this is his definition of totality. What he's pointing to is our immediate experience: the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and taste, the body and sensations, the mind and objects of mind. Objects of mind are basically thoughts and emotions.

If you look at your direct experience, is there anything in your experience that the Buddha doesn't cover in this statement? Direct experience of a present moment: sight, sound, smell, taste, sensations, thoughts, and feelings. That's pretty much it, isn't it?

This is a map of our inner experience. And the reason the Buddha is pointing it out is that this is where our suffering comes from. Most deeply, our suffering comes out of our own inner experiences. And therefore, this is where our freedom has to come from—our own inner experience. So he's not approaching the world like an external, independent thing. He's inviting us to look at what's here, what's now.

So how does the sense of self get created out of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and feelings?

Let me ask you this. The word "I" comes up in our conversation a lot, right? We're talking with friends, we're thinking about our life, we notice the words I, me, my, and mine a lot. Do they ever come up on their own? Do you ever just sit there quietly in meditation and the thought comes up, "I"? Or the thought comes up, "me"?

It doesn't usually happen like that, does it? Doesn't the word usually arise in relation to something else? "I want to go to the movies." "I'd like a piece of chocolate." "My back hurts." "I need to see a doctor." So the "I" doesn't arise just by itself, but it arises based on these objects of the senses. I want, I need, my knee, my body.

This is significant, because what it means is that sense of "I" isn't always there. But it comes up again and again in relation to experience. And we claim experience: I see, I hear, I want, I'm afraid, I'm going.

So if the "I" isn't intrinsic—it's not there all the time—are there times when it's not there? When you're sitting really quietly in meditation and there are not demands from inside, is there a strong sense of "I"? Take a look and see. It's pretty light at those times, isn't it?

Other times, if you get upset, somebody says something discourteous or a driver cuts you off on the freeway, the "I" comes up really strong. "They shouldn't have done that to me." "I'm really angry." "I'm going to fight back." "I'm going to report them." Then the "I" springs up with a lot of life and energy.

And is that a happy state? Not usually. When we get caught in a lot of resistance, anger, fear, hatred, or a lot of wanting—"I've got to have that new car"—

I need to have that raise. I need more money. That's also a struggle.

When the "I" comes up strongly, take a look and see if there isn't some friction, some turmoil, some upset, and some suffering with that. It may be subtle: "I'd like some ice cream. I can't have it right now. I'll have to wait until I get back to Fairfax and see if the scoop is still open." That's subtle suffering.

Or it might be more obvious: "Oh, my son is really going through a hard period. He lost his work. He may lose his house. I don't know if his job will be there to provide income to support his family." Then that becomes a burden. That's difficult. That's suffering.

So take a look. Sometimes the "I" is really not making itself felt, and this is a doorway to freedom.

I want to tell you a story. At the time of the Buddha, there was a practitioner in the south of India. The Buddha had lived and taught in the north of India, sort of east of Delhi, between Delhi and Calcutta. That's where he wandered for the forty-five years that he was teaching. But his fame spread.

There was this practitioner in the south of India. He was a really good meditator, a spiritual teacher with many students. He lived very simply and had a certain purity—a purity of heart and mind that many people were drawn to. His name was Bahiya.

He knew that he was developed, but he didn't quite know how far. So he was sitting one day, meditating, and he wondered, "Am I fully enlightened?" Well, that should have been a clue, because if you're fully enlightened, you tend to know it.

The story goes that one of these heavenly beings called devas in the old texts read Bahiya's mind, heard that question—"Am I enlightened or not?"—and came down and spoke to him. The deva said, "Bahiya, you're not enlightened. Sorry. Not only that, you're not even on the path to enlightenment."

That was an honest response. Bahiya said, "Do you know anyone who is enlightened?" The deva said, "Yes, up in the north of India, in the town of Savatthi right now, there is an enlightened being and he's teaching. He's offering the dharma. He's alive and he's fully enlightened."

Bahiya immediately resolved to go there. There weren't airplanes back then—there wasn't even United Airlines! He just set out on the road, walking from the south of India to the north. It would have taken him weeks to get there. But his motivation was so strong, and he had faith that the account was true.

He came upon the Buddha one morning while the Buddha was walking into town with his alms bowl. Monks are mendicants and have to make themselves available for food to be offered to them. So the Buddha was walking through town with his alms bowl, and Bahiya found him.

"Are you the Buddha, the one that I have heard about?" And the Buddha said, "Yes."

Bahiya said, "Please, venerable sir, teach me the Dharma. Teach me in brief because life is short. Who knows what will happen to you or who knows what will happen to me? Please teach me."

And the Buddha said, "This is not the time, Bahiya. I'm walking the streets for my morning round for collecting breakfast."

But Bahiya entreated him again. He said, "Oh, please, sir, please give me the teachings in brief because life is short. Who knows what will happen to you or happen to me?"

The Buddha again declined. Bahiya asked a third time, and that's the way it goes in the suttas. You ask three times, the Buddha said, "Okay."

And this is the teaching that he gave him: "Okay, Bahiya, this is how you should train. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here, nor there, nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Bahiya's mind was very ripe. He heard that teaching, that direct pointing, and he immediately awakened. Full enlightenment. On the spot. The Buddha later described him as the person who was foremost in quickness of learning of all the people he taught. Bahiya got it. Like that.

And then he expressed his gratitude for the teaching, wandered off, and that very day, that same afternoon, was walking through a meadow. There was a mother cow guarding her calf. The cow felt threatened, gored Bahiya, and he died.

So all the monks were concerned. This beautiful spiritual seeker had come, died that very day. But the Buddha said, "Don't worry, he understood before he died. He fully awakened and was released just on the basis of that short hearing."

So this is a good teaching to contemplate. You never know when it might happen again. Basically what the Buddha said: if you don't make I and mine, there's no suffering. There's no suffering.

This is an instruction that we can take in practice. When we look in our experience and we see what's happening, maybe fear is arising. We could say, "That's my fear" or "I'm afraid." Or we could just say, "Fear is arising."

We could say, "I'm sitting in meditation. There's a pain in this part of the body. My knee is killing me." Or we could just say, "Strong pain is arising."

Play with it and see how it feels to say what's happening without the I and my. It can make it more spacious, more equanimous. Through the process of meditation and examining this formation of I and kind of letting it come and go, we don't take it quite so seriously. We don't believe in it so strongly.

And as the sense of self thins, more of that spacious relationship to life opens up. We don't hang on so tightly. And we have more of that open awareness that perhaps we touched in the meditation earlier.

And then it leads onward. That peace and the ease of that continue to deepen.

So that's just a brief look at the emptiness of self. Then the next thing the Buddha pointed at was the things of the world. He said they're not as solid as you think they are. It feels like it, doesn't it? This table, these chairs, the floor—they all feel really solid today. But knowing twentieth-century science and quantum physics, are they? What are they mostly made of? Space, right? The neutrons and protons in the center of an atom are just at the center. The electrons whiz around the outside, and most of that atom is space. So most of the matter that we see is actually space.

Scientists only discovered this in the last hundred years, but the Buddha discovered this twenty-five hundred years ago.

I want to read from a discourse called "A Discourse on a Lump of Foam." On one occasion, the Buddha was dwelling on the bank of the river Ganges, and he addressed a group of monks in this way: "Monks, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, monks, whatever matter there is, a person inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. What substance could there be in matter?"

So here the Buddha is reporting, twenty-five hundred years ago, the lack of solidity in all matter—every form of matter on the face of the earth—which he realized from his direct meditation experience. It was not through scientific instruments; it was from his firsthand experience. And this kind of exploration is available to us also. Matter is like a lump of foam. How can that be?

One year I was teaching a retreat up the hill at the retreat center, giving a talk in the evening in the hall up there. Sometime in the middle of the talk, there was this loud scream from outside. It sounded like a baby crying really loudly. It was a little unsettling for everybody to hear, but it passed. Some of the staff went out to see what had happened, and I kept giving the talk.

After the talk, I went outside to see what had happened. The staff were gathered around the body of a deer. The deer was lying on the ground with its neck at an unnatural angle. The staff had checked and found the deer was dead. They said that when they first went out, they saw a couple of large dogs running away from the deer.

This happens in Woodacre. There are lots of deer in the hills, and sometimes there are loose dogs who will attack and kill the deer. But I hadn't seen that happen at Spirit Rock before, so it was kind of a shock.

We stood around, made a circle around the deer, and sent it thoughts of loving-kindness for whatever its journey was going to be. We did that for a while and then went on with the rest of the evening's program.

One of the staff members called the Humane Society and said, "We have the body of a deer. We don't want to just leave it out here. Could you come pick it up?" The Humane Society said, "Sure. Take it down near the entrance and we'll come by tomorrow and pick it up."

So the deer was brought down near the parking lot, just by this meditation hall. The Humane Society never came.

Over the next two weeks as I was teaching the retreat, I would stop by and look to see what was happening to the deer. You probably know that on this land, we have raccoons, vultures, crows, ants, badgers—all kinds of scavengers. Every day there was just a little bit less of the deer there, until at the end of about ten days, all that was left were the hoofs, the bones, and the fur. Everything else had just been picked clean.

So that solid deer that was there ten days ago, just like a lump of foam, was gone. This is one way we can see this matter—our body is just like a lump of foam.

The Dalai Lama was giving teachings some years ago down at Shoreline Amphitheater in Mountain View on the Heart Sutra. It was over a three-day period, so I went down with a number of friends. It was a beautiful few days in May. If you've ever been to Shoreline, you know there are a lot of seats arranged in an arc, and then there's a big grassy hill behind the seats. So you could sit on this big grassy hill and watch the Dalai Lama.

He was surrounded by monks and nuns from all the major traditions. There were many other Tibetan monks and nuns there in their bright red and yellow robes, Theravadan monks and nuns with the dark brown of the forest tradition, Korean Zen monks in gray, Japanese Zen monks and nuns in black. The whole stage was filled with all the colors of the monastic worlds of Buddhism. It was like being at a Buddhist Woodstock—a really beautiful feeling.

The Dalai Lama was sitting up on a big, tall throne so that everybody could see him. He was teaching from the Heart Sutra, and the Heart Sutra says that there are three ways that we suffer, three reasons that we suffer.

One is we suffer the pain of disagreeable or unpleasant experiences. Sometimes the body is directly painful. Sometimes the emotions are directly painful—anger, wanting, fear, anxiety, worry. This is called dukkha dukkha. Dukkha means suffering. This is like a double shot, like a double espresso—a double dukkha.

The next way we suffer is that even when something pleasant comes along, it's going to change. The bowl of ice cream runs out. The love phase of the relationship changes—it's no longer a honeymoon. The new car gets a dent when you leave it in the parking lot. So even the very pleasant things of life change at some point, and that's painful to us. This is called the pain of alternation.

But he said the underlying root cause—and he said you need to understand this if you really want to help people—the underlying root cause is something called unsatisfactory formations. What he said is that all the formations of the world are not really stable. It's not that things go along solidly for a while and then flip. He said they're not solid even for a moment. Whatever is arising is also changing moment by moment by moment. There's no stability in our direct experience.

You can get a sense of this if you look at your body sensations in a sitting and see if there's anything solid and unchanging anywhere throughout the body, or if the sensations you experience are actually characterized by vibration, pulsation, flow of energy, alternation, change. Take a look and see. This is something you can experience directly. This is the unsatisfactoriness of changing formations. And the Dalai Lama said it happens moment after moment after moment. This is also why matter is like a lump of foam—there's nothing solid that we can rest on there.

So why do we reflect so much on impermanence? It's so that we don't hang on. One meditator said it really crisply: "Suffering is rope burn." It means we're trying to hang on to something that's flowing through our hands, something that's changing. It could be our youth, it could be our health, it could be our relationship, it could be our job, it could be our money, it could be our children, it could be our parents. We try to hang on for some kind of security or happiness, but everything we're holding on to keeps changing. And as we hold on, it burns.

The reason we look at impermanence is so that we'll let go, because we know it's going to change. But emptiness takes us one step further. When we start to see clearly the way things really are in our experience, we see things aren't solid even for a moment. It's not that there's something solid that we can hang on to, but then it goes. There's nothing really there to grasp in the first place.

So it's seeing this that lets us let go. And it's the letting go that steps us out of that rope burn of suffering. And even more deeply, it's the letting go that opens our heart and mind to this spacious awareness that we touched in the meditation that can lead to enlightenment. I'm sometimes reluctant to use that word, but it is the point of the Buddha's teachings. It is possible through this deep letting go for the heart to be liberated, for the heart to be awakened and for suffering to come to an end. And that only happens through a deep letting go.

So this is why we look at the emptiness of self. It's why we look at the emptiness of phenomena. So we start to see we're empty in two ways. There's no fixed core at the center that we can really call an I. That's one way we're empty. The other way we're empty is that all the elements of our experience, all these phenomena, are arising, passing, arising, passing, and insubstantial.

When we really deeply understand both of those, what we see is this world is a complex play of causes and conditions. Everything in this moment is going to condition the next. And that's going to condition the next. And that's going to condition the next. There's no controller in here who's making all this happen. And as we start to see this, we settle back and relax into the flow of the Dharma. Nature, you could call it. Nature is taking care of us. We don't have to control it.

We learn a deep trust in the processes of nature, which means all the causes and conditions that unfold in their own way: biological causes, physical causes, chemical causes, mental causes, emotional causes, karmic causes, social causes. They're all playing out in this complex interplay of life. And we don't have to fix an I in the center that tries to control it all. So this deep letting go brings a lot greater peace and ease in life. And it also opens the door to liberation, to awakening.

I was a monk in Thailand for about a year. And one of the privileges of being in robes in Thailand is that you get to go to the morgue and watch autopsies. So this was fascinating to me. I was in my early thirties. I had never even stood next to a dead body. In the West, we tend to put death somewhere over there. So I had never even stood next to a dead body.

But in Thailand, I got to go to a morgue down in the center of Bangkok, and I was led into a room where there was the body of a young woman laid out on a metal table who had drowned in one of the canals a day or two earlier. So that was shocking enough for me. But then we got to go into the autopsy theater, which is a lot like an operating room. So there were seats in tiers around the main center of the room. And the young woman was wheeled in on that metal table. And then the coroner started to perform the autopsy.

And we got to sit and watch along with a bunch of medical students. There were maybe half a dozen monks and nuns there and maybe twenty-five or so medical students who were watching the autopsy. And if you've ever seen an autopsy or heard one described, what's happening is that the coroner takes out all the major organs and weighs them and inspects them to see what the cause of death was. So I had only just seen my first dead body, and then I watched it being taken apart, organ by organ by organ. And I'd been sitting in retreat for about three weeks at that point. I was very quiet, I was very present, and I was very open. So this was a powerful experience for me.

So after the coroner finished and wheeled the woman away, I went out to catch a bus back to my monastery. I was waiting on the edge of the parade ground in downtown Bangkok, waiting for the bus, and I was just watching all the life go by: an old woman wheeling a cart full of groceries, a young couple walking across holding hands, a mother wheeling her baby in a stroller, the baby crying, young kids playing and kicking a ball around on the grass.

And I was watching them all in the light of death. And it seemed to me that there wasn't much difference between the young woman I had just been standing next to and all the people I was watching in their lives on the parade ground. The difference was just a little bit.

And it seemed to me that what the difference was was that in the people, I could see this brightness shining out through their eyes, which was related to their aliveness. With the woman who was dead, that brightness wasn't there anymore.

As I was riding back on the bus to my monastery, the phrase that came to my mind was: walking corpses. We're all just walking corpses. It doesn't matter whether you're young or old. I had the same perception of everyone.

What I meant by that is this: the difference between the woman who was dead and all those people who were alive was that the living people had this bright awareness that was still going, and her body didn't. So it seemed to me that what we are most fundamentally is this body and this bright awareness—both existing just in the present moment.

But we have this capacity for memory. What memory does is store up a bunch of the past and plant it in the brain as though it's real. But the past isn't there anymore. And then we project those memories into the future as though that's real out there somewhere. But that's just imagination. What's real is the consciousness in the present and the body in the present. All the rest is concept.

So what is it like if you feel yourself just to be this consciousness that's right here and now, and this body that's right here and now, and you let go of the past and you let go of the future? Does that feel light? That's the lightness of awakeness and freedom and emptiness. It's not believing that we are our past or we are our future. We're just right here, right now, and it's really simple. Isn't the moment really simple? You're comfortable, you're safe, you're in good company. This is the doorway to freedom. This is emptiness.

When we see in this way, emptiness is not something cold at all. It's not cold, distant, and remote. We realize that we all have this present moment awakeness, but we get caught believing in past and future, believing we're somebody, worrying about health, worrying about aging, worrying about money, worrying about death. And so this opens up this feeling of sympathy and compassion, because we're all in this same boat. Everybody's facing these same life situations. No one is exempt from them.

We realize there's nothing fixed in here, nothing solid in our experience. But we still have to deal with life. So as the space opens up in our own heart, we feel for the situation that we're all in. We feel compassion for ourselves. We feel compassion for others. Emptiness is not a cold thing that cuts us off from the world or from ourselves. It opens up the natural warmth of the heart because we're not so burdened. It's light living in this way.

Then we understand this quotation that is attributed to Kuan Yin. I think we have a Kuan Yin on the altar—the female representation of the embodiment of compassion. There's a quotation attributed to Kuan Yin. She's the bodhisattva of compassion because she listens to the cries of joy and the cries of sorrow that are in the world. At the same time, she really understands emptiness. She understands the simplicity of this moment-to-moment experience.

The quotation says: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?"

Our experience is always empty, always open, always basically free. There's a safety and a refuge, a freedom and an ease in that. This is the possibility of emptiness.

That's really all I wanted to share this evening. We have a few minutes for a couple of questions or comments, if there are any.

These words—I, my, you, we—do have clear meanings in a social setting, so we use them as we always have. It's really good that I know where my car is and you know where your car is, that you know which house is yours and I know which is mine. But these are social conventions. There's not an absolute ownership. This book doesn't know that it's mine; the car doesn't know either. But it's a social convention we've agreed upon, and it creates ease in living together in community.

Similarly, if I say, "I'm feeling really happy today," it simply identifies where the experience is taking place, as opposed to saying, "She's feeling really happy today." We're designating locations with these words, and they're necessary for easy communication. But when I'm in my own experience and have stepped outside the social realm, I don't need to use the words "I" and "my." I just say, "Fear is arising," or note, "Car."

When communicating with each other, we really need to use these conventional terms, and we use them in the conventional way. But we're not tricked by them anymore. We don't believe the words are pointing to something unchanging that's in here. They're still really useful, though. Because of that, we can talk about ourselves as having an identity using conventional terms. We're old or young, tall or short, gay or straight, black or white—whatever. Those still make sense, referring to this whole package. But we realize the whole package of mind and body is always changing, even though there's a kind of consistency to it.

Another questioner shared their difficulty understanding the absence of "I," thinking of it pseudo-scientifically as the point of origin of all sensation—something that could never disappear, regardless of feeling connected to surrounding energies or atmosphere. They reasoned that this sense of "I-ness" as the origin point of all touch, hearing, taste, smell, and thought seemed impossible to transcend.

There is indeed a kind of geographic or spatial centralness to experience, and I don't think that goes away. But we don't have to claim anything about it. It's taking away the claiming—"this is me," "this is mine"—that creates all the space. You also realize that within this spacious awareness, things are always changing. They're always changing within this mind-body stream and within that mind-body stream. We're located in different places, so there's geographical separation. We acknowledge that reality. But there's nothing fixed within either of those streams.

So rather than "I am where sensation is occurring and sensation is occurring to me," it becomes "sensations are occurring here"—wherever here is. And "here" isn't a very precise term. When we say here, do we mean Spirit Rock? Do we mean Woodacre? Do we mean the USA?

Finally, someone asked about suffering being part of the "rope burn"—referring to the earlier metaphor. In the Buddha's teaching, we suffer because we want things to be a certain way. Usually that wanting stems from having known pleasant experience in the past and wanting it to always be like that.

Or we've known unpleasant experience in the past, and we don't want it to be like that. So there's a holding on to an idea of the way things ought to be happening in our life.

A simple example: I'm sitting in meditation, and there's a pain in my knee. Well, I remember that there was a time when I sat comfortably, and I want it to be like that. So I'm holding on to that as a reference point. And because of that, this experience of pain in my knee is undesirable, unwanted, and I suffer from it. It may just be a little suffering, but it's suffering nonetheless.

Or consider a bigger suffering: we've been happily married for ten years, and we find out our partner has been unfaithful. It's very painful to realize that the relationship of trust and honesty that we thought we had is not there anymore. That really feels like the center of our life is being ripped away from our heart. That's a more extreme example.

But it's when we lose something really precious that we feel that suffering. Or when something really unpleasant comes upon us and we lose the ease or the health or the youth that we had before. And it's not easy to let go of that.

We are just at 9:15 now, and I want to be sure everybody can get back to their other commitments, so we will end here.

Just a couple of words before everybody leaves. Thank you all for coming. If this is of interest and you'd like to explore further, I'm doing a day-long on Saturday in this same hall on this topic, and it would be a pleasure to see you all. Otherwise, I thank you for coming tonight. Thanks for visiting Spirit Rock, and I hope we meet again.

CHAPTER 164

Emptiness is Everything

Guy Armstrong · 1h06

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores one of Buddhism's most central yet challenging concepts: śūnyatā or emptiness. Drawing from his book on the subject, Armstrong clarifies that emptiness doesn't mean nihilistic vacancy, but rather points to the insubstantial nature of both self and phenomena. He examines two key aspects: anattā (not-self) - showing how our sense of 'I' is constructed through identification with body, emotions, or an imagined observer - and the emptiness of phenomena, where even solid-seeming objects are revealed as dynamic, ever-changing processes. Through practical examples and meditation guidance, Armstrong demonstrates how the Heart Sutra's teaching that 'form is emptiness' can be directly experienced. He references the Buddha's Discourse on Totality, showing how our six sense doors (eye-sight, ear-sound, etc.) constitute the totality of experience available for investigation. The talk culminates with the story of Bāhiya, who achieved awakening through understanding that 'in the seen, let there be just the seen' - without the overlay of self-identification. Armstrong emphasizes that realizing emptiness isn't merely philosophical but leads to practical freedom from anxiety, self-obsession, and suffering, while opening space for compassion and wisdom to arise naturally.

Okay, so as I said earlier, it's a real treat to share with you tonight my good friend and respected colleague, Guy Armstrong. I probably teach with Guy and his wife Sally Armstrong and Carol Wilson more than anyone over the last 20 years. We always teach the February retreat together and we've gone through so many things together.

Guy and Sally are probably as important players, besides Jack Kornfield, of Spirit Rock being what Spirit Rock is—especially the construction of both the meditation hall and the new meditation community hall. This is just what he does on the side besides all the teaching, going to countless meetings and having a brilliant flair for creating beautiful things. But he's just a very special combination of clarity, depth of dharma, and good heart. When we teach on the February retreat, I teach about love and compassion. He teaches about dependent origination and karma and rebirth and those things. Thank you, Guy. So it's a real treat to have him here with us to share about this work that he's put the last two years or more into—a beautiful book called Emptiness, which I highly recommend. I'm enjoying it very, very much. So take it away.

Thank you, James. And it's a pleasure, it is a pleasure to be here. James and I have spent so much time together over the last 20 years in teaching and in meetings. I was sort of estimating the other day—I think all told we've probably spent about two years of our life working together. So he is a real dharma brother and a great friend. And coming into his community just feels like coming into family. So I'm happy to be with you all tonight.

I would like to talk about this topic of emptiness, which is not the simplest topic in the world to talk about. I usually teach this theme in a seven-day retreat. There are a lot of pieces to it. So this evening, I just want to hit a few of the highlights and leave you with maybe a little bit to reflect on, a little bit of food for thought. I hope that will interest you.

One thing to say about this word is it's not the most appealing for the central concept of a world religion. You know, the Hindus have bliss and devotion, the Christians have love and charity, and the Buddhists have emptiness. It's not much of a hook. But it has been really central to all the schools of Buddhism for the last 2,500 years—starting with the original teachings of the Buddha and the centuries of early Buddhism, the early Mahayana which expressed itself through the Prajnaparamita Sutras and the teachings of Nagarjuna, the later evolution in East Asia. As we sit in this temple, I feel like the emptiness vibe is just kind of permeating from the devotion and the philosophies that informed Chinese Buddhism, and then it translated to Japan as well. So this has been a theme, and I would say the central thread that links all the different traditions of Buddhism, the major schools over the last 2,500 years. But there are a lot of pieces to it, so we'll just touch on a few tonight.

Just to kind of illustrate the range of it, there's a young Tibetan lama named Mingyur Rinpoche. He's a wonderful teacher and a terrific practitioner. He visited Marin for the first time about 20 years ago—I've forgotten whether it was 97 or 98. And I had a little bit of connection to him through knowing his brother, Tsoknyi Rinpoche. So I got to meet him on his visit to California.

Living in Marin, I thought, well, let's take him for a little bit of a sightseeing tour. Maybe he'd like to see the top of Mount Tam. So we drove up to the top of Mount Tam. And on the way, I was trying to make conversation. I said, "Rinpoche, how do you find the West?" He said, "Square and clean." End of conversation.

Okay. I better try again. "Rinpoche, do you think Tibetans are happier than Westerners?" "Yes." End of dialogue.

So we got up to the top of Mount Tam, and if you've ever been up there, you know that there's an asphalt path that goes around the peak. Beautiful 360-degree views of the whole Bay Area and the ocean. So we were walking around on that path, and I just thought, I better try one more time.

So we got up to the top of Mount Tam, and if you've ever been up there, you know that there's an asphalt path that goes around the peak. Beautiful 360-degree views of the whole Bay Area and the ocean. So we were walking around on that path, and I thought I better try one more time to talk to this esteemed Lama.

So I said, "What's the difference between the views of the Dzogchen school and the Madhyamaka school of Tibetan Buddhism?" Two central schools within that lineage. Then he got interested. "Ah," he said, perking up as his eyes lit up. He said, "The first thing you have to understand is there are 18 different kinds of emptiness."

And then he sat right down on the path. It was only six feet wide. He sat down, so we all had to sit down. We totally blocked the path going around. And he talked for about ten minutes about the 18 kinds of emptiness in these two schools of Tibetan Buddhism.

So this is a subject for tremendous reflection. If you look on Amazon, you can probably find hundreds of books on this topic—well thought of in the Buddhist world, reflected on extensively, written about prolifically. I'd like to share just some key points this evening.

The main pointing behind this concept is that the world is not as solid or as substantial as we take it to be. That's a summary of the message of emptiness. And there are two key points I'd like to pull out of this.

One is that there's something we haven't quite understood about the way the world is. There's a very famous text among the Prajnaparamita body of texts called the Heart Sutra. You've probably heard of it. Many of you may have recited it. And it begins describing the practice of a bodhisattva named Avalokiteshvara. Avalokiteshvara is an Indian being who is the embodiment of compassion. And when this image of Avalokiteshvara migrated to China, it transformed into Kuan Yin, the female principle of compassion. And I'm sure there's one at the back, for sure, who's facing the front. The white statue at the back is of Kuan Yin—a beautiful devotional figure. Avalokiteshvara is the male representation from India.

And the very start of the Heart Sutra says, "The Bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara, when practicing deeply the quality of wisdom, perceived that mind and body are empty and was saved from all suffering and distress."

So within the tradition, that's the liberating power of this kind of insight. It is meant to save us from suffering and distress.

The kind of meditation that James and I teach is called insight meditation. The Pali word for it, the old Indian word, is vipassana. And the purpose of it is so that we gain more understanding, more insight into the way things are. Vipassana literally means to see clearly—to see clearly how things are.

So our development of insight meditation is meant to bring us to the same understanding that Avalokiteshvara had. And the purpose of that is to liberate us. This is not just a philosophical exercise or an intellectual exercise, but it's meant to free our hearts and minds. It's meant to lead us away from unhappiness, from stress, from worry, from anxiety, and into a great degree of freedom and happiness.

So that's the purpose behind all these teachings, and I hope we keep that view on it as I talk this evening.

One thing to clear up in the beginning: emptiness does not mean in the Buddhist lineage what it sometimes might mean in the West. It doesn't mean a vacancy, a total absence, nothingness, despair, cynicism, hopelessness. That's not the intention. It is rather to open up this spaciousness where we feel the fullness of life coming into the empty space. So we'll talk about that more as we go.

Now you probably know that in Buddhism there's tremendous emphasis given to the understanding of impermanence. We look into the fact that everything is always changing on every level—the personal momentary level, the level of one lifetime, the level of the cosmos and the planets and the sun. Everything eventually comes and goes.

And there's a reason that we look into that so deeply in Buddhism. It's so that we don't hang on so tightly to things that are bound to change. Because if we're hanging on to something and it changes, we're going to suffer from that.

So emptiness takes this principle one step further. And the seeing of emptiness is that there was nothing there to hang on to in the first place. We'll talk about this more. But we see the insubstantial nature of the way the world actually is. We see there's not a thing there that we can ever hang on to.

This also helps us to let go and keeps us from suffering. When we understand the insubstantial nature of all phenomena, we're less likely to grasp onto things that will inevitably slip through our fingers.

We're going to explore two or three ways that emptiness reveals itself in our meditation and investigation. The first is emptiness of self—the recognition that there's no solid core at the center of this mind-body process. This is the teaching known in our lineage as anatta or not-self, a central teaching of the Buddha.

The second is the emptiness of phenomena, which doesn't mean that the things we perceive don't exist, but rather that they're not solid in the way we typically imagine them to be. Suzuki Roshi captures this beautifully when he says, "Of course the bird we see and hear exists, but what I mean by that may not be quite what you mean by that." We want to learn to see the bird the way Suzuki Roshi sees it, because that understanding will keep us from suffering.

Let's begin with the teaching on the emptiness of self. The Indian teacher Nisargadatta Maharaj, who taught in the Advaita Vedanta tradition, said, "The aim of all the yogas"—and here yoga means any path that leads to liberation—"is to free you from the calamity of separate existence." This is meant to be a provocative statement. Why would separate existence be a calamity?

Because once we feel separate from everything else that is, it creates in our minds a sense of duality—self and other. And once we have a self, there's something that must be defended, protected, nourished, something constantly under threat from what is perceived as other. This idea that we are completely separate leads to a sense of isolation, of not belonging, of insecurity and underlying anxiety.

I think this is one of the most challenging aspects of contemporary Western life, as the sense of community continues to break down in so many societies. People are losing connections to family, neighbors, and close friends whom they might see daily. This leaves individuals feeling alone, isolated, and somewhat fearful.

As we investigate the emptiness of self, some of those boundaries we've created can start to weaken and eventually fade away, at least temporarily. In the Buddha's lifetime, he had a cousin and attendant named Ananda—the name means bliss. Ananda appears as one of the sweetest figures in the early teachings, a very kind and caring person. But he was younger and often found himself a step behind the other practitioners in understanding.

There's a text where Ananda approaches the Buddha and says, "Sir, you're always saying that the world is empty, but what do you mean by that?" The Buddha responds, "The world is empty because it's empty of a self or what belongs to a self."

This is both interesting and counterintuitive. Does it feel like your world is empty of a self right now? Probably not. Most of us experience the self as present most of the time. But the Buddha is suggesting that perhaps there's something here worth investigating more deeply. Maybe we don't fully understand what we carry as our idea of a self.

Let me ask you a couple of simple questions. First: How old are you? You don't need to answer aloud—that might be embarrassing for many of us. But it's a straightforward question, right? If you say, "I'm 39 years old," what do you really mean by that? Are your thoughts 39 years old? Is your mood 39 years old? What exactly is 39 years old? The body, right? So we're really saying the body is 39 years old. Here we're equating "I" with the body—they're the same thing.

But what if I ask, "What color are your eyes?" Again, an easy question. You might say, "My eyes are brown." But here, you're not saying "I am brown." You're not identifying yourself as the eyes that are brown, but rather presenting yourself as someone who has eyes. Now you're the owner of the body. They're your eyes; you might speak of your body.

So which is it—are you the body, or do you have a body?

Or are you something separate from it that owns it? And can you be both? How many selves are you in any given moment?

Then we can do the same question with emotions. We might say, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." So here we're equating ourselves with the emotion, with happiness or sadness. But we could also talk about "my joys" and "my sorrows." So we could be the body, we could be the owner of the body, we could be the emotion, or we could be the owner of the emotion.

Can you be all of them in one moment? It doesn't quite make sense, does it? Usually people who feel they're more than one self are offered medication. So you might not want to go around telling people you feel you're four selves at once.

And then there's one other way that we really create this sense of self quite often. And that is maybe the deepest sense—we feel like we're an observer that's located between the ears and behind the eyes, sort of two inches into the center of the head. And it's kind of looking out, seeing the world, hearing sounds, feeling feelings. And that's really who we most deeply are, this observer.

So this is five ways we've seen that we create a sense of I. And this creating a sense of I by connecting it to part of our experience is called identification. We identify the I as being just one part of experience.

Do any of these really stand up to logic? And moreover, have you ever found any of these as an individual being? Have you ever found that observer? Have you ever found the one who owns the body or who owns the emotion?

William James tried and he said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." It's a bit like that. It's quite subtle, this sense.

So we've used these words since we were old enough to understand. Before we were two years old, we were hearing and using these words. And just by the force of habit, we've come to believe that they actually point to something that exists. We believe that there is an I somewhere here that these words point to. That something exists that we can put our finger on if we're clever enough and say, "That's the self. That's what I really is."

You can search and search. You won't find it. The philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein said the self is just a shadow cast by grammar. We've used the language so much, we've come to believe in it, but it doesn't point to anything real.

Now there is a being here. There's no doubt about that. And there's a being there and there's a being there, but within this being is only an impermanent flow of body stuff and mind stuff. Always changing. Nothing is fixed within it. There's no core at the center that owns it, to whom it's happening, or who controls the whole thing. This is the understanding that the Buddha wanted to communicate.

This takes some reflection, because this sense is so conditioned. But through reflection and through meditation, we can explore it. For example, I'll bet that when you were meditating tonight, there were times when the I didn't seem that strong. When you're in a place that's calm and settled, it can feel peaceful, it can feel spacious and open, and it doesn't feel like there's such a strong center.

But at other times, the I can get really stirred up. Somebody says something rude to you. Driver cuts you off on the freeway. And all of a sudden this I springs up with some force. "How could they do that to me? I have to say something to them. I have to confront them about this." So then the I becomes very strong.

But at other times it can feel quite weak. So it's an easy way to investigate. Notice times when the sense of I is quite weak and other times when it feels really strong. So it's not just a steady ongoing thing, but it kind of grows and diminishes with time and circumstances.

So if the I in the Buddha's view isn't quite real, what is? There's this very interesting teaching that he gave that points to the basis for how Buddhists see what is real, what could be looked at, what should be investigated. This is a little text called the Discourse on Totality.

In this teaching, the Buddha said, "Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of things." First of all, that's a very bold thing to say, isn't it? Just tune in—I'm going to teach you the totality in about two minutes. In the West, Einstein never said that. Marx never said that. Freud never said that. Here's the Buddha 2,500 years ago saying, "I'm going to teach you the totality."

And so he said, "What is the totality of things? It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and objects of mind"—which means basically thoughts and emotions.

Is there anything else in your experience that falls outside of these six categories? Basically it's sight, sound, smell, taste, touches, thoughts, and feelings. Is there anything else? Is this a fair description of our reality? It's pretty good, isn't it?

The reason this is so interesting is if you look at many philosophers, they talk about quite different things—how many angels dance on the head of a pin or is there a God? The Buddha was interested in pointing directly at our own experience. That's what's so radical about this formulation. He's saying if you want to understand what matters, look at your own direct experience.

This becomes the basis for our meditation practice. We feel sensations of body and breath. We pay attention to sounds, when our eyes are open to sights, when we're walking, the sense of movement. And then we know our own thoughts and feelings. This becomes a map of where our meditation practice can focus.

The reason that's so helpful is it's in these areas that we get caught and we become unhappy. It's in relation to these six kinds of things that we suffer, and it's in relation to them that we can get free. This is quite interesting—there are only ever six things happening.

Normally, lay life seems really complicated, doesn't it? There are income taxes and jobs to carry out and children to look after and all the myriad problems of them coming into adulthood, or parents to care for with their aging process and loss of faculties. But in the pointings of the Buddha, there are only ever these six things to look at that make up our suffering or our liberation. It's a really interesting pointer to what really matters in life, a pointer of where to look.

What is interesting about this for our particular investigation this evening is how does the self, the sense of self, get created? Because we all have a sense of self, but the Buddha said the self isn't intrinsic. So how does it get created?

Again, I'll just ask you to look at your experience. You're sitting quietly. The sense of self—you'll notice it when the words are I, me, my, and mine. The language is the clue.

When you're sitting there, does it ever pop up and just go, "I"? Does it ever pop up and just go, "me"? Not really, does it? When you look at the way we form the concept of I or my, it's in relation to something else. There's a pain in this area, so I say, "my knee hurts." There's a memory about a friend, so I say, "I'm thinking about my friend."

The I and my are extras there. We could just say pain. We could just say memory. We could just say image. But we connect the I to it.

That means we identify and we add something there that doesn't have to be there.

Now the words are useful when we talk to each other. If I say to you, "I'm happy," what that identifies for you is where the emotion is taking place. That's different than if I say "James is happy." But that's just an indication of location. It doesn't mean we have to own it.

So the words are useful when we communicate, but when you describe your own experience to yourself, see what happens if you don't use these words. An emotion comes up and you could say, "I'm feeling really anxious today." Or you could just say, "Anxiety is arising and being known." See how it feels to make that just little change in language.

Notice that the sense of I isn't always there, but it gets created again and again and again when we lay claim to something. Also notice that when it's weak, there's generally a sense of peace. And when the I comes up strongly, there's usually some kind of turmoil going on. I want, I don't want, I like, I don't like, I need, I must—this strong attachment to I is integrally connected to our suffering. At times when it's weak, there's less suffering. There's a sense of deep peace.

So this is the sense of I, and the creation of self, that as we open it up, leads to one kind of emptiness, leads to more spaciousness, less anxiety, less self-concern and self-obsession.

The second sense in which emptiness is used classically is to explore the emptiness of phenomena. What that means is the things that we see in the world are not solid in the way that we think they are.

We're all good students of twentieth-century science, and we know quantum physics pointed this out like a hundred years ago. You know that the rug there is not mostly matter. What is it mostly? It's space, isn't it? Everything that you can see and touch, however solid it feels, is made up of atoms. Atoms are protons and neutrons orbited by electrons, and they are mostly space. So we know that this whole physical world truly is mostly space.

Has that made any of us a lot happier? It doesn't seem to have. I was a physics major in college. My professors did not seem a lot happier, and yet they really knew this. So what's happened? We haven't quite integrated it. We haven't taken in this knowledge and we haven't seen it directly for ourselves. So the aim of meditation is that we start to see some of this stuff for ourselves more directly.

I'll just read a passage from another of the Buddha's discourses. Again, it's a kind of wake-up call. He was giving a teaching. He was sitting on the banks of the River Ganges and giving a teaching to a group of students. And he addressed the students thus: "Monks, suppose that this River Ganges was carrying along a big lump of foam."

So I ask you to imagine that. If there's a big lump of foam, it really looks like there's something there, doesn't it? Big, with a certain color, a certain change of color, a certain texture. And yet what would happen if you went up to grab it? It would just go poof, wouldn't it? Because there's nothing really there.

"Suppose this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of matter there is, a practitioner inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in matter?"

This is basically the same insight that quantum physicists came to 2,400 years later, but the Buddha had realized it directly from his own meditation practice. And he's inviting us to learn it from our own meditation practice.

Just a simple way in: take the body as a place to check out. This is as close as we can get to knowing matter from the inside because our own awareness runs throughout the body. So what happens if you direct your awareness inside the body—you can do it right now—and ask, is there anything solid in your experience?

So we're talking about the field of sensations that we feel throughout the body. Is there any sensation in your body that is solid, fixed, and unchanging? Or when you look into the body, is it more like a dynamic field of energy that's characterized by pulsation, vibration, flickering, change, and variation? I encourage you to investigate now and at home in your meditation and see: is the body really solid, felt from within, or is it more characterized by change, by flickering, by pulsing? Take a look and see. If we can find that there's no solid matter felt from the inside, that gives us a certain amount of confidence. Maybe all matter is just like this body.

Another way that form is like a mass of foam. James and I were teaching at Spirit Rock one February retreat, and I was giving the Dharma talk that evening. So it was about eight o'clock at night, and outside the hall there was this loud scream—like a baby crying in some kind of pain, so it was unsettling. A couple of staff people left the room and went out to look to see what had happened, so I kept giving the talk.

The talk finished about eight-thirty, and then a number of us went out and looked to see what it was that had happened. Staff people had gathered around in a small circle around the body of a deer. The deer was lying on the ground near one of the residence halls with its neck at a really odd angle. The staff people had checked and found the deer was dead. They reported that as they came up to the deer, they saw a couple of large dogs running away from the site. That happens in Woodacre—there are dogs that roam the hills. There are a lot of deer, and occasionally dogs will kill a deer. But I'd never seen it happen at Spirit Rock.

So we knew the deer was dead, but we stood in a circle and said some phrases of loving kindness for the deer, hoping that it might help it on its journey. Then the staff people went in to call the Humane Society. "We've got a dead deer here. Could you come and pick it up?" The Humane Society said yes, they would. "We'll come tomorrow. Please take the body down near the entrance, and we'll come and get it." So the staff did that. They drove the deer down and laid it to rest by the parking lot right on the edge of the driveway.

But the Humane Society never came. Our retreat was going on for another couple of weeks, so I would pass the body every day and keep checking on it. So what do you imagine happened? Little by little, most of the body of the deer disappeared, because we have scavengers on the land. There are raccoons, there are turkey vultures, there are crows, there are mice, there are rats, there are insects. So every day that I went by, there was a little less of the deer there until after about ten days, there were only the hoofs, the fur, and the bones that were left. So the rest of that deer had just gone. Like a mass of foam. Poof. Nothing more left.

Another way to look at this: the Dalai Lama was giving a series of teachings a few years ago. I bet some of you were there. He was down at Shoreline Amphitheater in Mountain View, teaching on the Heart Sutra, that central text to all the traditions. A number of us went down to hear the three days of teachings.

It was a beautiful setup. It was early May, about this time of year. At Shoreline, there's a big stage, there are a bunch of chairs in a semicircle, and then there's a very broad hillside, which at that time was still green because of the winter rains. You could sit out on the hill, look up to the Dalai Lama on his big throne on the stage, and he was surrounded by monastics from all the different traditions. There were Tibetan monks and nuns in their bright red and orange robes, Theravadan monks and nuns in the dark brown of the forest tradition, Korean monastics in their gray robes, Japanese Zen monks in their black robes. The whole stage was just a colorful show of Buddhist monastics.

Actually, it was like a Buddhist Woodstock. I kind of felt like we were at a festival, except where the speakers should have been for the Grateful Dead, there was a big painting of the Potala Palace as the backdrop.

The Dalai Lama was saying that the teachings in the Heart Sutra point to this understanding that there are three forms of suffering we encounter in life. One of them is what's called dukkha dukkha. Dukkha is the Pali word for suffering—it means the pain of life. Dukkha dukkha is the direct experience of what's painful or unpleasant. It's like a double shot of espresso—a double shot of dukkha, the pain of pain.

There's another way that suffering comes to us, which is when something has been pleasant for a while, but then it changes. If we're expecting it to continue, we suffer from the change. The bowl of ice cream finishes. The falling-in-love part of the relationship is over and we get down to working on living together. Pleasant things change and turn into difficulty—this is called the suffering of alternation.

Then the third kind is called the suffering of unstable formations. The Dalai Lama said it's really important to understand this if you really want to help people. It's not that things go along for a while in a solid way and then change to something else. Things are changing moment by moment in every moment of our experience. Nothing is solid even for a few moments. Another way to say it is that if you look closely at experience—and this is what the Buddha did with the body and with the senses—things are dissolving moment by moment. This is the instability of formations. There's nothing to rely on.

This is the seeing into emptiness. The emptiness of phenomena is directly understood when we see this moment-to-moment dissolving nature within our experience—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts and feelings. Then we know we shouldn't hold on to things that are going to change. But we really see we can't hold on to anything that's dissolving. It's not possible. There's nothing solid enough to hold on to.

Both of these teachings—on impermanence and on the emptiness of phenomena—teach us not to grasp. Because we are conditioned to look for the next hit of something pleasing and to hold on to it for as long as we can. But that strategy doesn't ultimately work. It keeps us busy trying to find the next source of pleasure, but eventually it leaves us. And then we strive to find the next.

There's another way to live. The other way is we let go. In that letting go, we let go of some of the knot of selfing that we create moment after moment, trying to bring in the pleasure and keep away the pain. We start to see we're empty in two ways. There's no fixed core at the center of this mind-body process that we have to keep protecting and defending. And the elements of our actual experience are all just coming and going, pulsing on and off, moment after moment. Both these insights teach us not to struggle and hold on, but to let go.

The way this letting go feels—and you can check this out in your meditation—is that it leads to a settling back into an observing of the present moment that doesn't have such a strong agenda, but is a relaxation and an ease and kind of letting life flow. It's like we relax into the Dharma that's unfolding, which is really just nature. And we trust in that. Nature can hold us. When we release the self-centered grasping, nature holds us. This is what brings in a much deeper sense of peace and ease in our day-to-day living.

Not only that, but this opening up to the unfolding of nature also prepares the mind for an even deeper letting go, which is an opening that leads to enlightenment. I don't use that word a lot in Dharma talks, but I wanted to mention it tonight because it is the purpose of the Buddha's teaching. It is to find the possibility of a peace that truly can liberate us from all forms of suffering. This is why the Buddha taught, and it is the kind of peace that people are still discovering today.

Both the spaciousness and ease that we can experience in meditation and in life come from letting go. And also letting go leads to this deeper opening to a truly liberating understanding.

What happens when we let go and relax into nature is that we see life is proceeding from many causes and conditions. It's led up to this moment. This moment couldn't be any different than it is because of all the causes and conditions that have led up to it. Then this moment conditions the next moment, which conditions the next moment with its causes and so forth. We start to see this unfolding is taking care of itself if we don't struggle.

Now sometimes, of course, we need to intervene in the world when things are going off track.

And we need to adjust the conditions that are happening in our personal life, in our family, in the greater society, in the environment, and in the world. But we can find through meditation the way to engage with that intervention in a way that comes from peace and ease rather than just more angst.

So the meditative opening is to allow all the causes and conditions to be seen and to unfold. And there are so many of these—physical causes, biological causes, chemical causes, emotional, psychological, social, karmic. All these causes and conditions are weaving through to make this very complex play of life. But we find a way to be in it from a place of relaxation and ease. And this is what happens when the tightness of the self starts to get unwound, and this knot that we might feel in the center of things starts to open up and relax.

I want to close with a story of one meditator at the time of the Buddha. He was a spiritual teacher already, named Bahiya. Bahiya was living in the south of India. The Buddha was teaching in the north. And Bahiya was quite developed—he had many students, he lived very simply, he had a very pure mind. But one day he asked himself the question: Am I enlightened?

Well, the asking of that question is kind of a clue, because if you're enlightened, you know it. So it said a heavenly being came down and addressed Bahiya and said, "Bahiya, I'm sorry to tell you, but you're not enlightened. That's the bad news. The other bad news is you're not even on a path to enlightenment, because you're not doing the right practice."

So Bahiya was a little disappointed. But he said, "Well, do you know of anyone who is?" And this heavenly being said, "Yes, there's a teacher who goes by the name of the Buddha who's teaching currently in northern India. He's right now in the town of Savatthi, and you can go and visit him."

Bahiya would do anything for his spiritual practice, so he immediately left his home and started walking to the north to find the Buddha in the town of Savatthi. So he got to the town, and as he's walking around, he sees a person walking in a monk's robe who sort of matches the description he's heard. This being has a lot of dignity and a lot of radiance, a lot of beauty of spirit. So Bahiya walks up to him and says, "Are you the one they call the Buddha?"

The Buddha said, "Yes, I am."

"Please, sir, can you teach me your teaching briefly? I've come all the way across half of India. I really want to understand."

Well, at that time, the Buddha was walking with his alms bowl in search of his daily meal. So he said, "No, Bahiya, I'm sorry, I can't teach. This is not the right time. I'm walking for my morning meal."

But Bahiya was persistent. He said, "Please, sir, life is short. Who knows how long you may live or I may live? Please share your teaching briefly."

And again, the Buddha said, "This is not a convenient time. I'm walking for my midday meal."

But Bahiya didn't give up. He asked a third time, and as often happens, the third time the Buddha says, "Okay." And then he said, "This is how you should train, Bahiya. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized."

Do you notice what's missing? It's not being claimed as "I" or "mine." "Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. Then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

On hearing that profound instruction, Bahiya's mind woke up. He was so ripe, so ready. Because of his own spiritual practice, he was prepared to hear it. And he became awakened just upon hearing that brief teaching.

He thanked the Buddha and wandered off, probably looking for his midday meal. He happened to travel through a pasture where a mother cow was guarding her calf. The cow felt threatened, attacked Bahiya, and gored him. He died on the spot.

So his urgent request to the Buddha—"Who knows how long either of us will be here?"—was very timely indeed.

The monks were deeply concerned. They said, "Oh, Bhante, this person has come such a long way to see you, and then he died."

The Buddha reassured them: "Don't worry. He was awakened before he died. So his visit was fruitful, came to full maturation."

This is the potential power of seeing through the limitation of self. The letting go of self has been for 2,500 years a doorway to awakening and continues to be today. That's the power of emptiness. That's the power of this central teaching.

Thank you all very much for your attention. We have time for a couple of questions.

"Hello, Guy. Over the years in practice, I've had a very few, very brief experiences of walking around the world and not being Ernie. Nevertheless, there's still a location of perceptions. There's still a here and there's still something—some entity or being or gadget or whatever—that's walking around the world from that point of view. So who or what is that?"

I expect a number of you have had these moments of glimpsing the absence of self. The first thing I'll ask you to check in your experience is: How does that feel when the self temporarily is absent?

"It's very ordinary—just being in the world, except that I'm missing."

Is there peace and ease, or is there suffering?

"Peace and ease, yes. There's just a sense of being, basically."

When this happens, notice the emotional tone of that experience. See if it isn't one of peace and ease and absence of suffering. Many of us have had that kind of opening, and yet the self tends to come back. The sense of self tends to return.

"Very quickly, usually."

What I've observed is that the more I let myself open to these moments, and the more I understand the truth of it, the more my mind finds its way back to that way of being more and more often. Over time, one comes to stabilize in that kind of peace and ease and openness.

But the sense of self doesn't go away completely, according to the texts, until full enlightenment. So we continue to observe its appearance, but as time goes by, we're not so taken in by it. We know—we have seen the truth many times. The self isn't always there, and it's not intrinsic.

As it fades away, the more the experience of life becomes one of non-separation and openness, receptivity, and ease. The self is a burden. The belief in the self is a burden that weighs us down with fear, anxiety, and desire. As that lifts, there's a greater sense of openness, and out of that openness comes easy access to qualities like love, compassion, and joy.

So as the self thins, it's not just a metaphysical event. There's an openness of heart that springs from that which makes life really rich and beautiful.

Any other questions? Yeah.

Isn't there a self that lets go of the self? Isn't there an entity—and I'm not being flippant about it—isn't there an entity that observes and that is actually making decisions that affect beyond the conditions? Something that observes all the experiences, all the objects of mind, reflects on them and says, "Oh, okay, now I understand," and adjusts what I would call the lower level self accordingly?

No, it's a really good question, and it's one that I do answer at greater length in the book. But to say really briefly, there is a sense of agency within us. And when I talked about how causes and conditions lead to the next moment, lead to the next moment, it shouldn't be taken as being deterministic. Because the spiritual path unfolds if you act as though there is free will—it's best to act that way. In fact, our will is somewhat conditioned.

You were pointing to the issue of deciding, and there's a sense of agency that makes decisions. That deciding is conditioned by many different factors, the most relevant of which are the states of mind that are present right then. For instance, decisions that come out of fear, anxiety, and upset are different than the kind of decisions that come out of love, compassion, and generosity.

So there is not one entity that makes a decision, but there is a factor of mind called volition that operates in any given moment, influenced by the other qualities of mind that are present there. An impulse, an urge, a motive, a direction, a movement comes out of this factor of volition influenced by the other mind states that are present right there. There's not an entity that's doing that decision, but there is an agency that acts.

Similarly, there's not an observer, but there's a faculty of observing. This is interesting. So mindfulness is one faculty of observing. There's not an entity who is being mindful, but mindfulness is a factor that comes into our experience and carries out that observing function. So these are great questions. They can all be explored and resolved within your meditation.

Thank you. And there was one more question up front, if we could hit that one.

Now I've kind of forgotten what I was going to say exactly, but something around compassion and empathy—the fine line between detachment and having empathy and compassion and then doing something about it. Maybe having to take a few steps to help someone, rather than saying, "Oh, that's just the way it happens, like, let it be or whatever." Does that make sense?

No, it's a really good question because if one only dwells on the emptiness side of things... you could start seeing everybody as just collections of atoms and molecules, right? The scientific worldview—and I was kind of into this in my teens because I was studying physics—was just seeing people as collections of atoms and molecules. And it doesn't really matter what happens to atoms and molecules, right?

When you start seeing the emptiness of things, you could take it in a direction that says it doesn't matter what happens because it's all empty. That's a real misreading of the Buddha's teachings.

So the way I like to say it is that the insight into emptiness needs to grow up in parallel with the unfolding of love and compassion in our meditation practice and in our direct experience. Then when we look on others who are going through difficulty, the lack of our own self-obsession actually opens the door for more empathy to come through. And because the boundaries have melted somewhat, we don't feel so separate from the people who are going through difficulty.

So we say in our tradition, compassion comes out of emptiness. When there's emptiness of self, then the heart flowers. One of the things that we encourage is to let compassion flower and it will direct you what needs to be done.

Compassion isn't just a sweet feeling. It's an active wish to relieve the suffering of others. So it carries a little bit of that volition that we were just talking about a minute ago. And if there's real emptiness, then that volition can move forward without fear to act in the world. We need this compassionate response in the world—on the relationship level, on the family level, on the social level, on the global level.

I feel like if something is making you anxious or upset or suffer because you see something happening, then that's a good thing that it incites you to do something. But I guess it's kind of hard to... well, I don't know.

Yeah, sometimes suffering can be a spur to action. But I'll just say that you look at a lot of great spiritual teachers like the Dalai Lama in this day, the Buddha in his day, Dipa Ma, if you know of her—the teacher James and I met—they are coming from a place of being basically at peace, and yet they have tremendous energy to help others and be very active in the world in caring ways. So suffering doesn't have to be the only spur to taking compassionate action. And the more selfless we become, the less it acts in that way.

How would you say to keep yourself detached from that, but still be motivated?

So in the Buddhist language, the word we use so much is not detachment but equanimity, or rather I would say balance. Balance is the state where we feel a kind of inner equilibrium or equipoise. We're kind of at rest and things are okay. But if we see suffering outside, there's a movement to alleviate.

And that's the natural movement of compassion. So we let that flow in its natural way when we're already in a balanced place.

I think that's all I want to say tonight, and James is going to wrap up the evening for us with some metta meditation. So thank you all for coming. If anybody wants a book signed, I'd be happy to sign books afterward.

James offered a beautiful reflection: "First, thanks so much for the talk—as usual, clear on a very deep topic. One thing about how I approach this subject is that one way of looking at reality does not negate the other. So it's not like, 'Oh, you don't really exist. Who do you think you are anyway? You're empty.' Rather, when you see this other perspective, it brings a whole other way of holding this pattern of life called James or Guy or whoever.

There's this pattern that is uniquely yours, but it's not fixed and static. It's an ongoing transformative flux of life with its own history and all that—something you want to both respect and take care of, to discover its gifts and share them with the world. It just brings a whole other way to be light about your life. You know that you stop on the red light and go on the green, following all the rules of relative reality, but you're coming from a much freer place. So don't give up on who you are—just know the freedom that comes with seeing a wider perspective. May this support you in having the courage and interest to keep looking inside."

We closed with a brief loving-kindness meditation. James guided us: "Just going inside, appreciating that we're all here sharing the Dharma together and recognizing what extraordinarily good karma we have to be here in Berkeley, hearing a lovely Dharma talk and coming together with like-minded friends. May we share all of our good fortune and merit and good karma that we brought to this evening and that we created here together. Coming here this evening, may it be shared and be for the benefit of all beings everywhere and this beautiful planet Earth. May all know the highest happiness and peace."

As we concluded, there was a heartfelt wish: "May the earth heal soon. May that be so."

CHAPTER 165

Chanting And Morning Instructions: Mindfulness of Breathing

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> Guy Armstrong begins this dharma talk with the traditional chanting of the Three Refuges (Tisaraṇa) and Five Precepts (Pañcasīla), offering detailed guidance on proper Pali pronunciation and intonation variations between East and West Coast traditions. He emphasizes the importance of maintaining authentic pronunciation while creating a harmonious group practice.
>
> Following the chanting, Armstrong provides essential instructions for ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing) meditation. He guides practitioners through establishing a relaxed body posture, cultivating acceptance of present-moment experience, and connecting with the natural rhythm of the breath. The talk emphasizes the middle way approach to thoughts - neither resisting nor pursuing them - and offers various skillful means including noting, counting, body scanning, and the four-point breathing technique.
> Armstrong addresses common misconceptions about meditation techniques, clarifying that tools like noting and counting are not 'beginner' methods to be outgrown, but valuable supports that can benefit practitioners at any stage. Drawing from his extensive experience, including intensive retreats with Paok Sayadaw, he emphasizes finding what works best for each individual while maintaining relaxation in body and presence in attention. This foundational teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners practical wisdom for developing stable mindfulness of breathing practice.

We want to chant the Refuges and Precepts somewhat regularly, so let's begin with that this morning. If you have your hymnals...

I want to make a couple of comments about intonations and the melody before we start. There's kind of a West Coast accent and an East Coast accent on some of these. Because we're on the East Coast, I feel a little obligation to follow the East Coast accent.

This pops up in the refuges section when it comes to Budaṃ Saraṇaṃ Gacchāmi—all the Gacchāmis. On the West Coast, we do it like this: Budaṃ Saraṇaṃ Gacchāmi. But on the East Coast, we do it: Budaṃ Saraṇaṃ Gacchāmi. Dhammaṃ Saraṇaṃ Gacchāmi. So I think we should honor the East Coast pronunciation here, even though many of you are from the West Coast and incline that way. We'll do the flat on the Gacchāmi today.

Then in the fifth precept, there are different ways of intonation on the second phrase, which is Majjapamādatthānā. The way that Sally and I say it is Majjapamādatthānā. Normally in Pali, if there's a long A or a long accent over a vowel, that's the syllable that gets the emphasis. But it's also the case that when there's a double consonant, like the D-A-T-T, that's also an inclination to emphasis. So some people go da-ta-na, but Sally and I are used to da-ta-na, accenting the last one.

And then on the Magaphalajñānasā, I've heard different melodies for this. We do it sing-song: Magaphalajñānasā. So it's low, high, low, high.

Maybe just for today, we'll do those bits call and response, just so we kind of get the same melody. Because this is the Forest Refuge Tabernacle Choir, and we want it to really sound good.

Let's begin. I think we can do it all in unison until we come to the fifth precept.

We've really given the core instructions for mindfulness of breathing that we wanted to share.

Continuing with this gentle exploration of mindfulness of breathing, let me offer a brief review of the fundamental principles we've been cultivating together.

Begin by finding a comfortable seated position, allowing your body to settle into a natural state of ease. Feel into any areas where you might be holding unnecessary tension—perhaps in the forehead, around the eyes, or through the shoulders—and simply let these places soften. There's something particularly supportive about allowing the eyes to rest in a gentle downward gaze, as if you're looking toward the floor a few feet ahead. This subtle adjustment often deepens the sense of inward settling.

Let your jaw unclench, your shoulders drop away from your ears, and your belly remain soft and natural. Allow your hands to rest wherever feels comfortable, free from any grasping or holding. This is about settling into your body's natural posture with a quality of relaxed alertness.

As you establish this physical foundation, extend the same quality of relaxation to your mind. There's no need to strive toward any particular destination or outcome. One of the profound truths of meditation practice is that all wholesome development emerges from a place of acceptance—simply being present with whatever is arising right now, exactly as it is.

Open your awareness to include the soundscape around you. Sometimes this receptivity to sound creates that spacious quality we've been exploring, where everything can be held within a larger field of awareness. Within this openness, allow thoughts to arise and pass away naturally. When we resist the emergence of thoughts, we strengthen aversion. When we chase after them and elaborate on their content, we strengthen attachment. The middle way is found in allowing thoughts to come and allowing them to go, without resistance or pursuit.

Similarly, let whatever mood is present be accommodated within this open space of awareness, without judgment or the need to change anything.

Now, reconnect with the felt sense of your body in sitting. Imagine your awareness filling your entire body, present wherever you choose to place your attention. If at any point the focus on breath begins to create striving or tension, you can always return to this simple foundation—resting your awareness within the body as the body rests in stillness.

From this grounded place, begin to notice the natural impact of breathing. What do you feel on an inhalation? What shifts with each exhalation? You might choose to feel the breath moving through your entire body, or you might prefer to focus on a smaller area—perhaps the nostrils, the upper lip, the chest, or the belly. All of these approaches are skillful; choose whatever helps you remain most present.

As you attend to this natural rhythm of inhalation and exhalation, notice how the breath itself can become a gateway to calm. You might orient gently in this direction, letting yourself attend to the breathing rhythm specifically to cultivate tranquility in both body and mind.

Feel free to employ any of the supportive techniques we've explored together—noting, counting, the body scan, attending to the beginning, middle, and end of each breath, or the four-point breathing method that includes the eyes, chest, belly, and sitting bones. Through all of these approaches, the central thread remains simple: the breath coming in, the breath going out, with as much continuity of mindfulness as possible.

I notice how beautifully quiet you all are, and I almost hesitate to interrupt this natural settling with words. But there's an important point worth addressing briefly.

As you work with these breathing practices, you might find yourself viewing certain techniques—like noting or counting—as somehow elementary, thinking you should have progressed beyond the need for such supports. This represents a fundamental misunderstanding of how these tools function in our practice.

I spent years in my early practice using noting, carefully attending to "rising, falling" at the abdomen. Later, during an intensive two-and-half-month retreat with Pawk Sayadaw, I found myself counting in virtually every sitting period, not because I was struggling, but because I discovered that this support actually enhanced my ability to remain present.

These techniques aren't stepping stones to be abandoned; they're skillful means that can serve us throughout the entire journey of practice. Find your own authentic relationship with these tools, but please don't dismiss them as remedial. They represent profound wisdom about how attention can be cultivated and sustained, and they remain valuable allies at every stage of our development.

But the main thing is what works best for you, what keeps the body relaxed and the attention present.

So we have a few minutes this morning if there are any questions.

CHAPTER 166

The Power of Loving-kindness

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this comprehensive teaching on mettā (loving-kindness), Guy Armstrong explores the transformative power of the brahmavihāras, beginning with a personal reflection on how love requires the wisdom of non-clinging to become stable. Drawing from his own journey of nearly 20 years of vipassanā practice before discovering intensive mettā cultivation, he outlines five major benefits of loving-kindness meditation.
> Armstrong examines how mettā develops tenderness and responsiveness of heart, purifies the mind through the karmic power of wholesome intention (cetanā), and serves as a powerful concentration practice that unifies mind and heart. He addresses common obstacles like the "near enemies" (attachment) and "far enemies" (ill-will) of mettā, offering practical guidance for working with hindrances that arise during practice. The teaching emphasizes how mettā connects us beyond individual liberation to care for all beings, referencing examples from the Dalai Lama and other realized teachers.
> Throughout, Armstrong weaves together classical Buddhist understanding with accessible modern examples, showing how loving-kindness transforms both meditation practice and daily life. He concludes with the profound happiness that emerges from mettā practice, describing it as filling the emptiness revealed by vipassanā with warmth, creating a liberation by loving-kindness that feels like coming home.

The subject of the talk this evening is the power of loving-kindness. We shifted this morning into instructions for the metta meditation, meditation on loving-kindness. So in the next few evening talks we want to touch on the themes of metta and the other Brahma Viharas. Tonight I'd like to talk specifically about loving-kindness or metta.

Rumi said, "Someone who does not run toward the allure of love walks a road where nothing lives." This really connected with me because in my early twenties, I was opening to love in many different ways—with people, with nature, with music, with art. The experiences were very strong and very fulfilling and quite inspiring for me at the time, but they were very unsteady. They came and went seemingly beyond my control or influence. And yet they became somewhat of an inspiration for my Dharma practice because I wanted to live there more of the time in my life.

Over the years I came to realize that they could not be steady unless they were joined by the wisdom of non-clinging, or you could say the wisdom of emptiness. And that's what makes these experiences more stable. Since that time, since my entry into Vipassana practice, I got very interested in the heart practices of the Brahmaviharas and really very moved by their power to bring in qualities that Vipassana alone was not bringing in for me.

Tonight I want to talk about what I see as five major benefits of the practice of loving-kindness. First, it makes the heart more responsive, or you could say tender. Second, it purifies the heart—it cleans it up. Third, it develops the factor of concentration strongly. Fourth, it connects us to all of life, meaning an inclusive openness to life. And fifth, it brings a lot of happiness. These are the five areas that I want to explore this evening.

This quality of tenderness—you could say that loving-kindness and the Brahma Viharas sort of wake the heart up. It makes us more in tune with the heart qualities of what is going on around us. That means what's going on in other people, in the creatures, and in ourselves. We let that land in our own hearts more clearly and more deeply.

The phrases lead us in this direction. All four phrases for metta that we introduced this morning are leading in the direction of "I'm checking in on you and I hope you're doing well." That's the flavor of the metta phrases—"I hope you're doing well." And that means that we care. We care about how we're doing ourselves. We care about how others are doing. And we're checking in to feel how that's going for you.

We say that Vipassana is our wisdom practice, and it is to see things the way they are. Not everyone who does Vipassana will choose to incorporate metta into their practice, and that's okay. You don't have to. If you don't want to run to the allure of love, that's your business. But Vipassana is really our foundation. We say we do metta in the context of Vipassana. That is, in liberating the mind and bringing these beautiful qualities into our life, metta and the Brahmaviharas are some of the most important ones that we want to bring along and to develop.

My observation is that for some personalities, the quality of metta unfolds naturally from Vipassana. As we see more clearly and the hindrances lift, wholesome qualities come in, and for some personalities, those qualities will include metta. Deepamma was like this. She did Vipassana, and in the beginning, a lot of her beautiful heart qualities just naturally shone through. She had that kind of temperament.

But I've known other people who develop quite a lot of Vipassana insight where the heart qualities were not so apparent. And so it's kind of based on what temperament one comes into practice with. In general, I'd say the more emotional temperaments tend to develop the more emotional qualities of the Brahmaviharas. And the less emotional temperaments tend not to develop them so readily, and so they are helped by being supported by specific practices.

For me personally, I had done close to twenty years of Vipassana practice when I happened upon the intensive practice of loving-kindness. And it became very important to me. I did a six-week retreat at the retreat center one year. For the next year, I didn't do any Vipassana practice. Everything I did in my daily sitting—

I came back the next year and did another Brahmavihara retreat. So for almost a year and a half, I put Vipassana aside and did nothing but Brahmavihara practice, and I have kept it up to some extent ever since. It has been a wonderful addition to my meditation and to my life. I really feel it has had a big impact on the way I see the world and the way I feel about the world today.

One of my teachers was a young Lama named Sogyal Rinpoche—well, at the time he was young; he's gotten a little older now, as all of us have. At the end of Tibetan retreats, they tend to give heart advice to their students. The retreat has ended and they're sending people out into the world. They want to offer some parting words of wisdom, pith instructions for the journey ahead.

Rinpoche's pith instructions at this retreat were simple but profound. First, he said, "When you go back into the world, be natural." Don't puff yourself up as some kind of great spiritual person. Just be natural and easy, simple. The second thing he said was, "Be wise. Go home and take care of your life, take care of your family, take care of your friends. Don't mess up." And the third thing he said was, "When you go back, be juicy."

Now, "juice" is a technical Buddhist term that stands for qualities like love and joy and compassion and reverence and devotion and wonder and awe and humility. All these things are what emerge as our hearts grow and grow. These are the qualities, I think, that get communicated to the people in our lives.

You know, you go home, and the people in your life are not going to be interested in hearing about your anatta insight—you probably already know that. But they are really going to respond to these qualities of juiciness that you bring home. And then they're going to think, "Maybe there's something to that meditation you've been doing." These qualities make our experience of life much sweeter and much richer.

Alice Walker, the author of The Color Purple, was quoted by Sharon Salzberg in one of her books as saying, "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness." This is what communicates when we go back. Our good-heartedness is what touches people.

The beautiful thing is the Buddha didn't just say this is a good idea. He told us how to develop good-heartedness and gave very clear instructions on this. Within our tradition, loving-kindness is our primary practice to develop these qualities of heart—the primary one in the tradition of early Buddhism. Essentially what we learn, through what the phrases are pointing to, is that we care for the well-being of others and we care for the well-being of ourselves through this wish which we generate again and again and again.

Once we have established this basic relationship of care for ourselves and for others, the other three Brahmaviharas follow along naturally based on that. When this open heart connects with someone who's suffering, what comes through naturally is the quality of compassion. Compassion is the response to suffering. When this open heart connects with someone who is in a state of well-being and happiness, then what comes through is what's called sympathetic joy. Our heart resonates with the joy that they're experiencing. This is not something we have to force—it happens naturally.

And when we're not particularly confronted with anyone's situation, the open heart can rest in a way that holds all the joys and all the sorrows of life, and this is the quality of equanimity, the Brahmavihara of equanimity.

If you look at teachings from Tibetan Buddhism or Zen Buddhism, you'll probably find that their primary heart quality is compassion. I think this comes out of their emphasis on the bodhisattva path, working to end the suffering of all beings. So compassion as a response to suffering gets elevated in those traditions to the primary place.

But don't imagine that it's that different from metta. The Dalai Lama said that compassion is basic human warmth, and that's what metta is too. It's just a slight shift in flavor—whether it's looking on suffering or more general in the case of metta. The other traditions also have the other Brahmaviharas, so it's not that compassion stands alone as a Brahmavihara in the Mahayana; it's joined with the other three Brahmaviharas as well.

Sometimes as people get into metta practice, they have a kind of philosophical doubt about it. It seems a little phony or seems like a Hallmark greeting card, or something that's too idealistic. Or they feel like, "I don't want to fake it if I'm not feeling it." This is where our good friend Carol Wilson has a nice piece of advice. She says, "Fake metta is better than real aversion."

So we trust in that. Because really the generation of these beautiful states is all part of the Buddha's teaching on right effort. Right effort is to maintain and develop wholesome states of mind, and the brahmaviharas are some of the most wholesome states that we can develop.

As Sally has been saying, don't hold metta so differently from, say, the steadiness of the breath. What we want to do is combine mindfulness and metta together in a moment of experience that you could think of as a warm attention. We want to meet our experience with a quality of warmth or friendliness. So if we can befriend all our experiences with this warm kind of mindfulness, that's actually the way the practice will deepen the best.

And then other people say that metta is really deluded. It says "may I be happy," but there is no I. It says "may you be happy," but happiness is impermanent. You know, "I'm too wise to practice metta. It's not really aligned with the Buddhist teachings."

So we have a phrase for you, if you are that kind of skeptic. If you like, you can say the metta phrase like this: "In this ever-changing stream of physical and mental phenomena, conventionally designated as Sally, may the mental state of happiness arise ever more frequently."

So if you like, you can say that. Or you can just say, "May Sally be happy." The choice is yours. The truth is, I just say "may Sally be happy," but I understand it in the longer form. So as old vipassana practitioners, you may also come to understand it that way and you just say it really simply: "May Sally be happy."

It is extraordinary when we meet someone who has developed the heart so strongly. And one of the people I think of in this regard is the Dalai Lama—such an amazing individual. I think we're so fortunate to be alive in a time when someone like him is still living on this earth.

When I want to think about, sort of realistically, how might a really awakened human being respond to a life situation, I don't imagine it in my mind or go back to stories of the Buddha. I think about the Dalai Lama. How does the Dalai Lama respond to life situations? He laughs a lot, and he also cries. He meets the refugees who are coming out of Tibet who may have been in prison for years. He hears their stories, and he'll cry at those stories. So we don't imagine that someone who's awakened has a cold or unfeeling heart or approach to life.

He has said very publicly, when people would ask him in these interfaith conferences, "What's your religion?"—like, they hadn't been reading?—"What's your religion?" And he would answer, "My religion is kindness." And I think he really means that. Most fundamentally, that's what he is about.

One time a few years ago, he was interviewed by Oprah Winfrey for her magazine. I really appreciate that Oprah is someone who gets these wonderful spiritual teachings and puts them out to a really wide audience. There aren't many people in the world today who do that, and Oprah is very good at that.

Oprah started interviewing the Dalai Lama and began by asking, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama said, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect," Oprah said.

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued, "You have nothing in your life that you have regrets about."

That's a good life. That's a great life, to have no regrets.

Regarding service to Tibet, the Dalai Lama said, "Service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

That's a wonderful mind. I'd suggest that his meditation skills are tied to his kindness—that his heart qualities support that deepening of his meditation practice.

So people like the Dalai Lama and Dipa Ma remind us of things that are part of our own nature, that are intrinsic to us also. My grandmother was born around 1890 in North Carolina, never had any formal Buddhist training. But she was one of the most loving people that I've ever met. It just came naturally to her.

So in our practice, we develop this quality of responsiveness, tenderness, awakefulness of the heart by inclining our mind in that direction moment after moment, much the way we develop in vipassana meditation by developing mindfulness moment after moment after moment.

The second powerful effect of the loving-kindness meditation is that it purifies our heart very strongly. This is from that very simple intention of connecting with someone in our meditation and wishing them well, connecting with oneself and wishing ourselves well, that we repeat again and again and again.

Now whether they get happy or not is not up to you, right? The outcome or the result isn't in our control. So we don't base the meditation, the worth of the meditation, on whether it works to make them happy or not. We base it on whether it purifies our own heart, our own mind. We can't control what happens in their life. But as we incline our mind to wish for their welfare, this wish can be connected with again and again and again. And it's that which purifies our own heart.

When we wish something, there's a kind of intention behind it. Our intention is for the person's well-being. This factor of intention is pointed to in a quotation on page four under the brahmaviharas, under the name of volition. The Pali word is cetana. Sometimes we'll translate it as intention, sometimes we'll translate it as volition. But there's a will in it.

In quotation fifteen, the Buddha says, "It is volition or intention that I call kamma. For having willed, one acts by body, speech, and mind."

So what we're doing as we generate this intention or volition toward others' welfare is we're making a karmic imprint in our own heart and mind through this mental action of intent, and that's what transforms us. Moment by moment, these intentions cause our own mind-stream to go in a slightly different direction. And that's a direction of care and of loving-kindness.

This is really the engine of the metta practice—connecting with this wish. That's what does the work. So when you say the phrases, it's not enough just to repeat them like a mantra. The power of the practice really comes from the intention that you give to the wish you're making. Simpler way to say it is: say the phrase as though you actually mean it. Try to put as much real meaning as you can into the phrase.

Sometimes it will be hard to summon that up and you'll just say the phrase and you'll stay in the present moment, and then a little later the meaning will come back to you and you'll be able to give it that sense. But it's really your heart's meaning of the caring that is the power of the metta practice.

You might say that what we're doing with each repetition of a phrase is we're just planting a seed. We're planting a seed of that intent. And as you know with mindfulness, meditative seeds can take a long time to bear fruit. Mindfulness was probably not an explosive experience for you when you started. Little by little you feel the momentum, tremendous momentum that it has. And so these metta intentions are the same way.

So say it with some degree of meaning and trust in the fact you're planting that seed. Don't worry if it feels like nothing's happening. This is something that every metta meditator has to deal with: "I'm saying the phrase, I'm being diligent. My heart still feels dry. What am I doing wrong?" Nothing. It's just sometimes one has to be patient. It takes time for the change to develop.

But a week of metta practice will do something for you. I don't have any doubt about that. It will do its work over the course of a week. So just be willing to plant the seeds, water them.

It's not our job to tell it when it's going to flower or when it's going to bear fruit. That's nature's job. If you went out and planted a tomato plant in the soil out here, your job is to plant it and get the soil right and water it. But it's not your job to say when the tomato should come up. If every day you want to go dig it a little bit and pull a little harder, it's going to stifle it. But you plant the seeds, you water them, and then you trust the Dharma. You just surrender.

This is from the Dhammapada: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, 'this will come to nothing.' By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled." Little by little. The jar fills up one drop after another of this intent, this karmic action of intention.

So we begin with loving kindness for ourselves. As Sally mentioned, sometimes this can seem difficult. It's presented as the easiest person, but it's not necessarily. However, it is the person we care the most about. So in that sense, it's easy. We do care for ourselves more than for anyone else, and that's the starting point.

But as we turn metta to ourselves, often it brings up the ways that we don't feel so great about ourselves. We may find that it brings up feelings of self-judgment or "I'm not worthy of love," or it brings up some self-hatred or feelings of guilt. We remember all the times we didn't act with loving kindness and then we feel really bad about that.

This doesn't mean that we're doing it wrong. Actually, that can be a sign that it's working—that we're doing it right. Because metta purifies. As we incline the mind to loving kindness, anything that's not aligned with that is going to come to the surface. It's kind of like metta is this powerful magnet with a positive pole, and we run it up the center of our being, and it attracts all the things that are negatively charged to it. It draws them out of the mind, it draws them out of the body.

Then, when they're drawn up into awareness, we have the possibility of knowing them, understanding them, and releasing them through caring attention, through a combination of mindfulness and loving kindness. So hindrances—the activation of hindrances—are part of the process of the loving kindness practice. It's not all light and flowers in our metta practice. So just be prepared for that. It doesn't mean it's going wrong; it means that it's actually doing the work of purification.

People who have done quite a lot of metta practice find they become really sensitive to anything that's arising in their thoughts or emotions that's not aligned with metta. And it starts to feel really uncomfortable to have those kinds of thoughts and feelings. And then, therefore, we want to let them move through us as soon as possible, without judgment, but with clear seeing: "Oh, this is not aligned with metta. Let's let this move through."

So as the hindrances come up through the metta practice, how do we work with them? The first suggestion—much as Sally discussed with the hindrances in concentration practice—is to leave the hindrance in the background. So it could be anger, could be fear, could be anxiety, could be desire. Any of the normal hindrances, just let it go on kind of in the background and keep turning the attention to the wish for caring.

If the hindrance is weak enough that you can still develop the intention of caring, continue to do that. Then eventually the caring and the metta will sort of embrace the hindrance. It's like wrapping an arm around it and saying, "Come on in, you don't have to be so upset." It'll take care of the hindrance by itself and then you don't have to do very much.

If the hindrance is stronger and it blocks the intention to caring, then try moving from metta to compassion. You're in a position of some suffering—the hindrance is strong enough that you're not able to develop the genuine wish for caring anymore.

That's kind of painful. So we turn to compassion and I'd suggest doing a formal compassion practice at that point. Also on page four of the study guide are some possible phrases for compassion, and you can use any of these that you like. The classic one would be to turn your attention to yourself and say, "May I be free from this suffering."

So you recognize the suffering is here through the hindrance, but you care about it. You care about your experience of suffering. You say, "May I be free from this suffering?" This is the most classical way.

Another approach—I find that "may I be free from" has a little bit of an aversive, pushing-away tone. So the phrase I use personally is "May I hold this pain with compassion." This kind of wraps the arms around the whole experience. "May I hold this with compassion." Or you can say something like "I care about this pain" or "I care about this sorrow." It creates a new relationship with the hindrance that shines the caring on the hindrance itself.

If that doesn't feel fitting, then you can switch to vipassana. Just move into your normal mindfulness practice. Feel the hindrance as its emotion manifests. Feel it in the body. Listen to its thoughts. Stay with it with mindfulness until it passes through. So mindfulness is still useful even in the metta practice. Once the hindrance has washed through, you can go back to the formal practice of metta.

One thing you'll notice in being with a hindrance with metta is that it may not be a very joyful kind of metta. You start to learn that the presence of loving-kindness has a range of flavors. It goes from subtle to strong.

Here are some of the manifestations of the quality of metta. The first is patience. Something unpleasant is going on—like a hindrance—but you're basically okay with being with it. You're kind of okay that it's there. You're not thrilled, but you're not really struggling or getting judgmental about it. So there's this element of patience, which is allowing without pressure to get rid of it. There's still a kind of "don't like it," but you're bearing with it, you're forbearing.

One step up from there, you move to the hindrance with real acceptance—a real quality of "It's totally fine with me that this fear is here, or this desire is here, or this anxiety, or whatever it is." It's really totally fine. I don't care if it goes or stays. I accept it as part of my experience. No resistance.

Then, as metta continues to warm up—maybe with or without a hindrance—it moves into a quality of real friendliness, an affection for your experience. There's a kind of warmth that comes, radiating and directed to anything that comes within your field of experience.

One step up from that is love. You might feel this when you're walking out in nature here, walking in the forest on a beautiful sunny day when the flowers are out—it's rhododendron season—and your heart just goes, "Wow, this is love." This is the quality of deep, deep affection for things.

Then it can grow to devotion. Devotion can be directed toward a person, a spiritual teacher, or toward the dharma itself. You just feel that this is the greatest gift in life—the dharma, the teachings, the beings who manifest the dharma. This is what I want to lay my heart upon. So this devotional quality comes through as the metta practice develops.

As we're directing metta to ourselves, we can feel at times there's an inward friendliness developing that lets us open up to more and more of ourselves. This is pointed to in this poem by Galway Kinnell called "St. Francis and the Sow." I'm just going to read a little bit of the poem.

He starts off talking about a flower bud, which is nice at this time of year. A lot of the rhododendrons are still in the budding stage—some plants. Some of them are already really flowering. You'll see other flower buds around here.

"The bud stands for all things, even for those things that don't flower, for everything flowers from within, of self-blessing; though sometimes it is necessary to re-teach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on its brow and retell it in words and in touch..."

It is lovely until it flowers again from within of self blessing.

This is part of what metaphor offers us. It lets us discover our beauty, the treasures of our heart and mind.

Now, the metta practice in its purification work brings up any hindrance, but specifically there are two kinds of hindrances that we discuss in relation to the Brahmaviharas. One is called the near enemy and one is called the far enemy. Each of the Brahmaviharas has one of each. You can see a list of those on page 4, quotation 13.

So for each divine abode, it lists its near enemy and its far enemy. The near enemy—somebody called it the near miss, which I thought was rather cute—because it's close to the Brahmavihara, but it's not quite on target, and it misses in a way that's somewhat unwholesome. The far enemy is the opposite, so it's definitely not a wholesome state of mind.

With loving kindness, the near enemy is said to be affection with attachment. That is, you have a feeling of friendliness towards someone, but you want something back from them or you want them to be a certain way. The metta only continues if you get what you want or they manifest the way you want them to manifest.

So in relationships, for example, there's often a kind of contract: I'll be friendly to you if you're nice to me or if you give me what I want. Or sometimes there's the expectation, I'll be nice to you if you act the way I want. This can lead into a kind of conditional acceptance of someone, and that can lead to fixing.

I was teaching a metta weekend once in Canada—a whole weekend just on metta practice—and I'd used the phrase "may you live with the ease of well-being" as the fourth phrase. I encouraged people to find someone really close to them in the friend category and practice: "May you live with the ease of well-being."

Partway through that session, someone raised their hand and said, "Well, I have a son in college, and I say this phrase to him: 'May you live with the ease of well-being.' But I think to myself, no, he's living with way too much well-being and ease. I'm taking care of him, I'm cooking his meals, I'm doing his laundry, and he's not even doing that well in his classes. May you start doing well in your classes!"

That was mother's metta. And I said, "No, no, no, no, no. That's fixing. You really want to feel the friendship and acceptance for the way your son is." So allowing each person to be the way they are and still having that care for them.

The far enemy is the opposite of metta. So instead of caring about somebody's happiness, we are happy when they're not doing so well. This is called ill will—the opposite of goodwill.

At my first metta retreat at the retreat center, my difficult person happened to be on the retreat with me. I would be doing my metta, getting into it: "May all beings be happy. May they be safe. May they be at ease." And my difficult person would walk by. I'd start remembering all the things that had happened in the past year: "Oh, no. I can't believe she did that. When I said that and she did... I can't believe it was like that." So I'd start spinning on all the events of the past.

This would go on for a while. It was very painful—not only the upset, but the loss of the metta was really painful when being around this difficult person.

I hadn't done a lot of metta practice at that time. I'd heard that you could do metta for your difficult person, but I thought, "I don't want to do that. They're going to make me pretend I like them. I don't want to do that." So I resisted for a while, but then I got desperate. I said, "Okay, I'll start doing metta for this person."

I just went through the phrases—five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes—and all of a sudden I found I wasn't angry at them.

I could actually start to wish for their welfare. And what I realized was that within my anger—and I think within a lot of our anger—there's an element that's actually ill will. This person has hurt me, and I want them to suffer. That's what ill will is: I want them to suffer.

When I realized I was wanting somebody else to suffer, that was very close to cruelty. Cruelty is when we enjoy somebody else's suffering—it's the opposite of compassion. So here I was wanting someone else to suffer. It was so close to cruelty I couldn't accept it. When I saw what it was, I couldn't accept it. I thought, I don't want to live like that.

And so I discovered that this conscientious application of metta, even for my difficult person, would undermine the ill will. As long as I could generate a thought of good will for them and really hope that they become happy, the ill will couldn't coexist. Ill will can't coexist with good will. As soon as I could find the good will, the ill will wasn't there anymore and the anger wasn't there anymore. I found this really does work, even for the difficult person. That was one of my most difficult people in my life, and it really made a difference.

Some people who have been in prison—Buddhist practitioners in Burma who have been imprisoned—have commented that when they came out of prison, they really appreciated the value of loving kindness so much more because they saw what it was like to live with people who were influenced by the opposite of loving kindness: their prison guards and captors. They came out of prison and appreciated even more the value of loving kindness.

Nelson Mandela said something similar. This is from that movie based on his life called Long Walk to Freedom, which is based on his autobiography. There was this amazing episode where he was negotiating his release from prison with de Klerk and members of the white government. The main reason they didn't want to release Mandela, according to the movie, is that they were afraid that he would incite the black people of South Africa to violent revenge upon the whites who had mistreated them so badly for so many years.

In this face-to-face meeting with Mandela, they asked him that directly: Are you going to go out and incite the black population to take revenge? And he said, "No, we will not do that. I've seen what fear has done to your people. You have always been afraid of us, and it has made you an unjust and brutal people. We do not want to live like that."

He did this amazing thing of coming out and developing the truth and reconciliation movement that tried to unify all South Africans. It was an amazingly spiritual step to take.

So this is the element of purification. The hindrances come. We hold them with metta. They have the possibility of moving through us. And some of them are purified—I'm reluctant to say it, but it's true—forever. As some of these old habits of mind are seen and moved through us, that particular pattern may truly be gone forever. Forever.

The third of the great benefits of loving kindness is that it is a concentration practice and brings about this quality that we've been talking about so much on this retreat: the unification of mind. We've talked about mindfulness as bringing the mind together in the present moment in a unified way, but we also know that love unifies the mind. Love is a tremendously unifying force. It brings people together—couples together, friends together, families, communities, nations, eventually, maybe, someday, the globe. It has that potential.

So we join the unification of love with the unification of concentration. In loving kindness, the concentration is primarily, as Sally mentioned this morning, the phrases. By continuing to say the phrases, the mind is collecting around that meditation focus. But there are three other focuses that we've mentioned or will draw out more clearly: the image of the person that you may want to work with, the metta feeling that may come, and feeling the effects of the metta in the body.

And here we incline you to look at the heart center. We actually have four objects for concentration: the phrase, the image, the metta feeling, and the heart center. We'll explain how to work together with these as we go. Therefore, having even more objects can make the concentration stronger. A juggler who's got four balls up in the air has to be pretty with it to keep those four balls going. This is our concentration practice with metta. So love brings the mind together, concentration brings the mind together, and the two together are really powerful.

I want to read this paragraph from a Christian saint—his name is Theophan the Recluse, and he lived in Russia in the 19th century. He was a Russian Orthodox saint. It sounds like it could have been written by a Buddhist practitioner. I don't know if he had the influence or what, but it's so like our practice:

"So long as the mind remains in the head, where thoughts jostle one another, it has no time to concentrate on one thing. But when attention descends into the heart, it attracts all the powers of the soul and body into one point there. The concentration on life is immediately reflected in the heart by a special sensation that is the beginning of warmth. This sensation grows gradually stronger, firmer, deeper. So it comes about that whereas in the initial stages the attention is kept in the heart by an effort of will, in due course, this attention by its own strength gives birth to warmth in the heart. This warmth then holds the attention without special effort. From this, the two go on supporting one another and remain inseparable, because dispersion of attention cools the warmth and diminishing warmth weakens attention."

Isn't that lovely? The warmth and the attention coming together in the heart, concentrating and reinforcing one another. That's also this practice.

The fourth great benefit is that it really opens our practice out to all of life. Vipassana practice can become quite individualistic sometimes, can become self-centered and in a way sort of narrow—about my happiness, my suffering, my release. But metta practice eventually opens out beyond our limited experience. It opens out to other individuals from the beginning, eventually opens to all beings.

This is from Shantideva, an 8th century practitioner and writer from India who practiced and taught at Nalanda University, a great center of Buddhism in medieval India. His most famous work is A Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life, a foundational text in the Mahayana. This is from Shantideva:

"Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

With metta, we really awaken this wish for everyone in the world—all beings, all humans, all creatures—to be happy. And that connects us. I think one of the deepest sadnesses in the West in the last century has been the growing sense of isolation. As communities have been undermined, as children have moved away from parents and their homes, the risk is of individuals getting very alone and disconnected, even from other friends, in a very solitary kind of lifestyle. Researchers who have investigated say that this is a source of deep unhappiness for our world today.

Metta undoes that. Metta connects us. As we tune into the welfare of other beings, we find out we all have the same wishes. Everybody wants to be safe and happy and healthy and live at ease. And so do all the creatures. We all want the same basic things.

In our social discourse these days, we make all kinds of distinctions. There's a lot of thought and writing about distinctions of race and ethnicity and class and age and sexual orientation and gender identification, language, culture, political views. All those things—they're real. Those are real distinctions. We don't want to write them off. But sometimes we forget that they're not the whole story. Those distinctions don't tell the whole story about us. And what the distinctions don't tell is our sameness. We all share the same humanness.

And we know that, but in the realm of social discourse, it doesn't get pointed to very often. It's like, oh, that's a spiritual thing. That's not the place for newspapers to talk about. But it's a place for us to talk about.

We have basically the same body with minor variations. We have the same heart because we share all the emotions together. We have the same mind. We can think the same thoughts and have the same human consciousness at work. And we realize basically we're one organism. All of it. One species. One organism.

The same human heart has been poured into all these different vessels. And then it undergoes different conditions and different experiences. And therefore it gets shaped. But the heart is the same. Everywhere. And we forget that. We forget how deeply alike we are. And that's ultimately what connects us. We're the same being.

So metta really reminds us of that. Across all the distinctions that we can make, which are valid distinctions and important distinctions on the social level, on a deeper level, it's different.

You know, Rumi left a lot of poems, and he credited one person with being his teacher, who was Shams of Tabriz. Shams of Tabriz left very little in the way of poetry, but here's the one poem that we know that he did leave: "I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

You could also say in the clear seeing of Vipassana, these are not true distinctions. And metta sees through them to this connectedness. It does not ignore the distinctions, but it sees that they are not the final or only word about our truth.

And finally, the fifth benefit that comes from the practice of metta: it brings a lot of happiness. And I really hope you all get to experience this during this week to come. Metta brings a tremendous amount of delight and happiness.

One of the people I think of in this regard is the Thai teacher I talked about the other day, Ajahn Jumdean. He was one of the most accomplished practitioners that I've met. He was proficient in Vipassana practice, and he'd done a lot of loving-kindness practice, and he radiated that as well. And every time I saw him, he seemed happy. He had a smile on his face. He was laughing. He was playful. He was joyful. I never saw him in any other mood than that.

At one point, we were talking to him about his practice and his development. He said, "I haven't had anger in 25 years." That's a happy mind.

So we'd bring him to Spirit Rock and offer that people could come if they wanted and hear teachings, but he was there to hang out. And some days people would ask him, or Jack would ask him, "What would you like to do today, Ajahn? We could drive you around Marin and take you up to the top of Mount Tam and you could have a view, or we could go out for lunch at a restaurant."

And he'd say, "Oh, I'm happy with anything, I don't mind, but are there people who want to hear the Dharma? If there are people who want to hear the Dharma, then I'll talk to them about the Dharma. But if nobody comes and nobody wants to hear the Dharma, then I can just sit here and I'll be happy."

But he really seemed happiest when people wanted to hear the Dharma. And he was one of those teachers, sort of the river-of-Dharma teacher, where you turn the switch and it just goes on and on and on until lunchtime, maybe. He had a lot of Dharma energy to transmit.

And one of his key teachings that I still remember—he didn't speak much English, but he learned at least two words. And he was transmitting the essence of what he understood from Vipassana and metta. And he would touch the space and he would say, "Empty, empty." And then with his other hand he would go, "Happy, happy."

And that's what he was like. He was so empty and he was so happy.

So when we discover this happiness of the Brahma Viharas and happiness of metta, it's a little bit like the sukha that we were talking about the other day. It is so satisfying. It is so much what we are looking for that we feel we can just settle into it, just rest and experience that quality of happy comfort and the joy of loving kindness. It feels like we're home. It feels like a deliverance.

And in fact, the Buddha talked about the liberation by loving kindness as one particular form of liberation. So we say that in our practice of Vipassana, it reveals this inner emptiness or this openness or this spaciousness, but then metta fills it with warmth. And that's what's so lovely. So when we come to rest, this is not like a cold, empty void that we find ourselves in because the metta is pervading it with warmth. And so it's rich, it's touching, it's moving, it's satisfying.

And out of this we find—and it's not just metta, but so many treasures of the heart and mind come from that place when we can rest, when we're supported by the Brahma Viharas, by emptiness and by wisdom. The treasures of the mind really come out. So we can trust in that. We can surrender to it. We can stop doing. We can stop running. We don't need anything else. And we feel as we rest, oh, our basic nature is good. Self-doubts really dissolve in that kind of experience. Our basic nature is good. And there's a really okay feeling about who we are and what we are.

And then when we can trust in our own goodness, we find it's a pleasure to share that with others, as many of you are already doing in your lives, sharing this blessing of the Dharma with others.

This is also from Shantideva. This is a particular passage that the Dalai Lama has a very strong resonance with, and I think encapsulates his attitude:

"For as long as space endures and as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the misery of this world."

This is really the Bodhisattva's aspiration. For as long as sentient beings remain, may I too abide to dispel the misery of this world.

And then I want to close with another quotation with Oprah and the Dalai Lama. And in this quotation, I want to again remind us that metta and compassion are not very different. They're different flavors of the same ice cream, you could say.

So Oprah finished the interview and said to the Dalai Lama, "In my magazine, I do a column called 'What I Know For Sure.' What do you know for sure? The one thing on which you have no doubt."

The Dalai Lama did not hesitate: "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For happy life and happy world, there is no doubt."

And so is metta.

Let's just sit for a minute and let the words settle. What do you know for sure? Metta is the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world. There is no doubt.

CHAPTER 167

Morning Instructions: On Mettā Practice

Guy Armstrong · 40 min

> In this morning dharma talk from the June 2019 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong provides detailed instructions for mettā (loving-kindness) meditation practice. He guides practitioners through the foundational stages of mettā bhāvanā, emphasizing the importance of beginning with self-compassion before extending loving-kindness to benefactors and friends. Armstrong addresses common challenges in mettā practice, particularly the arising of memories and thoughts when focusing on relationships, explaining this as a natural "relationship review" process that helps align past experiences with present dharmic understanding.
> The teacher offers practical advice for selecting appropriate recipients of mettā, suggesting that in Western contexts where traditional benefactor relationships may be less common, practitioners can include children, pets, or mentors who evoke uncomplicated affection. He emphasizes the embodied nature of mettā practice, encouraging practitioners to connect with the heart center and maintain awareness of physical sensations and emotions that arise during meditation. The talk includes a guided meditation session using traditional mettā phrases: "May I/you be safe and protected from harm, may I/you be happy, may I/you be healthy, may I/you live with ease."
> Armstrong concludes by connecting individual mettā practice to the universal wish for happiness shared by all beings, encouraging practitioners to recognize that the basic desires for safety, happiness, health, and ease are common to all sentient life. This teaching offers both beginning and experienced practitioners accessible entry points into one of Buddhism's most transformative practices for developing compassion and emotional healing.

In the loving kindness instructions for today, we'll continue to work with the two or three people that Sally started us with yesterday, which includes beginning with self. So I recommend in every sitting, in every walking, you include some time on mettā for self.

This may not be the most warm, alive, juicy part of your meditation. But it's really important to keep bringing those attentions back to self. It's what starts to change our relationship to our self.

Then we'll work with someone who will be in the category for you of either benefactor or friend. So after a third to a half of a session of sitting or walking, begin with self and at some point you can switch to benefactor or friend if that seems skillful for you, if that seems appealing and helpful.

If you start with mettā for self and you find this is really connecting, this is really where I want to be, you can just stay with mettā for self. People have discovered in the mettā practice, mettā for self is really filling up a thirsty hole they didn't know existed. And they have stayed with mettā for self for years before moving on to another person. And it's fine to do that if that's what feels appropriate for you, if it feels really a strong draw.

But if it feels easy, be with mettā for self for fifteen or twenty minutes or so, and then move toward the second person—let's say a benefactor or a friend—wherever the relationship feels warm and pretty easy, pretty uncomplicated.

If you're looking for someone in a benefactor category, in the West sometimes we don't have so many benefactors growing up. Family members are at a distance. Maybe we haven't connected with a mentor or a teacher in a really personal way. So there may not be anyone that stands out for us as a benefactor in that classical sense.

Then you can also think about using a child or a pet in this category. The benefactor should be a being who evokes a lot of affection and where there's not much ambivalence when you turn to them. So children can really open the heart really well. It could be your own child. If they're adult and the relationships become a little more fraught, you could think of them as a youngster. Or it could be a niece or a nephew or a godchild or it could be one of your grandchildren if you happen to have grandkids.

And then if you'd like to bring in a friend as well in that category, you can do that too. You can have both a benefactor and a friend, and bring them in as they seem to fit.

So in these first days of the mettā practice, we'll be focusing mainly on people in these three categories: self, benefactor, and friend.

One of the things you may find as you do mettā practice toward, especially someone who's an adult whom you've known for a lot of years, is you bring them in and a lot of memories about them will come up, and memories about yourself in relation to them. This is natural. You might think, "Oh, I've really backslid because when I was with the breath I wasn't having so many thoughts, I wasn't having so many memories and now all these are coming up. Am I losing it?" No, this is natural with mettā practice. It's a relational practice. And so it tends toward this kind of relationship review, let's call it.

As memories of the person come up, you may remember things that were beautiful, warm, loving, happy. You may remember areas where there was friction, where there was some conflict or disagreement and things may not have turned out so well.

So in practicing with mettā, if memories come up, don't fight with that. Don't try to push them back down. Don't try to suppress the thoughts. Let them be there but in the background. So it's best if the memories can kind of come just as images without a lot of words. And you can let the images be in the background while you continue to say the mettā phrases for that person or for yourself.

And essentially what's happening as we bring someone into a field of unconditional acceptance, which is mettā, we start to see the ways that our relationship didn't line up with that in the past. And so essentially what the memories are saying is, help me get aligned with mettā in my relationship with this person. So we're kind of updating them from our old ways of living into our new ways of Dharma understanding. And this is a healing process. This is helpful.

So not to fight the memories, but also try not to go on long thought excursions around them. Let the thoughts come, let them go. Images can stay in the background and keep returning to the mettā phrases.

Beginning the meditation. Sitting easily, comfortably. It's really hard to generate a lot of mettā if your body's in pain, so be easy and relaxed in your sitting.

Begin by connecting into your body. Just feeling yourself in sitting. We want the mettā practice not just to be a mental line of words, but we want it to be an embodied experience of whatever it is that comes.

Feeling your presence in the body, and perhaps within that, bringing your attention into the heart center—this area in the center of the chest, where so many emotions are rooted and felt.

As you connect with the heart center, get in touch with this wish which is behind all metta practice: the wish for the welfare of all beings everywhere. This is what we're aiming toward, and we're building toward it through various individuals. But in its basic form, the wish of metta is for all beings to be well and to be happy.

So have that sense of an expansive awareness that's very wide and open, inclusive—standing in a kind of boundless way all around you. Just realize that whatever beings there are in this wide awareness, our intention toward them all is for their welfare. You might verbalize that with a few repetitions of this phrase: "May all beings be well, happy and peaceful."

And recognize that included in all beings is you.

Now bring the attention to yourself. You can still rest the attention in the heart center and connect with your sense of yourself. As you do, remember some of your good qualities. This might be your taste in art, your sense of humor, your caring for friends, or being there for your children or parents, caring about the earth and environment and showing that. What would one of your friends say they liked about you if you asked them?

Then bring to mind a few things you've done—a few actions you've undertaken that have shown your care for others. Calling someone who's ill to check in. Sending a card to someone who might need support. Looking after your pets and seeing they're well-fed and healthy. Just little things.

As you remember some of these kind actions, get in touch with the intention behind each one. Notice how you are responding to someone's need or wish through a motivation of caring for their welfare. As it's said, the proximate cause for metta to arise is to see the good in someone. So it's helpful to remind ourselves of the good in ourselves.

And especially for all of you, think about your commitment to the Dharma. How you've dedicated so many hours to growing in understanding, growing in love, growing in compassion for the benefit of yourself and the benefit of the world. This is a rare and beautiful motivation.

So in touch with your own goodness, begin directing the phrases for loving-kindness to yourself, using the phrases that you've found feel suitable for you:

May I be safe and protected from harm.
May I be happy.
May I be healthy—and this always carries a sub-clause: And if that's not possible, may I hold my limitations with grace.
May I live with ease.

This phrase especially refers to taking care of ourselves in the world—the phrase about our relationships and livelihood. When those are in order, we can feel we're living with ease.

Stay in touch with yourself—this could be the felt sense of your body and mood as you sit. It could be through an image of yourself somewhere that you're comfortable or happy. Stay in touch with yourself and repeat these phrases of loving-kindness. There's no need to rush with your phrases. It's not a speed affair. See if you can take the time to feel the sincere meaning in the wish as you say it.

Now, if you feel ready, you can move on and bring in your benefactor or friend. Connect with them by remembering them, perhaps calling to mind an image of them someplace where they feel comfortable. Or it might help to say their name.

As you get in touch with them, remember something of their good qualities. What has made you like them so much? It might be their wisdom, their integrity, their compassion, their ethical lifestyle...

their humor, or simply the warmth of their presence. Then you might reflect on a few kind actions you've seen them take. It could be kind things they've done for you, kind things they've done for others, or acts of care for the earth itself.

With a sense of the goodness of your benefactor, begin to repeat the phrases for them that are more or less the same as the ones you use for yourself—the same basic wishes. As I want to be safe, may you too be safe and protected from harm. May you too be happy. May you be healthy. May you live with ease.

Continue to stay connected with the benefactor, either through an image or a felt sense of them, occasionally saying their name, and extending your wishes in the form of the phrases. A nice rhythm might be that you call up an image, say your phrases for them, and at the end of a set of phrases, bring your attention back into the heart center. Feel what it feels like in the body and see if any emotion or mood is present. Could be strong, could be subtle. Could be the flavor of metta, could be a little bit of compassion. Could be one of the hindrances, or could just be calm. All of those are fine. Notice the mood as you connect back into the body. Allow it to be just the way it is, and connect with the next set: image, phrases, heart center, and feeling.

As you're connecting with your benefactor, you may notice different feelings come up in relation to them. Could be gratitude or appreciation or friendliness. Could be one of the hindrances—some memory of a conflict or disturbance comes in. All of those are fine, a natural part of the meditation. So if possible, allow that emotion to be there, to be felt, and continue connecting with your wish for the benefactor's welfare and expressing that through the phrases.

For the last minutes or so of the sitting, reconnect with that wide sense, with an expansive awareness of all beings everywhere. Human beings, creatures, beings seen and unseen. All beings everywhere have the same basic wish that we do for happiness. Just reconnecting with that wish for all beings again with a simple phrase: May all beings be well, happy and peaceful. May all beings be well, happy and peaceful.

So as you go through the day today with the sittings and the walkings, continue with the metta practice. Remember to always spend some time with yourself and then, if you feel ready and inclined, move on to a benefactor or friend as well. It's helpful to use the same phrases for all the beings you work with—first, because it strengthens concentration, and second, because it really brings out the fact that all beings want the same basic things in life: safety, happiness, health and ease.

We have a few minutes for questions, if there are any. And just to remember, I don't know if we've mentioned this, but sometimes staff will come in to sit and staff are welcome to leave after the sitting. They're not required to stay for the questions. You, on the other hand, once you come, we'd appreciate if you'd stay so there's not too much turnover.

So are there any questions this morning?

CHAPTER 168

Morning Instructions: The Practice of Compassion

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

> In this morning instruction from a June 2019 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong introduces the practice of karuṇā (compassion) as an essential component of the brahmavihāra meditation. He addresses how practitioners can wisely meet the reality of suffering—both in themselves and in the world—without becoming overwhelmed by grief or despair.
> Armstrong explains that compassion is the appropriate response when encountering dukkha during mettā practice, whether reflecting on one's own difficulties or witnessing the struggles of loved ones. He provides detailed instructions for compassion meditation, beginning with a 'suffering person' whose difficulties feel manageable, then extending the practice to oneself, benefactors, and friends. The talk emphasizes that compassion is not itself a state of suffering but rather a beautiful, balanced response that can hold pain with wisdom and care.
> The instruction includes practical guidance for daily life application, referencing the mindful self-compassion approach developed by Kristin Neff and Chris Germer. Armstrong offers specific phrases and techniques for practitioners to use when encountering physical pain, difficult emotions, or challenging life circumstances, making this an invaluable resource for both retreat and home practice.

For today and tomorrow as you continue your meditation throughout the day, we suggest that you keep working with the three categories of individuals you've been working with so far: self, benefactor, and a good friend. We want to take advantage of the instruction times today and tomorrow to introduce two practices that are part of the brahma viharas and serve as helpful tools during any period of brahma vihara practice. These are the practices for compassion, which we'll introduce today, and for sympathetic joy, which we'll introduce tomorrow.

We're not suggesting that you move your entire practice to compassion or sympathetic joy. Rather, we want to give instruction on how to do these practices so that you can bring them in when they really fit. Sometimes they're very helpful. In a normal metta retreat of a week, we would introduce these in the afternoons. Since we're not having afternoon instruction sessions, we're introducing them today and tomorrow.

This morning we'll be introducing the practice of compassion. This is obviously so relevant to our meditation practice and our life in the world, because once we start to wake up to the way things are, what we see around us and what we see inside us is suffering. It's everywhere. It's part of the human condition and the foundation for the Four Noble Truths. We start to see the truth of suffering everywhere we look. We begin to understand more deeply the root cause of suffering—craving. We understand there is the potential for the end of suffering and the end of craving, and we walk the path toward that.

Nonetheless, many people in the world are not walking the path to the end of suffering. The suffering is visible, and in some cases not easy to remedy. So how does our heart meet that truth? How do we relate to all the unfixable suffering that we encounter in our life in the world?

As you go through the meditations on your benefactor and friend and also yourself, you'll come across areas of suffering. There will be ways that you review your own life where you realize you didn't act so skillfully, and you may have regret, remorse, or judgment. You'll come upon situations in your current life that are difficult and don't admit of easy resolution. You'll find conditions here as you're meditating on retreat—difficult emotions or bodily pain that are an immediate part of your experience and not easy to alleviate. Then metta can seem like a wishful fantasy when the truth is the immediacy of suffering in this moment.

In all these situations—the width of suffering in the world, the experience of suffering directly in our own life—how can we meet that wisely with the brahma viharas? This is the role of the brahma vihara of compassion. Compassion is the wise response to the encounter with suffering, and it's not itself a state of suffering. Compassion is a beautiful state.

If you look at the statues of the Buddha, or even more to the point, Kuan Yin, who is the bodhisattva of compassion, she's not depressed. There's this beautiful balance of equanimity in the face of all the cries of sorrow and joy that she's witnessing. The response of compassion to suffering is a wise response that is not itself suffering. It finds a way to hold the suffering, whether of oneself or of the world, in balance.

In fact, in order to develop compassion, we need to meet an instance of suffering. Compassion is not some ideal state that we manufacture out of thin air. The proximate cause for the arising of compassion is the encounter with suffering. It may be our own; it may be another's. But we need to touch the suffering directly for compassion to be able to arise.

In the meditation on compassion, we always say that we start where it's easy. We're going to start with someone in your field of acquaintance who's undergoing some suffering. This is a person we'll call, for the purposes of this meditation, the suffering person.

As you think about selecting a suffering person for this meditation, don't pick someone with the most suffering you can imagine. Pick someone with a suffering that feels manageable for you. It may not feel manageable for them, but it should feel manageable for you. This means either it's someone for whom the suffering is manageable for themselves, or it's someone who's at a little more distance so that their suffering doesn't overwhelm you.

You'll start to see that the potential miss—the near enemy—with compassion is being overwhelmed with the grief of another, the grief of the world, the grief of ourselves. As we're learning a compassionate response, we don't want to call up a person that puts us immediately into more burden than we can carry. So pick someone whose suffering feels manageable for you but is apparent. This is the person we'll begin the meditation with.

As you come into this period of meditation, first sit comfortably, finding your own balance of body and mind. Remember that the wide intention of the brahma viharas is for all beings to be well, happy, and peaceful. May all beings be well, happy, and peaceful. Establish that wide view first with a short reflection on metta meditation for yourself.

Included in all beings is yourself. We begin with the simple wishes for our own welfare.

May I be safe and protected from harm. May I be happy. May I be healthy. May I live with ease.

And now taking a few moments to select and call to mind someone in your circle of acquaintances who's going through a difficult time. It could be someone you're close to, a loved one, someone a little more distant, a colleague at work, someone in the sangha whom you know.

And as you choose this person and bring them into the moment with you, feel their presence as clearly as you can. It may help to see an image of them. Or you might like to say their name. And as you connect with them, remember if you can what you've liked about them. Any of their good qualities, pleasant interactions that you've had, ways you may have seen their kindness. So that you approach this person from a foundation of goodwill and appreciation.

And as you connect with them, now bring to mind the ways in which they're experiencing some present difficulties. It could be in the area of their health, their close relationships, partners, parents, with children. It could be in their life circumstances. Difficulties in housing or finances or livelihood. Could be conflicts with family or friends. And as you touch into the difficulties that your person is experiencing, tune in also to how it's affecting their heart, how the difficulties are landing for them emotionally.

And as you connect with them from a place of appreciation, of goodwill, know that you really want for them not to have to go through the suffering they're going through. You really wish for them relief from this suffering. This wish that they be relieved of their suffering is the essence of compassion.

So we express this wish to the person with a phrase something like this. Classically, the phrase is, "May you be free from your suffering." In the formal compassion practice, we usually just take one phrase instead of the four of metta. See if there's one phrase that expresses what you want for this person. It might be, "May you be free from your suffering." It could be, "I care about your suffering." It could be, "I'm with you in your suffering." Or something like, "May you hold your pain or sorrow with compassion."

Try out a few of these phrases and see the one that resonates for you. May you be free from your suffering. I care about your suffering. I'm with you in your suffering. May you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion.

And so staying connected with this person and repeating for them your compassion phrase. Every so often putting the attention in the heart center, making it embodied and feeling whatever you feel there. Notice any emotion that comes as you connect with your suffering person. If you like, you can refer directly to the kind of difficulty they're experiencing instead of using the word suffering or pain or sorrow. You could say something like, "May you be free from this illness. May you be free from your fear. May you hold your grieving with compassion." If there's a word that speaks more directly to what they're feeling, you can make that part of the phrase.

If you feel yourself becoming too weighed down by this person's difficulty, then you can let them go for a few moments, return to loving-kindness for yourself or a benefactor. And then when you feel a little refreshed, you can come back in again in relation with the suffering person and try again the phrase for compassion.

Now letting go of this person you've brought in and their difficulties. Come back into the moment in an open and spacious way. Notice any feeling that's there after this meditation. See if it has that quality of caring in response to the difficulty. See if that has any sense of the difficulty being too much for you to open to, tipping into some form of too much grief. Notice any other emotions that may have come with the meditation. Just making space for those.

Now we'll turn the practice of compassion toward ourselves.

So once again, connecting with yourself. This could be as you sit here and now—familiar body experience, familiar mood. Remember to look on yourself with friendly eyes, with appreciation, with goodwill.

As you connect with yourself, bring to mind any areas of your own life that are currently difficult. These might be in the inner world—emotions, balance. They could be connected with your health, welfare on the physical level. They could be in relationships with partners, family, parents, children, friends. They could be outward circumstances of safety, finance, home.

As you connect with the things that are difficult for you presently, take a moment to feel the impact of those things. They land as heart experiences. So become aware of the hurt, the hardship, the pain of these difficulties as they impact you, as you feel them.

In touch with that level of pain, begin to direct the phrase for compassion to yourself: "May I be free from my suffering," or "I care about my pain and sorrow," or "May I hold this pain with compassion." Just repeat the phrase for yourself, staying in touch with what's difficult for you.

Feel that you can kind of wrap your compassion around the experience of the difficulty, embracing it with comforting care, holding it gently. If it's helpful, use a word in the phrase that points directly to what you're feeling. It could be grief, worry, injury, fear, loss: "I hold this [grief, worry, fear] with compassion."

If it seems too much, take a break from the compassion, returning to metta for a bit. Perhaps bring in a benefactor or friend who you feel comfortable with, who you feel might even uplift you, reconnecting to them with metta.

Then, letting go of the focus on yourself, let the mind come back into balance and bring in either your benefactor or good friend. Connect with them, feeling the appreciation and goodwill you have for them. Then notice any areas that may be difficult in their life. If not too much suffering is apparent, just remember the small ups and downs that everyone experiences day by day—changing circumstances, pleasure and pain. Direct your thoughts of compassion to your benefactor or friend with this same phrase: "May you be free from your suffering. May you hold your pain and sorrow with compassion."

This can be a very useful form of brahmaviharas practice combined with the practice of loving-kindness. You may find as you're directing thoughts of metta to yourself or to one of your people, or especially when we get to all beings, that your metta is touching on areas of real difficulty in their life. Your recollections of them are touching on areas of real difficulty. As you're saying the metta phrases, what may be coming through for you is not so much safety, happiness, health, and well-being, but their opposites. You may feel the person's lack of happiness or lack of safety or lack of health. Then the flavor that comes through may be more of compassion than of pure well-wishing.

If that happens, it's very helpful to turn directly to the compassion phrase. Make a direct perception of their difficulty, of their suffering. Within the brahmaviharas, you respond to it directly: "Oh, may you be free from that difficulty. May you be free from that pain and sorrow."

This is very helpful to do for others. It's especially helpful when you find yourself in a position of suffering in meditation. Whether it's here on retreat or in daily life, suffering will come. To be able to recognize it, turn our attention to it with compassion, say this phrase for ourselves—this can really shift the relationship to it. Even taking it as a practice for fifteen or twenty minutes, you can start to feel a shift. Maybe there's physical pain, there may be a strong hindrance that's up. Try it if that arises for you over these days and see where the potential is for this compassion practice for you.

There are a couple of teachers who are part of our sangha who have made a full offering out of this approach. Based on the Buddhist practice of compassion, they've expanded a little bit into what they call mindful self-compassion. Both Kristin Neff and Chris Germer, who have been students here, have done a lot of work in this area and led workshops and trained people to lead this work.

I want to offer one form of it that you may find on Kristin Neff's website. They call it mindful self-compassion. Anytime you run into a difficulty in life or in meditation, you can do this compassion practice for yourself. I've posted a brief outline on the bulletin board, but I'll go through it here.

The first step, which is a little bit optional but is nice, is to put a hand on your heart or make some physical gesture of comfort for yourself so that you feel, even physically, that you're being held in the moment. Touch does release some chemical transmitters in the body that bring comfort.

Then you simply comment. The second step is you comment: "This is a moment of suffering," or in whatever form that feels right for you.

It might be, "This hurts." Or "This is painful." Or "This ache is painful. This longing is painful." Whatever words fit to acknowledge the difficulty, acknowledge the immediate impact—"This is a moment of suffering."

The third step is to reflect on the universality, which is in one form: "Suffering is an integral part of life." It's the First Noble Truth. Or you might say, "Everyone has this," or "I'm not alone with this." One of the classical techniques in working with pain is to imagine all the people in the world who have the same difficulty that you're having, but much, much worse. This connects you to the human ability to bear what is a common experience of difficulty or pain. So that's the third step: "Pain is an integral part of life," or "I'm not alone in this."

The fourth step is your compassion phrase. It might be, "May I hold this pain and sorrow with compassion." It might be, "I care about this suffering." It might be, "May I be free from this suffering." Whatever compassion phrase works well for you.

So play with this also. I find that sometimes going through the four steps of mindful self-compassion a few times draws out our whole relationship to the experience of difficulty. Then we can just go back to the one phrase of the classical compassion practice. So this can be kind of a warm-up to doing compassion for self.

Instructions for Today

Continue with the metta practice for self, benefactor, and friend. Bring in compassion as it seems appropriate, as it seems suitable to any of the individuals.

And then, as Sally was pointing to in the talk last night, if you're interested, spend some time doing metta for a neutral person and perhaps a difficult person. You might choose to do a neutral person today, just from time to time. Just occasionally bring in someone in this category. And tomorrow you might want to spend a little bit of time doing some loving-kindness for a difficult person. Not as a central practice, but maybe from time to time during the day.

Any questions this morning?

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 169

Morning Instructions: Practice of Muditā

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> Guy Armstrong offers morning instructions on muditā, the third of the four brahmavihāras (divine abodes). Building on the foundation of mettā (loving-kindness) and karuṇā (compassion), muditā is the heart's natural response to encountering joy and happiness—whether in ourselves or others. Armstrong explains how this practice of sympathetic joy serves as a powerful antidote to our mind's tendency to focus on difficulties while overlooking the happiness that is equally present in life.
>
> The talk provides practical guidance for cultivating muditā through specific phrases like "May your happiness and good fortune continue" and "I'm happy that you're happy." Armstrong addresses common misconceptions from ancient commentaries about practicing muditā for oneself, clarifying that the Buddha's instruction was "to all as to myself." He also discusses the near enemy of muditā (elation or over-exuberance) and its far enemy (envy), offering skillful ways to work with these hindrances.
> This teaching emphasizes muditā's role in creating balance in our perception, helping us recognize that all beings experience both suffering and happiness. As Armstrong notes, "apart from enlightenment, this is the happiest practice I know of in Buddhism," making it particularly valuable for uplifting the heart during difficult times.

Today is a lucky day for us because we start the practice of muditā. As I mentioned early on, the Brahmaviharas allow the heart to respond to all the different circumstances and conditions in life, our own and those of others. Mettā lays the general foundation as an attitude of caring and goodwill, a wish for all beings to be happy. When that open heart touches suffering, it naturally evokes compassion, described as the trembling of the heart in response to suffering. But when that open heart encounters joy or happiness in ourselves or another, it responds with this quality that is muditā—sometimes translated as sympathetic joy, sometimes altruistic joy, sometimes simply joy. This is a wonderful companion to have with us on the journey.

Today we get to enjoy the joy of others. We get to enjoy the joy of ourselves. It's interesting that yesterday was compassion day and it was gray and rainy. Today is muditā day and nature is cooperating—it's bright and partly sunny. We let that sunshine come in and resonate with us this morning.

In the practice of muditā, we are encouraged to look at the things that are going really well in our life and in the lives of others that we bring to mind. In doing so, we're reminded that happiness is as much an integral part of life as suffering is, as difficulty is. We start to understand that all beings have a mix of difficulty and enjoyment in life.

It's often said that positive things in our life slide away from us like Teflon, while the difficult things stick in our mind like Velcro. There's some truth to this. Out of a wish for protection, we tend to focus our perception on the difficulties, the threats, the challenges, the things that might go wrong. But in doing that, our thought mechanism becomes biased. It inclines to see the problems.

The practice of muditā helps put the needle back in the center. The Buddha came from the center. He wasn't inclined to see the world predominantly one way or the other. He talked about suffering. He talked about the end of suffering. Both are possibilities. In our lives, in our perceptions, we should have our minds in the middle where we're open to seeing suffering and we also see the happiness, the joy, the possibility of ending suffering in our experience and in the experience of those around us.

This practice of muditā is wonderful because it connects us to this thread of joy that runs through all the lives of sentient beings. When we start to look, we can find happiness in all sentient beings' experiences. I remember one of my early teachers went into a hospital where a student was in a hospital bed inside a breathing machine, without even real contact with fresh air. He asked her how she was doing and she said, "I'm fine. I love it when the sunlight comes in through the window and falls on my face."

Even in the midst of what looked like really difficult circumstances, there are moments where the pain lifts or where joy comes in. We can tune into those experiences for any being that we turn our attention to. When we open to that, we find that muditā has a beautifully uplifting quality for our hearts.

As compassion is a really useful practice when pain is present, muditā is a really helpful practice when you want to pick your mood up a little bit. When you're going along and things seem down or a little flat, and you feel it would be helpful to have a little uplift of energy, a little positive outlook on things, the practice of muditā is our way into that. Apart from enlightenment, this is the happiest practice I know of in Buddhism. I hope you'll enjoy this foray today.

There are a few different phrases you can use for sympathetic joy. They're in your study guide if you want to review them. I'll suggest some during the meditation. The phrase that I've used for many years is: "May your happiness and good fortune continue. May they increase. May they never end." I like this because it points to the happiness, but it also points to the possibility of its growing. As practitioners, we know that's possible.

Another phrase is: "I appreciate your happiness and good fortune." We just tune in to what's going well for the person, and we notice, "I appreciate that. It's great that that's happening for you." Another way to say this is: "I appreciate the blessings in your life."

The simplest one is: "I'm happy that you're happy." It's a nice sentiment to have, and we can feel that a lot. When we're with somebody who is in a happy place, it's contagious. We resonate.

That's why it's called sympathetic. We resonate with each other's happiness.

Now, if you read some of the ancient commentaries, they'll say things like, "Oh, but you can do mudita for other people, but you can't do it for yourself. That would be too selfish." So some of the ancient commentaries say, "Oh, don't do mudita for yourself." That's incorrect understanding. The Buddha never said that. When he talked about practicing mudita, he said, "to all as to myself." So mudita is for all beings.

When we get to ourselves, you might want to find a phrase that resonates. It could be something like, "I appreciate the blessings in my life." That's kind of unimpeachable. Sometimes, depending on our current situation, if we say, "May my happiness and good fortune continue," that might sound like we're cultivating greed. So if it rubs you the wrong way, "I appreciate the blessings of my life" is fine. But see what works for you. I'll repeat these phrases again as we start the meditation.

We always start the brahmaviharas where it's easy. In mudita practice, the easy person is someone you know who's happy or going through a particular space of happiness in their life—someone whose good fortune is really apparent when you bring them in. So you can start to think about that now, and we'll settle into the meditation.

Beginning again, just bring your attention into the present moment. Coming into your experience of the body with its alertness and relaxation. Bringing your attention into the heart center, the center of the chest, the seat of a lot of our emotional life.

As you connect with your heart center, just feeling the broadness of awareness. It includes everyone in the room. It expands to outside and nature. All those beings. It doesn't have a clear ending. So we feel that all sentient beings can be included in our awareness.

We remember the foundation of our brahmavihara practice as wishing that all beings be well and free from suffering. Expressing that with just the reminder: May all beings be well, happy, and peaceful.

Now bringing in someone who for you represents a happy person—someone in your circle of acquaintances whom you know well enough to know that things are going well in their life. As you bring them in, you might see them with a smile on their face. Remember a time that you've been together. As you connect with them, remember all the things you like about them. That foundation of goodwill and appreciation.

As you connect with your happy person, bring to mind all the things in their life that are going well or that they enjoy. Could be big things—home, relationship, family, livelihood. Could be small things. Hummingbirds are coming back and they like to put out food. They're going to see a play they've wanted to see. They bought a dress they really like. All the things that make this person happy.

As you connect with all the sources of happiness in this person's life, beginning to express your connection to them with a phrase of mudita. "May your happiness and good fortune continue. May they increase. May they never end." Or, "I appreciate your happiness and good fortune." Or, "I appreciate the blessings in your life." Or, "I'm happy that you're happy."

You can play with these phrases, find your own. Again in this practice we just use one phrase, though there may be multiple clauses. So repeating to your happy person the phrase that expresses your gladness at their happiness.

From time to time coming back with your attention into the heart center. Feeling in the body the effect of the meditation.

And noticing whatever emotion is there in response to the mudita wish. Again, we don't try to force any particular feeling in relation to the happy person. We're simply inclined toward seeing the happiness in their life. Repeat the phrase, staying open to whatever emotion might arise from that.

Now let go of the connection to the happy person and bring in the connection to yourself. Feel your body and mood in sitting here. Bring up an image of yourself somewhere you've been content, happy, enjoying things. As you connect with yourself, bring to mind all the things that are going well in your life now—all the different sources of happiness that are in your life. Big things, little things, silly things you might not even tell anybody else, like you enjoyed lunch yesterday.

All of us here have so much to be thankful for, including our refuge in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Warm, dry, and fed. Express this appreciation for the happiness in your life by directing the mudita phrase to yourself: "May my happiness and good fortune continue. May they increase. May they never end." Or "I appreciate the blessings in my life," or "I appreciate my happiness and good fortune." Continue to connect with the sources of happiness and send the mudita phrase to yourself.

Now let go of the focus on yourself and bring to mind either your benefactor or good friend—whichever you feel inclined to, the person you've been using for these few days. Feel their presence with you. You might see an image of them, you might say their name. Remember what you like about them. Hold them with friendly eyes. Then bring to mind all the things you know of that are going well in their life currently—all their sources of happiness, big ones and little ones. As they come to mind, repeat your phrase of mudita for this person, your friend or benefactor: "May your happiness and good fortune continue," or "I'm happy that you're happy."

As you go through the day today, make your practice primarily rooted in the practice of metta and loving-kindness for self, benefactor, and friend as we've been doing. This will lay the stable foundation for the opening of the heart. But throughout the day, as you come upon instances of joy in yourself or in these other people, you might turn to the mudita reflection for a short period of time and see how that feels. It's a good practice to make friends with. It's really a wonderful ally on the journey of bringing about the uplifting of the heart.

Tomorrow we will move into loving-kindness for all beings. So we'll begin to move in a spacious direction beginning tomorrow.

It might be worth saying just a little bit about the near and far enemies with mudita. The near enemy—and this is in the study guide—is elation, something like elation or over-exuberance. What I think of it as is when you start to feel joy and there's an element of grasping that comes in, and you start to spin out with thoughts about it. "Oh, now that I'm this happy, I'll be able to do this in my life," things like that. So I think of elation as getting a little attached and whipping up the positive feelings through thinking about them.

The far enemy is envy. This especially comes up with friends. We bring in a friend, we're looking at what's going well in their life, and we think, "Hmm, might be going a little too well for them. Why is my life not going quite that well? If they have that much happiness, they must be stealing some of mine." Whatever. The comparing mind comes in. Conceit can come in.

But we just notice that. Let the envy or elation be. Try to come back into balance. If the envy feels quite strong, we might go back to someone we don't have that kind of comparing mind toward. Return to metta or return to mudita for someone else. So just be on the lookout for those particular hindrances with the mudita practice.

And again, if you have a moment during the day to do a little metta practice for a neutral person and a difficult person, then that kind of paves the way conceptually for all beings.

Once you've found that you can extend loving-kindness to neutral and difficult people, then you understand it's possible to extend it to all beings. That's the logic in the progression. But you don't need to spend a lot of time with those two categories initially.

When choosing a difficult person for practice, I'd recommend picking someone where there's some irritation or mild conflict, rather than the most difficult person in your life. Start with manageable challenges and gradually work your way deeper as your practice stabilizes.

The beauty of mudita practice is that it opens our hearts to genuine celebration of others' happiness and success. When we can truly rejoice in another's joy without the interference of comparison or envy, we discover a wellspring of happiness that doesn't depend on our own circumstances. This sympathetic joy becomes a gift we can offer freely, enriching both our own lives and our relationships with others.

As you continue developing these heart practices, remember that they work together synergistically. Metta provides the foundation of unconditional friendliness, while mudita adds the sparkle of shared celebration. Together, they help us move through the world with greater openness, warmth, and genuine connection to the happiness that surrounds us.

May your practice of mudita bring you great joy, and may you find countless opportunities to celebrate the good fortune and happiness of all beings.

CHAPTER 170

An Appropriate Response: The Brahmaviharas as a Roadmap of the Heart

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the brahmaviharas (divine abodes) as a comprehensive roadmap for how the awakened heart responds to life's ever-changing conditions. Drawing on the teachings from the Metta Sutta and various stories including King Asoka's transformation, Armstrong explores how metta (loving kindness) naturally develops into karuna (compassion) when it meets suffering, mudita (appreciative joy) when it encounters happiness, and upekkha (equanimity) as the balanced foundation that holds all experiences. He discusses the near and far enemies of each brahmavihara, showing how these twelve possible responses map our relationship to the world. The talk includes practical guidance on working with the neutral person in metta practice, using compassion phrases during difficult emotions, cultivating gratitude as a form of mudita, and developing bodhicitta - the awakening heart that wishes for liberation for all beings. Armstrong emphasizes that these are elevated states representing the awakened response to circumstances, not our ordinary self-centered reactions, offering practitioners a clear framework for training the heart toward appropriate response in any situation.

The subject of the talk tonight is the Brahmaviharas.

A Zen master was asked one time, "What's the value of a lifetime of practice?" I was really curious what the Zen master was going to say because I expected something like: "Well, after a lifetime of practice, just before you die, you sit up in perfect zazen posture and you utter a spontaneous poem expressing your deepest realization, and then you go." He didn't say anything quite that idealistic. The Zen master said the value of a lifetime of practice is an appropriate response.

I thought this was beautiful because it points to the fact that after we've practiced, the way it shows up is how we respond in the moment over and over and over. The fruit of our practice is responding appropriately in each new moment. That's enough. As practitioners we recognize that anything can happen at any time.

One day a friend of ours had visited the Ramana Ashram in southern India and afterwards went for a vacation on a beach nearby. It happened to be December 26, 2004. If you remember, that was a catastrophic date in that part of the world. He was standing on the beach in front of his cottage, a beachfront cottage, practicing qigong. A big wave came up and knocked him over. But then it went back out and he was able to stand up. As he stood up, he saw this wave receding in a really unusual way. It was leaving a huge depression as it went back out—very abnormal wave formation. He said, "This doesn't look so good." So he hopped up onto a concrete wall and grabbed hold of a palm tree and then the second wave came in. That was the really devastating one that hit Thailand and India and Burma. But because he had grabbed hold of the palm tree and stood on the concrete wall, he was high enough and had enough of a grip that it washed in, washed out, and he was okay. This is one time when the practice of non-clinging was not advised. Clinging was very helpful to him.

Of course, lots of people didn't have a palm tree to cling to, and there were many lives lost in that tsunami. But you just never know. Fortunately, he had the mindfulness to look at what was happening and listen to his instincts. "Uh-oh." And he found a safe place, found a safe haven.

Life is going to keep presenting us with these situations, sometimes mild, sometimes intense. I was just talking with a friend today who had a very intense situation arise in her life and a friendship, someone she's very connected to, completely out of the blue, completely unexpected, and obviously somewhat shaken by it. But as these episodes of life affect us, it's easy to become despairing, hopeless, feel defeated, or think "what's the point?" But if we move in that direction, that doesn't help the world. It doesn't help others and it doesn't help ourselves.

The Brahmaviharas show us that there's another way of responding to any situation on the scale from painful to very pleasurable. There's an awakened response that's possible. As we cultivate the Brahmaviharas, they become our allies in training the heart to an appropriate response in whatever situation comes up.

As we've said, loving kindness is the foundation, this basic sense of goodwill and care. When that tender heart meets the truth of suffering, the response naturally is compassion. When it meets a situation of happiness, the response is sympathetic joy or mudita. If no particular stimulus is coming in, the open heart can rest in equanimity, where it's balanced among the joys and sorrows that life can present.

I mentioned the other morning this question about: If we are trained to accept the moment as it is in our meditation practice, how can we have a wish for the suffering of the world to go away? It's through this quality of equanimity that we combine those two. When the Buddha looked out on the world, he saw a vast range of suffering. He also knew he had the key to unlock it for people, but it depended on their effort. So through his compassion, he wished to alleviate their pain. Through his equanimity, he understood they needed to do the work, and he couldn't do it for them. This is how we balance—the compassion and the loving kindness and the sympathetic joy are all held in this deep rest that equanimity brings to us.

We begin with loving kindness and on the easy end of the spectrum: self, benefactor, and friend as we've been practicing for these last few days. Sally talked a little this morning about the neutral person, bringing that person in for loving kindness. A neutral person is really a turning point in our practice of loving kindness because we find as we start to wish them well that we can care a lot about somebody that we don't really know.

I was teaching a daylong on metta once at a gathering in Marin County. A guy had come down from Sonoma and took the day and received instructions for all these categories including the neutral person. He went home and took as his neutral person a cashier in a supermarket near him. I saw him about a year later and he told me the story. He said, "I practiced metta for my neutral person every time I went into that supermarket. I got so fond of that person, I started to get nervous when I was checking out."

And he never really knew that person well, and yet he had this big reservoir of care about her and connection to her.

So the neutral person opens us up to the possibility that we can care for the seven billion people on the planet whom we haven't yet met and therefore have no reason to dislike. That's kind of a nice situation, right? So it's said that metta becomes, as it extends to all beings, like a gentle rain that falls everywhere without exception. That's what gives it this universal or boundless quality.

The Buddha made a reflection about this that I find really interesting—sort of why we might choose to care about the people that we run into. He said, given all the many lives that we have all spent in this realm of samsara, it's not easy to find a being who at some point has not been your mother, your father, your brother, your sister, your son, or your daughter.

Now you may or may not hold this view of rebirth that the Buddha taught often and referred to many times in his discourses. But what if it was true? What if we all have been, especially those of us in this room who seem to be connected in a way that a lot of people in the world may not be—what if we have been that close to one another in the past? Could be many times in the past. It would make us feel differently about each other, wouldn't it? We would start to care more. Of course, that might depend on how you feel about your family of origin, so I don't know. But it makes us closer than we would have thought we were, and it really can open up our metta practice to all of life, all human beings.

So just as we've been reading in the Metta Sutta, "Just as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings." This is our instruction. And as Sally said, it doesn't mean we have to like people, but we can care about them. We can wish them happiness. We can wish them well. And as we meditate with these reflections of loving-kindness, we understand every being that lives wants the same things we want. Every being wants safety, happiness, health, and ease. So in that, we're all alike.

So as we open up to the welfare of beings in the world, we also discover there's a lot of suffering around us, some suffering inside us. How do we relate to that? Sometimes not easy.

Classically, it's said that the hardest of the Brahmaviharas to practice is mudita, because the factor of envy comes up so easily and so readily. It's hard for us to be joyful about someone else's happiness because the envy is so nearby.

But that's not what I found. In one six-week period of retreat, I spent ten days doing intensive practice of each of the four Brahmaviharas. It was a wonderful experience to really get into the depth of each one. And each of them can be practiced for concentration as well as for the heart quality that it brings.

So for me the hardest to practice was not mudita. Mudita was actually the most joyful. I just found it really uplifting to be with happiness all day. The hardest for me was practicing compassion because it was about staying with suffering all day long—eighteen hours a day in me and all the other people that I brought to mind.

I find it difficult—I think most of us find it difficult—to be right up against suffering. So we've found ways to avoid doing that. We have lots of different defenses to keep from having that experience. Carl Jung, the psychologist, said that neurosis is basically a refusal to confront suffering. Well, that's a strong statement. Because we don't want to face suffering directly, we find these suspect ways to avoid it that are our neuroses.

So take a look at the relationship of the world to suffering. We avoid it, we turn away, we deny it. Often we try to fix it. If we find a friend is suffering, we really go quickly—at least, I think it's a male pattern—we go quickly to fixing. I think women are a little better at just being with a friend in suffering. We might tend to blame it on someone else. If it's our suffering, they made me suffer. It was my mother, it was the society, or it was capitalism. We judge it as wrong. This suffering shouldn't be happening.

We judge ourselves as wrong. If I was an okay person, this suffering wouldn't be happening. Or we turn to something pleasurable. The Buddha pointed to this really directly in one sutta. He said, for the ordinary untrained person, the only escape from painful sensation is to turn to a source of pleasure.

So this is the beginning of addiction. We look at all the pleasurable outlets that the world offers, and there are many, and we become addicted as a way of avoiding the pain. Or if it's suffering with other people, we tell ourselves stories about it. We rationalize it. It's not my problem. It's their karma. It's those kinds of people.

But suffering is the proximate cause for compassion to arise. If we want this quality of compassion to develop, we need to touch the suffering in ourselves and in others really directly. So in our meditation, can we touch it, be close to it, and just feel it without having to make it go away or fix it or avoid it? Can we just feel the suffering in ourselves and in another?

If we open to that, then we find the compassion can come through. And the more we can expand the compassion for our own suffering, the more we'll be able to be with the suffering of the world. The less we're able to be with our own, the less we can be with others. It's really the same dynamic.

So it's wonderful to be in a sangha because you see these amazing examples of compassion. I was teaching a retreat, a month-long retreat one year at Spirit Rock. And there was a meditator who worked in the kitchen who had an illness that had attacked his kidneys. Both his kidneys were failing. So if he went back from the retreat, he was going to need to be on dialysis perhaps for a long, perhaps for the rest of his life, because waiting for a kidney transplant can be a long process. It depends on the need, the availability, and lots of different factors.

One of the other meditators happened to overhear a conversation in the kitchen about this. This other meditator had no relationship to the yogi who was ill, and she formed the intent during that retreat to offer the meditator a kidney if they were a match. And she held to it. Going through the retreat, obviously she probably went through a lot of ups and downs and questions, but she came out of the retreat, she held to it, she approached the person, offered the kidney. The person accepted the offer, they went into testing, it took some time, but ended up that she donated a kidney to this other yogi whom she had never met before. It's a beautiful act of compassion and wanting to help someone else in a situation of suffering.

Suffering can really affect us, can change us. There's a quite interesting story, a moving story about King Ashoka. He lived in the third century BCE in India, and he was probably the first emperor of India to unify almost all of that subcontinent. How does a king unify a subcontinent? It's not by loving-kindness. He doesn't just say, come on, give up your own ruler and come under my government. It's by wars. He battled fiercely many other rulers on that subcontinent, battle after battle, war after war. In one of the last ones, it's said that 100,000 people died in the war with this one ruler.

It culminated in one particular battle. Afterwards, the king was surveying the battlefield and the carnage that was just laid out in front of him—thousands and thousands of corpses from both sides, dead on the battlefield. And as he watched, he saw a Buddhist monk walking across the battlefield in a state of great serenity and peace and calm. And he was looking at the ruins and thinking, what have I done? Is this worth it? I'm responsible for all these people dying. And he watched the Buddhist monk walking across in a state of complete calm and peace. And he thought, this person has nothing. I have all the wealth of what he knew as his world. I could do anything. He's at peace and I'm tormented.

What is his secret?

At this time, Buddhism was not anything like a hugely widespread religion in India. But Ashoka became so interested that he pursued the teachings and changed his rule completely. He followed the Buddha's teachings. He gave up war. He assured all the rulers around him that he'd given up his aims of expansion and conquering more territory. He encouraged everyone in his kingdom to respect all religions, not to fight over religion any longer. He distributed food widely so that poverty essentially became a non-issue in the kingdom. He outlawed animal sacrifices, having compassion for all creatures. And then he put up edicts throughout the country proclaiming Dharma principles—the principles he wanted people to abide by.

So it was a huge transformation that came out of a moment of compassion—an hour or a day of seeing the effects of war, the devastation of war. And he changed the history of India from that point forward.

Here we have a formal practice to develop compassion that can transform our relationship to suffering. I remember some time ago I was at home when a student I'd been working with for a couple of years called me in a great state of fear. The student said, "I'm going through this intense fear and I've tried working with vipassana and it's just not letting up. I'm really in the grip of it and it's really painful."

I could hear the panic in her voice because it was an overwhelmed situation. I said, "Okay, you've already tried vipassana, let's try something different." So I gave her the instruction for the compassion phrase, which she hadn't worked with before. I said, "Just hold yourself, feel the fear and repeat this to yourself over and over—at least twenty minutes, at least thirty minutes, longer if you can. And then let me know what happens."

About an hour later, she called back and said, "That completely changed. The compassion phrase just let me be with the experience. And then the panic went out because I knew I could be with the experience. As the panic went out, the fear went way down and became really manageable."

So compassion has this kind of ability. I remember in my own experience when I started working with the compassion practice and applying it during retreat when I was in some state of pain and suffering. I can't remember what it was, but I felt this different voice coming alive inside me. It was like I was channeling Kuan Yin. The pain was still there, but this other voice was coming in that was very mature, adult, balanced, confident. And with that, I knew I could be with whatever experience was going on. It completely changed it for me.

Essentially what compassion does as we grow it is let us hold the experience in a bigger frame—what I would say is a bigger heart. It's a little bit like the title of Sharon Salzberg's book, A Heart as Wide as the World. We find we can accommodate the pain of the world as we grow that heart. We can still be overwhelmed, but we can come back to that as a baseline, as a foundation.

Because compassion is in touch with suffering, it's not an exuberant state. You feel the suffering that you're in touch with. One of my teachers said that it's like the mood at sunset. There's a beauty and there's also this kind of wistful poignancy that's there—a touch of sadness because of the suffering that's present. But there's also a sublime feeling that's a kind of beauty as the compassion is pure.

Now we've talked about the fact that compassion can easily tip over into a near enemy. One of them is overwhelming grief. We feel the suffering is too much to bear, whether it's ours or another's, and we feel too burdened down. We can't find the strength, we can't find the equanimity to hold it with balance. That's one possibility, that's a near enemy. In a situation like that, it's maybe more helpful to turn to some subject that will bring uplift—turn to someone like a benefactor or friend, a child or a pet, or turn to mudita, focus on the wholesome, the positive, and let the heart be picked up from this place of overwhelm.

The other near enemy is an element of pity—not piti, but the old English pity—where we feel sorry for the person, but it involves a looking down on them. It's, "Oh, too bad about your suffering, but I'm not feeling that."

So I'm in an okay place, so it doesn't really touch me. What's going on with pity is that we're kind of looking down on someone from above, and there's an element of conceit in that. We're in a superior position because we're not suffering currently. But of course, if we reflect, it could be the other way around at any time.

Compassion shows us that we're really all in the same boat in terms of our vulnerability. We may be temporarily away from suffering, but things could change and we could be feeling that. It's something that connects us to everyone. It's universal.

This is from a poem called "Kindness" by Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian American poet: "Before you know what kindness really is, you must lose things. Feel the future dissolve in a moment, like salt in a weakened broth. Before you know the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you, how he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans, and the simple breath that kept him alive. Before you know kindness is the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing."

So compassion opens us up to this universality of sorrow, our own vulnerability to suffering, and connects us to all things that live.

The far enemy of compassion is cruelty, which is enjoying someone else's suffering. We talked about this a little bit the other night. Most of us don't think of ourselves as cruel people. But if you look closely at anger, you might find within it an element of ill will—which is wanting someone else to hurt, to suffer. And that's just a step away from cruelty. So it may not be that far away for us.

Sometimes we're in the midst of very complicated situations where there could be blame on many sides—a family situation, a situation at work with lots of colleagues—and you can see everybody's piece of contributing to it. You may not be able to see a clear way to resolve the situation, but one thing you can always take as a refuge is compassion for everyone involved, without needing to judge right and wrong. Just to see the shared suffering in the situation.

Compassion also lends itself to seeing the potential for suffering for all beings and therefore the wish for all beings to be free from suffering. So both loving kindness and compassion can grow into this feeling for all beings everywhere—that's when they become boundless.

And then there's something else interesting that happens when metta and compassion grow up to become boundless. I want to pose this to you as practitioners: If you feel metta for all beings, you want all beings to be happy. What's the most complete way for all beings to be happy? It's for them to awaken, isn't it? The most complete form of happiness is their own awakening, their own liberation. So that wish starts to come in.

And as compassion grows up, you really want all beings to be free from suffering. What's the most complete way for a being to be free from suffering? It's also to awaken, isn't it?

So when metta and compassion grow up in this really boundless way as a Dharma practitioner, you want all beings to find happiness and to be free from suffering through awakening. What's the best way for you to help toward this goal? It's to awaken yourself, isn't it? Can you help bring beings out of suffering altogether if you haven't awakened yourself? Not so likely. But once we have awakened, then we have the possibility of bringing others out of suffering completely.

So this can become a real wish for us: "May I awaken myself in order to help bring others out of their suffering and into real happiness." This wish is called bodhicitta, sometimes translated as the awakening heart. And this wish can be fed back as a motivation in our practice. We can form the wish to practice, the wish to become awakened as the way that we can help others to achieve real happiness and a true end of suffering.

So this is the source—the quality of bodhicitta really grows out of the maturing of boundless metta and boundless compassion. This is expressed in a really nice way in one of the quotes in the study guide. It's short—you don't need to look it up now. A quote on the back page, number 80. "Crossing" is a word used in the Buddha's teachings for crossing the flood of the kilesas, the taints, whatever.

It means crossing over to the other shore, becoming awakened. "Crossed, I would cross others. Freed, I would free others. Tamed, I would tame. Calmed, I would calm. Comforted, I would comfort. Attained to nibbana, I would lead to nibbana."

This is the expression of that quality of bodhicitta—what I deeply wish for myself and the world: to come to awakening and help bring others to awakening. This was written by a fifth-century teacher from Sri Lanka named Dhammapala.

If you resonate with this sense of bodhicitta, you might like to bring it in at the start of sittings. I do this when I sit both in daily life and on retreat. I just say a few lines to myself: "By the merit of generosity and other virtuous actions, may I come to awakening for the benefit of all sentient beings." It renews my motivation at the beginning of each sitting period.

This is the quality of bodhicitta. The Dalai Lama is a great advocate of this practice—one we have to remind ourselves of because it's very easy for it to get lost in the wake of our self-centeredness. Even the Dalai Lama, who's one of the great practitioners of our day, says, "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration. Deep inside me, I realize how valuable and beneficial it is. That is all."

We don't have to imagine that we're going to become great bodhisattvas or saviors of the world. But we can plant this motivation and it can inspire us. It can help broaden our vision and keep connecting us to all of life.

As we're connecting to the world, we also notice how much joy there is. This leads us into the practice of mudita—the response of the heart to happiness, taking joy in another's happiness. I remember once calling a friend on the other side of the country. I needed to talk about some business, and I started by asking, "How are you doing?" She said enthusiastically, "I'm wonderful!" Her answer just picked me up. I said, "I'm wonderful too." That was the contagious nature of happiness—such a delight to hear from her.

Mudita gives us a double dose of happiness. It doesn't have to come from big things. Think about your lives as yogis here on this retreat. There are so many moments in the day that have little bits of happiness with them: getting out of bed when it's a little cool in your room, but you get to have a hot shower; after a day of rain, walking outside to find the sky is blue; catching sight of a deer in a meadow or off the road as you're walking; a cardinal flying by on the driveway; when the sky is clear, watching the moon rise a little later at night; or one of my favorite times of the day—lying down to go to bed. Such relief after practicing and working hard all day. It feels so good for the head to hit the pillow. Unfortunately for me, that never lasts very long because I go to sleep, wake up, and start practicing again. But it's a few nice moments.

We are so fortunate here to have the beautiful nature surrounding us. Nature is so sustaining and uplifting. One of the hardest retreats I ever did was as a fairly new monk in Thailand. I practiced in a forest monastery up north, outside of Chiang Mai, where the teacher didn't speak English and there were no other English-speaking monks I could talk to. I went for three months in real silence, apart from the chants around meal time. I didn't hear any dharma talks—we didn't have MP3 players back then—and I didn't have any interviews with the teacher.

I was just practicing completely on my own for three months in a new country, new culture. And it was difficult. It was very difficult at times. But what sustained me was the beauty of nature. The monastery was out in the forest. There was a creek that ran through the center of it. My little cottage was right next to the creek, so I could see that and hear the running water. The sun would come up most days. It was very beautiful. Trees all around. So I felt the beauty of nature really sustained me through that time because there wasn't a lot else. The nature was always there.

And practicing in Asia, there are always these opportunities for joy. Practicing in cultures where the Dharma has been embedded for so long. I went to Burma to be ordained for a second time some years ago. A student knew that I was going and wanted to offer some support, so she gave me some money to take to offer to the monastery. She said, "Take this gift and offer it. Use it in the way that it would seem most beneficial." It was a few hundred dollars, which in Asia can go quite a way.

So I got to the monastery, way out in the country in southeast Burma, far from the capital. At that time, there were 750 people practicing in the monastery—something like 450 monks, 150 nuns, and the rest were laypeople. I thought, "Maybe I could take this money and on behalf of the student, sponsor a lunch for everybody in the monastery. Offer a dana on her behalf to everyone who was practicing there."

I was still a layperson—I hadn't yet ordained—so I could still handle cash. I went to the clerk of the monastery and said, "I have this gift from a friend overseas. Could I sponsor a lunch for everyone?" Burma is a poor country, and what wealth they have has been siphoned off by the leaders. I thought there would be a real welcoming of this gift.

The clerk told me, "Oh, all the lunches for the next three months have already been offered." And I thought that was so beautiful. In one of the poorer countries on the face of the earth, people had already come along to offer meals to feed all 750 people who were sitting. This kind of practice is what gives rise to our meal dana, which we see the notices of every day at lunch.

So we arranged to provide two special breakfasts—really tasty, extra food for everyone. On the day of the meal, you'd go down and the name of the person or family or village who donated the funds for that meal would be put up on a big whiteboard, both in Burmese, which I couldn't read, and in English. You'd walk in and see whose generosity had made possible the meal for that day. So for the breakfast, her name was up there.

But for the lunch, the people who had offered the meal would usually come to the monastery. They would watch the monks go through the line and fill their bowls from the funds that they had donated. They would be sitting off to the side, typically villagers from nearby. Usually it might take a whole family or several families to make the money to offer lunch to everyone who was there. They would be sitting off to the side, watching people go through the meal line, dressed in their best clothes. This was a very special day for them, a very special outing.

You could just see the happiness in their faces. The first monk to go through was Paok Sayadaw—he had something like fifty-some years as a monk. He was the most senior monk, a teacher, so he went through first. And they were just beaming with being able to offer to Paok Sayadaw, all the other accomplished practitioners, the monks, the nuns, and then the laypeople.

So it was a very joyful thing for them to be able to do that, to offer that. So this is sometimes translated as sympathetic joy because our hearts would really resonate with theirs. We'd pick up on their joy and it was just delightful.

And sometimes it's translated as appreciative joy. This is from Ajahn Sumedho, the American monk who was a student of Ajahn Chah. Sometimes in Theravada Buddhism, one gets the impression that you shouldn't enjoy beauty. If you see a beautiful flower, you should contemplate its decay. Or if you see a beautiful woman, you should contemplate her as a rotting corpse. That's a good reflection on anicca, dukkha, and anatta, but it can leave the impression that beauty is only to be reflected on in terms of these three characteristics, rather than in terms of the experience of beauty. This is the joy of mudita, being able to appreciate the beauty in the things around us. So we encourage this joy with beauty, this appreciation of what is around us.

As we direct the meditation on appreciative joy to self, it often comes through as gratitude. And gratitude is a really beautiful state of mind because it undercuts both greed and aversion. When there's gratitude, we appreciate what we have so we don't crave for more. And when we feel gratitude, we appreciate what we have so we don't dislike our situation. We don't give in to discontent. We're happy where we are.

We have a friend who has kids and grandkids who's also a wise practitioner and teacher and takes the opportunity to teach when possible. She was talking to one of her granddaughters on Christmas Day, talking on the phone because they were a long way away. And the granddaughter had just gone through the list of presents she'd gotten for Christmas, which of course made her very happy.

So our friend said, "When you get lots of presents, do you feel thankful for what you have? Or does it make you want more?" And the little girl, who was about eight at this time, said, "Oh Nana, I want more." And so our friend said, "Oh, that's too bad." And the little girl was listening and said, "What do you mean?" And our friend said, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, you feel good? And when you're wanting more, it doesn't feel as good?" And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, you're right." That was a teaching on gratitude.

At one retreat, I went into the retreat at the start of November. It was here. And you probably know the start of November in New England is not a particularly uplifting time for weather. So it was rainy, it was gray, it was already cold, it was windy. And as I was getting into the retreat, the weather was kind of weighing on me. I thought, oh gosh, am I going to get really gloomy with this weather? So I decided to do some gratitude reflection and I wrote down on a piece of paper all the things in my life that I was grateful for. Just wrote down as many as I could think, the big things and the little things. It ended up filling a whole page.

And then every morning in the retreat, I would read through that list and remember how lucky I was. To be practicing was one thing I was grateful for, but there were lots of others. So it really served to dispel this sense of gloominess or sadness about my situation.

Sally and I, some years ago, were teaching a group of senior students, and we were talking about gratitude. And one member in the group said to another, "Hey, let's email each other every night before we go to bed one thing we were grateful for that day." And so two of them started doing it, and then other people in our group started doing it. And as far as I know, that's where the daily email gratitude practice came from, was that group of senior students. It's a good practice if you have a dharma buddy to do it with.

So it's very helpful to have things in your mind, things in your life that you can call to mind to bring up this sense of uplift. Later in that retreat, when I'd ordained and I was sitting in Burma with Paok Sayadaw, I hit some difficult patches. So I was in robes. I hadn't been in robes for years. The practice was very narrow because it was just keeping the attention at the upper lip, basically eighteen hours a day, no other focus. The schedule was demanding. The shortest sit was an hour and a half. Longest sit was two hours. And I happened to join and get ordained right at the start of the rains retreat. And I should have known the rains retreat was so called for a reason. It started raining and I didn't see the sun for about three weeks.

I read the rainfall figures later—it was raining about three inches a day. It was a real tropical experience for those three weeks. I was eating one meal a day, and as I looked back at the end of the retreat, I had lost close to half a pound a day on that diet of one meal, which had very little protein.

I remember it all came together one lunchtime as I was walking back to my kuti, my little hut. It was raining, of course. I had a bowl, which was hot, with the hot food. I had a little bit of dessert in the bowl lid, which was upturned on top. I was cradling it in my left arm, holding an umbrella in my right, and my robes, which I had not quite learned to tie well again, were sliding off my left shoulder.

As I was walking along in this precarious situation in the rain, a group of Burmese laypeople on the muddy path, running with water, moved off to the side, knelt down, and bowed to me. I was just hoping I wouldn't come completely unclothed in front of them. I managed to get back to my kuti and enjoy my lunch, put my umbrella away, and get dry. But it marked a low point in my whole journey.

I was feeling at the end of my rope, very challenged and down in spirits. All these things were coming together, and I really didn't know what to do because I didn't have a good friend there. I didn't know who to talk to about this. Sayadaw was not exactly on the emotional end of the spectrum.

I had brought along a photograph of the Dalai Lama with a very inspirational quote from Shantideva—a bodhisattva kind of quote. So I turned to the Dalai Lama in a great mood of sincere supplication and humility. I said, "Your Holiness, do you have any advice for me?"

Immediately there was this very clear response in his voice, his Indian-accented English voice: "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Then the transmission ended. That was it.

Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support. I thought that was brilliant advice. Because if I could remember what cheerful felt like, I could sort of put myself there, and it really helped. When would we not want to be cheerful, optimistic, and confident? This is one of the things that mudita opens up to us—an ally to bring in cheer and confidence. That's a teaching I've relied on many, many times. Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. Remember what that feels like.

The Dalai Lama himself manifests this in a beautiful way. He has probably seen as much suffering as anyone I can think of, because he kept hearing reports of genocide after he fled Tibet in 1959. Something like a million people were killed in the decade following, and most of the monasteries and nunneries were wiped out. And yet he has this huge pool of happiness.

A few years ago there was a gathering in Dharamsala, where he lives—a gathering of scientists, because he's really into science and lining Buddhism up with science and doing research to prove meditation. One of the scientists, over an informal gathering, asked him, "What was the happiest time of your life?"

I thought it would be when he was living back in the Potala and Tibetan culture was all intact, when he was under the supervision of his tutors and many, many monks and nuns were practicing all over the country. I thought it would be that kind of time he would point to.

They asked, "What was the happiest time of your life?" And he said, "I think right now." I thought that was so great—the best possible answer.

With mudita, the near enemy is, as we've talked about, elation or over-exuberance, when there's an attachment to the happiness and we overthink it and claim it as our own and project it into the future. Of course that will undermine it and eventually chase it away. And the far enemy is envy—as though if somebody else has happiness, it's going to take away from ours.

After I graduated from college, I went into the Peace Corps. In going into the Peace Corps, I left a relationship...

I left a girlfriend at that time to go off. I taught school in Malaysia for two years, which is where I first had contact with Thailand and fell in love with the culture. So I'd left my girlfriend—I still had feelings for her, but I wanted to do this teaching in Asia. Not long after I got settled at my school in Malaysia, I got a letter from my best friend who told me that he'd just gotten together with my girlfriend in a relationship.

Mudita was not the first response that came to mind at that point. So I had to work with that envy and jealousy. But we have a tool, and one of the beauties of mudita is that it's said to dispel envy. We become very skillful in situations like that.

The last of the Brahmaviharas is this quality of equanimity, and I think I'll save this for another night. The Pali word is upekkha. It is this fundamental balance of mind that's not thrown off by the alternating pleasure and pain of life, both internally and externally. Within the Brahmaviharas, it's the balance that holds all the joys and all the sorrows of the world and ourselves without getting disturbed about it.

Equanimity is an extremely high value in the Buddhist teachings. It's the last of the Brahmaviharas. It's the last of the factors of enlightenment. In the meditation system of Mahasi Sayadaw, it is the last development before awakening happens. So it's a very powerful and desirable state, and we'll talk about it more another time.

I want to close with some reflection on how the Brahmaviharas in their totality make a kind of road map of the heart and its relationship to the world. The Brahmaviharas themselves shouldn't be taken for granted. You shouldn't just assume, "Oh, I ought to be having metta. I ought to be having pure compassion. I ought to be having mudita. I ought to be having equanimity." These are high states. They are what I would call the awakened response to the circumstances of life. So we're imitating the awakened ones when we find ourselves in these states.

You shouldn't expect this to be your normal way of operating. These are elevated states of being. Our normal, self-centered way of operating is described by the near enemies. That's essentially where the near enemy comes from—normal self-centered mind states. Affection with attachment, pity and looking down, envy and looking up, or agitation instead of equanimity—this is the way the untrained mind tends to respond to changing circumstances.

The far enemies are essentially the really unwholesome responses to life circumstances, and we definitely want to avoid those—the responses of ill will, cruelty, envy, or agitation.

Taken together, we have four Brahmaviharas by three qualities: the Brahmavihara, the near enemy, the far enemy. This gives us a map of twelve responses to the world. As you start to practice with these, you really see how they describe or outline most of the range of possible responses that we will make to life situations. Using the Brahmaviharas as tools, we learn more and more how to move ourselves from the suffering places into the really wholesome and awakened places.

This whole system of the Brahmaviharas with their near and far enemies provides a wonderful roadmap to the responses to life's conditions. We can look at ourselves through this map almost any time.

Let me close with one other version of the Brahmavihara phrases. This is the standard Tibetan expression of the four Brahmaviharas. They have them also—I haven't heard of the practices being quite like ours, but they have the concept of the Brahmaviharas.

So I'll close with reading these qualities from the Tibetan point of view:

May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue.

May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue.

May all beings remain unseparated from the sacred happiness, which is free from sorrow.

May all beings come to rest in the great equanimity beyond attachment to those near and far.

So let's just sit together for a minute.

Crossed, I would cross others. Freed, I would free. Tamed, I would tame. Calmed, I would calm. Comforted, I would comfort. Attained to nibbana, I would lead to nibbana.

So thank you for your attention. We have about thirty minutes for walking meditation, and then we will return to practice a new chant—the last of the four pages of chanting on pervading loving-kindness.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 171

Morning Instructions: Pervading Mettā for All Beings

Guy Armstrong · 45 min

> In this morning meditation instruction from the June 2019 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong offers guidance on practicing mettā (loving-kindness) for all beings through the traditional method of pervading the four directions. Drawing from classical Buddhist meditation instructions, Armstrong teaches two approaches: first using phrases while directing loving-kindness to beings in each cardinal direction (north, south, east, west), and second using a visualization of a four-sided lantern in the heart center to pervade each quarter wordlessly.
> The teaching emphasizes the creative and imaginative aspects of mettā practice, encouraging practitioners to visualize specific beings—from loved ones and neighbors to wildlife and creatures in each direction. Armstrong guides students through the complete sequence: beginning with self, benefactor, and good friend to warm the heart, then extending systematically through the four quarters, and finally pervading all directions simultaneously. He offers practical advice for maintaining concentration and connection with specific beings to prevent the practice from becoming too abstract.
> This instruction is particularly valuable for practitioners looking to expand their mettā practice beyond individual recipients to the vast field of all sentient beings, incorporating both the structured approach of directional pervading found in classical texts and the creative visualization that keeps the practice alive and engaging.

Let's begin this morning again chanting the refuges and precepts to start our sit. And let's do this in unison this time. See how we go.

In the meditation this morning we'll again focus the instructions on loving-kindness for all beings. Just to orient you to directions, because we'll be pervading the four directions with loving-kindness, you are roughly facing north. This building is not quite aligned north-south, but more or less you're facing north. So East is to your right, West is to your left and South is behind you.

One of the instructions that I'll give is as you're directing loving kindness to beings in the North, you can think of all the beings to the North who will be receiving your loving kindness. You can think of our lovely neighbors from Canada whom we wish were closer to our country. You can think of all the native people, indigenous people up in the north of Canada and of course throughout. You can think of all the creatures to the north, creatures in the Great Lakes and the Bay and the Arctic, whales and fishes, seals and polar bears.

When we aim to the east, to the west, to the south, you can be really creative in your imagination about what beings are receiving your loving kindness in those directions. If there are people who you've wanted to bring in, who you haven't brought into the metta because we've been restricted, this is a great time to bring them in. Whenever we hit their direction, you can remember your loved ones who are in that direction and say the phrases specifically for them.

As we're extending to the various directions and you think of people in the hall who are in that direction from you, you can bring up their faces and say the loving kindness specifically for those people, or the birds you hear outside, or whatever sparks your imagination. Loving kindness for all beings is really a wonderful time to be creative. Bring in any beings that come to your imagination, think of the wide range of beings that your metta is directed to, and let that tickle your fancy. Metta for all beings can never become boring for me because there's always so much imagination we can bring to it, so many other people we can bring in.

Please begin by sitting comfortably. We'll begin again with loving kindness on a few individuals that you've worked with in order to warm up the field.

In sitting comfortably, coming into your body. Let the body be relaxed, the forehead and the eyes, the jaw and shoulders, the belly and hands. Not trying to get anywhere else, just resting, settling into the moment.

As you feel your body in sitting, coming into the heart center, bringing your attention to the center of the chest. Aware especially of any sensations, any mood that might be felt there.

Connecting with yourself, either through this felt sense, the body here and now, or an image of yourself somewhere you're contented and happy, maybe smiling. Remember your goodness. You've devoted so much of your life to the cultivation of wisdom and love. It's a really unusual thing in the human realm. A really beautiful expression of what you care about. I wish we could populate the world with you all.

With that sense of your own good nature, then directing the thoughts of loving kindness to yourself.

Then bringing in either your benefactor or good friend, wherever you feel the warmer connection. Bringing them alive with you in this moment so you feel their presence. Remember what you appreciate in them. Remember all their good qualities. There's some mysterious way that happiness follows goodness. In touch with your benefactor or friend's goodness and directing your thoughts of loving kindness to them.

Now letting go of your friend or benefactor. Just coming into the moment. Again, feeling your body, feeling the heart center, noticing any mood that's present.

As you rest in the moment, feel the wide field of your own awareness. How it stretches out to hold everyone in the room, the space in the room, the objects in the room. And beyond to the outdoors, to nature, to the trees and creatures and grass. And on in a fairly limitless way, to include all the beings everywhere.

We reconnect with that initial wish that's the impulse of loving kindness, that all beings everywhere be well, in a vast range of life. So we say that with our simple wish, may all beings be well, happy, and peaceful. May all beings be well, happy and peaceful.

Now we can take up the practice of the Four Quarters. We'll do this in two different ways. The first way that we'll do it, as you're sitting we'll begin with the quarter that's in front of you. So that is to the north. Just have the sense of taking in the vastness of what's in front of you. As you're sitting in the hall facing the front, you're roughly facing north. Remember, as you take in this quarter, that your gaze includes up into the sky as well as down into the earth.

And now, as you repeat the phrases for all beings to the north, let yourself feel the flame in the heart center. Imagine raising the metal pane on the side of the lantern that faces north, allowing the light of loving-kindness to shine out in that direction. You can visualize this warm, golden light streaming from your heart toward all the beings in the north.

May all beings to the north be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease.

The light doesn't need to be forced or pushed. It simply radiates naturally from your heart center, carrying your intentions of goodwill to all beings in that quarter.

And now turning your attention to the east, to your right. Imagine raising the metal pane on the eastern side of the lantern. Feel the warm light of metta flowing from your heart toward all beings to the east.

May all beings to the east be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease.

Now toward the south, behind you. Raising the southern pane of the lantern, allowing the light to flow from your heart center toward all beings in that direction.

May all beings to the south be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease.

And finally, to the west, to your left. Lifting the western pane and letting the light of loving-kindness stream from your heart toward all beings in that quarter.

May all beings to the west be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease.

And now imagine raising all four metal panes simultaneously, so that light is radiating from your heart center in all four directions at once. The lantern in your heart is shining its warm, golden light equally to the north, east, south, and west.

Feel this light representing your loving-kindness flowing out to encompass all beings everywhere. Not just those in the four horizontal directions, but also those above you—in the sky, in space—and those below you, within the earth itself.

May all beings in all directions, above and below, be safe, happy, healthy, and at ease.

Rest in this sense of universal loving-kindness, your heart radiating goodwill in all directions like a beacon of light. There's no effort required, no straining to make the light go further. Simply allow it to shine naturally from your heart center, touching all beings with its warmth.

Take a few more moments to rest in this all-encompassing metta, feeling connected to all life everywhere through the light of loving-kindness flowing from your heart.

So this will be a practice in pervading the four quarters one at a time without using words.

First, you lift the cover over the glass that's to the north, that's in front of you. The light of your loving kindness can shine in that direction in front of you. You let your metta pervade the quarter that's in front of you without any words. You simply have the sense that that quarter of your heart is open and the metta can stream out and radiate however it likes.

You don't have to try to make it fill that quarter. You don't have to try to make it go any further than it's inclined to. You open that door on the lantern and you let the light of metta shine in front of you, touching all beings in that direction who can feel it. I will abide pervading one quarter with a mind imbued with loving-kindness.

Now you let the door go down over that pane that's to the north, and you open the door that's over the pane of glass to the east. You let your loving-kindness pervade the quarter to your right, letting the light simply go free and extend as far as it likes to go. Loving kindness extended to all the beings in the quarter to your right.

If different beings come to your mind as you're pervading, that's fine. You can let them stay there and be touched by the light.

Then closing the door on the pane facing right, and opening the door on the pane that faces to your rear, behind you, roughly south. Simply let the light of your loving kindness shine in that direction, pervading the quarter to your back.

Then close the door facing south and open the door that faces west. Your metta extends to the west as far as it naturally does.

Now open all the doors over all four panes of the lantern and have a sense that the light of your loving kindness can shine in all directions equally. I will abide pervading the all-encompassing world with a heart imbued with loving kindness.

May all beings everywhere be safe and protected from harm.
May all beings be happy and peaceful.
May all beings be healthy and strong.
May all beings live with the ease of well being.

You can bring in this meditation on all beings as you like, as it seems appropriate to you. As you may have found yesterday, it's a really lovely meditation to do when walking, when walking outdoors. You can really feel that space and the pervading nature. And any being that comes in your orbit, make it specific to them—people, birds, chipmunks, squirrels. It's directed to individuals.

In practicing with this last form where it's wordless and you're just pervading a quarter or the whole world with this light, because there's not a clear form to focus on, sometimes it may be easier for the mind to drift. If you're practicing that way and you find a lot more thoughts coming in, come back to the phrases for a while. It can be phrases for individuals, phrases for the four quarters, all beings, however you like. But see that the concentration doesn't get too frayed around the edges as you practice with this formless, pervading kind of metta.

Work in your own self, benefactor and friend when they feel helpful. One of the risks in "all beings" practice is if it's not connecting with specific beings, it can get too abstract—"Oh yeah, may all beings be happy, right"—but we're not really feeling the happiness and welfare of individuals. It can just become conceptual.

If that happens, bring in specific beings to the north, south, east, west, whatever, or go back to your three easy folks—self, benefactor and friend—to make the metta warm again and real, so that it lands somewhere.

CHAPTER 172

Morning Instructions: Objects, Space, and Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 42 min

> In this foundational dharma talk from a June 2019 retreat at IMS Forest Refuge, Guy Armstrong introduces practitioners to awareness-based vipassanā meditation. He begins by clarifying that 'awareness' in this context refers to consciousness (viññāṇa), the fifth khandha - our most basic capacity for knowing that makes us sentient beings. This bare faculty of knowing operates through the six sense doors (sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects) without requiring conceptual thinking, distinguishing it from higher-level functions like perception, mindfulness, and insight wisdom.
> The guided meditation systematically explores three interconnected elements: sense objects arising at the six doors, the spatial dimension of experience both within the body and extending outward, and the quality of awareness or knowing itself. Armstrong guides practitioners to notice how objects arise within space, investigate whether inner and outer space are truly separate, and tune into the knowing quality that recognizes both objects and space. The practice cultivates what he calls 'choiceless attention' - a receptive alertness that allows phenomena to reveal themselves naturally.
> This teaching offers practical entry into consciousness-based meditation, emphasizing direct investigation of our immediate sensory experience while developing familiarity with the subtle, formless quality of awareness itself. The approach provides a foundation for deeper vipassanā practice by establishing clear recognition of the basic structures of conscious experience.

So this morning we're going to take the leap into the awareness practices. You ready? Lift off.

I want to say a few words before we go into any formal instructions. We'll be giving different instructions through the days of awareness practice, and we're just beginning today with an introduction. But I want to explain what I mean by the word awareness, or how we're going to be using it, because it means different things to different people.

In this retreat, we're going to use it synonymously with consciousness—the fifth aggregate, more or less. We'll clarify the finer distinctions as we go, but mostly we mean it's synonymous with consciousness.

I need to explain the meaning of this term consciousness. It's the fifth aggregate, vijñāna in Pali. It is the most basic capacity of knowing that we have. It is what makes us a sentient being.

As you are awake in this moment, you are having conscious experience through the sense doors of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects—mostly thoughts and emotions. That conscious experience is ongoing. It happens naturally in any moment that you're awake because we have sense organs, we have sense doors that bring the world into our conscious experience, our human experience. This is what it means to be a sentient being.

Can you turn that faculty off? If I say, "Don't hear this sound," can you stop hearing? If your eyes are open, can you stop seeing? If your body's sitting, can you stop feeling sensations? No.

This is the nature of consciousness: just to reveal, or you could say display, or illuminate, or put forward these bare sense experiences for us to know. Consciousness doesn't take any smarts. You can be on the verge of sleep and you'll still be knowing objects. Dogs have consciousness. Ants have consciousness. Every sentient being has this knowing of their immediate environment.

It's just the bare revealing of—for us—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects. That's what consciousness is. It's this faculty of knowing in a very simple and primitive way.

Now on top of consciousness we can layer other kinds of knowing that get more intelligent and more sophisticated. This is referred to in the study guide as the five kinds of knowing. We can know through perception, we can know through conceptual thought, we can know through mindfulness, we can know through insight. These are all higher level functionings that require concepts. Consciousness doesn't require concepts.

I don't think ants have too much verbal facility, but they have consciousness. They experience the world.

This is what we're going to use as the meaning of awareness for now. We'll refine it later, but for now, we're investigating consciousness. That's mostly what these days of practice will be about—investigating consciousness. With that as our prelude, awareness will be used synonymously with consciousness.

With that, we can go into the meditation. Please come into the present moment. Feel your body in sitting. Let your attention rest in the heart center.

First let us carry forward this idea of metta in its boundless form, extending to all beings everywhere and pervading the space around us. As you sit, let yourself become aware of the space in front of you, to your right, behind you, to your left. We can include above and below. Have a sense that your care for all beings can extend outward in all six directions from your heart center. Wish for all beings to be well, happy and peaceful.

With that sense of the vastness of metta, extending to all beings in a wordless way, let go of any phrases that you may have been using in the practice of metta or the other brahmaviharas. Just sit quietly with this awareness of space.

Sometimes it might feel a little awkward in turning the corner from metta to what we will now undertake as vipassana. In metta we've been concerned with the phrases, the image, the metta feeling, the heart center. Now we're changing our field of focus.

So as you relax into this open space, grounded in the body, just notice what's here. What's showing up in this openness? What sense objects are making an appearance for you right now?

You'll notice sensations in the body. You'll notice the impact of breathing. There will be sounds from time to time. Thoughts will come and go. And there's some mood or emotion that's present—could be a strongly felt emotion like joy or impatience, wanting or compassion. Could be a subtler mood, a bit of longing, a touch of aversion.

And then notice also the visual field. With eyes closed, there's probably not much going on, but there's the sense of grayness or darkness of the visual field, or perhaps some flickering pixels, or perhaps some light. So we notice that these are the phenomena that constitute our experience through the six sense doors, and they will continue to arise as long as we're awake.

So the objects of the senses are the first things that we want to notice in the meditation this morning. Sally talked last night about the six-limbed equanimity, and these are the six limbs of experience that we can notice in our meditation.

If you're feeling somewhat calm and settled, coming out of the concentration practice of metta, then you don't need to go searching for these objects, but you can have the sense of resting—just resting in the center of everything and letting the phenomena reveal themselves to you. Now a sensation, now a sound, now a thought, now an in-breath. Receptive attention, but alert, awake, ready for the next contact.

And now we want to move a little further into the exploration of the second territory, which is that of space. Bringing your attention into the body, noticing that you may feel sensations from the head through the shoulders and back, down the arms, chest and belly, and the hips and legs and feet.

As you connect with the head, the middle of the body, and the feet, you'll notice that the sensations spread out in this way create a sense of distance. Sense of distance is an immediate part of our experience of the body. So there's a separation or a space between the head and the feet, which we can directly experience.

As you feel the sensations that take place between the head and the feet, ask and investigate: Is this whole space full with sensations? Or are there some parts of the body as experienced from within that don't particularly have sensations? In other words, is there some space between some of the sensations in the body? Or is every cubic inch dense with sensation?

Once we connect with the distance in the body, we can also find space—space within, between, among all the various sensations. So tuning in now to the quality of space within the body.

And as you sit in the hall, can you also get a sense of the space around you? The space that you're sitting in. It extends to the front and behind, to your right and left. And can you feel it extending beyond the walls and windows to outdoors?

Sometimes sound is a way to evoke space. A bird sound. A bell sound. We can feel the distance between us and the sound that arises. So we can be in touch with the space outside. We can be in touch with the space inside the body. Are these two different things? Or is there just one space? It's both inside and outside.

So connecting with this sense of space inside and outside, you might investigate: how far does it extend? Or can you find an edge to it? If you hear the bird outside, do you get a sense the space extends that far?

When you hear my voice, do you get a sense the space extends that far? This is the second element that we'll look at in the meditation this morning—the sense of space.

The third element that we'll bring in is the quality of awareness. As you're in touch with appearances, sensations, sounds, breath, thoughts, mood, those are all being known because they're part of your direct experience. There's a knowing of these arisings that is your human consciousness. Sounds are known. Sensations are known. Thoughts are known.

Is space also known? When you're in touch with a sense of space, is there knowing of space? Is there some consciousness of the space around you and inside you? As far as the sense of space extends, does your knowing go with it? However wide space is, is awareness also that wide?

Now asking, can I be in touch with the sense of knowing? When the bird calls, can I sense the knowing of that sound? When a sensation arises, can I sense the knowing of that sensation? That sense consciousness is taking place—can I feel that happening? When there's the perception of space, and I feel the knowing of that, the awareness of space—is the knowing as wide as the space is? Is there any boundary or edge to awareness?

Sometimes the quality of awareness can seem really elusive. It's very subtle. It's formless. It can't be grasped. It can be intuited. It can be sensed. But sometimes it's so subtle, it's hard to sense it. So if that happens, you might just ask this simple question: am I aware? And if the answer is yes, just stay with that sense—awareness.

So there are the elements of the objects, of space, and of awareness or consciousness. Let's put these together with specific experiences at the sense doors. As you're sitting, simply resting in the middle of space, some object will arise that you'll notice—a sensation, a breath, a sound, a thought. As you connect with that object, ask if you can also notice the space around it. First we notice the object, and then we see if we can notice the space that it's happening in, the space surrounding it. It can be a big sense of space, it can be just a small sense of space, but notice that it is happening within space.

So we notice the object, then we notice the space. Is there any shift in inner feeling, any shift in mood when you go from noticing the object to noticing the space around it? And then after you've noticed the object and the space, notice the quality of awareness or knowing. There's knowing of the object, there's knowing of the space. Can you feel that activity of knowing taking place?

So for this last section of the sitting, practicing in this way, connecting with an object as it arises, noticing it, and noticing the space around it, and then noticing the knowing of the object and of the space. This can become a kind of choiceless attention, knowing objects arising at the six sense doors, contemplating in your direct experience the object, the space, and the awareness.

If the element of awareness is not so apparent, don't worry about it. It's kind of elusive, may come and go. Just be with the knowing of the object and the space.

For the last minute of the sitting, returning to our old friend, the breath. Bringing the attention into the body, feeling the breath wherever it's been comfortable for you. Connecting with the in-breath and the out-breath. Recognizing it in the field of sensations. As you connect with the breath wherever you're feeling it, notice the space around it. How does it feel to move from knowing the sensations of breath to notice the space? And then, can you feel the awareness of the breath, the awareness of the space? Knowing both the arising object and the space it's arising in.

So was that space or was that spaced out? Any comments, questions on the meditation?

When Jane asks about which sense door we use when connecting with space, I regard it as manifesting on the physical level - through the physical sense door connected with sensation and the body.

Don raises an interesting point about interoception, which refers to our ability to sense internal bodily signals. This eighth sense, as some researchers call it, encompasses our awareness of heartbeat, breathing, hunger, thirst, and other internal states. It's distinct from the traditional five senses and even from proprioception, which tracks our body's position in space.

Interoception could indeed be relevant here. When we're sensing space around the breath, we might be tapping into this capacity for internal bodily awareness. It's that subtle sensing that doesn't quite fit into the neat categories of sight, sound, smell, taste, or touch, yet is undeniably a form of knowing.

This highlights something important about meditation practice - we're often working with forms of awareness that don't map perfectly onto conventional categories. The space around the breath, the felt sense of openness, the quality of awareness itself - these experiences invite us to expand our understanding of how we know what we know.

Whether we call it the body sense door, interoception, or simply awareness itself, what matters is that we're cultivating a more refined and subtle capacity for knowing. We're learning to recognize not just the obvious objects of experience, but also the context in which they arise - the space, the awareness, the knowing quality itself.

This kind of practice gradually develops what we might call "meta-awareness" - awareness of awareness itself. We begin to recognize not just what we're experiencing, but the very capacity for experience. This is where meditation starts to reveal the deeper structures of consciousness, the very ground of our being.

CHAPTER 173

The Nature of Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong explores the nature of awareness and consciousness (viññāṇa), the fifth of the five aggregates. Drawing from the Honeyball Sutta and the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), he explains how consciousness arises through contact—the meeting of sense organ, sense object, and sense consciousness. Armstrong distinguishes between consciousness (knowing individual sense objects) and awareness (the broad field encompassing all six sense doors), using the metaphor of firelight illuminating objects while we rarely examine the light itself.
> The talk addresses why practitioners turn from object-based meditation to awareness itself: consciousness is free from the kilesas (greed, hatred, delusion), impartial like a mirror, and offers refuge from the pleasant-unpleasant dance that leads to suffering. Armstrong explores five levels of knowing—from basic viññāṇa through perception (saññā), conceptual thought (vitakka), mindfulness understanding (pajānāti), to liberating wisdom (ñāṇa/paññā).
> Drawing from teachers like Upasika Kee Nanayon and Ajahn Buddhadasa, Armstrong reveals awareness as the union of emptiness and knowing—'cognizing emptiness' that is naturally pure, unestablished anywhere, yet ceaselessly responsive. This recognition opens the heart's treasures: mettā, compassion, equanimity, and wisdom, pointing toward the mind's Buddha-nature.

The talk tonight is on the nature of awareness. I will be referring to the study guide if you have one handy and want to take a look at the quotes, as we will be using it a few times.

You probably know that after the Buddha's enlightenment, he debated whether or not to teach. He was inclined not to teach, saying, "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, and hard to understand." He didn't think people would get it. So the talk tonight may not be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. If that's the case, just let the energy wash over you. Take it energetically. Don't worry too much about the concepts.

As you all know, generally in Vipassana practice, we go through this systematic series of instructions that direct our attention toward what are called the objects of our sense experience. We typically start with sensations, breath, sounds, emotions, thoughts, feeling tone, intention, until we're quite comfortable relating with mindfulness to all of those different arisings. Usually then the retreat's over, right?

In this retreat, we are turning to this faculty called consciousness, or sometimes we call it awareness, which is what's responsible for knowing the sensations, breath, sounds, emotions, thoughts, et cetera. But in most Vipassana retreats, we don't get instructions on how to relate to this. So it's often new territory for us when we come into a retreat that is exploring consciousness, this fifth aggregate, vijñāna.
