You might also notice if you're feeling some discomfort in your bodily posture and you want to move—you want to unfold the legs or stretch forward with the back—the mind has to give the signal for the body to do that. And that signal is what we call the intention. It's a mental factor; it arises, it acts, the body responds, and then it fades away.

The intention is a very subtle movement of mind. Sometimes things happen so quickly in the body that we can't quite catch that little burst of intention that precedes it. So don't be frustrated if you find this hard to discover. It's subtle, it can happen quickly, and that's okay.

We're going to start paying attention to the moment before the bodily movement takes place and see what we can notice in the mind happening at that point. We're going to call this the "about-to" moment—when the body is about to move, about to do something. See what you notice happening in the mind.

We're calling it intention in this setting, which is how we usually describe it as a meditation subject. If you read the translations of the suttas, it's more often described as volition. Bhikkhu Bodhi uses the term volition to translate cetanā. So intention, volition, urge, motivation, motive power—all these words describe what's happening in the mind before the body responds.

What you want to try to do is pay attention and see if you can find the mental signal that precedes a bodily movement during this meditation. The body's not moving a lot, so this intention to move won't be there all the time. But notice—you may move your neck, you may move your arm, you may straighten your posture, you may move for discomfort, you may swallow. Just see if you can find the mental signal that tells the body to do one of those actions.

Once the act has happened, you can let go of looking for intention until the next time the body is about to move. We're going to focus on this "about-to" moment and just see what you find there—that moment of intention.

Please begin as you always do. Sit or stand in a comfortable and relaxed way, feeling the uprightness of the spine and relaxing through the eyes, jaw, belly, and shoulders.

I find it really helpful to have the conscious moment of relaxing at the beginning of a sit. Anytime you feel you've gotten a little tense through the sit, restore the sense of relaxation. It can be helpful to take two or three deep breaths and think that relaxation is happening on the out-breath.

This movement to relaxation reminds us we're not trying to get somewhere else. You're not trying to make anything special happen. All we're trying to do is to know what is happening.

in the mind, the body, the environment. Really our faith is in the mindfulness being enough. We don't have to control the experience because the mindfulness is enough. It will learn.

Coming into the body, just feeling the body as one integrated unit in sitting. For some, the body posture itself is a good anchor in meditation. The mind learns from the body's stability, from its stillness. As you connect with the body, let the attention open wide and take in all the sounds that appear and disappear. Have the sense that hearing is very receptive—not sending the mind out towards sounds, but simply resting and letting sounds come to you.

Settling again in the body and feeling the impact of breathing. How does the in-breath feel throughout the body? How does the out-breath feel? Just sitting, and the breath happens by itself.

As you're attending to the body, breath, and sounds, from time to time other sensations will draw your attention. A mood or emotion may call you. You may notice a feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. In a very natural way, let the attention go where it's drawn—to what we call the predominant experience in that moment. See thoughts as a present moment arising in just the same way.

In this way, nothing that arises in your sitting is a distraction. Everything is more food for mindfulness. Mindfulness can grow moment after moment, no matter where the attention is drawn, no matter what the experience is.

And then in this sitting, begin to investigate the mental factor called intention—just related simply to movements of the body. Anytime you notice that you're about to make a movement with the body, see if you can pay attention to the moment before the movement happens and catch the signal from the mind that is directing the body to move. Every voluntary movement is preceded by a moment of intention. You could call it an urge, a volition, a motive, or just that "about to" moment.

See what you notice in the mind in that moment when the body is about to move—from straightening the posture, swallowing, shifting. The intention may be accompanied with thought, or it may not.

Just keep an eye out for the action of intention, the "about to" moment just before the body makes a voluntary movement—adjusting the posture, shifting, swallowing.

There's a little bit more to say about intention, but before I do, I'll just see: are there any questions about working with it or what it is?

CHAPTER 51

Working With Fear

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines fear as one of humanity's most fundamental emotional patterns. Drawing on the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10) and the foundations of mindfulness, he explores how fear arises from our basic existential situation of unpredictable pleasure and pain, linking it to the three unwholesome roots (greed, hatred, delusion) described in Buddhist psychology.
>
> Armstrong demonstrates how fear operates as a form of aversion - a strategy of drawing back from the unpleasant - and shows how thought breeds fear through mental fabrication. He shares personal stories and teachings from masters like Ajahn Mun, illustrating how the Thai Forest tradition used direct encounter with fear as skillful practice. The talk offers practical guidance for working with fear's three components: body sensations, mood, and thoughts, emphasizing that true fearlessness comes not from the absence of fear, but from the confidence to meet it with wise attention and tender acceptance.
>
> This teaching reveals how opening to fear with complete acceptance can break its power over us, leading to the profound understanding that any emotion can be worked with skillfully through mindfulness and equanimity.

Tonight, I'd like to talk on the subject of working with fear. I really enjoy this theme, even though it sounds like it could be a little heavy, because as much as anything, I think this topic really shows the liberating power of the Dharma. By extension, in learning to work with fear, we also learn to work with a lot of other difficult emotions. Not only does the Dharma offer the possibility—the long-term promise—of uprooting these forces from the mind, but it also shows a step-by-step way that we can continue to reduce and weaken them over time in ways that bring a lot of relief and happiness into our lives. So I hope that in exploring this theme together this evening, some of that will come across.

Fear is one of our deepest conditionings. It goes way back in the evolutionary timeframe. It's one of the most powerful forces at work in our hearts and minds. When it's present, it feels like a kind of cloud—a heavy cloud has settled over us and blocks the sunlight from getting in and reaching us and letting the heart feel beautiful and spacious. When fear descends, it really limits our ability to enjoy the beautiful things of life and to open in the way that we're capable of opening.

There's an author and therapist named Gerald Jampolsky whose most famous book has a title I like: Love is Letting Go of Fear. That's a strong message that when we let go of fear, the quality of love is spontaneously there. It's not that we have to build it up little by little, but when this cloud lifts, love comes through very naturally.

Fear can be a very strong force in our life. At times it can be emotionally overwhelming. It can have a strong impact in the body. We're learning how much stress, how much illness is related to stress levels—forms of fear in our life. And it can lead to a lot of unskillful choices as we act in the world and live.

When you think about the big picture of human culture, it seems like fear has haunted our whole development as a species. From a long time ago, fear has been like a specter over the evolution of the human race. You can feel it over thousands and probably millions of years—this worry that humans have had that there's not going to be enough food, that there's not going to be enough land, that there's not going to be enough warmth, that there's not going to be shelter, that there's not going to be safety. In modern terms that all gets crystallized into: there's not going to be enough money. This fear of lack that we have struggled with has led to countless conflicts and wars and suffering.

In meditation we can find a lot of freedom in relationship to fear in general and to our individual specific fears in particular. The long-term promise of the Dharma is that this force can be uprooted from our hearts and minds—that it is possible to live without the influence of fear. That's a long-term aim. It might not happen in this retreat, so we need to be patient and set our aim accordingly. But it really is possible in one retreat to significantly change our relationship to fear. The gist of it will be not getting rid of it, but becoming more and more comfortable with it, so that when it arises, we're not so disturbed by it. We find a greater and greater ability to accept and be with the fear.

I'd like to talk a little bit about what the emotion is and how it plays out—what its role is in the psyche. When you think about our basic existential situation as human beings, and actually all sentient beings (you see it in the animal world as well), the basic situation is that we have a shifting mix of experience which is sometimes pleasant and sometimes painful. It's mostly unpredictable and it's largely out of our control.

I imagine you're seeing this in your day-to-day experience as yogis. This is one of the most striking features of retreat. We have a concentrated sitting, and the next sitting is all over the map. We have a lot of body pain, we get up and walk and it totally goes away. We have one day where we feel very open and enjoy the beauty of nature, and another day where we're very contracted and worried or sad or angry about something. These different experiences just seem to sweep through us, not of our choosing and not in our control.

This is one of the main things that we learn as yogis: life is unpredictable, practice is unpredictable, and above all, we find a growing equanimity in being with all those changing situations. But that's because the Dharma provides us some understanding.

At the root of sentient life is this unpredictability and a sense in the middle of it of our insecurity and vulnerability. Anything can happen to us at any time. This is so fundamental to our life, this changing mix of pleasure and pain. This is why the quality of feeling tone or vedanā is so important that it's the second foundation of mindfulness, because around vedanā our emotions live.

We're constantly being hit by this contact, alternately pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral in all the sense doors. I think fear has to be understood as one response to that shifting mix of pleasure and pain.

We've talked quite a bit about the three chalaces—the three roots of the unwholesome in the heart and mind: greed, aversion, and delusion. These can all be understood as ways to relate to this unpredictable mixture of pleasure and pain.

In my understanding, fear fits under aversion. Basically, desire is for the pleasant. The tendency of aversion manifests in two ways when encountering the unpleasant. One is anger, which pushes out against the unpleasant. The other is fear, which tends to draw back from the unpleasant. But they are both ways of trying to relate to the unpleasant or painful in life.

We can see that these patterns are born in the psyche and continue as strategies for dealing with this mix of pleasure and pain. The greedy temperament seeks to resolve this dilemma by constantly drawing in pleasure—"Let's just keep the pleasant coming moment after moment without interruption, and that will be the strategy for happiness." You probably know people who live like this. We all have known friends whose addictive personality comes out of this tendency of mind.

Aversion is a strategy that seeks to find security by keeping the unpleasant away—pushing it away through anger or aggression, retreating from it through fear. And delusion has a strategy of "Oh, well, let's not feel it. It's impacting us. Let's withdraw somewhat so it's not touching us so closely." I hope you got some sense of that from Andrea's talk last night.

All of these chalaces are volitional in nature, and they enact a fundamental strategy of interacting with the world. In Buddhist psychology, personality types are described along these three lines. Those with a greedy temperament are driven more by the factor of greed than the other two. Those of an aversive temperament are driven more by that force, and those of a deluded temperament driven more by the force of delusion.

Now we all have all three, but it's very interesting—as you look into your own psychology and you look at your friends, I bet you can tell for most people which of these three is predominant in their lives. In classical Buddhist psychology, it's a way of understanding ourselves and others.

What fear does is try to protect us by projecting into the future some painful experience, hoping that by that projection we can find a strategy to avoid it. So fear is future-related—I think that's the interesting thing to note here. It's also closely tied to desire because there's a desire that we won't experience that painful experience. And when desire creates the hope for a pleasant experience, there's also the fear that we won't get it. So fear and desire are intermingled.

It's interesting that when the Tibetans sum up the strategy of samsara, they will often talk about it as "hope and fear"—almost as one word. It's what governs us: the search for the pleasant, the avoidance of the unpleasant. And it's interesting that we often want to give up fear, but we don't always want to give up wanting. Have you noticed that? Desires are kind of entertaining and soothing and oriented toward the pleasurable. They're not often felt as suffering. But the fact is, pursuing desire always involves some degree of fear also. So we can't really be free from one without being free from the other.

In fact, when you look at your experience of life, which is more fundamental for you—desire or fear? In other words, as we grow up into adulthood and realize what life is presenting, are we mostly insecure and wanting pleasant experiences to soothe that insecurity? Is fear the primary motivator? Or are we mostly searching for pleasure, and then fear comes about because we can't always find it? Which came first—wanting or fear?

In the Buddhist statement of the Second Noble Truth, when the Buddha described the cause of suffering as being craving, he used the phrase "seeking delight now here and now there." So he was putting the primary emphasis on the desire force. That's one man's opinion. But for someone who is psychologically more driven by fear, fear seems like the obvious predominating force in life, and one can see it in many people as well. In fact, I'd say for a fear type, it seems like a very reasonable response to an unpredictable world. You never know what's going to happen. Anything can happen at any time.

A friend of ours was vacationing in southern India, staying with his girlfriend in a little cabin on the beach. He went out one morning by himself, enjoying the beauty of the waves rolling in and the warm sand under his feet, perhaps doing some movement exercises on the beach, welcoming the morning and feeling the energy of the ocean, sun, and earth. Very pleasant.

As he stood there, a big wave rolled in. He watched it come and watched it go back out, and he thought, "That is weird." The wave had gone so far out that it exposed a lot of the ocean bottom, which hadn't been exposed earlier in the day. "This is not right," he thought.

So he went into the cabin, woke his partner who was still asleep, pulled her out, and they both climbed up on a little concrete wall next to a palm tree. "I think we need to make ourselves safe," he said. So they climbed up on the wall. He held on to the palm tree and she held on to him.

Then the next wave came in.

The date was December 26, 2004. This was that massive tsunami that killed so many people and destroyed so many homes, hotels, and villages throughout India, Burma, Thailand, and Indonesia. The big wave hit them, but because he was hanging on to the tree and she to him, they weren't swept out. They survived. The big wave went back out, ruining many other things, but they were okay.

Peaceful morning, right? Beautiful beach. Anything can happen at any time.

Who wouldn't be afraid living in a world like this?

It's as though we try to imagine all the things that can go wrong so that we can hopefully prevent some of them from happening. This reminds me of a joke you may have heard. There was a patient seeing a therapist in New York, and the therapist noticed that this patient had a habit of snapping his fingers rather frequently. After a while, the therapist asked, "Why are you snapping your fingers like that?"

"Oh, it's to keep the elephants away," the patient replied.

"But there are no elephants in Manhattan," the therapist said.

"Yeah, it works, doesn't it?" the patient responded.

For the worry type, the fact that we keep thinking of all these things that could go wrong and they don't go wrong proves how effective our thinking is. It's really very useful to worry, because it helps keep those things away.

But what we don't look at when we worry like that is the impact it has on the body and mind right now. We don't realize that we are really tormenting ourselves with fearful thoughts and images. Imagining all the things that can go wrong, we're constantly evoking anxiety, fear, worry, dread, and that creates a stress in the body and mind that's experienced here and now. But we don't tend to notice it because we're thinking about making the future safe.

From a dharma point of view, the reflection is: the uncertainty in life is real. The unpredictability is real. Anything can happen at any time—that is true. But the question is, do we need to meet the moment with fear? Is the fear really necessary or not?

This is one of the opportunities for great opening and understanding. When we start to understand that our mental state doesn't have to follow either our habits or outside conditions, we find through meditation more and more choice and freedom in regard to our state of mind. Right effort is basically keeping the mind in a wholesome place. We find more and more ability to have the mind be free from fear regardless of the outer situation.

Sometimes it just becomes apparent how absurd the response of fear is. In the early 1980s, I did a number of retreats in England. I was there one summer, probably in June, and it just so happened that at this point in my life, fear was coming up a lot. I went through a couple of years where fear was arising strongly—I'll say more about that later.

On this particular occasion I was doing standing meditation out in the back garden of the retreat center—this was a precursor to Gaia House for those familiar with the English scene. I was standing after tea, in the early evening, under a tree with my eyes closed. The fear was coming up quite strongly. I was just feeling it in my body and feeling it in my mind, feeling how unpleasant this fearful response to life was.

For some reason, maybe to interrupt it, I opened my eyes and looked around.

So it was one of those really soft summer nights in England—so beautiful. It's a little bit warm. The air has a little humidity. It just feels like it's settling on you like a gentle wrap. The sun was going down, so it was already in that golden light stage. I was standing on lush green grass that was illuminated by the golden setting sun. And I was standing beside a tree that was flowering—it was probably a fruit tree, flowering in the very late spring, early summer. The white flowers were beautiful in my face.

So it was just this idyllic scene that I woke up to, and my thought was, "Wow, it's really a scary world, isn't it?" The contrast between my mind state—what I was imagining—and the actual situation I was in was so stark. I saw that this state of mind had nothing to do with the reality of the present moment. And it just made me laugh at the silliness of that habit, the uselessness of that habit. The emotion was real, so I'm not trying to discount anybody's emotions. It was something I needed to live with and practice with, but it wasn't related to reality. It was just an old habit.

So as we look into this quality of fear, it's helpful to look at what causes it. One of the pieces of advice in the fourth foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta is: understand what causes the hindrances to arise and what causes them to pass away. So we want to understand why fear comes.

One of the main sources of fear was put really clearly by Krishnamurti—J. Krishnamurti, the Indian philosopher—when he said very succinctly: "Thought breeds fear." Thought breeds fear. When we think about all the things that could go wrong, we generate a sense of fear.

This is from Mark Twain: "I am an old man and have known a great many troubles, but most of them never happened."

And you may have heard the story—there's a Zen artist, generally a monk, and he had painted on a scroll this big bold picture of a tiger: sweeping brushstrokes in black on white paper, really giving the tiger a lot of vitality and fierceness and fangs and claws. And he stepped back from the painting and he was scared of the image he had painted. The tiger seemed so lifelike to him.

So this is kind of what we do. We scare ourselves with our thoughts and with our images. We make up frightening situations in our head that are just mental projections, and then we recoil from them in fear. What happens if we just don't fabricate those thoughts and images? What's the state of mind then? This is an interesting question generally. What is your state of mind when you're not fabricating thoughts and projections? Take a look and see.

I think that there's a natural peace in the mind. When we're not stirring it up, the mind tends to be tranquil. So there's this kind of natural way of being, which is peaceful and relaxed, and then we keep stirring the waves by our imaginings and projections. So once we find that we can access this natural state of peace, it gives us a lot of confidence. We find it through meditation. When we stop stirring up the mind, it settles by itself, and we can trust in that. That becomes a real refuge for us.

Some of the ways we stir up the mind, some of the things we stir it up about—of course, a big one is death. There is a fear of death that's common to all animals and common to all humans who haven't fully walked a spiritual path. It's a very primal relationship to life. We are, by and large from birth, very attached to this body. It's our most precious possession—our body and this life.

And that's why it is so impressive when you find people who put their life on the line for a cause. Martin Luther King predicted that he would be killed before he was killed. Environmental activists are often targets for the violence and hatred of others. There's someone I hadn't known about at the time of his death that I read about recently. Chico Mendes was an activist, an environmental activist in Brazil. He was born as a son of a rubber tapper. Brazil had lots and lots of natural rubber trees back in the '40s and '50s, so he was born into that era.

And at the age of nine, he began working as a rubber tapper. As he grew up, he came to feel that the owners of the plantations were not truly caring for the workers or for the land. So he formed a trade union to provide better conditions for the workers, and he started organizing environmental groups to protect the land—something that he wanted to build as extractive reserves so that they would be preserved.

But unfortunately, this threatened the ranching interests around the area where he was working and living. He was eventually assassinated by the son of a cattle rancher in 1988. But he knew that. He had predicted that he wouldn't live to see the next Christmas, and he was killed in that year. He didn't step down from his work. He kept doing his work, even in the face of mortal danger.

You may also know the story of Dian Fossey. She was an American zoologist who worked to protect the mountain gorillas in Rwanda, in Africa. She wrote the book Gorillas in the Mist, which was then made into a movie. Her life was on the line over and over in working to protect these creatures. She was killed in 1985, probably by a poacher. They never actually found the person, but most likely by a poacher who made a lot of money from killing the gorillas and selling their bodies.

So it's amazing when people will overcome that fear of death to stand up for what they believe—for justice, for the environment, for each other.

It's kind of interesting. I tend to think that the fear of death is the number one fear, but a poll was taken a while ago and fear of death only came out as number four. Number one on the list was fear of public speaking. That's kind of interesting—it definitely can bring up more immediate anxiety. Ajahn Amaro, who's a British monk and now the abbot of Amaravati, gave a talk with a great title: "Why Public Speaking is More Terrifying Than Worldwide Nuclear Destruction." It seems kind of true, but I don't know why that is.

So we all, until we investigate it and grow beyond it, have this fear of death. And of course, it's easy to understand. There can be pain in illness. There can be pain in dying. But there's another component of it that's kind of irrational, isn't it? There's some fear of this stream of experience coming to an end. Why should we care? It's like, suppose you went to sleep tonight and you just didn't wake up in the morning. Would that be a problem for you? It isn't really, is it? It might be a big problem for other people. But your stream of experience in this form has ended. And yet, we have a real resistance to that.

The Buddha pointed out that there's a very deep-rooted cause for that, which is that we have a very deep desire for existence. It's one of the three forms of craving that he pointed to in the Second Noble Truth. We want to exist. We want to have a body with senses so that we're having contact—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, feelings. I'm not sure where that springs from, but it's very deep-rooted in us. And it's that, to a large extent, that leads to the fear of dying. We don't want this stream of experience to come to an end, even though it's not always that satisfactory. Still, we hold on to it.

But the Buddha said that it's not necessary that we fear death. At a certain point in spiritual life, one doesn't need to fear death. He basically said there are four conditions for that to be true: if you're not too attached to the body, you're not too attached to sense pleasures, you haven't done a lot of unwholesome actions, and you have faith in the Dharma. He said, if these four things apply to you, you don't have to be afraid of death.

I mean, this is a high bar, right? It's not immediately available, maybe, but it's possible. This is not our inheritance. This is something that we can come to in this life—to come to that degree of settledness in the Dharma, emphasis on the wholesome, emphasis on non-attachment. This is possible for us. And so it's possible to face that possibility of one's own death without deep fear. And then in the maturing—the real maturing of the spiritual life according to the texts—it's possible to go beyond that altogether.

There's this wonderful story from the Theragatha, verses of the elder monks at the time of the Buddha, involving an Arahant, a fully awakened being named Adimutta.

Adimutta was wandering in the forest when he was captured by a group of bandits. These bandits had their own religious practice and needed a human to sacrifice to their gods. Adimutta was the unfortunate soul they found for this purpose. You get from this story that life was pretty wild at the time of the Buddha. Indian society was not some completely lawful, peaceful place. Monks could literally take their lives in their hands by wandering through the forest.

So the bandits captured Adimutta and told him they were going to sacrifice him to their gods. And Adimutta was unmoved. He wasn't afraid. He didn't show any unease. He certainly didn't manifest any terror. The bandits couldn't believe it. It really threw them. They hadn't seen anything like this before.

The bandit chief says to him, "Why are you not showing any fear in the face of this?"

Then Adimutta gave this little verse, which is recorded in the Theragatha: "There is no mental pain to one with no expectations. All fears have been transcended by one whose fetters are extinct."

No mental pain to one with no expectations. Even the expectation that we will live another minute is an expectation. But he was so thoroughly in the present, he had no expectation about the future. All fears have been transcended by such a one.

We can be afraid of other people. Sally mentioned in a talk the other night that it was only about 7,500 years ago that you could run into a stranger and expect that one of you would need to kill the other before you were killed. That's not very long ago. This fear of others lingers as a residue, a psychological residue of our evolution.

Martin Luther King said, "People fail to get along because they fear each other. They fear each other because they don't know each other. They don't know each other because they have not communicated with each other."

We see this playing out across the world in the distrust between nations. We see it playing out within our own society because different races and ethnic groups have been segregated for so long. We don't know each other very well. We haven't built those bonds of trust and familiarity. That all needs to break down so that we can have a sense of shared trust and safety with one another.

There's a fear of physical pain. The sawing that's been happening this last week on making the deck outside the meditation hall reminded me of nothing so much as being in a dental chair. When it was going on, I would just notice this aversion, reminding me of drilling in the chair.

We're afraid of physical pain. And we find that often as yogis here. Sitting for forty-five minutes to an hour or longer, being still, not moving the body, discomfort often comes. It's a fact of yogi life. Sometimes it's going to hurt. And sometimes we develop a resistance to sitting because of that physical pain, not wanting to feel it or endure it.

I got to exploring this and became very interested in it. At one point in my practice life, actually I was practicing in Thailand at the time, I would have pain in the afternoon sitting almost every day. One day I got up from the sitting, and the pain was entirely not there once I got up and started walking. I thought, "Why should I worry about it?" It didn't really hurt me or damage me in any lasting way. There's some discomfort for a period of time, and I just thought, "It's just sensations. There's really nothing to fear in that." That really helped me get much more comfortable with having physical pain in my sittings. It didn't damage me. I got up and it was as though it had never happened.

There's a fear of emotional pain.

Just as with physical pain, once we begin to open to emotions, we see that they arise, move through us, and dissolve. We'll return to this point about fear again - we don't need to fear our emotions either. Once we learn how to open and allow them to be, they all pass through naturally.

There's also fear of particular events - obviously fear of future happenings. This is quite interesting. I appreciate what the Dalai Lama said: there's no reason to worry about things. One of two possibilities is always true. Either you can do something about it, in which case you should do it and then you don't need to worry. Or you can't do anything about it, so you shouldn't worry about it. Really quite simple, isn't it?

Many of these fears arise from thought in one way or another. But there's another source of fear I want to mention. At different times in life, sometimes very powerful events have happened to us that we couldn't fully open to at the time. The emotions and sensations that were present then, because we couldn't or didn't know how to accept and feel them, we repressed them. We pushed them down, and the bodily sensations and emotions that accompanied them became locked into our system. They became embedded mentally in the subconscious and locked into the very muscles and tensions of the body.

This can arise from injury, accident, trauma, or abuse. Then we grow up as adults and often have a feeling that something has been shadowing us our whole life, but we can't quite identify what it is. We come into meditation, and part of the beauty of awareness is that in the empty space of awareness, this material now has the possibility to emerge.

Often people come into retreat, especially long retreats, and find emotions arising, sensations coming from long ago that have simply been held by the body and mind over sometimes decades. Fear can be one of those emotions that emerges from this kind of unconscious holding, as well as sadness, grief, or anger. Many things can be held in this way.

Sometimes fear is not triggered by thought at all. It's simply released from the subconscious as we relax, open, and trust in the unfolding of the present moment.

There's one other fear I want to mention - a dharma fear that arises. Sometimes there's discomfort in opening to what's unfamiliar. We open to a new place in practice. It could be an experience of profound calm, or it could be seeing into impermanence - how things don't last very long. In either case, there can be a feeling of "I don't know what to do now."

Calm can be unsettling because we think, "Oh, where did I go?" We're accustomed to expressing through action, thinking, doing. When that stops and there's just empty space, we wonder, "Where am I?" It can be unsettling because the familiar self doesn't seem to be there. But we simply need to trust in that opening. It's a beautiful unfolding in meditation.

Impermanence reveals a groundless quality to our whole experience - the things we've been counting on aren't as reliable as we thought. So where do we place our trust and faith then? One place we can rest it is in the space that opens. The empty space of awareness is fundamentally peaceful and trustworthy. That becomes our refuge, the reliable place we can return to.

Fear can arise through all these different avenues, all these different entry points. In a way, it doesn't matter so much what the source is, although it's useful to understand. What's most important is how we relate to fear once it has arisen. This approach remains the same regardless of what has caused the fear. We want to bring the same quality of attention.

This is the part of the talk where I hope you'll see the similarity to any kind of afflictive emotion that can arise. Working with them all follows very similar principles, whether it's fear or grief or longing or anger. You want to take the same basic approach.

Basically, we need to face our fears and difficult emotions directly. We cannot overcome fear theoretically—it simply doesn't happen that way. We need to overcome it through meeting it face to face and finding a new relationship with it. You can't do it through thinking about it, through planning, through theorizing. It needs to be a direct encounter. Fear, any emotion—we need to meet it.

In that sense, finding fear arising in a meditation retreat is a great blessing, a great opportunity. Because until it arises, we don't have a chance to work, to become free of it. This is true for all the difficult emotions that may come.

In the Thai forest tradition, the abbots or teachers would look for places to send monks and nuns so that they would meet their fears. Ajahn Mun, the Thai master who re-established the Thai forest tradition in the 19th century, would send his monks out to meditate where tigers had recently been seen. He thought that was the best place. "Oh, there was a tiger there? You go meditate there." If you're lucky, he'll come back.

Monks would report hearing the roaring of a tiger nearby in the forests of Thailand a hundred years ago. They're not so abundant anymore, but a hundred years ago they were. That would awaken one to the present moment—one's mind would not wander far in that situation. And the monks who walked through the forest would often report coming across empty robes and an abandoned bowl, knowing that one of their fellow practitioners had passed through there and died. They wouldn't know the cause of death—it could well have been from a tiger or from sickness. But tigers were plentiful back then. So meeting one's fear was considered very fortunate and a good place to practice.

We're not going to send you into the woods at night. We're going to trust the mind will bring up what you need to see. But when it comes, it is a good opportunity.

One of the things you first want to look at is: How do you relate to fear when it arises? What's your first response when fear comes? For me, in the early part of my meditation path, the first response was more fear. I didn't want to feel it, I didn't know how to feel it, it made me very uncomfortable and it scared me. I thought I was going to be overwhelmed by it—it was too much for me to handle. This is the kind of response, of course, that leads to a panic attack. The fear comes, it makes us more afraid, that amplifies the fear, and then we get more afraid of the amplified fear.

One of the practitioners who had a lot of work to do with panic attacks in his early years was a young Tibetan Lama named Mingyur Rinpoche. Mingyur Rinpoche is a brilliant teacher and practitioner. I think he's in his late thirties now. He set off about four and a half years ago on what he called a three-year retreat, wandering in the Himalayas, and he hasn't come back yet. He's one of those beings who is already very well developed, and he has such a strong calling to develop further that he's been on retreat for the past four and a half years. We still don't know when he'll be back.

When Mingyur Rinpoche was about thirteen years old, he entered his first three-year retreat directed by his father. One of the things he really had to deal with was the frequency of his panic attacks, which came upon him when he thought of going to meditate, because he knew he didn't have anything else to protect him. He would just be there with the fear. So he just had to work with it, and his father encouraged him—his father was also a meditation teacher. His father just encouraged him to open to it and make friends with it. That was the advice he followed and eventually overcame the difficulty.

This is the key teaching in relating with fear: open to it and make friends with it. When fear arises, note that your reaction may be fear, but you want to try and shift into a relationship to it that is allowing and accepting.

Often when fear comes, it will encourage you to point your attention to where the fear is pointing. "I'm afraid of what's going to happen next week. I'm afraid of getting old. I'm afraid of dying. I'm afraid of a panic attack." Fear will point you in a bunch of different directions, and normally that's where the mind goes.

But in meditation, we don't want to go where it's pointing. We want to come right here into the fear. We want to be with the present moment experience of the fear and not get misled by where the thoughts are directing us.

In meditation terms, that being misled is called unwise attention. Unwise attention means placing our attention where it's not going to be helpful. And you'll see this happens with all the afflictive emotions. They tend to lead us to place our attention somewhere it's not helpful—past or future, something situational. The proper place for our attention, the wise attention, is to come into the direct experience in that moment of the emotion, in this case, of fear.

So we bring our attention fully into the present moment and let ourselves feel the fear, all the time working to open to it with an allowing and accepting attitude.

As we start to form a relationship with fear and other difficult emotions, we want to look at the fact that they are made up of, from a meditation point of view, three components: body sensations, mood, and thoughts. And we need to make our relationship with each of these pieces more or less independently, because they're all separate aspects of the phenomena.

So with fear, with all difficult emotions, the best place to start is the body sensation. When fear arises, how does it feel in the body? Bring your attention to that and just feel it. There's a contraction, maybe in the abdomen. The heart rate may increase. Under the arms feel sweaty. There's maybe a lightness or a vibration through the whole body as though you can't find a ground or any place solid to be. Maybe the breathing gets a little rapid and shallow when fear is strong.

Let yourself just feel those sensations. They won't be pleasant. And then ask yourself: can I bear them? Can I bear it?

What fear is sort of telling you is something bad is about to happen—meaning something like, maybe you can bear this moment, but in the next moment, something really unbearable is going to happen to you. So that's the tenor of the thinking that's going on, the thoughts that are coming.

The sensations, as we land in them, we find out they're bearable. And so even though the thoughts are saying the next moment's not going to be bearable, what we find as we come into the body is this I can bear. It's not pleasant, and at first it may not seem like I can, but I can. I am. I have. I'm doing it. It's happened before. I've gotten through it. I've survived. I've borne up with these sensations before. So we start to trust: I can bear this.

Then we start to examine them and we see they're unpleasant, but I can be with them. This is a huge step—being with the sensations of the difficult emotion. That opens the door for us to accept the experience.

Then we look at the mood. This is not so easy to locate, but every emotion has a flavor—a flavor in the mind, you might say. Let's say you meet an emotion in a dream and you're not so in touch with the body, but you know the flavor of happiness is one way. The flavor of sorrow is another way. The flavor of love is a different way. And the flavor of fear just in the mind is a different way.

So feel what that mood—I'd call that the mood of fear—is. It's just a mental thing. What's that flavor in the mind? Get familiar with that. It's also not pleasant.

When I came to really be able to feel it clearly, what it seemed to me it was saying was: run away, run away. It's not safe here. Get out, get out. So that was what I just tried to relate to and move to accept and allow.

And then the thoughts—start to notice that all the thoughts in some way or another are saying something bad is going to happen or something bad is about to happen. But that's just a figment of our imagination. That's just like looking at the drawing of the tiger and getting worried. It doesn't mean that it's true.

So we start to see: I can be with the sensations, I can be with the mood, I can be with the thoughts. All of them are basically okay. So that provides the foundation for us to be able to say, okay, let me open to this and really accept it. Really accept it.

We see that it goes on for a while and then it passes away. This is really important and really helpful to see. Any emotion that comes to you during this retreat is going to come, it's going to last for a while, and it's going to pass away. Have you had any emotions here that have lasted more than about a day? It's rare. I'll put it that way. It's rare. They come, they last a while, they pass away.

And we start to see these emotions are just like weather. Some clouds come, they cover the sun, then they pass, it's clear again. Rain comes, sprinkles a few drops, seems gloomy, it goes away. Clouds are back. Clouds pass, it's nighttime, the stars are out. Emotions are just like that. They come, they cast their influence for a while, and they pass through. They will exhibit their impermanence if we let them, just like everything does.

This is why you don't really have to worry about emotions and why you don't have to push them away. By just not doing anything, they're going to go. Now, there is a way that you can make them last longer: reach out, take hold of them, tussle about them, think about them, think of all the things that could happen, why this is such a terrible experience to have on your precious meditation retreat, and dwell on that for a long time. Then you can extend their life. But if you don't do that, they will come, they will express, and they will pass. They'll all pass if you let them pass.

We start to see that fear doesn't mean anything. It doesn't mean that something bad is going to happen. Wanting doesn't mean anything. It doesn't mean that I have to have that or my life will be miserable. Sadness doesn't mean anything. It doesn't mean that I'm destined to be depressed forever because I lost something. All these emotions are rich. They have their place in human life, but they don't have the meaning we attribute to them when we think that they're so threatening and so difficult.

As we start to accommodate the fear, it loses its power over us. And that power is lost through our full acceptance of it. I got tested on this because one of my teachers said, "If you really accept it, it's okay if it lasts the rest of your life." And so I checked out my fear. I said, "Would I be okay if this lasted the rest of my life?" The answer was really easy: No way. Absolutely not.

So I had to live with that for a while. Why not? Why couldn't I let this last the rest of my life? And the answer that came when I looked into it was: I'd lose some of the things I really enjoy. I couldn't open to a sunset the way I had. I couldn't sort of merge with nature the way I did sometimes. I couldn't get so blissed out with music the way I was used to. If fear was present, it would create a barrier.

So I clung onto that for a while. And then the fear continued. And I thought, okay, do I really want to hold out the possibility of future bliss at the price of present conflict and disturbance of peace? Or could I try giving that up and finding peace now?

So I gave that up and said, "Okay, if this is going to last the rest of my life, I'm going to be okay with this." And I found that okayness—I really meant it. At that point, the fear kind of shrank and almost rotted away. I could see that in that full acceptance, I had somehow broken its back. It was my resistance that was continuing to feed it energy and sustain it as such a threatening force. When I just said, "Okay, you can have me for the rest of my life, you got it," and gave up, it just kind of wilted.

I practiced for quite a while after that and was completely easy about fear. If it came, that was fine. If it didn't come, that was fine. It really didn't matter to me one way or the other. That kind of equanimity and openness shifted something fundamentally in my relationship to fear. It broke some hold, some grip that it had in my mind.

Fear has come many times since then, and I've suffered with it on occasion, but I don't suffer with it for long. I haven't ended my life yet, so that story could change between now and the end. It's not easy getting old and ill and dying. But so far, fear has never had that kind of grip again. Fear is a living thing—it still comes sometimes—but I feel very confident in my ability to work with it and open to it when it arises.

I think this is the promise of opening to these emotions: they lose their power to intimidate us. We develop this confidence that anything that comes to me, I know how to work with. If you really know to the very bottom how to work with one emotion, you've learned the secret for working with all of them. Whatever comes, you've got the skill through your practice and through your wisdom, through your awareness, to learn how to open to it, work with it, accept it, and not be overwhelmed by it. You find a refuge through understanding and through mindfulness to create a healthy relationship with any emotion that arises.

This is really the way I now understand fearlessness. It's not that fear never arises, but rather there's confidence that when it arises, one has the capability to work with it.

This is from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche: "True fearlessness is not the absence of fear, but going beyond fear. When we relax with our fear, we find sadness, which is calm and gentle. Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. It comes from letting the world tickle your heart, your raw and beautiful heart. You're willing to open up. You're willing to share your heart with others."

Let's just sit for a minute and let these words settle: Real fearlessness is the product of tenderness. It comes from letting the world tickle your heart, your raw and beautiful heart.

CHAPTER 52

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as a profound method for understanding the doctrine of not-self (anatta). Drawing from classical suttas, Armstrong explains how the Buddha analyzed human experience into five components: form (rūpa), feeling tone (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). He contrasts this with our conventional sense of a solid, controlling self, showing how this analysis reveals that what we call "I" is actually a collection of natural processes arising according to causes and conditions.
>
> The talk addresses contemporary Western culture's emphasis on self-aggrandizement and explains how understanding the aggregates can free us from the burden of trying to control what is beyond our control. Armstrong shares personal insights from his sister's death and how the aggregate teaching helped him understand the mystery of death and rebirth. He provides practical meditation guidance for investigating these five aspects of experience directly, emphasizing that this is not merely intellectual understanding but experiential insight that leads to disenchantment, dispassion, and liberation. The teaching concludes with the liberating realization: "No self, no problem."

The title of the talk tonight is The Five Aggregates Are Not Self.

It seems in the West today that the concern for the self has risen to a greater level than I've ever seen in my lifetime. I want to say that I accept present company from this general observation. I don't really mean you all when I point to this phenomenon because this practice doesn't lead to immediate selfish gratification. You may have noticed that. This practice tends to frustrate self-centered desire on a regular basis. So you wouldn't be here if you were looking for a quick hit or a promotion of the self.

In fact, I feel most of the meditators I talk to have a very strong altruistic motivation in their practice. For most of you, I think there's a recognition this practice is not just about yourself, but it's bringing clarity and warmth into our own being so that we can take that out into the world and affect many people's lives for the better. So I think we are a fortunate group together for these six weeks or three months, quite a special group of people.

But in the world in general, things seem to be going in a little different direction. One of the reasons for this, I think, is that the role of families and the role of communities is getting weaker in Western culture by and large today. What that does is it leaves individuals more alone and isolated in a way that we didn't used to be. It seems like when people can't locate themselves in a larger context, either of family or of community, then the emphasis on the self correspondingly gets bigger and more important. Without family and without community, the opportunities for service become much more limited and the need for morality even becomes less obvious. We don't see the ramifications of our actions so easily.

The internet has helped to promote some of this weakening, I think, of our culture. I'm thinking of websites like the one that tries to connect people who are looking to be adulterers that had something like 37 million registered users when it was hacked this summer. That's a very high proportion of the people in North America who were looking to have an extramarital affair. It's kind of shocking.

The internet also offers a lot of opportunity for self-aggrandizement. So many people want to just increase the number of viewers on their YouTube channel or the number of followers on their Twitter feed. Fame becomes an end in itself. People no longer want to be famous for doing something. They just want to be famous for being famous. I don't remember this happening when I was young, but it's happening a lot today.

For example, in 1976, there was a survey that asked people to list their life goals. Fame came in at number 15 out of 16 possible goals. Thirty years later in 2007, a survey was taken about people's principle ambitions. 51% of the people said that fame was one of their principle ambitions. Being famous was something they wanted.

So the self is a big deal. Its wants and needs and hopes and plans can become paramount, can seem to mean everything. Even for us at our level of understanding and given altruistic motivation, still our decisions, our thoughts, our choices in life revolve mostly around me, myself, and I. The "I" is the center for most of us as human beings.

But what's interesting is, have you ever found it clearly? Have you ever found this thing called "I" in your life or in your meditation? William James, the philosopher and writer, had a nice comment on it. He said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." That's about as big as it gets.

In Dharma practice, we have the opportunity really to look into this question of the self and its concerns in some depth. In fact, we really are encouraged to do this because the overemphasis on self can bring so much confusion and suffering. Correspondingly, if we can see it more clearly, there's a huge opportunity for freedom in relation to it.

We might say a central question in meditation is exploring what do we mean by a self? What is the nature of the "I"? Is there in fact a self? What is the real understanding of it? What are the implications if we believe there's a self? And how does it feel when that is not our central belief?

I like this statement by Nisargadatta Maharaj, who was a great teacher in India who died I think in the 1990s. He said, "All yogas have only one aim, to save you from the calamity of separate existence." This is the aim of our practice also, to save us all from the calamity of separate existence.

This inquiry into self is not primarily an intellectual exercise. It's not about thinking ourselves through the question of self or "I." We introduce concepts, of course, so that those start to go in and hopefully loosen some of the solidity that we normally attribute to "I" or self. But the main form of insight has to come from our direct experience.

It doesn't come from thinking about this stuff.

So in the talk this evening, I really just want to plant some seeds. Over time, as these seeds settle, the hope is that they will flourish into insight under the conditions of some stillness and mindfulness. It's really the combination of the initial turning to investigation, as Andrea talked about last night, but to meet that from a place of some steadiness of mind and some interest in investigation.

So because of that, I don't want you to strain your brains too much tonight in trying to figure this stuff out. It's not really helpful. And when you go away, I don't want you to stay up all night either trying to figure it out. Please leave, do your walking, do your sitting, go to bed, have a good night's sleep. And let the words that make sense to you go in, resonate, and gestate. They can take seed and sprout later.

So let's start with what's kind of obvious. We are all individual beings and the discussion or pointing to not-self doesn't change that. It doesn't try to argue against our individuality. We each had a certain course in life. We have a journey from birth to death. Our bodies are clearly separate. Our mind streams are unique. So we're not trying to merge ourselves into some cosmic oneness. The individuality is true and there are laws that govern our individuality. Laws of genetics and psychology and karma that are all based on this understanding of individuality—an existence of some form that is accurate.

But we could say that this is kind of the ordinary understanding of what beings are. And in that way, it's a conventional form of truth. But there is truth in the conventional understanding. So we're not trying to deny that altogether, but we want to understand it more subtly and in a more nuanced way, because there's more to it than the conventional understanding.

So Suzuki Roshi has this nice comment. He was talking about this question. He said, "Of course, the bird that we see and hear exists. It exists, but what you mean by that may not exactly be what I mean by that." So this is what we want to understand. In what way do we exist? In what way do we not exist as conventionally understood? Because there's something true and there's something that's not true in the conventional understanding.

We can start to question this sense of self by looking into some of the logic in the way we use words. So we take a look at the way we use "I," and I'm not sure that it really hangs together all that well. Let me give you an example.

If I ask, "How old are you?" the answer is pretty simple, right? Not a trick question. You might say I'm 35 or I'm 64 or whatever it is—comes easily. We all understand what that means. But all that really means is the body is 35 or 64, right? The thought you're having right now, is that 35 years old? The mood you're feeling right now, is that 64 years old? No, we mean the body came out of the womb 35, 64 years ago. So here, when we're using the word "I," we mean the same as the body. "I'm 35" means the body is 35, so I equals body.

But if I ask you, "What color are your eyes?" and you'd say they're blue or brown or hazel. Then you say, "My eyes are brown." But now we're not pointing to me as the body, but now they're my eyes. It's my body. So I am now the owner of the body. So that implies something separate from the body that owns it. And this is kind of a usual feeling, isn't it? That this is my body, that I possess it.

So which is it? Are you the body? Or are you something separate that possesses the body?

Looking more closely at this analysis, we might ask ourselves: can you really be both? Are these seemingly contradictory experiences of selfhood all somehow simultaneously true?

We can explore this same paradox with emotions. When I ask how you're feeling, you might respond, "I'm happy" or "I'm sad." Here there's a complete identification of the "I" with the emotional state—happiness or sadness becomes who you are in that moment.

But we also speak naturally of "my joys and my sorrows," "my feelings." Suddenly the "I" appears as someone standing apart from these emotions, possessing them as objects. So which is accurate? Are you the emotion itself, or are you the one who owns and experiences it? Can both perspectives be true simultaneously?

There's another sense of self that I find quite common—perhaps you recognize it in your own experience. It's the feeling that there's a being residing somewhere in the middle of the head, located perhaps a couple of inches back from the eyes and between the ears, perched on a little throne and gazing out at the world. This inner observer experiences everything that arrives through the sense doors, somehow central to all experience yet maintaining a certain independence from it.

If you've seen Woody Allen's film "Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex," you might remember Tony Randall's character—he played precisely this being, the command and control center in the brain directing all the body's activities. This captures something many of us feel: that we're the observer at the center of experience, stable and separate from the constantly changing phenomena flowing through awareness.

So here we have five different ways we might understand or experience this word "I"—and I'm not convinced they can all be true simultaneously. There seem to be some fundamental contradictions between these various self-concepts.

The Buddha expressed this perplexity beautifully: "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." One of my teachers put it even more directly—he said simply, "Everything you think is wrong."

I invite us to hold that as a genuine possibility: perhaps everything we think about the self is fundamentally mistaken. This reminds me of something I heard recently on a talk show, where someone remarked, "Ah yes, the mind—often wrong, seldom in doubt." This observation feels particularly relevant as we investigate the nature of selfhood. We rarely perceive our own inaccuracy, which is precisely what teachers mean when they speak of delusion.

Given this predicament, it might prove illuminating to consider how the Buddha actually saw human beings. As someone of remarkable clarity and insight, his perspective could offer us a different lens through which to examine our experience.

There's a fascinating passage in the Visuddhimagga, a sixth-century text from Sri Lanka that compiled the meditation techniques and insights available at that time—already nearly a thousand years after the Buddha's life, when considerable wisdom had accumulated. Written by the monk Buddhaghosa, a renowned commentator who synthesized the available teachings, this text offers a striking analogy.

The Visuddhimagga suggests that investigating what a person really is resembles the work of a skilled butcher who has expertly carved many carcasses. Such a craftsman, when preparing beef for sale, doesn't continue thinking "cow, cow, cow" as he works. Instead, his trained perception recognizes the distinct cuts—rump, sirloin, tenderloin, ribs.

Similarly, the text explains, someone skilled in understanding mind and body doesn't examine experience while thinking "person, person, person." Rather, clear seeing reveals the various components that constitute what we call a human being.

The Buddha typically described these components through two complementary models covering the same territory but approaching it from different angles. Let me share one of his fundamental analyses.

"Bhikkhus," he said, "what is the totality of life?" What a profound question to pose! "Listen carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and touches, the mind and mental objects. Anyone who claimed to describe anything beyond this as the totality of life would not be speaking of something they actually knew."

These are, as you'll recognize, the six senses—the five physical sense organs along with their objects, plus the mind as the sixth sense.

I find this description remarkable. First, notice its boldness—who else would dare to define the totality of life so definitively?

I don't think Einstein tried that. I don't think Marx tried that. I don't think Freud tried that. But 2,600 years ago, the Buddha did it. And can you argue with it? It includes everything, doesn't it? It includes it all.

This is a map that applies really well to our meditation because what we're often doing in the meditation instructions—and as you carry them out—is looking at our direct sense experience. Sight, sound, sensations in the body, smells and tastes when those are happening. Thoughts and emotions are the principal mind objects that we include. So this is a really good list for meditation instructions. We rely on it a lot. It's very helpful.

The Buddha used this map primarily to cut through craving. He would point out how we get attached to pleasant experiences at the six sense doors, and then how to see that attachment and how to cut it.

But there's another map that he used, I would say just about as often in the discourses, and this map is called the Five Aggregates. It covers the same terrain in that it also includes everything that's in our direct experience, but it divides it up differently. We'll go into that in a little bit of detail.

But the interesting thing to me is that the way he used the five aggregates was mainly to cut through a misunderstanding of what constitutes the self. So you could say he used the six senses largely to cut through craving. He used the five aggregates to cut through wrong view.

So this is the map that we want to explore tonight. Learning to see ourselves according to this second map is really, really helpful because it leads us into seeing the way the Buddha saw, which is without the confusion or the falseness of the sense of self. So that's why it's useful to start to explore and to look at it in our own experience. It's also not an intellectual exercise. It's primarily experiential.

And it came very alive for me at a time when my older sister died. She was five years older than me and she died when she was 51. So I guess I was 46. It had a lot of impact on me because it came suddenly and unexpectedly. She had a chronic condition, but she was nowhere near dying. There was no hint that that might happen to her. And then I got a call: your sister has passed away.

It happened at home. One of her sons was with her. She lost consciousness. They called the medics. They rushed her to the hospital, but she never revived to consciousness and died that evening. And we were pretty close, so it had a real impact on me.

I couldn't understand where she had gone. We'd had a phone call the week before, catching up on news. She had a kind of a big personality and she was a statement in the world, my sister. And so to have her go, it was bewildering. I couldn't understand how somebody that big had just gone.

The only way that I could resolve it for myself was by understanding the five aggregates and how they had been put together to make her up. And then what happens when the aggregates fall apart or break up at death? And it was that inquiry that helped me understand—you know, what happens at death, to some extent, limited extent, but to some extent, what happens at death. So I hope this will also help explain some of that. The mystery, really, of living and dying.

The Pali term for an aggregate is khandha. The Sanskrit term is skandha, so you might hear either of these in Buddhist writings. And khandha is an ordinary word in Pali. It's not a spiritual word particularly. It just means a heap or a bundle. So if you went out and gathered a bunch of kindling to start a fire, you could call that a khandha of firewood or kindling.

When we put it in English and we call it aggregate, that sounds very technical to me. It reminds me of some paving mixture that gets spread on the road when they resurface the thing. A little too scientific. So what I like better is to call it the five kinds of stuff.

So there are these five kinds of stuff that make us up, and that's what we want to go through. They are material form—you can simply call it matter—feeling tone, perceptions, formations, and consciousness. I want to go through this list and explain each one in a little detail, so we'll come to understand what a meditator can see as we are, let's say, disassembled.

Form is the first one; the Pali word is rupa. This word rupa is sometimes used to mean body—like the statue behind me is sometimes called a Buddha rupa, the form of the Buddha or the body of the Buddha. But the word rupa is wider than just body. Actually, the word for body in Pali is kaya. So rupa means something bigger than that.

Let me read you the definition from a sutta: "Any kind of material form whatever, whether past, future, or present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—this is the material form aggregate of rupa." So it means all physical nature. It means this body, but also all the matter that's outside this body. And not only the matter—internal or external, near or far—it also means all the interactions among matter.

So when you put a piece of veggie burger on your tongue, the taste that comes from that is also rupa. When you're leaning over the Swiss chard, the smell that comes up and touches your nose is also rupa. So rupa is the world of matter and the interactions. Sight, sound, smell, taste, touch are all different forms of rupa. This first aggregate covers the whole physical world. That's a big space.

For example, we take this physical thing and strike this physical thing. That sound that comes out is in the area of rupa. The sound is an aspect of form, the first aggregate. So you might sort of infer from this—the other four aggregates must be mental, and they are. If you're looking for a complete description of mentality from a Buddhist point of view, the four aggregates is a very good description of what makes up mentality.

The second aggregate is feeling tone. The Pali term is vedanā. I think we've talked about this quite a bit—we introduced it in the instructions. It's the quality in every type of sense contact that it's either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Vedanā forms the second foundation of mindfulness. Sally talked about the body as being the first foundation. Vedanā is the second. And this points to the importance of this factor in the whole of the Buddha's teachings.

Why is this quality of vedanā given such importance—second aggregate, second foundation of mindfulness, very central? The reason is that it forms the basis for reactive formations of mind. Greed, aversion, and delusion arise based on feeling tone being pleasant, unpleasant, or neither. So a pleasant feeling tone—the habitual reaction to that is greed. An unpleasant feeling tone—the habitual reaction is aversion. And the neutral feeling tone—the habitual reaction is delusion, sort of overlooking or not caring about.

When one hears the sound of the bell, generally that's experienced as pleasant, isn't it? The tone is chosen to be pleasant, the striker to be pleasant, but more especially because the sitting's over. So that has quite a pleasant feeling tone.

When we first start to tune into feeling tone, we tend to think that it's intrinsic to the object—that the sense object has an innate quality of being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. But that's not the case. If that were the case, feeling tone could be part of matter. The feeling tone, though, is not intrinsic to the sound. It's really about how the sound lands in your mind. And it's ultimately your mind that determines whether it gets interpreted or received as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither.

Simple example: some people like the taste of beets. I don't. Beets taste to me like dirt. So that's not experienced as a pleasant form of rupa to me.

Another example, and this is quite amusing: there was a 7-Eleven in Southern California where drug dealing was taking place in the parking lot.

And this was disconcerting to the manager of the store because when drugs were being dealt, other customers didn't feel comfortable parking and coming into the store. So he would ask them to leave, and they wouldn't. He'd ask the police to come, and they'd run away for half an hour, and then they'd be back. And so he had to figure out a different strategy.

So he thought, "I'll play some music." The music he chose to play was Mantovani. I don't know if you remember Mantovani. He was a composer from the 1950s who had these very lush accompaniments to movie scores—swelling strings that were very melodic and sentimental. So he put Mantovani on and blasted it through the store's loudspeakers. The drug dealers couldn't stand it, so they all cleared out.

My mother was a great fan of Mantovani. She found it very pleasant. They didn't. So the feeling tone is not in the thing—it's in our mind receiving it.

Ajahn Sucitto, who we've mentioned a few times, talks about feeling almost as a verb, how the mind kind of feels into the sense contact to determine whether it's going to be interpreted as pleasant, unpleasant, or neither.

Another thing that's interesting is you'll find that the feeling tone of some sense experiences changes depending on your meditative state of mind. So when you're first settling into a meditation and there's some pressure on the seat or pressure in the knee, that's easily experienced as unpleasant. As the mind settles more—let's say concentration strengthens and equanimity is stronger—the exact same sensation can be experienced as neither pleasant nor unpleasant. It's quite interesting. So you can explore that. The feeling tone can change for each of us.

The third aggregate is called perception. The Pali term is saññā. This means something a little different in Buddhism than normal perception in Western language, philosophical or psychological. Often Western language interprets or defines perception as the sense contact itself. So it would talk about the perception meaning the sound or perception meaning the sight. But in Buddhism it's not the bare sense contact—it's the recognition of it, and recognition in terms of what we already know, or we could say in terms of memory.

So for example, as you look around the room, typically you can pick out objects. There are people and shawls and cushions and chairs and floors and a bell and flowers and statues. So as you look around the room, you're identifying different things that are in the visual field. It's that categorization that is the perception.

The visual field is really just form and color, isn't it? Sometimes you can see this better by closing one eye. You take the two dimensions out and mostly what you see are just patches or shapes with certain colors. But we've learned to interpret them as specific objects—people or chairs or whatever. But what's interesting is it's become so automatic we don't realize that this categorization is something we've learned how to do. We did it so young, and we've done it for so long, we've lost track of that. And so we tend to look around the room and think the visual field is made up of different objects. It's not like that. The visual field is made up of patches of form with color, but we've interpreted them.

So this is an interesting story from Oliver Sacks, the neurologist, and you know how he really was so great at identifying places in human experience that were a little outside the norm and using that to shed light on our normal experience. So he was attending to a man, a man whose name was Virgil, who had lost his sight when very, very young, probably in infancy. Virgil had met a surgeon who was able to do an operation on his eyes that restored his sight. And when this happened, Virgil was, I think, in his forties. So he had been blind for probably forty years or so, and then had this operation, and the family and the doctors were all gathered around his bedside in order to remove the bandages after the surgery.

So the bandages were peeled away and everybody was waiting expectantly, like Virgil was going to go, "Wow, this is so fantastic, I can see again." But that didn't happen. In fact, as Sacks describes it, Virgil seemed to be staring blankly, bewildered, without focusing at the surgeon who stood before him still holding the bandages. Only when the surgeon spoke—saying, "Well?"—did a look of recognition cross Virgil's face.

Virgil told him later that in this first moment he had no idea what he was seeing. There was light, there was movement, there was color, all mixed up, all meaningless, a blur. Then out of the blur came a voice that said, "Well." Then and only then, he said, did he finally realize that this chaos of light and shadow was a face, and indeed the face of his surgeon.

So what had happened is that his ability to perceive had not formed because he had lost his sight too young. And that part of the brain that puts it all together didn't develop as a normal person's would.

So when he came back to seeing in his 40s, he had not learned how to make sense of the patches of form and color. As the years went by, he developed more ability and could function well in a simple environment where he had learned to identify the components. But he was not at ease. He was never at ease again going out into the street or the wider world or really unfamiliar places. Some of that wiring of perception never quite got completed again for him.

We are perceiving all the time. It's happening more or less automatically. We tend not to notice it, but we can start to tune into it. Normally we do that when something unusual happens, but we can tune into it any time we start to notice a thing—something standing out from the visual field that we single out and identify.

Another thing to take in about perception is that it involves categorization into familiar objects, but it also carries with it some kind of meaning or association, a kind of emotional tone. For instance, if I say to you the word "car," it probably doesn't evoke a big emotional response. For me anyway, the word car has fairly neutral associations.

But what if I say to you the word "Prius" or "electric vehicle"? Do you get a nice glow out of that? I do. I love the environmental consciousness behind the Prius and behind electric vehicles. I think, "Oh, these are trying to save the planet, and people who drive them are really trying to make a contribution to environmental well-being." I don't think all those thoughts when I see a Prius, but I just feel warmly about Priuses—or Prii, if that's what the plural is.

Similarly, when I see a Ferrari going down the road, I may experience a touch of envy, but mostly I think about, "Do they really need twelve cylinders on a suburban street? And isn't that a little damaging to the environment?" So I have a different emotional response just on seeing a Ferrari. I hope none of you own Ferraris—I haven't offended anyone. I didn't see any in the parking lot.

Very simply, we have these immediate responses to things that we've known well. Think about a friend. When you perceive a friend, there's a whole emotional tone that comes just in the moment of recognition. Or your child, or a mother, or father, or your partner. Perception often carries with it real connection and meaning and flavor for us.

Sometimes if we just stay with the label in which we've put a thing, we don't see it so clearly. We have an unpleasant sensation and we label it "pain"—the very label of pain can prevent us from going back in and feeling what exactly is that sensation. The name can block the direct experience of what's actually happening.

Another example: Take this thing. Normally we think this is a bell, but I've known some monks whose begging bowls were about this size and it made quite a good meal receptacle. Or we could imagine taking it out and using it as a nice little chapeau atop some statue. Wouldn't this be a cute cap for a rather larger figure? It could be that. It could also be a great planter, couldn't it? Wouldn't it be nice to have a little Bodhi tree in here, up on the platform?

So if we just think it's a bell, we're missing something about it. We're not really seeing its thusness, you could call it, or its suchness. In Zen, this is a kind of common koan: "What is this? If you call it a stick, I will hit you. But if you say it's not a stick, I will hit you too. What is it?"

What I got from that is that if I went to Zen a lot, I was going to get hit. That was partly why I chose vipassana.

There's another story about perception and seeing the thing as it is and not getting lost in concepts. Back in the late seventies, some friends of ours in Cambridge understood that there were two masters in town from different Buddhist traditions. One was Sansanim, a Korean Zen master—very wise, very powerful. The other was Kalu Rinpoche, one of the most respected Kagyu masters of our lifetimes. They thought it would be very interesting to bring them together. They rather imagined that these two masters would sort of just immediately recognize each other's enlightened nature and kind of dissolve into the bliss of emptiness together.

So they brought them over for tea.

And they thought it would be very interesting to bring them together. They rather imagined that these two masters would just immediately recognize each other's enlightened nature and dissolve into the bliss of emptiness together. So they brought them over for tea and thought they would engage in some deep conversation. Each had a translator.

Sansanim took the first step. He picked up an orange off the plate, held it out to Kalu Rinpoche, and said, "What is this?"

Kalu Rinpoche just sat there quietly doing his beads, his mala, probably just reciting some mantra. He didn't reply.

So Sansanim thought he was missing it, and he held it out again and said, "What is this?"

Kalu turned and said something to his translator, and the translator said, "Don't they have oranges in Korea?"

This is a little bit of cross-cultural missing, which is easy to do.

So when we're sitting and we hear that sound, we recognize that's the bell. We recognize it is the bell to end a sitting. That's our momentary, immediate perception. It doesn't require thought. It just happens by itself. That's the third aggregate.

The fourth aggregate is called volitional formations. The Pali term is sankara. These are sometimes also translated as mental formations. This is the whole world we've been exploring—we could call it objects of mind: thoughts and emotions, moods, mind states. As such, it includes the refined states of meditation. Mindfulness, concentration, calm, equanimity, loving-kindness, compassion are all in here, as well as the hindrances and the difficult emotions and the beautiful emotions. They're all in this realm of mental formations, sankaras.

They're sometimes also called karmic formations because when you look closely, the way we form these objects of mind, they're coming out of some underlying intention. Desire is expressing an intention—often an intention to draw closer. Aversion is expressing an intention to push away or move away. Loving-kindness is expressing an intention toward someone's welfare. Compassion expresses an intention toward easing someone's suffering.

Even the beautiful states of meditation—simple things like calm, investigation, concentration—are expressing an intention because they have been developed by repeated effort for the most part. There has been an intention in us to sustain wholesome states. So they are also volitional. Their strength in us is the result of our own effort and volition and will.

For instance, when hearing the sound of the bell, there's often a sense of relaxation. Sitting's over. I don't know if you've noticed this, but sometimes when the bell rings, I think, "Oh, now I could sit forever." As soon as it's over, it gets really easy, doesn't it? That sense of ease and even the thought, "Oh, now I can sit for a long time"—those are both volitional formations in response to the sound.

The fifth aggregate is the most subtle and really interesting one. I love the way the Buddha explained this quality. In English, we translate it as consciousness. It has a very precise meaning in the Buddhist teachings, more precise than in the West, where it's more general. In Buddhism, the Pali word used is vijnana.

It is the mental faculty in every moment of our experience that holds the sense object. It's so fascinating to find this in our experience. Everything that's happening to us—hearing the bell, knowing the feeling tone, knowing the mood that comes with it, recognizing it as a sound—that's being known to consciousness because we are sentient beings. What sentience means is this quality that has experience, that knows experience.

This is not an intellectual knowing; it's the most bare form of cognizing a sense experience. As soon as there's hearing, there is consciousness in that hearing. If we were asleep, the sound might be there, but the knowing of it, the consciousness wouldn't be.

You know that old riddle: if a tree falls in the forest and there's no one around, does it make a sound? The answer is it depends how you define sound. If you just mean the vibration of the air, if you call that a sound, then there is a sound.

But if you mean the conscious experience of hearing, no. There is nobody conscious there to bring that sound into human experience.

So consciousness is just that simple revealing or holding or receiving of sense data. It's happening all the time that we're awake. It happens very automatically. You can't turn it off. Sometimes you may wish that you could, right? The sitting's gone on a long time. Mind's all over the place. There's unpleasant sensation in the body. "I wish I could just stop experiencing." But we can't. As long as we're awake, consciousness is doing its job, which is revealing data at the six senses. That's just happening.

So that's what brings this ongoing contact with pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experience. It's said, as the Buddha explained it, that there's a separate sense consciousness for each of the six senses. So there's eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, and so forth. But essentially, the knowing is very similar, though it acts through the six sense doors. So this is a fun thing to investigate in practice.

The way I understand it is that in an experience like this, the sound and the consciousness come up together. They can't really be broken apart in your direct experience. In other words, the sound comes with the knowing of it. But you can separate—you can discriminate or differentiate these two aspects of what's going on in your experience.

So every sense experience for a human being arises with consciousness, but you can start to feel out what's the sense object and what's the knowing of it. It's a relationship almost like the object is being held in the consciousness, in the knowing.

Now that may sound a little odd—there's one experience, but it's got two aspects—but it's not that odd. When you look at the bell from the side, is it round or is it black? Round or black? It's both, isn't it? There's just one circle here, but it's got two aspects. You can either look at the form of it or you can look at the color. So similarly, when you hear a sound, you can either tune into the quality of sound or you can tune into your own knowing of it. And this is something that you can actually explore and feel in your meditation practice.

It's actually the consciousness that knows the sound, the feeling tone, the recognition, the mood, and the thought connected with hearing the sound of the bell.

Okay, so this is the list: form, including the matter and all the physical senses; feeling tone; perception; mental formations; and consciousness or knowing.

Is it kind of a funny list? I found this kind of a funny list when I first started to work with it. I think the funniest thing about it for me was that matter made sense, mental formations made sense, consciousness made sense—but why were feeling and perception tossed in and separated out as important as body, mind objects, and consciousness? That didn't quite make sense to me.

But what's interesting is when the Abhidhamma classifies our experience, they only put it into three categories, which is basically matter, mind objects—which they call cittasikas—and consciousness, which they call citta. So in the Abhidhamma model, they collapse feeling and perception into the fourth aggregate of mental formations. This kind of made more intuitive sense to me.

So if you want to think of your experience in terms of three aggregates, that's fine. So this talk could be the talk on the three aggregates. It works for me. But you can play with five or you can play with these three.

The important question is: does this list, whether it's five or three, include everything in your direct experience? This is something you can explore. If it does, then it's an exhaustive list. It's a good list for our purposes.

This list or this way of looking is freeing. When we start to understand it is very freeing.

Why is that?

Because there's nothing else here. There's only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. That's all there is to a human being.

What's missing? I. There's no I in the center that is looking at all this stuff. There's no I in the center that is separate from all this stuff. There's no I in the center that's owning any of this stuff. There is only form, feeling, perceptions, formations, and consciousness happening according to their own causes and conditions.

The beauty of this kind of seeing is it takes out the fiction of control. When we establish an I, it's like "queen me" or "king me" at the center of everything—we feel like it's our dominion. I should be in control of my body. I should be in control of my emotions. I should be in control of feelings. It's never worked because body, feelings, perceptions, formations, consciousness all have their own laws and causes and conditions.

Looking at the body particularly, how many times have we felt proud of our body? "Oh, I'm looking good today. Walking well today." Or on the other hand, how many times have we felt embarrassed about our body? Too big or too small? Too thin or too heavy? Too narrow or too broad? But did we have anything to do with that basic makeup? We take so much either pride or embarrassment about it. Was it our fault? Did you have anything to do with constructing the overall form of body? Whether you're tall or short, or whether your hair is curly or straight, or whether your bones are broad or narrow?

No. You know what happened. Father's sperm met mother's egg. They joined. They divided and multiplied. At a certain point, that form emerged from the womb. It was nourished by milk and water and air and light and food over years and years and years. And this is the outcome. It's a purely physical thing that has done its own thing. We've been along for the ride, you might say, but we didn't have any control over it. Why? Because it's just part of physical nature. It's not mine. It's not yours. It's just part of nature.

As such, our bodies are not very different. The differences between our bodies are really, really small compared to the similarities. Any level you look on—from DNA up to comparing side by side—we all have the same basic components.

This is from Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of my teachers in Thailand. He said, "This body came out of nature, it's part of nature, and it never departed from nature. It belongs to nature, so give it back. That will be a big relief for you."

This is the way we understand all the aggregates. The body is part of physical nature. Emotions are part of human nature. Consciousness is part of a bigger nature than that—every sentient being has this factor of consciousness. We're united with the creatures in this way. Our emotions are part of human nature. Consciousness is part of all nature, all sentient nature.

So the Buddha said, "Therefore all form should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom thus: this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself."

And similarly for feeling, perception, formations and consciousness. But so often we claim it, don't we? We think "this is mine," or "I am this," or "this is myself." That's what gets us into trouble. That's not clear seeing.

When we see clearly, the Buddha said, the instructed noble disciple becomes disenchanted with form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. Why become disenchanted? Because they're all impermanent. None of them offer the possibility of lasting happiness.

So disenchanted doesn't mean we hate it, doesn't mean it's disgusting, doesn't mean we're averse to it. We just see, oh, it doesn't have the promise to bring me lasting happiness. So we kind of let go and stop looking there.

Being disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, one's mind is liberated. When it is liberated, one understands: birth is destroyed, the holy life has been lived, what had to be done has been done, there is no more renewal of being.

So this teaching on not-self goes deep. It is the way through understanding impermanence to let go of clinging through all the forms of sense experience to any of the five aggregates. And in that letting go, the mind rests, and in the deep resting and non-resistance becomes liberated.

In the shorter term, I'll just relate this quote from an old Sri Lankan monk. Jack Kornfield went to visit him, I think when Jack was still in robes. A very happy being, had been in robes a long time, just had a lot of joy. The monk wanted to check Jack out. So he said, "What's your understanding of the central teaching of Buddhism?"

And Jack said, "My understanding is there's no actual separate self within this mind-body process."

And the old monk just nodded and said, "No self, no problem." He just laughed and laughed.

So this is the message: when we understand properly, it's just causes and conditions. No self, no problem.

Let's just sit for a minute together. Therefore all should be seen as it really is with proper wisdom thus: This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 53

Seven Factors of Enlightenment

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive teaching on the bojjhaṅgas, the seven factors of enlightenment that the Buddha identified as essential qualities leading to liberation. Drawing from retreat experience and classical texts, he explains how these factors develop sequentially while reinforcing each other: sati (mindfulness) as the foundation, dhammavicaya (investigation of phenomena), vīriya (heroic energy), pīti (rapture), passaddhi (calm), samādhi (concentration), and upekkhā (equanimity).
>
> Armstrong illustrates how mindfulness awakens natural intelligence, leading to curious investigation of direct experience. This investigation generates heroic energy (vīriya) - not mere effort but the courage to transform reactivity into wisdom. As energy brightens the mind, rapture (pīti) arises as delight in the meditation process itself. This joy naturally settles into profound calm (passaddhi), where the mind discovers its natural peace. Deepening calm leads to the unification of samādhi, gathering the mind's scattered power. Finally, equanimity (upekkhā) develops as inner balance undisturbed by changing conditions.
>
> Using the metaphor of feeding beneficial mental states while starving hindrances, Armstrong shows how these factors create the optimal conditions for insight and potential awakening. He balances inspiration with practical guidance, explaining how to recognize, cultivate, and balance these factors in meditation practice, illustrated with stories from classical masters and contemporary teachers.

The talk tonight is on the seven factors of enlightenment.

There's a story you may be familiar with, as it became popular after 9/11—the story of the two wolves, which has been attributed to the Cherokee Nation, although I'm not quite sure of the exact source.

The story goes that a young boy was at school and one of his friends did something to him that was unkind and unfair. He came home quite stirred up, wondering how he should respond—whether he should get back at the person or try to work it out in friendship. He came to his grandfather, explained the situation, and asked what he should do.

The grandfather said, "Oh, I know what you're feeling exactly. This has happened to me many times. It is as though there are two wolves inside me. One is very angry and inclines easily to hatred, looking for vengeance. The other wolf is kind and patient and wants to live in harmony with everyone. These two struggle inside me many times, and both try to dominate my spirit."

The boy asks, "Grandfather, which one will win?"

And the grandfather replies, "The one that I feed."

I like this story because of its simple pointing to an important truth, and also because it really echoes the Buddha's language in working with our minds. The Buddha talked often about our meditation practice being directed towards starving the hindrances and feeding the factors of enlightenment.

We start to understand that through the tools we acquire—mindfulness, loving kindness, and wisdom—we gain the capacity to shape our own minds in the direction that we choose. This is an amazing thing. I never imagined when I was young that this was possible, that I could create my mind in the direction that I wanted it to go. But there are specific practices in our tradition to shape it for wisdom, for loving kindness, for energy, for compassion, for freedom—all the beautiful qualities that we seek. We have tools to build the mind in that direction.

We often don't know how far this development can go until we meet somebody who's really walked this path quite a long way. I think about the Indian teacher Dipa Ma. If you haven't encountered her teachings, she's someone I really recommend to you. There's a whole book on her teachings written by a sangha member, a former IMS staff person, called Dipa Ma.

Dipa Ma was teaching the three-month course one year. She was staying in the house across the street, and one of the notable things was that after she finished lunch, she would do walking meditation. She was not in a mode of "I'm retired because I'm all the way there." She was still a really ardent practitioner, but her being was so developed that she was very inspiring.

One day in a question and answer period, one of the yogis asked her, "What's in your mind?" Wouldn't that be interesting to ask someone really developed—what's in there? What's going on?

Dipa Ma said, "There are only three things in my mind: peace, concentration, and loving kindness."

That's a well-shaped mind. That's really beautiful, and that's the possibility of practice. We can shape our mind in that direction, and it's just a question of doing the work.

When we think about the lists of the Buddha—many lists describing difficult factors of mind, many lists describing beautiful factors of mind—for us as meditators, one of the most significant lists describing the difficulties is the list of the five hindrances. These are the qualities that the Buddha said obstruct wisdom and block the journey to awakening.

But on the other side, in the beautiful qualities, I think equally important for a meditator is understanding these seven factors of enlightenment, because they really become our great allies on this journey. Where the hindrances block the current to awakening, the seven factors move it forward. They are the forces that propel it.

This is from the Buddha: "Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future, all will do so by surmounting the five hindrances that weaken wisdom, by firmly establishing their minds in the four foundations of mindfulness, and by correctly developing the seven factors of enlightenment."

This is a very clear statement of the path. This is our task.

These seven factors are briefly: mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, calm, concentration, and equanimity. I'll talk about them each in some detail, but as an overview, they're called by this name because the Buddha said they lead to enlightenment—therefore they're called factors of enlightenment. That's pretty clear.

They're all described as maturing in release. Each of these factors, he described as maturing in release or liberation. That's where they go.

He compared them using an image of a kind of house that you see in New England a lot—one of these houses with a peaked roof, very common in this part of the country. If you go into the attic, you see how it's constructed. There are these beams or rafters that all go up to the center and support the roof. Many of these run in parallel to support the roof.

He said, "Just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline towards the roof peak, so too when a practitioner develops and cultivates the seven factors of enlightenment, she slants, slopes, and inclines to nibbana."

So as we develop these qualities, they're aiming in just one direction. Like the rafters that only point one way, these factors only point one way also.

At this point in the retreat, I am quite confident that all of you have had experiences of all these factors. You may not have noticed them when they went by. They may not have been of extremely long duration. But I want to talk about them tonight so that you can start to recognize them when they come. Because the first step in developing them is knowing when they're present, knowing what helps them arise, knowing what sustains them, and knowing how to develop them further.

So they lead in the direction of liberation, enlightenment, nibbana. They're also a description of the mind that is poised on the edge of enlightenment. When we develop and collect these factors together in the right balance, that mind is perfectly prepared for an opening into nibbana or the unconditioned. We can't by effort make that opening happen. We can't effort a moment of enlightenment. But what we can do is prepare the mind with these factors so that it is poised on the threshold.

In a way, you could say these factors, when they're brought together and balanced, describe an approximation in mundane terms of the tipping into enlightenment or nibbana. Either way, they're kind of our best attempt to reproduce or imitate this unconditioned element. They lead there; they approximate that state.

The factors have been described by the Buddha as being sequential—one leads to the next, leads to the next, and so on. That's how I'm going to organize the talk tonight, and I hope to show how that development happens naturally. But they also reinforce each other. So one that seems later down the list is also supportive of ones that come earlier. It's not like you have to develop only this one and only then develop the second and only then the third. They all can develop together. But I think understanding the sequence is helpful because it shows how meditation itself develops.

The first factor in the list is mindfulness. It starts the ball rolling. That's why we put so much emphasis on it from the first day. And it also serves to keep the factors in balance. Now, what does that mean, keeping them in balance?

After mindfulness, the next three factors are called arousing factors. They tend to bring up energy. These are the factors of investigation, energy, and rapture. The next three factors are pacifying factors. They lead to the development of calm. These are calm, concentration, and equanimity. Balance means that the three arousing factors are equally matched by the pacifying factors.

You know all the instructions we gave from day one about finding in your posture the balance of alertness and relaxation? This is really to find in the body the expression of these factors of enlightenment. The posture itself leads to the balancing of these factors of energetic awakeness and calm relaxation. Because it's when these really come together that the mind is best poised for insight.

I'd like to talk about all the factors a little bit, beginning with mindfulness. We've said a lot about mindfulness. I don't need to say very much more. But I want to say something that I hope might be helpful as you practice this quality and as you try to understand it.

There's been a lot written about mindfulness and sati and what it all means, and explanations can become very long to the point where I can't tell if I'm doing it right or not after I've read somebody else's definition. So I want to give you a really simple definition: Mindfulness is understanding what our experience is in this moment. And I honestly think that's enough. If you're in touch with the moment and you know what you're experiencing, mindfulness is happening—in the Buddha's vocabulary.

Some teachers will say, "Oh, it's only real mindfulness if there's no greed, aversion, or delusion." That's a very sweet form of mindfulness. That's a very developed form of mindfulness, but I don't think it's the only form of mindfulness. Very simply, when you know what your experience is, mindfulness is being activated. And then it grows and becomes refined.

What I base this on is the way the Satipatthana Sutta is expressed. Because in each of the sections on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the word "understands" is used again and again in this functional sense. The Buddha will say something like: the meditator understands, "I'm breathing in." They understand, "I'm breathing out." They understand, "I'm experiencing a pleasant feeling." They understand, "The mind is affected by lust," or "The mind is unaffected by lust."

In each case, the word used for "understand" is pajanati in Pali. So I take this as the functional definition of mindfulness: this understanding or knowing of our experience. Pajanati is related linguistically to the term for clear comprehension, sampajanya, which has an element of wisdom within it. This understanding of our experience is enough to get the ball of meditation rolling.

When we become mindful, we start to notice things. We see more about our direct experience, and then we become interested. We become curious. Why? Because there is this native intelligence that mindfulness wakes up. Mindfulness brings out this natural interest and wisdom or intelligence to relate to our experience, and that leads to the second factor, which is investigation. This is the quality in Pali known as dhammavicaya.

Andrea talked about this in some detail a week or so ago. We've described how this is not particularly a conceptual investigation, but it's really about drawing our attention close to the direct experience and, you could say, rubbing our attention against the phenomenon of our direct experience. It's kind of like when you want to investigate or understand anything that you really care about—you'll notice how the mind naturally calms down and draws close to that phenomenon.

I was biking up Pleasant Street a couple of years ago, going north on this road. It's a very quiet country lane with very little traffic—that's why it's so good for biking. I was about a mile or two from the center when, all of a sudden, out of the woods on the left side of the road, this black bear emerged. Just kind of ambling along, wasn't in any hurry. Fortunately, it was in front of me.

I stopped the bike. The bear just sat down in the middle of the road. It wasn't too worried about the traffic either, and just sat there for a while on its haunches, kind of looking around. I didn't want to get too close, but I was very interested. Eventually, a car drove up, and the car was not going around because the bear was sitting right in the middle of the road.

What was very interesting about this experience is that we were all kind of transfixed by seeing the bear. My attention was not wandering very much. I was really right there with that bear. This is how it is when we're really interested in something—the experience is just naturally there with it.

This bear was really kind of a lazy creature and had no real urge to move along. So finally I talked to the driver of the car and said, "Look, why don't you drive by it on one side? I don't think it's going to bother you. Then we can ride by on your other side while you're driving by the bear." So that's what we did. The car drove by, we rode by on the other side, and just as we passed it, the bear said, "Okay, that's enough," and ambled off into the yard of the farmhouse just across the street. Somehow they had a bear in their yard, but we could keep going.

This is how it is when we're with a natural phenomenon that we really want to learn about—the attention is right there with interest, with curiosity, and ready to learn from that experience. This is the quality of investigation. There's a kind of natural warmth to that interest and attention, sometimes described by the term "wise attention." In Pali, the word is yoniso manasikara. It's interesting that the term yoni is the word for womb. So you can think of this as a womb-like attention that gathers around something that we care about in a warm and embracing way.

We can cultivate this factor of investigation, as Andrea described in her talk, and hopefully you've gotten a number of pointers from that. I'll just mention one other that I've found helpful. One of the most difficult things when we're with a meditation focus is that the mind wants to wander off into the realm of conceptual thinking. The more interest we can find in the present, the more likely we are to stay connected.

After some time, the breath may become kind of ordinary. "Oh, I've seen a hundred breaths today. What interest is there in seeing the hundred-and-first?"

So one of the ways to keep interest in the experience of breathing is to ask for a little more noticing of detail. One of the things I sometimes like to do in practicing with the breath is seeing if I can find in each in-breath the beginning, middle, and end. Then, if I can find in each out-breath the beginning, middle, and end of the out-breath. And then if there's a pause before the next in-breath, I focus the attention on a touch point like contact of the seat with the cushion or the contact of the nostrils with the breath.

So these seven points—beginning, middle, end, beginning, middle, end, touching—keep my mind often interested in the breath when just a simple noting of "in" doesn't quite hold it. This is just a way to investigate, bringing us a little closer to the experience, bringing up the quality of interest. This investigation factor is part of the wisdom element of mind, and so this is, in a way, a very direct way to activate that faculty within us. Mindfulness brings in some of that intelligence. Investigation sharpens it.

When we get interested and curious and are looking closely at something, it tends to bring up our energy. Dullness is related to being disinterested, and energy is related to being interested. And that leads us into the third factor, which is called energy. The Pali term is viriya.

It's interesting—the root of the word viriya is vira, and the meaning in Pali is hero, or it could be heroine. This is the same root as the Latin word virile, or the English word virile from Latin—same root. So there's a sense of a heroic quality to this energy.

It's sometimes translated as energy, but other translations of this term have been used, and I'm going to run through a few because taken all together, they really give more of the connotations of what's being pointed to here with viriya. It's also been translated as effort, energetic effort, strength, courage, ardor, and enthusiasm. So you can see it's not just raw energy, but it's energy that's directed—in this case, to the path. It has a strong quality of mind applying directly to the practice.

The Buddha put it this way: "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the responsibility of cultivating wholesome states." You may recognize this as the definition of right effort—to abandon the unwholesome and cultivate the wholesome. And this is where energy is directed.

There's the connotation that this effort is a heroic kind of effort. The effort that all of you are engaged in has a quality of heroism about it. And it's a recognition that it's not an easy task to meet these conditioned patterns of reactivity and with the tools of the practice transform them into wisdom and compassion. That's what we're doing moment after moment. And that's not an easy job. How do you transform anger into wisdom, into love? It's not simple. This is why the energy has to be of a heroic quality. And this can only come from our own motivation and aspiration for freedom, for greater peace and understanding.

Some teachers really emphasize the heroic quality of this effort. I was sitting one three-month course here in 1987, and the teachers were in a very heroic effort kind of mode. In every interview, the way we would start off, as a yogi I would relate how many hours I sat, how many hours I walked, and how many hours I slept. That was the start of every interview with my teachers. And from that, they got a sense of the kind of effort I was putting in.

Their guideline was they wanted me to get down to four hours of sleep a night every night. I was used to cruising on retreats at about six hours of sleep. That felt comfortable to me. I'd never tried to get to four before. But that was the challenge. That's what my teachers wanted me to try to do. And so I had the time to do it. I worked at it.

I came in the hall a lot of times sleepy. I couldn't hit four hours right off. I really had to work up to that, but over the weeks the sleepiness wore away, my sleep needs went down, and I eventually got to the point where I could cruise—it took some effort, but I could do the practice with four hours of sleep a night and not fall asleep very much during the day. That was a very fruitful period of practice. I learned a lot from doing that. It was very rigorous, it was very demanding, and it was very insightful. So I really appreciate the time that I did that.

I think about the way professional athletes train.

You know, I think about the way professional athletes train. I don't know if any of you have favorite sports, but I'm a big fan of tennis. And in the 90s, I really liked Andre Agassi, who was one of the main US players at the time. Agassi was a fitness fanatic. He trained in Las Vegas under this very demanding coach named Gil Reyes, who taught at UNLV, University of Nevada in Las Vegas. Reyes would have Agassi run up and down the hills outside the city so intensely that he would push himself until he threw up. And then Reyes would say, "Okay, that's good effort for today. Come back again tomorrow. We'll do it again."

You talk to professional cyclists—I don't know if you ever watch the Tour de France. That is an amazing feat of endurance. These athletes, and now there's a women's tour also, go for about twenty-eight days of incredible effort every day. One professional cyclist said, "Every time I get on my bike for a race, I know I'm going to be facing eight hours of non-stop pain." That's how they push themselves. That's just for fame and fortune—they're not even getting liberated from doing that!

So that's an encouragement for us, perhaps, to see what this quality of heroic effort might mean in our practice. Sometimes we'll feel inspired to do that. It's not so helpful to do it from a sense of "I really ought to do it," or "I'm not going to be a good yogi unless I do this." But sometimes we get inspired to just extend a little bit—sit a little longer, or sit a few more times in the day, or stay up a little later, get up a little earlier in the morning. And we find that in stretching our capacity, we grow into that way of practicing.

This isn't right for everybody, but it's right for some people. And especially, it may be right for some younger practitioners, because when you're young, it's really good to stretch your wings and see where your capacity is. It can be really helpful.

So that's one style of heroic effort. But there's another style where the virya expresses itself more as perseverance—or you could say persistence.

One of the greatest yogis in Tibet in their entire history is considered to be Milarepa, who was practicing in the eleventh century. He was one of the lineage holders in the Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, considered to have made unbelievable meditative progress in one lifetime.

Milarepa left a number of disciples, one of whom was very prominent in the lineage—Gampopa. Gampopa had come to Milarepa, who was practicing out in the mountains. Milarepa is the one you see in Tibetan paintings who's just clad in light white robes. If you see a picture on a Tibetan thangka and the yogi is just in these white robes, that's likely to be Milarepa. He would practice in those thin white robes in the Himalayas in the middle of winter because he learned how to do tummo practice to generate inner heat. So he kept himself alive with the warmth of tummo and by eating nettles out in the wilderness.

Milarepa had been teaching Gampopa for quite a while, and now it was time for the disciple to go off, find his own cave, and do his own practice. They had come to the point where they needed to say goodbye. The student was leaving the master—quite sad at leaving, but it was a necessary step in his own development.

So Gampopa had started off down the mountain track, leaving behind his teacher, and then Milarepa called out, "Wait, wait, come back!" Milarepa said, "There's one more key instruction I need to give you."

So Gampopa came up. Milarepa turned around with his back to Gampopa, flipped up his white robe, and leaned over to show him his buttocks. And this is where the teaching came:

"There is nothing more profound than meditating on this pith instruction. The qualities in my mindstream have arisen through my having meditated so persistently that my buttocks have become as hard as a camel's hoof. You must also give rise to such heartfelt perseverance and meditate."

So this was the pith instruction from the master to the student, and then he sent Gampopa off to do his own practice.

This quality of perseverance or persistence is another way to express the energy of virya. It's just to keep going. Start and keep going.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya puts it this way: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort simply directed at remaining aware."

It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this you need right effort, which is simply perseverance. This is why we stress in our instructions the quality of relaxation. If you approach each moment from a relaxed frame of mind and you're present, the meditation will gain momentum and that persistence of momentum will develop this quality of virya.

As the energy comes up, the mind becomes brighter. And as the mind becomes brighter in relating to our experience, we find there's a quality that comes in of enjoyment. This is pointed to by the next factor, which is called rapture. In Pali, this is piti.

So piti is the factor of mind that takes a delight in the meditation. This is not like a delight in a sense pleasure—there's a very different experience. It's not stoking sense desire, but it's a very refined enjoyment that's really an appreciation of the quality of the attention itself, the quality of mind. This is sometimes translated as joy, this factor, but please understand it's a meditative kind of joy. It could also be called joyful interest or a rapt attention. We're enjoying being with our direct experience, whatever its nature. It doesn't have to be sensually gratifying. We're enjoying the process of being present.

So we start to find that the present moment is where we want to be. We're not forcing ourselves to let go of the thought stream and come here. The present is where we're finding our delight, our satisfaction.

One teacher who teaches concentration practice on the breath is Ajahn Brahm. He's a British monk who's living in Australia and teaches concentration practice extensively. He said that when you discover that the breath can seem beautiful to you, when you find the beautiful breath, then your practice picks up this quality of rapture, of delight. This is interesting to explore. What would happen if you saw the breath as something beautiful? What if you discovered the beautiful breath? It has a way of really bringing the attention in with an enjoyment of the process.

So rapture is a mental factor, but it has a physical echo or accompaniment in different degrees. Sometimes it feels like there are goosebumps running down the arms. Sometimes it feels like there's a momentary rush of energy, kind of like a lightning bolt in the body. Sometimes there are passing waves of sensation that arise in the body. Sometimes there's a feeling of being uplifted. I don't know if you've ever felt that. Sometimes when the quality of piti is strong, you almost feel like you could float off your cushion. Something is holding you up. And then there's an all-pervading piti where it's felt throughout the body.

Mostly this experience of piti is pleasant because it's coming out of a mind state of enjoyment. Sometimes the physical manifestation can get so strong that it tips into the unpleasant. It feels a little too intense and it's no longer pleasurable. But in its initial state it's felt as pleasurable and it tends to offset the hindrance of aversion. That pleasantness of the bodily energy offsets aversion. If it becomes stronger and starts to be felt as unpleasant, you just need to keep deepening the practice and that will smooth out in time.

So as the pleasantness of piti grows and the enjoyment of the experience, we're not so inclined to send the mind out to past and future for gratification because the moment feels sufficient. This leads into the next factor, which is calm. Also sometimes called tranquility, the Pali word is passaddhi.

Some of the other translations for this factor might be ease or serenity, tranquility or calm. Once I saw it translated as relaxation, which is nice to think about. This is the quality that lets us relax into the moment. This is the first of the pacifying factors. Rapture has the possibility of getting a little overexcited, amping up the energy too much. And so the calm starts to smooth that out and starts to balance out the arousing factors.

When the mind and the body start to feel tranquil in meditation, it's often a new experience. We're not so familiar with this from our busy outside lives in the West. And so when it first arrives, we may not quite recognize it. The experience of calm is quite subtle, and it's easy to overlook. But when it's pointed out, we can start to recognize it and then work with it.

One meditator, when having this experience for the first or second time, noted it as calm.

Like, is that what this is about? Is this calm? So we get to know it a little bit.

When we first find it, it might not feel that satisfying. Coming out of busy lives in the West, we are often accustomed to intensity, to riding dramatic emotions up and dramatic emotions down, and we think that's what vitality is about. Oh, if I'm feeling really strongly, whether it's pleasure or pain, then meditation is really happening. The emotional intensity is really where it's at.

And as calm starts to come in, we may feel a little disappointed. What happened to the intensity of meditation? And there can even come in a little bit of boredom. Well, not so interesting. I was looking for the ride that I got from the emotions. Well, what's going on now?

So it's an interesting point at which to investigate boredom because boredom is basically an aversion to neutrality. When things are high or when things are low, it's easy to stay engaged because it's kind of thrilling either way. When those go out, there's a kind of neutral quality to the mood and the mind goes, not so interesting. This is actually delusion coming in.

So we start to notice it. Oh, this is calm. Not a bad state to be in. Calm is a really wholesome state. And so we start to appreciate. And one of the ways it can be appreciated is in calm, there's an absence of dukkha. So it may not be thrilling, but the absence of dukkha is very significant.

In the early years of meditation practice, for many of us, retreats are characterized by a lot of turbulence. The hindrances are really the main fact of life, sometimes for years in practice. And when we hit this patch of calm, it's a significant turning point.

And it's kind of like we've crossed some stormy ocean. You know, it's got big winds and there are pirate ships and then there's the attack of the giant squid. And all of a sudden, we've entered this big safe harbor where there's really not much happening. And then we can just sort of float on that for a while, still being mindful, but there's a sense of being able to float instead of struggling.

So Emily Dickinson really expressed this well in a poem called "Wild Nights." And for those of you who aren't native English speakers, there are a couple of odd words in this. Futile means useless, of no benefit. And chart is a synonym for a map in nautical terms. So here's the poem from Emily Dickinson:

Futile the winds to a heart in port.
Done with the compass, done with the chart.
Rowing in Eden.

I love this image. This calm space in meditation, it's like we're rowing in the Garden of Eden. Things are at peace. There's fulfillment and there's satisfaction.

So what is happening in the experience of calm is the mind is discovering its own natural peace and ease. That natural peace is always there when we're not stirring it up. It is the basic nature of the mind and our kilesas continue to ruffle the waters. Now we're discovering that natural peace that is the mind's basic quality.

There's a meditation instruction that Ajahn Amaro likes to use. He's an English monk who's now the abbot of Amaravati Monastery in England. And at a certain point in the retreat, he likes to give this meditation instruction. It's all the meditation instruction you ever need. Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body. Then pay attention to whatever disturbs that. Very simple. Rest in peace or pay attention to the disturbance. That's enough.

So resting in that peace when this comes is a piece of what we've been looking for all along. Peace—P-E-A-C-E—of what we've been looking for. There is a deep satisfaction in discovering this quality of calm. The access to that is really a doorway to contentment.

The mind finds satisfaction in its own nature. Then many of the desires for the future and regrets about the past, which tend to stir up restlessness, start to seem irrelevant because the present moment takes on its own kind of fulfillment.

This leads to a shift in our approach to the path, a shift in our understanding. It's really one of the great blessings of the meditative journey. The Buddha said in the Dhammapada this line I really love: "Peace is the highest happiness." I wonder to what extent we actually believe that, because peace is available in any moment when we don't stir it up. How often do we choose that? Or how often are we looking for some other kind of happiness that we think is going to be better?

So often in the West, we believe that ecstasy is the highest kind of happiness, or some special bliss, or some unitive experience is the highest kind of happiness. But the Buddha, who was not a dumb person, said that peace is the highest happiness. I think this is really interesting to explore, and I think it's a very profound comment on human psychology—that this most deeply is what we're seeking and that this is what brings the most fulfillment for us.

Now there are ways that this can be cultivated in meditation. Obviously the development of mindfulness through the other factors is necessary, but there are ways that we can encourage it. I'll just mention a simple one from the Anapanasati Sutta, where the instruction is: "I shall breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe in tranquilizing the mental formation. I shall breathe out tranquilizing the bodily formation. I shall breathe out tranquilizing the mental formation."

So in this discourse on the mindfulness of breathing, we can use the breath consciously to bring in this feeling of calm. You can play with this and see if it's accessible in this way. But the basic instruction is: when calm comes, notice it, be mindful of it, note it if you're doing that, and relax and trust in it. Settle into the calm and get to know it. It will continue to deepen.

As the calm continues to deepen, it leads into the next factor, which is concentration. The Pali word is samadhi. This is a state of mind where the calm has really become collected. The dispersion into past and future has fallen away. The mind is more united, unified in the present moment. And when it becomes unified in that way, it gathers back all its natural power.

We are constantly giving away the power of our mind through our distractedness. The quality of unification brings incredible power to the mind. The Buddha said the amount of power that comes from a concentrated mind is inconceivable—you can't understand what kind of power is there. For instance, it leads to jhana states, these states of deep absorption, which are very purifying. It leads to psychic powers. Again, one of Dipa Ma's skills is that she had the ability to develop all the different psychic powers that are described in the old texts, described in the suttas. One of the things that her teacher commented on is that she could appear in a room for an interview without using the door. Wish I could do that.

Samadhi is usually translated by the term concentration. We'll continue to use that term because it's so widespread, but it's not a very good translation because the English word has associations that aren't in the Pali. In English, when we say concentration, we usually mean an exclusive focus of attention—like, "I'm trying to concentrate on my homework. Don't distract me with that music." But in the Pali samadhi, the unification is not about a narrow focus of attention. It is about the unification of the mind stuff, the mind as a whole.

It can become unified through one focus like the breath, but it can also become unified in a very expansive kind of awareness, as when you practice choiceless attention or when we did the big mind meditation the other day. As long as the mind is fully in the present moment, that unification is taking place. So the focus can be narrow, the focus can be broad. Unification of mind can be as strong in either state. I like to think of this as a wholeness of mind—when the mind becomes collected, unified, and whole.

Wholehearted is another beautiful term for samadhi. This quality of concentration offers two main benefits.

The first is that it brings a great sense of well-being. You can notice this directly in your meditation practice. When the mind becomes steady in the present moment, how does that feel? It generally feels good, doesn't it? We're not being thrown about by the hindrances left and right. The absence of the hindrances itself is a pleasant experience. There's a sense of well-being that comes from the power of concentration as the mind becomes stable, steady, and strong.

The Dalai Lama expresses this beautifully: "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." Samadhi is what gives the mind its strength to remain in this inner peace.

The second significant benefit is that concentration serves as the foundation for wisdom. In one of the suttas, the Buddha says the purpose and benefit of concentration is for wisdom. It's the foundation for insight, because when the mind is steady, it can see more clearly.

Imagine you're on a merry-go-round, seated on one of the horses, going round and round. Your friend approaches the edge and holds up a newspaper announcing, "Here's today's news!" But you're whizzing by so fast you can't read it. The merry-go-round slows down and comes to a stop. Now you're positioned in front of your friend and can read the headlines clearly. What do the headlines say? "Everything changes. If you hold on, you suffer. Letting go leads to happiness."

When the mind slows down, we see these truths clearly. And when the mind is concentrated, the insights penetrate deeply. They go way beyond the intellect to a place that feels very experiential—into our bones, because concentration brings depth.

One of the powers of concentration is that the mind grows strong and isn't so pushed around by the changing flow of events. It's not so buffeted by the pleasant and unpleasant. This leads us into the seventh factor, called equanimity. The Pali term is upekkhā, and the basic definition is that state of mind not so moved by pleasure and pain. We still see pleasant and unpleasant, we still experience them, but our inner balance isn't pushed around by them.

Sometimes in English, equanimity carries the connotation of not feeling anything, of no longer having emotions. When I first came into Buddhism, I thought the ideal was to be as unmoved as the stone statue of the Buddha appeared to be. But equanimity is not about losing our emotional response.

During a discussion group at the end of one three-month course, I asked people to recount some of their most meaningful experiences over those months. One that several people described was being able to remain centered and steady while still experiencing a full range of changing experiences. They were essentially describing the quality of equanimity and its growth. I think this represents one of the key benefits of a long retreat that doesn't simply disappear when you return to the world. This basic strength of mind will stay with you for some time.

I then asked them, "In that place where you felt centered and unmoved, were you no longer feeling? Were your emotions shut down?" They replied, "Not at all." They said there was actually more metta and compassion arising from that place than in their normal state of mental turmoil. Equanimity truly opens the door to the flowering of beautiful qualities like love and compassion, as well as peace. It's not a cold place at all.

For this reason, Bhikkhu Analayo prefers to translate this not as equanimity but as equipoise. There's a sense that we're poised in the present moment and balanced, but not at all cut off or shut down. Equanimity appears on many of the lists of beautiful qualities in the dharma.

It's included in the paramis, the brahmaviharas, and in the progress of insight described in the Visuddhimagga detailing how meditation unfolds toward enlightenment. It's also found in the factors of enlightenment. What's particularly striking about equanimity is that it consistently appears last in all these lists, suggesting that equanimity represents the culmination of meditative development. I would say the reason it occupies this final position is that equanimity is the closest worldly state to nibbana—the conditioned state of mind that most closely resembles the unconditioned.

It's invaluable to begin noticing when these qualities arise in your meditation, becoming familiar with each one and recognizing that while they're all wholesome, their particular balance and relative strength shape the mind in different directions. You'll want to discern which factors are strong and which are weak.

One approach I find helpful is maintaining awareness of where I stand with mindfulness, energy, and concentration. Mindfulness serves as the originator, energy represents the arousing factors, and concentration embodies the calming factors. When these three are balanced and strong, meditation feels bright, alert, and peaceful. But energy and concentration can fall out of balance.

When energy exceeds concentration, we feel restless and agitated. When concentration overpowers energy, we may feel dull and slip into what's called "sinking mind"—a drowsy state that resembles sleepiness but originates from a wholesome place. We feel dull and can space out. Understanding how each factor is generated allows us to restore balance through skillful application.

A practical way to work with these factors builds on the attitude inquiry we often suggest—checking for the presence of greed, aversion, and delusion. Sometimes this inquiry yields negative results: Look for greed? No. Look for aversion? No. Look for delusion? No. What then?

This is where checking for wholesome factors becomes invaluable. How's the mindfulness? How's the interest? How's the energy? Is there enjoyment? Do I feel peaceful? Is the mind strong? Is there equanimity toward pleasure and pain? You can identify from direct experience which factors are present and to what degree.

As familiarity with these factors deepens, you'll understand what conditions their arising and what sustains them. When all seven are harmoniously present, there's not only a foundation for insight and clear seeing—there's also the possibility of opening to a moment of enlightenment. We cannot force or control such moments, but developing these factors is within our capacity. We can bring the mind into that balance from which opening becomes possible. That's all we can do. The rest we entrust to the Dhamma.

The Buddha taught: "Bhikkhus, these seven factors of enlightenment, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering."

Sometimes we might wonder whether the complete destruction of suffering remains available to anyone in this day and age. Does this still happen for contemporary meditators? I'd like to share an excerpt from the biography of a Thai monk named Luang Por Liem, or Ajahn Liem.

Ajahn Liem was a student of Ajahn Chah. When Ajahn Chah knew he was dying, he appointed Ajahn Liem to assume the abbotship of Wat Pa Pong in Thailand, essentially anointing him as his primary Dhamma successor. This account describes part of Luang Por Liem's practice experience under Ajahn Chah, dating back to 1969.

In this rainy season, Ajahn Chah encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity, so I increased my effort. Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit in meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m. and then stop to have a rest, but now I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture.

A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body, as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, an experience of the whole body becoming completely light and at ease. Cool, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness. The body felt tranquil, cool, and light.

This experience continued on throughout that whole year—not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued on unchanging for many years now, all from that one time. It feels like there are no proliferations of the mind anymore. All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before—the kilesas concerning the other sex, or all kinds of ambitions that I had before—I don't know where they all disappeared to. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose.

There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. The experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change at all, all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on and it has been stable, continuous and without changes.

So let's just sit for a minute, please.

As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any.

CHAPTER 54

Impulses Come From Ignorance

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines why the mind continues its restless activity even in the simple environment of meditation retreat. Drawing primarily from the Honeyball Sutta (Madhupiṇḍika Sutta) in the Majjhima Nikāya, he traces how sense contact leads to feeling, perception, thinking, and mental proliferation (papañca) - the explosive tendency of mind to spin stories that pull us away from present-moment awareness.
>
> Armstrong explores the first two links of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination): how ignorance (avijjā) conditions volitional formations (saṅkhāra) - the impulses that drive our obsessive thinking patterns. He identifies three layers of obscuration that veil our natural peace: fundamental ignorance of the Four Noble Truths, afflictive emotions rooted in greed/hatred/delusion, and harmful actions that create karmic burden. The talk demonstrates how the Eightfold Path systematically pierces these veils through sīla (ethical conduct), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom), leading toward the unconditioned peace of nibbāna. Armstrong offers practical guidance for recognizing the volitions behind our thoughts and cultivating temporary states that approximate the freedom from craving.

The subject of tonight's talk is impulses come from ignorance.

When we come into a retreat, we're usually coming from quite a busy daily life, having been involved in a lot of planning and creating and doing and thinking and feeling. We can feel that momentum in our minds when we're outside, and then we carry it into the retreat with us.

So when we come into this environment, which is very simple, we could drop most of the mental doing. But do we? This is what's curious. That thought stream is not really needed here, but it continues with such force and intensity. And I wonder why that is. Why does it work like that? Why can't we just say, "Okay, I'm in a retreat. I can stop thinking. It's not serving any purpose. It's bothering me." Why can't we just put it down?

I'm not suggesting that we should stop all thoughts. Number one, we can't. Number two, if you try to do that, you will just suppress your own vital energy and it will not be helpful. And third, there's not a problem with a thought per se. As all of you know, there are times in practice when thoughts can arise and pass and not disturb us. It's not the thought that's the problem. The problem is when we get fascinated by the thought and chase after it. With that sort of active energy, we propel thoughts forward and then it becomes obsessive. We can no longer just let them come and go, but we get wrapped up in the content and the momentum of them.

But sometimes stopping does happen. A number of you have been reporting in interviews that there are times when it has become calm, when you can simply see thoughts coming and going, and there's something very satisfying about that kind of stability. There's something quite freeing about it.

I was reminded of a brochure that one of our friends created when I was on staff here in '78, '79. He created a parody advertising brochure for IMS. It said, "Come to the greatest resort of all. There's no talking, no reading, no regular dinner, no swimming, no golf, and no tennis. This is the vacation of your dreams," because, he said, it's better to do nothing than to waste time.

I think this is really a beautiful line: it's better to do nothing than to waste time, because that's what we're involved with here a lot of the time, aren't we? When you take away the formal aspect of the meditation hall and you realize mostly what you're doing is sitting down and doing nothing, right? And yet that's incredibly wholesome. It's like one of the best things you can do. But it's not that easy to really do nothing. It depends on a lot of wholesome factors of mind, because otherwise this habit carries over, carries over, carries over.

So the Buddha talked about this habit also. There's quite a famous discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya called the Honeyball Sutta. I want to tell a little bit of the story of that sutta.

The Buddha was living at this time in Kapilavatthu, the village in northern India close to the border with Nepal where he grew up. So it was a place he was very familiar with, and a number of his closest monks and disciples had come from this area. They were from the same extended clan as Siddhartha was himself. So it was like he was back on his home turf. He'd been there many times before.

This fellow came up to visit him, whose name was Dandapani. Dandapani—the name means "golden stick"—and you can tell by this that he was kind of a fashion plate. He carried around a golden cane, even though he was a young man, to show off his wealth and how well-dressed he was.

So he comes to visit the Buddha who's in meditation. Dandapani doesn't pay respects or sit down and address him in a respectful way, but he leans on his cane and says, "What does the recluse assert? What does he proclaim?" waiting for something that he can argue with. This is a disrespectful opening, but this is what the spiritual world was like back then. These seekers liked to come to each other and debate their positions and argue.

And it was sort of like ultimate cage fighting—one really wanted to smack the other down and come out on top. So that's the way Dandapani was addressing the Buddha.

The Buddha replied, and this is quite clever: "Friend, I proclaim such a teaching that one does not quarrel with anyone in the world." It's a beautiful statement. And then he continued, "No perceptions underlie such a one who is free of craving."

This is very cryptic—no perceptions underlie someone who is free of craving. The commentaries say what is pointed to here is that one does not build off of sense contact and the perception of things to develop craving. So the Buddha has freed himself from that. But this was still a cryptic statement even to his students, so some of them later asked a senior monk to explain what the teacher meant.

Most of the core of this discourse is delivered by a senior monk named Mahakaccana. But before that, I should mention that after the Buddha said these two lines—"I'm not going to quarrel" and "perceptions no more underlie"—Dandapani shook his head, wagged his tongue, frowned, and went away. We can see he was very disappointed by this answer. He went away leaning on his golden cane.

Later, Mahakaccana explained this line about perception: "Dependent on eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact. With contact as condition, there is feeling." I think you've heard this before—this is not new. We've gone over this several times. "With contact as condition, there is feeling. What one feels, that one perceives."

Perceptions arise based on sense contact where the feeling has impinged on one. Remember that when the Buddha talks about perceiving, it means not sense data, but the recognition of what kind of thing that is—perceiving a man or a woman, a human or a wall or a statue or a chair. It's a recognition of objects. The world really springs up from our perceptions of the shapes and forms that we see. That's what constructs our conceptual world.

Then Mahakaccana continued: "What one perceives, that one thinks about. What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates."

This is an interesting turn: what one perceives, that one thinks about. You'll see this in your meditation. There's a pain in the knee—you'll start to think about it. There's an emotion of sadness—you'll start to think about it. But what one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates.

The noun here for proliferation is papañca. This is a great Pali word. I think most of you probably know papañca. You get that there's an explosive feeling to it—the mind going off in all directions.

So we perceive something, we start to think about it, and that easily leads into proliferation. A simple example: You're sitting in the hall. You think the Buddha statue up here is very attractive and you wonder where you could get one. Let's see—I would have to get my phone out. Maybe Elizabeth would release my phone if I ask her nicely. I could connect, I could Google "Buddha Rupa." I think this one is Thai, so I want to look for a Thai Rupa. Maybe I could find one on eBay, or maybe they're creating them on Etsy. Yeah, Etsy. A friend of mine has a site on Etsy, and she's trying to make her living from it, but she wasn't getting enough sales, so she was going to hook up with this guy who said that he could really promote her stuff, but I didn't trust him...

Anyway, this is how proliferation happens.

We take these conceptual leaps from a simple perception of a statue. This is papañca. And when papañca happens, one of the curious things is we don't stay in neutral territory. Buddha, rupa, from Thailand—that's all pretty neutral. But then we get into our friend and her money and her relationships and whether we trust someone or not.

Papañca usually leads us into things we really care about. That's why they draw our attention. We start to care, which means our emotions become involved. It's those emotional involvements that stir us up from this proliferation, creating a sense of disturbance.

Then Mahākaccāna continues: "With what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and ideas tinged by proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye."

Let's review this because it's an interesting progression. It starts rather passively and in quite a neutral way. The meeting of the eye and the form brings contact. With contact, there's feeling. This is happening all the time—it's not a big deal. Then it becomes active.

Listen to the next part: What one feels, that one perceives. In perceiving, there's a little mental activity coming in. We perform an act of recognition. It's not very voluntary and doesn't have much charge.

What one perceives, that one thinks about. Now we're starting to get more active. We're engaging the object we've perceived and beginning to dwell on it with our thought. But it's still not problematic because we're still connected to reality. That's a Buddha rupa. I think it came from Thailand. It's not problematic.

But now what happens? "With what one has mentally proliferated, perceptions beset one with regard to past, future, and present." We are assaulted by the proliferations that spring, almost uncontrollably, from the earlier thinking. This is the situation we find ourselves in when we come into meditation. We're not in charge anymore.

Based on past associations, our conditioning, our relationships, our emotional patterns, our areas of craving and clinging, we become victims of our own thought processes. They beset us. They assault us. Papañca launches it all, and then it gets out of hand. That's what we find when we sit quietly in meditation and try to bring our attention into the present moment—all this other stuff going on.

So what is all this other stuff about? And why is it so powerful?

In the beginning of the chain of dependent origination—this cycle of twelve links where the Buddha traced the genesis of suffering in great detail, beginning with ignorance, moving through craving and clinging, and ending in suffering—I want to talk particularly about the first two links: avijjā paccayā saṅkhārā.

Avijjā means ignorance, this fundamental not knowing of the way things are. Paccayā means it's a causal factor, but doesn't mean straight causation. It more means "conditions" or "gives rise to" if supporting conditions are there. You can think of it as "tends to give rise to," but not always.

Saṅkhārā are these volitional formations we talked about when discussing the five aggregates—thoughts and emotions primarily, the contents of mind that show up in our proliferation. Avijjā paccayā saṅkhārā means that ignorance conditions or gives rise to volitional formations.

A more visceral word for volitional formations is impulses. That's how it feels when these things come up—like there's an impulse or urge coming sometimes from deep inside us that forms the driving force for our thoughts and emotions. That's why I like to call this talk "Impulses Come from Ignorance."

This implies that many of these impulses have a blind quality about them. Not all our impulses come from wisdom. If they did, we could probably stop them once we were in meditation.

But because there's ignorance bundled up with them, they're operating on their own pilot. This quality of ignorance is a very deep conditioning factor in the mind. The literal meaning of avijja is "unwisdom." Vijja is another word for wisdom or understanding; the "a" is a negation—unwisdom. It refers to this deep blindness that we carry, this inability to see the truth of things clearly.

The fact that ignorance is the first link in the chain of dependent origination is very significant, because it means that ignorance is where all suffering stems from. The other thing to understand about this chain is that even ignorance is not fixed. That's a beautiful aspect of understanding dependent origination—we'll explore this further later. Ignorance is not permanently fixed in us; it can be uprooted. That uprooting doesn't happen until full enlightenment, but we can puncture it. We have the ability to puncture ignorance quite drastically through the practice of meditation. This is also what we want to explore.

The basic understanding is that volitional formations arise out of ignorance, and these volitional formations are coming up all the time in our meditation practice—when we're feeling distracted, drawn into past or future, figuring things out, adopting views, forming ideas about ourselves, and so on.

At one time in my practice, I became very interested in this connection between volition and thoughts. And of course, thoughts bring feelings, so they're connected on the emotional level as well. For a while in my practice, I would take thought as my primary object. Every time a thought came up, I would label it as a thought, see its content, and then ask: What volition is this expressing? What's the motivation or urge behind this thought?

This became a very interesting exploration because I found that most of my thoughts had a pretty clear volition when I looked at them closely. For example, you think of someone you care for and have a wish that they're doing well. That wish is a form of volition associated with metta—that's what loving-kindness is: a wish for another's welfare. I might be feeling grateful and think of a friend who wasn't doing so well, considering something I could do to help them. That's the motivation of generosity.

During the day, you may have many thoughts that carry these beautiful motivations: loving-kindness, compassion, generosity, renunciation. These are what Sally spoke of this morning when discussing right attitude.

But our most obsessive thinking isn't always so altruistic, is it? How often do we obsess about ending world hunger? How often do we obsess about ending poverty in this nation? That's not typically what we obsess about. The obsessive thoughts tend to be a little closer to home.

We might think of somebody we've had a conflict with and some resentment arises—that's an expression of ill-will, the opposite of good will. There's a quality in anger where we wouldn't be sorry if they got hurt a little bit. That's an ill-will attitude.

Or we think about our work situation, whether our job is secure, whether our income is reliable, and anxiety comes up. Fear expresses an intention—a wish for safety.

We have a thought about some place we'd like to spend time, or reuniting with our partner after missing them for these five weeks, and desire arises—desire to be home or to see someone we're close to. That's an intention toward pleasant experience.

We might think about ourselves with judgment: "Oh, I'm not good enough in this way. I'm not lovable enough. Nobody's ever going to really care for me." This expresses a view of condemning ourselves, finding ourselves insufficient—the comparing mind.

This was an interesting exploration, and I encourage you—you don't have to obsess about this—but take a look now and then. When a random thought goes by, see if you can feel into the volition or motivation behind it. Most thoughts have some motivation.

This raises another interesting question: Are there any thoughts that don't come out of volition? I'm just going to leave that with you as an open question to hold.

Look at your thoughts over the next several days or weeks and see what you find about that.

During meditation, other urges arise—ones that don't involve us so much with the long-term past and future of outside life, but instead entangle us deeply in the meditation world and experience. These urges try to make the moment a little bit better. We want to make the body more comfortable. We want to get rid of that tension and pain that's popped up in the shoulder blade. We want to return to that concentrated, peaceful sitting we had first thing in the morning. Or we want to recapture that open experience of loving-kindness we felt for our benefactor when we felt truly connected and appreciative.

We might try to push away some fear, anxiety, or resentment that's starting to emerge connected with a memory. These impulses arise within the realm of meditation itself.

In these areas where we tend to get obsessive and driven by urges, don't they mostly revolve around me? Aren't these obsessive ones that really push us mostly about self, I, me, and mine? Many of our impulses, especially the really powerful and difficult ones, come from a sense of self-concern in some degree or another.

There's a funny story about ignorance and formations. A robber went into a bank and handed a teller a note demanding all the money in her till. The teller didn't want to get shot, so she emptied her till and handed the money over to the robber, who went out, hopped into a getaway car, drove back to his house—and when he got there, the police were waiting. How did that happen? He'd written his robbery note on the back of his own deposit slip, which of course had his address on it.

We do a similar thing when we hurt someone or when we hurt ourselves. We've written our address on a karmic deposit slip. The impact of that action, of that harm, of that unskillful volition is going to come back to this address, to this body and mind. On the other hand, if we're seeing clearly, then our actions align with that wisdom and clarity. One of our colleagues and friends, Sylvia Boorstein, says when we see clearly, we act impeccably. But when we don't, our actions are not always so great.

We can see this effect of the movement of craving in the world, expressing itself through greed and hatred and confusion. I just read in the New York Times today that the top one-tenth of one percent of Americans own twenty percent of the wealth—one in a thousand people own twenty percent of the wealth. This is compared to what it was in the 1970s, when it was seven percent. So when we talk about income inequality, certainly there is a vast change over the last thirty to forty years in wealth distribution in this country, mostly because of tax cuts in recent years.

What's also curious, and the Times reported this, is that in order to balance the budget, the wealthy are much more likely to favor cutting spending as opposed to raising taxes compared to ordinary Americans. So could that be greed at work? Could be.

Another version from today's paper: The war in Afghanistan is still continuing—this is like fourteen years later—and the Taliban are still fighting. One intelligence report says that they now control or greatly influence about fifty percent of the country. So that's still going on.

Ajahn Sumedho put these first two links succinctly in summarizing the whole chain. He said, when you start at ignorance, you end up at suffering. This is the mechanism, these formations, these impulses—this is the dynamic that keeps us going round.

So what is ignorance? It's not about not knowing facts. It's not about whether you know the longest river in Asia. It's defined in the discourses as not understanding the Four Noble Truths. We don't see the full extent of dukkha, of unsatisfactoriness, number one. We haven't completely given up its cause, which is craving. We still think that there's some lasting happiness to be found there. We haven't fully realized the end of craving, which is nibbāna, and we haven't fully practiced the path to the end of craving, which is the Eightfold Path. In all these ways, we're still bound. We're still bound up with suffering, not having understood the four truths fully.

As long as we're tied to craving, we're also—in a way, that establishes the three characteristics. It also means that we haven't fully seen the three characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. We don't see the inherent nature of change, so we keep holding on, keep craving and clinging. We don't see how craving leads to suffering, so we haven't fully seen the extent of unsatisfactoriness. Because we haven't seen through the belief in self, we continue to put a lot of energy into the self—extra energy that's not helpful out of the belief in a self, which we could summarize as hope and fear. We continue on that route.

Maybe just as a shorthand, we can think of ignorance as not seeing the truth of not-self—summarizing all these different truths, the craving and the clinging, the unsatisfactoriness, the impermanence, into the truth of not-self.

The Buddha made an interesting comment about one who is in a state of suffering.

He said that when one is in a state of suffering, it results in either bewilderment or search. That's really interesting. So first, maybe there's confusion from the suffering, and second, we look for a way out. And that search might be guided by wisdom or it might be guided by ignorance, by unwisdom.

It's obviously the search through unwisdom that leads us from the confusion of suffering into the activities of greed, aversion, and delusion. We put all our hope in craving, although we don't really see it clearly, and it turns out to bring us more suffering.

So we could say that in this veil of ignorance, it casts a cloud of not seeing. We could say there are three levels to the way that it obscures. And I want to talk about it sort of from the foundation up.

Through not seeing the third noble truth, which is nibbana, we are not seeing the possibility of a complete and satisfying peace. We don't understand that that absolute peace is right within our own nature. Nibbana is spoken of as an unconditioned element, not subject to arising and passing. Not subject to arising and passing means it's present in every moment, but we don't see it. And that is the sad part of our condition.

You could say the Dharma treasure that will set our hearts free is right here. But because its vibration is more subtle than the vibration of the passions, it's clouded over. So we're not able to see that which could give us the greatest possible happiness and freedom and security.

Not understanding that, we look for substitutes. And the substitute that our psyche comes up with is the self. The self seems to offer the promise of some ongoing security. Through the construction of self-image related to past and future, we believe that there's an ongoing nature that is a substitute for the true lasting peace.

But once we construct a self and we identify it with this body and mind, we have to do a lot of activity around it. We have to make the self try to be safe. We have to keep it nourished. So that's what a lot of our thoughts are about—this self-protecting. We don't see that this construction of self wraps us up with holding on. We construct the self out of holding on to past and future and views. And therefore, because it's holding on to what's impermanent, it can't really last. The self-view can't really last. So that's the first level. We've lost touch with the deep inner peace that is part of us.

The second is that we move into these strategies based on craving. We think if we feed the self, that will be the road to happiness. So we put our chips on greed, aversion, and delusion. Greed is to keep the pleasant coming. Aversion is to force the unpleasant away. Delusion is to step back and not feel exactly what's happening in all of those.

Greed, aversion, delusion are the basis for all the unhelpful emotions. We could talk about anger or guilt or judgment or grief or loneliness or pity, desire. They are all based on different combinations of greed, aversion and delusion. In one school of Buddhism it said there are 84,000 of these afflictive emotions combining greed, aversion, delusion in different ways. And that was written about 2,000 years ago. So today I think that number must be at least doubled. Modern life is so much more complicated.

So our normal life is a flood of these emotions, these unhelpful emotions—you call them the hindrances or the taints, kilesas—because we've put our chips on the self and keeping it fed through craving. And these are all oriented around the self, all these unskillful emotions. The Buddha referred to this as a flood. This is the flood that he talks about crossing, talks about crossing to the further shore, crossing to the island, crossing over the flood.

So you could call this the second layer of obscuration. And this is a veil of the afflictive emotions. One of the things we see when we're governed by the hindrances: we don't see clearly. That's one of the main descriptions of the hindrances in the language of the Buddha—they blind wisdom. So when any of the afflictive emotions are strong, they prevent us from seeing clearly. They draw our attention elsewhere and they reinforce these passions, which are not helpful.

When we are tormented by the afflictive emotions of greed, aversion, and confusion, we act in unskillful ways, and this creates the third level of obscuration. We harm ourselves and we harm others.

That's what's so interesting about understanding sila, which Kamala is going to talk more about in a day or two—that when we transgress the precepts and harm someone else, it ends up harming us also. It's so interesting. And the reason is that we are not totally separate. We are so deeply interconnected that hurting someone else also harms us because on some level we know that it's wrong. And we carry that knowledge with us even if we are in denial about it. But we know that it's wrong and that we've hurt ourselves through doing it.

So harming—basically violating the basic lay precepts—causes harm to us not only emotionally but also in terms of wisdom because it builds up in the mind either a layer of denial, which will block clear seeing, or the burden of regret and remorse, which we really carry as a weight that prevents us from fully loving ourselves and from fully accepting ourselves, which means the moment just as we are, just as it is.

And so we could call this third one the obscuration that comes from harmful actions.

So the ignorance, the basic not seeing, gets layered with these afflictive emotions of greed, aversion and confusion. And out of that come the third level of obscuration, which are the actions that we commit out of these three together.

When we come into meditation, this often becomes a weight that we start to open to. When I did my first long retreat here, all the things I had done in my life that hurt other people or other beings started to come up really strongly in my memory. And every one I would look at, and because I now had a new understanding of the precepts, I would just cringe in seeing it. I can't believe that I did that. I can't believe that I was so ignorant and unaware that I would have done that.

And some of these things went back to second grade. And some of them were a lot more recent at that time. I was about 29 years old at that time. They just invaded my mind. They stayed there. I felt terrible about them. And I had to write them down to get them a little bit out of my thoughts. So I made a list, the 10 biggest mistakes I've made in my life. And by writing them down, I didn't dwell on them quite as much. And then over time, just letting myself feel the remorse and regret about those acts and a real recognition that they were harmful, that I wouldn't do them today, and it was really a different person who had done them, I started to get lighter around them. I still feel regret when I think of them, but I don't feel that heavy weight that I did then.

This is a quotation that's been attributed to the Buddha. I don't think it comes from the Buddha, but it could well have: "Thoughts give rise to intentions, and intentions lead to actions. Actions are repeated as habits, and habits harden into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

So we have these three layers of obscuration to seeing: the basic ignorance, the afflictive emotions, and the actions of harmful conduct layered on top of one another. Most people don't have the opportunity to penetrate these layers and see what the truth of things is. And so most beings are bound in this cycle of ignorance leading to suffering. This is the fact for most human beings in the world. And so we just continue to perpetuate. Out of the suffering comes more ignorance and we continue to perpetuate this. That's why the Buddha said, "This samsara is without discernible beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings roaming and wandering on, obstructed by ignorance and driven by craving." And in the Buddha's vision, this is over many, many lifetimes and many, many years of birth and death.

So now what's interesting is to see how the path works. Because the path is constructed deliberately to pierce through these three layers of obscuration. And if you know the Eightfold Path, it can be summed up as sila, samadhi, and panna.

So we start with sila. The point of sila is to undo the layer of obscuration that comes from harmful conduct. As we take up the five precepts, we cease, as far as we can, harming others and harming ourselves. That then leads to the undoing of this layer of obscuration. We have to meet the past harm, but as we meet it and let that go, that level gets purified by the acts of sila.

So conduct alone brings a certain level of peace of mind. This is from the Buddha: "Virtue is for the sake of restraint. Restraint is for the sake of freedom from remorse. Freedom from remorse is for the sake of gladness." So as we take more care with our conduct, it leads directly to a sense of gladness and ease in the heart.

So this stage is described in the text as the purification of conduct, piercing the first level of obscuration—the area of sila.

The second area is the area of samadhi. Samadhi is a word that is translated as concentration, and as we've talked about in the discussion on the seven factors, it refers to a state of mind that has become collected, steady, composed—one that's not so assaulted by the hindrances. One of the delights of the concentrated mind is that the hindrances have ceased assaulting us. The rolling on of papancha has stopped assailing us, and there is this new sense of calm, peace, and rest that comes in.

Just by being steadily attentive to the moment, moment after moment, the floods have been halted. The floods of greed, aversion, and delusion—the hindrances—have been halted temporarily. In one of the discourses, the Buddha made the comment that mindfulness can dam any flood. That's what we're practicing. When we practice being in the present moment, again and again, we're blocking those floods from coming in and taking over our mindstream.

The mind becomes collected in the present moment. The nature of the present moment is essentially peaceful. If we don't disturb it, the present moment is peaceful, here at least. So this mood of samadhi is about relaxation, about acceptance, and about trust in the moment. The very fact that the hindrances are absent gives a deeper level of happiness. This degree of happiness is found directly in our present experience, so we don't have to go out to look for stuff anymore.

The Buddha expressed this as: tranquility is for the abandoning of desire. This word tranquility is a translation of the Pali word samatha, which is paired with vipassana. Practice develops both tranquility and insight—this is the tranquility piece. Tranquility is for the abandonment of desire.

So this stage of samadhi leads to the purification of mind. The hindrances are in abeyance—they are temporarily halted—and we start to taste some of the possibilities of that peace and freedom.

Then, because the mind is more still, it can see more clearly. It's not blinded by the hindrances. Wisdom can function at a deeper level, and so wisdom now has the possibility of seeing more clearly the deeper truth of things. Wisdom starts to undo the third level of obscuration, which is the misunderstanding about the nature of the self and the nature of our own being.

We start to see that everything is merely coming and going and that there's no fixed center. The more we rest in equanimity with that seeing, the more we are coming closer to that natural peace of non-disturbance. That peace, basically of equanimity, is right next door to a deeper seeing. This is the stage called the purification of view, where we are starting to get closer to piercing the fundamental ignorance about our own nature—the essential peace that's deep within our own nature.

Seeing not-self is a part of that, but it's not the end of the path. The wisdom needs to go one more level at this point, and that is to nibbana.

This dependent origination chain shows how suffering is created based on ignorance. But it's also given, as the Buddha said, in the reverse order, so that when ignorance ceases, the other links of the chain collapse also, and suffering is no longer generated. When ignorance ceases, that is the moment of the realization of the unconditioned, of the element of nibbana.

The Buddha said: with the cessation of ignorance comes the cessation of sankhara or impulses, these volitional formations. What is it like when the mind is filled with wisdom? The basic sense is peace, calm, spaciousness, loving-kindness. There's understanding, there's strength, there's joy, there's interest. All these factors are there. These are aspects of the awakened mind.

The actual sense of awakening depends on this third noble truth—the penetration to nirvana—which involves, as is often said, the destruction of lust, the destruction of hatred, the destruction of delusion. This is one of the descriptions the Buddha gave: "This is peaceful. This is excellent. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana."

This is really, for serious practitioners, the goal of our practice—the realization of the third noble truth. In our tradition, this is called a moment of enlightenment. In this first moment of realization, one is said to enter the stream. One becomes a stream enterer.

If I were to describe this as carefully as I can, I'd say it is a moment of the direct realization of the unconditioned element of nibbana. The Dalai Lama has described it as a direct realization of the ultimate nature of reality.

I think that is also accurate. There's one phrase that often appears in the discourses that expresses this seeing. After someone has had this stream entry experience, the Buddha will say something like, "The spotless, immaculate vision of the Dhamma arose: All that is subject to arising is subject to cessation."

This sounds like simply a seeing of impermanence, but I think more is being pointed to here. This quality of cessation is most often referred to as the cessation of craving. And the cessation of craving, as you know, is the cessation of dukkha and is connected with the third noble truth or nibbana.

So when craving ceases, the unwise impulses also cease. There's a sense of stillness and peace. Now this peace of nibbana is an unshakeable kind of peace. But we start to approximate this. We start to feel close to it in our practice when the mind is temporarily free of craving, temporarily free of greed, hatred, and delusion.

And you can start to recognize these moments for yourself. There's a feeling of calm and steadiness. You check on attitude. Is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion? No. That is a moment. It's described in the suttas at one point as "insofar as possible, nirvana" or "just this much nirvana." And one of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, called it "temporary nibbana."

This happens not uncommonly for meditators in retreats like this. It's not exactly enlightenment, it's not exactly stream entry, but it gives one a taste, a pre-taste of that quality, and you can start to appreciate it.

Once you start to appreciate the sense of temporary nibbana, you can use it as a meditation instruction for yourself by asking something like, "Do I remember what that felt like? Can I sort of put myself back there?" This is not just to recreate an experience, which would be based on greed. It is because it is such a wholesome place to be in. It not only provides a strong foundation for wisdom, for seeing clearly, but it also continues the work of purifying the heart and mind—continues that work of the three levels of purification.

So it's a very helpful practice in and of itself. If it's not accessible, drop it. You can't strain after it. But sometimes by remembering the feel of it, you can find it again. And then this becomes something of a practice.

When this is a practice, you're feeling the freedom in it already. You're feeling the peace of it already, which is the goal. So it's very interesting—at this point in practice, the path and the goal come very close together. And at one point the Buddha said something like, "The Eightfold Path has the deathless as its ground." It's founded in nibbana, in other words.

Some teachers have a way of transmitting this quality of awakened awareness and intelligence. I have a teacher who lives in Kathmandu named Soni Rinpoche, a Tibetan lama. One winter I went over to visit him in his monastery. I stayed in town and was doing a retreat in my room, and I would go out to see him every couple of days in his monastery.

Just at the end of the time I was there, he had a very senior Tibetan lama staying with him, whose name was Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche. A lot of my friends had studied and practiced with Nyoshul Kempo and spoke very highly of him. Toward the end of my stay, my teacher asked me if I would like to meet him, and I said yes, I would.

I actually had a good excuse because a friend had emailed me and said, "Would you be willing to give Nyoshul Kempo some dana from me?" So I had an excuse to pay a visit and pay my respects to him. I had some cash that she would repay me.

So I was taken in to see Nyoshul Kempo. Everything was arranged. The translator was there. He was sitting up, quite dignified, wearing a gold robe.

His wife was beside him. My teacher was there and there was a translator. So I paid my respects with three bows and went forward on my knees to offer him the dana from my friend, who was a student of his.

As I did that, he drew me closer and looked directly into my eyes. I'd been sitting for a couple of weeks at that point, so I was fairly sensitive and fairly quiet. And he was a very well-known and respected master, so I was a little bit nervous. But I went up—it was quite an open place—and I looked directly into his eyes. Our heads were not very far apart.

At that moment he went into a meditative space. I could tell that he made a shift. He wasn't so much looking at me anymore. His look was more inward, and what it felt like is his eyes sort of went apart and were looking off into infinity. And what I felt in his mind then—it almost wouldn't be right to say that his mind was complete peace. It was more like there wasn't a mind there anymore.

Looking into his eyes, I felt like I was looking into the unconditioned. I just held that gaze for a few seconds and he stayed in that state for a few seconds. Then I started feeling that nervousness came up. I felt so exposed, but I felt he could see right through me. I just got a little nervous and it's like I kind of blinked, and then it ended—that moment of transmission. But I felt like if I had just been able to go on looking for a few more seconds, who knows what might have happened.

It was just a wonderful moment of transmission where he revealed to me that inner state of utter peace—of utter non-disturbance, of the utter absence of impulses, of any kind of movement based on self or anything else. He was just there, I felt, in the unconditioned element.

So I'll just close with another quotation from the Buddha about Nibbana:

One who is dependent has wavering.
One who is independent has no wavering.
There being no wavering, there is calm.
There being calm, there is no desire.
There being no desire, there is no coming or going.
There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising.
There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between.
This, just this, is the end of suffering.

So let's just sit for a minute together.

There being no wavering, there is calm.
There being calm, there is no desire.
There being no desire, there is no coming or going.
This, just this, is the end of suffering.

CHAPTER 55

Joy and Happiness

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

Guy Armstrong presents joy and happiness as fundamental elements of the Buddhist path, reframing the Four Noble Truths in positive terms. Drawing on the Upanissa Sutta's transcendent dependent origination, he traces the movement from suffering through faith to pamoja (joy), pīti (rapture), and ultimately liberation. Armstrong explores various cultivation methods including mudīta practice, gratitude, ethical conduct (sīla), generosity, and the joys found in concentration states. He shares personal retreat experiences and teachings from the Dalai Lama to illustrate how positive mental qualities support spiritual development. The talk emphasizes that while dukkha receives much attention in Buddhist practice, joy and happiness are equally important for balanced mindfulness and the progressive refinement that leads to the "highest happiness" of nibbāna. Armstrong weaves together canonical teachings with practical guidance for developing these wholesome mental factors in both meditation and daily life.

The subject of this evening's talk is joy and happiness.

We've spent considerable time in this retreat exploring the vocabulary of the Buddha's teachings around the concept of dukkha, which is central to the Four Noble Truths—founded as they are around dukkha, its origin, its end, and the way to its end. But those Four Noble Truths could also have been formulated in terms of happiness. They would read something like this: There is unhappiness in life. The cause of unhappiness is wanting. Real happiness is possible. And the way to real happiness is the Eightfold Path.

Although we talk extensively about the hindrances and the kilesas and the afflictive emotions and all the difficulties of practice, it's also important to remember that joy and happiness are essential parts of this path. Especially at a certain point in development, they're really necessary to further the movement. The sense of deep contentment, relaxation and surrender can't fully ripen unless they come out of a place of joy and happiness.

These are essential parts of the path, but they don't always show up strongly in the beginning. It may take some time to really feel the development and the ripening of these factors in practice, so don't worry if they're not there today or this week. But it's important to know where we're headed, because as Yogi Berra said, if you don't know where you're going, you'll wind up somewhere else. So we want to be sure that we wind up in the right place with this quality of joy, this quality of happiness.

It's very helpful to actually spend some attention and time cultivating these as ongoing parts of your practice, your meditation practice, because this kind of development will keep the mind inclining to what is wholesome. If you remember the definition of right effort, two of the pieces of the four elements of right effort are about the wholesome: developing the wholesome and maintaining the wholesome. Joy and happiness are part of that mix of wholesome qualities that we want to continue to cultivate and develop because they're so supportive.

There is, I think, among our community a real thirst to find these qualities and develop them in our hearts and minds. You may know our friend James Baraz in California, who's written a book called Awakening Joy. It's become very popular and is highly recommended if you'd like to develop these qualities further. James has done for several years now a class in Berkeley based on the book, offering very practical ways to help people develop more joy in their life and in their meditation. He structures the class in such a way that there's an in-person portion and an online portion.

At one point his book got a favorable mention from Oprah Winfrey in O Magazine. Of course, that's a big platform to get noticed on. After that review came out, the next session of his class had an enrollment of 2,900 people, which in the Vipassana world is a pretty good turnout. It's not like a Taylor Swift video—I think one of hers just went over a billion views—but for Vipassana it's a good turnout.

It's important first in the beginning to start to notice these qualities when they come. We spend so much time, especially in the beginning, talking about dukkha and the hindrances and the kilesas and afflictive emotions, that in a way it inclines us to be on the lookout for those. We can develop this kind of vigilance about watching out for when one of those hindrances is about to sneak in. And then an experience of calm comes and we hardly even notice it or recognize it or open to it because it's not one of these threatening mind states.

But it's just as important to notice and be open to the positive qualities in meditation—like the seven factors of awakening, like the Brahmaviharas, like the five spiritual faculties—as it is to be mindful of the difficult ones. In the beginning of practice, we often develop more attention to the difficult states. But what we want to find is a balance of mind in mindfulness that's not looking particularly one way or the other. A mind that is so poised in the middle that it's equally open to seeing the beautiful as seeing the difficult, so that we're not biased one way or another.

It's as though the mind is on that midpoint, which we could call zero or we could call emptiness, and it's just open to what appears. So open to seeing the beautiful qualities as well as anything. And the more we notice them, the more the mind learns to find its way there. The development of these qualities comes with the mindfulness and recognition of them when we're there.

Emphasizing the beautiful qualities at different times in our practice is actually skillful because it redresses the imbalance where the mind so often looks for the negative. It is true that craving is a frequent visitor. Greed, aversion and delusion are frequent visitors. The hindrances come often. Such a mind inclines to seeing difficulty, inclines to seeing insufficiency, inclines to the negative. So by cultivating and putting attention and emphasis on the wholesome qualities, positive qualities, we start to right that imbalance a little bit.

And we remember what the Buddha said: "What one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of one's mind." So we want to think and ponder upon these qualities.

There's a very large vocabulary in the suttas for the range of qualities pointed to by these two English terms, joy and happiness. Let me share some of them in Pali and their English translations. You'll be familiar with many, some of them you may not be so familiar with. Mudita, which is the third Brahmavihara, usually translated as empathetic joy or sympathetic joy, which if you're staying for part two, you'll have formal instruction in developing. The word sukha—I find this a very pleasant term. I would translate it normally as happiness.

And this is the word I normally translate as happiness. What I like about it is its sound—it has a quality reminiscent of sucrose, like sugar, which gives it this sweet connotation for me. Sukha is that quality in the mind that brings a lot of sweetness. Often when people are experiencing sukha, a little smile will come spontaneously onto their face with this happiness.

The word ananda is normally translated as bliss. You see this in many Buddhist names. The Buddha's cousin was called Ananda. My first preceptor in Thailand was Panyananda, which means the bliss of wisdom. And when I ordained as a monk for the second time, I asked for this name and my preceptor granted it: Sunyatananda, which means the bliss of emptiness. So you'll see ananda used frequently in names, this attribute of bliss.

Piti, which you already know, means rapture—it's the fourth of the enlightenment factors.

Pamoja is a word that I would translate as joy. This is the Pali word that I would typically translate as joy, and it appears in quite an important sutta that I'll mention later in this talk.

Somanasa means gladness of mind, contrasted with domanasa, which is difficulty of mind.

Santuti—don't you like the sound of that? Santuti. It sounds like an Italian gelato machine, and it means contentment. One of the stanzas in the Dhammapada says, "Santuti is the greatest wealth"—contentment is the greatest wealth.

All these terms point to the same basic quality: gladness, uplift, happiness, empathic joy, delight. They were not neglected in the Buddha's teachings at all. It's a thread that runs throughout.

Pamoja comes in especially in one sutta in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Upanissa Sutta, which describes another version of dependent origination with twelve links showing causal relationships among them. We normally call this transcendent dependent origination—quite a mouthful, but it's called transcendent because it transcends suffering.

Whereas the original dependent origination shows how suffering is created based on ignorance and craving, this cycle describes how liberation is reached through positive states of mind. It describes the journey totally in positive and wholesome terms.

It begins with suffering, picking up where the first dependent origination leaves off, and then moves to faith. Now that's an interesting combination—how does suffering lead to faith? Because when we suffer, we are motivated to find a solution. When we discover that there is a solution available through these teachings, our faith is strengthened and gives us the energy to walk the path.

This leads to the next quality, which is pamoja or joy. Joy then leads on to rapture, tranquility, happiness, concentration, insight, and liberation. The movement into the maturing of these faculties flows from joy, rapture, tranquility, and happiness. This is what needs to be found.

Bhikkhu Analayo is the author of a book I recommend to all of you if you haven't read it—it's called Satipatthana, an extensive commentary on the Satipatthana Sutta. He's quite a remarkable person: a German monk who ordained in Sri Lanka, practiced there, learned Pali there, and became very familiar with the whole range of the Pali discourses. Because he felt that was fairly straightforward, he went on to learn Chinese so that he could translate the equivalent discourses found in Chinese. He's since learned Tibetan so he can do comparative studies with that tradition as well. He's a very dedicated and excellent practitioner—probably one of the most remarkable Western scholars who combines both a deep practice orientation and really extensive knowledge of the original texts. In other words, he's a reliable source.

This is his comment from Satipatthana: "The entire scheme of the gradual training"—which is what we're all involved in—"can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." The whole journey we're embarked upon is a progressive refinement of joy, leading to and culminating in liberation, which the Buddha described in this way: "Nibbana is the highest happiness." This is from the Dhammapada.

Nibbana is the highest happiness. And that's where mindfulness leads. From Sally's talks on the Satipatthana Sutta, the practice of mindfulness leads in only one direction, and that is to liberation and Nibbana.

So the discovery of joy is a really good ally at many points. Not only as an integral factor of the path, especially on the upward trajectory of liberation, but it's such a great ally in times of difficulty. And all of us, as we continue on the path, are going to run into times of difficulty.

This came fully home to me about ten years ago. I went back to Asia. I had not quite finished with the robes when I left the monkhood the first time in Thailand, which was in the eighties. And I'd always had a little bit of nostalgia for being a monk. So I went back again in 2005 to Burma with the intention of ordaining again, because I wanted to practice with Pa-Auk Sayadaw, who's a very renowned master of concentration and insight, who had a large monastery.

So I traveled over there, and his monastery is about two hundred miles southeast of Rangoon. I arrived late one afternoon, went up to meet the Sayadaw at his house about five p.m. I was introduced and very pleased to meet him. And I said to him, "Sayadaw, I'd like to stay for about six weeks, and if it's possible, I'd like to ordain."

He checked out that I had been a monk before, so I sort of knew the basics of the Vinaya and the monk's life. So he said, "Okay, I'll ordain you tomorrow."

So I'd just arrived—I'd just been off the plane a couple of days. I'd just arrived there with my big suitcases and foam mat and all of that. And I was going to ordain the next day.

So in the morning I went into town and bought my robes and bowl and belt. I got my monk gear together. Came back to the monastery, had lunch. And immediately after lunch, I joined a small group. My head was shaved. I changed into the robes. And I was a monk about an hour later. It all happened really quickly.

Well, in the intervening years, I'd sort of forgotten how to tie the robes. So I was walking around with them slipping off my shoulders for quite a while, but I sort of got back into the habit, we might say.

And so I went there to do Sayadaw's concentration practice, and he has a rigorous practice and a rigorous schedule. In doing concentration practice with him, he has you focus on just the small area below the tip of the nose, on the upper lip, about the size of a dime. That is your sole meditation object in sitting, in walking, in meals, and throughout the day. So it's a very narrow focus.

I went to him and said, "What should I do about hindrances? Hindrances are coming up." He said, "Oh, if you're averse, do metta, and if you're sleepy, pull your ears." That was the instruction. So other than that, I was right here in this very small place for six weeks. So that's a very disciplined kind of practice.

And the schedule at the monastery—by the way, there were about 750 people practicing when I was there. About 400 or so of them were monks, about 150 were nuns, and the rest were lay people. So it was a strong practice energy.

The schedule was such that we were sitting several times a day in a very big meditation hall. The shortest sitting was an hour and a half. The longest sitting was two hours. And as a new arrival, there was no way around that. I was to be at the meditation center, I was to be in my spot, hour and a half most sittings, two hours some sittings. So this was challenging.

In addition, I had arrived on the day that the rains retreat began. Now this should have been a clue about the weather, but I hadn't quite thought it through. So I ordained, and the day was actually fine. The next day the rain started, and it kept up solidly for about the next three weeks. I really didn't see the sun for three weeks. Mold was growing on my baggage, insects were crawling around my kuti, and the rain just kept coming down.

It rained about three inches a day over that period—a real tropical downpour. And then there were the meals.

Breakfast timing didn't work out so well for me. I was eating just one meal a day. While I appreciated that it was a vegetarian monastery, as I'm vegetarian myself, there wasn't a huge amount of protein. It was basically white rice and stir-fried vegetables. So I started losing weight—about half a pound a day over the time I was there. And I didn't have a lot to give up.

The rain kept coming down, and my robe still kept falling off my shoulder. I remember this one day when it was really raining hard. I'd gone down to the dining hall and had a really hot bowl full of food. I tried to cradle that in one elbow with dessert in the lid, my umbrella over my head as I walked back along the dirt path to my kuti where I was going to eat, and my left shoulder kept coming undone. As I was going, there were these very devout Burmese laypeople kneeling by the side of the path and bowing to this Western monk who couldn't even keep his robes on and who was about to lose his whole lunch on the path.

Long story short, I had a very difficult time at that point. It was about three weeks into a six-week retreat, and the practice was difficult, the weather was difficult. I've never seen such big spiders as inhabited my kuti. I was losing weight and getting really glum. Everything just looked gloomy to me.

Fortunately, I had one piece on my little altar in my hut—a photograph of the Dalai Lama with a couple of verses from Shantideva surrounding it. I find the Dalai Lama a very inspiring being, a very beautiful being. So he was my resource. I felt in real need of some uplift and some advice. So I said, "Your Holiness, I'm having a really hard time. Do you have any advice for me?"

I was in a state of real supplication, looking for some help beyond "pull your earlobes." Immediately that I made the request, the answer came. It was so interesting. It was exactly his voice—that slightly high-pitched, Indian-accented English that he speaks. That's exactly the voice I heard. There was a very clear message. What the Dalai Lama said was: "Stay cheerful, optimistic and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." And then transmission ended. That was it. That was the message. Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident.

I've thought about that many times since. I revisited it a lot of times on that retreat. At times it was really helpful. At other times I couldn't even remember what cheerful felt like, so I couldn't use it. But if I could remember that advice, I could often incorporate it and just pick my mind up and move it into that more wholesome place. It helped that the words had come from the Dalai Lama himself in that short transmission, because he is such a happy and joyful person. I picked that up from him, and it inspires me greatly.

As we know, he has the whole weight of the Tibetan nation on his shoulders—seven million Tibetan people who remain. Something like two million have been killed since the occupation in 1949. But he is the only hope for the remaining Tibetan people and Tibetan culture. There's no one else on the world stage who has his stature, who could possibly shape the international situation for his people. Even the Dalai Lama is not succeeding in that role. But despite this enormous burden that he carries, he is so light and happy—cheerful, optimistic and confident.

He will say that over and over again.

I'd like to share a little anecdote about him. He was at a gathering of scientists in Dharamsala—he's very interested in bridging the Buddhist world and the scientific world, so he often has scientists come over to where he lives. One of the scientists, during a break, was chatting with him and asked, "What was the happiest time of your life?"

I thought, well, surely the Dalai Lama is going to say it was when he was a child in the Potala and Tibetan culture was intact, when his tutors were revealing everything about Buddhism and it was all opening up, dawning—it was so beautiful. I thought he would say something like that, perhaps a bit nostalgic.

Instead, he said, "I think right now—this is the happiest time in my life."

What a beautiful answer. Right now is the happiest time. That's such a wonderful attitude.

I want to talk about some different ways we can develop and cultivate these qualities of joy and happiness in our meditation. The first is the practice of mudita. In terms of formal Buddhist practices, this is the most direct path to joy. It is the happiest practice I know of in the whole realm of Buddhist meditation. The entire practice is about uplifting our heart and moving into a place of joy.

Mudita is defined as taking joy in the happiness of others. Here's a simple example: I got a call out of the blue from a friend one day. I hadn't talked to her for a while, so I said, "How are you?" And she said, "I'm wonderful!" She really meant it—I could just feel that enthusiasm in her voice. Without even thinking, I just said, "I'm wonderful too!" That was the instant arising of mudita based on her happiness. It just picked me up as well.

Mudita is like a double dose of happiness. We resonate with someone else like sympathetic strings. I love this word "sympathetic" because of how the sitar is built, that Indian stringed instrument. There are sympathetic strings underneath—twelve or seventeen or something—and then the main strings above that get plucked. The little strings aren't plucked; they just resonate in sympathy with the strings that the musician fingers. That's how sympathetic joy works. When someone else's heart is resonating with happiness, our heart resonates in response, so it becomes contagious.

A simple phrase, if you feel like playing with it and haven't had formal instruction, is to think of someone else and say: "May your happiness and good fortune continue." Then you focus on the things in their life that are happy, the blessings that are active for them.

Shantideva, that seventh-century Indian author, put it like this: "Whatever joy there is in this world, all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world, all comes from wanting only myself to be happy." This is a beautiful indicator for our metta practice as well. Metta picks up our heart when we wish others well. Mudita does the same.

We don't teach mudita often in formal settings. It will be taught in Part Two. We usually teach it on metta retreats. But one weekend, I decided I wanted to teach mudita here, so I offered a weekend retreat with another teacher just on the theme of mudita. People came in on Friday evening and we practiced mudita together the whole weekend.

I thought, oh, nothing's going to happen in a weekend because it's the worst format for a retreat, isn't it? You have the first day where your body really hurts, and then you have the last day where you're already thinking about going home. That's a weekend retreat. But I was amazed how much people gained from it. Just doing the practice consistently, I could feel it in my own experience and I could feel it shaping others. At the end of that weekend, one of the meditators came up and said, "You know, this is the happiest I've felt in years, just from two days of doing mudita." So it really is an uplifting kind of practice.

There are other ways that happiness is found in life. As lay people, part of our life involves sense pleasures. We know that sense pleasures are impermanent and they don't give deep, lasting happiness and all of that. And yet, imagine your lay life without any sense pleasures. Wouldn't it feel a little bare?

These places flow with clear, cool water,
Covered with indigo clouds,
Adorned with flocks of many birds,
These rocky crags do please me so.

Like blue clouds in the sky,
Like palaces well-plastered,
Echoing with the cries of peacocks,
These rocky crags do please me so.

This is quite wonderful. Here's one of the most austere practitioners of the Buddha's time expressing such delight in the natural world. And this points to something important about our practice—we don't have to shut down our appreciation of beauty and simple pleasures. Even in the midst of deep renunciation, there's room for this kind of joy.

The Buddha taught that there are different kinds of happiness available to us at different times. There's the happiness that comes from getting what we want, which is pleasant but unstable. There's the happiness that comes from meditation and states of concentration, which is more refined and stable. And there's the happiness that comes from wisdom and freedom, which is the most lasting of all.

But he didn't say we should reject the simpler forms of happiness while we're cultivating the deeper ones. In fact, being able to appreciate the beauty around us, to take joy in simple pleasures with mindfulness and moderation—this can be part of our path. It can soften our hearts and make us more receptive to the deeper teachings.

I think sometimes in spiritual life we can become overly serious, overly concerned with getting to the "important" stuff. But joy itself is important. Lightness is important. The ability to be delighted by a beautiful sunset or a cup of tea or the sound of rain on the roof—these moments of simple happiness can be doorways into greater understanding.

The key is awareness. When we're mindful of our experience, even simple pleasures become part of our practice. We can notice how they arise and pass away. We can appreciate them without clinging to them. We can let them remind us of the preciousness and beauty that's always available in this moment.

Like the lofty peaks of looming clouds, like the most refined of palaces, the lovely calls of tuskers sound. These rocky crags do please me so. The lovely ground is rained upon, the hills are full of holy seers. Resounding with the cry of peacocks, these rocky crags do please me so.

It continues with more verses like that. He was an arhat, and you can see his sensitivity and joy in the beauty that surrounded him.

This reflection comes from Ajahn Sumedho, the former abbot of Amaravati in England. Sometimes in Theravada Buddhism, one gets the impression that you shouldn't enjoy beauty. If you see a beautiful flower, you should contemplate its decay. Or if you see a beautiful woman, you should contemplate her as a rotting corpse. That's a good reflection on anicca, dukkha, and anatta, but it can leave the impression that beauty is only to be reflected upon in terms of these three characteristics, rather than in terms of the experience of beauty itself. This is the joy of mudita—being able to appreciate the beauty in things around us.

There are other avenues to joy as well. Kamala spoke extensively about the quality of sila in her recent talk, and there is indeed great joy in virtue. The Buddha spoke of it as the bliss of blamelessness. When we have been committed for a long time to practices that don't harm others, over time there grows in us an appreciation for that refinement. We enjoy looking back on our past conduct and seeing that there is nothing to blame ourselves for in the way we've acted. This leads to a certain kind of happiness.

You might know this verse from the very opening of the Dhammapada: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable." This is one of the fruits of beautiful conduct.

Again, I think the Dalai Lama is a wonderful example of how this can be developed. At one point, Oprah Winfrey was interviewing him for an article in her magazine. They were going to talk for an hour, and Oprah started by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?" This leads us to reflect back on our own forgiveness meditation from a few weeks ago. Most of us can find a few things, right?

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes? It seems no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. There was awe in her voice when she continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

I believe that much of that brightness, happiness, and purity that we see in the Dalai Lama comes from his refinement of conduct, which is of course embedded in compassion and loving-kindness.

There's also great joy in generosity. Kamala spoke about this as well. I'm reminded of going to Burma when I went to ordain. A student knew that I was going and knew what teacher I was going to practice with, and she wanted to make an offering. So she gave me a few hundred dollars to take and donate to the monastery in whatever way I thought was appropriate.

When I arrived—this was before I ordained, I was still in lay clothes—I talked to the clerk of the monastery and said, "I have a donation from a supporter in America. Could we use it to offer a lunch for the 750 people who are practicing here?"

And the clerk said, "No, I'm sorry. All the lunches have been subscribed for the next three months." This was in one of the poorest countries on the face of the earth. But there is so much devotion and so much faith in the power and beauty of generosity that the three-month meal subscriptions had all been taken up.

I said, "Well, is there anything we could do?" He said, "Yes, you could sponsor a couple of special breakfasts." They make a special meal for everybody in the monastery that wouldn't normally be served, but when they have extra funds, they can do that. So then on those days when there were the special breakfasts, I could go down and read the meal board. They have a board much like ours—in fact, our board was inspired by this practice in Burmese monasteries of meal offerings—and the dedication for the day comes from the person or group who was offering the food. So I could go down and read her name on the days that the special breakfasts were offered.

But every day, going to lunch was a treat because the people who were offering the lunch that day would come to watch it being offered to the 450 monks and 150 nuns who went through the line. Sometimes it was a family, sometimes it was like a whole clan or a village. They would sit off to the side and watch the whole line of monks go through. Pauk Sayadaw would always lead the way because he had about 60 vassa at that point—he had so many years in the robes. He would be the first one through the line, then the senior monks, and then so on.

And they would look so happy. They would be so delighted watching everybody be served from their offering from that day. They would have collected the money from everybody in the village or the whole family. They would dress up in their best clothes to come and watch the meal being offered. It was really beautiful.

So we take these qualities like generosity, like virtue, like loving-kindness. These are considered bases for what's called merit. Wholesome actions in the teachings of the Buddha are considered to generate positive energy that more or less ripples forward with us. And this is from the Buddha: "There are these streams of merit, streams of the wholesome, nourishments of happiness, which are heavenly, ripening in happiness, conducive to heaven, and which lead to whatever is wished for, loved and agreeable—to one's welfare and happiness."

This is a profound statement. I hope you'll take it in and reflect on it. Practices like generosity, virtue, loving-kindness lead to whatever is wished for, loved and agreeable to one's welfare and happiness.

When I think about the sources of worldly happiness—happiness being a normal human being in the world—these are the three things I think about that are most important. And as someone mentioned in a question period the other morning, these can be found in every faith: generosity, virtue and loving-kindness. So as we practice these, this is a stream that can lead to what I call ordinary human happiness, worldly happiness.

Then, of course, our practice also offers us the deeper happiness of insight. This opens up new areas, greater potential for freedom. But the insight journey is not always so easy. As you know, the journey of insight opens up old psychological patterns, it opens up the common human tendency of craving through greed, aversion and delusion, and we meet those forces very directly. That's not easy. But there's even joy in that.

If you look at the moment when the mind is steady enough to meet a deeply entrenched pattern that you're just recognizing, there is a joy in that. Because until we meet it directly—and many of you have said this in the interviews—we don't have a possibility of releasing it. But when we can meet it directly and with clarity, there's a possibility of understanding it and then releasing it. And releasing these deeply held tendencies is a source of a great deal of freedom and happiness.

This is from an Australian poet named Michael Leunig: "When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring."

So even in healing, there is a sweetness. There's a joy. Then the meditation leads on to deeper states of concentration, peace and stillness. And these are felt as deeply satisfying places to be, deeply satisfying places to reside, to abide.

In some ways, I think for me personally, the discovery of peace was one of the most onward-leading fruits of retreat practice. As I began to practice through doing intensive retreats, I found levels of peace and calm that I'd never known in daily life—I'd never known in my ordinary existence. And they were so rich and meaningful that every time I thought, "Oh, if this much is possible, how much more is possible?" And then I would want to go back and find out what else was possible. So these experiences of deeper and deeper peace really led me on.

And of course one of the things that's most joyful about peace, even though the emotional tone may feel fairly neutral and not a strong affect, we start to really appreciate the absence of the hindrances. When the mind is in that state of stillness, the hindrances are no longer assaulting, and the relief of that is a beautiful kind of freedom.

And then as the concentration develops further, it moves into these states called jhāna. This is the way the Buddha described the first of the concentration states called jhāna: "One enters and abides in the first jhāna with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion. She makes the rapture and pleasure born of seclusion drench, fill, steep, and pervade this body so that there is no part of her whole body unpervaded by the rapture and pleasure." This is the delight of concentration as it deepens and matures. This rapture and pleasure become very accessible.

Another beautiful access to joy comes through gratitude. And gratitude is such a beautiful emotion. It's in the brahmavihāra family. And personally, I would put it very similar to—has a similar feel to—muditā for self. When we stop to appreciate our own blessings, we are in the realm of gratitude. So muditā for self can give access to gratitude, or you can access it through deliberately thinking of all the things you're grateful for, just calling them to mind.

I want to tell a little story about Kamala. So Kamala has some grandchildren, and one time she was talking to one of her granddaughters. Her granddaughter was about five or six at this time, I think. And Kamala called her on Christmas Day. Kamala was in Hawaii and her granddaughter was on the mainland. And the girl had gotten a lot of Christmas presents that she really enjoyed. You know, being six years old, you love Christmas presents—that's kind of like the high time of the year.

And so Kamala asked this really thoughtful question. She said, "Oh, when you get lots of presents, do you feel thankful for what you have or does it make you want more?"

And the little girl said, "Oh, Nana, I want more."

And Kamala just said in her very quiet way, "Oh, that's too bad."

So the granddaughter actually picked up on that and said, "Well, what do you mean?"

And Kamala said, "Well, haven't you noticed that when you're thankful for what you have, you feel good? And when you're wanting more, it doesn't feel as good?"

And the little girl said, "Oh Nana, you're right."

So this is the beauty of gratitude. When we have gratitude, greed is blocked because we appreciate what we have. And aversion is blocked because we appreciate the present moment. So gratitude is a movement out of those kilesas. And as such, it's in the brahmavihāra family—it's one aspect of the brahmavihāras.

And we all have a lot to be grateful for. Just think about the opportunity to be here for six weeks or three months immersed in the Dharma. Even though it's difficult, even though many times you might wish to be anywhere else but here, it's a fabulous opportunity. And it's like—you know, I think of it as an investment in our future happiness and freedom. We're making deposits that will ripen in the future, moment by moment.

So in thinking about all we have to be grateful for, I'm reminded of a friend who was working in a refugee camp in Thailand. And the refugees were people from the countries where the wars had been going on. This was in the mid-eighties. So both in Cambodia and in Laos, there had been quite destructive regimes where a lot of people were suffering and a lot of people were displaced from their homes. And so a number of the people who were coming into the refugee camps were from the hill tribes of those countries.

When they came to the refugee camp, our friend and other workers—aid workers, both Thai and Western—were helping them acclimatize to a new culture. And they were teaching them skills like how to use money, what a washing machine does, what a toaster is, and how to read a bus schedule.

Because from where they had come, these people didn't have those things. So one of the questions that they would routinely ask in their schools in the refugee camp was: what are the most important things in life? This one teenage girl said, "The most important things in life are fire, rice, and water."

I think about that because if we didn't have those things, they would be the most important things for us too. But as it is, we have food, we have clothing, we have shelter, we have some access to medicine. These are considered the requisites in the Buddhist system. We have those things, and many of us have much more than that. So we all have that to be grateful for, as well as the Dharma.

Many of you have mentioned this over recent days—the gratitude for the opportunity to be here, the gratitude to be able to practice, gratitude for the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. These really are our refuges.

So joy is normally considered to be dependent on these conditions. It flowers in response to conditions. Happiness becomes a kind of softer and quieter bloom that isn't so dependent on conditions. It settles within us, or we settle into that quality of contentment.

We could say that happiness is a kind of joy that has risen up into rapture or pīti and become more intense, and then has become tranquilized through calm to settle out into this stable kind of contentment where really the mind is finding the quality of being contented within itself. It's not looking out anymore.

We don't have to worry about making this happiness permanent. That was something that bothered me as I first started to come upon this—that there wasn't a way to fix it and make it permanent. But we can't do that. We don't have to try. It will come when it comes and it will go when it goes. And that's why there's this saying in the Dharma: "Take care of this moment and you take care of all time." And we develop that attitude. We take care of this moment.

This is from Rumi, and it helps to remember that when Rumi says "you," he means what is divine, what is most essential:

"Come to the orchard in spring.
There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers.
If you do not come, these do not matter.
If you do come, these do not matter."

That's that deep contentment.

But then, of course, the practice doesn't stop here. It doesn't stop just with wholesome states. The Buddha said at one point, "Two things I never lost track of in my own practice: not to be lax in my efforts and not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind." Because the sequence continues from happiness into concentration, insight, and liberation.

But the role of happiness is really important. One of my teachers, Mingyur Rinpoche, who's a very bright young Tibetan Lama currently away on a personal retreat that is in its fourth year and counting, put it this way: "The main cause of freedom is happiness. The main cause of freedom is happiness." We cultivate this and it's onward leading. It goes further.

Joseph's first teacher, Munindra-ji, used to say, "If you aim for the highest happiness, all the other kinds will come along the way." So we just keep walking this path of mindfulness pointed to the final goal, and all kinds of happiness flower along the way.

And as Kamala read the other night: "The goal of the practice is not virtue or gain or renown or concentration or insight, but it is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of the holy life, its heartwood and its end." That is the highest happiness.

So let's just sit together for a moment, please. It is the unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of the holy life, its heartwood and its end.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 56

Mindfulness of Breathing

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this foundational dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong unpacks mindfulness of breathing like Russian dolls - situating ānāpānasati within the Four Noble Truths, Noble Eightfold Path, and four satipaṭṭhānas. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and Ānāpānasati Sutta (MN 118), he defines mindfulness as "understanding what your experience is in the present moment" based on the Pali term pajānāti. Armstrong emphasizes mindfulness of the body as the foundation, explaining why the Buddha prioritized kāyagatāsati despite meditation being ultimately about mental liberation. He provides practical guidance on vitakka and vicāra (connecting and sustaining attention), addressing both the samatha (tranquility) and vipassana (insight) aspects of breath meditation. The talk includes considerations for when breath practice might not be suitable, alternative anchors like sound awareness, and how mindful attention reveals the three characteristics of existence. Armstrong concludes with the Buddha's promise that ānāpānasati develops tranquility, rapture, pleasure, gladness, concentration, and liberation.

I think this has been a very successful day for practice because we've reached nearly the end of the first full day and everybody's still here. Congratulations and well done. The first days often are difficult. As you know from earlier retreats, it can take a while to settle in. So please don't get discouraged until about the third or fourth day.

The subject of tonight's talk is mindfulness of breathing. I wanted to talk about this because these are the instructions that we've been working with for the first couple of days. When I thought about talking about mindfulness of breathing, I realized that I needed to put it in the context of the Buddha's whole teachings. When I looked at doing that, it became like one of those Russian dolls—you know, where you take off the head and there's a smaller one underneath, and then you take off that head and there's a smaller one. I want to unpack the Russian dolls that hold mindfulness of breathing.

The first is the Buddha's first discourse, where he talked about the four noble truths: the truth of suffering, the cause of suffering, the end of suffering, and the way to the end of suffering. It's said that the whole rest of his teaching career—forty-five years—was just footnotes to those four teachings. This is the biggest container that we'll talk about, the Buddha's Four Noble Truths.

Within the Four Noble Truths, the way to the end of suffering is the Eightfold Noble Path. Within the Eightfold Noble Path, in the meditation section, we have right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. So now we're in the territory of mindfulness.

Within the territory of mindfulness, the way right mindfulness is described is in terms of the four foundations of mindfulness. Within the four foundations of mindfulness, the first foundation is mindfulness of the body. And within mindfulness of the body, the first thing mentioned is mindfulness of breathing.

So these are the containers: Four Noble Truths reveals the Eightfold Path, reveals mindfulness, reveals the Four Foundations, reveals mindfulness of the body, reveals mindfulness of breathing. This is the little bit of the teachings that I want to talk about tonight.

I also want to bring in a discussion of what mindfulness is and why mindfulness of the body is important and then the role of mindfulness of breathing. So I want to hit those last three dolls as we get to mindfulness of breathing.

What is mindfulness? I find this a really interesting question because I've asked a lot of people, and as many people as I've asked, I've come up with that many definitions. You can go on the web and find tons of definitions also, especially because mindfulness has come into the mainstream and scientists are getting interested in it. They want to get really precise.

The Buddha never defined mindfulness. I think this is really interesting. He never said mindfulness is A, B, and C. You have to get the flavor of it from reading all the different things he said about it. If you go on the web and listen to recent Western understandings of mindfulness, you can get a lot of different definitions. I'm always kind of amused when I go on the web and read that someone is the foremost authority on mindfulness because they have a PhD and they've been studying it academically, never mentioning that the whole concept came from the Buddha twenty-five hundred years ago. I personally consider the Buddha the foremost authority on mindfulness.

In wanting to understand what mindfulness is, I think it's interesting to look at one of his discourses. The Satipatthana Sutta is the primary teaching that he gave on the general development of mindfulness. To unpack that term: sati means mindfulness, patthana means establishing, and sutta means, literally, thread, but in the context of the teachings it means discourse. This is a discourse on the ways of establishing mindfulness. It's sometimes called the foundations of mindfulness, but it's how we establish mindfulness.

I want to read you some excerpts from that discourse in the operational way that mindfulness is developed. In the first foundation, there's this phrase: "Breathing in long, one understands 'I breathe in long.' Or breathing in short, one understands 'I breathe in short.'" In the second foundation: "Feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' Or feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.'" In the third foundation: "When the mind is affected by hate, one understands 'the mind is affected by hate.' When the mind is not affected by hate, one understands 'the mind is not affected by hate.'" In the fourth foundation: "When the enlightenment factor of energy is present, one understands 'the enlightenment factor of energy is present.' When the enlightenment factor of energy is not present, one understands 'the enlightenment factor of energy is not present.'"

What do you take as the key word running through all of these? What word repeats?

Breathing in long, one understands, "I breathe in long."

It's this word "understands," isn't it? It occurs in every one of the explanations of how to develop mindfulness. So I take this word "understands" as pointing us experientially to what mindfulness is.

This word "understands" is Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation of the Pali word pajanati. It is very closely related to the term sampajanna, which is usually translated as clear comprehension. While Bhikkhu Bodhi translates it as "understands," the Venerable Analayo in his book on the Satipatthana Sutta translates it as "knows." This is interesting—one person says "knows," the other says "understands." You get the sense this word is somewhere between understanding and knowing.

I want to suggest, drawing from Guy Armstrong's definition as a modern Western interpreter of the Buddhist teachings, that for us as practitioners, the working definition of mindfulness can be: understanding what your experience is in the present moment.

This is a lot less complicated than many of the definitions you'll read on the web. You can find some very long descriptions with a lot of added material, but I think for our purposes, based on the Satipatthana Sutta, this is a good way for us to think of it.

I like this definition because it's really simple and directive. Suppose you get in a situation where you become confused or a little lost, or you're not sure how to practice in the next moment. What this definition says is: take a look at what's happening in your present moment experience. If you can do that and notice what it is, you've reactivated mindfulness. That means you're back on track, and that means the path is engaged again. You've engaged the path to awakening.

This is really easy. No matter what's going on, you just ask—this is another way to put it—"What's happening now?" When you know the answer to that, when you understand, "Oh, this is what's happening now," mindfulness has been reactivated.

I want to put this out really as a practice instruction. It's my interpretation—other teachers may frame it a little differently—but I found that this really works. It's really simple and really helpful for me to remember. In any moment, this is how we turn mindfulness back on: we ask, "What's happening now?" We look and we see.

As Andy said this morning, it can be in any of the six senses. It could be sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions, mind objects. Just take a look. One of those will stand out when you look.

The next question is: is mindfulness automatic? Is it always happening for you? Did it happen every moment today? No, not likely. If it did, please come sit up here and you can give us teachings.

We have to make a little bit of effort to be mindful, but that effort doesn't need to be very hard. For instance, if you put your fingertips together right now, can you be mindful of that experience of the fingers touching? Is that difficult? No. Mindfulness can be just that light and just that easy. It requires a little bit of attention to know it, but not much work.

The difficult thing with mindfulness is remembering to do it in every new moment, because we get distracted. We go in other directions. It's not hard to be mindful, but the intention has to be renewed frequently because it's not automatic. You can't just say at the start of a sit, "I'm going to be mindful this whole sitting," and have that happen.

During the sitting, you need to keep renewing that intention to answer the question, "What's happening now?" It's the renewing of that intention that makes mindfulness come into more and more moments of your day—more and more moments of your sitting, your walking, your working, your meals, your showers, your bathroom breaks, and so on—so that little by little, the whole day gets filled in with these moments.

And that's what we're pointing to when we talk about the continuity of mindfulness. It's not that we expect mindfulness really to be continuous, but the aim is to make it more and more frequent. That is, fill in more and more moments of the day with this quality, simply knowing what's going on, what you're experiencing. And that's how it develops.

So it's very simple. And when you first come into a retreat like this, it may not feel like very much. When we noticed the contact of the fingertips, that probably didn't feel like an earth-shaking moment. But what's so interesting is that when you put one simple moment next to another, next to another, the power of the momentum of the continuity of mindfulness starts to build and it does become earth-shaking.

This is a practice that can take us to the depths of our being and give us a fantastically new approach to life—to our inner life, to outer life, to other people. So it's fascinating to me that such simple knowing, just knowing what you're experiencing, can lead to such powerful results.

I'd like to read this from the Buddha. This is toward the end of the Satipatthana Sutta, the Discourse on Mindfulness:

"This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of Nibbana, namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

That's a big promise. And it all starts with such a simple act of connecting—connecting to the present moment.

Now, I think everyone admitted you weren't mindfully present in every moment of the day. So we have to look at the question: what's the alternative? When we're not being mindful, what's happening?

I like this cartoon in the New Yorker from some months ago. There was a person at work on their PC, supposed to be working on the keyboard, but there was a thought bubble—a fantasy, an imagination—of them on the golf course. Daydreaming, obviously. The next panel showed that person on the golf course, and there's a thought bubble as they're holding their club of them making love with a partner. Another daydream. The third panel—maybe you can guess—they're in bed making love with their partner and there's a thought bubble of them being at work on the PC.

This is the alternative when we're not mindful. We get taken over and carried away into these imaginings and into these thought streams. So where do they take us?

When we're not mindful, where does the attention go? It goes a lot into past, it goes a lot into future—remembering and anticipating. It goes into planning, into judging, into comparing, into views and opinions, and it goes into fantasy, some pleasant, some unpleasant.

We can talk about these as distractions. And to me, that sounds kind of neutral. You know, "I got distracted for a second, but now I'm back." But if you look closely at where the thoughts lead emotionally, is it always that neutral?

When you go into the past, do you sometimes go into regret, sadness, anger, conflict, judgments of yourself or others? When you go into the future, is it just a kind of clinical investigation, or do you go into wanting or longing or anxiety or worry or fear about the future?

Start to investigate what is happening when you're not being mindful. Is it just a neutral experience, like imagining what's for lunch? Or do some of these thoughts, memories, plans for the future take you into areas that are actually pretty emotionally charged?

In my observation, this happens a lot. When our minds wander, they tend to wander into areas that have charge for us. So it's hard to be mindful in the middle of a thought stream, but when you return to the present moment—which you will—check and see where the attention has been. When you come back, do you feel more peaceful, more settled, more contented, more calm, more happy? Or how often do you feel more agitated, more stirred up, more discontented, more upset?

This is not to be judgmental, because all of our minds wander in these directions. We're not wanting to judge this activity, but we do want to learn from it. We want to learn what's going on in our minds. Specifically, we want to learn what are our actions of mind, of speech, and of body that lead us into more unhappiness, and what are the actions that lead us into more happiness.

One of the key questions you can investigate is: where is the attention dwelling? And when the attention dwells in the present moment, how does that feel? Well, the present moment isn't always pleasant. Difficult emotion may be present. The body may not be so comfortable.

So coming into the present is not always a great experience. But because of our development of mindfulness, it holds this transformative potential. So it's where we want to place our bets, really, as meditators. It's what we want to trust in.

But when we wander away in extended thoughts, again, check it out. Do they lead to greater calm, contentment, happiness, and settledness? Or do those thought streams end up making us more agitated and dissatisfied? Do they tend to lead more to suffering? And where are we dwelling? Are we dwelling in the present, which has the potential to be transformative? Are we dwelling in past and future views and opinions, regrets and anticipation?

This is a really key distinction that the Buddha drew between what he called wise attention and unwise attention. We're always placing our attention somewhere. This is an interesting thing to see when you start to meditate and observe the mind. The attention is always landing somewhere. In Abhidhamma terms, the attention is what's called a universal factor. It's present in every waking moment. Where is the attention landing and where is it dwelling? We can examine this. We can start to observe the mind.

One of the great things, Joseph's first teacher, Manindraji said, "If you want to understand the mind, sit down and observe it." And that's really what we're doing here. It's really simple. We sit down and we see what it does. So one of the things it does, it moves attention from one object to another throughout the course of a sitting, a walking, a meal, moving about your room and so forth. Where is the attention landing and how long is it dwelling there? Is it dwelling in places that lead to greater calm, settledness, peace and happiness? Or is it dwelling in places that leave us more agitated and stirred up?

It's not that we can automatically control by will where the attention goes and for how long, but this is the interesting thing about the wisdom aspect of mindfulness. Remember I said that pajanati, related to clear comprehension, has a wisdom component. So mindfulness has an intelligent property built in. It understands, it knows. And that intelligence, when it wakes up, can look at attention, where it's dwelling that leads to happiness, where it's dwelling that leads to suffering, and learn from that.

You don't have to force it by will, but if you turn your mindful attention to that question, mindfulness will show you the answer. And more and more, just by wisdom, we learn, "I don't really want to hang out where I'm increasing my own suffering. I want to hang out with attention that's leading to greater happiness." So trust in this aspect of mindfulness. Trust that it will learn as you observe and show you the way. You don't have to figure it all out ahead of time. Watch what happens, what leads to happiness, what doesn't.

So, of course, wise attention to the present moment is one of the best ways to dwell. As the Dalai Lama said—you could say this about a lot of things—the present moment is the only place we can feel love or compassion or insight. All these beautiful qualities come about when we can connect to the present moment. So this first benefit of mindfulness is that we spend more time connecting in the present, less time in the agitated thoughts of past and future. That leads to more settledness and we start to learn how the mind operates, what leads to suffering and what leads to happiness.

But I think you all know it's not that thoughts are the problem or that thoughts are the enemy or that we shouldn't be thinking. We're not meditating to stop thinking. We're meditating to become aware of thinking when it happens. So we'll unfold the instructions in a few more days so that we can be as mindful of a thought as we are of any other present moment experience. But it takes a little stability to do that well, so we'll wait a few more days to do that. So just as Annie said this morning, anything that's happening can be a great ground for mindfulness, including thinking. And we'll get there.

So that's just kind of a broad view of mindfulness, the way it leads to peace, the way it leads to greater happiness, connecting to the moment. And then I want to talk a little bit about the next dallin, which is mindfulness of the body. Within the overall field of mindfulness, this is one that is really helpful and really central. Mindfulness of the body. It's in so many discourses of the Buddha's. Of course, it's the first foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta.

There's one part in the numerical discourses, the Anguttara Nikaya, where there are fifty discourses in a row in praise of the benefits of mindfulness of the body—fifty discourses in a row. So that's very encouraging, very inspiring.

Here's one of the things the Buddha said in one of those discourses: "They do not partake of the deathless who do not partake of mindfulness of the body. They partake of the deathless who partake of mindfulness of the body." The deathless is a synonym for nibbana—the state of unshakable peace that the Buddha discovered in his enlightenment and passed on to us through his teachings.

Here's another beautiful statement from those numerical discourses: "When one thing is developed and cultivated, the body becomes tranquil, the mind becomes tranquil, extraneous thoughts subside, and all wholesome qualities that pertain to true knowledge reach fulfillment. What is that one thing? Mindfulness directed to the body."

So the Buddha encouraged us again and again to be really in touch with our direct experience in the body—as he said, to feel these experiences in the body, not as thoughts, but what's actually happening in the body.

I find this really interesting because ultimately meditation is about the mind. If we want to understand the mind, we sit down and observe it. We want to understand what mental actions lead to happiness and what lead to suffering. And if you look at some of the most important lists, you'll see how mental they are: the five hindrances, the four right efforts, the seven factors of enlightenment, and the five spiritual faculties. These are all about qualities of mind, and it is qualities of mind that liberate.

The body can be completely free of pain, the body can be completely healthy, and yet it does not of itself have liberating potential. If it did, babies would be pretty much done—healthy babies might be enlightened! But it's really about our challenge to wake up the mind and its wisdom. That's what truly frees us.

So why is the body so central, so emphasized in the Buddha's teachings? Several reasons.

First, mindfulness of the body is always available. We can always drop in and feel the body and know what's happening. As a ground, it's always there for us—a great support in that way. If you're not sure what to pay attention to, just feel the body.

The Buddha himself said that while the body is changing, it's not changing as fast as the mind. So if you want someplace a little more stable to land, the body is a little more stable than the mind. That's why it grounds our attention, and you can feel that as you sit.

As you sit in stillness in the meditation hall, feel how the grounded calm of the body communicates to the mind. The mind absorbs the stillness that the body's manifesting. It's quite beautiful. We sometimes give the instruction to sit like a mountain, and you feel how the body can just sit through all kinds of storms. There could be mental storms, there could be bodily restlessness, and to some extent—it's one of the beautiful things I appreciate when I look out—you all are sitting still and letting it go. The body stays there unmoved in a way.

This quality of unmovedness communicates to the mind. It's one of the reasons that sitting meditation has a certain power. Of course, we need to discover this unshakable attention in all the postures, but the sitting posture does communicate something of that unshakability.

Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was one of my teachers in Thailand when I was in robes, said, "Don't do anything that takes you out of the body." This is an interesting practice instruction for the day. See what it would feel like to stay in the body most of the time, to really inhabit it, as Annie mentioned in the walking. Can we really inhabit our body all day long?

This is a very helpful practice direction, and it's in such sharp contrast to much of Western culture. I think about James Joyce, the Irish author. One of his characters in Ulysses was a man named Mr. Duffy, and Joyce's description was: "Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body."

When you feel into that, you get the sense of a withdrawal from life—separation from the vital energy of the body into some kind of headspace, too much thought.

Disconnected in some ways.

As we stay in touch with the body, one of the great benefits is that we remain connected to our emotions. Often it becomes difficult to stay in the body because the emotions have grown too uncomfortable. Particularly for people who have experienced trauma in life—whether from personal incidents, physical abuse, verbal abuse, sexual abuse, racism, or homophobia—the body can become full of trauma's residue, making it challenging to inhabit. Longstanding racism and homophobia can be traumatic as well, leaving their mark in the body.

Mindfulness of the body isn't always available to all of us. If contact with bodily energy feels overwhelming or threatening because of this residue, then mindfulness of the body may not be the preferred anchor. In such cases, speak with your teacher to find the best approach. Mindfulness of sound might serve as a helpful alternative.

But if you're able to rest attention in the body without too much difficulty, it serves as a wonderful channel for staying in touch with emotions. If the mind is agitated, the body will likely be as well. If the body feels calm, the mind will often be calm too. It's an excellent place to check in and feel what's happening.

When any strong emotion arises, it manifests in the body. Happiness brings an uplift. Joy creates a surge of energy, perhaps in the chest. Fear appears as strong contraction. Anger might tense the neck and shoulders. By staying in touch with the body, you know what's happening in the mind when these strong emotions are present. This contributes greatly to self-knowledge and self-understanding.

As Annie mentioned, when we bring attention into the body and truly inhabit it, we notice the impact of breathing. Sitting and feeling the body, you begin to sense what breathing in and breathing out actually feels like.

Now we enter the terrain of mindfulness of breathing, the innermost of these nested practices. Looking at the modern history of Vipassana practice—I don't know if it's always been this way—but in the last fifty to seventy-five years, mindfulness of breathing has become the most emphasized practice. In my observation, among the teachers I've sat with, the books I've read, and the talks I've listened to, the first instruction is most often mindfulness of breathing. It has come to occupy a central role in our lineage, and there are very good reasons for this.

But as Annie said this morning, mindfulness of breathing isn't the right anchor for everyone. Just as mindfulness of body sometimes isn't helpful, mindfulness of breathing isn't always the best place to settle.

Let me share a few reasons why, before exploring what makes it so beneficial. If you've had difficulty breathing at some point in your life—perhaps childhood asthma or a life-threatening situation where you felt you couldn't breathe—mindfulness of breathing may reconnect you with that experience and bring up the fear and anxiety you felt then. In such cases, it might not be the best primary focus.

Another situation where mindfulness of breathing might not work well: if, like me, you were a perfectionist or striver in life or early meditation. When I started with mindfulness of breathing, I thought I couldn't miss a single breath or it wouldn't work. I stayed really tightly focused, trying to catch every breath that passed. Of course, I couldn't. But attempting this made me incredibly tense. Only after extensive meditation with other objects did I learn to relax enough to return to the breath in a truly easeful way.

Notice your relationship to the breath as you begin connecting with it. If you find yourself becoming tense around it, speak with your teacher. Perhaps there are ways to bring relaxation into mindfulness of breathing, or maybe a combination of breath with another focus would be most helpful. Talk with your teacher and see what makes sense for you.

The central discourse in the Buddha's teachings on this topic is called the Anapanasati Sutta, the discourse on mindfulness of breathing. It appears in the Middle Length Sayings, like the Satipatthana Sutta, and contains a long section describing all the benefits of mindfulness of breathing.

One thing I find particularly interesting: at one point in his teaching career—the Buddha was fully awakened at thirty-five before he began teaching, then taught for forty-five more years—he went into retreat for three months. This meant: don't talk to me. I'm not coming out to give talks. I'm staying in seclusion and doing my own practice.

When he emerged, what do you think he had been practicing? For three months, he practiced mindfulness of breathing. I find this fascinating—someone already awakened still found it helpful to abide in mindfulness of breathing. If it worked for the Buddha, it must be beneficial for us as well.

In mindfulness of breathing, notice where you feel it most clearly. This varies greatly from person to person. Some feel it most clearly at the nose, others in the chest, still others in the belly. Some experience what's called whole body breathing—settling into the torso and feeling the expansion and contraction of the rib cage, like bellows.

Or some people like to follow the breath as it enters the nose, goes down, expands the chest, expands the belly, and then reverses on the way out.

So that was what? About half a dozen different techniques for mindfulness of breathing. And there are many, many more. You can add mental noting to that or not. There are lots of ways to feel the breath. All of them are good.

I'll give some more suggestions tomorrow morning in the instructions, but there's one particular aspect of mindfulness of breathing I want to talk about: connecting and sustaining. These are translations of two Pali terms called vitaka and vichara. They are the first two factors that go into developing strong concentration, and they are factors to some extent under our control. This is the beauty of connecting and sustaining.

The idea is this: let's say we take the breath as an object. When an in-breath begins, we connect our attention to it. This is the exercise in wise attention—I'm going to be mindful of the breath. So on the start of the in-breath, we make the effort to connect the attention to that experience of breathing in. That's connecting. That's vitaka.

And then once we've connected, we make the effort to sustain the attention there for a bit. This is the effort of vichara.

So the question becomes: how long should you sustain? What if I told you that you were no good unless you could sustain the attention for ten minutes? Would you succeed? No. So we're not going to say that.

The right length of time to sustain, according to us, is one half a breath. Can you connect at the start of the in-breath and sustain the attention for the duration of the in-breath? Then can you connect at the start of the out-breath and sustain the attention for the duration of the out-breath? That's enough. Is that doable? Sometimes, right? Sometimes you might just touch it and then off. But often you can sustain for half a breath.

Play with these two factors: connecting the attention at the start of an in-breath, sustaining it for the in-breath. Connecting it for the start of the out-breath and sustaining for the length of the out-breath. See what happens in your practice. It's the continuity of mindfulness that leads to the development of samādhi. These are two factors that help the samādhi to grow, and they are factors to some extent within our power.

Focus on developing these two qualities as you're engaging with the breath and see what happens.

Of course, you'll go away. Of course, you'll be gone for a while. Of course, you'll come back. When you come back, can you land with grace? Instead of saying, "Oh, I messed it up again. I was away. I was away for so long."

Here's a place you could ask: what's the right length of time to be away? What's that bar? Do you have one? No, but whatever time you were away, it was too long, right? We don't know the right length of time to be away, but whatever time it was, it was too long.

So we can't control the length we were away. When you're back, you can't really control how long you're back before the attention goes away again into thought and the loss of mindfulness. That's okay. The thing is that this is the training.

As we practice connecting and sustaining, we will be present more and more. We will be away in thought, lost in thought, less and less. That's the way it develops.

Now another name for this connecting and sustaining, which I really like, is aiming and rubbing. These are just different translations of the same words, vitaka and vicara. Think about it in this way: you aim your attention toward the first contact with the in-breath, and then when it lands, you rub it. Rub it with your mindful attention. When the in-breath ends, you let go of that. Then when the out-breath starts, you aim again and you rub for a bit.

This has a lovely kind of physical, almost sensual feeling of intimacy between the attention and the direct experience in the body. When we learn to aim and rub, we get some very nice results.

One is, of course, that you're staying connected to the present moment. You're not going off into the unwise fields of attention. The second is that when you rub any experience—whether it's a body sensation, an in-breath, an out-breath, an emotion, or a thought—when you rub it with mindful attention, you start to know it better. You start to learn about it because the wisdom is there in the middle of the rubbing. Mindfulness is learning at the same time that you're rubbing.

What do we learn? We rub the sensation of an in-breath. Maybe it feels like expansion. Maybe it feels like pressure. We rub that and one of the things we see is that any sensation within an in-breath has certain qualities. Expansion feels a certain way. Contraction feels a certain way. Pressure feels a certain way. These lead us into really understanding the bare physical nature of our bodies.

Formally, we would talk about these in terms of the four elements. By rubbing a sensation, by rubbing an in-breath, we start to get to know the body in terms of the four elements that make it up: earth, water, fire, and air. We start to see its primal nature—that my air element is just like yours, my earth element is just like yours, my earth element is just like the rocks and the trees. We start to see that in our direct experience.

We learn the individual nature of bodily sensations, the individual nature of the breath, but we also start to see its universal characteristics. We see that every sensation of expansion that arises also is of the nature to pass away. Every sensation of contraction that arises also is of the nature to pass away. Every in-breath passes away. Every out-breath passes away. We start to see this as we rub our experience with mindful attention.

We start to understand these universal characteristics of impermanence, of unreliability. Nothing stays the same connected with the breath. We might always like the breath to be smooth and comfortable and calm, but it's not always like that. It's not always reliable. We start to see all these things are coming and going on their own. We don't make the sensation of expansion be the way it is. We don't make the feeling of pressure be the way it is. The body is doing its own thing and to a large extent it's out of our hands. The body is living its own life.

Classically speaking, by rubbing we start to really see the three characteristics of existence: the impermanent, unsatisfactory, and selfless nature of what makes up our experience—in this case, of the breath, or you could say of the body. This is because mindfulness comes with built-in wisdom and the rubbing lets us get to know our experience directly. The wisdom will illuminate those truths for us.

When the Buddha talked about mindfulness meditation, he described two broad effects that it has. One he called samatha, the other he called vipassana. Samatha is tranquility, vipassana is insight—that's how we usually translate them. This means that as you develop mindfulness, part of what happens is you get calm, and the other part is you get wise. The samatha aspects lead to greater tranquility in body and in mind. The vipassana aspects lead us to understand the way our experience is constructed.

It leads us to see these three characteristics, which lead us into letting go. And it's the letting go that leads us into liberation. So we really appreciate both these developments.

The tranquility feels good in and of itself. Sometimes we think tranquility is primarily of the mind, but tranquility is equally of the body. When we come into meditation, often we've accumulated twenty, thirty, forty years or more of life experiences that result in the body having tension, having stored emotions. And when we sit, sometimes those things come through and the body doesn't feel so tranquil and the mind doesn't feel so tranquil. The samatha aspects of mindfulness start to allow that energy to move through and calm the whole system, calm the body and calm the mind. And then we find that we can sit comfortably with some degree of ease of both body and mind. This is the beauty of samatha.

This samatha can be developed to great depths, and when it's developed to great depths, it strengthens to a high degree the factor of concentration, of samadhi. Having met teachers who have developed this element to a very high degree, it is very impressive. Someone like Dipa Ma, an Indian teacher who visited IMS in the late seventies, an Indian woman from Calcutta—really beautiful being, radiated loving kindness. Her mind was so still and her heart was just open. In her presence you always felt loved. Ajahn Chah, a Thai forest master, had strong unification of mind, strong samadhi from very early on as a child. He said for twenty-five years he had never felt anger. And U Ba Khin, who was a teacher of mine, a samatha teacher of mine both in Burma and here, was such a steady being. I never saw a flicker of reactivity cross his face. So settled, so in his body and so peaceful.

So the development of samatha can go to great depths. It's very beautiful. But we are not primarily focusing on that development here. We are primarily focusing on the development of insight, of vipassana, and samatha will come as a side benefit. So it's a beautiful thing, but we're not primarily practicing just for samatha.

In taking the breath as an object to develop vipassana, we want to have an open and natural relationship with it. So we might say that we will develop a slight preference for being with the breath, but it's not an exclusive, attached relationship. We can have other partners. So we may like to come back frequently to the breath and aim in that direction, but we're not clinging to it. So when another experience comes that naturally draws our attention, the attention can easily move there—whether it's sensation in the body, a sound, an emotion, a thought, a sight if we're walking outside.

By staying connected with the breath in vipassana, you will continue to strengthen the quality of samatha, but not in an exclusive kind of one-dimensional way. So mindfulness of breathing within a vipassana context has a nice combination of settledness and calming effect, but also an openness to all our experience—very open, wide mind—and an ability to learn through that practice from all the different sense experiences that we contact.

So trust in this quality of mindfulness in general, in mindfulness of the body, in mindfulness of the breath. It will be a consistent place to dwell with wise attention. It will keep you away from all those troublesome avenues of unwise attention. And it's also the gateway to insight. Through the wisdom properties of mindfulness itself, it opens the door to insight.

So I just want to close with mentioning a few of the qualities that the Buddha said mindfulness of breathing leads to. I'm going to really condense it instead of reading a section from the discourse. I'm just going to hit the highlights. The Buddha said that mindfulness of breathing can be used to develop tranquility, rapture, pleasure, gladness, concentration, and liberation. All of these are in our path as we dwell in mindfulness of breathing.

Let's just sit for a minute and let these words settle: mindfulness of breathing will develop tranquility, rapture, pleasure, gladness, concentration and liberation.

CHAPTER 57

Morning Instructions

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> In this foundational dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers clear meditation instructions focusing on three primary anchors for practice. He begins by emphasizing the importance of balanced posture that embodies both relaxation and alertness, reflecting the mental attitude needed for effective meditation.
>
> Armstrong guides practitioners through three distinct approaches: whole-body awareness while sitting (kāyagatāsati), mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), and mindfulness of sounds. He emphasizes developing a receptive attitude rather than forcing attention, encouraging practitioners to rest in awareness and allow experiences to arise naturally. The teaching draws on the wisdom that "if you sit and know that you're sitting, the whole of the Dharma will unfold for you."
>
> This instruction is particularly valuable for both beginning and experienced meditators, offering practical guidance on how to work skillfully with attention and awareness. Armstrong addresses the common experience of mind-wandering with compassion, teaching practitioners to notice the aftereffects of thinking and gently return to present-moment awareness. The emphasis on receptivity and spaciousness provides a foundation for developing deeper samādhi and insight.

This morning we'll continue with the same basic meditation instructions as Annie introduced yesterday. I'll encourage you to work with one of the primary anchors we've talked about: body, sounds, or breath. We'll introduce these one by one, and then you can find the focus that's most suitable for you in this period.

Begin the meditation by feeling comfortable in your posture, finding a position where you feel relaxed and also upright, where the back is reasonably straight and yet you're not straining or stiff. What this posture really represents is also a mental attitude. In meditation we want to have the mind be relaxed and alert, and the body posture supports that. The uprightness supports the alertness. The relaxation supports the sense of ease.

If we're too relaxed, the mind easily drifts away from the present. But if we're too tight, we'll never feel happy about meditating. And it's nice to occasionally feel happy about meditating.

As you settle into this posture, let yourself just feel yourself in sitting. It's not so much that we want to observe the posture, observe the body from above, from someplace in the head, but rather this embodied experience of the posture means we feel the body sitting from inside. What is it like to let your attention just settle within the body and feel it throughout?

Notice how there's some awareness of the body all through, from the top of the head, through the neck and shoulders, through the back, through the arms and hands, in the chest and belly, the hips, and the legs and feet. Wherever attention goes in the body, there's some awareness there. Sometimes there's a clear sensation. Sometimes there may not be a sensation. That's all right. There's some awareness in that part of the body. Awareness really permeates the whole body.

So the first anchor that you can opt for is just this sense of sitting with the whole body in sitting. As Ajahn Chah said, if you sit and know that you're sitting, the whole of the Dharma will unfold for you.

As you're sitting, feeling the whole body, then you may notice from time to time the sensations that are connected with breathing. You might start to notice what happens in the body when there's an in-breath. Where do you feel in the body the impact of the in-breath? And how does that feel? What's that feeling like of an in-breath? Do you just feel the in-breath in one little place? Do you feel it in a few places in the body? Do you feel it throughout the body? There's not one right answer to this; it's just for you to look at your experience.

And then what happens in the body when there's an out-breath? What are the sensations that arise that let you know an out-breath is happening? And how does that feel? How does the out-breath feel? Where in the body do you feel the out-breath? In just one place? In a few places or throughout the body?

Having explored both the in-breath and out-breath a bit, then being a little continuous, feeling the in-breath followed by the out-breath, feeling the next in-breath and the next out-breath. This is the second possible anchor that you can use in your practice this morning: mindfulness of the in-breathing and out-breathing.

Then from time to time, you'll notice a sound. It might be a sound inside the room, sound of the ventilation, sound of my voice, sound of one another. Or it might be a sound from outside of traffic or work in the building. Take a little time to explore this experience of hearing.

As you open to sounds, let your attention open in a wide and expansive way. Just open to all the sounds as they might arise all around you. Might be to the front or back, the left or right or above. It's as though you're sitting in the middle of a concert hall and you're just opening to be receptive to whatever sound arises.

Notice when a sound comes, you don't have to make any special effort to hear. The sound arises and it's heard spontaneously, immediately. All you have to do is rest and receive. See what it feels like to be in this purely receptive mode in your meditation. You're just resting in the center of all sounds and each one is known spontaneously as it arises. And as it's known, mindfulness of sound.

This is the third possible anchor in your meditation: mindfulness of sound. Notice how it brings out the qualities of spaciousness and receptivity.

And now bringing that same receptive attitude back into the experience of the body. Again, having the sense that you're simply resting, receiving the sensations throughout the body. Among them are the sensations of breathing.

So see what it's like to tune into the experience of breathing with this very receptive attitude. Not forcing the attention to the breath, not holding on tight, but just resting in the body, feeling the in-breath and feeling the out-breath. Let the mental attitude be very relaxed and open.

If you'd like to continue paying attention to the breathing, you can let the attention go where you feel the breath most clearly. It could be at the nose, in the chest, in the belly, in the torso—feeling chest and belly together—or following the entire breath as it enters the nose, expands the chest, and then the belly. If you'd like to work with mindfulness of breathing, see where it's most comfortable, most accessible for you to feel the breath, just staying in touch with the simple sensations of breathing.

Sometimes your attention will get lost in a train of thought. It could be for a few seconds or a few minutes. This is normal—not to worry about it. At some point your attention will return to the present moment. And when it does, take a moment just to acknowledge that thinking has been happening.

You might look to see in the aftereffect of the thinking: is there more peace, more calm, or has there been some agitation, some unsettledness in the thought excursion? Just notice that and then again connect with the present moment.

See what stands out for you. See what meets your receptive attention—body, breath, or sounds. Take a look to see what's happening now. What's the present moment experience? And is there mindfulness of that?

CHAPTER 58

Morning Instructions: Thought Game

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

> In this morning instruction from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong introduces an innovative meditation technique called the 'Thought Game' for developing mindfulness of thoughts (vitakkānupassanā). Building on previous teachings about working with physical sensations and emotions, this practice offers a structured approach to observing thoughts as they arise, persist, and pass away without becoming entangled in their content.
>
> The guided meditation begins with establishing mindfulness through traditional anchors like body awareness, breath, or sounds, then systematically opens attention to observe one thought, then two thoughts, and finally sustained periods of thought-watching. Armstrong emphasizes seeing thoughts as present-moment phenomena rather than getting drawn into their narrative content - a key aspect of developing clear comprehension (sampajañña).
>
> This practice directly supports the cultivation of continuous mindfulness (sati) throughout formal sitting and walking meditation periods. Armstrong stresses that such continuity of present-moment awareness forms the essential foundation for deeper insight (vipassanā) and eventual liberation. The technique offers practitioners a skillful means for working with one of meditation's greatest challenges while building the stability of attention necessary for profound dharma realization.

Annie has been pointing us to mindfulness of thoughts all day yesterday, both through the instructions and through the evening Dharma talk. So I thought it would be good to continue with that instruction a little further. In the guided meditation this morning, I'm going to introduce something called the Thought Game. So please settle in normally. We'll give some preliminary instructions to lead up to that and suggest yet another way to work with thoughts as an object for mindfulness.

Again, sitting comfortably, finding the balance in your posture between uprightness and relaxation. Have your back be fairly straight. Your chin should be tucked in a little so that the neck is not tilted upward—it's just vertical. Letting go of any obvious areas of holding. So having the eyes be soft and a little downcast. Letting the jaw be loose. The shoulders be dropped. And let the belly be soft, relaxed.

Then letting the attention rest for a bit in the body, in the sitting posture. Noticing how the awareness can fill the whole body posture. Letting the awareness inhabit the whole body. There's a sense of sitting with attention and dignity in your body.

Opening to sounds, if that helps you bring in a sense of relaxed and receptive attention. Having the sense that you can just rest, and any sound is heard effortlessly, spontaneously.

Connecting again with the body in that same receptive attitude, and now noticing in the body the impact of breathing. Just feeling what happens with one in-breath. Feeling what happens with one out-breath.

A comfortable anchor for many people is the sense of the whole body posture. And then feeling within that overall frame what happens with the breath. This is an anchor that gives both a good sense of groundedness through the whole body, a breadth through the whole body, and also some particular focus on the sensations of breathing.

But as you attend to whatever your anchor is—body, sounds, or breath—also being open to and moving easily to any sense experience that draws your attention: other sensations in the body, emotions or moods, and the arising of thoughts. We easily let go of the anchor, let the attention connect with the new experience as an equally good focus for mindfulness and sustain the attention on the new experience long enough to get a sense of its nature. What kind of sensation? What kind of emotion? What is the thought and its process of arising, persisting and passing?

And so now we can prepare a little bit to enter this kind of mindfulness that we call the thought game. To prepare for it, connect again with your anchor—body or sounds or breath—so that you feel present in this moment. You're bringing a focus of attention, a directed attention to your anchor.

And now let go of the focus of attention on the anchor. Open the attention in a completely unfocused, wide way. And just notice and be mindful of the first thought that arises when I finish this sentence.

When you've noticed one thought, return again to your anchor. Connecting in the present moment, familiar focus, and reviewing your experience with that one thought. Were you able to see its arising, persisting, and passing with mindfulness? And that means basically seeing the thought as just another present moment phenomenon. You will also notice its content. Our intelligence doesn't go away. But you can see its content as a present moment arising also. So this establishes a new meditative relationship to the thought.

Connecting again with your anchor at ease in the present moment. And now letting go of the focus on the anchor, letting the attention just be open as though into a big space. And now become mindful of the first two thoughts that arise when I finish this sentence.

If you've been able to notice two thoughts returning the attention again to your anchor. Staying connected to the present moment.

And now letting go again of the focus on the anchor, just opening to the sense of space and now becoming mindful of every thought that arises until I give a different instruction.

And now returning the attention once again to your anchor. Connecting to the present moment in a way that's real and grounded in a direct sense experience. Just here and now.

And then you might also just review your experience when you were practicing with thought as the object for that extended period of time. How long were you able to be mindful of thoughts coming and going without having the attention lost into the content? How long could you sustain the present moment knowing of thoughts arising, persisting and passing? And again, there's not some standard you're supposed to meet.

It's just noticing what the attention does, how the mind behaves, what's the strength of mindfulness.

Once again, connecting with your anchor grounded in the present moment and letting go of the anchor opening once again, just to notice every thought that arises until I give another instruction.

And coming back again to your anchor.

So this is a way to practice with thought really as a primary focus for mindfulness. Let go of any deliberate directing of the attention. Rest easily and openly in the present moment. Just ready for the next thought that arises. And when it does, notice its arising, lasting, and passing.

There may be times when in doing this exercise, no thoughts are arising. That's fine. See if you can then rest in that open state of readiness. You'll still notice body and sounds and breath and moods. You're just resting easily and waiting for the arising of the next thought. And then seeing that thought with present moment attention arising, lasting and passing.

So in the remainder of this period, I invite you to play with this thought practice as it seems useful to you. You can start with a period of connection, clear connection to the present moment, and then just open and notice any thought that comes as your primary focus for mindfulness.

If you find the present moment mindfulness is getting lost and you're getting drawn into the content of the thoughts, let go of thoughts for a moment. Come back to your anchor. Re-establish the present moment connection. And when you feel ready to play again, you can open up to thoughts again for a shorter or longer period of time.

If you haven't found this thought exercise helpful, then just continue with the meditation practice you've been doing. Connecting with your anchor, but being open to the arising of any sense experience, sounds, moods, emotions, and thoughts.

What's the relationship to the present moment just now? Has mindfulness been lost in the content of some train of thoughts? Or is there a present moment attention that can see all the sense experiences and thoughts as arising and passing, still centered just in the present moment?

So I hope you're starting to get a sense, at least for moments at a time, of how this mindfulness can become steady and stable in the present moment and what that feels like. We've been spending a lot of time in the last few days really talking about the things that tend to disturb it. Bhante talked a lot about working with physical pain—this is one of the things it's difficult to be with, at least in the beginning. John talked about working with the hindrances and how strong emotions move through and sway us and challenge the steadiness. And Annie talked a lot yesterday about thoughts. Thoughts come and we can lose our mindful attention in their content and then they stir up further emotions.

But as we learn to work with these three big areas which can cause disturbance, we find ourselves more and more able to be in the present with some steadiness and balance. And this has so many benefits in meditation.

First of all, it feels good. And feeling good is a good thing in meditation. It brings that sense of ease and happiness.

Second is from this place, in daily life especially, we make a lot better decisions in our speech and actions when we come from a place of steadiness. We're more thoughtful.

And the third thing is—and the reason it's so important here—is that this is the foundation for deeper insight to take place. And from deeper insight comes greater freedom, greater possibility of liberation.

So what is the key factor in the development of this steadiness of attention in the present moment? Really, it's continuity. I think we've said this a few times. Continuity of mindfulness, which I think I mentioned in my first talk, is really about the frequency of moments of mindfulness through the day. We don't expect any of you to be continuous from the moment you wake up to the moment you go to bed with your mindfulness. We know there will be interruptions. But the more frequent moments we can put in, in every period of practice—the sitting, the walking, the meals, going about your room, your work meditation, all of that—will help with this development, the buildup of continuity. And at some point you'll feel the momentum start to happen where it's much easier to stay in the present without specially strong effort.

So one of the keys to this continuity is really your commitment to the walking meditation. The schedule is put up the way it is, sitting and walking and sitting and walking, really to support this continuity. So I really encourage you, first of all, to do the walking with as much commitment as you're bringing to the sitting or any other practices through the day.

If you've been a little less careful with the walking than with your sitting, I'd really encourage you to try a period today of continuity where you attend as well as you can fully through a sitting and then make the resolve. Get up from the sitting, stand up, begin your walking meditation, go to your spot, do your thirty or forty-five minutes of walking fully, come back and sit again for the next sitting and see what that kind of continuity feels like if you haven't been doing it already. It really does make a difference and it's what will lead to this greater stability that eventually supports greater freedom and liberation.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org.

CHAPTER 59

Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention

Guy Armstrong · 47 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents what he considers the culmination of Mahāsi Sayādaw's meditation instructions: choiceless attention. This approach represents the genius of the Burmese master who founded this vipassanā lineage, making explicit that anything experienced can be a focus for mindfulness.
>
> Armstrong explains three ways of relating to meditation objects: exclusive focus (for samatha practice), preferred emphasis on an anchor with openness to predominant experiences, and choiceless attention where no preference is given to any particular object. In choiceless attention, practitioners begin with an anchor but then deliberately unhook attention and allow it to move naturally, maintaining awareness of where attention lands moment by moment.
>
> The teacher describes this as "organic meditation" - simply being aware of what's happening now. While this approach offers greater relaxation by removing the effort of constantly returning to a chosen focus, it carries the risk of drifting into what Joseph Goldstein calls being "kind of mindful." Armstrong recommends developing skill in both anchored and choiceless approaches, learning when to stabilize with an anchor and when to open to the full field of experience while maintaining clear mindfulness.

The meditation instructions I'm offering this morning represent, in many ways, the culmination of the sequence of instructions we've been unfolding. In my opinion, they truly reveal the genius of Mahasi Sayadaw, the Burmese monk who founded this lineage of meditation upon which our three-month course instructions are based.

We've said many times that anything you experience can be a good focus for mindfulness. It was really Mahasi Sayadaw's instructions that pointed this out so clearly and explicitly. You do not find this in all lineages of Vipassana, but in this lineage it's very clear, and today's instructions will make that apparent.

Before I get into the instructions, I want to offer a preface. The approach I'm going to share today is what I call choiceless attention. First, let me explain this word "attention." There was a question yesterday in the hall about attention, and it's something really important in mindfulness practice.

Attention is the faculty of mind that selects one aspect of our present moment experience to focus on and highlight from all the things that are going on. To give the biggest context of what's happening for you right now, take a look at all the things that are in your present moment experience. There's the sense of the body and sitting. There are sensations within the body. There are sounds. There's a certain mood or emotion for you. There may be sight. And there are thoughts passing through. This is basically the field of our experience in most sitting meditations. The senses of smell and taste are not usually very active when we're sitting in the hall, but the other senses are active and constantly revealing experiences.

Attention is the faculty of mind that highlights one of those aspects and settles on it momentarily. Attention, if left to its own devices, keeps moving around. We sometimes do an exercise called Vipassana out loud, where we simply ask the meditator to keep stating what they're noticing now. You'll see that it keeps changing: "Now I'm aware of a sensation in my knee. Now I'm aware of the sound of a voice. Now I'm aware of an in-breath. Now I'm aware of a mood of calm." Attention keeps flitting between all these different facets of our experience, if left to its own devices.

As we've started the meditation instruction, if you remember, in the beginning we asked you to focus on an anchor. This means picking out some aspect of your experience—body posture, breath, or sounds—and deliberately directing your attention to that part of your experience, coming back to it again and again. We were deliberately cultivating a focus on one part of our experience.

Once you pick an anchor like the breath, there are basically three ways you can relate to it with your attention. I'm going to use the breath as an example here, but you could substitute your anchor for breath.

The first way is to make this the exclusive focus of your directed attention. You keep noticing the breath. If anything else pulls your attention, you don't let it rest there—you bring it back immediately to the breath. This is the kind of approach used in developing concentration practice. If you want to direct your practice primarily toward samatha or tranquility, you pick this exclusive focus on the breath. A few of you are doing this, but not many.

The second way involves a preference for the breath. This says, "I'll be with the breath as a focus of directed attention, but if anything comes along that's stronger and naturally draws my attention, I'll let go of the breath as a focus and let my attention relate to this new phenomenon." In other words, you make the attempt to connect and sustain—vitaka and vicara—the attention to the new arising, whether it's a sensation, thought, mood, emotion, or sound. This way, you start to open up to the whole range of experiences you're having. But if nothing else is strong or predominant, you redirect the attention to the breath. It becomes your default, a preferred focus of attention. This is a very nice way to meditate because coming back to the breath helps establish some of that tranquility and focus development in practice. This is a very good way to practice Vipassana.

In the approach we're discussing today, there is no preference for the breath or your other anchor. You start by connecting to the anchor, but then deliberately unhook the attention and let it go where it will. That's why this approach is called choiceless attention.

And then your job is to sit back and notice where the attention is landing in each new moment. So you're not trying to control it or direct it, but that means you have to be really fresh and alert and awake to see where it is landing because it's not going to be predictable.

So this is what we'll explore today. Can we let go of an anchor, open the attention up, and still stay present enough to see where it's landing moment after moment after moment? This is the basic outline of the instructions that Mahasi Sayadaw invented. And I think it's a really beautiful way to practice because it makes clear anything that arises can be a focus for mindfulness. Mindfulness doesn't need to get lost in the face of any experience that you're having.

That's one way to describe this practice. The other way to describe it, equally valid, is the practice of "what's happening now." So in each new moment, you're answering the question, what's happening now? And what's happening is where your attention is landing. Attention keeps alighting on something. It will illuminate that aspect of experience—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thought, emotion. And your job is to be with what's happening now. These are just two different ways to describe this practice of choiceless attention.

Having used up most of our instruction time, we'll move into the formal meditation instruction. So please sit comfortably, finding in your posture that balance of relaxation and ease with the sense of uprightness and alertness. What you find in your posture will be reflected in your mind's relationship to the moment—a balance of firmness and relaxation.

Please begin by connecting with your anchor. It could be the experiencing of the in-breath and out-breath. It could be connecting with the overall feeling of your body as you sit, the body posture. It could be an openness to sounds as they arise all around you —in front, behind, right and left. Whatever helps you stabilize your attention in the present moment. Here we're deliberately directing our attention to one aspect of our experience: breath, body, or sounds.

Now let go of any effort to direct your attention to your anchor and simply open in a very wide and receptive way to the whole field of conscious experience in this moment. Notice that within this whole field, there are sensations and mood or emotion, the breathing, sounds, and thoughts coming and going. Notice that these are the usual elements of our experience. This is the inventory of our sitting meditation experience.

In the instructions up to this point, we've gone into detail about how to relate with mindfulness to each of these facets of experience. So you know how to practice giving mindful attention to each of the aspects of your present moment experience.

Now, allowing the attention to stay very open and undirected, just begin to notice moment after moment where the attention is moving to. If you'd like, it can be helpful to make a soft mental note or label of where the attention is landing. It can be a support for staying present while the attention is not anchored to any particular facet.

You might just make a soft mental note every few seconds where you notice the attention alighting. The notes might sound something like: "in," "hearing," "sensing," "out," "thinking," "sensing," "sound," and so on. The note is optional. You might experiment to see if it helps you stay present.

If you'd like to use the mental noting, keep it soft like a whisper and keep the main emphasis on the direct experience of that sense contact. We'd say keep the attention 90% with the sense contact and just have the note be a soft whisper in the background. But the note's not required. If you can pay attention to the present moment arising without it, that's fine.

Pay mindful attention moment after moment to whatever attention is highlighting. Sometimes if one experience is predominant, attention may stay there for a while. That's fine. You're letting it do whatever it chooses. Just be there to notice: oh, attention has landed and is staying here. But then also notice—is the attention continuously there? Or does it land there and still dart off to notice other things happening? Just stay alert to all the subtle movements of attention.

Sometimes letting go of the anchor can bring up a little insecurity or confusion, not quite being certain how to practice. So if that happens, notice the insecurity or confusion as the new aspect of experience.

If it continues and it's difficult to find mindfulness happening, just return to your anchor again. You have a reliable refuge there. Steady the attention in the present moment again. And when you feel ready, open up to the approach of choiceless attention. What's happening now? Keeping alive this alert interest in where attention is landing and being mindful of that aspect of sense contact.

I'd like to mention again these three styles of practice. One is exclusive focus on the anchor. For most of you, that doesn't really apply—that's a samatha kind of instruction. So those of you who are doing vipassana have types two and three to work with.

Two: there's a preferred emphasis on the anchor, but an openness to other predominant experiences. Number three: no preference for the anchor, just an openness to anything that's happening in the present moment.

Number two provides the advantage of giving an ongoing focus that will help steady the attention in the present moment, so it has a little bit of that concentration flavor to it. Number three, because it's taking out an additional area of will or effort—bringing back the attention to the same focus again and again—can give a greater sense of relaxation.

Number three, I think, has this quality—it's almost what I call organic meditation. It's the meditation God intended us to do, because it's just so natural. Be aware of what's happening now. That's really its beauty.

But there's a risk to this kind of meditation. Because it's so open, the mindfulness can start to slip away. There's not a clear chosen focus. The mindfulness can start to diminish and you don't quite notice it. Then you find more and more time is spent with thinking, but you're not really mindful of each thought. This is what leads to the condition that Joseph Goldstein describes as "kind of mindful."

This open attention can lead into a little bit of driftiness. You're kind of mindful, still connecting to the present, but you're not really noticing the times when you're not connecting to the present.

What I encourage for most of you is to develop both two and three. As the retreat goes on, your learning can be: How do you balance the strengths of each one? When do you need to come back and refocus on the anchor to generate more steadiness in the present moment? And once you have that steadiness and stability, when can you open up to all the changing objects and retain the stability and the clear mindfulness in doing it?

Knowing when to move back and forth between number two and number three can happen in the space of one sitting—you might move from one to the other. It can happen several times over the course of a day in your sittings.

CHAPTER 60

First and Second Noble Truths

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this comprehensive dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's foundational teaching from the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta (SN 56.11), the first discourse delivered at Sarnath. He explores the First Noble Truth of dukkha—not merely suffering, but the fundamental unsatisfactoriness inherent in conditioned existence. Armstrong distinguishes three types of dukkha: the direct pain of dukkha-dukkha, the suffering of change (vipariṇāma-dukkha), and the deeper instability of all saṅkhāra (conditioned phenomena).
>
> The talk then investigates the Second Noble Truth—that craving (taṇhā) is the root cause of suffering. Drawing on stories from Nelson Mandela's transformation and teachings from the Dalai Lama, Armstrong shows how understanding our mental habits of grasping and aversion can be liberating rather than depressing. He explains how taṇhā manifests through the three poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion, and emphasizes the practical instruction to abandon craving through mindful acceptance of present-moment experience. This teaching offers both philosophical depth and practical guidance for working with difficulty in meditation and daily life.

The subject of our exploration this evening is the First and Second Noble Truths. Sometimes we hear this and think, "Oh no, not more suffering. Haven't we already had enough suffering?" But I want to share this quote from the Buddha: "The realization of the Four Noble Truths is accompanied only by happiness and joy." That is our preview.

I want to base this talk around the Buddha's first discourse, recorded in the Samyutta Nikaya. You may know this story: after the Buddha's awakening, he spent the first forty-nine days not departing from the Bodhi tree, but standing, sitting, and walking around it, basically just enjoying the bliss of liberation and reflecting on what he had come to understand.

During that period, he contemplated not teaching. He thought that what he had found was too subtle for anyone else to understand, and so he wasn't at all sure that he was going to teach. But then, when he surveyed the world with his vision, he saw there were some people who had but little dust in their eyes, who were capable of understanding. So he decided to teach.

The people he decided to first teach were five practitioners who had been with him through his ascetic phase of practice. Again, with his vision, he saw that they were located near the town of Benares, about 150 miles away from the place he awakened in Bodh Gaya. He didn't have a Mercedes, so he had to walk 150 miles to get to his old friends to deliver this teaching. It must have taken him about ten days to arrive.

When he found his five old friends in the spiritual life and started to approach them, they said, "Oh no, Gotama has gone soft. Look how much weight he's put on. You can't press your finger in his belly and feel his backbone anymore. He's eaten. He's fallen off the path"—because they were committed to ascetic practices. But as he walked toward them, they were struck by his composure and radiance, and finally they agreed to open themselves to hear what he had to say.

This was the occasion of his delivering the first discourse called "Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma." This discourse was essentially the declaration of the Four Noble Truths: the truth of suffering, the truth that the cause of suffering is craving, the truth that the end of suffering lies in the end of craving, and the truth that the way leading to the end of suffering is the Noble Eightfold Path. This is what he outlined in this first discourse—a comprehensive view of his whole teaching. You could say that the rest of his forty-five years of teaching were just footnotes to this talk.

If you look at his collected teachings in English, they occupy about twenty-five volumes. I find this remarkable. The recorded teachings of Jesus in the Bible are about fifty or sixty pages, while the Buddha's words fill twenty-five volumes. He said many things, but they were all about this central topic. As the Buddha himself later said, "Formerly, as now, I make known just suffering and the end of suffering." His teachings were always completely pragmatic and down to earth: this is what will help you come out of suffering, this is how you recognize suffering.

Let me begin by reading from this discourse, "Setting in Motion the Wheel of the Dhamma":

"Thus have I heard. On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Benares in the deer park at Isipatana. There the Blessed One addressed the group of five thus: 'Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness and sensual pleasures, which is low, ignoble, unbeneficial, and the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, unbeneficial.

Without veering towards either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision, which gives rise to knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana. And what, bhikkhus, is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata which gives rise to vision and leads to nibbana? It is this Noble Eightfold Path: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration. This, bhikkhus, is that middle way awakened to by the Tathagata.'"

This was the first exposition of the path that we are following and the possibility of the path leading to liberation, to nibbana, to complete peace and the end of suffering. The Buddha then continues with an exposition of all Four Noble Truths.

The First Truth is the truth of suffering, or the statement that there is suffering in life. This is how he expressed it: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of suffering. Birth is suffering. Aging is suffering. Illness is suffering."

Death is suffering. Sorrow, pain, grief and despair are suffering. Association with what is displeasing is suffering. Separation from what is pleasing is suffering. Not to get what one wants is suffering. In brief, the five aggregates affected by clinging are suffering.

The word being translated as suffering is the Pali word dukkha, which I'm sure you've all heard before. There's not an English word that really corresponds to dukkha. We have to approach it with a whole constellation of different English words. Some of the translations that have been used include: suffering—probably the most common—anguish, stress, unsatisfactoriness, unreliability, unhappiness, and dissatisfaction.

All of these point to the meaning of dukkha as indicating that there's some friction in life for us as human beings. This friction doesn't mean that you're making a mistake with your life, but it points to the fact that some degree of suffering is an integral part of living. So not to judge ourselves when that shows up in our life.

Notice that this noble truth never says life is suffering. Sometimes people look from outside and they say, "Oh, Buddhism is really a pessimistic religion. It says that life is suffering." It doesn't say that. The Buddha never said that. Almost always when he talked about suffering, he also talked about the end of suffering. Both are equally important.

One of the things one sees is that as we practice the Dharma, we get happier and happier. There are people in the world in the field of Dharma practitioners who are basically happy people. It doesn't mean that happy people are immune from dukkha, but the dukkha is more temporary and the happiness becomes the baseline for one's life. This is possible. The Buddha himself was known by one of his epithets as "the happy one"—sugata.

This term dukkha points to some sense that the basic circumstances of life don't quite satisfy us. I want to read this account from the New Yorker from a few years ago:

According to a study just released by scientists at Duke University, life is too hard. Authors of the 1,200-page study were hesitant to single out any particular factors responsible for making life tough. A surprise, they say, is that they found so many. Before the study was undertaken, researchers had assumed, by positive logic, that life could not be that bad. As the data accumulated, however, they provided incontrovertible proof that human endurance equals just a tiny fraction of what it should be given everything it must put up with. Nine out of ten of the respondents stated that they would give up completely if they knew how. The remainder also didn't see the point of going on any longer, but still clung to a slight hope for something in the mail. In a personal note in the afterword, researchers stated that statistically speaking, life is, quote, "just too much." And as yet, they have no plausible theory how anyone gets through it at all.

Sometimes you might feel like that—though your chance of getting something in the mail has gone away. So here we are.

One of the things I like about the Buddha's definition of dukkha in this discourse is how universal it is: birth, aging, illness, death, association with what is displeasing, separation from what is pleasing. Who doesn't experience these things? All of us are vulnerable in this way to the difficulty of living. We all have this.

Sometimes when we feel "I am suffering," it feels isolating, as though I'm the only one bearing this problem. Everybody else seems to be sitting beautifully and walking beautifully, and I'm the one who's struggling here. But of course, no, it's not really like that. We're all in this together. We're all facing the same kinds of problems. When we reflect on that—that there is dukkha still in everyone we meet—it provides a way of connection and not a way of isolation.

This is from Naomi Shihab Nye, who's a Palestinian-American poet. The poem is called "Kindness." This is just a small part:

Before you learn the tender gravity of kindness, you must travel where the Indian in a white poncho lies dead by the side of the road. You must see how this could be you. How he too was someone who journeyed through the night with plans and the simple breath that kept him alive.

This universality of our vulnerability to suffering is part of what connects us as human beings.

The second kind of dukkha the Buddha talked about is called viparinama dukkha, and it is described as the unsatisfactoriness of alternation or change. This means something may be going along in a pleasant way for a while, but because of impermanence, it will shift. And if we're holding on to the pleasantness, when it changes, there will be suffering.

Ajahn Chah said that this is like grabbing hold of a poisonous snake. If you grab hold of the head, it bites you directly—that's dukkha dukkha. If you grab hold of the tail and it's pleasant, eventually the head will come around and bite you, and then you suffer. So grasping at the pleasant or the painful eventually leads to the experience of dukkha. Grasping leads to dukkha.

Joseph Goldstein had a nice way of putting this succinctly. He was surveying the changes that he was going through physically in a retreat and he said, "If it's not one thing, it's another." I've reflected on that often.

The third kind of dukkha the Buddha talked about is called sankhara dukkha—the unsatisfactoriness of conditioned phenomena. Sankhara in this instance means a conditioned phenomenon, something that arises based on prior causes and conditions. And the problem with conditioned phenomena is that they're unstable.

Some years ago we were at a teaching in the Bay Area from the Dalai Lama. I think he was talking on emptiness. And he was using this third area of sankhara dukkha to explain something very fundamental to the way the universe is set up. These were outdoor teachings in Mountain View at an outdoor amphitheater called Shoreline. The stage was set up just for the teachings, going on for three days, and it was quite beautiful.

The Dalai Lama was seated on a high throne, which he said is not about puffing up the ego of the speaker, but to give respect for the teachings—which I thought was interesting. On both sides of him were monastics from all the different traditions. There were Tibetan nuns and monks in the bright red robes that you're familiar with. Theravadan nuns and monks in the ochre robes that you know. Korean Zen nuns and monks in the gray robes of that tradition. Japanese Zen monastics in the black robes. The whole stage was this rainbow of monastic life from all over the Buddhist countries.

The backdrop was a painting of the Potala, the palace where the Dalai Lama had lived until the occupation happened and he fled the country in 1959. The Potala spread across the whole stage where the speakers for the Grateful Dead would have been—this huge canvas of the Potala at sunset with the Dalai Lama sitting in front. It was very beautiful.

We were sitting on the grass behind the seats, and it felt like a Buddhist Woodstock. All the tribes had gathered, there was a big stage and huge speakers so we could hear the voice.

So the Dalai Lama got to this part in the teaching where he talked about viparinama dukkha.

And what he said was, it's not quite correct to understand impermanence as that everything is going along in a stable way and then it changes. This is the pointing of viparinama dukkha. But in sankara dukkha, there's something more subtle being pointed to, which is that things don't go along in a really stable way for even two moments. Rather, things are constantly arising and passing, being formed and disbanding, coming into existence, passing out of existence, moment after moment after moment. And this is what we need to see. This is the instability of all conditioned phenomena.

We can see it in the body. We can see it through thoughts. We can see it through the sense bases. We can see it through mental states. They're all arising and passing really quickly. When we see this, we see that there can't be any lasting security from phenomena because there's nothing solid enough there to hold onto in the first place.

The Dalai Lama said, if you want to help people come out of suffering, you have to understand all three of these ways in which people suffer: the dukkha dukkha, the viparinama dukkha, and the sankara dukkha. We have to see all of them. And each one requires more subtlety to see. Everyone in the world understands the pain of pain. But not everyone understands the pain of alternation, and fewer people understand the pain of the dissolving structure of reality. But all three of these catch us up in suffering.

This is a quote from the Samyutta Nikaya. A god figure came down and commented on the dharma teachings that he had understood. And this person said, "Having seen form's flaw, its chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to form." You can think of this as body sensations. Having seen the shortcoming in bodily sensations, their chronic trembling, the wise do not cling to the body. This is the insight when we look closely into our experience of the body arising, passing, forming, disbanding moment after moment after moment. Nothing solid to hang on to.

But we usually don't see this, or we usually don't take it in, or we don't quite account for it. So in our worldly life, we want to create a world for ourselves that is kind of safe and cozy and predictable, that has security built into it. It's kind of like we want to have adventures, but we still want to be safe. So it's a little bit like a fairy tale where you can go off and have adventures in the woods during the day, but you come home to your safe little bed at night and a parent tucks you in and gives you your cookies and milk and everything's taken care of. That's kind of what we're looking for in life when we don't tune in to the truth of impermanence.

And we can do this in meditation also. We can aim to end up on a very cozy plateau of mindfulness and concentration. And we think, oh, if I just get the meditation right, I'm going to land and not move from that cozy plateau. But of course, it doesn't ever work like that. There is greater and greater happiness. There is more and more of a sense of resting, but there's always change. States like mindfulness and concentration are also conditioned. They're part of sankara, part of compounded phenomena. So they also arise and pass.

This is not altogether bad. This is another quote from the Buddha: "If there was one speck of permanent form, the holy life for liberation would not be possible." If there was permanence in the world somewhere, it would gum up the works and we wouldn't be able to transform suffering into knowledge and vision and liberation. So impermanence works for our benefit as practitioners. It really does.

The first noble truth states the truth of suffering, but the noble truths are not just philosophical statements. It's not like we're just supposed to believe in these things. Each of the noble truths in this discourse also carries with it an action. There's something to do with each of these noble truths. So further on in the discourse, the Buddha states explicitly, "This noble truth of suffering is to be fully understood." That's the action that's asked of us. It is to be fully understood.

The meaning, of course, is we don't fully understand it now. We may think conceptually we get it, but we haven't actualized it. We keep forgetting this truth. So we have to see it over and over and over again. And this is an important part of practice.

When things are difficult, can we see that as the first noble truth? This is an interesting question to ask: How often, when things are difficult, do we recognize this is dukkha? This is a universal part of life. I would say not all the time. There are many other ways we think about our suffering.

Sometimes we deny it. "Oh no, I'm okay. I can truck through this." Sometimes we judge ourselves for having it: "It's my fault. It's my mistake. If I was doing it right, this wouldn't be happening." Sometimes we blame others—our parents, society, the teachers, the world. Or we might distract ourselves because we don't want to touch it. In daily life, we go to the television, we go to the refrigerator, whatever, to get away from the experience of dukkha. Or here we might drift off into pleasant fantasy.

We have so many ways of missing, of not truly seeing and knowing the dukkha that comes. Can we let ourselves simply feel it and acknowledge, "Oh, this is the first noble truth. This is the truth of dukkha in my direct experience"? Can we open to it and acknowledge that?

This is a delicate point in practice, this first noble truth practice. If we don't acknowledge the truth, then we're always going to aim for that cozy plateau—whether worldly or meditative—always having a gaining idea that we should be landing somewhere else where everything's all worked out. And that gets us into striving.

But sometimes if we do acknowledge the first noble truth, if we think about it too much, we can get depressed. This is where the view comes in: "Oh, everything's dukkha." But the Buddha never said that. He never said there's always suffering. He clearly pointed again and again to the pleasure and happiness that we can find in life.

There's a difference between thinking about the first noble truth and making it a view—"there's all this dukkha"—which tends to feel like a heavy weight. But when you actually see the truth of dukkha in a moment, that tends to be freeing. It's the difference between holding a fixed view as a constant ongoing take on life and seeing the truth in the reality. When you can see the truth in the reality of the moment, that dukkha is also capable of change. It forms and it's capable of being undone. That part is liberating.

Clearly, we are not meant to take the teaching of the First Noble Truth and get depressed by it. The Buddha said: "A practitioner is not overwhelmed by suffering and does not overwhelm oneself with suffering. One does not give up the pleasure that accords with Dhamma, yet one is not infatuated with that pleasure."

James was talking the other night about finding these wholesome states of joy and happiness and recognizing them within your practice. That is pleasure that accords with the Dhamma. That offsets the inclination of the mind to lean toward just seeing dukkha. Yet one is not infatuated with that pleasure. One appreciates it, but one does not attach.

One way to hold the truth of dukkha is to ask: Has suffering ever been helpful in your practice? Did it ever bring you anything positive? What brought you to the Dhamma? Wasn't it suffering in some form or another? This is the almost universal role of suffering in Dhamma practice. It wakes up our yearning to know, our yearning to understand. It leads us into hearing the teachings, considering the teachings, and then taking up the practice. Without the impact of suffering in our lives, I don't know if any of us would be here. I wouldn't be here.

These are noble truths, meaning they have an ennobling quality. This is another way to understand "noble"—they are ennobling. If you look around the world, how often is suffering ennobling for people? Sometimes it seems not very often.

Sometimes suffering can indeed crush us under its weight, leaving us heartbroken and lost in despair. But if we use it well, if we remain open to learning from it, suffering can become truly ennobling—it can be transformative.

I want to share something from a book that many of you may have encountered: The Book of Joy. It records a remarkable dialogue that took place over several days between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu in Dharamsala, where His Holiness lives. The subtitle, "Lasting Happiness in a Changing World," offers an excellent approach to understanding the Four Noble Truths.

Both of these extraordinary men have endured incredible suffering in their personal lives and in relation to their countries. The Dalai Lama fled Tibet in 1959 and has since witnessed what amounts to cultural genocide and a devastating assault on the monastic order in his homeland—circumstances he has been powerless to change. Archbishop Tutu labored for years under the oppressive apartheid regime in South Africa, becoming a leading voice for justice, especially after Nelson Mandela's imprisonment. He has witnessed immense suffering among his people, even since the movement toward greater equality began.

Neither man is a stranger to suffering, whether personal or societal. Yet what strikes me most about this book is the profound joy from which they speak when conveying their understanding of the teachings in their respective traditions.

Regarding suffering specifically, Archbishop Tutu shared these illuminating words about Nelson Mandela's imprisonment: "I think some suffering, maybe even intense suffering, is a necessary ingredient for life, certainly for developing compassion. When Nelson Mandela went to jail, he was young and you could almost say bloodthirsty. He was head of the armed wing of the African National Congress. He spent twenty-seven years in jail, and many would say, 'Twenty-seven years, oh, what a waste.' I think people are surprised when I say no, the twenty-seven years were necessary. They were necessary to remove the dross. The suffering in prison helped him become more magnanimous, willing to listen to the other side, to discover that the people he regarded as his enemy were also human beings with fears and expectations, molded by their society. Without those twenty-seven years, I don't think we would have seen the Nelson Mandela with the compassion, the magnanimity, and the capacity to put himself in the shoes of the other."

The Archbishop continued with these paradoxical words: "It is how we face all the things that seem difficult in our lives that determines the kind of person we become. Actually, nothing beautiful in the end comes without a measure of pain, frustration, and suffering. This is the nature of things. This is how our universe has been made up."

In retreat, we have the opportunity to experience this suffering firsthand and to truly understand what it is and where it comes from. This understanding naturally leads us to the second noble truth.

Let me read from the discourse: "Now, what is the noble truth of the origin of suffering? It is this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, seeking delight now here and now there. That is craving for sense pleasures, craving for existence, craving for non-existence."

The word "craving" translates the Pali term tanha—the word we'll use as we explore the second noble truth.

When I first heard this teaching, it was revolutionary for me. At that time, I felt completely stuck in my suffering, trapped in what seemed like an incomprehensible mass of confusion. This teaching revealed that there was actually a cause for my suffering. Where there's a cause, there's a way to remove that cause. And when you take away the cause, the suffering naturally ceases—which brings us to the third noble truth.

This realization was profoundly liberating: my psychological suffering could be uprooted by examining this cause.

Now, this teaching on the second noble truth doesn't exclude other perspectives on suffering in the world, because there are indeed other causes for extreme suffering. People need food, clothing, medicine, and shelter. When worldly forces combine to deprive people of these basic requisites, there are certainly societal and economic causes for suffering as well. But assuming one can gather these necessities, the possibility exists to transform our suffering through understanding the noble truths.

Tanha, translated as craving, originally meant simply "thirst" in the Buddha's time—a very straightforward word. The Buddha, as he often did, took this common word and brilliantly re-engineered it for his teachings.

Thirst is indeed a form of craving, a kind of wanting, but it reveals something profound about desire's nature. Thirst can be satisfied temporarily, but it always returns. When you're thirsty, you drink a glass of water—it feels wonderful, completely satisfying. But how long before you need another drink? Not very long at all.

So craving works in the same way. We may have a craving, it gets temporarily satisfied, but it's going to spring up again, just as thirst did. In our hearts and minds, what it springs up from is some underlying sense of unfulfillment. This is the human existential condition that we are trying to remedy—this underlying sense that something is not right or is not being fulfilled in the present moment. It's this hole, you might say, in our heart that is the source of craving.

Craving springs up to try to fill this empty void, this hollowness of insufficiency. And then it latches onto one object after another, seeking delight now here and now there. It picks up and takes in the object and temporarily the craving is satisfied. But because the underlying hole has not been filled and can't be filled in that way, it springs up again.

In observing this pattern, it's really helpful to start tuning into the force of craving itself more than the objects that it is associating itself with. This force of craving manifests in different ways. Even though its language represents primarily desire, it's not limited to just the desire force. Craving basically means wanting things to be different than they are. It's a relation to the present moment that is dissatisfied with the present moment and wants it somehow to be different.

There are three ways of expressing this dissatisfaction—our old friends: greed, aversion, and delusion. One way we get dissatisfied with the present moment is that we want something pleasant, maybe more pleasant, maybe greatly pleasant. We want something pleasant to come into the moment that isn't there, and that's the force of greed. But we can also look at the present moment and see discomfort here that isn't wanted, and we reject that out of the force of aversion. So that's also rejecting the present moment and wanting something different to take its place.

In truth, both greed and aversion are manifestations of craving. They're both rejecting the present, wanting to replace it with something else. So craving doesn't just refer to the force of desire or greed—it encompasses greed and aversion, which are really two sides of the same coin.

How is delusion also an aspect of craving? This is not so easy to see, but it is true. We can see it in two ways. One is that we ignore the activities of greed and aversion. Greed and aversion are always rejecting the present and trying to make something different happen. This activity is ultimately really unsatisfying—it's what keeps the mind spinning, keeps the mind restless, keeps the heart from finding peace and ease. But we don't see it. So we are basically deluded about the operation of greed and aversion as our habitual ways of trying to find happiness. We don't look at their operation, and that continues to strengthen the force of craving. We're acting out craving again and again through greed and aversion, and we don't look at it.

The second way delusion plays into craving is that when we are preoccupied with pulling in the pleasant and pushing away the unpleasant, anything that's neutral doesn't register on our interest scale. When your attention is focused on pleasure and pain, the neutral comes along and you don't care. It doesn't gratify, it doesn't feed you, but it doesn't threaten or alarm you either. So we tune it out.

This delusion regarding the neutral is another expression of the mind that's lost in craving, dominated by greed and aversion. As mindfulness comes in and sees clearly what is, independent of likes and dislikes, the neutral is just as real, just as alive, in some ways just as interesting, as the pleasant and the unpleasant. But the mind caught in craving doesn't see it, overlooks it, denies it. And that's delusion at work as well.

So truly, you could say that craving encompasses or is even the same as the movements of greed, aversion, and delusion. They're more or less synonymous.

The retreat setting is a very good place to see the ongoing activity of liking and disliking and ignoring. These are the active expressions of craving, and we see them again and again. Especially with liking and disliking, which are the stronger forces in active expression, we have to understand that the friction we feel with them is due to our own minds. If we blame it on the external situation—the food isn't right today, the weather isn't right today, somebody's making noise in the meditation hall—if we blame it on the external situation, we never get a chance to look at and transform our own habits of mind.

So when there's a struggle with the way things are, if we can bring it home and look at the movements of greed, aversion, and delusion in our own hearts, that's what gives us the ability to transform them.

There was this beautiful scene in the movie Kundun. I don't know if you've seen it or remember that movie. Martin Scorsese made a film of the life of the Dalai Lama. He did it so beautifully you would have thought he was Buddhist instead of Catholic. He so deeply resonated with and captured what was happening in Tibetan culture.

There was one scene that struck me. I went back and watched the movie again just last year, and I liked it as much this time around. The Dalai Lama is about nine or ten years old, and he's receiving teachings from his tutors, who are very esteemed older monks in his lineage. They're teaching him the Four Noble Truths.

When they come to the teaching on the second noble truth, they ask the young Dalai Lama, "What's your understanding of the second noble truth?" And the Dalai Lama says, "Well, the second noble truth is that the cause of suffering is craving."

They say, "Make it more personal. Speak from your own experience. What's the second noble truth?"

He says, "Oh, the second noble truth is that the cause of my suffering is my wanting."

They said, "Not personal enough. State it again in your own terms."

So the young boy sits there and reflects for another minute. Then he says, "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind."

The tutors respond, "Oh, very good, very good."

This is the message of the second noble truth: most of our suffering comes from our own habits of mind. If we want to transform it in the context of a meditation retreat, this is where we need to look. When we're willing to look there, we find we have all these tools for transforming the suffering that's based on greed, aversion, and delusion.

I find one really interesting way to work is this: anytime there's a sense of struggle throughout your day, anytime you feel conflict, tension, difficulty, dukkha, take a look and see what is being resisted or what is being wanted. This sense of struggle always comes from some lack of acceptance. What's not being accepted? What in the moment is being pushed away, or what pleasure are we grasping for to replace it?

We can learn about this. When we look at it again and again—these activities of greed and aversion and delusion—and we see our own responsibility in them, we get better and better at letting go. Of course, it's the letting go that leads to the third noble truth, which is the end of suffering. I'm not going to talk about that tonight. We'll talk about it later in the retreat.

But to me, this is the heart of dharma practice: How do we move from the second noble truth, which is struggle, conflict, difficulty? How do we let go of that craving and open to the third noble truth, which is the absence of struggle, the absence of craving, and the presence of peace? This is the heart of what we're trying to learn in meditation. This is how we transform our suffering moment after moment.

The Buddha talked about three kinds of craving that were mentioned in the discourse. The first is craving for sense pleasures. This is called kama-tanha. You can see what a huge force this is in the world—craving in the worldly sense for pleasant experiences of sight, sound, smell, taste, and touch.

I looked up some industry figures. For the sense of sight: movies brought in eleven billion dollars last year in the United States alone. Craving for the visual. For sound: recorded music, fifteen billion dollars in the world last year. Fifteen billion dollars. And this doesn't even include live concerts and all the other ways we enjoy sounds. For smells: this one struck me—the perfume industry, twenty-nine billion dollars a year, and that's not even counting air fresheners and deodorants. And then food, for taste: the restaurant industry in the U.S., seven hundred eighty-three billion dollars in 2016.

Money follows sense desire. The scale of it is enormous.

So this is where in the world people are putting—where we are putting—a lot of energy. And underneath the wanting of sense pleasure is the wish to become happy through it. Sense pleasures do bring a certain amount of happiness, and sense pleasures are an integral part of lay life. If you're really not interested in sense pleasures, then I think Bhante can tell you the monastic life has many advantages. The monastic life is designed as a renunciation of the effort to find sensual pleasures.

But as lay people, we are involved in a world where sense pleasures are part of our daily activities, and we have the opportunity to find many of them. So what the Buddha cautioned about—he didn't say you can't enjoy sense pleasures. He said don't build your happiness all around finding sense pleasures. Because you can see how people do this, right? There are people who do it with food, people who do it with drugs, people who do it with sex, people who do it with television, people who do it with alcohol.

So as lay people, it's not that we are not allowed to have sensual pleasure. Don't build your life around trying to find happiness through those avenues. It doesn't work. You know that, or you wouldn't be here. Because the sense pleasures here are really limited. But other pleasures are great.

This is the first kind of craving—craving for sense pleasure. The second kind of craving is called bhava tanha, craving for existence or craving for becoming. This is a deep force in the mind, this craving for existence. And it's why we're afraid of dying. Somehow we have this deep-seated yearning for life in this body, and it's why death is scary for most people.

When you think about it, this craving for existence is not very rational. I mean, if you went to bed tonight and you never woke up, would that be a problem for you? It might be a problem for other people, but it might not be a problem for you at all. And yet that thought terrifies us. That's like the worst thing that could happen. So it's a deep-seated craving we have to be alive, to be in a body. It doesn't quite really make sense. So this is the basic meaning—craving for existence.

But bhava also means becoming. There's a desire to become something or someone. When I look back on my early years of retreat, I was younger then, and I would run through a lot of projections about where I wanted to live and what work I wanted to do and what kind of community I wanted to join and how I was going to plan my life and support myself. All of these types of becoming were running through my mind over and over and over again. And that's bhava tanha as a craving to become something or someone. I like this line from Lily Tomlin: "I always knew I wanted to be someone, but I guess I should have been more specific." So we all become someone.

And then the third kind of craving is the craving for non-existence. This is called vibhava tanha—non-existent craving. It basically means the state where we want to escape from the world of sense contact. We don't want the constant stream of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind objects. We want to turn it off, but we can't. So this is a deep kind of aversion to life. You just go, "Enough already. I don't want to keep experiencing this stuff."

Obviously this is the deep motivation behind suicides—one simply wants to cut off the stream, a deep aversion to living. It also means, in a less grandiose way, wanting to get rid of a particular unpleasant contact that's happening. So aversion to the unpleasant is also contained in here—not wanting that kind of becoming.

So these are the forms of tanha that we can experience and know. And there's an instruction, an action connected with the second noble truth as well. Here's the instruction: This noble truth of the origin of suffering is to be abandoned. That means let go of craving. That means surrender your desire in meditation to have the moment be different than it is.

This is why the role of acceptance in meditation is so important, so central. Now we're not talking about going back into the world and saying you have to accept all the conditions of the world.

You have to accept the injustice and the racism and the oppression and the homophobia. We're not saying that. But in meditation, to find your own balance of mind, there needs to be this letting go of the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion, or there will be no peace. Acceptance is opening to the present moment just the way it is, and that's what opens the door for peace and settledness.

This is the instruction around craving that allows it to move into the third noble truth, which is the end of craving is the end of suffering. So we look at this moment again and again. What are we wanting from the moment? And can we let go of any desire for it to be different than it is? Any desire for there to be less physical discomfort, any desire for there to be more calm or more concentration or more metta, any desire for there not to be any difficult state of mind—fear or sadness or anger.

The interesting thing is if we can recognize this movement of greed or aversion, of wanting and not wanting, and start to meditate with it, something interesting happens. Eventually it does let go. The particular form of craving does not last forever. If you can just stay with it, it will release. Sometimes it will release because you've really learned how to do it skillfully. Sometimes it just runs out of steam. Whichever way, whatever you're working with that is difficult to be with, continue watching the urge to push it away or bring something else in, and eventually that will release and you will go back into balance.

This gives real trust in the teaching of impermanence and lets you feel in a direct experiential way the movement from the second noble truth to the third noble truth. When desire is active, what does that feel like? What does wanting feel like? Is it peaceful and calming and settled? Or is it contracted and agitating and restless? When aversion is present, is that peaceful and calming and concentrating? Or is that friction and rubbing and fiery? And then what does that release feel like?

So get really interested in this movement from the second noble truth of some form of craving and lack of acceptance, some struggle, to being patient and observing it with mindfulness and noting that moment of release. How does that feel? This is really the heart of our practice. And we develop more and more skill moving from the grip of craving into the freedom of letting go, finding the peace and the ease that's inherent in our minds already.

I'll close with this quotation from Ajahn Sucitto: "To one who cultivates attention to the present, in whatever form the present moment takes, the mind through practice begins to reveal its treasures—sensitivity, joy, confidence, and serenity." These are all found in this movement from letting go into the third noble truth, the state of peace, acceptance, calm—temporary nibbana.

Let's just sit for a moment together.

CHAPTER 61

The Five Aggregates Are Not Self

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong investigates one of Buddhism's most central yet challenging teachings: anattā or not-self. Drawing from his personal experience of grief and the classical Buddhist analysis, he explores how our sense of 'I' emerges through identification with various aspects of experience - as body, owner of body, emotions, observer, or all of these simultaneously. The teaching centers on the five khandhas (aggregates): rūpa (material form), vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (mental formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). Armstrong demonstrates how these categories provide an exhaustive description of human experience without requiring a central self or observer. He references the Buddha's systematic questioning in various suttas, particularly the analysis showing how each aggregate is impermanent, ultimately unsatisfying, and therefore 'not mine, not what I am, not myself.' The talk offers practical guidance for seeing through the fiction of selfhood that creates suffering, suggesting the contemplation 'not me, not mine, not who I am' as a direct practice tool. Armstrong skillfully bridges intellectual understanding with experiential investigation, showing how every moment of mindfulness helps dissolve the illusion of a separate self.

The subject tonight is the five aggregates are not self. This evening I want to continue our exploration of this understanding of not self—one of the Buddha's central teachings and, I'd say, one of the most liberating. It offers a great deal of promise, but it's also one of the most difficult to understand.

As you listen this evening, don't have the idea that you have to figure it all out tonight or you'll miss it completely. The purpose of a talk like this is to plant seeds that go in conceptually. Then what happens in meditation, when there's a topic we're interested in, is that the subconscious mind chews on it in the silence. From time to time in that silence, intuition comes out with new understanding.

We're really about seeding this as a question to explore and for your intuition to work on. You don't have to figure it out conceptually. Let it come in, let it pass through. If it doesn't make sense, don't struggle too hard to figure it out. Let land what lands for you.

Central to the Buddha's teaching is this understanding that the sense of self each of us carries is not really intrinsic to being human, to being alive, but rather is a concept we have generated. If we don't understand it correctly, it creates a deep form of bondage for us, a deep sense of suffering.

You could say that our belief in this sense of self is one of the primary meanings of the word ignorance, which in the chain of dependent origination is viewed as the beginning link that leads into suffering. It's a very fundamental misunderstanding.

When we truly believe in the self without understanding it correctly, it leads to a sense of duality between self and other, between ourselves and the world, setting up a degree of tension, separation, isolation, and anxiety. When we cling to this idea without properly understanding it, we box ourselves into a corner that's not very pleasant. There's a deep existential missing, a lack that comes from an unquestioned belief in this sense of self.

Much of the purpose of spiritual practice is to liberate us from this false understanding. There's a beautiful quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj, a teacher of Advaita Vedanta who lived in Bombay and died in the 1990s. He was a very powerful teacher, and many of his sayings are collected in a book called I Am That, which I highly recommend. From the yogic tradition, he was deeply interested in wisdom as a path to liberation. Though he spoke in terms of yoga, his teaching also applies to our path.

He said, "All the yogas have only one aim, and that is to save you from the calamity of separate existence."

Right now, being unliberated, we are all engaged with the calamity of separate existence—believing ourselves separate from the rest of the world with the attendant isolation and fear that brings.

We want to understand how this sense of self comes about. We want to understand that it's not a necessary element of our human experience. And we want to understand how to move beyond it, how to see through this false sense.

For most of us, this sense of I and self is revealed when we use the words I, me, and mine. Anytime you find your thoughts going there, the sense of self is at play. It can be correctly understood or misunderstood. There's no problem with using the words I and my—once we understand correctly, we use them conventionally and there's no problem.

We have to identify in talking to one another where an action is taking place. If I just said "feeling angry," you wouldn't know where the anger was located. Is it in you? In me? In Annie? So we say "I'm feeling angry" just to identify the location of an experience when talking to one another.

But when you're describing your own experience to yourself, is that word I really necessary? We'll see. Maybe not.

There's this social convention of you and I that makes complete sense. We have to understand that when we leave the room, you'll go to your room and I'll go to my room. If we didn't understand that, things would get really chaotic. These are very useful conventions, but don't get deceived that there's more being pointed to than is actually there.

For most of us, not having examined this sense, everything revolves around this sense of I—our thoughts, actions, plans, future, intentions, motivations. The I is kind of the center of the universe for us, and yet we haven't quite understood it fully.

This sense of self seems self-evident, as it were—pun intended. But have you ever been able to find it? By looking through your direct experience in meditation, when your mind is calm and your inner vision is clear, have you ever been able to locate the self, the I? Somehow I suspect you haven't.

William James, the psychologist, said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." He's getting closer than many of us do.

The Dalai Lama said, "When we think something is clear, but we can't actually find it, that's a sure sign of delusion."

This is our relationship to the I. We think it's really obvious, the center of the universe, but we can't get a hold of it. The classical analogy for this is like looking at a piece of colored rope lying on the ground—strands of beige and red and green—and we look at it and think it's a snake. When we perceive it as a snake, we get scared. But when our perception gets corrected and we see it's a piece of rope, we can calm down.

The same thing happens with this sense of I. When we believe in it strongly, we get scared. When perception gets corrected, there's a sense of inner freedom and ease. So this is not an intellectual exploration. This is an exploration that goes very deep to our sense of being in the world, to our existential dilemma, and will possibly solve much of our existential predicament.

There is confusion around the use of the word "I," and we can see it by looking at ordinary language. For instance, if I ask, "How old are you?" That's a simple question, right? You might say, "I'm thirty-nine" or whatever. But when you say "I'm thirty-nine," that's really not quite correct. Are your thoughts thirty-nine years old? Is your mood thirty-nine years old? Is this strand of hair thirty-nine years old? No, we really mean the body is thirty-nine years old. So here, you're equating the I with the body. The body is thirty-nine years old, I'm thirty-nine years old, so I am the body.

But let me ask another question: What color are your eyes? This is simple. "My eyes are brown." Oh. Now the I is not the body. It's something separate that owns the body. These are my eyes. So the I has now become the owner of the body. You don't say, "I'm brown." You say, "My eyes are brown."

So which are you? Are you the body or are you the owner of it? Can you be both? How many selves are you right now? Generally, if somebody thinks they're more than one self at a given moment, we give them medication. So look at this question and see: can you really be both?

We could look at it another way. We say "I'm happy" or "I'm sad," and there we're the emotion. The I is being equated with the emotion. But then a minute later we could talk about "my joys" and "my sorrows," and now we're the owner of the emotion. So are you the body, the owner of the body, the emotion, or the owner of the emotion?

There's another way that we often take ourselves to be located, and that is as the observer. Check this out. This one goes deep for most people. We think that the I is located inside the head, behind the eyes and between the ears. This little being is kind of looking out at the world and taking it all in. I'm seeing sights, I'm hearing sounds, I'm smelling smells, and so forth. So there's the sense of I being a little observer, a little person in the center of the head to whom all this is happening. That's the fifth way that we form a sense of I.

And another way that we do it is by saying, "Yeah, that's right, I'm all those things. I'm the body, I'm the owner of it, I'm the emotions, I'm the owner of those, and I'm the observer looking out on everything. I'm all of that."

Can this all be true? Where is the I really?

It's quite strange the way we use language around the self, but we don't examine what I would call these faulty assumptions of logic. It doesn't really make sense when we look closely.

The Buddha's comment on this is profound: all of those ways of conceiving self are not true. "In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that." However you take yourself to be—in one of these six ways—the fact is ever other than that.

These six ways of creating selfhood we call identification. Identification in Buddhist terms means that we create a sense of I by pointing to a facet of our experience—like the body or the owner of the body, the emotion or the owner of the emotion, or the observer. We point to a facet of experience and say, "That's I." But when you really think about it, the self is bigger than any of those, isn't it? Your human experience is bigger than any of those fragments. Yet we identify with, we take ourselves to be, these limited pieces.

One of my teachers put it even more bluntly than the Buddha did. He said, "Everything you think is wrong." And about the self, that is kind of true until we've seen it clearly. Everything we think is wrong.

This reminds me of a comment from talk radio. I'm not a fan of talk radio—I think a lot of delusion goes across those airwaves—but one commentator made this observation, which I thought was pretty good: "The mind: often wrong, seldom in doubt."

This belief in the I is actually a fiction created by thought. There's no reality to it in the way that we commonly use these terms.

Here's a quotation from the Buddha. His attendant Ananda—who was his cousin, his attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life, and one of the sweetest people in the whole Pali canon—came to the Buddha and said (he was always asking for teachings), "Venerable sir, you often say the world is empty. The world is empty. What does it mean that the world is empty?"

The Buddha replied, "The world is empty because it is empty of a self or what belongs to a self." Meaning within this world of our experience, there's no I and there's no my. Those terms don't really apply.

So how did the Buddha see, if these conventional perceptions aren't correct? When we look out in a room like this, I think we mostly see persons, right? We look around and we see different persons sitting around the dharma hall. Along with the chairs and mats and walls, we see persons.

But in the Visuddhimagga, which is a meditation manual from the fifth century in Sri Lanka, the text says that this is not a very refined perception, and they compare it to a butcher's work. I'm reluctant to use this analogy because I've been a vegetarian for about forty years and I love animals, but it's in the text, so I'm going to relate it.

They said that if a butcher is carving up the carcass of a cow, as they cut, they're not saying "cow, cow, cow." They would say something like "rump, tenderloin, sirloin, ribs," because they are really well acquainted with that body. The Visuddhimagga says that one who has carefully investigated the process of human mind and body would not say "person." They would look at what makes up a person, having seen it in more detail than just "person."

So how did the Buddha see? When he looked at a human being, how did he see? I don't think he saw "person."

I believe he saw in one of two ways. The first way is illustrated by this discourse called the Discourse on Totality. Let me read this:

"Bhikkhus"—which means you practitioners—"what is the totality of things? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality."

First of all, this is a very bold thing to say. Have you ever heard any teacher say they were going to teach you the totality? We've had some great intellectuals in the last hundred years. Marx didn't say this. Freud didn't say this. Einstein didn't say this. But here's the Buddha 2,500 years ago...

Listen, attend. I'm going to teach you the totality of things. What is the totality? It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe something beyond this totality would not be speaking of something they knew about.

I love this sutta. First of all, I think it's profoundly radical that a great figure—spiritual or intellectual—points to the most important things to examine as being our human experience itself. Marx pointed to the socio-economic system. Einstein pointed to the way physical objects interact with each other. Many other teachers spun out philosophical theories about what's beyond and what's down here. The Buddha said, look at your own direct experience.

This really sounds the opening bell for Buddhist philosophy, psychology, and meditation practice. It is all about our own personal experience: the sense organs and their objects—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind—and their corresponding objects. This is why our meditation practice reflects this understanding. Notice how often we give instructions about noticing the elements of these six senses. That's what insight meditation is all about.

So that's the first approach: to see the six sense bases and their objects. The second approach the Buddha used is called the five aggregates. I'm going to explore that in a moment, but I'll just say the five aggregates cover the same territory of human experience, but divide it up differently.

The Buddha used these two schemas somewhat differently. He generally used the six sense bases to point out craving and to let go of craving as the cause of suffering, leading into the third noble truth—the end of craving. He used the five aggregates to point out wrong view and to lead into right view. This is the first spoke on the Eightfold Path and the expression of wisdom. The five aggregates are used to lead us into right understanding.

Basically, when we learn to see as the Buddha saw, we see things without this fiction of self. That's the power of this teaching of the five aggregates. This is not an intellectual exercise. It's an investigation that really has the power to open up our understanding in a direct and personal way.

One of my sisters died when I was in my mid-forties. She'd been ill, but she was not anywhere close to dying as far as any of us knew. But one evening at her home, she went into a faint. Her son was there and called an ambulance. On the way to the hospital, before she could reach there and be treated, she went into cardiac arrest and did not come out. So she died suddenly and unexpectedly, and it threw me into a lot of questioning.

I was a practitioner by then, and I couldn't understand how my sister had seemed so solid the week before I talked to her on the phone. She always had a big personality and a big laugh. She was a very alive, dynamic person, and now she was just gone. I'm sure most of you have had experiences like this also—how somebody living can just be gone in a moment.

This was the first time it had really struck me how I couldn't comprehend what had happened to her. As I reflected on it over the next couple of months—because I was in stages of grieving—the most helpful way for me to understand it was looking at it through the five aggregates. Coming to understand who she was in terms of the five aggregates helped me come to terms with her death. Because I understood her situation better, it also helped me understand my situation better when I considered my own death.

Maybe at the end I'll try to remember to bring this back and talk a little about what I learned in this investigation. At any rate, I find the schema of the aggregates really helpful for understanding our experience in a very freeing way. That's part of what I want to share this evening.

The English word "aggregate" is a translation of the Pali word khandha. I never liked the term aggregate because it sounded too technical to me—like somebody mixing up road paving material or some chemist in a lab putting stuff together that they were going to patent. It sounded much too technical.

The term that I prefer is "kinds of stuff." We human beings are made up of five kinds of stuff. That's a little more in line with the spirit of the teaching—the Pali term khandha just meant heap or bundle. So we're these bundles of stuff. The Buddha talked about five of them: material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness.

I want to talk about each of these tonight. As I do, I want you to be investigating whether this list provides a comprehensive description of your human experience.

In other words, is there anything in your ordinary human experience that isn't included in this list? Or can we say, yes, this is an exhaustive description of what I experience. That's what we're interested in—this exhaustive listing of what we're made up of.

Material form is simply the world of physical matter, which means this body and all the physical matter outside this body. So the whole physical world is included in this category of material form. The Pali term is rupa. Also included are all the interactions between physical form. For instance, if I take one piece of matter and strike another piece of matter, the resultant sound is also in the realm of physical form. So when you take a piece of Indian curry and you place it on your tongue, the taste is also part of physical form. When you smell the lunch as you're standing in the queue, that smell is also part of physical form. So the physical sense objects—sight, sound, smell, taste and sensations—are all part of this category. All the matter in the world and this body. So this is the whole physical world and the physical sense objects. This is all part of the first aggregate.

That's a big piece of reality, isn't it? It's a big piece of our world. So what's left must be the mind stuff. The other four aggregates are all mental.

The second aggregate is feeling tone, which I think we've talked about quite a lot, both in the instructions. Sally gave a whole talk on it as the second foundation of mindfulness. I'll just mention that the reason I think this is included as a separate aggregate is because it's so crucial to the arising of greed, aversion, and delusion. Pleasant feeling tone has a tendency to stimulate wanting. Unpleasant feeling tone tends to stimulate aversion. Neutral feeling tone tends to stimulate delusion. So it is very central in the links to suffering.

For instance, in this sound, most of us would experience that as a pleasant feeling tone. But it's not universal. If you were in the middle of a really wonderful sitting and you thought enlightenment was just about two minutes away, do you think this would be pleasant? Not necessarily. So we can experience a different feeling tone dependent on our background and mood and tastes. The feeling tone is a mental reaction to the physical stimulus—in this case, the sound.

The third aggregate is perception. The Pali is saññā. And Carol gave a whole talk on this, so I think it's been pretty well covered. Just to mention that it's the faculty of recognition that we take sense objects and place them into familiar categories. So for instance, in looking around the room, we tend to categorize things as window, chair, floor, wall, person, clothes, mat, cushion, and so on.

This is actually a learned association. There's an age at which these circuits wire in the brain and we learn to make sense—for instance in this case of the visual field—by putting these objects into categories. And if that hasn't been learned at an early age, it's very difficult to fill in later.

Sometimes we don't see things the way they are because of a label. For instance, if you're really accustomed to seeing this as a meditation bell, and you look at it and you go, "bell," you might miss its potential as a really wonderful alms bowl for a monk or a nun. Somebody could hold a lot of food in this as a bowl. I had a friend who was a monk in Chiang Mai whose bowl was about this big, and his girth matched the size of the bowl.

Or you might forget that you could turn it upside down and this could be a really cute little hat on a statue. Or it could be used as a planter. We could have a beautiful growth of flowers from this. So if we just say "meditation bell" and we stop there, we don't necessarily see what's really there.

There are a lot of Zen koans about this. A Zen master will hold this up and say, "What is this? If you say it is a stick, I will hit you. If you say it is not a stick, I will hit you."

Wow, that's why I didn't sit Zen. I knew I was going to get hit a lot.

Oh, there's a funny story about perception along these lines.

Some friends in Cambridge years and years ago were hosting a meeting between two very, very distinguished spiritual teachers. Kalu Rinpoche was a highly regarded Lama in the Tibetan Kagyu school, and Seung Sahn was a very inspiring Korean Zen master. They both happened to be in Cambridge at the same time, so some friends brought them together thinking, "Wow, this will be amazing. One enlightened mind seeing another enlightened mind. It'll just be emptiness reflecting emptiness. And we might get enlightened just from the contact."

So they brought them together in a friend's living room and served them tea and snacks. Seung Sahn started the dialogue, and coming from a tradition where koans are used extensively, he picked up an orange and held it out toward Kalu Rinpoche asking, "What is this?"

Kalu just sat there and counted his beads on his mala, keeping a smile on his face. Seung Sahn wasn't getting the response he wanted, so he held the orange out again and repeated, "What is this?" Kalu just kept doing his mala, then turned to his translator and whispered something. The translator said to the group, "Don't they have oranges in Korea?"

This is playing with perception. Can we see things just fresh, not necessarily just as a category? Can we see without so much the veil of memory? That's the challenge of this aggregate.

But at any rate, when we hear the bell, we recognize that it usually means the end of a sitting. So it's usually a pretty pleasant sound.

The fourth aggregate we call mental formations. I think we've talked about this before. This includes all our thoughts, strong emotions—desire and fear and sadness, anger and so forth—moods, background moods like nostalgia or feeling a little blue, contentment, and refined meditative states. All the qualities of mindfulness and concentration, equanimity, loving-kindness, compassion—all these wholesome meditative states are also in this basket of mental formations or sankharas. So it's basically all the factors of mind that flow through. This is the biggest assemblage of mind objects that we're pointing to.

So hearing the bell, when it happens, you might feel immediately relaxed—the sitting's over, oh, now I can relax. That mood is one of the sankharas. And you might have the thought, "Oh, now I could sit forever." Sometimes the sitting gets really easy after the bell rings. So that thought would also be a mental formation.

The fifth aggregate is a really interesting one, and one that we may not have paid much attention to before we started to meditate—consciousness. The Pali word is vijnana. Now in Western languages, consciousness might mean something really broad. In psychology or philosophy, it can mean many different things and has broad meanings and interpretations. Like in the seventies, we spent a lot of time consciousness-raising, looking at issues of gender and race and privilege and so forth, raising our consciousness about all those issues. That's not what it means in the aggregates or generally in Buddhist terms.

This word vijnana is really, really simple in Buddhist language. It is the bare faculty of knowing sense data. So for instance, when you first hear the bell, just the fact that that sound arises for you, the bare knowing of the sound itself—it's vijnana that reveals that.

There are different kinds of knowing that happen in relation to this sound. There's the knowing of just the bare sound. You might be someone with perfect pitch and you'd say, "Oh, that's F sharp." That would be a different kind of knowing. There might be the perception, "Oh, this is the bell at the end of the meditation session." That's a kind of knowing. There might be the recognition, "Oh, that goes in the aggregate of rupa." That's a thought—that's a kind of knowing.

Consciousness is the simplest kind of knowing that there can be. It's just—I don't know how else to say it—knowing, receiving, or making appear to us the bare sense data of our experience.

We are all sentient beings. What sentience means is that we're having conscious experience. When you think about times when you fainted, or were in deep sleep, or under general anesthesia, those were times when—as far as we know, as far as I've ever remembered—conscious experience was not occurring. I wasn't having sense experiences in those situations. But when you're awake, conscious experience is happening through the six sense doors, and it's the faculty of consciousness that allows them to arise and be known. I don't know how else to say it. Do you get a sense of this?

The simplest kind of knowing that reveals our sense objects.

Here's an example. You know that old riddle: If a tree falls in the forest and no one is present, does it make a sound? This is a seeming paradox, but it's really just because sound hasn't been well defined. So let me put it this way: If a tree falls in the forest and no one is there, does it create a wave of air pressure at a certain frequency? Yes. Is that a sound? Well, it could be or it could not—it depends how you define it. But if a person is there and that sound wave hits the person's ear and the ear is working, does a sound arise in that person's experience? Yes. That's the moment of conscious experience. Consciousness is what lets that sound arise and be known.

It's very interesting to investigate: every part of our experience as waking human beings has this element of consciousness in it. In every moment of experience, consciousness is present and its functioning is revealing what's in that moment. When you look into it a little more, as you hear that sound, there are two things going on. One is the physical sound in your experience. The other is that you're having a moment of hearing consciousness that knows it. These two things are not separate.

The way I understand it is that the sound and the consciousness come right together. You can't have one without the other. So I regard it as a unitary experience, but we can look at either the physical aspect of the sound or we can look at the mental aspect of the consciousness. We can tune our attention to either one of those.

Now how can one experience have two aspects? Is this round or is it black? You can look at it either way, can't you? You can notice the roundness of it, or you can notice the blackness of it. In the same way, as you investigate your sense experience, you can either notice the bare data—the five physical senses, thoughts and emotions—or you can notice this activity of consciousness that's always taking place because you are a sentient being. It's always there and it can be tuned into.

This becomes a very interesting meditation pathway. Most of our instructions are about noticing the objects of our senses: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions. But in each of those experiences, we could equally well notice the consciousness aspect. We can tune into the knowing because that's right there with every object. Tuning into the knowing turns out to be a really interesting meditation exercise. We're not going to go into it anymore tonight, but I wanted to lay the background for that.

So these are the five aggregates: material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. Is there anything in your experience that doesn't fit? I'm not going to do a big Q&A on this, but I'll leave it to you to investigate. I'm going to suggest that this is an exhaustive description of our human experience. I'll leave you to confirm it or ask about it later.

What's significant about this? There's one really central term that is not included: me. There is no "I" or self or center in the aggregates. Our whole human experience is just form, feeling, perception, formations and consciousness. There's no one at the center who owns it.

There's no one in the center to whom it's all happening. There's no little observer in the center that's noticing it all. Truthfully, this thing that we thought of as the observer that was inside the head is only identification with consciousness. When we say "I'm seeing, I'm hearing, I'm tasting," actually it's consciousness that sees, consciousness that hears, consciousness that tastes. But when we identify the I with that fragment, we get the sense of the observer. But there's no observer there. There's only consciousness carrying out its work of knowing. That's what creates a sense of the observer.

So that's why looking at the aggregates as describing our experience is freeing—because we start to understand this mind-body process without the addition of an I. Truth to tell, the six sense objects do the same thing. And that's why in every moment of mindfulness, you are helping to unravel the sense of self. Every time you're directly with a breath, a sensation, a sound, a thought, a feeling, a sight, you're giving priority to that object and you're not whipping up the drama of self.

Where do you start whipping up the drama of self? When you start proliferating in thoughts. And that happens a lot. So take a look: when the mind is not with the sense objects, with mindfulness, where is it dwelling? It goes into thinking. What do you think about primarily? Isn't it I, me and mine? When you look at what gives your thoughts the juice, the passion, the energy, the investment, isn't it I, me, and mine? Take a look at where your thoughts go.

This proliferating tendency that tends to dwell around I, me, and mine, is called papañca. The thoughts spin, and what do they spin around? Self. When they spin around self, look at what's fueling them. Do these thoughts have emotional energy? Often they do, don't they? When you come back from a thought excursion, are you more peaceful, more settled, more calm, more equanimous? Or does a thought excursion tend to stir up greed, aversion, and delusion?

These thought excursions of papañca are not so innocent. They're not so neutral. They involve us more and more in the concerns of the self. And they involve us then in different degrees of suffering.

So we start to look at this makeup of the mind-body process that we call a human being. And it's fine to talk about a human being, but we start to understand there is nothing in the center of all this that we can point to and say, "That's me, that's I, that's the true self." Because properly understood, this is just a collection of parts. Being human is just a collection of parts—the material part, feeling, perception, formations, and then the consciousness part.

I like to think of it really in three parts rather than five. One is the body and the physical sense impressions. The other is all the stuff that goes on in the mind—so I would lump feeling, perception, and formations in one category that I'd call mental factors. And the third is the consciousness, the knowing faculty.

So let's think of it as those three parts. In the texts they use the classical analogy of a chariot, but I couldn't bring one into the room. Everybody recognize what this is? From the back you can probably see it's a pen. We say that it's a common object; everybody agrees this is a pen. But what is a pen, really? Is a pen a thing? Or is the pen just an assemblage of parts?

Because lo and behold, I've got a cap, I've got an ink cartridge, I've got a spring, and I've got a barrel. Is this a pen? No. It's the pieces of a pen, right? But it's not a pen until we put it together again.

And when I take the right pieces and assemble them in a certain way, now I've got a pen. And everybody would agree. So a human being is a collection of these pieces assembled in a certain way—body with physical senses, mental factors like love, hate, desire, fear, compassion, tenderness, and consciousness, this knowing faculty. That's what we are. That's all we are. And there's nothing in the center of it. There are just these pieces passing through and functioning together.

So this is what I came to see about my sister. When I had felt that she was so solid, what I had basically put together was her personality—and that's the mental formations piece. Mental formations describe a personality. That's how we know someone, through their qualities of heart and mind. I had put her mental formations, her personality, glued together with her body. And I didn't understand that they weren't a fused unit. I took her as the person that she was with her physical expression and her emotional expression. And I didn't see that those were two separate things.

When she died, the body was still there. The personality was not. That's what was so confusing to me. But then I came to understand those two had just been put together for the course of her life. They were never fused forever. And so I started to understand myself in the same way. The body is here, exists for a certain period of time, but the personality is changing all the time. You know, mental formations are born and die, born and die, born and die. They're not fused together.

So this is the way the Buddha explained it. He asked the practitioners about this question. He said, "Bhikkhus, what do you think? Is material form permanent or impermanent?"

You know the answer, right? "Impermanent, venerable sir."

"Is what is impermanent suffering or happiness?"

Now I have to understand these words the way he meant them—dukkha or sukha. Dukkha means something that isn't capable of giving lasting satisfaction. Remember we talked about viparinama dukkha and sankhara dukkha? It's not that it's necessarily unpleasant, but at some point it will change. And if we look closely, it's changing even in the moment. Something that's going to change, can it give lasting happiness? No.

So is it ultimately unsatisfying or can it give lasting happiness? The bhikkhus, being very smart, said, "Suffering, venerable sir." It doesn't mean it's unpleasant. It doesn't mean it's dukkha dukkha, but it's incapable of giving lasting satisfaction.

"Is what is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change fit to be regarded thus: This is mine. This I am. This is myself?"

So this is really the crux of it. The Buddha is asking, do you want to pin your happiness and your identity on what is impermanent, unsatisfying, and subject to change? It's kind of like, why would we do that? If we knew that was coming, why would we do that? Build a self and a whole identity around that.

And the bhikkhus said, "No, venerable sir, it is not fit to regard them as this is mine, this I am, this is myself."

And then he went through the same question with the other four aggregates. So he had them examine feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. And what he said is that all of these components are arising and passing, but there is no self that's continuing, independent of these. This continuity is important. When you look into the assumptions around a self, there are embedded assumptions about what a self means, about what "I" means.

The central embedded assumption is continuity. We believe that the self continues over time, but that's opposed to the transitory nature of all the aggregates. Our experience is not continuing over time, but we think the self is. We think "I am."

In some ways, we feel like, "Oh, I'm the same person that was in that third grade class learning arithmetic." And the problem with that is then we think, "I am the same person who at some future time is going to die." So this "I" that has been assumed to have this ongoing continuity, we see an end to that. And that's part of our existential dilemma of being human—this awareness of our own mortality.

If we consider the "I" is supposed to be continuous, that becomes a problem. If you saw yourself as arising and passing, arising and passing, arising and passing, moment by moment, you'd see yourself being born and dying in every moment. Then that moment at the end—what's the end of the physical life—wouldn't be so upsetting. But we don't see it that way. We think that the "I" continues and has these changing experiences. That's what's not accurate.

At any rate, this formulation of the Buddha's—"this is mine, this I am, this is myself"—is a very helpful way to notice our experience because we can turn it around as he did himself. And he said, "What is the right way to understand it?" And he said, "Therefore, all forms should be seen as it really is with proper wisdom thus: This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself." And then he repeats that for the other four aggregates.

This is a practice pointer. This is not just intellectual speculation. This is a practice pointer. When you get caught up in taking some aspect of experience as yourself or as belonging to you, try saying, "Not me, not mine, not who I am." See if you can tune into that with proper wisdom thus: not me, not mine, not who I am. Just try it. Just drop those three little phrases in when you feel like you've identified with something and see.

Another way to say this is we stop taking things so personally. So what does that mean—we stop taking things personally? Obviously there is a person here. There's a person with a whole history and conditioning and background, and our situation is very personal, our conditioning is very personal, our body is very personal. What would it mean to not take these things personally?

Let me suggest that our condition, our human situation, is made up of a personal component and a universal component. Or a better way that I like to say it than impersonal, because that almost seems to deny the personal, is universal. A personal dimension and a universal dimension to our experience.

The universal dimension we can tune into when we see ourselves as part of nature. The personal dimension is really helpful to understand, especially in relating to suffering. Whether it's our own suffering or other suffering, we see how the conditions that have generated our suffering are caused from many, many different situations, and we understand our personal background is also coming out of many different causes and conditions, and we don't invalidate those. The personal way of looking is a valid way of looking.

So in a personal way of looking, I would say I am a white, cisgender, male, middle-aged, brought up with a middle-class background, and a college education. Those are all characteristics that describe this being in a certain way and those are all accurate. But if we just focus on the particulars of our conditions, we miss the universal peace.

So the way I like to think of the universal peace is in the here and now, in the moment, I am just an outgrowth of nature.

We look first at the body. You know, we take the body really personally. We're proud of it or we're embarrassed about it. We like the way it is in certain ways and we wish it were different in certain other ways. And somehow in all of that, there's a sense of meanness about it that feels weighty sometimes. Whether we're proud of it or we're embarrassed about it, it feels like kind of a weight.

But we forget we didn't have anything to do with the basic way this body turned up. It was the product of the meeting of our father's sperm with our mother's egg, nourished in the womb, born into the world, fed on milk and air and sun and water and solid food, and it grew, grew, grew, aged, aged, aged, until it is the way it is today, with a certain hair color and skin color and height and breadth of shoulders and athleticism or lack thereof.

Did you have anything to do with that? For sure, you can modify it slightly with diet, with exercise, with healthcare. But do you have anything to do with the basic way you turned out? Color of your eyes, color of your hair, color of your skin, height, frame. Did you even get a vote?

Yet we claim it with either pride or embarrassment. And it's just a product of physical nature.

I spent some time when I was in Thailand as a monk with Ajahn Buddhadasa, one of the great forest masters of the last century. Central to his teaching was having us live very close to nature because he felt we learned so much from being in nature. This is the way he put it: "This body came from nature, grew in nature, never departed from nature, and belongs to nature. Give it back to nature. That will be a great relief for you."

So the aggregates are just part of nature.

Emotions are the same. When we have a strong feeling, we look at the personal conditions and history that have led to its arising. But if we drop into the moment without the history, fear is just fear. It's not like my fear is any different than your fear. Joy is just joy. It's not like mine is different than yours.

We all have the whole human package. We all have this whole range of emotions. Until we're fully enlightened, then we lose some of them. But until then, we all have this same package. This is part of our mental nature. They're not unique. The situations that brought them around, the storyline behind them is unique. But the emotion, when it comes, is shared with every human being on the planet. We all have this. That's our emotional nature.

And similarly with consciousness. Consciousness is the least individual thing I can think of in the universe. It's not like some of us have a really great viññāṇa and others have a really puny viññāṇa. This knowing quality, as far as I can tell, is the same in all of us. And I think it's also the same in frogs and cats and caterpillars. All sentient beings have this knowing faculty. There's nothing individual about it. That's also mental nature.

So when we can see the natural part of the aggregates, then we don't have to take it so personally.

"Therefore, all forms should be seen as it really is with correct wisdom. This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself. Seeing thus, the instructed noble disciple becomes disenchanted with form, with feeling, with perception, with formations, with consciousness. Being disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, one's mind is liberated. When it is liberated, one understands: birth is destroyed. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more renewal of being."

So let's just sit for a minute together.

Seeing thus, the instructed noble disciple becomes disenchanted. Being disenchanted, one becomes dispassionate. Through dispassion, one's mind is liberated.

CHAPTER 62

The Third Noble Truth and Nibbāna

Guy Armstrong · 1h05

Guy Armstrong offers a profound exploration of the Third Noble Truth and nibbāna, presenting what he considers "the very heart of Dharma practice." Drawing from the Buddha's own quest and awakening, Armstrong examines the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha) as both the complete, remainderless end of craving (taṇhā) and its temporary cessation accessible in daily meditation.

The talk illuminates the unconditioned (asaṅkhata) nature of nibbāna through key suttas and teachings, explaining how craving, suffering, and selfing are intimately connected through the process of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda). Armstrong guides practitioners through the crucial four links - contact (phassa), feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging (upādāna) - showing how freedom lies in "resting in the gap between feeling and craving."

Using practical examples and the Buddha's instructions to Mālunkyāputta, Armstrong demonstrates how to direct attention toward the deathless element (amata dhātu) through non-clinging (anupādāna). The teaching concludes with an inspiring account from Luang Por Liem, Ajahn Chah's successor, describing his realization of unshakeable peace. This dharma talk provides both the ultimate vision of complete liberation and practical guidance for touching moments of temporary nibbāna in everyday practice.

Two weeks ago I talked about the First and Second Noble Truths, and the subject of the talk this evening is the Third Noble Truth and Nibbāna. I want to say that I consider the material of this talk to be my idea of the pointer to the very heart of Dharma practice. What we are talking about tonight, in my view, is why we practice and how we are meant to practice. So I'm going to try to sum it up from a number of different angles.

When the Buddha was still a layperson, he was twenty-nine years old and living with his parents. This sounds like it could be the punchline for a modern sitcom, but it was not so unusual back in India at the time. And he described his quest in this way. He was still a layperson, and he said: "Why, myself being subject to birth, aging, sickness, and death, why do I seek what is also subject to birth, aging, sickness, and death?" You can think of this as the layperson's quest for sense pleasures—that's what the common trend is. But why do I do that? "Suppose that I seek the unaging, unailing, deathless, supreme security from bondage, nibbāna."

That reflection is what led him off on his six-year journey—six years of serious spiritual practice going through deep forms of renunciation and asceticism until he found what he was looking for. As you know, he realized this through his awakening on that night under the Bodhi tree.

Immediately after his awakening, this poem came to his mind. This is from the Dhammapada: "Through many a birth I wandered in saṃsāra, seeking but not finding the builder of this house. Painful is birth again and again. Oh house builder, now you are seen. You shall build no house again. My mind has attained the unconditioned and reached the very end of craving."

In this statement, the house is the body that is generated again and again through the rounds of rebirth and saṃsāra. The house builder is craving. The Second Noble Truth points to craving as the source of suffering. So the Buddha is basically saying that it's this craving that generates the round of saṃsāra again and again. "My mind has attained the unconditioned"—this is one of the synonyms for nibbāna.

Something that is unconditioned does not arise from prior causes and conditions. All conditioned things arise from prior causes and conditions and because of their arising are also characterized by passing away. Nibbāna does not arise from prior causes and conditions; therefore it is the unconditioned. So these two are synonyms: nibbāna and the unconditioned.

After his breakthrough, the Buddha thought not to teach. He said: "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, hard to see and hard to understand, subtle to be experienced by the wise." So I can't claim that this talk will be either profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. So just allow for that. This talk may be really hard to understand, so don't try too hard. Just kind of let it flow over you and through you, okay? You can't figure it all out, this territory.

So the Buddha's statement of the Third Noble Truth—remember the First Noble Truth was the truth of suffering, the Second Noble Truth was that the cause of suffering is craving. Here's the statement of the Third Noble Truth: "Now this, bhikkhus, is the noble truth of the cessation of suffering. It is the remainderless fading away and cessation of that same craving, the giving up and relinquishing of it, freedom from it, nonreliance on it."

Here the Buddha is equating the end of suffering with the end of craving. And because of the earlier poem, we know he's also equating it with nibbāna and the unconditioned. So these are all terms for the same territory of discovery. And he describes this as the remainderless cessation of craving. To me, that means it ceases and no remainder comes again. Craving ceases and it is over. That is what the full end of suffering is about.

If we only understand the Third Noble Truth in this light—the complete remainderless cessation of craving—that makes it a very remote possibility, at least for me. Maybe it's closer for you; I can't tell. But this full liberation that's pointed to by this term "remainderless cessation of craving" is something that we come to gradually, slowly, over the course of a lifetime or many lifetimes. So this formulation can make the Third Noble Truth seem kind of theoretical. Like, right, this is something that's going to happen ten lifetimes from now or whatever. Won't think about it.

But there's another way to understand the Third Noble Truth where we understand it as the temporary cessation of craving. And this we experience many times during a day.

This temporary cessation of craving leads to the temporary cessation of suffering. As we become more skilled in recognizing these moments, this becomes our pathway to freedom here and now. It's a relative kind of freedom—not the final freedom, but a good kind of freedom. The temporary end of craving is a temporary release and a temporary movement into something profound.

This understanding of the Third Noble Truth makes it genuinely accessible in our experience here and now. It's very practical and can be absolutely immediate for us.

We want to understand both dimensions—this final pointing that the Buddha is talking about, which offers a very inspiring vision. The vision that we can come to the complete end of suffering is right there in the Third Noble Truth. And even before we reach it, there are many, many moments of freedom that we can touch in our practice. I find the combination of both of these very inspiring.

We also want to bring in the connection with self. I talked last week about the fact that there's no self found in this changing mind-body process. This is also directly connected to the teaching on the Third Noble Truth. Over the course of this talk, I hope it will become clear how craving, suffering, and selfing are all very closely related, and how non-craving, not suffering, and not-self are also very closely related. That's why I say that this configuration of elements is really at the heart of what we're doing in dharma practice.

Each of the Noble Truths is not just a philosophical statement to be believed in—it comes with an action. There's something to do about each of the Noble Truths. What is the action for the Third Noble Truth? This Noble Truth of the cessation of suffering is to be realized. This is a goal in our practice: to realize the cessation of suffering.

In conceiving it as the permanent end of suffering, this is basically saying that nibbana is to be realized. As I understand the Third Noble Truth, the aim of our practice is for each of us to have the direct realization in our personal experience of the unconditioned, or nibbana—this is what we are practicing for. To realize this element directly for ourselves.

This realization—direct, immediate, personal experience—is what constitutes a moment of enlightenment in our tradition. Or you could say awakening; I'll use the terms synonymously. In our tradition, there are considered to be four stages of enlightenment. It's not an all-or-nothing thing. There is an initial stage called stream entry, which matures into a greater degree of freedom called once-returner, and then a still greater degree of freedom called non-returner, culminating in full enlightenment or arahantship. One's practice, one's realization unfolds in our tradition in these four steps.

So what is nibbana? This is the hardest thing in all of Buddhism to talk about. It's not describable, basically. It's beyond dualities. Language differentiates—it separates one thing from another. Nibbana is beyond all dualities, so there are no words that can adequately convey it.

The Buddha was deliberately quite vague in the details of nibbana, and I think that was very wise. As soon as we put out a description of a state, the mind will fabricate an attempt to simulate it. By not giving details, the Buddha kept us away from that kind of artificial effort. What he did is he laid out very clearly the steps for us to realize it ourselves, basically saying: you'll know when you get there. You don't have to have a concept about it ahead of time. You'll know when you reach it, and here are the steps to reach it.

The literal meaning of nibbana in terms of its word origin is extinguishing or blowing out. There's the image of a candle or a fire that is blown out. The fire stands for craving, essentially. In blowing out the fire of craving, where does the fire go? When you blow out a candle, where does the fire go? It's just gone, isn't it? That's what happens with craving when full enlightenment is reached. It's just gone.

Sariputta described it this way: "The destruction of greed, the destruction of aversion, the destruction of delusion—this is called nibbana." He's pointing to the very end of greed, aversion and delusion, synonymous with the end of craving.

So again, craving is equivalent to greed, aversion and delusion. Nibbana is, in this description, a state of mind. But it's also understood as a dhamma, which means something that's present within our experience. We'll get to this a little later.

This is from the Udana, a Pali text: "There is, bhikkhus, an unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded. If there were not this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, then there would be no deliverance here visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded. But since there is this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded, therefore a deliverance is visible from that which is born, become, made, compounded."

So what is born, become, made, compounded? The six sense bases. The elements of our experience are all being born, made out of prior conditions. Is there release from the six sense bases? Yes. And it is this unborn, unbecome, unmade, uncompounded that gives the possibility of release from the phenomena of our six sense bases.

Because nibbana is an unconditioned element, it means it's an element within our experience that is not subject to arising and passing. Not subject to arising and passing means it's ever present. It's not that it arises and then you're enlightened. It's not subject to arising and passing. So that means it's always present. That means it's here and now for each of us. It's a dimension of our being that is always available in any moment. That means the possibility of waking up is here in any moment.

Why don't we see it? We don't see it because it's so subtle. Its nature is so subtle. That's what the Buddha was pointing to when he said, "This Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, hard to see." It is, as far as I know, the subtlest element imaginable within our being. And our usual range of movements of mind—the defilements, craving, greed, aversion, delusion—are so coarse that they cover it over. Their coarse movements obscure the subtlety of this particular element, of this dimension.

And that is why the training of the path involves this meticulous shaping of the mind that we're engaged in through meditation. This is the role of the seven factors of enlightenment. Their role is to shape the mind so that its subtlety matches the subtlety of nibbana, of the unconditioned. When the mind is shaped in such a way with this exquisite balance of presence, energy and stillness, then the mind is prepared. It is converging on the nature of the unconditioned, so close that at some point it will touch it. It will open to it. There will be that direct realization.

And that is why the cultivation of the seven factors of awakening is so critical in our meditation practice. Our aim is to realize the unconditioned element because that's what constitutes enlightenment or awakening. The seven factors are the key players that shape the mind for that to be possible.

Here are some synonyms from the Samyutta Nikaya for this element. The Buddha called it the unconditioned, the truth, the other shore, the everlasting, peace, the deathless, safety, freedom, the shelter, the harbor, the refuge and the beyond.

The Buddha considered this the highest possible happiness available to us, way beyond sense pleasures and even beyond very refined states of meditation such as loving kindness or concentration. It is so happy because within it there is no possibility of suffering. That's why it is a place of complete safety. In it we have stepped completely out of the reach of suffering—cannot be touched by it. It is happy because the mind is beyond the possibility of disturbance.

I find it really interesting that this movement beyond disturbance is what gives the deepest possible happiness. It's not the highest high. It's not the deepest concentration. It's not even the most open-hearted metta. It is this state that is beyond disturbance, beyond agitation, beyond suffering. There is a relief that can't be compared to anything else.

In the Dhammapada, the Buddha says that peace is the highest happiness. He's actually pointing at this kind of peace, but it's still a good phrase to bear in mind.

Peace is the highest happiness. I wonder how many people in the world believe that. Because if you look at the world, it's not like peace is the main thing being chased out there. And then how many of us believe it? It's interesting, because peace is basically available in any moment. If we trust in that, it will come more and more.

So how do we get to this highest happiness? Well, of course, this is the Fourth Noble Truth. The way to the cessation of suffering is the Noble Eightfold Path. The Buddha said, "Just as the river Ganges slants, slopes, and inclines towards the ocean, so too a practitioner who develops and cultivates the Noble Eightfold Path slants, slopes, and inclines towards nibbana."

So this practice that you all are engaged in—you are directly engaged in the Eightfold Path every day, hour after hour. Sometimes it's moment after moment. You're directly engaged in cultivating the Eightfold Path. It's only going one way. It's going toward nibbana, toward that highest happiness. That's where you're all heading. Whether you intended it that way when you came or not, that's where it's leading you.

Now it's interesting—when you head in that direction, a lot of other great things come also. But the Buddha said, "Don't take any of those as the end of the journey. Keep going." And he said this very clearly in a discourse called the Simile of the Heartwood.

The heartwood is the most beautiful part of a tree. And there are lots of other pieces to a tree. There are leaves and twigs and bark and outer wood, and then there's the heartwood. So the Buddha said, "This holy life, friends, does not have gain, honor, and renown for its benefit, although that may come along the way, or the attainment of virtue for its benefit, although that comes along the way, or the attainment of concentration for its benefit, or knowledge and vision for its benefit. Not even insight is the purpose. But it is this unshakable deliverance of mind that is the goal of the holy life, its heartwood and its end."

This is what the Buddha taught for—the unshakable deliverance of mind. This is the final release from craving and end of suffering.

So that lays out the map toward this final end that the Third Noble Truth is pointing to. But let's talk now about the temporary end, because it's much more practical and accessible through our meditation practice. And yet, the one will lead toward the other, so they're not entirely separate.

I want to start by looking more closely at what blocks this opening to the temporary end of craving. And I'll put it in terms of the creation of self. We talked about how the sense of "I" is not intrinsic, stable, permanent, and ongoing, but it is created over and over and over again. How does that happen?

There's this really wonderful pithy statement from Ananda. Ananda was the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. He was a cousin from the village area that Buddha grew up in. And this is a statement from Ananda: "Another monk told me when we were newly ordained, it is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging. And by clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness."

So when we hold on to any of the elements of the senses—the six senses or the five aggregates—the notion "I am" is going to get created. In other words, a new self is going to arise.

You can take a look at this in your direct experience. When does the sense of "I" arise? And does it ever arise on its own? Or does it come into being in relation to some object of the senses? For example, sensation in the knee: "I have a knee pain." The "I" arises in relation to the knee pain. Or in relation to a thought: "I am thinking." Or in relation to a mood: "I feel happy" or "I feel sad."

Or in relation to consciousness. "I am aware." We don't actually need the word "I" in any of these. We could simply talk about knee pain, thought, happiness, consciousness. But when we add the "I" to it, a sense of self gets born, gets stirred up.

Does the "I" ever arise on its own? Do you ever just sit there and it goes, "me"? Just pop up out of nowhere. "Here I am." Take a look. It arises in relation to objects in our sense experience.

There's a rather poignant discussion in the Anguttara Nikaya between the Buddha and Sariputta. Picture this: the Buddha has been teaching for several years already, and he says this to his chief disciple: "Whether I teach the Dhamma in brief or in detail, those who understand it are hard to find."

That's every teacher's lament, isn't it? This is the universal plight of the teacher, whether you're teaching arithmetic in third grade or astrophysics. And Sariputta replies, "Now, Blessed One, is the time to teach the Dhamma. There will be those who will understand."

So the Buddha continues: "Well then, Sariputta, this is how one should train. In regard to this body with its consciousness and in regard to all external signs, let there be no 'I-making' and no 'mine-making' and no underlying tendency to conceit." That is, forming a sense of self by comparing, by establishing. "Let there be no 'I-making' or 'mine-making' with the body, its consciousness, and all external objects."

What I love about this statement of the Buddha—apart from the poignancy you feel in it—is how clear it is that "I" and "mine" get made over and over again in the present moment. We are generating them through our volitional formations, through our own creations. This activity—I think we've referred to it a few times—we could also call "selfing."

The "I" is not a constant, ongoing thing. We make it up, partly by attaching with language to the simple events of our moment-to-moment experience: "I have a knee pain." "I'm feeling happy." "I'm aware."

The philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein made this famous comment that the self is merely a shadow cast by grammar. It's just kind of an accident. We say it over and over again in our language—"I have this," "I am that"—and we start believing it's real. It's just a shadow.

Try relating to your experience without making "I" or "mine" and see how that feels, because the "I" is always extra.

As a practice instruction, what's very interesting from this quotation from the Buddha is to notice when the sense of "I" is weak. Take a look. When is the sense of "I" weak? I'll give you a hint: When are things calm and peaceful? When is it pretty mellow?

When is the "I" strong? Well, take a look. When are hindrances up? When are strong emotions and a lot of thought energy up? Then the sense of "I" rises up really strongly.

When is the sense of "I" completely absent? Take a look. It could well be happening numerous times during the day, maybe briefly, but take a look and see. And then look and see: How do these three states feel? When the sense of "I" is strong, does that feel pleasant? Or does it feel agitated and disturbing? When the sense of "I" is weak, you can touch a sense of peace and ease. And when the sense of "I" is completely absent, how does that feel?

Investigate, explore, see what the impact is. Where is there suffering, and where is there the absence of suffering?

Another way the Buddha described the formation of I—probably the most clearly—is in the chain of dependent origination. I think this has been mentioned already. It's a chain of twelve links that begins with ignorance and goes through a series of different activities, ending in suffering. You start with ignorance, you end up in suffering as a rule. That's what this chain describes, though it presents it in considerable detail.

I'm not going to explore the whole chain—it's too much for this talk. Moreover, the first five links are somewhat philosophical, and I don't really want to delve into that. The last three links are again rather philosophical, which I'll leave aside. But the central four links are very experiential. They are designed for meditators to investigate, so these are the ones I want to examine.

The central four links in the chain are contact, feeling, craving, and clinging. Sally may have mentioned these in an earlier talk, but we'll go through them again with a specific focus on the generation of self.

Contact is the arising of an impression at one of the sense doors—one of the six sense objects. Contact really means the coming together of the sense organ, the sense object, and the sense consciousness. For instance, if your eyes are open or your ear is working—let's say your ear is working—you have the ear organ, you have the sound of my voice, and it reveals itself through hearing consciousness in your direct experience. That's contact.

Contact has the quality of giving rise to a feeling tone. This is vedanā, the second foundation of mindfulness—being pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. Every moment of contact gives rise to a feeling tone. It's embedded in that moment of contact.

We've talked about how feeling tone is so important because pleasant feeling tones are the stimulus for greed to arise. Unpleasant feeling tone is the stimulus for aversion to arise. Neutral feeling tone is the stimulus for delusion to arise. Here we have the fulcrum of moving into greed, aversion, and delusion, and that's why the next link in the chain is craving. Craving is more or less synonymous with greed, aversion, and delusion. The idea is that feeling tone conditions the arising of craving.

So we have contact, feeling, craving. Let's look into this activity of craving a little more deeply.

Something happens at a sense door—like a sound. The attention inclines toward that sound, specifically based on its pleasant or unpleasant nature. In this case, let's say it's pleasant. The mind inclines to it. If you really like this sound—because it means the end of a sitting, for example—the attention inclines, and at some point you take hold of it. That's the activity of clinging or grasping.

With truly pleasurable things, we take hold because we want to keep them. We want to stop that moment and preserve the pleasure of it. It's also called fixating. We want to freeze time, as it were, when something pleasant is there. Or when something unpleasant is there, the attention leans to it because we're fascinated by the threat it poses. We don't want to experience the unpleasant, so again we lean toward it and take hold of it in order to push it away.

Whether we want to bring something to us out of greed or push something away out of aversion, to act on it we first have to take hold of it. That's the activity of clinging, which is the next step.

Contact gives rise to feeling tone. Feeling tone stimulates craving. Craving stimulates clinging. Once you're in clinging, you're in trouble, because then it leads on pretty inevitably to suffering.

Let's look at a couple of examples to see why this is so. Take knee pain as an example. We're in a sitting, in the hall, and there's this little disturbance arising in our knee. Over the course of a sitting, it gets stronger and stronger. Finally, we realize, "Uh-oh, this could really be something serious." So the attention leans in, takes hold of the knee pain, and then what happens? We start to proliferate around it with thoughts: "What have I done to my knee?"

Is it going to be like this forever? Am I ever going to be able to walk again? Do I need to go see a surgeon when I get home and get a knee replacement? How much is that going to cost? Does my insurance cover it?

Do you notice the "I" thoughts in all that? When we've taken hold of something, in this case out of aversion, "I" thoughts proliferate around it. And that's because grasping is not a neutral activity. It's fueled by greed, aversion, and delusion. So there are strong emotions circulating around that act of grasping. The "I" gets born around the strong emotions—in this case, worry, fear, restlessness, and so forth.

But if you're a reasonably lucky meditator, the bell rings, you get up to walk, and in a couple of minutes the knee pain's gone. You think, "I don't have to call my doctor today. I can walk another mile."

So here we've had a birth. As we've taken hold of the knee pain, out of that fear, a self has been born. Let's call it the injured yogi. It's taken birth, it's proliferated, it's projected a future where we're going to have to go to the hospital. The injured yogi was a being, was a self for a while. So there was a birth, and then in time, when we walk and actually find it's okay, the injured yogi passes away. There's a birth and there's also a passing away, and the mind comes back to balance. That's in relation to a painful sensation.

What about a pleasant sensation, a pleasant experience? When I was first meditating in this hall many years ago, I started to wander into places of some concentration, and I thought, "This is what I've been waiting for. This is what meditation is supposed to be about." The mind got still, the body was relaxed, everything was stable. Thoughts would come and go and I wasn't disturbed. A little discomfort in the body wasn't disturbing. Everything was stable, peaceful, workable.

And I started thinking, "Wow, now I know how to meditate. Now I've got it." I kept this through that sitting, went out to walk, and as I was walking, I just kept thinking, "This is so great. It's going to be like this from now on. I'm going to have such a steady mind. I'll be a great worker. I'll get promoted really quickly in my company. I'll be really great in relationships, and I'm going to have the best partners possible because I'm so stable and I'm so loving and I'm so balanced." I just saw my life unfolding in a really beautiful progression because this state was never going to leave me.

Then I came back in to sit. Guess what happened? Totally gone. I'd been spinning out in thoughts. I'd totally lost the concentration.

So here I had taken birth as the good meditator. It was a very happy birth. It was kind of a heaven realm birth. I thought I was floating, cruising, but the passing away—not so pleasant.

First, with the knee pain, there was an unhappy birth as the injured yogi, but a happy death when we found it wasn't that bad. With the state of concentration, there was a happy birth as the good yogi, but there was a very painful passing away. Either way we grasp, either kind of birth we take, there's going to be suffering. Happy birth, unhappy death. Unhappy birth, happy death. There's unhappiness in both.

As long as we grasp, and in the grasping, we will create a self. Take a look at it. When you take hold of something and freeze it in time, watch the "I" thought start to proliferate around it. That's the sign that grasping has happened, and that is a new birth. Eventually, that birth will pass. All these selves that we give rise to during the day do pass away, but with the grasping, a new self comes into being.

What becomes clear through this analysis is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds on to or pushes away what is unfolding in experience.

For the most part in worldly life, we activate this state of grasping so often that it becomes what's called monkey mind. Have you ever watched a monkey go through a forest by swinging? The monkey will take hold of a vine and use that vine to swing, only letting go when it has another vine to hold on to in the next part. Then it takes hold of that vine and swings, only letting go when it gets another one to grasp.

In worldly life, this is exactly what we do—we hold from one thing to another to another, over and over again. But as meditators, we have another choice. We start to realize that we can let go of one vine and not grasp the next. And we don't crash. That's where we have it over the monkeys.

So the question is: in this chain of contact, feeling, craving, clinging, and that leading to suffering—is this inevitable? Does contact always have to lead to suffering? No. If it were inevitable, we'd be stuck. There would be no way out. That means it's possible to have contact and not move into suffering, which means the chain gets broken at some point.

Where do you think it gets broken? Can you ever have a pleasant feeling and not move into greed? Can you have an unpleasant feeling and not move into aversion? Yes. This means that feeling tone can arise and it doesn't have to lead to craving. This is where the chain gets broken.

With enough mindfulness and enough steadiness, we can be with the pleasant and not move into greed. We can be with the unpleasant and not move into aversion. Then we're not taking a new birth. We're not forming a new self. We're not moving on to clinging and proliferating an I.

One Buddhist teacher put it this way: the whole of the path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving. The whole of the path.

Now don't imagine that this is a big time gap. These four—contact, feeling, craving, clinging—can go by in a second. So don't imagine that you'll be able to sit back with your good mindfulness and leisurely observe contact happening for a few seconds, then turn your mind when feeling arises to catch that, then see the mind inclining and catch that, and if it goes to grasping, see that really clearly. No—it goes contact, feeling, craving, clinging, really quickly.

You won't be able to see them all sequentially most of the time, but if you keep looking at that chain again and again, sometimes you'll pick up the contact, sometimes the feeling, sometimes the craving, sometimes the clinging. You'll go over it enough to see how they're all connected together. They go by quickly, but you can start to discriminate the different pieces.

When you do, you'll see that it's quite possible to be with feeling and not move into craving. This is where we want to establish our practice. This is the heart of dependent origination. This is the opening to freedom. This is the abandoning of the cause of suffering.

Remember, in the second noble truth, the action for the cause of suffering is to abandon it. This is where we do that. We experience pleasant or unpleasant, but we don't move into greed or aversion with it.

And what does that feel like? You're with your experience, but the mind is not moving into craving, not moving into greed, aversion, delusion. Take a look. I think you'll find it's characterized by ease, peace, spaciousness, relaxation, rest, contentment.

This peace that you touch when you don't move into greed and aversion—did you construct it?

Did you make that peace? How did you consciously decide, "I'm not going to fall into greed and aversion. Instead, I think I'll call up some peace"? Or was that peace already there when you rested? When you abandoned craving, was that peace already there?

I think that peace is already there. It's not something that has to be constructed or brought about. It's available in any moment when we don't disturb the moment with greed, aversion, and delusion. So when we're not taking birth, we're not subject to death, and that place is always available—always available. In any moment, that peace is available.

We'd say that this has the flavor of the deathless—not subject to arising and passing, not subject to birth and death. There's something there, when we don't disturb it, that can let us rest in peace.

What I'm pointing to here is that this temporary end of craving has a connection to nibbana. It is not the final nibbana, but it is something you could call a temporary nibbana. It's a place of being unborn and uncreated, and it's like a foretaste of the final nibbana. The Buddha actually had a phrase for this in the Samyutta Nikaya. He referred to it as tadanga nibbuto, which means approximate nibbana.

So this is the territory we're in when we don't take birth through grasping. We're in the territory of a proximate nibbana. This proximate nibbana is satisfying on its own terms, but it's also onward leading. As you rest there, you are strengthening the habits of non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion in the mind. You're strengthening the habit of non-craving and non-clinging. And that is a very powerful way to advance the path.

It's as though you get to this point—non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—where you taste the freedom of it. And you're also getting a taste of the final deliverance. So it's as though you're walking down the street where there's a bread factory somewhere in the neighborhood and you get the scent of the bread. "Oh, there's fresh bread baking somewhere. Where is it?" You just follow that scent so that it keeps getting stronger and stronger and stronger, and it takes you to the factory. You follow this taste of temporary nibbana, and it leads you on and on and on until you come to the actual nibbana.

"The tides of conceiving do not sweep over one who stands upon these foundations. And when the tides of conceiving no longer sweep over one, they are called a sage at peace. The sage at peace is not born, does not age, does not die. They are not shaken and they are not agitated, for there is nothing present in them by which they might be born."

This is the Buddha talking about going beyond birth and death—momentary birth and death.

There are a number of ways we can talk about this in practice terms. Breaking the chain between feeling and craving is one. Another one is looking directly at non-clinging. And the Buddha spoke often in praise of this. It's one of the most used of his phrases in the Pali Canon to denote the process of liberation: "The supreme state of sublime peace has been discovered by the Tathagata, namely liberation through non-clinging."

Through non-clinging. That means this is a practice instruction for us. Non-clinging is the way. Non-clinging is the path.

There are a few ways that non-clinging can come about. One is we wait for clinging to pass. Clinging happens a lot. Ajahn Chah said that 70 to 80 percent of the spiritual life is clinging and not being able to let go. So this happens a lot. If you find it in your practice, you're not off track. You're on the Ajahn Chah track. That was a pretty good track.

So sometimes we wait for it to pass, and it will. All the clinging will eventually pass. The mind will come back into some balance.

Or it might be possible to learn better and better how to let go in the moment. We notice we're clinging and we've learned and are learning the skill of letting go.

So this again is from Ajahn Chah: "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. If you let go completely, there's complete peace."

See what this is like as a meditation instruction. What is it like in a moment of practice of full mindfulness to let go completely? All the areas that might be holding, mind and body—what if you let go of it all? What would that feel like?

I hope you're getting a sense at this point in the evening how all these teachings of the Buddha are pointing to this same area of practice. The instruction from the second noble truth is to abandon craving. The instruction in the third noble truth is to realize the end of craving. The teachings of non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion essentially mean letting go of craving. The pointing to non-clinging—a deep letting go.

In all of them, we're not creating a new self. We're resting in this deathless place, the gap between feeling and craving. We're not taking birth and we're resting in the deathless. This is the realization of temporary nibbana.

To me, this is the heart of Dharma practice: How do you move moment after moment from the second to the third noble truth? How do you let go of craving and come into peace? It's always available. It's always there and it unfolds from just letting go.

There was this interesting dialogue between two of the great practitioners in the time of the Buddha: a bhikkhu named Anuruddha and Sariputta, who was already a chief disciple at this time. Anuruddha is in meditation and he needs a little help, so he asks Sariputta for an interview.

This is his report: "Friend Sariputta," he says first, "with a divine eye which is purified and surpasses the human, I survey a thousand-fold world system." Second report: "Energy is aroused in me. My mindfulness is established without confusion. My body is tranquil without disturbance. My mind is concentrated and one-pointed." Third report: "Yet my mind is still not liberated from the taints through non-clinging."

That's a pretty good yogi report, isn't it? I would have said, "Wow, Anuruddha, that's fantastic." But that's not what Sariputta said.

Sariputta said, "Friend Anuruddha, when you talk about the divine eye, that is your conceit. When you talk about your energy and mindfulness, that is your restlessness. When you talk about your mind not being liberated, that is your remorse. It would be good if you would abandon these three qualities and stop attending to them. Instead, direct your attention to the deathless element."

This is a direct meditation pointer: Stop attending to everything else and direct your attention to the deathless element.

This is possible for us. Once we get a sense of what constitutes the deathless element—that quality of resting in the gap between feeling and craving—we can incline the mind that way. Now, if one has been partially enlightened, one knows the deathless element from direct experience to its depth. But if that hasn't happened, there's another discourse where the Buddha gives us more step-by-step instructions. It's as if he's in an air traffic control tower and we're coming in for a landing, and he's directing us how to land in that place of release into the unconditioned.

This is from a discourse to a practitioner called Malunkyaputta: "Whatever exists of sense objects, one sees those states as impermanent, as unsatisfactory, as void, as not-self. One turns the mind away from those states and directs it toward the deathless element thus:"

Now he's going to tell us exactly how to direct the attention to the deathless element: "This is peaceful. This is sublime."

"That is the stilling of all formations. The relinquishment of all attachments, dispassion, cessation, nibbana. This is peaceful. This is sublime." This is what we've already touched through resting in the gap between feeling and craving. We start to get to know that—the stilling of all formations.

This is a phrase you all actually know. The Pali is sabba saṅkhāra samatha. Sabba means all. Saṅkhāra is the fourth aggregate of formations, movements of heart and mind. Samatha is just the aspect of tranquility. Sabba saṅkhāra samatha—all formations have come to stillness. The formations have stopped. Just be still. Just be still.

The relinquishment of all attachments—this is the deep movement into letting go. Be still, let go. That's what leads to cessation of craving, cessation of suffering, and nibbāna. This is the route into enlightenment.

There's an important pointer here: "Whatever exists of sense objects, see those states as impermanent, unsatisfactory, void, and not-self. Turn the mind away from those states." Why are we so fascinated with sense objects? We have seen them come and go and come and go over and over and over. Has any of them ever really made a difference? Has any sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or even mind state really lasted? And yet we keep holding on, keep looking for the right one—the one that's going to fix it, the one that's going to solve it, the one that's going to make a difference.

The Buddha is saying, turn your mind away from all of those. Turn it to peace, to stillness, to relinquishment. This is the path.

As we start to rest in this ground, we start to see that the path and the goal are coming closer and closer together. Stillness, relinquishment—this is a lot like the Third Noble Truth. The Third Noble Truth is what is to be realized. As the path and the goal come closer and closer together, the satisfaction of the goal comes into the immediate present. We don't need to look for anything else because they are so close to one another.

"One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Now in our modern day and age, we often wonder: Is this still really possible for anyone? This complete end of suffering? Is there anywhere in the world someone who has reached this—a living person that I could meet and talk with who is an example, a living example of this? I think there is.

I want to read a little bit from a short biography of Luang Por Liem. When Ajahn Chah passed away in the nineties, his monastery—a big monastery in Thailand called Wat Pa Pong—was passed on to his Dharma heir, who is Ajahn Liem. As he gets older, he's called Luang Por, spiritual father.

"Around the middle of the rainy season of the year 1969, Luang Por Chah encouraged the monks to practice with special intensity. So Luang Por Liem increased his efforts, and as he did so, results became evident. Keeping this teaching in mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit meditation until about ten or eleven p.m., then stop to have a rest. But on this day I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture. A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body as if something was taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, completely light and at ease. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness."

The body felt tranquil, cool, and light. This experience continued throughout the whole year, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued unchanging for many years, all from that one time. It feels like there are no proliferations of the mind. All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before—I don't know where they all disappeared to. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose.

There isn't anything to be concerned about as far as how various things exist. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously, all the time since then. There has been no change all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without change.

So let's just sit for a minute and let these words settle.

As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. This same state still lasts on, continuous and without change.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 63

Transcendent Dependent Origination

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> Guy Armstrong presents the teaching of transcendent dependent origination, a profound 12-link formula that describes the path from suffering to complete liberation. Drawing from the Upanisa Sutta in the Saṃyutta Nikāya, he explains how suffering can become the proximate cause for faith (saddhā), which naturally leads through gladness (pāmojja), rapture (pīti), calm (passaddhi), happiness (sukha), and concentration (samādhi) to knowing and seeing things as they truly are (yathābhūtañāṇadassana). This wisdom then gives rise to disenchantment (nibbidā), dispassion (virāga), liberation (vimutti), and finally knowledge of the destruction of the taints (āsavakkhayañāṇa). Armstrong illustrates each link with personal stories and teachings from the Thai forest tradition, including accounts from Ajahn Chah and experiences from his own monastic training in Burma. He emphasizes that this natural unfolding requires neither forcing nor delaying, and shows how joy and beauty are integral to the spiritual path rather than obstacles to it.

Transcendent Dependent Origination

The subject of this evening's talk is transcendent dependent origination. Don't be thrown off by the title—it's quite a mouthful, but the concepts are not that difficult, so don't be intimidated.

This is another example of a formula that the Buddha often used, which we might say falls under the general heading of dependent arising. Here's how he stated it in the most general case:

"When this exists, that comes to be. With the arising of this, that arises. When this does not exist, that does not come to be. With the ceasing of this, that ceases."

We have seen this kind of formulation in the teaching on dependent origination—that chain of twelve links that starts with ignorance, runs through craving and clinging, and ends up in suffering. This particular form is going to start from suffering and state a chain in positive terms that ends up in liberation.

What I find interesting is that these three—the general principle, dependent origination, and transcendent dependent origination—are all put in terms of cause and effect. If you look further, it seems all the Buddhist central teachings are put in terms of cause and effect. The Four Noble Truths are about suffering and its cause, the end of suffering and its cause. The teaching on karma is the cause and effect of actions with consequences. And then we have this general principle of dependent arising.

Why is causality so central to the Buddha's main teachings? These teachings are at the heart of what he had to say. I think there's an interesting question to ponder.

The basic thing, the first thing I would say, is that when you take the self out of the picture of the world, there's no agent in the middle who's causing it all to happen. When we see the unfolding of events as the process of cause and effect—of prior causes and conditions giving rise to the present moment experience, which then conditions future effects—we see the whole unfolding of our experience in a way that doesn't revolve on "I" and that can be explained in terms of cause and effect. This general principle of dependent arising really covers all of it. So I wanted to toss that in as a footnote that is kind of at the heart of the Buddha's way of seeing the world.

The chain we're going to look at tonight also consists of twelve links. It really describes the emergence of the path, leading from suffering all the way to liberation, described in positive terms. Because it's in positive terms, I find it an inspiring kind of map. It describes a lot of the journey that you've been on in the retreat so far, so I'm sure you'll find your experience reflected in some of this list.

This was outlined in a discourse in the Samyutta Nikaya called the Discourse on Proximate Cause—how one factor becomes the proximate cause for the next. The commentaries call this "transcendent." The Buddha didn't call it that—that's a label from the commentaries because it transcends suffering. That's a nice way to think of transcendent: what transcends suffering, what goes beyond suffering.

I can't resist one bad joke: Why did the yogi refuse novocaine? It was in order to transcend dental medication.

We note that the original chain of dependent origination started with ignorance and ended in suffering. This one's going to start with suffering and move to liberation.

Here's an outline of the twelve links: suffering, faith, gladness, rapture, calm, happiness, concentration, knowing and seeing things as they are, disenchantment, dispassion, liberation, and knowledge of the extinction of the taints. I'll talk about each of those in detail—you don't have to remember them all right now.

The first linkage in this chain is that suffering is a condition, a proximate cause for the arising of faith. I think this may have been mentioned earlier, but this is pretty surprising because there's a huge amount of suffering in the world and I wouldn't say there's a huge amount of faith in the world. So something is happening here that's different from the usual tendencies of the world, because normally suffering leads to more suffering.

In fact, the Buddha said suffering results either in bewilderment or in search. This is interesting—I think it's kind of true. People either get totally confused and overwhelmed and lost in suffering, or they start searching for a way out, some of which are wise, some of which are not. You see a lot of worldly activity as a search for release from suffering, but not always applied with wisdom.

So what are the conditions for suffering to lead to faith? It's said that there are two: one is the clear awareness of suffering, and the second is that one has heard the teachings.

So I think it's very interesting that all of us are in that position—we have suffered and then heard the teachings and been motivated by that combination. This gives us belief that there is a way, with wisdom, to overcome suffering. We become open to looking at things in a new way when we suffer.

James and I saw this many years ago when we were invited to lead a class in meditation at a juvenile hall in the Bay Area. He had a contact who was a nurse there and thought it might be helpful to these young men who were in jail. For those who don't know the American system, juvenile hall is where young people under the age of 18 are held when they've been charged with a crime but have not yet come to trial. It's a holding place. They know they will be coming to trial in the future, but they haven't yet been tried, so they haven't been convicted.

We went into the maximum security part of the juvenile hall, a men's unit. There were young men under the age of 18 who had been charged with serious crimes such as assault, assault with a deadly weapon, murder, and attempted murder. You can imagine these young guys, 16 and 17 years old, sitting in there not knowing what the next step in their life would be, not knowing what the judge or prosecutors would do. They were in this holding pattern for months sometimes, creating a huge amount of anxiety. Because they were all cooped up together, there was also quite a bit of aggression. It was a very difficult environment.

We went in to teach mindfulness, not knowing if this would connect for them at all. It seemed like an unlikely pairing. Yet it turned out to be a good fit for a number of them because they had time on their hands, they had a lot of emotions up, and they recognized their own suffering and were willing to look at it in a new way.

What we found most helpful to them first were the teachings on how to work with difficult emotions like fear and anger. They would practice with those in their cells because they had a lot of individual time and quiet time. One other exercise we gave them was to do mindfulness of breathing and see if they could tell if they went to sleep on an in-breath or an out-breath. They were really interested in trying to find this out.

We had to relabel the teachings—we couldn't call it Buddhism, and it had to appeal to a younger crowd, so we called it Mind Power. At the end, we gave them all a certificate that said they had completed the course in Mind Power. One of the young guys said, "Can I take this to the judge when I go up?" We said, "Sure, I don't know if it will mean anything, but you can."

When we get into difficult situations, our suffering prompts us to look at our experience in a new way. That's what opens us to new insight. Sometimes it's in situations of real extremity.

In the Thai forest tradition, it's very common for monks especially—I don't think the nuns were encouraged to do this because it's considered riskier for women to be on their own—to go out and meditate in the forest at night. They were specifically encouraged to go meditate where they heard the sound of tigers. If there were tigers roaring, Ajahn Mun, one teacher in the Thai forest tradition, would encourage his monks: "Oh, good night for meditation. Go dwell out there where the tigers are roaring."

The purpose was to evoke fear so that they could meet their fear directly and learn to work with it in their meditation. This was a situation of real life uncertainty—powerful teaching. Moreover, some forest monks recounted that as they made their way through forest paths, sometimes they would come upon the bones and robes and bowl of a monk who had been practicing there before them. They didn't know how the monk had met his end. It could have been a tiger, it could have been illness where they didn't have the strength to get treatment, it could have been an injury. But that was a real life situation with fear, and they were encouraged to engage with it.

Ajahn Chah was Jack Kornfield's first teacher in Thailand, also the first teacher of Ajahn Sumedho, the Western monk who brought that model over to England. At a point in his practice where he felt he really wanted to look at his fear, Ajahn Chah decided to go meditate all night in a charnel ground. This is one of the contemplations suggested by the Satipatthana Sutta: go sit where bodies have been brought, where bodies are decaying, and contemplate the decay of the body because one day your body will do the same thing.

Ajahn Chah went out there. He went out in the day and set up his place for meditation. Toward the end of the day, the local villagers brought a corpse to the charnel ground, built a funeral pyre, and burned the corpse. Ajahn Chah didn't know that was about to happen, but that's what was happening that day at this charnel ground.

So he was sitting in meditation, behind him the funeral pyre was lit, the flames rose, the body burned, the villagers departed, and night fell. He kept meditating.

You may know that in Thailand, as a culture generally, there's quite a fear of ghosts. There is the assumption that something continues beyond the death of the physical body, and ghosts are seen as mischievous or perhaps harmful beings that can appear to the living.

So there was Ajahn Chah sitting in meditation. The body had just been burnt behind him. And then he says, "I forgot about sleep. My eyes were rigid with fear. Then about 10 p.m. there came a sound of shuffling from the fire behind me, the sound of footsteps. They walked up behind me. The leaves crunched under the footsteps as it made its way round to the front. It got closer and closer until it stopped right in front of me and just stood still.

"This was really it. I forgot all about Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha. There was only fear welling up inside my chest until it completely filled me. The fear reached its peak and began to overflow. A voice inside me asked, 'What am I so afraid of?' A voice replied, 'I'm afraid of death.' Another voice said, 'Where can you run to escape death? Whether you are afraid or not, there's nowhere to escape death.' As soon as I thought this, all the fear completely disappeared. It was amazing. So much fear and it could disappear just like that. Non-fear arose in its place. Now my heart rose higher and higher until I felt as if I was in the clouds."

It's amazing how in the very extreme of one of these difficult periods of emotion, based on perhaps a real world situation, that fear can just evaporate and turn into something wholesome. That's one of the beauties of impermanence—the impermanence of mind states.

Then there's also this poem from the Therigatha. The Therigatha is a collection of verses from the elder female nuns. These were nuns who were practicing in the time of the Buddha or shortly thereafter. It's part of the Pali Canon. There's a corresponding version of the monks' recollections, but this is from the elder nuns. This is the account of a nun named Siha:

"Obsessed by sensuality, I never got to the origin, but was agitated, my mind beyond control. I dreamed of a great happiness. I was passionate but had no peace. Pale and thin, I wandered seven years, unhappy day and night."

You think six weeks is a long time? She wandered seven years, unhappy day and night.

"Then I took a rope into the forest and thought, 'I'd rather hang than go back to that narrow life.' I tied a strong noose to the branch of a tree and put it around my neck. Just then, my heart was set free."

Again, a beautiful story of someone brought to an extremity where, as I imagine, she just had to let go. And fortunately, she let go inwardly so she didn't have to physically let go of her body. Her heart was set free in that moment.

So even though none of us wants to suffer, and we don't want you to suffer, sometimes it just happens. And out of it can come these really wholesome developments of mind leading onward to faith.

This quality of faith—I know all of you have had experiences like this or you wouldn't be here. It takes a lot of faith to be here for six weeks or three months. The quality of faith, I think Bhante talked about it when he discussed the five spiritual faculties, is not a belief or a doctrine or a dogma, but the original word saddha, the Pali word that's being translated, has an etymology or literal meaning like "to place one's heart upon."

You see, everybody in the world has something that they place their heart upon. Everybody lives out of some core beliefs or some faith about how the world is put together. In the Buddha's system, this word means basically faith in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha—faith in the teacher, the teachings, and the community.

But it's meant to be experienced as a personal thing. It's not just something we believe in, but it gives us a confidence that we ourselves can put the teachings into effect, walk the path, and get the benefits of them. It's a belief that greater freedom is possible in our own life. And as it grows into confidence, it means we trust that we can do that. We can walk this path and find that happiness for ourselves.

This is a comment from the Buddha: "Endowed with faith, one receives the gladness associated with the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha." Some form of this, I think, exists in every spiritual tradition.

In the Bay Area, we have a Native American teacher who sometimes comes to Spirit Rock named Fred Wapipa. His ancestry is joint Kickapoo and Sac and Fox. One time he was speaking at Spirit Rock and said something that quite surprised me, but I was really struck by it. He said, "You know, there's no word for hope in our language. That's because we believe everything's already all right."

I thought that was an amazing expression of native wisdom. Everything's already all right. Beautiful.

So we have this faith or trust or confidence, and that leads onward to what the Buddha pointed to as gladness. The Pali word is pamoja. I might call it gladness or joy—I'll probably use joy mostly in the rest of the talk.

This word joy is a little troublesome in Buddhism because there are about three words that sometimes get translated as joy. One of them is pamoja, which is the word pointed to here. Another is the term piti, which is in the Seven Factors of Awakening. And the other is the term mudita, which is often translated as sympathetic joy. In this case, I'm going to talk about joy as this pamoja or gladness.

It arises from the sense of faith. Once we have confidence that we can see the way out of suffering, it gives us a sense of gladness. We have conceptually solved the problem. We still need to do the work to solve the problem, but we know now how to do it. We've got the instruction manual and we just need to carry out the steps. So this gives a lightness and a delight to the heart.

A number of us have mentioned that joy is really an integral part of the path. James has talked about it a lot. Sally mentioned in one of her talks, quoting Bhikkhu Anāgārika, "The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." So it's very helpful to find this factor of mind, to bring it in and let it become your ally. Let it become your support, because we all will run into times of difficulty. And if we have reliable sources for joy, that can help us persevere through those difficult times.

This really came through to me some years ago when I went to Burma to ordain as a monk. I'd been a monk in Thailand before, but I had disrobed before I'd gotten all my monk yearning out of my system. So I had this leftover "I'd like to be a monk again" kind of thing going. And I had the opportunity to go to Burma and ordain with Paok Sayadaw, who's a noted master of concentration and insight.

I did that and arrived at his monastery the night before the rains retreat was going to start. As soon as I arrived, I went up to meet him and asked if he would be willing to have me ordained while I was there. He said, "Yes, okay. So tomorrow morning you go into town with one of the lay supporters, get your robes and bowl, come back, you can be ordained after lunch."

Well, that was a little quick. I'd just gotten to the monastery the night before. I was trying to settle in. So before lunch the next morning, I had my head shaved. All the hair was gone. I had lunch. And then I slipped into my monk's outfit in this ceremony right after lunch. There I was, about eighteen hours after arriving, back in robes again. It was what I wanted—it was just a little quicker than I'd expected.

It had been some years since I'd been a monk before, and in the meantime, I'd kind of forgotten how to tie the robes. I think you heard Bhante talk about how every monk is always a little worried the robes are going to fall off, because it's basically wrapping oneself up in a sheet. So I had that going.

I got there at the start of the rains retreat, and it was literally the start of the rains. For the next three weeks, I didn't see the sun. It rained on average three inches a day, which gave rise to a lot of mold in my room. The biggest spider I had ever seen was building a web on my porch. I was eating just one meal a day, as often happens in monasteries.

At this monastery, I was eating one meal a day. It was vegetarian, which I was delighted about, but it was mostly white rice and steamed vegetables. I was losing about half a pound a day on that diet. The meditation hall was a 15-minute walk uphill, often in the pouring rain. Once we got there, the shortest sitting was an hour and a half. The longest sitting was two hours.

The meditation was challenging. I was engaged in keeping the attention focused on the upper lip to notice the breath as many hours of the day as possible—the whole day long. Sitting, walking, eating, showering—just to stay here. I once went and asked the Sayadaw about how to practice with the hindrances. He said, "Hindrances? Oh, if you're sleepy, pull your earlobes. If you're aversive, do metta." That was all he had to say about working with the hindrances.

It was a very challenging practice, and the weather continued to be what it was. It became the most difficult retreat I had ever undertaken in my life. All the conditions were just so challenging. We had to report to the Sayadaw every day on our progress—a constant check-in.

I remember one day I went down for lunch. I was dressed in my robes, had my bowl, got it filled up. Hot food was on the bottom, and you know these metal bowls really transmit heat very well. The hot rice and veggies were on the bottom. I was holding that in my arm, walking back to my kuti. The lid of the bowl was upside down on the top because it held a little bit of dessert. I had my umbrella in my other hand because it was still raining like crazy. I was walking up this dirt track to go back and eat at my kuti.

In the path alongside, just to one side, a group of Burmese lay people were bowing down to me because that's what they do when a bhikkhu walks by. They're very reverent. While all that was going on, I felt my robe slipping off my left shoulder. That just epitomized my situation. I managed to keep it on until I got back to my kuti, but it was nip and tuck.

Through all this, my spirits were very low. It's funny now when I think back on it, but my spirits really sank. I had brought with me a photo of the Dalai Lama because he's always a great inspiration for me. I turned to the photo with a great deal of what I could only call supplication. I said, "Your Holiness, I'm really having a difficult time. Do you have any advice for me?"

Immediately this transmission came through. It was in his voice—that Indian-accented English he has, spoken in his tone—and it said, "Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. A positive attitude is the best support." Then the transmission ended.

I really tried to take that message to heart. Stay cheerful, optimistic, and confident. When would that not be helpful? This is the role of joy in the practice. Sometimes, unfortunately, I couldn't remember what cheerful felt like. But when I could, and I could bring that into mind, it really lifted my spirits and inspired me to go back and practice again.

This is the role of joy. When we have a channel to it, a reliable access to it, it becomes a tremendous ally for us when times are difficult. Here I think we're really lucky that we are surrounded by the beauty of nature. That has always been for me a very reliable and deep source of joy in practice.

Here it's very available. I encourage you to really take advantage of that and open to that beauty. This is not foreign to the path. This is not antithetical to the path.

This is a quote from Ajahn Sumedho: "Sometimes in Theravada Buddhism, one gets the impression that you shouldn't enjoy beauty. If you see a beautiful flower, you should contemplate its decay. Or if you see a beautiful woman, you should contemplate her as a rotting corpse. That's a good reflection on anicca, dukkha, and anatta, but it can leave the impression that beauty is only to be reflected on in terms of these three characteristics, rather than in terms of the experience of beauty. This is the joy of mudita, being able to appreciate the beauty in the things around us."

So being open to that, let that joy come in and lift us up. It's intrinsic in the nature of things. When you tune in to the way things are, there is joy there. I often tune in to the way light strikes things. Whether indoors or outdoors, there's a brightness, there's a brilliance, there's a radiance in light that reminds me of that joy and beauty.

This is from Thomas Merton: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fountain of action and of joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all created being."

So this access to joy or gladness is one of the central links of this chain to liberation, and it leads onward.

The next link in the chain is rapture. The Pali word is piti. This has been described already on a number of occasions—it's in the Seven Factors of Awakening. It's the kind of joy that comes when we're connected to our meditation. When you find you start enjoying the meditation object, that is piti.

It's a mental factor, but it has an expression in the body. And the expression is one of energy—sometimes strong energy, sometimes uncomfortably strong energy. But in its initial stages, it's quite pleasant energy that comes out of the joy of the meditation itself.

Then rapture leads on to the next link, which is calm, or passadhi in Pali. Rapture in its energetic manifestation can sometimes feel a little turbulent. So as the path deepens, the rapture gets mellowed out, gets moderated by the arising of calm.

Sometimes this word passadhi is translated as relaxation—it could also be translated as ease or serenity, but mostly I'll call it calm. The combination of the pleasantness of rapture and the factor of calm really allows us to settle into the moment in a new way. We find it's easier to be here because there's not as much turbulence, and there's a sense of peace that's quite appealing.

Sometimes when we first discover this factor of calm in meditation, it's like new territory because this is not a common factor out in our fast-paced world. So one meditator who was finding this for the first time wasn't sure what was going on and noted it as calm, hardly believing that this is what it was. So it takes a little while to get to know it, but it becomes a comfortable place to be after some time.

It's as though in the initial stages of meditation, the hindrances are so strong and the thoughts are so active. When we come to this place, it's like we've crossed the stormy ocean—it's had big waves and pirate ships and an attack from a giant squid. But all of a sudden we've landed in this safe harbor, this big safe harbor, and we can just cool out for a while into this calm.

There's a poem by Emily Dickinson that expresses this feeling. It's a poem called "Wild Nights." I'm only going to read a little bit. If you're not a native English speaker, there are two words I want to point out beforehand in this poem. The word "futile" means useless, not of any benefit. And here the word "chart" is used to mean a map—it's kind of an archaic use of the term, a map like sailors would use in navigation.

"Futile the winds to a heart in port, done with a compass, done with a chart, rowing in Eden."

That's kind of what it feels like when we land in this big safe harbor. "Futile the winds to a heart in port, done with a compass, done with a chart, rowing in Eden."

The mind discovers, or you could say rediscovers, its own natural peace and ease. This is something that is a natural part of our being, but we've lost touch with it by covering it over with so much stimulation, so much activity and so much thinking. When we find that it's there, we can use it as a meditation technique. This is an instruction given by Ajahn Amaro:

He's the abbot of Amravati now. "Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body. And then pay attention to whatever disturbs that."

I love this instruction—rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body when we're not stirring it up. A number of people have reported experiences in interviews that really point to this. I often suggest that a nice place to rest at that time is to put the attention in the heart center, just having a sense you can rest the attention there, and then you'll notice whatever comes along that disturbs that kind of peace.

This access to peace is a lot of what we've been looking for all along. We have been looking for a way to calm the heart and mind and body from the overstimulation of a fast-paced modern society. When we discover this aspect of calm through meditation, there's something very satisfying about it.

So the journey continues. The access to calm leads to the next step, which is happiness. The Pali word is sukha. I like this term sukha because it sounds so much like sugar, and sukha has a quality of sweetness in it. The quality of rapture has an enjoyment, but it's subtle. The quality of calm has a pleasant feel, but it's a little neutral. But when the element of sukha starts coming in, there's an emotional flavor there that's very sweet. It's kind of touching. So this is recognized as one of the factors of concentration—it helps collect the mind, as we'll see.

This sukha is a deeper flowering than the joy of pamojja. It's joy that has risen to rapture and become more intense, then been mellowed out through tranquility to land in this place of happiness or sukha, which is really a state of contentment. Contentment might be a closer translation, but it has elements of both. The sweetness gives a sense of happiness.

The joy of pamojja depends on conditions—we reflect on nature or reflect on Buddha-Dhamma-Sangha. But as this happiness comes about, it doesn't depend on conditions. It is the quality of our own natural development of heart and mind. In that way, it's more reliable. It's the happiness of coming home, coming really into the present moment with both gladness and peace.

I think about this line from Rumi. When Rumi says "you," he often means the divine, and in this case, sukha has a kind of similar flavor to this divine:

"Come to the orchard in spring.
There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers.
If you do not come, these do not matter.
If you do come, these do not matter."

When that sense of deep happiness is there, the conditions aren't so important. There's an unconditional contentment that is settling in.

But the practice doesn't stop here. It continues on, and the Buddha himself said when he was a practitioner, when he was the Bodhisattva: "Two things I never lost track of in my practice. One was not to be lax in my efforts. The other was not to settle merely for wholesome states of mind."

I find this a really beautiful and challenging statement. How many times would we settle merely for wholesome states of mind? That might be a pretty good outcome for us. And yet the Buddha said: Don't settle just for wholesome states of mind. The path continues.

So the next stage in the links is concentration, or samadhi. This is really the unification of mind where the attention, the energy, the awakeness is brought together into the present moment. When that attention and undistracted quality is brought to the present moment, we find the mind becomes strong. It's like we've given away all our mental energy, sending it out in fragmented ways to past and future, to thinking and memory and regretting and anticipating. We drop all that, call it into the present moment, collect in the quality of samadhi—the mind becomes strong, steady, stable, and firm.

It's pleasant in itself and gives us the ability to accommodate what's difficult. Have you noticed that when the mind takes on some of this quality of concentration, something that was felt as uncomfortable or unpleasant a few minutes before or earlier in the day all of a sudden is kind of neutral—not disturbing, not problematic? This is one of the strengths of the mind of samadhi, because it's based in happiness. In fact, happiness is the proximate cause for concentration. We may have thought when we started meditation that the proximate cause of concentration was striving energy—pushing hard, pedal to the metal and all of that. But truly, the proximate cause for concentration is happiness.

When there's the sense of this natural peace and ease, the mind can just rest in itself in an effortless, unforced way. And that settling brings along the quality of peace and rest.

So the mind settles in concentration, but this is not the end of the path either. As the Buddha said, the purpose and benefit of concentration is to know and see things as they really are. This is the next step in the unfolding: knowing and seeing things as they really are.

The Pali is yathābhūta-ñāṇa-dassana. Ñāṇa means knowing—it's the same root as the word "gnosis" in Greek. Dassana means seeing. You may have heard the Sanskrit word darshan, which means seeing, basically the teacher. And dassana is the same root as vipassana—they both mean seeing or insight. And yathābhūta is things the way they are.

So what is it to see things as they really are? When the mind is concentrated—and that means it's not being swayed by the hindrances, by the forces of greed, aversion, delusion—there's some steadiness. What do we see as the way things really are? We see impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, selflessness. We see the three characteristics. This seeing is where vipassana or insight takes off in the classical teachings of the Buddha.

In the West, we've expanded the field of insight to include psychological understanding, and those are very important understandings, and in my view, very important insights. But in classical Buddhism, vipassana refers to the seeing of the three characteristics, and it is when the mind is steady and focused and concentrated that those really become apparent, very clearly apparent.

Once we see that things are impermanent, we see that they're unsatisfying and they aren't to be taken as "I" or "mine" in a permanent ongoing way. So this seeing has a transformative effect in the heart and mind.

Most of our life we have grown up thinking that if we could just get the outer circumstances correct, if we could line up the objects in the right way, our life would fall into place and we would find happiness or satisfaction. The right job, the right income, the right relationship, the right community, the right place to live, and so on.

As we start to see the three characteristics of things, we see that there is not stability in the external things of the world at all. And so we stop so much pinning our hopes on getting all the conditions of the world to line up exactly right. We start to understand that the world can't give us the lasting satisfaction that we're really looking for. And this is the kind of pivotal understanding of seeing the three characteristics. It teaches us to let go a little bit.

So this first step in letting go is the next step in the sequence of this chain, and it's called disenchantment. The Pali term is nibbida. Disenchantment here doesn't mean we become cynical or we fall into despair or we think everything's worthless. It's not that at all. It's a recognition that the bright objects of the world have enchanted us. They have put a spell on us and made us run after them as though they were capable of really satisfying us. But at this point in the development of insight, we see that that promise was false. The things of the world—whether it's other people or objects or locations or money or jobs—aren't capable of giving that deep satisfaction. And so there's a way in which we start to give up that illusion.

So there's a freedom in that. Okay, that's not going to do it for me. What is? So this is the motivation, the real genuine motivation for renunciation. There's a turning away from external objects and we look for something else.

Renunciation is not about telling ourselves, "As a good practitioner, we should give up everything that's pleasant." This is the way it's described in the Dhammapada: "If by giving up a lesser happiness, one could experience a greater happiness, the wise person would renounce the lesser in order to find the greater." This is the significance of renunciation.

So it's not a painful penalty. It's a movement of wisdom when it comes. And we all renounce different things at different times. It's not that every one of us should be renouncing X, Y, and Z at this point. The wisdom has to grow for us to see what will bring satisfaction and what won't. And then step by step, we all renounce at different rates in different ways.

In this renunciation, it doesn't mean that we scorn the things of the world or even scorn the sense pleasures that we're still engaged in. We just recognize they aren't going to do it for us. And so the Buddha said, "The beauty of this world remains the same, but the wise do not hanker after it." So this disenchantment doesn't mean that things get grim or gray or ugly or even neutral.

The beauty is even more apparent because the heart isn't burdened by greed, aversion, or delusion. And so the beauty is very clear to see, but there's no hankering after it because ultimately it won't finally satisfy.

This leads into the next link, which is called dispassion. The Pali term is viraga, which literally means without lust. It has also been translated as without attachment, but I think without lust is the better etymology. There's another sense in which viraga is used in the Pali: it means fading away. Like when you take a shirt that's a bright color and wash it many times—little by little, the color in the shirt fades away.

What this is pointing to is very interesting. The movement of dispassion doesn't happen all at once. There is a fading away of lust. The more our minds get purified in the understanding of the way things really are, the understanding of disenchantment, the moving away from the false promise, the more that desire gradually fades away out of our system. Craving fades away, and we encounter more and more of this quality of dispassion.

The initial meaning of dispassion is more or less synonymous with equanimity, as Annie spoke about earlier. It means the mind is not so moved by the ups and downs of changing pleasure and pain. There's a balance. Even though pleasant and unpleasant continue to alternate, we're not so moved by desire or aversion for those changing conditions.

But this word dispassion sometimes doesn't sound appealing in the West because it suggests we're not supposed to feel any passion anymore. We might think, "Wait, my passion is what I really care about in my life." So we need to make a language distinction here. When dispassion is used in translations of Buddhist texts, it has one specific meaning: an unwholesome state based on greed, lust, or craving. That's what passion means in these English translations of the Buddha's language.

There are other words in the Buddha's language that refer to this quality we in the West call passion—which we rightfully regard as something important and beautiful in our lives. Someone might have a passion for clarity, a passion for truth, a passion for justice, for social justice, a passion for non-cruelty. These are all fine things to have. What we are removing are only the unwholesome factors of lust, greed, and craving.

There are many words in the Buddha's vocabulary that point to what we would call passion: words for ardor, for zeal, and enthusiasm. The word for ardor is atapi, based on a word meaning fire. So this is a fiery quality of heart. Does that sound cold or hot? Turned off or dead? No—there's a fiery quality of heart in ardor.

Here are some quotations. In the Satipatthana Sutta, it says the practitioner dwells ardent, fully aware and mindful, having put away covetousness and grief for the world. In another discourse, Sariputta said very clearly: without ardor, one cannot awaken. So this ardor is passion directed toward the path, toward awakening.

There's the term zeal, which is a common translation of chanda. Chanda can also be translated as desire. When it's considered one of the four iddhipadas—the bases for spiritual success—it's often translated as zeal. This denotes a quality of strong energy toward the path, toward the achievement of liberation.

And then there is viriya, which you probably know as energy or effort. One explanation I like is "delighting in what is wholesome, turning our energy to what is wholesome." One of my favorite translations for viriya, although it's not used very much, is enthusiasm. When you're feeling enthusiastic and inspired about your practice, about the path, about the meditation, this is viriya coming into the mind, and it's what leads us to take the next step, to come to the next sitting, to investigate the teachings.

So there are all these words that point to this deeply caring, deeply motivated quality of heart and mind that in the West we might call passion. But viraga—this dispassion—refers to the fading away of lust, of greed, of craving. In its initial stages, it resembles equanimity. In its maturity, it is a synonym for nibbana, a synonym for the unconditioned.

We talked about nibbana last week, so I don't need to say much more. One other quote from the Buddha: "Insofar as the practitioner has abandoned greed, aversion, and delusion, insofar is nibbana realizable, immediate, inviting, and attractive."

So this is the deeper meaning of being without lust. One has completely set aside greed, aversion, and delusion, and in that moment opens to the unconditioned. This is the movement that leads to the next step, which is liberation.

The Pali term is vimutti. This is what we talked about last week as that unshakable deliverance of mind. This is peaceful. This is sublime. That is the stilling of all formations, the relinquishing of all attachments, the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, nibbana. The mind has been freed in full liberation from all the fetters and completely from the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. And there is, it's said, a happiness of peace and lack of disturbance that is the most deeply satisfying kind of happiness that's possible to us.

This uprooting of the fetters happens in the moment of liberation, and then there's a reflecting back which is called knowledge of the destruction of the taints. This is the last step in the twelve links of transcendent dependent origination. One reviews what has just taken place in the mind and knows that the most deeply conditioned tendencies of mind have been uprooted. These are the taints of sense desire, of becoming, and of ignorance.

So this is the culmination of transcendent dependent origination—the three links leading from suffering through different kinds of joy to the stilling of concentration, the turning away from sense experiences and relinquishment of attachments to the touch of nibbana and the liberation of heart and mind.

When I first heard this teaching, I went to one of my interview teachers at the time and I said, "How long is it going to take?" And of course the answer is nobody knows for each of us, because it's different. But if we continue along this path, these factors are not only possible but inevitable. Each one leads naturally to the next. That's what the Buddha said. You don't actually have to make an additional volitional effort to go from one to the next. They unfold as part of nature.

I like this. There are a couple of analogies that the Buddha used for this process. He was talking about if you're a carpenter and you have an adze, which is a woodworking tool like an axe. He said if you use it for a long period of time, the handle of the ax will wear away from the contact of your hands and fingers with it. You can't say how much of the handle has worn away every particular day, but as you keep using it, you know the handle wears away. He said it's just like that with the fetters. We can't tell how much of them have worn away today, but if you keep practicing, they do wear away.

The other analogy he used was the riggings of an ocean-going ship—the sails and ropes. He said this ocean-going ship has been affected by the salt of the sea. It's been affected by the wind, the air, the sun. It's brought up on land and left there. And while it's up on land, the impact from all the elements is going to cause those riggings, the sails and the ropes, to rot and fall away. He said it's just like that with our fetters. Our fetters rot and fall away in meditation, just like the riggings of an ocean-going ship that's exposed to the elements. We don't know how long it takes, but it only goes in one direction.

This is from Ajahn Chah: "As a result of his experience, the Buddha taught that the practice has to develop naturally according to conditions. You allow things to develop according to your accumulated wholesome karma and paramis. This doesn't mean that you stop putting effort into the practice, but that you continue with the understanding that whether you progress swiftly or slowly, it's not something you can force. It's like planting a tree. It knows by itself the appropriate pace to grow at. If you crave to get quick results, see that as delusion. Even if you want it to grow slowly, see that as delusion."

I'll close with another quotation from the Buddha. A questioner came to him and said, "How did you cross the flood?" This means the flood of becoming, the flood of selfing again and again, leading to repeated birth. Basically, how did you become liberated? And the Buddha replied, "I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away."

Let's just sit for a minute together. I crossed the flood by not tarrying and not hurrying. When I tarried, I sank. And when I hurried, I was swept away.

CHAPTER 64

Mindfulness of Breathing

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

> In this foundational dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) as a cornerstone practice found across all major Buddhist traditions. Drawing primarily from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10) and the Ānāpānasati Sutta (MN 118), he explores the Buddha's definition of mindfulness as simply "one knows" - clearly understanding what is happening in each moment.
>
> Armstrong traces the historical preservation of these 2,500-year-old teachings through the Majjhima Nikāya, emphasizing how mindfulness of the body serves as the foundation for all meditative development. He explains why breath awareness is so effective: it's always available, naturally occurring, and provides a stable anchor that balances energy while highlighting when the mind wanders into past and future concerns.
>
> The talk addresses common obstacles including striving, aversion to thoughts, and self-judgment, offering practical guidance for working skillfully with these hindrances. Armstrong concludes by describing how sustained practice shifts one's center of gravity from discursive thinking to the spacious awareness from which wisdom and creative insight naturally arise - what the Buddha called "the direct path for the realization of nibbāna."

Good evening.

I'm happy to see that you're all still here, because the first days of retreat, especially long retreat, are not easy ones. There's the unfamiliarity with the long sittings and walking slowly and the withdrawal from all our daily activities and contacts. It's not an easy transition often. I often think it takes me about three to five days to really get into the rhythm of a long retreat. So you've made a good beginning. Happy to have you still awake.

What I'd like to talk about tonight is mindfulness of breathing. I'd like to talk about it because I think probably a number of you are doing this practice now. I also want to talk about it because I have a lot of affection for this practice. It's an important practice in the whole history of Buddhism and the Buddhist teachings.

There are three main meditative schools of Buddhism alive in the world today and transitioning to the West. Roughly speaking, our tradition, which is often called Theravada, but we've recently started calling it early Buddhism for reasons that are too obscure to go into. But it's on the website, actually, if you get curious why we decided to make that change in name.

So early Buddhism relates to the very earliest teachings of the historical Buddha. Tibetan, which came out of northern India some centuries after the historical Buddha, and then got preserved in Tibet and the Himalayas. And Zen, which grew out of Chan in China, shares a lot of thinking and practices with Chan. So Zen and Chan I kind of put together as the third major meditative tradition.

What's interesting is mindfulness of breathing is a central practice in all three of these main lineages. It's the only meditation practice I know of that is central or even practiced by all three of the schools. So that's some indication of how important it's been in the history of Buddhism and continues to be until this day.

In our tradition of early Buddhism, there are two main discourses of the Buddha that really pertain to this practice. One of them you've probably heard of—it's called the Four Foundations of Mindfulness Discourse. In the Pali language, that's called the Satipatthana Sutta. The other one is the Discourse on the Mindfulness of Breathing, or the Anapanasati Sutta in Pali.

One of the interesting things about teaching at the three-month course is that people are here with such a range of practice backgrounds. We have people here who have been practicing for forty years or more. We have people who have been practicing for one or two years. We love having all the ends of that spectrum and everyone in between. Because with more veteran practitioners, we get to talk about some things that pertain to their practice. With newer practitioners, it's really exciting to see the way the teachings illuminate your experience and how the understandings dawn, often for the first time in certain areas. So it's wonderful to have both.

But as a teacher, it's hard to speak to both at the same time. So in my talks, I'm sometimes going to say things that will be more suited for people who've been doing this for a while and may seem esoteric or not very interesting to people who are newer. Other times I will say things for newer people that may seem boring or repetitive for people who've been around for a while. But please be patient and recognize that you're a broad group. So we try to hit a little bit of something for everyone.

One of the things I wanted to talk about tonight, especially for those who are not so old in this particular school or practice, is just a little bit of history. Both the discourses I mentioned of the Buddha are collected in a volume that in the Pali is called the Majjhima Nikaya. It's a collection of 152 discourses, originally in the Pali language, and they've been translated into English in a very good translation by Bhikkhu Bodhi.

These teachings are about 2,500 years old. The fact that we have them in readable English today, to me, is an amazing adventure story. It's like something out of Raiders of the Lost Ark. Indiana Jones would feel right at home in a story like this because the texts were preserved orally for centuries. Then they were written down by celibate acolytes on a tropical island and preserved against weather and corruption and all kinds of things for more and more centuries. They got lost in India. Virtually all the teachings of the Buddha got lost in India around the 11th century because of invasions.

Different translations are still available in Tibet, translations from Sanskrit. But our tradition rests on the Pali versions of these texts, which go back to the time of the Buddha. Pali is an ancient Indian language that nobody speaks today. It was kind of interesting—in 1956 there was a gathering of a lot of Buddhist monastics that was called something like the Fifth World Council. They were from all different kinds of countries and they didn't know each other's languages so they spoke together in Pali. It was very sweet because it's the only language that they all knew—all these monks and nuns from around the world talking in Pali, which basically nobody speaks today.

The texts of the Buddha's discourses that were recorded in Pali amount to about twenty volumes in that language. This book, which is quite thick in English, was three of those volumes in the original Pali. So altogether they comprise probably 2,000 pages.

When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one understands, "I feel an unpleasant feeling." When feeling a feeling that is neither pleasant nor unpleasant, one understands, "I feel a feeling that is neither pleasant nor unpleasant."

Third foundation, mental states. Here, when the mind has lust, one understands, "The mind has lust." When the mind is without lust, one understands, "The mind is without lust." When the mind has hatred, one understands, "The mind has hatred." When the mind is without hatred, one understands, "The mind is without hatred."

Fourth foundation, dhammas. Here one understands, "There is sensual desire in me," or one understands, "There is no sensual desire in me."

Do you notice something about all these instructions? What's the common thread running through them?

It's simply knowing what's happening while it's happening. That's mindfulness. Not changing anything, not judging anything, not trying to make it different—just knowing. Breathing long and knowing you're breathing long. Feeling angry and knowing you're feeling angry. Having desire arise and knowing desire is present.

This is quite revolutionary, actually, when you think about it. Most of us spend most of our time either lost in what's happening or trying to change what's happening. But the Buddha is pointing to something much simpler: just know what's happening.

Jon Kabat-Zinn's definition, which has become quite popular, is "paying attention in a particular way—on purpose, in the present moment, and non-judgmentally." I think that's a pretty good contemporary way of putting it. But the essence is right there in these ancient texts: knowing what's happening while it's happening.

Now, you might think, "Well, that sounds easy enough." But if you've ever tried to meditate, you know it's not so simple. The mind has this amazing capacity to be somewhere else entirely. We can be sitting here listening to the breath, and suddenly we're planning tomorrow's grocery list or replaying yesterday's conversation. That's just how minds work.

So mindfulness practice is really about developing this capacity to stay present with immediate experience. And it turns out this is a skill we can cultivate. Like learning to play the piano or ride a bicycle, it takes practice, but it's definitely possible.

The Buddha was quite systematic about this training. He didn't just say, "Go be mindful." He gave very specific instructions about where to place attention and how to work with it. And breathing was his starting place.

When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one knows, I feel an unpleasant feeling.

The third foundation, which is the meditation on mind, mind states: here one understands, one knows mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust. And mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. One knows mind affected by hate as mind affected by hate. And one knows mind unaffected by hate as mind unaffected by hate.

Here's the fourth foundation: There being sense desire in one, one knows there is sense desire in me. There not being sense desire in one, one knows there is not sense desire in me.

These examples span all four foundations where mindfulness is being described. What word stands out to you here? "One knows." That phrase appears again and again and again. In the Buddha's most basic description of mindfulness, the phrase is simply "one knows." Breathing in long, one knows. Breathing in short, one knows. Feeling a pleasant feeling, one knows, and so on. One knows what is happening to one.

I would like to suggest this as a really good working definition of mindfulness. There are many ways you could expand on this. If you read definitions on the internet, people can get very flowery—that it has to be based in total acceptance, and it has to be non-judgmental, or the mind has to be completely free of greed, aversion, and delusion for it to be a true moment of mindfulness. But when the Buddha described it, he simply said, "one knows." One knows what is happening to one.

This word "knows" is interesting. In Pali, the word is pajanati, closely related to sampajanya, which is usually translated as clear comprehension. In one translation, the translator uses "understands" in place of "knows." This is intriguing. "Know" and "understand" are similar, but they're a little different, aren't they? Clear comprehension has this flavor of understanding, of comprehension.

So this word pajanati, which is really the key operational word describing mindfulness, has within it an element of understanding, which to me suggests there's some intelligence there, some wisdom. I understand mindfulness as the doorway for wisdom to arise in us. It has this basic component of wisdom through the understanding of what's going on.

In the simplest description, mindfulness is knowing what's happening for us. Draw it out slightly and it becomes: one clearly understands what's happening for us. Whichever you prefer.

This has enormous significance to me. I'm not just playing with words here, because mindfulness is our path. That is the path of this meditation we'll be doing. And what it comes down to, described this way, is really simple.

If you ever get off track in your meditation, or you get confused or uncertain—What do I do? How do I get back? I've lost the thread. I've got to start again. What do I do?—know what's happening to you. Breathing in, breathing out, unpleasant feeling, confusion, aversion. You could notice any of those things that are part of the experience, and you would be starting on track again.

That's how we renew our practice in any situation. It answers the question: What's happening now? That's all you have to do. And from that, the whole path unfolds. So it's really simple. Don't make it complicated.

Know what's happening to you now. And here's the hard part: do that moment after moment after moment. Joseph Goldstein likes to say, "It's easy to be mindful. It's hard to remember to be mindful." So it's simple—just know what's happening and then keep doing that in every new moment. And then the path will unfold.

And it's very powerful. Again, in this discourse on the foundations of mindfulness, this is what the Buddha said about the power of this: "This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbana"—that means liberation or awakening—"namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

So this simple act of knowing what our experience is leads all the way to the end of suffering and the fullest awakening. I find that really inspiring because it's so available and so simple.

How does it do that? Well, one thing to think about is what's the alternative. I like this cartoon from the New Yorker. It showed somebody at work, sitting at a desk and working on the computer—a task we can probably all relate to. But there was a thought bubble above the person's head, and the thought bubble was of being out on a golf course, swinging a club. So imagine that you're at work and you'd rather be out playing somewhere.

The second panel of the cartoon was the same person out on the golf course swinging the club, but the thought bubble was of being at home making love to his partner in bed. We can probably relate to that part too. The third panel was the person at home making love to their partner in bed, and the thought bubble was of being in front of their computer at work.

This is all too representative, isn't it, of the distracted mind? Wherever we are, we're thinking about something else. This is not the mind that has really come together in the present moment. So there's always this undercurrent in a life like that, in moments like that which we all know—this undercurrent of not full satisfaction, not complete fulfillment, but a wanting something other.

So I want to suggest that this is a potent image, this kind of cartoon image, and invite you to investigate: when you're not with your anchor for right now, when you're not with your focus in the present moment, where are you? What's happening? When you're not in the present moment, where is your attention?

We often say we get lost in the past or the future. We're planning or we're remembering or we're analyzing or we're conversing or we're comparing or we're in some kind of fantasy. Take a look and see if that's accurate. When you come back from these excursions, thoughts and images, where were you? What were you doing? What were you involved with?

Sometimes we call these distractions. But you know, if we're honest, these are not emotionally neutral activities. We go off into regrets about the past. We go off into worries about the future. We go into judging ourselves for something we didn't do quite skillfully. We go off into resentment of other people who we feel weren't fair to us. We find longings and wants for something that isn't here. These are the things that stir us up.

So in your meditation, when you come back to the present moment after a thought excursion, take a look at your mood and your state of mind. Did that thought excursion help bring calm and peace and settledness? Or did it stir things up more?

Generally, these thought excursions are into the realm of seductive thoughts and emotions. And what seduces us is hope and fear, pleasure and pain. So we return from these excursions a little more stirred up than when we entered them. Check it out. Take a look in your meditation and see if it's somewhat like that.

When we give a lot of attention to these thoughts, especially charged thoughts around past and future, we end up getting more stressed. We end up getting a little bit disturbed and we lose any sense of calm we may have had. Then we come back to the present moment, we pay attention for a while, a little bit more calm comes back in. Next excursion, some thoughts come along and we become stirred up.

So what the Buddha said about giving our attention to these kinds of thoughts that basically stir us up and revolve around hope and fear is that it's a form of unwise attention. We're giving our attention to things that don't end up making us happy.

And we tend to do this a lot with our thinking. The thinking stirs up emotions that don't make us happy. Then take a look at how it feels when you're able to sustain your attention in the present moment for a while—notice if it doesn't bring about some kind of settling of the energy, of the disturbing thoughts, of the hope and fear. And this is what the Buddha said is wise attention.

Wise attention is giving time to things that lead to our happiness and our growth, things that lead to our deepening in the Dhamma. This is wise attention. And of course, the present moment is the foremost of those. In our style of meditation, mostly where we want to give our wise attention is to the present moment. It's also helpful to engage in Dharma reflection—we'll talk about that probably later in some moderation—but particularly paying attention to the present moment, knowing what you're experiencing. That's our path. That's the way we grow in the Dhamma.

So the first benefit of mindfulness is we're not running off into distracting emotions that stir up the mind. And then the second thing is that as we settle more in the present moment, a lot of wholesome qualities come out of that.

As I mentioned within the Satipatthana discourse, the first foundation is that of the body. And the Buddha talked a lot about mindfulness of the body. So I want to talk about that generally for a bit. He spoke in praise of mindfulness of the body over and over. There's one section in one of these texts—the numerical discourses, the Anguttara Nikaya—where there are fifty discourses in a row on the benefits of mindfulness of the body. Fifty in a row. And here's one of the quotes:

"When one thing is developed and cultivated, the body becomes tranquil, the mind becomes tranquil, extraneous thoughts subside, and all wholesome qualities that pertain to wisdom reach fulfillment. What is that one thing? Mindfulness directed to the body."

I find this really interesting because ultimately meditation is all about the mind. The heart of meditation is about the mind because suffering and the end of suffering really are in the mind. The source of suffering, as you know from the Second Noble Truth, is craving. And that's a mental activity. The five hindrances are states of mind. The four right efforts are about states of mind. So are the seven factors of enlightenment and the five spiritual faculties. The heart of the Buddha's teaching is around states of mind. And yet, mindfulness of the body is the foundation for us. Why is that? Why did the Buddha emphasize it so much?

There are a few reasons. One is that it's always available. The body is always with us, whether we want it to be or not. It's always here. So this practice is always available. It's not like you're practicing with bliss or rapture, which come and go—you're practicing with something you already have. It's already there.

The other thing that's really helpful is that the reality of the body is fairly firm compared to the reality of the mind. The Buddha said that if you're going to identify with anything—meaning make an "I" out of anything, claim anything, like "I am the body" or "this is my body," or "I am the mind" or "this is my mind"—he said it's better to identify with the body than with the mind. Why? Because the mind changes so quickly. Whatever you identify with could be gone in an instant, but the body is here. It changes too, but a lot more slowly.

So there's this kind of firm reality, and you feel that as you sit. The body has a very grounding quality because a lot of it is the earth element. You can feel yourself settle into it and let it rest on the earth and feel the firmness and solidity of it. The more you get in touch with that, the more that stability transfers to the mind. As you ground the attention in the body, the mind picks up by osmosis that stability. And you start to realize that you can sit here for forty-five minutes in the hall and the body is quite still, and the mind may have gone through a roller coaster of waves, but the body has just been there stable. And the more you connect with that, the more you understand—oh, these waves are going to come and go.

And in the end, they don't last all that long. But the body is here, and I can rest in it. To some extent, I can trust in it a little more.

One of my teachers in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, gave this advice to his students: "Don't do anything that takes you out of the body." Contrast this with our life as Westerners, with this famous line from James Joyce in Ulysses, said of a character, "Mr. Duffy always lived a short distance from his body." You may know people like that—not quite at home.

Now in meditation, sometimes the body is not so difficult to come back into. If there's been trauma earlier in life, the body may not be an inviting or comfortable place to be. And so work with your practice teachers to figure out how to navigate that. Eventually you want to start coming back into the body, but to do it in a measured way that's not overwhelming when there's perhaps a trauma history there.

So the body sits and manifests a lot of equanimity through all the changing waves of thoughts and emotions. As we tune into it, we pick up some of that equanimity. But also the body reflects the mind—really honestly and really accurately. If there's a strong emotion going on in the mind, you'll feel it in the body. There's this great book title: "The Body Doesn't Lie." And it doesn't. The body will reflect whatever's going on in the mind.

If there's tension in the body that you identify as habitual, long-term tension, or you feel it arising spontaneously in the moment, it's important to listen to that because often it's an indicator of something that's gone on in the mind. Once the mind becomes calm, the body starts to calm. When the mind gets agitated, the body usually reflects that. So we can learn a lot about our emotions by tuning in to what's going on in the body. And if we don't move away, it will keep bringing us back in touch with what's happening emotionally.

So that's mindfulness of the body. Within mindfulness of the body is mindfulness of breathing. It's one of the experiences that we find within the body—the experience of the breath going out and the breath coming in.

About this, from the Discourse on Mindfulness of Breathing, the Buddha said, "When mindfulness of breathing is developed and cultivated, it is of great fruit and great benefit. It leads directly to true wisdom and deliverance." So this practice can be a single path that one follows for years in one's practice career.

In fact, after the Buddha was awakened and began teaching, he still went back into retreat. I find this really interesting. His mind was already free. He had no more suffering. He had no more unwholesome mind states. And he would still go back into retreat for three months at a time. After one of these retreats, he said, "During my retreat I practiced mindfulness of breathing." And this is a quote: "If anyone could say of anything that it is a noble dwelling, a divine dwelling, the Buddha's dwelling, it is of concentration by mindfulness of breathing that one would rightly say this." He spoke highly of this even after his awakening.

So why is it so helpful? Why is it such a central practice in our tradition?

One of the really nice things is breathing happens by itself. It's part of the semi-autonomous nervous system, and even if you don't pay attention to it, it's going to keep going. So that means we don't have to do anything to breathe, and that's one thing we can let go of and start to relax into. The breath's going to happen. It's going to go by itself. Just relax and feel it. You don't have to do anything to breathe.

And like the body, it's always there. We hope it's always there. If it's not, call me or Karin. So it's reliable. It's always present. It's basically neutral. Breathing is generally a neutral experience unless you've had some history where it's been troubling.

But although it's neutral, it has great potential for pleasure. Because as the disturbing thoughts start to settle down, that relaxation in the body, that tranquility, is felt as a pleasant thing.

Finding pleasure in your meditation is really, really helpful. Not only will it bring you back to the meditation cushion more often, but the experience of pleasure inwardly is that we relax more. And that relaxation leads to a collectedness of mind called concentration that's very helpful for insight as well.

Sometimes tune into the rhythm of your breath. Let it be natural. You don't need to control it. But tune into the rhythm. When you can relax and let it just go on its own, there's something really soothing about the rhythm of breathing. I don't know if this is true, but it may even take us back to the time as an infant when we were cradled on our mother's chest and feeling that coming and going, a rising and falling, inhale and exhale of our mother's breath. But our own breath can kind of cradle us and rock us in the same way. It's very calming and soothing when you can relax into that.

You want to let the rhythm be natural in order for that to happen. You have to let go of trying to control it. That's not easy in the beginning. As soon as we start to pay attention to the breath, we have a tendency to want to direct it—okay, now breathe in, now breathe out, now breathe in, now breathe out. That's okay. A little bit of control, even though it's not recommended, will often happen in the beginning. As you relax more, that little bit of control will go away, and then the relaxation becomes stronger.

Another great thing about the breath is it has a wonderful way to balance the energy. It's interesting to look at the difference, feel the difference between breathing in and breathing out. They have very different effects in the body. Breathing in is energizing. The word in Pali is pana. That's why it's the anapana discourse—in-breathing and out-breathing. So pana is breathing, is breath. The Sanskrit for it you're probably more familiar with is prana. And so prana in the yogic tradition has connotations of life, vitality, and energy. It originally just meant breath. In yogic practices they use the breath a lot to control the energies of the body. In our meditations we don't use it to control in that way. We just let it be natural.

But you will notice that breathing in has an energizing aspect. You can feel it in many parts of the body. It's kind of an uplift in that way. And then breathing out has a relaxation quality. You can tune into that and kind of encourage the relaxation with the out-breath. You might think on the out-breath that you're letting go. And the breath just goes out into space. And as you kind of feel that out-breath going out into space, you might feel your own mind kind of emptying. You feel that connection to space and it opens up space in your own mind. So you can start to tune in to the energizing aspect of the in-breath, the relaxing aspect of the out-breath.

The other strength of this meditation is that—and this applies to any of the anchors—when you're clear that for a period of time you're choosing to focus on body or sounds or breath, then it really becomes clear when you're not there. So it highlights the times that we go away. Those stand out by contrast. You're with the anchor for a while, for a while, for a while, then you're not with it. That means you're off somewhere else. And then you kind of wake up—oh, I haven't been with the anchor. Oh, where was I? Oh, thinking, imaging, something like that. So it highlights those times of excursion, makes it clear.

And then check—oh, how am I feeling after that excursion? Oh, stirred up a bit. If we practice with open attention where mindfulness of thoughts and images is part of the practice, part of the territory, honestly it's easier to be a little lost in those without recognizing that we're lost. That's my experience anyway.

Meditation on breath is an elemental kind of meditation. We're meditating on the wind element. There are four classical physical elements that we experience in meditation. The wind element is one of them. What's nice about connecting with these elemental qualities—the others are earth, water, fire, or heat—is that it connects us to nature. We feel the air coming into our body, and it's a lot like the wind that's rustling the leaves on the trees outside when there's a breeze.

It also brings up this interesting question about self and not-self. When the air's out there, we don't think of it as us, right? When you breathe it in, at what point does it become you? Is it when it first enters your nostril? Or is it when it goes into the lungs and binds with the blood? And at what point is it no longer you? When it leaves the lungs or when it leaves the nostrils? There's this transition. We're always going back and forth with nature. Bringing nature in and it becomes part of what we consider us. And breathing out and it becomes part of what we no longer consider us. It's back to nature. That's an interesting exploration.

The Buddha also said that practicing mindfulness of breathing, even though it's in the first foundation of mindfulness, fulfills all the other three. In the second foundation of feeling tone, one of the instructions in the Discourse on Mindfulness of Breathing is breathing in and experiencing pleasure, breathing out and experiencing pleasure. So there's the feeling tone. In the third foundation, breathing in, gladdening the mind, breathing out, gladdening the mind. The breath is directly affecting our mind state. And the fourth foundation: breathing in, contemplating impermanence; breathing out, contemplating impermanence. This is opening up to dhammas or wisdom, dharmic principles, understanding what's going on. This is mindfulness of breathing as a whole.

It's interesting that in this discourse, the Buddha doesn't tell us exactly where to pay attention to the breath. Over the years, people have developed practical approaches. Inside the nose is fine—breath in the nostrils. Just below the nose on the upper lip is fine. Chest rising and falling is fine. Belly rising and falling is fine. Feeling the breath in the whole body is fine. Sometimes people like to track the breath coming in through the nostrils, going down, expanding the chest, expanding the belly, and on the out-breath reversing—tracking the course of the breath as it comes in and out. That's also fine. Anything that feels accessible for you is fine.

As I mentioned this morning, there are some obstacles or difficulties that people often experience taking breath as a focus and why it may not work for everyone. There could have been a past difficulty from asthma or some injury that has conditioned the relationship to breathing and made it not comfortable or easy. And then there are particular hindrances that come up.

One is striving. Striving is basically the desire force that is taking root in the meditative realm or the realm of meditative experience. As an example, we're settling in, a few days into the retreat. We start to feel some periods of calm, maybe even a whole sitting where there's a lot of calm. And then the next sitting, we want that again. We want to re-experience that delightful feeling of calm. To get it back, we may lean on the breath harder with an extra amount of effort that's kind of tense because we want a result. The calm comes when we're just able to be with the breath out of the innocent motive of interest—interest in wise attention. Then the mind relaxes and settles. But if we're approaching the breath in order to get somewhere else, the motive is not pure anymore and tension comes in. We're looking for result and not just to know what's happening.

So what do you do when that happens? I've come across this a lot. One of the places I came across it really clearly was when I went to Burma some years ago. I ordained as a monk just for a short period of time because I wanted to practice with a great Burmese master named Pauk Sayadaw. He's in his eighties now, and he's recognized as one of the great masters still living in our tradition in both concentration and insight practices. I went to him specifically because I wanted to practice mindfulness of breathing to develop stronger concentration.

In his traditional style, I would see him regularly for interviews. He was the abbot of a very large monastery. When I went there, there were 750 people practicing in his monastery—600 monastics, both male and female, and 150 lay practitioners. So there were many people there, some of them very accomplished meditators.

Knowing I was a teacher back in the West, he gave me an interview every day. I'd go to his kuti and meet him outside on his deck. It was a very public affair—we'd all line up and wait for our chance to report on our experience to Sayadaw, then he'd give us advice. We'd hear each other's interviews, which was quite humbling.

One day I remember there was a young Burmese monk ahead of me. I'd been practicing for many years at that point, and this young monk couldn't have been practicing for very long. His report was, "Oh, Sayadaw, I sat for three hours yesterday in the third jhana in the meditation hall." That's a very advanced state of concentration, especially in his system. So it was humbling to hear those reports.

Then I'd give my little report: "Oh, Sayadaw, I'm having hindrances," or whatever I was working on at that point.

What I was reporting on one time was, "Oh, I'm striving. I find I'm striving in my meditation because I go through periods of calm and then I want to re-experience them." I asked for his advice. He just looked at me and said, "Don't do that."

Often his advice was very pithy. When I asked him about the hindrances, he said, "If you have aversion, do metta. If you're sleepy, pull your earlobes." This actually works pretty well—try it sometime when you're sleepy. Yank on your earlobes and it does tend to wake you up. So that was his advice for the hindrances, and on striving it was simply "don't do it."

But if you find yourself striving, you might feel it first as a tension in the body—the body's kind of tight like you're leaning forward, thinking "next moment, not this moment." Recognize it through that sensation and then see what might need to be let go of. Sometimes it's helpful to drop that practice and open to sounds. Just let go of the focus on the breath and open to sounds, because it's a very spacious and relaxing focus.

Another possible problem is aversion to thoughts. We start finding our way into these calm places and begin thinking, "Oh, I get it—thoughts are the problem. If I could just stop thinking, it would all be okay." This is a misguided observation. Thoughts aren't the problem, and our practice is not about stopping thinking. If you think that, you'll tie yourself up in knots, because there's no way we can stop our thinking by any effort of will. If we try to stop thinking through willful effort, it results in a big contraction. That tension is not conducive to relaxation and ease, which are the wellsprings of concentration.

The problem is not recognizing thoughts. If we recognize a thought upon arising—not a problem. It's recognized and then it usually dissolves.

It's the not recognizing thoughts that leads us into being seduced, carrying us far down the road with that thought train. This is what stirs us up. We give away our basic peace by going on these thought train excursions.

Part of wisdom is recognizing that this isn't wise attention and learning to reframe. We cannot stop thinking, but we can develop more and more choice about not following the train tracks of those thoughts. The thought arises—fine for it to be there—but I choose not to pursue it. This becomes the skillful choice point.

Joseph Goldstein offers wonderful guidance for meditation: "Nothing is worth thinking about." This is excellent advice. Whatever kinds of thoughts arise—even those that seem like the most brilliant creative urges you've ever experienced—simply say "not now" and return to the present moment. You can do this right in the middle of meditation: "Not now," and back to the breath.

This practice leads us to trust the still heart and mind as the most reliable source of creative response to life. Whatever personal problems we might feel inclined to work on, we will not solve them through thinking. The response must come from a different place—from the deep settledness, stillness, and openness that meditation cultivates. From that space, truly new approaches, ideas, and solutions can simply arise. Trust this more than thinking through problems. It works better.

The last hindrance I want to address is judgment. We often hold some concept that we should be present with every breath, every sound, every moment of bodily experience. This becomes particularly highlighted with the breath because breaths are so discrete and clear. When we are not present with the breath for a while, we think we have failed. We become very judgmental: "Oh, I've been away in thought for so long. I'm really a terrible meditator, and I'm never going to learn how to do this." Then the thoughts spiral downward: "I should not have missed that whole stretch."

We believe we should be present with more breaths than we actually are, and away for less time than we actually were. Let me ask: what is the right number of breaths to be with in a sitting that would qualify you as a good meditator? Do you know the answer? Has anyone ever told you? Yet we judge ourselves for not meeting some fictitious standard.

Simply release the idea that there is any standard about this. You are making your best effort. Accept what comes. There will be excursions. Has anyone ever told you the right length of time to be away in a thought excursion? No. The right length of time for you right now is exactly the time you were away.

Did you pull yourself back by an act of will? No. There are simply these spontaneous moments of return to the present moment. How wonderful! Our past practice habits make such returns more likely, but the process itself is beyond our control.

Take your actual experience as your standard. This is the way things are right now. I am making my best effort. This is what is happening. That is my standard, and it is perfectly fine. Watch out for judgment—it can be truly crippling.

Looking at the trajectory of this practice, the meditation does work.

One comes more and more to abide in the present moment. The thought excursions do lessen. And as that happens, the mind becomes more peaceful and the body becomes more peaceful. The center of gravity of our being starts to shift.

When I came into meditation, my center of gravity was in the thought world. That's where I lived almost all my waking hours. I almost always had some thought running through my mind, and that's where I hung out. That was my center of gravity.

As time went by and I could see thought as just another arising in the field of awareness, my center of gravity started to shift to the empty space—the empty space that's created by mindfulness. Then thoughts were just blips in that empty space.

So this happens. We dwell more and more in that wide openness that has tremendous wisdom potential. Ajahn Sumedho likes to call that space intuitive awareness. It's from this open, receptive, still place that the deepest insights and creative responses to life arise—the insights that eventually liberate us. We learn to trust the insights and understandings that emerge from that kind of silent space.

I love this quote from Albert Einstein: "The intuitive mind is a sacred gift, and the rational mind is a faithful servant. We have created a society that honors the servant and has forgotten the gift." So we're here to rediscover that gift. Meditation returns that gift to us in its proper perspective.

I'll close with this quote from the Buddha: "Mindfulness of breathing is peaceful and sublime. It is an abiding in happiness that breaks up and calms unwholesome mental states whenever they arise."

Let's have a few moments of silence to allow the words to settle before we move into walking. We'll just sit for a minute together in silence.

"This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbāna—namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

We have about thirty minutes now for walking, and then there will be the last sitting of the day with chanting at nine. Don't be afraid to come—Annie promised the sitting will end at 9:20. It's wonderful to learn a new chant, so please do return.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 65

Morning Instructions

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this opening retreat session, Guy Armstrong provides comprehensive meditation instructions for establishing mindfulness practice during an intensive three-month retreat. He explores three primary meditation anchors: mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), whole-body awareness, and sound consciousness, emphasizing the importance of finding the most suitable focus for each practitioner.
>
> Armstrong guides retreatants through the foundational approach of using a chosen anchor to stabilize attention and develop clear recognition of present-moment awareness versus mental proliferation. He addresses common challenges with breath meditation, including over-efforting and anxiety, while offering alternative approaches through body posture and sound receptivity. The instructions emphasize beginning from relaxation rather than striving, cultivating the meditative balance of alertness and ease.
>
> The session concludes with a community ceremony of digital renunciation, where participants formally relinquish their phones while chanting the traditional refuge formula (Buddhaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi, Dhammaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṁ saraṇaṁ gacchāmi). This ritual exemplifies the retreat's emphasis on simplification and community commitment, supporting practitioners in creating optimal conditions for deepening meditation practice and wisdom development.

Good morning everyone.

I hope you're starting to settle in and feeling well rested this morning. It does take a few days to settle into a retreat, and when you add jet lag into it, things get complicated—even remembering where your room is, figuring out when you can take a shower, or how to do your work meditation. These details tend to occupy the first couple of days, so it's good we're easing in gently to the rhythm.

Today will be our first full day of silence and a full schedule of sittings and walkings. I'll fill in more details about that later.

In this morning sit, as Brian mentioned, each morning we will provide new meditation instructions. This will be very helpful so that as we go along, you'll receive a complete set of instructions that we're suggesting you follow. It would be nice if we could just begin and say, "All right, from this moment on we want you to be mindful of everything that happens in a clear and choiceless manner. End of instructions." That's where we're going, but we find that it really helps if we unfold stage-by-stage instructions for all the different facets of your experience. So that's what we'll be doing over these ten days to two weeks—going through all the different pieces that make up a moment of experience for us as meditators.

This morning we'll continue with the instructions that Brian offered yesterday. As he said, we'll be working with an anchor for the first few days of the retreat. The reason we do that is to stabilize the attention. It's so easy, as you all know in meditation, for the attention to go other places than the present moment—basically into thoughts, fantasies, images, memories, anticipations, and so on. By choosing one area to come back to again and again, we start to build up a mindful relationship to that experience. And because we have a chosen focus, it's clear when we're not there, when we're not with it. So choosing a focus for these days really helps us see clearly: am I in the present and with my anchor, or am I not? This will help bring the attention back more regularly to the present moment, and that's why we begin this way.

As Brian said, you might be comfortable with the breath as an anchor. Many, many meditators are. Some are not. In my experience, the people who are not so comfortable with the breath are those for whom it becomes an area for striving—where the worry increases that we'll miss a single breath. And so there's an over-efforting, a striving, a getting a little too tight around being with each and every inhale and exhale. If you're with the breath and you find that tension is just increasing in your body and in your mind, that's a sign the breath may not be the right choice for you, or you need to be more relaxed in your relationship to it. So you can check on that and play with that.

If the breath doesn't work, another reason could be that there's some past history of difficulty in breathing. For instance, people who had asthma in childhood or who've had an injury in the area of the chest might have a complicated relationship to the breath where it brings up anxiety to focus on it. So in that case, again, choosing a simpler object that's more neutral might be more suitable. And that's why we offer also the body, the body posture in sitting, or sounds as alternatives.

I'll go through each of these three anchors in the instructions this morning, and you can see what feels most helpful for you. With all of them, the important thing is to begin from a place of relaxation. We start from a place of just settling into the present moment the way it is. And from that relaxed attitude, then we meet our present moment experience, however it shows up.

So let's begin with the meditation.

In your sitting posture, check that you can feel this quality of relaxation. As you're sitting, let the body be upright. Let the back be reasonably straight, but not like there's an iron rod up your spine. Feel that you're upright and sitting with some dignity that brings in a sense of alertness and energy, but also that you can feel within the posture a sense of some relaxation or as much ease as possible. You could say that the posture reflects this balance of alertness and relaxation that we also want to find in the mind. The meditative mind should have this combination of a degree of firmness and a base of relaxation.

As you tune into your sitting posture, just begin by settling your attention within the body. Let go of any obvious areas of holding. Let the forehead be unwrinkled, unfrowning. Soften the eyes. The jaw can be unclenched. The shoulders dropped, and the belly soft. The hands can rest in a relaxed way in the lap or on your thighs.

In this way, you can feel the awareness pervading the whole body. Anywhere you direct your attention within the frame of the body, the awareness is there—from the top of the head, through the torso, to the hips.

legs and feet. Awareness is present throughout the body.

In some places it will reveal sensations—sensations of pulsing or tingling, warmth or coolness, tightness or softness. In other areas, no sensations may be apparent. That's fine too. We get the sense of the awareness pervading the whole body, and you can rest with that.

In this way, you can practice with the whole body or the sitting posture as an anchor. From that base, let the attention become wider and open to all the sounds that are arising. Could be the sounds of one another, sound of my voice, sounds of the building, sounds from outside.

Notice how a sound can arise in any part of the room or outside in any direction, and it's heard without any effort on your part. This effortless quality in hearing leads us into an attitude of receptivity—just like you're listening to a concert, or in nature, listening to the sound of the wind in the leaves. So just in resting and being open, sounds are known spontaneously, effortlessly. Sound can become a second kind of anchor for some people.

Then returning the attention to be with the body, to be felt in the body, through the body. Allow the experience in the body to be felt just the way it is, not needing to change or correct anything. There may be a mix of pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation—just allowing that all to be the way it is, all held in awareness, known through awareness.

As you settle your attention into the experience of the body here and now, you'll begin to feel the changing sensations that come from breathing. Every time there's an in-breath, new sensations are arising and passing in the body. Every time there's an out-breath, different sensations are appearing.

As you maintain your awareness of the whole body, start to tune in to these changing sensations of breath. What happens on an in-breath in the body? What happens on an out-breath? How far throughout the body can you feel the in-breath happening? How far throughout the body can you feel the out-breath?

So not trying to change the breath or control the breath, make it long or short, shallow or deep. Let the breath just come and go naturally, but feel it, feel it in the body. This is the third option for an anchor—maintaining a receptive attitude, receiving the breath the way you would receive sounds at a concert. Allow the breath to find its natural rhythm, based in ease and relaxation.

Then just maintaining this continuity of mindfulness of breathing, resting the attention in the body, feeling each in-breath and feeling each out-breath.

From time to time your attention will move away from connection with the body or breath, and you'll be drawn into some string of thinking or imagery. Then after some time you'll notice that you've been away from the connection with the breath and body. So don't judge that excursion. We all will take these thought excursions.

But when you notice that thoughts or images have been taking the attention, just acknowledge that: "Oh, thinking" or "image." Appreciate that spontaneous return to the present, and then again, rest in the body, feeling the breathing—each in-breath, each out-breath.

These will be the instructions for your sitting meditations throughout the day today, continuing to explore the anchor, finding the one that feels most suitable for you. The real gauge is what helps you stay in the present moment the best, whether that's the whole body posture, sounds, or the breath.

The instructions I gave this morning were really around feeling the breath through the whole body, which I think is a really nice way to practice because it brings in the sense of relaxation and receptivity. But many of you may have an established breath practice where you're experiencing the breath at the nose, in the belly, or at the chest, and maybe that's clearer for you.

If that feels more comfortable for you as a way to practice with mindfulness of breathing, please follow that. This whole body breath is one option, but also the nostrils, the chest, or the belly are also fine. Whatever you're comfortable with and works for you—all of those are fine.

This is the morning where we're doing the renunciation of cell phones for those who wish. It is something that we really encourage, and this is helpful on a number of levels.

I think we all know that screens have become profoundly problematic in our culture today. It's easy to become addicted. Children are spending so much time with their screens that one writer referred to it as "nature deficit disorder" for kids these days—they simply don't want to go outside anymore.

The giving up of cell phones for a period like six weeks or three months is part of acknowledging this over-reliance, particularly our connection to the internet where anonymity leads to wrong speech. There's false speech, angry speech, and divisive speech—all of which the Buddha spoke of very clearly as things to avoid. The anonymity of online spaces gives leeway for these unwholesome expressions.

So in renouncing our cell phones, we're stepping away from that, at least temporarily. Every so often I see an article on the homepage of news sites: "In a bold experiment, young person gives up their phone and all social media for a month." Well, you all are doing so much more than that. I think each of you should be a front-page story in the New York Times. I deeply appreciate your commitment in the way Annie spoke about last night.

As an additional step, we often refer to this as renunciation—a word that carries perhaps negative connotations in modern society. But a better way, an easier way to think of it, is simplification. Our whole approach to retreat is simplifying our daily life so we can give our full attention to being in the present moment. Anything that leads away from that as a regular part of our day, we try not to engage in.

That's why we suggest not reading, not writing, and definitely not connecting to the internet, texts, and so forth. Some people have received very disturbing texts in the middle of retreat that have completely disrupted their experience. By turning your phone over to the office and letting them be in charge of it, you'll be truly protected and safe. We really encourage this, though it's not mandatory.

The reason we're doing this as a ceremony—rather than simply asking you to take your phone to Rebecca, who would give you an envelope, write your name, and put it away in a safe for six weeks or three months—is that ceremony is one of the things that bonds a community. That's what rituals are for: bonding in spiritual communities.

What happens as you see people turning in their cell phones is that you appreciate their commitment. They make their commitment visible. It's like when somebody shows up for a group sitting—they're making their commitment visible, and it really supports the rest of us. It's the visibility of the renunciation that we emphasize in making this a public ritual or ceremony. This is one of those things that binds communities together.

To add a ritual element, we'll include some Pali chanting. As people come up to drop their cell phones in, all of us—not just teachers, but all of you—will join in the chanting. We'll chant the three refuges, just the first version: "Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi," and then repeat those same three lines again and again. They're in the first paragraph of your chant sheet under "Refuges and Precepts," but you'll pick it up quickly.

Those of you who have your cell phones already in an envelope and prepared to give them up, please line up at the back, forming a line that leads to the front. We have a basket here where you can drop your phone. We will bow to you and ring a bell each time a phone is renounced, accompanying that with the chant.

If you meant to bring your cell phone but left it in your room, or if you just feel at this moment like you'd like to participate, there are more packets with envelopes just outside this door in the walking room. Or if you need to go to your room to get your cell phone, you're welcome to do that during the ceremony.

If you've already dropped your cell phone off but would like to be part of the ceremony, please come up and bow, or express your participation however feels appropriate to you.

Now we begin together with our chanting of the triple refuge: Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi.

Please begin to come forward now.

Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi...

[The chant continues as participants process forward to place their phones in the basket, each repetition accompanying their steps toward this symbolic act of letting go]

Thank you all for your expression of this commitment to simplicity. May it be the cause for your deepening in wisdom and loving-kindness.

A few announcements before we leave this morning. There will be a walking period coming up. In the walking meditation, please continue for this period to follow the simple instructions Brian gave yesterday. Stay grounded in your body. You can focus on the feeling of moving through the whole body, or on the movement of the legs and feet.

At the end of the ten o'clock sit, Annie will give more detailed instructions in walking meditation. If you already have a well-established walking practice, you don't need to come to that sit. But if you'd like a refresher, if you feel like your walking would benefit from a little tune-up, please come to the ten o'clock sitting this morning.

At 11:30, Brian will lead a session on good posture. Again, this is optional, but as you start into a long period of retreat, it's good to get your body in proper alignment from the beginning. Without it, stress on the back, neck, knees can build up over time. This session is highly recommended. Brian has extensive experience and will give many helpful tips on how to sit properly and comfortably. He'll conclude before lunch.

At 6:15 today, we have the affinity group sit for the LGBTQIA+ community. This will be in room M204, right at the top of the main staircase. Just go to the top of the stairs, turn right, and you'll find it. There's also a note on the board reminding you.

Someone asked whether you have to wait for an emergency to contact retreat support—that is, May or Karin—by going to the office and picking up the red phone. Not necessarily. If you find yourself in a place in your practice where you could use a little contact, a little support to help you through a difficult patch, but it's not an emergency, you can simply leave a note on the board for retreat support. If you forget the name "retreat support," you can address it to the retreat manager, and Rebecca will pass it on to one of them. They will get back in touch with you by note and find a time to meet. They are available for support in situations that aren't emergencies as well.

The last thing to mention is that we will begin the scheduled practice meetings tomorrow morning. Those notices will go up on the board later this afternoon, probably by tea time. Please check the board later today. We'll see half the group tomorrow and the other half the next day—half the group on Friday, the other half on Saturday. So if your name doesn't appear today, don't worry. We haven't forgotten you.

This time now is a walking period until the ten o'clock sit. May you have a beneficial day of mindfulness practice.

CHAPTER 66

Morning Instructions - Thoughts

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this retreat instruction, Guy Armstrong addresses one of meditation's most challenging aspects: working skillfully with thoughts. Drawing from the Buddha's middle way approach, he emphasizes that thoughts aren't the enemy - it's not noticing them that creates problems. The talk explores three practical approaches: noting thoughts as 'thinking,' taking thought as primary meditation object through the 'thought game,' and working with repetitive thought patterns by identifying underlying emotions.
>
> Armstrong explains how thoughts, though appearing as mere whispers of words, have tremendous power to shape our lives and decisions. He guides practitioners to shift from living in thought content to resting in the spacious awareness that mindfulness reveals. The session includes detailed meditation instructions for observing thoughts as they arise, persist, and pass away, while maintaining present-moment awareness.
>
> Addressing common questions, Armstrong clarifies the relationship between the Second Noble Truth (craving as suffering's cause) and attachment to self, explaining through the Paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination) how contact, vedanā (feeling tone), taṇhā (craving), and upādāna (clinging) interconnect with self-construction. He emphasizes the Buddha's instruction to the Kālāmas: verify teachings through direct experience rather than blind belief.

This morning we're going to expand the field of the meditation instructions to take in the whole area of thoughts. We've delayed this focus for a few days because thoughts are so tricky. They're very slippery. As you've probably seen, it's a slippery slope into getting fascinated with their content and losing touch with the present moment.

It can come to seem that in meditation, thoughts are really the enemy—the thief of our mindfulness. We might think, "I can't be mindful if I'm thinking, and good meditation must happen when there aren't any thoughts." But that's really a misunderstanding. Thoughts aren't the enemy. It's not noticing them that is the problem.

What we want to do is bring the same mindful attention to the arising of thoughts as we do to the in-breath, the arising of a sound, a body sensation, an emotion, a hindrance, and so on. This is our challenge: Can we bring mindfulness into the realm of thinking?

What this means is we have to shift our relationship to thoughts from the ordinary one. When I came into meditation, I was pretty locked into the content of all my thoughts. That's where I lived—I really lived in my thoughts and they pretty much occupied every waking moment of every day. I was lost in the content, not really aware that that's what was happening.

We're going to shift our relationship into a mindful one that can see thought as another thing that arises, persists, and passes away in the present moment. This is the challenge, and the reason it's challenging is because thoughts are very seductive. If you look closely at the content of thoughts, they tend to be things that arouse our emotions, so it's very easy to get pulled into that content. That's what's seductive about it. The pleasure and pain, the hope and fear, the praise and blame—these all get played out through our thoughts.

Yet if you look at a thought closely, what is it? Most of the time I'll use "thoughts" to mean a string of words that appear in the mind. Some people think in images, and images might also be a form of thinking—whichever way it expresses for you. But let's take this string of words that appears in the mind, basically a form of speech, speaking to ourselves but not vocalizing it. If you look closely at it, all it is is a little whisper of words.

And in fact, as soon as you notice the thought, what usually happens to it? Poof—it's gone. Yet when they're not recognized, thoughts have this incredible power. I'd say every major decision we make in life comes out of our thinking. I remember when I was in college, I was really fascinated with Zen Buddhism. This thought came: "I'd really like to see Asia." Then in a blink of an eye, I found myself in Malaysia teaching for two years with the Peace Corps. One thought, two years in Asia—direct connection.

You could even say our lives are ruled by thought. The world is ruled by thought. But when we look at what a thought is, it's just this slender whisper—poof. Yet it's the power that we give them that truly rules the world.

Our training in meditation will be to see a thought in the present moment, to watch it arise, persist as it expresses itself, and then pass away. That will be the theme of the morning's instructions.

When we get more familiar with this—it's not easy at first, but when we become more familiar with it—the whole center of gravity of our being shifts. Instead of living in the world of thought and occasionally touching the present moment, we start to live in this big open space of awareness that's like the sky, which is where mindfulness is born. Then thoughts are an occasional puff of smoke in that open spaciousness of awareness. We can take our home in the space and not in the concepts.

In the meditation and guiding this morning, we're going to look at three aspects of working with thoughts. One is simply beginning to notice them, with a suggestion to note them as "thinking." The second is taking thought as the primary focus. This is quite fun—we'll approach it through something we call the thought game. We'll just do that for short periods of time, but it will be an interesting exploration.

The third thing involves dealing with repetitive thoughts, because we all have our top ten list, don't we? It could be the difficult boss thought, or the partner conflict thought, or the "I'm worried about my kids" thought, or "what's happening with my health on this retreat" thought that we bring up over and over. We want to start identifying the particular ones that come often and maybe find some names for those and learn how to work with them skillfully.

Okay, I think that's enough of a preamble so we can go into our formal meditation at this point.

So again, please sit comfortably. Find in your posture that uprightness that also has a sense of ease and relaxation. Connect first with your anchor—the overall body and sitting, sounds or breath. One of the reasons it's helpful to develop a relationship with this focus is that it becomes like a resting place for us. If nothing else strong is going on, we can always come back to this. It's like a meditation home.

Then from that home, anything else that comes up that's strong enough to draw the attention—whether it's a sensation, a sound, an emotion or mental state or hindrance—we easily let the attention move away from the home base and make that new experience a focus for mindfulness. When the new experience fades, we can return, resting in our home base, our home.

So as you rest in your meditative home, one of the things that will draw your attention from time to time is the arising of a thought. Sometimes we don't notice the arising. Sometimes we don't know we're thinking until we've been in the content for a while, even a few minutes, several minutes, twenty minutes. And then we return to the present moment and we notice, "Oh, there's been thinking." Then we reconnect with our home base or with the body, sounds.

But now see if you can begin to notice a thought as it arises. Sometimes you'll notice it with the arising, sometimes you'll notice it partway in, sometimes you may just notice it at the end. But whenever you notice it, turn your mindful attention to that appearance. That too has a lifespan. A thought arises, expresses itself, and passes away. Can mindfulness see that? Can your mindfulness be with a single thought without losing the connection to the present moment?

So you will notice the content of the thought. Don't think you have to blank out the content. Mindfulness can take that in, but you'll also see its passing nature. And then you're back in the present.

It can be helpful just to support the mindfulness. When a thought comes and you notice it, to note it—just the simple label "thinking." And that just says, "This is what's going on right now. I know my experience in this present moment is thinking." So in a way, that's like a little stake that mindfulness places in the ground right then. "This is my orientation. I know I'm thinking."

So practice with that, resting in your meditative home and just noticing any activity of thought as thinking. And for you it could be words, it could be an image. Let's try the same note: "thinking."

So in this way, a thought can come and go and we don't have to give up any of our present moment mindfulness. Thoughts are just another appearance. Once a thought has been noticed, you can return to your home base or with whatever experience is dominant in the next moment—sensation or sound, mood or emotion. Maintain the continuity of mindfulness through changing appearances.

The second way we'll work with thoughts in this meditation is to take thought as the primary focus for limited periods of time. This is kind of fun to play with. What that means is you're going to just sit quietly and sit in waiting, as it were, for the next thought to appear. Notice it, and then return just to waiting, resting. A little bit the image sometimes used is a cat outside a mouse hole. Cat's very attentive, but not focused on anything particular yet.

So perhaps develop that attentiveness with your anchor, your meditative home. Return to that. Ground the attention—body, sounds, breath. Rest in the anchor. And then have a sense—there are two ways to do this. Have a sense that there's a space around you or a space around your anchor. Or have a sense that there's like a screen in front of your eyes. Blank screen. And you're just waiting with your anchor until the next thought appears. And you're going to know it.

and come back to your anchor.

So let's try it.

Resting in the anchor and becoming mindful of the first thought that arises after the end of this sentence. And then returning the attention to your anchor again, resting with the anchor, collecting in the present moment, opening to the space or that visual screen.

And now becoming mindful of the next two thoughts that arise after this sentence, and bringing the attention back to the anchor. And check—was it possible to have more or less continuous mindfulness, even as those two thoughts were appearing and passing? So was it possible to know a thought without being carried out of the present moment?

Returning to the anchor, resting again. Opening to the sense of space or visual screen. And now becoming aware of every thought that comes for a limited period of time. I'll end this in a short while, but being aware of every single thought that comes and goes in this brief period.

And now returning to your anchor, reestablishing the attention there, firmly connected to the present moment. And in this next period of the meditation, you might just play with this thought game. Settling in the anchor and then taking thought as a primary focus for extended periods of time. Anytime you find yourself getting lost in the content or distracted, coming back into the anchor, just resettling in the present moment and opening up again when you feel ready. Taking thought as a primary focus.

If it starts feeling like you've lost the mindfulness, drawn into the content of thoughts, just come back to the anchor. Stay as long as needed to really settle again in the present moment. And if you feel inclined, open up again to thought as the primary focus.

The last of the meditative approaches I wanted to mention this morning has to do with repetitive thought patterns. So you've probably already seen that thoughts often run in certain grooves. If you look at it, thoughts tend to be drawn where there's some emotional charge, either of problems or of pleasure. So sometimes these run around relationships or work, vacation fantasies, friends, children, parents, money, home.

So starting just to recognize what subjects the thoughts tend to circle around and then developing a specific note for some of the main ones. So in addition to just "thinking," you might be specific and call it "planning thoughts," "remembering thoughts," "work thoughts," "relationship thoughts," "redecorating the apartment thoughts," whatever fits that particular train. And then when those thoughts arise, by labeling it with that specific kind of thinking, it gives a little more distance around it. You know, we just start to get familiar—oh, that's one of the grooves the mind likes to run in. And we get a little more tolerant, accepting—okay, that's that tune again.

So you don't have to go looking for your own particular categories. But just practice as usual. But when one arises that you know comes often, developing a specific label: planning, comparing, judging, analyzing, rehearsing, and so on.

So in this part of the meditation, return again to your meditative home—breath, body, sounds. And from there, move easily to whatever naturally draws the attention: a sensation, a sound, a hindrance, energy, mood or emotion, or a thought. And just beginning to recognize the particular patterns of thinking that your own mind likes to go to. Starting to name some of the different categories that you see again and again. And if nothing particular is drawing the attention, just being content to rest with your anchor.

And one last instruction with repetitive thought patterns. If there's one kind of thought that comes again and again and it's really hard to get disconnected, to let it go, and it takes over your mind and a lot of feelings come with it, then it can be helpful to look at what's the emotion that is fueling the thought. And so in this case, with the repetitive thought pattern that feels quite charged and quite hard to let go of, drop down and feel what emotion is accompanying it.

For instance, with a lot of planning thoughts, there's an underlying emotion that's really driving the thinking. And that emotion many times is more fundamental than the thoughts. The thoughts are just kind of getting spun off from that emotion. So if we want to get a little deeper in relation to that thought pattern, let go of the focus on the thought and drop down to the emotional level. What am I feeling emotionally? And to support that, where am I feeling it in the body?

So to stay connected with the emotion, stay connected with where you feel it in the body. Ground the attention there. Just open to and allow the underlying emotion to be there just the way it is. Don't try to get rid of it. Don't need to judge it. Just open, feel it, and allow it. This is a more sure path to understanding than just staying on the level of the thought.

So please continue today to bring thoughts into the field of your mindfulness. It's such an interesting area. Thoughts are incredibly useful.

The meditation on thought isn't intended to deny the validity or usefulness of thought. I mean, look at the room we're in. Everything here exists because somebody thought about it—from the lights to the windows to the statues to the flowers.

Everything is here because of thought, and we're supported by all that past thought activity. We're probably here because our parents had thoughts about each other! So the world is often born from thoughts, and thought is very useful in that way.

And yet it can also become a kind of trap for us. When I came into meditation, I'd been through many years of school, and what school taught me to do was think. I had a lot of faith in thinking. I thought as I came into meditation, if I think more, I'll be able to solve my problems through thinking. Then I got a little more sophisticated and thought, well, I'll be able to think my way into enlightenment. By understanding the Dharma conceptually, I'll get free.

So I had a lot of attachment to thought and pursued thought extensively on the cushion. It took me a while to realize it wasn't working, and to trust in the silence as the ground from which real insight comes. Real insight is an intuitive process that sees the world in a new way. That's a creative process that comes better out of some degree of stillness.

In the beginning, I had a lot of desire for thinking. I thought it was going to solve things. Then in the middle, I had a lot of aversion to thinking because I thought it was destroying my silence. So take a look—which side of thinking are you on? Are you on the desiring side or the aversive side? What the Buddha tells us is that the middle way is the right approach. Don't be desirous with thoughts. Don't be aversive to thoughts. Let thoughts come when they come and go as they go.

Shinul, a Korean Zen teacher, put it beautifully. He said, "Don't be bothered by the fact that thoughts arise. Only be concerned that you're late in recognizing them." This is the key. If we can see them clearly, they're in the field of mindfulness, and that gives us a lot of protection. We see a thought for what it is.

There were a few questions in the basket, so I have time for at least a couple this morning. I'm going to start with a small picture one and then go to a big picture one. The small picture question: "Have you ever asked yourself, am I being brainwashed? Because sometimes I do, although it's a great feeling."

This is a good question. Are you being brainwashed here? Is this some kind of cult and we're indoctrinating you with views to make you our devotees? The first answer I want to give is: not at all. I think it's the opposite of brainwashing. What's really going on is heart-washing—we're cleaning up our heart from all the unwholesome states that have grown up in it.

But let me address the brainwashing piece first. What this implies is that you're being indoctrinated to believe along a certain line, and there are penalties for not believing—like we might send you to a re-education camp somewhere, perhaps in a cold northern monastery, if you don't follow what's being taught.

I want to put a framework behind the things we talk about in instructions and Dharma talks: check it out for yourself. Don't take anything on our word, but check it out for yourself and see if it's true in your experience. This is really where understanding comes from.

Don't rely on what we say. This principle goes back to the very core of Buddhism. The Buddha traveled throughout northern India for forty-five years, meeting countless people and teaching. One day he wandered into a village of the Kalama clan. He had been speaking about sila, about ethical conduct, when the Kalamas raised a pointed question: "Look, many different teachers come through here. Why should we believe you? Teachers say different things, our elders say different things, our books say different things. Different among us believe different things, and we think through different things. Why should we believe you?"

This question prompted what became a founding principle of his teachings. The Buddha replied: "Don't believe it because I say it. Don't believe it because a teacher says it. Don't believe it because an elder says it. Don't believe it because your tradition says it. Don't believe it because you read it in a book. Don't believe it because you figured it out just with reason. Try it out and see what leads to happiness and what leads to suffering. Those things that lead to happiness—promote those, follow those, develop them. Those things that lead to suffering—don't follow them, don't encourage them, try not to act on them."

This is the founding principle in the Dharma, and this is the principle we all follow. So don't think you have to believe something because we say it or because the Buddha said it. Check it out for yourself.

Now, there are some things you may not be able to verify for yourself in this course. Does karma work? Is there such a thing as rebirth? In a moment of true enlightenment, is there absolutely no greed, hatred, and delusion? You may not find answers to these questions. So those you can take in as reflections—maybe, maybe not. We don't require that you believe in any of those. You can hold those as open questions.

But what we do suggest is this: when greed, hatred, and delusion are present, there will be some suffering. When they're absent from the heart and mind, there's some degree of happiness. That you can check out. You can discover what things lead to a growth in greed, hatred, and delusion, and what things lead to their reduction. If something leads to their growth, don't follow it. But if it leads to non-greed, non-hatred, non-delusion, follow that—it will be for your happiness.

That's the basic message we want to convey. The tools we offer are really to help you come to your own understanding around these things. You don't have to believe anything. What's really going on is that our hearts are getting purified. There's a classical text called The Path of Purification, and purification basically means a reduction in the elements of greed, hatred, and delusion, with a corresponding growth in happiness—reduction in suffering, greater happiness. So not brainwashing, but heartwashing is what we think goes on here.

Now for the other question, which I found really interesting. The second noble truth says that craving is the source of suffering, yet at other times the Buddha pointed to attachment to self as the primary source of suffering. How do we reconcile these two? Have you heard both these teachings? I imagine you have.

The second noble truth, which appears in the Buddha's first dharma talk, definitely states that there is dukkha—the first noble truth, as Carol discussed. The second noble truth identifies the cause of dukkha as craving, tanha, thirst. But then in many other places, the Buddha pointed to this confusion around the sense of self as really fundamental to the way we get drawn into suffering. So how do we reconcile these two?

They are basically the same pointing. Craving is inextricably bound up with self. This is probably most clearly shown in the Chain of Dependent Origination, where there are four links in the middle that are truly experiential and worth studying. I'll likely talk about them in more detail later.

The Chain of Dependent Origination consists of twelve links that break down the arising of suffering in fine detail. The first links, starting with ignorance, are philosophical. The later links, which end in becoming, birth, and death, are also philosophical. But there are these middle links—four of them—that you'll see again and again in your own practice. You can check this out for yourself.

The middle links begin with contact—sense contact. This means the arising of experience at one of the six sense doors: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind (which includes thoughts and emotions). This is happening constantly. We are always having contact at these six sense doors, except when we're asleep. Deep sleep seems to stop this process. Otherwise, in waking moments, these contacts are occurring continuously. This is the basic fact of our experience.

The next link is feeling tone, or vedana. We'll explore this more deeply in a couple of days. Feeling tone means that every one of these momentary contacts is either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither—sometimes called neutral. This feeling tone tends to condition our response.

What's your experience in meditation or in life when something pleasant arises? We want more. The feeling tone of pleasant tends to activate wanting or greed. What's the normal response when something unpleasant comes along? Push away. Don't want it. Make it go as far away as possible. What's the normal response when something neither pleasant nor unpleasant arises—something neutral? We go to sleep. It's not interesting. It doesn't excite us or threaten us, so we're not going to pay attention to it.

But this isn't mindful. Mindfulness is noticing whatever's there.

So feeling tone tends to condition responses of greed, aversion, and delusion when we're not being mindful. This leads to the next link: craving. Feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—conditions a response of craving in the absence of mindfulness.

Craving is basically made up of "I want that," "I don't want that," and "I'm going to ignore all the rest." This is a fuller description of what's happening in a moment of craving or tanha. Thirst is wanting things to be different than they are. We want that pleasant thing to stay forever, we want that unpleasant thing to go away forever, and we don't want to see the rest forever. Craving is the conditioned and habitual response to feeling tone.

Then what happens when the impulse of craving arises? We take hold of the thing. We grasp it either to pull it toward us or to push it away. You can see this moment to moment in your experience. If there's something you don't like, you have to take hold of it before you can push it. If there's something you want, you have to take hold of it to bring it closer.

Once we've taken hold of something with clinging, we proliferate an "I" around it. This happens all the time. Start to notice this. Once you've clung to something—and it could be any of these areas of thoughts we've talked about: a thought about our relationship, a thought about our work, a thought about a vacation, a thought about our home—

When it's taken hold of, see if the I-thoughts don't come up abundantly around that topic: "I want it this way. I don't want it that way. I like this. I don't like that. I want to change it in this direction. I don't want it to go in that direction."

So when we cling to something, I-thoughts proliferate from there, and that's the birth of self. Craving, clinging, and selfing are all joined together, as pointed to by these links of dependent origination. This is something you can observe in your moment-to-moment experience.

What's your response to pleasant and unpleasant experiences, whether they arise through memory or present-moment awareness? Watch how the I-thoughts grow from that response.

The Second Noble Truth—that the cause of suffering is craving—points to the same reality as attachment to self. They always go together.

Sometimes, however, this process isn't happening. Begin to notice in your day the times when there's not much I-thinking, the times when there's no holding on, the times when there's no craving. How does that feel? Generally more open, more peaceful, more free.

This is the end of suffering—letting go of craving, letting go of self, letting go of suffering. Take a look and see for yourself.

Have a wonderful day of freedom.

CHAPTER 67

Working with Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers profound guidance on working skillfully with difficult emotions that are part of our human experience. Drawing from the Satipatthāna Sutta (MN 10), he explores the third foundation of mindfulness—cittānupassanā—examining both wholesome and unwholesome states of mind characterized by greed, aversion, and delusion versus generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.
>
> Armstrong presents a practical framework for understanding how difficult emotions relate to time—desire for future pleasure, fear of future pain, grief for past loss, and anger about past hurts. Through personal stories and teaching examples, he demonstrates how mindful attention to bodily sensations, mental flavors, and underlying beliefs can transform our relationship with challenging states. Rather than resistance, which only strengthens difficult emotions, he advocates for acceptance and investigation.
>
> The talk emphasizes that awakening doesn't come from eliminating confusion but from discovering wisdom within our difficulties. Armstrong shares inspiring accounts of practitioners working with grief, self-judgment, and fear, showing how these challenges can become catalysts for profound growth. He concludes with Rilke's powerful poem encouraging us to "let everything happen to you—beauty and terror" while remembering that "no feeling is final."

Working with Difficult Emotions

Being human, we all have a very wide range of emotional life and experience. Some emotions are beautiful and quite enjoyable—love and compassion, joy and elation, and even calm, neutral as it is. Then some are really difficult and take us to an edge: qualities like fear and shame, anger, loneliness, grief, wanting, despair, self-judgment, and humiliation. These are things we don't really want to feel, but sometimes they visit anyway.

These difficult emotions can be a primary source of suffering in our lives. We may go through periods where life is easy, tranquil, and enjoyable, or these may be frequent companions for us all along the way. But sooner or later, they're going to be visitors for almost all of us.

Outside in daily life, life is complicated. There are so many people, so many situations, so many facets to what's going on in our lives. But here in meditation it tends to get simple. There are times when things are going well, and then there's bodily pain and emotional pain. We need to learn how to work skillfully with both of these. These times of emotional pain may well come at any point, and it's good if we can learn how to relate to bodily pain and emotional pain. Then, of course, in meditation there's also the wandering mind—occasionally painful, but that's a first-world kind of problem to have. It's not so bad.

Usually we want to get rid of these painful emotions. I certainly did when I came into meditation. They started to arise and I thought, "This isn't what I came for. I came to get peaceful. I don't want this stuff." But the resistance doesn't help. That's just more aversion and it tends to lock them in place. We really can find another way to work with them, to be with them. In the process of that, we unfold and discover a lot of strengths that maybe we didn't even know we had. In doing that investigation and exploration with them, we can really transform not just our relationship to them in terms of being more welcoming, but we transform the emotions themselves. We transform how often they come and how strongly they come into our experience. But it begins with really opening to being willing to feel them.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run a hundred miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

With all these emotions, they're part of our human package. They're going to be around in one form or another for probably a long time. So it's really good if we can clarify our relationship to them and come to understand them.

This whole field goes into what's called the third foundation of mindfulness. The third foundation is called citta in Pali, and it's usually translated as mind, but we often translate it as heart-mind. The term citta in Pali really includes both cognitive aspects of mind—knowledge and thinking—and also affective, emotional aspects of mind. They're both together. So neither the word heart nor the word mind quite captures it. I think the best translation for citta is psyche. Psyche really includes that whole realm, but not many English translators use that for citta.

At any rate, citta does include moods, emotions, and states of mind. You can get a flavor of that from the Satipatthana Sutta where it's described like this: "How does a practitioner abide contemplating mind as mind? Here one knows a lustful mind to be lustful and a mind without lust to be without lust. One knows an aversive mind to be aversive and a mind without aversion to be without aversion. One knows a deluded mind to be deluded and a mind without delusion to be without delusion."

One of the things you'll feel in this description is that the Buddha includes a balance of wholesome and unwholesome qualities. He almost always does that when he's describing our experience. He doesn't usually just focus on one or the other—sometimes, but very often he'll point to both. So this foundation is pointing to the wholesome qualities of mind as well as the difficult or unwholesome.

The unwholesome states are characterized by greed, aversion, and delusion. The wholesome states are characterized by non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion. The Buddha often spoke in these kinds of negatives, but if you think about it, what does non-greed mean? It means giving up or giving away—renouncing or generosity. I like to think of it simply as generosity. Non-greed is generosity.

Non-aversion means we don't carry ill will. The opposite of ill will is loving kindness. So I think of it as loving kindness. Non-delusion means we're seeing clearly, or you could say there's wisdom. So the wholesome states are made up of generosity, loving kindness, and wisdom, while unwholesome states are composed of these roots of greed, aversion, and delusion.

The whole point of the path is to increase the wholesome states and decrease the unwholesome. This is the very definition of right effort in the Eightfold Path. I think it's amazing that we have the tools in this lineage—the meditative tools to develop any of these qualities to any degree that we want.

This process is called in Pali bhavana. It means mental development, development of heart and mind, cultivation of the wholesome. Sometimes it's translated as meditation, but it really has this sense of actively developing these beautiful qualities. Any way that you want to shape your mind—which means to shape your life—there are practices to do that.

If you want to go in the direction of wisdom, there's insight practice. If you want to go in the direction of love, there's the metta practice. If you want to go in the direction of stillness, there's concentration practice. If you want to go in the direction of joy, there's the practice of mudita—altruistic joy. It's just beautiful that we have all these possibilities to bring out the most beautiful human qualities to whatever degree we want to develop them.

That's what we're doing here. We're actually developing all these qualities together. But if you like, at any point in your practice, you could pick one or two and go down that route for a while. The potential is unlimited.

I don't want to talk much more about wholesome states now, just to say two things. One, notice them. Be mindful. Two, don't cling. We'll talk more later.

But I really want to talk tonight about the difficult states of mind, and there are two things we need to do here. One is to shift our attitude. Instead of resisting them, we need to become much more open and allowing. This means on a moment-to-moment basis. It's not that we decide tonight, "Oh, I'm going to be open to these things." We need to move in that direction every time they come. This is something we need to keep learning and doing.

Sometimes a difficult state comes and we have a judgment: "Oh, this shouldn't be happening." But it is happening, right? Someone commented that if we fight with reality, reality is going to win. This is reality. So we need to open to it, allow it to be the way it is. A shift in attitude.

The second is greater understanding. We need to understand the mechanism of these difficult emotions. We also need to understand their nature—their basic nature, which is that like all conditioned things, they're impermanent, they're unsatisfactory, and they're not me or mine. They're impersonal. We all have all these states because they're part of the human package. So why claim them as I or mine?

Third, we need to cultivate acceptance. It's all of ours—this is part of being human. We learn not to take it so personally. As we see the impermanence, we understand that we don't have to make these difficult emotions go away. They're going to go away by themselves. But there's one way you can make them stay: resist them. If we resist or suppress, we just push them lower, and then they can hang around for a long time. But if you open and let these states come, they will arise and they will also pass away, because their nature is impermanent.

So this is what we have to do in practice. We have to accept, and we have to observe to learn what these emotions are like. The first step is knowing what we're feeling when we're feeling it. You can't sort of think through these things before they arrive. "Oh, let's see, I think tonight I'll work out fear." It doesn't happen like that. You've got to work with fear when fear is present. You've got to relate to it in real time.

So the first step is to know what we're feeling, and this isn't learned in our culture. Jill mentioned this morning—wouldn't it be wonderful if kids were taught to know what they're feeling?

We have a friend who's a Sangha member in California, a longtime meditator and very devoted practitioner who ran a preschool. This meant kids who were before kindergarten—three to five-year-olds. She ran that preschool along Buddhist lines, basically because she wanted to teach kids meditation. She had a long waiting list, but one of the requirements to get in was that the parents also had to meditate. She didn't want to just train the kids to be smarter than the grown-ups; she wanted the grown-ups to be along for the ride and support the kids in meditating.

So she had these three-, four-, and five-year-olds, and she was teaching them to meditate. Now, if you've worked with children this age, you know you don't just say, "Sit still and watch your breath." That doesn't work—they'll be bouncing all over. So she got very creative.

First, she would teach them yoga. They liked that—moving their bodies around, stretching, rolling around on the floor. After she got them good and limbered up through the yoga, she'd have them lie down on their backs on the floor where they'd just been practicing. They were relaxed by then. Then she'd lead them into a visualization.

The visualization was this: "You're a big lake. Feel how big your lake is. It stretches all around you. And you are the water. Now in this water, there are many different fishes swimming. I want you to notice all the fishes that are swimming through your lake." Of course, water is an ancient symbol for consciousness, and the kids relate on that symbolic level.

"Notice all the fishes that are swimming through your lake and just let them swim. There's a happy fish, there's a sad fish, there's a mad fish, there's a kind fish, there's a lonely fish, there's a joyful fish. Just let all those fishes swim through." She'd guide them in this for several minutes at a stretch, and they had fun with it.

After one of the meditations, she asked them, "How was that?" A five-year-old boy said, "That was great. You know, I could let all the fishes swim through, except I couldn't let the mad fish swim through."

"Well, why not? Why couldn't you let the mad fish swim?" she asked.

He replied, "Well, when you don't know you're the water, the mad fish makes you do things that hurt people."

Five years old.

So that's wisdom. First, we have to practice knowing what we're feeling, what fishes are swimming in our water, in our awareness. This is not as easy as it might sound.

A story from my practice here. One of the three-month courses I was sitting in—I was not a new meditator. I was ten years into practice. I was sitting in this hall, and after the 8:15 sitting, I would go out and walk on the grass down below, down where some of the fruit trees have been planted since then. But there was a lot more grass back then. I would walk back and forth for the period, come back in here and sit for the next sitting, then go out and walk again. So basically every walking period, I was down walking on the grass down there.

I was about two weeks into the retreat. I'd been walking there every period for two weeks. The 8:15 sit comes to an end. I go out the back door, head for my walking space, and I'm being really mindful. I'm two weeks in. I'm being really mindful. Lifting, moving, placing. Walking slowly. Lifting, moving, placing.

I get out the door. I look down to my path. There's somebody else there. I couldn't believe it. I start going, lifting, moving, placing, and I start thinking, "What's that person doing there? Don't they know that that's my walking path and I've walked there every period for two weeks?" Lifting, moving, placing. "Did I cut in front of them in line this morning? Are they trying to play some kind of head game with me?" Lifting, moving, placing. Very present, right?

So I got down to the grassy area, and my place was taken, so I found another patch of grass to walk on, which, to my great surprise, worked just as well as my own. I started walking back and forth—lifting, moving, placing—but I was still sort of running on about this guy. And it took me thirty minutes into the walking period before I realized: I'm angry now.

While I was caught in that, while I was telling myself the story about how they were in the wrong place and it was my path and why didn't they see it—as long as I was running that story, I was totally bound up with being irritated at the person. As soon as I could recognize that I was angry, then I had a way to work. Oh, I know how to release anger. I would drop the story, feel it in my body, feel the mood of the anger, feel the sensations, and then very quickly it dissipated. But as long as I was involved in the story, it wasn't going anywhere.

This points out a few things about working with these difficult emotions. If we have a belief about the situation—like mine was, I'm right and they're wrong—it locks the emotion in. We keep telling ourselves the story, and every new sentence, like anger's like a fire, right? Every new sentence adds another log to the flame. I'm right, they're wrong—basically saying it over and over. When I could drop the story and drop those thoughts, the fire wasn't being fed anymore. And what happens when an emotion isn't being fed? It just faded away.

Basically, my attention was in the wrong place. The Buddha said this about the hindrances—it's kind of an interesting observation tucked away in one sutta. He said every hindrance is a case of unwise attention. We're putting our energy and attention in the wrong place. So where was I putting my attention? Into the person and the story. That was unwise because it just kept it going.

What happened when I turned it to the emotion of anger itself? Poof. That was wise attention.

I think Brian said this the other morning when he was talking about giving instructions for the hindrances: take the attention away from the situation that's causing the hindrance and put it on the hindrance itself. When we become mindful of the hindrance or the emotion itself, that's when there's the possibility of its releasing.

The other funny thing in this story is that I thought I was being really mindful. I was with "lift, move, place" all the way. And I was missing the most important thing that was going on, which was this emotion of anger and all the thoughts around it.

This is how hindrances happen. We feel like we're connected to the present moment, but they slip in under our radar. They get established in some viewpoint, some belief, some story. And the more we dwell on the story, the more we sustain that hindrance energy. Until at some point—I think what finally woke me up was I was getting bored with it, or it was uncomfortable or something—and then I was sort of forced to notice, oh, I'm angry.

So this is delusion. The force of delusion is we don't notice what's happening to us. And this happens a lot with emotions. We don't see clearly exactly what emotion is catching us up.

The first step, when you're starting to feel something stirring, is to name the feeling. I think Jill said this was a real education for her to note the emotions. And that's the way it felt for me too. I hadn't been taught how to recognize or name my emotions. But this practice made me do it. And so I would just keep exploring. What is that feeling that's there? Until I developed a pretty good vocabulary for the things that showed up. And then it was really helpful to know, because if we don't know what we're feeling, it's difficult to release it.

The noting is helpful because there's something that happens when we name an emotion. I think Jill mentioned the neuroscience of it. I feel a shift take place when I name an emotion. And part of what happens is there's not just the emotion, there's also the mindfulness. In the middle of an unwholesome state, we're bringing in mindfulness, which is one of the most wholesome mind states we can bring in. So we're not just with the anger. We're with the anger and mindfulness now. And mindfulness is what transforms it.

There was also a study which I think is really interesting. They took a group of people from an anger management class—people who had documented difficulty with anger—and they gave them different approaches to work with. One approach was simply asking the people every time they started to get angry to note "anger." Just to name it. Basic mindfulness practice, right? That turned out to be about as effective as any other strategy they worked with. And it showed a marked decrease in people's tendency to be angry over the course of the study. So it really does make a difference.

In these difficult states of mind, there are a few that I see again and again—in myself and in practitioners. Rather than just tell you what they are, I'm going to have you guess. I find this really curious: difficult states of mind are always connected with time. That means with past and future. I never quite realized that until I started to look at it. When we're caught in difficult emotions, we're caught in time.

Beautiful states of mind can just be totally in the present. Love is in the present. Compassion is in the present. Insight is in the present.

Peace is in the present. Concentration is in the present, and so on. But difficult states of mind are connected to time—which means past and future.

So imagine an axis running from past on your left to future on your right. That's a time axis. Then we're going to bring in another axis, which is pleasure and pain. We're going to run that from the bottom up—pain down at the bottom, pleasure at the top. Now we have four quadrants. You loved your seventh grade algebra class, didn't you? I know I did.

Let's take the quadrant over here, which is pleasurable things that are in the future. What emotion do you feel for pleasurable things that are in the future? Craving, wanting, desire. That's one of the big ones.

What about painful things that are in the future? Worry, fear. That's another of the big ones.

What about pleasant things that were in the past? But in the past means it's not coming back. Grief. You lost something. Grief or sadness. Another of the big ones.

And then painful things that were in the past—think about this especially in relation to people. Anger. Resentment. So: desire, fear, sadness, and anger. These are four of the big ones that come up often, so I want to talk about all of those. One variation on the anger one is when it's toward ourselves—it turns into self-judgment.

In working with all of them, what we want to do is notice three aspects. First, feel it in the body. If it's a strong emotion, it's going to express itself somewhere in the body. By grounding the attention there, you can prolong the contact with the emotion.

Second thing to look at is the flavor of that emotion. Every mood has a different flavor in the mind. Happiness feels different than regret. Shame feels different than compassion. Get familiar with how it tastes—how the emotion tastes. It's a mental kind of flavor.

And the third is these difficult emotions do have some kind of underlying belief or story, like "I was right and they were wrong." Look for the belief. The belief props up the emotion. It sustains it. It feeds it. It keeps it going.

So look at these three areas, and we'll go through them with examples.

Desire is something that wants a pleasant experience to happen sometime in the future. This can come up a lot on retreat. You're here, but what you really want is to be at home or be with friends or to have a nice meal somewhere or go out to a party. These things pop up and can take our attention away.

Looking at the nature of desire, what we see is that the object that's coming up is to some degree comforting. We remember, oh, there's pleasure in life.

And when we're in a difficult space in retreat, that's kind of appealing. "Oh, there is pleasure." But it's mixed because we don't have it now. So with desire, there's always this gap between the pleasure that could be and the reality of sitting in the hall with your body aching. That contrast leaves a gap of dissatisfaction. Desire always brings with it some dissatisfaction. "Yeah, there's a pleasure out there, but it's not here now." So there's a frustration that's inherent in wanting.

You can tune into that. You can feel it. You notice that you never want what you already have? Do you sit there wanting a hand at the end of your arm? No. We want what we don't have. And that's why it's frustrating.

I was teaching in Italy one time a number of years ago. It was so much fun working with Italian yogis, because as you might imagine, I found them to be very fluent with their emotions. They knew their emotions well, and they were open in talking about them. It's a lot of fun to work with them.

There was this one young man who came in for an interview a few days into the retreat, and I said, "How's it going for you?" He said, "I don't want to be here." I've heard that before. But I said, "Why did you come?" He said, "Well, this is August. It's our holiday month. We had free time. A bunch of my friends were going to the Caribbean, and they invited me to go. I thought, oh, beautiful blue waters and swimming—that would really be a lot of fun to go there." I said, "Why didn't you go there?" He said, "There were no more tickets left. So I came on this retreat."

I can understand why he was having a little trouble adjusting. So I just suggested to him that he wasn't unhappy with the retreat itself. Maybe he was unhappy because he wanted the Caribbean. And that if he didn't want the Caribbean all the time, maybe he'd be happy in the retreat. I said, "Take a look at that. Maybe that's a possibility. Maybe it's the wanting that's making your time here so miserable."

So he went away, meditated some more, came back in a couple of days. He said, "I think you're right. It was the wanting that was stirring me up. When I let go of the Caribbean, the retreat was fine. I'm totally settled in. I'm good with it."

Desire has this quality—it creates dissatisfaction for us when there doesn't need to be. On retreat, that feeling of gap may come about daily life as you settle into the retreat. It comes more and more about retreat experience, so that what we're wanting is the meditation we had two days ago, or in the last retreat. We want a special experience, or we want that state of calm or stillness or peace or bliss or love or whatever.

Start to notice when the desire is coming in. Investigate that inherent quality of dissatisfaction that is with it—sometimes mild, sometimes big, depending on what is wanted. And in relation to meditation experience, see where your thoughts have been going. Sometimes it's the thoughts that will tell you what the desire is for.

It's easier to let go if you can see, oh, it's for that same experience I had two days ago—that experience of being really settled, open. It becomes a little easier to release.

I sometimes recognize that desire is happening in meditation by noticing myself sort of leaning forward with tension in the body, like I'm trying to reach out for the next moment to be different. So tune into that tension. See if you can understand what it's about. And if possible, let go.

The next area I want to explore is anger, though the broader category is aversion, which manifests in many different flavors: ill will, anger, blame, hatred, impatience, irritation, resentment, despair, resistance. There are many variations of this fundamental quality.

How does it feel in the mind when aversion is present? Start to tune into this. Often there's a burning quality. With anger in particular—speaking of anger as one form of aversion—I feel it intensely around my shoulders, neck, and head. Energy seems to rise up and become constricted there, creating a burning, intense, hot quality that comes with the anger.

Feel it in the body: contraction, tightness, burning, energized sensations—these are the bodily manifestations of anger. The mood also carries that burning quality, and the thoughts usually follow the pattern of "I'm right and they're wrong." Get familiar with this—this is what constitutes anger. This is what's actually present.

As we continue the mental narrative of "they're wrong and I'm right," we add more fuel to the flames. You can feel how that fire keeps burning the more we think about it. Don't force yourself to change it at this point, but become intimate with it. This is the mechanism of anger, and we want to truly understand it before we try to eliminate it—understanding how it gets created, how it gets fed, how it gets prolonged, and the beliefs that underlie it.

One of the tricky aspects of anger is that when we say "I'm right and you're wrong," that may actually be true. We might be perceiving clearly someone's unskillful actions. But if we keep running that thought repeatedly with indignation, we continue adding fuel to the fire. How does that feel? Not so good.

I was doing a metta retreat here one year—a long six-week period of loving-kindness practice. I was deeply engaged with the practice and really connecting with the metta, experiencing those beneficial feelings. It happened that my difficult person was also on the retreat—someone I'd known for several years, and the previous year had been especially challenging.

They were on the retreat, and every time we'd cross paths, I'd begin thinking about what they had done, how they had acted, how they had spoken to me. The anger would start arising, building, intensifying. I would spin out for thirty minutes at a time. Not only would I lose my metta phrases—I would completely lose the metta feeling altogether.

Finally, I began to realize how painful this was. It was truly painful to keep entering this anger repeatedly. To tell you the truth, what made me let go—let go of the memories and the blame and all that was stoking the fire—was recognizing how much pain it caused me.

This is why it's so helpful to let yourself feel the fullness of anger when it's present, and to feel the pain of it. Even if I was right—and in some ways I still think I was—it didn't benefit me to keep rehearsing it. It only created more suffering.

So that's what enabled me to release it. It's possible to recognize that someone acted unskillfully without burning ourselves up in the process.

In the Buddhist tradition, it's said that when we're angry at somebody, it's like wanting to pick up a hot coal to throw at them. But first we pick it up, and it burns us. Another way anger is described: we drink poison and hope somebody else gets sick. It doesn't work.

There's another dimension to working with anger. The Dalai Lama used to meet with refugees who had escaped Tibet. After the occupation, when he fled in 1959, whenever someone managed to escape and reach India, if they came to Dharamsala, he would meet with them.

He would hear their stories and difficulties, often breaking down in tears upon hearing their accounts. One year, a monk came whom he had known when he was still in Tibet. The Dalai Lama had left in 1959, and it turned out this monk had been imprisoned for twenty years. His crime was being a monk, being a Buddhist monk. Many Buddhist monks and nuns were imprisoned for that crime.

When he came over and met with the Dalai Lama, he said that when he was in prison, he felt that he was in danger. The Dalai Lama said, "Were you in danger of being tortured? I could really understand that."

And he said, "No, I was tortured. I was in danger of becoming angry, but I didn't."

The Dalai Lama said he had to reevaluate his opinion of that monk. He was a much more developed practitioner than he had remembered or imagined.

This sort of practice is possible with the difficult emotions. It's not a beginning practice—that's really advanced practice—but it shows a human possibility that we all have.

So in relating to anger, can we get to the point of just feeling the feeling and not continuing to tell the story? Feel it in the body, feel the flavor in the mind. If we can do that, that's what sets the condition for the emotion to show its impermanence, to decay, because it's not being whipped up further.

A variation on anger is when it's directed toward ourselves—self-judgment, where we feel we're not good enough. Either we've made mistakes or we've failed to meet people's expectations. We've gotten the message that we're not good enough or smart enough or good-looking enough or something. Sometimes these messages have come from parents, sometimes from teachers, sometimes from siblings or peers. But we take it in and we take it to heart.

The other thing that can happen is if you're part of a group that's been marginalized in society, you may have gotten the message from very early on in your life that you're not as good as everybody else—that you are, in effect, a second-rate person. This leaves an imprint because people in these marginalized groups are often getting this message from the early days of childhood, at least by early adolescence.

It could be from racism, homophobia, or gender discrimination. The message goes out that if you're not conforming to the cultural ideal or the norm in the dominant culture, then you're not as valuable as those people. This message can be overt, like direct racism, or it can be more subtle—implicit bias communicates the same message. If it goes in at an early age, it can go in deeply.

So one can grow up with this kind of internalized sense of being second-rate or second-class. It's very painful. When people come into meditation, that which has been carried maybe a little subconsciously can really start to come to the surface. Same thing if the message has come from parents or teachers or other sources—you may have been taught that you're not good enough in these different ways. As you sit in meditation, this sense of not being enough starts to come through.

Whether it's come from a societal message directed to a marginalized group, or whether it's come as an individual message to you from people around you, this is something that comes up often in retreat. Many, many people feel it.

The Dalai Lama used to meet with groups of Western dharma teachers in Dharamsala. He'd invite about twenty Western dharma teachers over at a time. I never got to go, but I know a bunch of people who did. He would discuss with them over a couple of days issues that they found were important coming up in their teaching.

One year they asked him how to work with this feeling—let's call it lack of self-worth or sense of worthlessness or inferiority. He didn't understand what they were asking about. He didn't have any experience of it. He didn't know about it in Tibetan culture, because children there, apparently, are loved from very early on. Children are really dearly prized in Tibetan culture and get such an outpouring of love from the extended family that they grow up feeling valued and worthwhile. The Dalai Lama could not understand what this feeling was about.

And so he went around to all the teachers and asked, "Have you felt this before?" Yes. "Have you felt this?" Yes. Virtually every teacher there said they had experienced this kind of lack of self-worth in their upbringing and had to work with it in their dharma practice. He was shocked.

The first thing we must do is recognize this pattern, because if we don't, it operates subconsciously. It's not something that stands out as strongly as anger or fear—it's more subtle and underlying. As it arises, we need to appreciate how it makes us feel. We can experience it as a bodily sensation once we learn to touch into it.

I remember going through a period of working with this feeling. It was like carrying a weight on my shoulders that I had to support because I wasn't good enough to relax. I had to hold up this burden. We can work through this considerably—it's one of the things that can truly lift through sustained meditation.

One of the most effective tools for working with self-doubt is loving-kindness practice. We need this partly for ourselves, to soften our attitude and acceptance of ourselves, but also toward people we genuinely like and care about, because that brings the metta out more clearly and strongly. When metta starts to come alive in our hearts—genuine metta awakening in our hearts—we truly know the inner quality of goodness. Then we trust ourselves. There's not much better than metta in the human experience. When we feel that within ourselves, we really trust in our own goodness. We trust that we're capable and equal.

To illustrate how widespread this struggle is, I recently finished reading Michelle Obama's memoir, Becoming. It's a beautiful book where she speaks very honestly about her trials and learning in this area. She was a young Black girl in a not particularly prosperous section of Chicago, receiving all the messages from television, newspapers, and movies that she wasn't in the privileged class, the favored class, the dominant class. So with everything she undertook, she carried this deep inner self-doubt: Am I going to be good enough? Am I going to be smart enough?

Fortunately, she had loving parents—I think that was enormously helpful. She just kept moving forward. She managed to get accepted into one of the best high schools in Chicago, went from there to Princeton where her brother had gone on a basketball scholarship, was admitted to Harvard Law, and then joined a prestigious law firm in Chicago, where she met Barack. Then things really changed. But at every step of the way, she had to keep answering this question: Am I good enough? Am I smart enough? She kept meeting it, facing it, and growing, becoming the amazing person we witnessed her become before our eyes.

Another difficult emotion for us to work with is sadness. This one is particularly challenging because often sadness or grief can feel overwhelming. There's sometimes a worry: "If I open to this, I'm going to drown in it. It's going to take me over and I'll never be able to get out." It feels so vast that we don't feel capable of opening to it.

With emotions of this magnitude, you may need to take it one step at a time. Go into it partway, come back out, re-center through nature, meditation, finding your anchor, creating spaciousness, walking—whatever works—and then go back in a little further. But this idea that overwhelming grief will consume us forever simply isn't true in my experience with meditators.

I had the privilege of observing one such process—a parent in California who lost a child to suicide. I believe that's one of the greatest losses a human being can experience in this life. She came to meditation and retreats partly to heal from that depth of grief. Watching her year after year as she kept returning to retreats, hearing her reports of what was happening for her—it was remarkable to witness that over a period of years, she emerged from that grief.

That grief really healed for her. And now she's leading a support group for other parents who have lost children through suicide because she knows firsthand that healing is really possible. She's become a wonderful source of support for others. This transformation came through her willingness to go step by step through that level of grieving and sadness, meeting it with mindfulness and compassion.

The last difficult emotion I want to explore is fear. This is my personal favorite because it's one I worked with extensively in the early years of practice, becoming quite familiar with its nuances and challenges.

One pattern I noticed with fear was that when it arose, I would get scared of the fear itself. Fear would appear, and immediately I'd think, "I don't want this. That's too scary to investigate." Fear can be among the most unpleasant emotions we experience. I had to examine this fear of fear, this secondary layer of aversion.

The underlying story for me was something like: "This present moment is bearable—just barely, but it's manageable. But in the next moment, something truly disastrous will happen, and that won't be bearable at all." This anticipatory dread was what fueled my fear of fear.

Eventually I questioned this assumption. My teachers kept encouraging me to open to whatever arose and simply feel it. Little by little, I began to trust their guidance and experiment with this approach.

The doorway in for me was through bodily awareness. My teachers gave me the same instructions I've been sharing: Feel the physical sensations first, then explore the emotional flavor in the mind. Notice the mental story, then let it go.

My recurring story was always "the next moment is going to be unbearable." I practiced releasing this narrative and returning to direct experience. When I tuned into the sensations of fear, I found my stomach clenched, a fluttery energy rising through my abdomen, and an overall sense of feeling light and ungrounded. The fear was intense and genuinely unpleasant.

But then I began asking myself a crucial question: "Can I bear these sensations in this present moment, right now?" And I discovered I could. This realization opened a significant door. I found I could actually tolerate the experience of fear. It wasn't pleasant—I wasn't rolling out the welcome mat—but I could bear it.

As I continued opening to the sensations and moved deeper, I wondered, "What is this emotion really like? What's the bare mental nature of fear?" This investigation proved quite tricky. Fear is particularly challenging because its very nature involves moving away. Fear says, "Get me away from this—it's too dangerous." So attempting to move closer to the raw emotion of fear goes directly against fear's fundamental impulse.

The closer I got, the more strongly it protested: "Don't get close to me. It's not safe here." Fear kept trying to push me away from itself. But gradually I was able to get closer and open to the bare experience of the emotion.

Then one of my teachers offered a profound challenge: "You know, if you really accept something completely, you're willing to say it could be with you for the rest of your life, and you wouldn't mind." So I asked myself honestly: "Could I be with fear for the rest of my life?"

The answer came back with startling clarity: "No way. I can't do that. I'm not ready for that level of acceptance."

If I was with fear for the rest of my life, I wouldn't enjoy anything again. I wouldn't enjoy music or a sunset or anything. So I said, no, I can't do that.

But then I started to see, if I was holding myself back from fear, I was still creating this distance. And that was going to make the fear hang around, still stir me up. So I said, okay, I could either be agitated the rest of my life, or I could take a risk and maybe find some peace. So I went for peace.

I said, "Okay, fear. If you want to stay around the rest of my life, it's okay." And I really meant it. I really meant it. When I made that move, and I really meant it, something broke in the fear. It lost some kind of hold that it had had over me. It's kind of like its spine cracked a little bit.

I went through a phase in my practice where fear was coming and going, and I really didn't care. I didn't care if it went, I didn't care if it stayed, didn't care if it arose, didn't care if it passed away. And for me, that was the turning point in relating to it.

Fear can still arise for me. Sometimes I have to remind myself, it's okay. It's really an old acquaintance, an old friend. But it really is okay with me now.

I was interested to read this account from Ajaan Liem, a Thai teacher who was a disciple of Ajahn Chah. When Ajahn Chah died, he named Ajahn Liem as his successor. So Ajahn Liem is now the abbot of Ajahn Chah's old monastery, Wat Ba Pong in northeast Thailand. Ajahn Liem apparently is also an arahant, a fully awakened being. There's a beautiful biography with some autobiography and reflections, and he recounts his awakening. It's inspiring. Maybe we'll talk about that later. But he's a very special being, for sure.

At some point, he was in conversation with another abbot. The abbot asked him, as one practitioner might to another, "What was the hardest thing in your practice?" Ajahn Liem said, "I would have to say that fear was the hardest thing for me." Then he paused. He said, "But just to say that it was hard isn't quite right. I would have to say that it was a worthy opponent. Working with it brought about the growth of a lot of wisdom."

That's what I would say about my working with fear also. I had to go really deep in order to accept fear just the way it was and to open to it that completely. I had to find a kind of strength and courage and wisdom I didn't even know I was capable of. But once I found that understanding and that strength, I felt I could work with any emotion.

So the learning wasn't just about fear. It was about any emotion that might come. I found out I could be with it. What looks like a disaster in your practice may turn out to be your lifeboat. It may turn out to be the thing that really fuels your liberation and your awakening and your growth in the Dhamma. So don't mind it. Don't mind it. We all have this potential of tremendous growth through really opening to these challenging areas.

In the beginning you think, "Well, I'm going to wake up by getting rid of confusion." There's confusion on the one hand, which is our agitated state of mind, and there's awakening, which is wise, peaceful, and compassionate. You might think, "When I get rid of this stuff, then I'll be over here in awakening."

But what has to happen is we have to wake up in the middle of our difficulties. We have to bring the awakened mind or discover the awakened mind in the middle of confusion. It's not get rid of confusion first, then awakened mind shows up. It's find awakened mind in the middle of confusion. This is possible. This is what we're practicing for.

So I want to close with a quotation—a poem from Rilke, the German poet Rainer Maria Rilke, from a little book called The Book of Hours. He wrote this when he was in his twenties, some of his most accessible poetry. He was traveling around, mostly Germany but I think other parts of Europe as well, visiting churches and becoming very inspired and spiritual.

This poem is called "God Speaks to Each of Us."

God speaks to each of us as he makes us,
then walks with us silently out of the night.
These are the words we dimly hear:
You, sent out beyond your memory,
go to the limits of your longing.
Embody me.
Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in.
Let everything happen to you:
beauty and terror.
Just keep going.
No feeling is final.
Don't let yourself lose me.
Nearby is the country they call life.
You will know it by its seriousness.
Give me your hand.

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me.

CHAPTER 68

Morning Instructions: Choiceless Attention

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this morning instruction session, Guy Armstrong introduces choiceless attention meditation, a practice descended from the teachings of the great Burmese meditation master Mahāsi Sayādaw. This technique represents the culmination of progressive mindfulness training, where practitioners release their reliance on anchor objects (breath, body, sounds) and instead follow wherever attention naturally lands moment by moment.
>
> Armstrong explains that choiceless attention involves the Pali concept of manasikāra (attention) roaming freely among the six sense doors, while maintaining continuous mindfulness of whatever predominates in each new moment. He suggests optional soft mental noting to support present-moment awareness as attention moves between breath, sensations, sounds, emotions, thoughts, feeling tone, and intentions. The practice requires fresh alertness to avoid drifting into unconscious thinking.
>
> The talk also addresses practical questions about emotional states in meditation, distinguishing between guilt and wholesome remorse, and clarifying how maintaining wholesome states differs from clinging when motivated by wisdom rather than craving. Armstrong emphasizes that no single technique is superior - the best practice is whatever keeps one most harmoniously present and increases wholesome states of mind in any given moment.

This morning, for the instructions, I'd like to invoke the spirit of Mahasi Sayadaw. He was a great Burmese meditation teacher, possibly the greatest meditation teacher of the 20th century. The instructions that we've been giving are really descended from his instructions.

We've been unfolding experience gradually, starting with breath, sounds, sensations, in eating meditation, tastes and smells, emotions, thoughts, feeling tone, intentions. At this point, we hope we have covered essentially everything that will arise in your sitting meditation experience. I can't remember if we've done formal instructions for seeing, but I know that it's been mentioned.

Up to this point, we've given instructions how to be mindful with anything that arises within your experience. Today, with the blessing of Mahasi Sayadaw, we're going to combine all that in a new technique that's the logical outcome of where we've been going, called choiceless attention. I think this was his genius, and I love to reflect on his offering to the world. He founded many meditation centers in Asia, and our instructions are a direct descent from him. I'd like to invoke his spirit, but because he was an Arahant and he's now dead, there may not be any spirit to invoke. Nonetheless, it's a great blessing to have his transmission.

The instructions today are going to shift our relationship to the anchor a bit. So far, in the beginning, you'll remember we asked you to choose an anchor. Let's just take the breath as an example. For some it was body, for some it was sounds. Let's just take the breath. We gave the instruction, stay with the anchor. Anytime thoughts carry you away, return to the anchor. So here we have almost an exclusive focus on the breath as the basis for mindfulness.

Then we started to open up the instructions to include sensations, sounds, emotions, thoughts, et cetera. There we said, stay with your anchor as your home, your meditative home. But if anything came along that drew your attention away from that, go to that new experience, make that the focus for mindfulness. When that passes, you can come back to your anchor of the breath. You'll notice in this, there's not an exclusive focus on the breath, but there's still a preferred focus on the breath. It's where you go when nothing else is predominant.

Today, we're going to take away even that preference. In choiceless attention we take the breath just like any other object and we don't have any particular fondness for it over anything else that's happening. In choiceless attention we really unhook the attention from the anchor and let it go.

To explain this practice, I want to first say what attention means when we talk about attention. Attention is a formal term in our tradition. It's the translation of a term that's central in the Buddha's teachings in the Pali Canon. That Pali term is manasikara. We translate it by attention. I think it's a good translation.

In the context of meditation and life, attention is the faculty of mind that singles out one element from all your present moment experience and settles on that, however briefly. For instance, in this moment, there are a lot of things going on. There are sensations in your body, there's your breathing going in and out, there's the sound of my voice, there's the temperature of the air, there's the visual field if your eyes are open, sounds coming and going, thoughts coming and going, and some mood is present. Out of all those things, what are you noticing in this moment?

The interesting thing about attention is that it can be directed. If I tell you, direct your attention to the touch of your hands and keep it there, you can do that, at least for a few moments. But what if I say, don't direct your attention at all? Let the attention be undirected. Where does it go?

If you take a look, you'll probably notice that it's rotating among the different objects in your experience. Sometimes with sensations, sometimes with a thought, sometimes with a mood, sometimes with a breath. If you just let your attention go, it will go. It's always on something until you fall asleep. But as long as you're awake, it's always on something. There's some contact at one of the six sense doors where attention is landing.

In the practice of choiceless attention, we're going to un-anchor the attention from the breath, body, sounds. We're just going to let it go. We are not going to consciously direct it. We're just going to sit in an open and relaxed way and notice in each new moment where it lands. It'll land on some part of your experience and in that moment make that experience the focus for mindfulness. You've learned how to be mindful of anything that arises. We're now asking you to do that in real time.

We could call this the predominant experience in this moment, or simply say where attention is naturally drawn in this new moment. Sometimes it will land on your anchor, but you're not placing it there. You're letting the attention roam freely, but your job is to notice where it lands and be mindful there.

This takes a really fresh, awake quality of mind to keep up with this. Because we're open to anything and we don't have an anchor, it's quite easy for the attention to drift into thoughts and we don't know that it's drifted into thoughts. You know how when you use an anchor like the breath, it's really clear when you're with it and when you're not. In choiceless attention it's not so clear.

It can be helpful to combine choiceless attention with soft mental noting. This is an option, not a requirement. The main thing is, in each new moment, you're noticing where the attention has landed and connecting with mindfulness. But to support that, it can be really helpful to keep up steady, soft mental noting that just names where the attention is and what you're mindful of.

As an example, as I'm sitting here, I might notice: in, touching, hearing, calm, out, thinking, pressure, sound.

So if you'd like to play with this noting, I'd say try to keep it steady and don't force yourself to make a note very rapidly. Every couple seconds, every two or three seconds, notice where the attention is now. If there's a strong experience, the attention might stay there for a while. If there's a pain in the knee, you might be noticing painful, painful, painful for a while. And that's okay. But you're not trying to keep it there. Sometimes attention will stay there on its own.

So you're not making an effort to direct it, but you are making the effort to stay mindful in the present moment of whatever your experience is.

The first way to describe this choiceless attention is you're unhooking the attention and you're noticing where it's landed. You might say that's the kind of technical description. In this, we're not choosing the focus for attention, so it's called choiceless attention. Some people call this practice choiceless awareness, but that term was coined by Krishnamurti, and he really uses it to point to a mind that's free of greed, aversion, delusion. So I think the more accurate term is choiceless attention. We're not choosing a focus for attention. So that's what we will call it here.

The informal description is you take a look and you ask, "What's happening now?" Oh, I'm feeling sensation at a touch point. There's hearing. There's thinking. There's an in-breath. So the other way to describe this practice is it answers the question, "What's happening now?" And you keep answering it in each new moment.

This is the outline, the background to the instructions. It's a very powerful practice because we're not directing. We don't have an outcome in mind, but we're open to everything. So in this approach, there can be a good deal of relaxation and a very open mind. You might even get a sense of the width of your experience in this moment. How wide are sounds? How wide is the silence? How big is your body? So you can let your overall awareness be big enough to accommodate all that and notice where the attention is going.

So that's the background and let's move into formal meditation now.

Please sit comfortably. Feeling uprightness in your posture and also a sense of ease, of relaxing, dropping into your sitting base. Let the awareness settle throughout the body.

Get in touch with your anchor—body, breath, sounds. And settle there for a few moments. Here you're choosing to direct your attention. Very helpful for stabilizing.

And now deliberately take your attention off the anchor and let it move freely. And notice where it lands in each new moment.

Sitting.

Pressure.

Breathing out, hearing, interest, breathing in.

If you find it helpful, try making a soft mental note every few seconds about where the attention is landing now, covering the whole range: breath, sound, sensations, emotions, thoughts, feeling tone, intention. See if by making a soft mental note every two or three seconds, this becomes a support for you to stay connected to the present moment.

If you're using the mental noting, keep it very soft, like a whisper in the mind. Keep about ninety percent of your focus on the experience itself, and just ten percent on the soft note. To do that, you may need to find the volume knob on the noting and turn it down.

Any time you lose touch with the present and you realize you've been lost in thought for a while, that's fine—of course it will happen. Just notice that the thinking is present, appreciate the spontaneous return to the moment, and begin again the noticing of the present moment experience, whatever it is. Use the notes if you find them helpful.

Remember that the key thing is the noticing, the clear noticing in each moment. The note just serves as a support for that. What's happening now? What experience is your attention with in this new moment? At any of the sense doors? Can you be mindful of that?

So this is the introduction to the practice of choiceless attention. Feel free to bring it in as an approach whenever you feel like it at this point in the retreat.

Sometimes when one starts to appreciate the power of this approach—and it's kind of the last instruction we give after giving a bunch of instructions leading up—there's a tendency to think, "Wow, that's the best meditation. It's so elegant, right? Just be mindful of whatever arises." And yet there's a rigor to it. In every moment. Don't space out. In every moment be mindful of whatever arises. So it's elegant, it's cool, it's profound, and all of that. It doesn't mean it's a superior practice. It doesn't mean it's the best practice.

What's the best practice changes for you depending on the state of mind and body. The best practice may be changing throughout the day. Sometimes it may be choiceless attention. Sometimes it may be returning to your anchor. Sometimes it may be staying with an emotion as it's expressing through the body for an extended period of time—for a sitting, a walking, half a day. The best practice is what keeps you best in touch with the present moment in the most harmonious and suitable way possible. The best practice for you at any given time is what's going to increase the wholesome states of mind the most.

So sometimes it could be returning to your anchor. For instance, one of the downsides in choiceless attention, especially if you're not using noting, is it's quite easy to go off into thought and not really notice that you're going off into thought. Attention's so open, whatever happens is fine. Zip. Gone. Gone.

So if you find yourself in choiceless attention with a lot of thinking coming up that's not being noticed—a tendency to drift off a lot—then the best practice at that point would be to come back and anchor again in the present moment in something simpler. It could be breath, could be body, could be sounds, but something where you have a clearly defined relationship and then you know when you're away.

At other times, if you feel really settled and the mind's balanced and you feel open and fairly settled in the present moment, that's a good time to try opening up to this choiceless field—letting the attention go where it will, knowing what's happening. If there's some meditative stability underneath it, then the conditions are good for practicing choiceless attention.

So it's not that any one practice is the best. The best changes—see what suits you at any given point in time.

In practicing choiceless attention, one of the other things that people run into is it's so open. And there are so many possible places to develop mindfulness. Sometimes the openness of it gets overwhelming, and confusion comes up and uncertainty and doubt: "What should I be attending to?" If that starts to happen, just come back to your anchor. That's the beauty of having developed this meditative home.

So it's always available when we feel we need some stability. If you're feeling any kind of confusion or uncertainty, just come back and stabilize with the anchor. When you feel settled again, you can try opening up once more.

We had quite a few questions today—actually, a lot of questions. The talks must have been interesting the last few nights. We only have time for a couple.

Here's one that comes up often around the topic of emotions: "If I'm not experiencing any strong emotions, does it necessarily mean I'm suppressing something or avoiding a feeling?"

Not at all. Each of us will go through cycles in regard to emotions. There will be times when emotions are really up and expressing and very vocal. There will be other times when emotions naturally are quiet and even silent. This doesn't mean there's any suppression going on. Emotions have a natural flow—they arise and they pass away, even strong ones. So don't worry about that.

The other thing is there are really different personalities among us as meditators. Some personalities tend toward the emotional. I've been in cultures that tended toward the emotional. I've been in cultures that tended toward not being very emotional. We're all representative of our cultural background. So sometimes there's not a lot going on emotionally, and the Buddha actually said some fairly positive things about the experience of peace. That's considered a good development in meditation.

If peace, calm, balance, or equanimity are the mood of the moment, for instance, you're in line with some of the Buddha's teachings. So notice that. Don't think that states of mind have to be loud or dramatic. Some of the greatest meditative states of mind are subtle and peaceful.

Sometimes you go, "Oh, there's nothing going on in the emotions. Nothing's happening. I don't have any state of mind." Check and see if there's calm. Calm is one of the factors of awakening, so it's a very wholesome state.

Another question related to emotions: "Does the Buddha mention guilt? I haven't heard that described yet."

Yes and no. The word the Buddha used, translated into English in this direction, is remorse. Remorse is considered basically a wholesome emotion.

What happens in long retreat, as we're sitting in the quiet and there's not much happening, is things that have been percolating underneath maybe for years have the space to come up and be felt—to be seen through thoughts and to be felt through emotions. Especially on long retreats, there's time for a lot of unprocessed old experience to come up and be noticed.

When I first did a long retreat, my mind just called up all these memories where I had caused harm to people and to creatures. They weighed on me a lot because at that point I'd understood the precepts. Nobody told me about the precepts when I was growing up. I mean, there were the commandments, but they were a different tone. So nobody really told me the value of the precepts.

Through my childhood and teen years, I did unskillful things. These memories came up—like something mean that I did to a fellow student in second grade, going hunting with my father. Fortunately, I was a bad shot, so I let most of those animals off the hook, but I was trying, you know? They were very burdensome to me, and I had to live with the pain of that regret quite a few days as I was coming to terms with these things. So that often happens.

The other thing that can happen is we remember ways we've been hurt.

But the remorse and guilt are around things that we've done personally.

So it's a natural part of meditation that some of these memories may come for you. And in another couple of weeks we're going to be talking explicitly about how to work with them with the quality of forgiveness. Because forgiveness needs to be extended to ourselves as much as to anyone. So we'll talk about that in a couple more weeks.

But right now I want to distinguish between the way I understand the words guilt and remorse.

In guilt, we think about something unskillful that we've done. We see the harm that it's had on other people, other creatures, and we feel genuine regret for that. But we can take it a step further and then really blame ourselves for those actions. We can get into a lot of negative self-judgment around that: "Gosh, I'm such a bad person. I have a really mean streak in my character continuing to today. I'm never going to be able to live harmoniously with people." All that extra conceptual thought is unnecessary, and that's really a lot of the pain in bringing these memories to light. We don't need to do that. The judging thoughts are extra and not necessary.

What needs to be felt is that heartfelt regret, and that's what I would call remorse. We really feel the unskillfulness of the action, and we really have this sincere regret that we did those things. That's healing. When we can hold the remorse with mindfulness, like any other emotion, it has its way of coming up, being accepted, being deeply felt, and then it has its way of passing on.

So when I think back to those earlier incidents—second grade, hunting—I still feel regret about it. But I don't beat myself up, and it's not a place of suffering for me anymore. I acknowledge it, wish it hadn't happened. I'm a different person now. Wouldn't do those things now. I've borne the responsibility and come to terms with it. So that's the value of remorse.

When you can reach that kind of equanimity with things, then meditation opens up. And the Buddha said a number of times that the purpose and benefit of good conduct is lack of remorse—or I would say lack of guilt, lack of regret. The purpose of lack of remorse is gladness. Gladness means the mind can settle happily into the present moment. So we pay attention to the precepts, we act skillfully, and then we don't trouble ourselves in meditation about things that we've done wrong, and that lets the mind settle more and more. So these are really connected: the conduct, lack of remorse, gladness, and settling in meditation. This is our path.

Here's another question. Part of right effort is to maintain wholesome states that have arisen. So there are actually four right efforts. One is to guard against the arising of unwholesome states. The next is once unwholesome states have arisen, to abandon them if possible—it means don't dwell on them, let them go. And then to bring about the arising of wholesome states, and once wholesome states have arisen, to sustain them, let them be maintained.

This question is about the maintaining of a wholesome state that has arisen. The question is, how does that differ from clinging?

This is a really interesting point, and it also ties into the notion of pleasure. The difference is that we strive to maintain wholesome states of mind out of wisdom. Wisdom understands the meditation practice deepens best, heads toward insight, heads toward loving kindness, heads toward liberation, when wholesome states are in the mind. So we sustain them not because they're enjoyable or pleasurable—which they are, and that could be a motivation, but that would be clinging based on craving. We sustain them out of understanding. This is how the meditation deepens. This is the path to liberation. This is the path of benefit to myself and to other sentient beings.

So we make that choice as far as possible: keep wholesome states present, out of understanding. Sometimes craving will come in. Sometimes clinging will come in. If that happens, we see that. That happens with a contraction.

That happens with suffering when they change. If the development and maintenance of wholesome states is brought about by wisdom, there will also be wisdom when they go. And there won't be suffering when they go. There will be understanding.

"Oh, what's happening now? Let me find wisdom in this new moment. Let me relate to what's up now."

So start to look. Is there craving for wholesome states? Is there clinging? That can happen. But deepen the understanding that this is for the benefit of myself and all beings. This development of the wholesome will encourage kindness, it will encourage relaxation, and it will lead to deepening meditation, insight, and liberation.

Now, two announcements for today. Today is a day for mindful movement, so Sabra will be meeting with those who wish to join her downstairs at 2:45. She said that more blankets have arrived, so you don't need to take any props down with you. She'll have a new shipment of blankets for you to use.

The second announcement is that Annie has had to change a couple of her meeting times. So if you're on Annie's list for today, please check the notice board one more time because a couple of the times have shifted.

As you stand up, see if you can do it choicelessly. Maintain the continuity from here in a choiceless way to walking, and then be with the walking really continuously. I hope you will use this practice as a way to foster continuity of mindfulness, whatever experiences are arising for you.

Have a lovely day.

CHAPTER 69

Seven Factors of Awakening

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this retreat dharma talk, Guy Armstrong presents the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga) as taught in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10). These factors—mindfulness (sati), investigation (dhammavicaya), energy (vīriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā)—represent both the path to awakening and the qualities present just before moments of insight.
>
> Armstrong emphasizes that these are not remote experiences but accessible states that retreat participants are likely already encountering. He explains how the first four factors (mindfulness through rapture) are 'arousing factors' that bring energy, while the last three (tranquility through equanimity) are 'pacifying factors' that cultivate calm. Together, they create the balanced conditions necessary for liberation.
>
> Drawing from traditional sources and contemporary examples, including accounts from Dīpa Mā and Ajahn Liem, Armstrong demonstrates how these factors mature through practice, leading practitioners toward the 'complete destruction of suffering' that the Buddha promised. The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing and cultivating these beautiful qualities of mind in both formal meditation and daily life.

At this point in the retreat, as some of you have pointed out to us, we have not shied away from talking about the unwholesome factors of mind. Some of you may have complained a little about the emphasis here. We've talked about the hindrances, we've talked about difficult emotions, we've talked about the three roots of the unwholesome. This is really important because if we don't know how to work with these forces in our meditation, they will hinder it. They will block its development and deepening. Once we learn to work with them, the deepening can happen in relation to them. Hopefully this is what many of us have been working with during the first two weeks of the retreat.

But now we are starting to turn the page and talk about the beautiful qualities of mind. The Buddha talked about these just as often as he talked about the difficult qualities. When he talked about dukkha, he also talked about the end of dukkha. So we're going to spend considerable time moving forward talking about beautiful qualities. Jill started us the other night with her lovely talk on the four Brahmaviharas. That's one of the key lists of the beautiful factors. The Eightfold Path is a list of wholesome factors of mind. The Five Spiritual Faculties are another. Tonight I want to talk about the seven factors of awakening, sometimes also called seven factors of enlightenment.

Both terms refer to this waking up that the Buddha experienced under the Bodhi tree some 2,500 years ago. The Pali term for it is Bodhi, and it's been translated as both awakening and enlightenment. Enlightenment is sort of from a 17th century European intellectual movement, so its applicability to the Buddha's experience is questionable. I like the term awakening, but it's getting overused today—awakening through ten minutes a day or awakening through drinking tea. I'm sure there are workshops on this in California as we speak. I don't want to get over-popularized around this term, but this is the authentic use of the term. The Buddha means the one who is awake. So I'll use the term awakening and you can use it as you like.

This is a really important list for meditators. When the Buddha gave the Satipatthana discourse and he came to the fourth foundation, he only included two lists of mental factors. One was the five hindrances and the second was the seven factors of awakening. So as meditators, his instruction was really to get to know these two lists. These are the ones he considered most important for you as meditators. Obviously the Eightfold Path and the Five Spiritual Faculties and the Brahmaviharas are very important also. But in the Foundations of Mindfulness, these are the two lists the Buddha pointed to as really critical. So it's very helpful to become familiar with this list of the seven factors of awakening.

Carol said in her talk the other day that what we're doing in meditation practice is we're starving the five hindrances and we're feeding the seven factors of awakening. This is how these two lists are to be understood. We do the kinds of effort that reduce the force of the hindrances and we do the kinds of effort that promote the growth of the seven factors. This is the direct path to awakening. It's amazing that we can shape the mind in this direction. That's what our practices do.

It's also amazing to meet someone who has gone a long way down this path. So many of you know of the Indian teacher Dipa Ma. She was a really wonderful and inspiring figure, one of the most amazing minds and hearts that I've met on this journey. She taught at the three-month course one year here. We're sorry that the teaching quality has been a bit in decline since then, but we're doing the best we can. Yogis were, of course, curious about her being. Someone asked her at one point, "What's in your mind right now?" This is what one wants to know when one meets an awakened being—what's that like? What's your experience of your mind right now? She said, "There are only three things in my mind. There's peace, concentration, and loving kindness. That's it."

So that's a beautiful mind. But that's a possibility. That's a possibility for us as well. One of the things I want to emphasize about these factors of awakening is that they are not so remote for you. These are experiences that I believe each of you has already had to some degree in this retreat. I've certainly heard reports in my meetings with some of you, and I bet if you look closely at your own experience, you'll recognize these. This is the first step.

Once we recognize them, then we can start to understand how they come about, and as the Buddha said, how to bring them to fulfillment, how to grow them up. They may be kind of baby formations when we first meet them, but just like any seeds, we water them, we feed them, they grow up. These really become your best friends, along with the brahmaviharas. These two sets of states really become the beautiful qualities that accompany you and move you on your journey.

The Buddha put it this way: "Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future, will do so by overcoming the five hindrances that weaken wisdom, by firmly establishing their minds in the four foundations of mindfulness, and by correctly developing the seven factors of awakening." This is a direct quote from the Buddha. They lead to awakening. Therefore, they're called factors of awakening—never shy of stating the obvious. This is what they're here for, to lead us to awakening. They're all described as maturing in release, which means liberation.

He put it another way: "Just as all the rafters of a peaked house incline towards the roof peak, so too when a practitioner develops and cultivates the seven factors of awakening, the practitioner inclines toward nibbana"—toward freedom, toward the unconditioned, toward release, toward awakening.

So these seven factors lead to awakening, but they also describe the mind just before a moment of awakening. They describe the preparation of the mind just prior to the awakening moment. The awakening itself doesn't come through effort, but the preparation does. So the effort goes into developing the seven factors. As they mature, you might say they converge toward the unconditioned, toward nibbana, toward release, which Annie is going to talk about in a future dharma talk. They converge to that, and when they get very close, at some point the mind can tip into that state, tip into the unconditioned.

It takes effort to develop the mind in this way, to bring these factors together. Once they are close together to the unconditioned, at some point, by a moment of grace which we can't force or predict, they can open into the moment of awakening.

These seven factors are described as sequential, meaning that each one leads to the development of the next one. So they build upon one another, but they're not quite linear in that way. Different factors may pop up at different times in your practice. It's not that you have to bring one to maturity before the next one begins. A little bit of one starts the next, starts the next, and they reinforce each other. So they're also kind of circular.

Let me describe them. You've probably heard them before, but let me review them. The first factor, no surprise, is mindfulness. It's mindfulness that begins the development of all of these. It's also mindfulness that keeps them all in balance, and we'll get later to why that's important.

The next three factors are what are called arousing factors. They bring up energy. These are investigation, energy, and rapture or joy. The last three are called pacifying factors. They bring in calm. These are tranquility, concentration, and equanimity.

When they are all brought up together and come into balance, we have the energizing factors that pick up the energy and make for brightness, alertness, and interest. And we have the pacifying factors that calm the energy, settle the mind in tranquility, bring it together, and provide that base of peace. This sounds a little bit like the instructions we give for posture, doesn't it? Bring up the energy and also relax. The seven factors work in the same way—bring up the energy and then calm.

So let's go into these one by one.

Beginning with mindfulness, we've talked a lot about mindfulness. There's not a lot more that I need to say about that. The practice you've been doing, the way you've been noticing all the different facets of your experience—this is the base of mindfulness that we want to continue to develop. Everything comes out of that. We've talked about the importance of the continuity of mindfulness. That means stringing together more and more moments of mindfulness.

And by the way, when we say continuity of mindfulness, we don't actually expect it to be continuous for you. If you've been thinking it should really be continuous because that's the instruction, let me just modify that a little bit. What we really mean by that is frequent. None of us has continuous mindfulness.

Maybe the Buddha had it. But at this point, none of us has continuous mindfulness. What we mean is keep making the effort to be mindful in as many moments as possible, in every activity through the day—from formal sitting, formal walking, to all the informal times. Make it as frequent as possible. And we know that you'll lose it at times. That's okay. That's to be expected.

As we become more mindful and connect with our experience, one of the things that happens—and Brian pointed to this a lot this morning—is we get interested. What's that experience really like when we look closer? What's really going on? This is a wholesome kind of curiosity. This is not speculative curiosity. This is curiosity directed to our immediate experience. This is what brings about the second factor, which is investigation.

Investigation means I want to know my experience even better. Mindfulness knows it—it's a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste, a sensation, a thought, an emotion, an intention, a feeling tone. But investigation wants to bring mindfulness as close as possible to that momentary experience. So this investigation—the Pali is dhamma-vicaya—is not conceptual. This is not about investigating through thinking. Sherlock Holmes did a lot of that. We don't do it that way.

We do it like you're walking down the path and you see a beautiful flower and you just want to bring your attention right up to it. Or I was riding my bike up Pleasant Street a couple of miles from here, and this large black bear wandered out from the side of the road and plopped down right in the middle of my path. My interest was right there. I didn't have to force mindfulness. I was one hundred percent present. This is what happens when interest is there with us. It naturally draws the attention, naturally draws our gaze right up to the experience. This is what we want to foster with investigation.

We've talked about this quite a lot in relation to emotions or difficult mind states. We want to really feel the experience in the body. We talked about bringing the attention into the body to explore the feeling of difficult emotions. We talked about bringing the attention close to the breath, to just feel the breath within the body as it comes and goes, being fully with sounds and so forth. So this is the kind of investigation—bring it close to the experience.

One word that's used is "rub." Rub the experience with your attention. Rub the experience with mindfulness. Be that intimate with it. There's a sense that your attention can kind of embrace the experience.

The word in Pali for wise attention, which we've talked about before, is yoniso-manasikāra. Manasikāra means attention. Yoniso is the word that's being translated as wise. If you've spent time in India, you may know that yoni refers to the female genitals and lingam refers to the male genitals. So yoni can also be translated as womb or source. Yoniso-manasikāra has this connotation of attention that's like a womb that holds, embraces, nurtures our connection to the object. That kind of warm attention that we give to our immediate experience is part of investigation.

Some ways to investigate, if you'd like to explore this a little more, with the breath: Can you feel in one in-breath the phases of beginning, middle, and end? Can you feel in one out-breath phases of beginning, middle, end? What happens after the out-breath has finished?

Is there a pause before the next in-breath begins? Can you notice the pause? Then can you stay with that sequence—beginning, middle, end of in-breath; beginning, middle, end of out-breath; and a pause if there is one—breath after breath.

In this way of investigating, we can refine our interest in what constitutes a breath and refine the mindfulness in relation through investigation.

If you're connecting with the sensation in the body, you can explore details of it. One thing I like to look at with sensation is to ask: is it solid, fixed, unchanging, or does the sensation itself exhibit change? In other words, can you notice impermanence within a single sensation? Or is it fixed and unchanging? Take a look.

As you're feeling into a sensation, look at how far it extends. Maybe there's a sensation in the shoulder. How far through the shoulder does it go? Does it go around the corner and into the upper arm? Does it extend down the back or down into the chest? Exactly where are the limits? Where is that sensation not felt at all? Where has it faded to the point it's not touching any of the surrounding body area?

Just investigating in this very experiential, simple way to see what's really there will begin to deepen the connection to the present moment.

Also, this factor of investigation is an aspect of wisdom. Interest and curiosity are wisdom openings. As we learn to investigate skillfully—which doesn't mean to think about it, but to get in and feel it and see it—we're waking up the natural intelligence in the mind. So investigation wakes up wisdom. It starts it rolling.

The other thing investigation does is it arouses energy. This leads into the third of the awakening factors, which is energy. The Pali term is viriya. Energy is just one translation for it. Sometimes it's translated as effort. Sometimes it's translated as energetic effort. That gives you the sense that viriya is not just a random collection of blood flows, but it's directed toward the effort of the path.

Some other words that are sometimes used to describe it are strength, courage, ardor, my personal favorite, enthusiasm. I've had so many practice meetings where people are describing their love for this practice and their enthusiasm for it. That is a sign of viriya.

This energy is directed toward movement of the path. The Buddha put it this way: Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the cultivation of wholesome states. And remember, the primary wholesome state that we're all engaged in developing is mindfulness itself. It starts the whole ball rolling, one of the most often mentioned wholesome states in all the Buddha's lists.

The Pali term is viriya, and this is from the word vira, which means hero. There's the same root as virile, which comes from Latin. The English word virile comes from the Latin—same root. And so there's a kind of pointing that this journey we're on is a heroic kind of journey. It's the hero's or the heroine's journey, this process of awakening. And the energy we put into it is a kind of heroic energy. That can be inspiring. Not to underestimate what you're about here. It's a big thing.

Viriya comes out of our motivation for practice. Not so much pushing ourselves as letting ourselves be inspired and wanting to understand, wanting to find out—this deep interest.

I sometimes like to think of it in comparison to athletes. It's interesting, if you look at great athletes in fields like figure skating or gymnastics, they often started when they were five years old and have worked really steadily ever since then. That's a lot of effort to get to the level of mastery that they're at.

The other sport I look at for energy is professional bike riding. I love to watch the Tour de France when it's on in the summer, and I'm a bike rider myself. So I have an amazing appreciation for what those people do. In this case it's men, but there's also a women's race and they are also amazing athletes.

So one bike rider said that every time I get on a bike in that race, I know I'm pushing my body to the limit and I'm going to experience eight hours of pain. Does this remind you of meditation practice? No, ours is sixteen hours.

But they're willing to do it. And that's just for fame and fortune. We're on a much more heroic journey.

So I went through a period when I was younger where I really explored what for me was the leading edge of this kind of heroic approach. It was a period of time when at the three-month course, the teachers were really suggesting that we work hard to minimize the number of hours we slept every night. So they put it out as a standard: it would be really good if you could get down to four hours of sleep a night.

And I thought, I've never done that. Never been able to do that in my practice. And I was younger then. I had more energy in general. But still, on retreat, I would usually go along at about six hours a night. So looking at two additional hours—not only of less sleep, but more hours of practice—that was a challenge.

So I didn't try right away, but I just tried to decrease it little by little by little. Going to bed later, getting up earlier. And I finally reached a rhythm where I could get by on four hours of sleep a night. So I would go to bed about eleven and I would get up at three, and the rest of the day was just sitting and walking and having meals and showers and work and all of that.

And then I found I could sustain that. It was very beneficial for my insight practice. I saw a lot of things I think I wouldn't have seen if I hadn't put in that level of effort. So I found out that I could do it. And I had a certain motivation because every time I came in for a practice meeting, my teachers would ask me: How many hours did you sit? How many hours did you walk? And how many hours did you sleep? So I had to keep notes and I had to report to them.

So we don't teach like this anymore, as you may have noticed. And part of it is that this kind of heroic effort isn't really for everyone. It's not suited for every temperament and everyone in every stage of their practice. It was very good for me at that time because I was young, I was highly motivated, I had the energy, my body was working. But it's not for everyone, so we don't teach it like that anymore. Though sometimes in individual interviews we might see this might benefit someone and we'll offer it, but not in general.

And so there's another way that this form of energy expresses itself that's very useful for everyone. And that is as perseverance—that's sort of the message of just keep going.

And I like this story from Milarepa. I don't know if you've heard of Milarepa before. He was a yogi in Tibet in the eleventh century, and he's regarded as one of the greatest yogis in all the history of practice in Tibet. And there have been a lot of great yogis in that history. And he's regarded as one of the greatest. He's held as a real model and was a lineage founder of one school of Tibetan Buddhism.

So he had two main disciples. One was called Gampopa and the other was called Rechungpa. And they both also wrote texts and had lots of students and helped solidify the school that Milarepa more or less began.

So at this point in time, one of the disciples, Gampopa, has been practicing with Milarepa for a while. Gampopa has listened to lots of teachings, practiced with Milarepa, gone through ups and downs as all yogis do. Finally, Milarepa thinks, okay, he's learned the basic instructions. It's time for him to go off on his own. The solitude was an important piece of the training—self-reliance at a certain point.

So Gampopa was heading down the path, sad to be leaving his teacher, but he knew it was the right time in his training. And he was heading down the path and Milarepa called him back and said, "Wait, come back. I have one more instruction for you." He said, "There is nothing more important than this pith instruction that I'm going to give you right now."

Milarepa is known in the tradition for just wearing white cotton robes. Even in the middle of Tibetan winters, he just wore white cotton robes. He was dressed in his white cotton robe and was about to give Gampopa this last pith instruction, which he said there is nothing more important. He turned his back to Gampopa and flipped up the bottom of his white cotton skirt and showed Gampopa his backside.

And he said, "You see how my buttocks are as hard as the hooves of a camel? This is my instruction to you. This has come from sitting uninterruptedly hour after hour, month after month, year after year. I want you too, Gampopa, to practice in this way. This is perseverance. Practice so that your buttocks become as hard as the hooves of a camel. This is my final instruction." And then he sent Gampopa on his way.

This understanding of virya as perseverance is profoundly helpful. It doesn't require staying up until eleven or one in the morning. It simply asks that you keep going very steadily, always coming back to mindfulness.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, a contemporary Burmese teacher, puts it beautifully: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this, you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

This we can commit ourselves to. Let me be as steadily mindful as I can. Let me not let go of that intention throughout the day. Let me practice with this kind of perseverance. This is the force of energy.

The next factor, and the last of the arousing factors, is called in English "rapture." The Pali term is pīti. Rapture is not a particularly good translation because it points to something more dramatic than pīti actually indicates. I think a better translation would be "happy interest" or sometimes "joyful attention."

It's the quality of mind that develops when you actually like your meditation focus. Whether you're being with the breath, with sounds, with body sensations, emotions, or thoughts, you're genuinely enjoying the process of connecting with that focus, with that object, with that phenomenon.

This happy interest has a deepening effect in our practice. Once we enjoy being with experience, we start to find it more appealing than being lost in thoughts or distraction. We discover a genuine pleasantness, a genuine pleasure in being in the present moment. This quality of enjoyment begins to reorient the mind because it becomes where we want to be.

Instead of dragging ourselves back to the present from fantasies or mental excursions that seem so seductive and entertaining, we actually find we prefer being present. We want to hang out more with our objects in the present moment experience.

Ajahn Brahm, a teacher in Australia, talks about discovering "the beautiful breath." This is for those practicing breath meditation. When the breath becomes beautiful to someone, attention is naturally drawn there. We want to abide with that beauty. Discovering this possibility that the breath can seem beautiful and attractive is tremendously helpful for establishing mindfulness in the moment.

Pīti, though commonly translated as rapture, is a factor of mind that often manifests in the body. The texts describe different kinds of pīti. Goosebumps might arise—this is called minor pīti. There can be momentary pīti, experienced as a rush through the body like lightning. There can be showering pīti, which appears as waves of sensation passing through the body.

Sometimes an uplifting energy comes with pīti, where you feel light even while sitting with all your weight pressing down on the cushion. Then there's all-pervading pīti, where the whole body fills with these intensified sensations born from this deepening interest.

Pīti generally has a pleasant feeling tone, but when it becomes strong, its bodily expression can be so intense that it feels unpleasant. If this happens, simply stay with the experience as much as you can. Notice that it's arising from a deepening process. Allow it to be, and gradually that unpleasant quality smooths out.

This is one of the factors connected with strong concentration, often paired with the quality of sukha, which means happiness. Together they bring a sense of contentment. This is a wonderful turning in practice, and Dawn will be exploring this more deeply in her upcoming talk.

This turning into contentment brings the next movement, which is the development of the factor of tranquility. And this is the first of the pacifying factors.

For tranquility, the Pali term is passaddhi. We could also translate it as ease, calm, serenity. Sometimes it's translated as relaxation. There's the sense that there's a kind of growing contentment that develops out of the interest being pleasurable. And instead of having to send the mind out—past and future and fantasy and imagination—instead of having to send the mind out for its fulfillment, we find a fulfillment in the here and now with our meditation.

So as that starts to happen, thoughts, discursive thoughts, distracting thoughts of past and future, just don't have as much pull as they did. So they start to calm down, quite naturally, not through any kind of forcing. They just start to calm down. And so, of course, the emotions they stir up also start to calm down.

A lot of us haven't known this experience of calm, of mental calm or tranquility much in our outside life. I hadn't before I found it in meditation. And so the experience, when we come upon it, can feel kind of new. And one meditator said that when it first started happening to them and they were using the noting practice, they noticed: "Calm. Huh? Is this what they're talking about?" Big question mark. And then as it continues or becomes more accessible, you become more confident. "Yeah, this is what they're talking about." It takes a while to get to know it.

But it's as though once we come upon it, it really feels different. And we're coming through working with the hindrances and the difficulty emotions and all of that. And it's like we've crossed this stormy ocean with all kinds of turbulent winds and pirate ships and giant squids kind of leaping out of the waters to attack us. And all of a sudden, after that journey, we find this broad, safe harbor. And so we sail into this, and there's a sense: "Wow, I can kind of relax a bit now. I can start to rest now in my practice."

And this brings about the quality of contentment. It's actually okay to be here. But there are different responses maybe before we find that contentment. And part of it is it may seem uninteresting because the calm is not dramatic. It might not seem interesting. I'll come back to this in a minute. But for now, the instruction is: when you discover this harbor of calm, let yourself feel it. Let yourself rest in it. Take it as your meditation focus. This state of mind, you can trust it.

And it's expressed well by this poem from Emily Dickinson, who, if you don't know, did her writing about a forty-five minute drive from here in the town of Amherst. Her house is there now as a museum. And this is from a poem called "Wild Nights." That's kind of where we've been too, right? We've been through some wild nights.

And she starts off: "Futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass, done with the chart, rowing in Eden."

So I'll read it again. This term "futile" is a little unusual in English. If you're not an English speaker, it means useless. And then some other references are a little bit eighteenth century. The compass and the chart are ways—chart means map here—it's ways that sailors would steer their boats.

"Futile the winds to a heart in port. Done with the compass. Done with the chart. Rowing in Eden."

So you might feel this. You know, big space opens up from this calm.

And we can rest there.

So Ajahn Amaro, who's the abbot of Amaravati Monastery in England, has a very nice teaching about this. When you touch this calm, he says, use it as an instruction. He puts it this way: "Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body. And then pay attention to whatever disturbs that." Rest in the natural peace and ease—it is the natural peace and ease of mind and body. And then pay attention to what disturbs that.

When we find this element of calm, it's a lovely discovery because it is a part of what we've been looking for all along. I think most of us can relate to thinking that we came into meditation to find greater peace of mind, to find a calm place in the midst of all the turmoil of life—all the emotions, all the relationships, all the work, and so forth. And this is the start of that. This is the beginning of that inner peace.

We find that it becomes more and more available anytime we don't stir it up. And how do we stir it up? By thinking about past and future. By going off on distracting thought excursions. But as we trust in it more and can rest there, it becomes more easily available.

When we first start to notice it, however, it's a more subtle state than the hindrances. It's not dramatic. And we may think, "It's not very interesting." Sometimes we feel bored with it. When boredom comes—I think we've talked about this before—it is basically a kind of aversion to neutral feeling tone.

So when calm comes, check the feeling tone. Maybe it's kind of neutral because not much is happening. And we discover from our fast-paced life outside in the twenty-first century, we may have become somewhat addicted to intensity, looking for the ups and the downs that are more dramatic, that seem entertaining, maybe even cathartic. And maybe we weren't expecting something so undramatic and seeming almost ordinary.

But this is a big deal. This opening into calm is a big deal.

There's this cartoon—Gay and Wilson got into drawing some nice cartoons about meditation. In this one, there's a Zen temple, and everyone's sitting in robes. The monastics are sitting in robes around the edge of the temple. One of the older monastics leans over to one of the younger monastics and is obviously speaking to the younger one. The caption is: "Nothing happens next. This is it."

So this is sometimes the first experience of calm. Nothing happens next. This is it.

So notice the presence of calm when it arises. Notice if there's a more neutral feeling tone to it, and if there's a little bit of discontent with that. But you know, the Buddha spoke rather highly of this quality of peace. He thought it was a pretty good thing to aim for. In fact, what he said is, "Peace is the highest happiness."

I think this is an interesting thing to hear: Peace is the highest happiness. And I wonder if we believe that or not. And if our practice is really directed in our minds to peace, or if what we really think we're looking for is a more intense feeling of bliss or some special peak experiences or some other kind of high. But what the path promises is peace, and that that's the highest happiness.

I think that's also a really interesting comment on our human psychology. I do think it's true. And I think it's true that the most fulfilling way to live is to live in peace, in inner peace. So it's something that we come upon and we can also develop.

Within the Anapanasati Sutta, the Buddha puts it this way: "I will breathe in tranquilizing the bodily formation. I will breathe in tranquilizing the mental formation." And then he repeats that for breathing out. So breath can be used at a certain point to bring in this sense of calm, to bring in a sense of tranquility. So you can play with that.

Think about especially relaxing on the out-breath, tranquilizing the formations on the out-breath.

As we settle into this calm, it's as though the mind starts to settle into itself. It's not pulled out so much to outside objects, to past and future, to looking for its satisfaction elsewhere. It starts to find contentment within itself. This gives us a new degree of independence from the world and from the changing conditions of the world.

And it leads into the next of the factors of awakening, which is concentration. The Pali term is samadhi. This is a state of mind that is primarily unified. The mind has come together, and that's what makes the state of concentration. In that state, it's collected, it's steady, it's stable, it's whole. It's non-distracted and therefore it's strong. This is also a very high quality in meditation, another of the factors the Buddha talked about almost more than anything else, except perhaps mindfulness.

This beautiful state of mind comes from being mindful one moment after another. It's the moments of mindfulness that bring up this state of collectedness—the mind collects in the present moment. Concentration is another of these translations that's not particularly accurate, because in English, concentration usually refers to singleness of attention. You know, like "I'm trying to concentrate on my homework. Don't distract me with that music." It's about trying to focus in one area without distraction.

But the term samadhi isn't dependent on narrow attention. Samadhi means the mind has come together in the present moment. That could come together with a narrow focus, like on the breath. It could come together with a very wide focus, as in choiceless attention, or in sounds. It's the coming together, becoming unified, that's the important piece, not the narrowness of focus.

Before Spirit Rock built its retreat center, which now occupies a lot of land and is perched above a natural amphitheater, we had Thich Nhat Hanh come to teach a daylong on a couple of different occasions. When we had him there, the visitors were spread out on this big natural amphitheater sitting in the grass. At the bottom of the amphitheater, we built a platform for Thay that had a good sound system and speakers.

His voice was amplified. We had something close to 2,000 people that day to hear him teach. We could hear every word through the amplification, but we could also see him clearly because we were in the amphitheater and he was at the focal point of it.

It was amazing to experience him in the teaching mode in that setting because he talked dharma continuously. As the day went on, I felt like he was casting this spell of samadhi over the whole 2,000 people because he was so still. His body was still. His movements were still. His focus on the dharma was very clear and specific. We were all just getting a samadhi transmission from him. It was beautiful. The personal power that he manifested there over that size group was really impressive.

The beautiful thing was he led a walking meditation for about a thousand people to the back of the property and back. We still have photos—we couldn't get all thousand in one shot, but we got a few hundred trailing behind him on this little trail to the back of the land. It was amazing.

This quality of concentration or samadhi means that we can stay in the present moment more and more because the mind has become stable, and in that stability it's become strong. The basic measure, you might say, is how many moments in a row you find yourself in the present moment. This is not something that can be forced or willed, but it is something that develops over time with mindfulness practice.

As a measure, you can check it out: How many notes in a row can you make before becoming distracted? How many breaths in a row can you connect with before becoming distracted? That gives a rough measure, just a metric for the concentration.

It's interesting to know that concentration develops from mindfulness. That's a given. But the proximate cause—the thing that really tips it into concentration, the proximate cause—what do you think? Pushing hard? Forcing?

Strongly efforting? The proximate cause is happiness. When happiness develops, then the mind is really willing to settle into itself. It's not forcing. It's not straining. It's not striving. It's happiness. That's what grows concentration.

So concentration has a couple of benefits. One is it feels good. When the mind becomes strong and steady and stable, there is a feeling of inner peace. This is what the Dalai Lama said: inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility. And samadhi is a big part of inner peace. So that's the first thing.

But more important is what the Buddha said: the purpose and benefit of concentration is to see things as they really are. That means insight. The purpose and benefit of concentration is insight. When the mind is steady, we see more clearly.

So it's like when the hindrances are active. Imagine you're on a merry-go-round and it's going round and round and round. You're on a horse. And a friend of yours comes up next to the merry-go-round and holds up a newspaper and says, "Have you seen this?" And you're going by so quickly you can't read the newspaper. But the merry-go-round starts to slow down. And then you come to rest in front of your friend and you can read the headlines. And the headlines say: life is change. If you hold on, you will suffer. Letting go brings happiness. This is what we want to see when the mind slows down. You want to see it in your direct experience.

And when the mind is still, those insights go deep. And they're really transformative. You can hear those insights now and they'll go a certain depth. But when you feel them, discover them in the depth of meditation—and all of you have had experiences like this—they change us. They go deep and they change us.

So how can we develop this factor here? There are things you can do in your daily routine that will help support the development of this quality of stability and unification. One is spending time again, as we did at the beginning, with your anchor. Whether it's breath, sounds, body, whatever helps keep you really connected with the present moment. Do that again. We don't just use the anchor for the first four days and then forget it. We use it again and again and again anytime the mind is tending to distraction.

Techniques like noting or counting the breaths are very helpful for strengthening concentration because we really know when those stop—whether it's noting or counting—we really know we've drifted off. We know we're not really present anymore. The continuity of mindfulness is really key. So this means making an effort throughout the day, not just in formal sittings, not just in formal walkings, but in all the times in between: moving around your room, taking a shower, being in meals, carrying out your work meditation, putting all the same effort at continuity there as well.

Another one we don't talk about a lot, but it is really helpful, is slowing down. When you move the body more slowly, it starts to slow down the mental activity as well. And it's also saying something. You're making a statement: I'm not here to get to lunch as fast as I can or to get to my walking spot as fast as I can. I'm not rushing. I'm taking my time. I'm just here to pay attention. So this factor of slowing down throughout the day—moving around the building, movements in your room, moving from here to your walking spot, trying slow walking when you reach your walking spot—but find the tempo that is most suitable for you. But this general act of slowing down will increase your moment-to-moment mindfulness.

Now, you want to be careful when you get in hallways, when you get around meals, when you get in the lobby. That's not the time for snail's pace.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 11/12). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

So we say, if you're on your own walking path or going to your room, that's more private space. Private pace, private place. When you're in a common space, go at a common pace.

Do you ever see those signs on some two-lane roads: "When five cars pull up behind you, please pull over"? Please don't let five cars pull up behind you while walking to the dining room for a meal. Keep the pace steady and allow people to move.

Guarding the sense doors is another important practice. Brian will talk about this more in future sessions. This basically means being aware of how you respond to sights and sounds. When a sight or sound draws your attention, don't take it as an opportunity to go into greed and aversion and proliferate. Be really clear. Be mindful of the contact. Be very mindful of any reaction of liking or disliking, and avoid proliferating around it. Brian will explore this further.

The importance of formal walking practice as a support for developing mindfulness is hard to overstate. When the walking periods come, try doing the formal walking. It's a really good support.

As the days go by, you may find that your need for sleep goes down—many people do. So the encouragement is: if you're still alert at the end of the day at 9:20, 9:40, or whenever, don't feel you need to go to bed then. If the energy is still there, stay up a little later. Or if an alarm goes off in the morning, or the bell rings, or you wake up naturally, consider getting up then. Little by little, whatever is comfortable for you, out of interest rather than pushing or striving, you can try extending your practice time slightly.

The last of the factors of awakening is this quality called equanimity. The Pali term is upekkha. When the mind has become strong through concentration, that strength means it's not so thrown about by changing phenomena. Pleasure and pain will still come, but the concentrated mind is not so moved by them. This is the meaning of equanimity—not being so moved by pleasure and pain.

Sometimes this word "equanimity" in English has a rather cold and unfeeling connotation, but that's not the sense of it here. At the end of one three-month course, during the integration days where people are learning to speak again—and by the way, it does come back, quicker than you might like—I was meeting with a group of about twelve people here in the hall, asking them about their retreat.

I asked, "What were some of the greatest outcomes for you? What were some of the greatest benefits?" People said things like, "I just don't feel so tossed around by my experience anymore. I feel much more stability and centeredness in the middle of all the things that are happening to me." What they were really pointing to was this factor of equanimity, which might also be described as a balance of mind.

I asked, "In those periods where you weren't feeling so tossed around, did you feel emotionally shut down? Was it a cold place to be? Were you unfeeling at those times?" They said, "No, not at all. Because of the stability, I had better access to metta and compassion. It was a warmer place to be." We'll see in the Brahma-viharas how equanimity supports the arising of the other three.

These are the seven factors. As they all come to maturity, they truly do lead to awakening, as the Buddha said—to direct knowledge, to awakening, to nibbana. They're noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts on them to the complete destruction of suffering.

In this modern age, we might wonder: Is this complete destruction of suffering still possible? Is this just something that happened 2,500 years ago with the Buddha and those disciples? I want to read you a little story from the biography of Ajahn Liam. I might have mentioned him earlier—he was the student of Ajahn Chah who became the abbot of Ajahn Chah's monastery once Ajahn Chah passed away.

This is his account of his meditation one year when he was practicing under Ajahn Chah:

"Around the middle of the rainy season, Ajahn Chah encouraged us to practice with special intensity. So Ajahn Liem increased his efforts at that time. Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally I would sit in meditation until about 10 or 11 p.m. and then stop to have a rest. But on this day I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture.

A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, becoming completely light and at ease. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness. The body felt tranquil, cool, and light.

This experience continued on throughout the whole night, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued on unchanging for many years, all from that one time. It feels like there are no more proliferations of the mind. All the suffering that arises with defilements that had bothered me before, they had all disappeared. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose. There isn't anything to be concerned about.

As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change at all, all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without changes."

So let's just sit for a minute together and let these words settle.

As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then.

The complete destruction of suffering—it is still possible in this modern age.

CHAPTER 70

The Five Aggregates Are Not-Self

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive exploration of the Buddha's teaching on anattā (not-self) through the framework of the five khandhas (aggregates). Drawing from his personal experience with his sister's death, Armstrong makes this profound teaching accessible by examining how our sense of 'I' is constructed through language and grasping.
>
> The talk systematically examines each of the five aggregates: rūpa (material form), vedanā (feeling tone), saññā (perception), saṅkhāra (mental formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). Armstrong demonstrates how these categories completely describe our experience without requiring any permanent self or 'I' as owner or observer. He explains how the sense of self arises through clinging to any of these aggregates, referencing Ānanda's insight that 'the notion I am occurs by clinging, not without clinging.'
>
> The teaching concludes with the profound instruction the Buddha gave to Bahiya: 'In what is seen, let there be just the seen... When you are not in that, there is no you there.' Armstrong shows how understanding the aggregates as impersonal expressions of nature - physical nature, human nature, and sentient nature - can lead to great relief and freedom from the burden of separate existence.

The subject of this evening's talk is the five aggregates are not-self. I want to explore the Buddha's teaching on not-self through this schema of the five aggregates.

The teaching on not-self—the Pali word is anatta—is one of the most important teachings that the Buddha gave and therefore one of the most liberating things for us to possibly understand. It's also one of the hardest to understand.

Tonight, I want to put out some reflections that might serve as seeds for your meditation. This is not something that can be fully understood through conceptual thought. We use words to plant some ideas and then let them sink into your wise attention and simply hold them. You don't have to consciously hold them, but as they go in, if they're of interest to you, your subconscious will work on them. Then as meditation deepens, insights will come. This is a process that won't be solved in one night, a process that you can't figure out rationally. But take in some of the terms and wordings, let them settle, and see if insights come anyway, which they tend to do.

This teaching on not-self is paired with the Buddha's teachings on impermanence and unsatisfactoriness as the third characteristic. These are said to be the three characteristics of existence. Carol has already talked on unsatisfactoriness in the First Noble Truth and on impermanence a while back, so now we're rounding out those three characteristics.

Basically, the Buddha said that the way we tend to hold the concept of self is mistaken. This is puzzling because it seems so obvious—I'm here and you're there, and there's a self here and a self there. But when we look more deeply, it doesn't quite make sense. This belief we have in self, the deluded belief in self, is a very significant aspect of what the Buddha called ignorance—avijja—which is the start of the whole wheel of dependent origination that leads us into suffering again and again. We're going to fall into suffering as long as we keep holding onto a mistaken view of self.

I appreciate this quote from an Indian teacher named Nisargadatta Maharaj. He was a teacher of Advaita Vedanta who lived in Bombay until the 1990s when he passed away. He's from a yogic tradition, so he talks in terms of different yogic paths, but it's the same path of purification as we're involved with. He says, "All the yogas have only one aim: to save you from the calamity of separate existence." In case you didn't realize that you were in a calamity—this is to remind us it is a calamity to be involved in separate existence. It is a burden. It leads us into suffering and prevents us from flowering into happiness and love to the greatest extent possible.

When we believe the self is real, we create a duality. There's the world out there and there's us here. In that gap, there's separation, isolation, and fear—in particular, the fear of death. When we think we are a separate, solitary self, we will fear death because it means the ending of what we've taken to be our identity. But when we release the limitation of self, it opens into a much broader relationship to the world. We don't base everything around ourselves any longer, but in awareness we see that the whole world and all other beings arise within our own consciousness. We open to that more and more without this strict dualistic boundary.

Tonight, we want to understand how this idea of self gets formed and then how we can see it a little more correctly.

For most of us, the "I" is really the center of the universe. I'll use the words "I" and "self" interchangeably. We know the self is operating if we tune into our thoughts and hear these words—"I," "me," "my"—going by frequently. That's a clue. If you look closely at your thoughts, don't you hear those words often? Aren't most of the compelling thoughts about "I," "me," and "my"? That's both the sign of this incorrect understanding and the perpetuation of the belief. It's what keeps us hooked in over and over.

Our whole world tends to revolve around this concept of "I" or self. Yet it seems obvious, self-evident—but have you ever found it? It feels like it's in here somewhere, doesn't it? And yet, if you look for it, you can't find it. William James said, "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat." He came up with more than a lot of us come up with. The Dalai Lama said, "When you think something is clear, but you can't actually find it, that's a sure sign of delusion."

We really carry around this feeling. Yeah, there's a self in here. There's an I at the center of this. And yet, we can't quite find it.

So the classical analogy in the tradition is we look at a braided rope made of different colors lying on the ground and we think it's a snake. And because we misperceive it, we get scared and we jump back. But when we slow down and look a little more closely and we see it's just a braided rope, then the fear goes out.

So the same understanding is true about our sense of the self. When we misunderstand it, we live in the fear of duality, of the ending of the self through death, of the separation from the world and the isolation. When we understand it correctly, that level of anxiety, separation, isolation, fear goes out. We live with a much more expansive relationship to life.

Our ordinary language reflects this confusion around the I. For instance, if I ask you, how tall are you? This is pretty easy. And I might say something like, I'm 5'10", or I'm 175 centimeters, or whatever. That comes easily, naturally, you don't have to think twice about it, and it's not a trick question. I'm 5'10".

But is that really all there is to it? When I say I'm 5'10", I really mean this body, right? So when I say I'm 5'10", and what I mean is the body is 5'10", then I'm equating I with the body. So here I'm basically saying I am the body.

And then let me ask a second question. What color are your eyes? So I'd say my eyes are brown. Oh, wait, I didn't say I'm brown. I said, my eyes are brown. Now I'm someone who owns a body. The body is mine. I'm the owner of it.

So which are you? Are you the body? Are you the owner of it? Can you be both? People who really think they're multiple selves usually get taken to a hospital. So is this really tenable?

Or we could go on. Sometimes we say, I'm happy or I'm sad. And here we're equating I with emotions. But we could also talk about my joys and my sorrows. So are you the emotions or the owner of your emotions? The body or the owner of the body?

Here are four ways that we construct an I. Our language constructs an I. And there's one other way that to me is quite deeply felt. What we really think is that I is somewhere inside the head, you know, between the ears and behind the eyes. And it's sort of looking out all the time and taking in all the different experiences that come to us. So I am seeing sights. I am hearing sounds. I am tasting foods. I am thinking thoughts. And there's this little being that dwells inside the head that you might call the observer that we feel is the real me.

So these are five ways that we create a sense of self. And we express it through our language all the time without thinking anything strange is going on. But can you be five people at once? Which one are you really? So it doesn't really make logical sense the way we use the term.

And what the Buddha said is all of them are not true. And the way he put it was this: in whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that. In whatever way they conceive of self, the fact is ever other than that.

One of my teachers put it a little more dramatically.

He said, "Everything you think is wrong." He was trying to wake us up. It might go a little far, but it's a good provocative thing to contemplate.

I also like this comment that came over talk radio—one of the few pearls of wisdom from talk radio. The comment was: "The mind, often wrong, seldom in doubt." That describes it, doesn't it?

So the way we believe in the I, the way we believe in the self, is a fiction that's kind of created by thought. Ludwig Wittgenstein, the philosopher, said that the self is a shadow cast by grammar—a shadow cast by grammar that we haven't examined. We haven't taken the time to look into it and see what's true and what's not in our use of language.

Ānanda is one of the central figures in the Pāli discourses. He was a cousin of the Buddha who became the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of the Buddha's life. And he is one of the sweetest beings in the Pāli canon—very warm-hearted, generous, kind, humble, very devoted to the Buddha. So he kept asking the Buddha questions to clarify his own understanding. He was not fully awakened during the Buddha's life, so he continued to ask questions to try to deepen.

At one point he came to the Buddha and he said, "The world is empty. The world is empty. What do you mean by the world is empty?"

And the Buddha replied, "The world is empty because it is empty of a self or of what belongs to a self." The world is empty of self or what belongs to a self. Basically, it's empty of I and my. There's no real foundation for I and my.

But our world doesn't feel like that, does it? Is your world empty of I and my? Mine isn't completely. So these notions keep coming up. We keep kind of believing in them. And a long meditation retreat is a time to really question them.

There's this interesting passage in the Visuddhimagga. The Visuddhimagga was a compilation of meditation practices and understandings that was put together in Sri Lanka in the fifth century, primarily by one author named Bhikkhu Buddhaghosa, one of the great commentators in our tradition.

In this passage in the Visuddhimagga, the author is drawing an analogy to a butcher who is cutting up the carcass of a cow. Personally, I find this analogy a little distasteful because I've been a vegetarian for a lot of years and I'm a supporter of animal rights. However, it's in the text, so I share it in that sense.

The text says that a butcher who is carving up the carcass of a cow, with which he's very familiar, wouldn't carve it going "cow, cow, cow, cow." Because he knows that being so intimately, he would go "ribs, sirloin, tenderloin, rump." And the Visuddhimagga says, in the same way, someone who really understands their own mind and body, looking at themselves or looking at another, wouldn't say "person," wouldn't say "human being." For one who has investigated the mind-body process closely, one sees much more precisely than that.

So the question is: when the Buddha looked at a person, what did he see? And therefore, can we learn to see the same way the Buddha did? So that we just don't go "person," either for ourself or for someone else.

He saw in one of two ways. There are two main ways that he saw us.

The first is he saw us as six types of sense processes: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and so forth. This is really clear in a discourse from the Saṃyutta Nikāya called the Discourse on Totality. It says, "Bhikkhus"—which we understand as practitioners—"practitioners, what is the totality of things? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality."

First of all, this is an awesome thing to say, isn't it? We've had a lot of smart people in the West in the last hundred years. I mean, you think about Marx, you think about Freud, you think about Einstein. Did any of them say, "I'm going to teach you the totality"? No.

But here is the Buddha 2,600 years ago saying, "I'm going to teach you the totality. Listen up. Attend carefully and I will teach you the totality. It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality of things would not be speaking of anything they knew about." So this is it.

These are the six classes of sense organs and sense objects. I find this pretty amazing and radical. Here's the Buddha who ended up founding one of the world's great religions, and he's not going on about cosmic visions or a pantheon of deities. He says, what you need to be concerned about is your direct experience. You can't get any more down to earth than that.

This becomes the foundation for Buddhist psychology and Buddhist meditation practice. It's all about our six senses. And I'm sure you can see how our instructions have been unfolding so that we become familiar with how to be mindful of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects—mind objects being thoughts and emotions primarily. This is the domain of our practice. This is the domain of suffering. This is the domain of liberation. This is what we care about. This is what he taught about.

So this is the first way that he saw us: the six sense bases, internal and external. Bhikkhu Bodhi said that he used this map primarily to offer teachings to cut through craving, because we experience pleasure at these six sense bases. So it involves us with wanting.

But the other way that he looked at us, and the other way he taught, was to see us as the five aggregates. It's the same field of totality. He's still talking about the field of the six senses, but he's dividing it up differently. And it's a very interesting division to me. Where he used the sense bases to cut through craving, he uses the aggregates to cut through wrong view, and particularly the view of self. But it's interesting—he links it into the other two characteristics. So in a number of discourses, you really see the connection between impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. We'll get to that.

So as we tune into the way he saw people, we tune into the awakened mind. We tune into right view. And this may sound kind of intellectual—oh, the five aggregates, that sounds kind of very specialized and esoteric. But this has real implications for our lives in practice.

The time that it really came alive in my life, I was in my mid-40s, and I was a practitioner at that time. My older sister, who was 51 at the time, died unexpectedly. She'd been ill for a while, but we thought she was on a sustainable path with treatment. She seemed nowhere close to death. And one evening, she was at home with her son. She fainted, passed out. He called the ambulance. They came and picked her up. And in the ambulance on the way to the hospital, she suffered a cardiac arrest. She got to the hospital, and they were not able to revive her. So she died quite suddenly.

It was a shock to me because I had just talked to her the week before and she'd seemed relatively healthy and happy in her life and full of energy. I couldn't figure out what had happened to her. A lot of you may have had this experience with death too. It boggles the mind how someone who was there and alive and breathing and big in their life, all of a sudden didn't exist anymore.

My sister was big in her life. She had a big personality. She laughed a lot. She had a lot of passion. Loved her family.

She was a spark, a spark in all of our lives. And then she was gone. I couldn't put it together. It was the first time in my life I'd really been brought up against this immediacy of dying and the puzzle that it brought up.

Her death threw me into a period of grief for a couple of months. Life seemed dark, and I'd wake up thinking about her not being there anymore. I'd feel depressed and missing her. I thought, there's something I need to learn from here dharmically, because I couldn't understand how she'd been so solid and then was not there.

The way that helped me understand her passing was the five aggregates. This was the first time I really took them up for serious reflection, and they made sense of it to me in a new way. As we go through this, I'll talk about how that unfolded. When I understood her death better, I could better understand my own death still in the future—I could understand the process better.

You may have heard mention of the five aggregates earlier in this retreat, because I think Carol mentioned them when she talked about the first noble truth. As the Buddha goes through his list of all the things that are dukkha, one of the things he names is the five aggregates subject to clinging, upādāna. Since this is the totality of our experience, he's basically saying our experience subject to clinging is unsatisfactory. It's a really important statement.

Let's talk a little about this word "aggregate." It's a translation of the Pali term khandha. In Sanskrit, the word is skandha. I don't really like the translation of "aggregate"—I've never liked it because it sounds so technical. It sounds like road paving material: pebbles and tar and I don't know what else. Or it sounds like something made up in a chemistry lab. It has this mysterious connotation.

The translation I like best is "kinds of stuff." These are the five kinds of stuff that make us up. I think it goes better with the Pali because khandha is a simple word that just means heap or bundle. It's just kinds of stuff that get collected. You could talk about a khandha of sticks if you're gathering twigs for firewood.

So there are these five kinds of stuff that make us up: material form, feeling tone, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. I want to talk about each of these individually.

Material form—sometimes I'll just call it form. Sometimes the translations just use the word form. The Pali term is rūpa. What it means here is the whole physical world. Everything you can touch, everything you can see is all in the realm of form. The trees, the earth, the clouds, the rain, the water—it's all under the world of form.

Form also refers to the experiences of the five physical senses. It includes smells and tastes and touches as well as sights and sounds. So that's all the world of form—the whole physical world and the physical senses. It's a big part of our reality. For instance, when you hear the bell, that sound is in the aggregate of form, in the first aggregate.

Since this takes care of the whole world of matter, you might infer that the other four aggregates have to do with mind. And that's right. The first aggregate is matter; the other four have to do with mind.

The second one is feeling tone—our old friend vedanā. Sometimes we'll just say feeling to be brief, but be clear that it's this vedanā quality of feeling tone, not feeling as in emotion.

We've talked extensively about how central vedana is to the teachings and to our practice. Vedana is the second foundation of mindfulness and a central link in the chain of dependent origination. Here it's singled out as one of five aggregates that make us up, giving it a truly central role in the Buddha's teachings.

Why is that? I think we've explored this because the pleasant form of vedana tends to lead us into greed. The unpleasant form tends to lead us into aversion. And the neutral form tends to lead us into delusion. You might say that feeling tone tends to stimulate the kilesas in our response to them. Since the kilesas are where we get involved with suffering, feeling tone becomes a critical link in the unmindful response to experience that leads to suffering.

With the bell, most of us experience that as a pleasant feeling tone. The sound itself is nice, but even more, this is the sound of the end of a meditation period. That's like one of the best things that happens in a day, so we generally have really pleasant associations. But it might happen that this becomes an unpleasant association. You're in the middle of the best meditation you've ever had in your life and the bell rings. Then you know that all these people are going to get up and stampede out of the hall and you're going to lose your concentration. What a bummer.

But generally, it's experienced as a pleasant thing. Again, remember that the pleasant or unpleasant quality is not intrinsic to the object. It's how it lands in our own mind, personally. That's determined by our conditioning, our background, our tendencies, our current state of mind.

Sometimes you've probably had the experience where a physical sensation is felt as unpleasant. But sometimes even in the same sitting, as concentration deepens and the mind becomes steady, that sensation becomes neutral. Or going through the lunch line, I can tell some people really like beets. I don't like beets. They taste a little too much like earth to me. But a lot of people really like beets. So it's very personal, this feeling tone thing.

Sayadaw U Tejaniya, in describing it, says something like: we feel into the experience, and the feeling tone comes out of that. It's our mind meeting the experience—pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. This is the second aggregate.

The third aggregate is perception. In Pali, the term is sanna. Annie gave a whole talk on this, so I think this is already in your understanding. I just want to say a few other things about it.

Perception in Buddhist language means recognition. I think in Western psychological terms, it more often means the bare sense data. But we use contact for that. So perception comes after contact and recognizes what's just been experienced. When you hear that sound, you recognize "bell." You recognize "meditation bell." That's perception.

If your eyes are open and you're looking around the room, you're perceiving many different things automatically. You perceive people and floor and shawls and windows and lights and Buddha images. All these just happen automatically as you look around.

In fact, the bare sense data of the eye is not people, shawls, windows, lamps, Buddhas. The bare sense data is just form and color. But we've learned to recognize them as all these different things. It's a learned response.

Now when we perceive something and put it in a category, sometimes that blocks us from taking a closer look at the thing. You might label something in the sensation in your leg as pain, and that just makes you draw back and not want to get closer to it. But if you get close to it with mindfulness and see its changing nature, its impermanent nature, it reveals a lot more about it than just that simple category or label of pain.

Or take this thing. Now you've learned to see it as a bell.

But if it was in another setting and you came upon it, you might not know what it is, or you might think it's a bowl for a monastic. Our monastics have very modest bowls, but I had a friend in Thailand who was a monk whose bowl was about this size. When I went on alms round with him, he filled it to the brim and almost overflowing, then fed many people back at the monastery.

So we could look a little closer and see it could be a bowl. It could be a planter—we could grow a nice flower out of this thing. You don't want to be too quick to stop with perception. You want to go into the experience and see what's really there.

Zen plays with this a lot. In those stories, the Zen master holds something up and says, "What is this? If you say it is a stick, I will hit you. If you say it is not a stick, I will hit you. What is it?" What I got from that is that if I went to Zen, I was going to get hit a lot. One reason I came to Vipassana.

This is the koan practice, and there's a funny story about this. Some friends were living in Cambridge in the 70s when two highly respected spiritual masters both came to town at the same time. There was Kalu Rinpoche, a very high Lama in the Tibetan Kagyu lineage, and Seungsahn, who was a widely respected master in the Korean Zen tradition. They thought, "Let's introduce them to each other."

In Asia, these traditions do not mingle. I bet many of you have mingled with other traditions—I have. But in Asia, that just doesn't happen. The Zen people stay away from the Tibetans, the Tibetans stay away from the Theravadans. So this was a great opportunity to bring together these two really awakened mind streams and let them meet each other. Who knows what will happen? It will be like emptiness meeting emptiness. Maybe we'll get enlightened from the dialogue.

They brought them to a friend's home and served tea and snacks. At a certain point, Seungsahn took the initiative and started a conversation. In typical Zen style, he picked up an orange, held it out to Kalu Rinpoche and said, "What is this?" Kalu just sat there doing his mala and smiling, unruffled. Seungsahn wasn't getting the response he wanted, so he held it out again and said, "What is this?"

Finally, Kalu leaned over and whispered something to his translator. The translator then said, "What he said was, 'Don't they have oranges in Korea?'" This was the meeting of the awakened minds. I don't think it deepened from there.

So this is the activity of perception. Here we recognize the sound as the bell, recognize it as the ending of a meditation period.

The fourth aggregate is the field called mental formations. The Pali term is saṅkhāra, and this refers to basically the whole range of mental activity—thoughts, emotions, moods, any state of mind, meditative states, the refined states. We've talked about this area a lot. All of this goes into the fourth aggregate, which is mental formations. It's also a very, very big field. Beautiful emotions, difficult emotions, refined meditative states—they're all in this category of mental formations.

It's basically all the mental activity except that feeling and perception have already been taken out and singled out as unique aggregates. For a long time, I found this list really puzzling. Why would these two be taken out of mental activity and highlighted? Partly it speaks to the importance that they have in our psychological process and in our Dharma understanding. And also it could be a little arbitrary. Why not move volition out from mental activity and isolate that? Volition is the heart of karma.

It's really important. Why not move attention out? Attention is either wise or unwise, lands on things, dwells, abides. It's a really important factor too. So I don't know why the Buddha took these two out and highlighted them, but he did.

If we wanted to be a little more simplistic, we could take feeling and perception and put them back in the whole basket of sankharas, of mental activity. Then we'd have three aggregates: form, which is the physical world including the body; mental formations or mental activity; and the next aggregate—consciousness. We'll come back to this threefold list a little later. Actually, this is the way the Abhidhamma divides up our experience, putting things into three categories rather than five.

In sankharas, we hear the bell, and I don't know about you, but when I hear the bell ending the meditation session, I relax. I start feeling a sense of ease in my mind and body, and sometimes I think, "Oh, now I could sit for a long time." That sense of ease and the thought "now I can sit a long time"—those are parts of sankhara, mental formations, mental activity.

The next aggregate is really interesting: consciousness. The Pali term is vijñāna. In Western language, sometimes consciousness has really broad meanings. I once applied for a PhD program in California called The History of Consciousness. I thought that would be really fascinating. That's a really broad use of the term. Or we could talk about cosmic consciousness or consciousness raising—all those words in Western philosophy or psychology.

The Buddha's use of the word consciousness is really simple, very basic. It's just the knowing of sense data, of sense objects or sense experience. There are six types of consciousness: eye consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, tongue consciousness, body consciousness, and mind consciousness. It's just the bare knowing of a sense object—the knowing of a sight, the knowing of a sound, the knowing of a smell or a touch or a thought or an emotion, in the simplest way possible.

For instance, when you hear the bell—just that knowing is the activity of consciousness. Then other things happen in the mind in relation to it. You recognize, you perceive, "That's a bell." If you have perfect pitch, you might know, "Oh, that's C-sharp, just above middle C." If you're conceptualizing, you might think, "That's the sound of a Japanese bell that is used strictly in Buddhist temples and monasteries." You can conceptualize a lot beyond that, but the basic ear consciousness just hears, just reveals that sound. It brings that into our experience.

We're all conscious beings. What that means is we're having experiences at our sense doors all the time we're awake. It's consciousness that brings them into our field of experience. This is what it means to be a sentient being—we're having conscious experiences.

This flow of conscious experience seems to turn off when we go into deep sleep, if we faint, if we go under anesthesia. I don't have recollection of conscious experience in any of those states. Maybe there's something going on, but it's not what I know. So that gives a sense of what consciousness does—it brings experience to us at our sense doors.

It's the faculty of all sentient beings. It's not just humans that have this. Every creature has this. Frogs have it. Birds have it. As one Zen master said, all wriggling things have this kind of consciousness. But it's the simplest kind of knowing possible, before perception, before conceptual elaboration.

Now what's interesting is that for us to have an experience of that sound, there has to be both the sound and the consciousness. Just like for us to have an experience of breathing, we have to be conscious of the breath and there has to be a physical movement.

If we had a corpse, you could push down on its chest and some air would come out of its lungs. You could let up on its chest, and some air would probably go back into its lungs, and that seems like a breath. But as far as we know, the corpse is not having a conscious experience of breathing. We're having conscious experience of breathing.

So you can start to tune into that. You're knowing your breath, you're knowing the sounds, you're knowing the sights. When a sound arises, the way it's understood is that the sound and the knowing of it, the consciousness of it, are there together. It's one experience, but it's got these two aspects. And you can tune into either one. You can tune into the physical form aspect of the sound, or you can start to tune into your knowing of it.

Now, we don't usually give this meditation instruction, even through choiceless attention. But in the three-month course, we like to get you to turn your attention in this direction and look at that knowing quality itself. It takes a little while to tune into it. It's not obvious. But the first thing that you might have to inquire into is: how can one experience, the sound, have two aspects?

So let me ask, is this black or is it round? It's one thing, but it has two aspects, doesn't it? And you can tune into either one you want. You can focus on the blackness or you can focus on the roundness. So it's the same thing with hearing, or with any sense door. You can focus on the object, which is what we've mostly been doing, or you can start to tune in to the consciousness itself, to the knowing, because they're both there.

That's all I want to say about that meditation for now, but a little later in the retreat, we'll do something that brings that out a bit more.

So consciousness is with all the aggregates. It was with the knowing of the sound. It was with the knowing of the vedanā as pleasant. It was with the perception of this as a bell. It was with the feeling of ease. And it was with the thought. All those are arising in consciousness. So consciousness is there with every other aggregate.

A question that I'm going to leave you to reflect on is: is there anything in your field of experience that doesn't fit into one of these categories? Or is this list of the aggregates exhaustive in describing your experience? We're not going to go into that further. I'm going to leave you with that question, but I'm going to suggest maybe it is.

And if it is, then this gets pretty interesting. Because what it says is there's only form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. And there's one big term in our vocabulary that isn't there: I, me, self. Not in there. Not necessary.

So there's no I that owns the aggregates. There's no I that's the center of everything. There's no I that's observing all the sense experiences from the place behind the eyes. In fact, that sense of an observer is only a laying claim to the activity of consciousness. It's consciousness that sees and hears and thinks and feels. No I.

So this is kind of amazing—that if we look closely at our mind-body process, we can't find an I within it. And these categories of the aggregates describe our experience completely. It means there's no need to bring in anything like a self or an I.

And yet the self seems to emerge over and over and over again, doesn't it? How does that happen? How does that come about? One way we can see it is that when we lose mindfulness in the present moment and we drift into thinking and papañca—I think Annie talked about this—papañca tends to run around I, me and mine. All our thoughts tend to be around I, me, and mine because that's where the charge is.

That's where the energy is. That's where the passions are. That's where the emotional investment has been. So especially compulsive thoughts tend to be fueled by I, me, mine, and our self-concerns. And yet as we understand it more and more, we start to let go more and more of this sense of self.

What the aggregates say is that the human being is just a collection of parts. And these parts, as you'll see, are to some degree impersonal. We all kind of have them. And it's a little bit like—if you can see what this object is from the back of the room, you can probably see it's a pen. It's a ballpoint pen. And of course, a ballpoint pen can be taken apart. And we see that when you take a ballpoint pen apart, there are these components. There's an ink cartridge and a spring and a barrel and a top. And right now that we've taken it apart, is it a pen? I wouldn't call this a pen. It has a potential to be a pen, but only when the parts are put together in a certain way and assembled—then it can again function as a pen.

So a human being is a collection of parts in the same way. And that's what the Buddha is inviting us to realize. And when they're put together in this particular way, it's called a human being.

So what this opened the door for me around was my sister's death. Because when I saw her as solid, it was because in my mind I had fused her personality—which is her sankaras. Personality and sankaras are covering the same territory. It was her mental formations, her way of being in the world, her sense of humor, her personal qualities, her big laugh. All these things were what I had come to know as my sister, joined with her body. So in my mind, I'd fused them. Personality and body were one.

And what I saw at her death is that the personality fell away. The sankaras were separated at death, and the body was there, and the sankaras weren't anymore. That made it a lot more understandable for me, a lot more relatable. And I saw the same thing's going to happen for me. When I die, this personality isn't going to be anymore. The body will still be here for a while, but this personality will go. In fact, personality is not a fixed thing. It kind of comes and goes and rises and falls and appears and disappears moment by moment by moment. So that's helpful to see too. Personality is impermanent. And it's not owned by anyone. I'm just manifesting with all these thoughts and emotions.

So that's one way that we create the sense of I. We think about things that we are invested in, emotionally invested in. We conceptualize things being put together in a certain way. But there's maybe a more immediate way that the sense of self, the sense of I, gets generated again and again.

So the first thing I want to mention: the sense of I is not stable. The sense of I goes through a lot of ups and downs during a typical day. Sometimes it will feel really strong. And this is usually when hindrances have been stirred up and we've gotten concerned about some sequence of events. Could be something that happened at breakfast. Could be something that happened five years ago. And we start to proliferate around what was done to me or what I wanted to do or how it didn't work out well or how it's going to work out better in the future for me. So all those activities go on when the sense of self is strong.

But at other times, when there's quite a bit of calm in the mind and body, the sense of I really goes kind of quiet, goes a little bit dark. And there's not a lot of I-ing and my-ing taking place. So start to notice that during the day, the sense of the power of self can fluctuate wildly—sometimes very dramatic and big and expressive, sometimes very soft, thin, relaxed, sometimes hardly there. So notice that.

So how is it that it gets built up? Again, this is from Ananda. He related this story much later in his life.

He said, when I was newly ordained, another monk told me, "It is by clinging that the notion 'I am' occurs, not without clinging."

This is profound. The notion "I am" comes when we take hold of something, not without clinging. This is why the sense of self gets so quiet in times of calm and peace—because we're not clinging. But once something comes along that stirs us up—a memory, an anticipation, a strong physical sensation, a difficult emotion—we take hold of it. And in that taking hold of it, we energize the thoughts of "I." We create a self around it.

You can watch this in your experience. When something strong comes along, see how you relate to it and see if the thoughts of "I" don't start to spring up. And of course, this is what engages us into suffering.

So basically the sense of "I" arises out of clinging. And then Ananda continues: "By clinging to what does 'I am' arise? By clinging to form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness." By clinging to any of the five aggregates, then the sense of "I" comes into existence when it wasn't necessarily strongly there before.

So when we grasp a phenomenon at any sense door, the sense of "I" starts to come in, and you can watch this happen. Take a look when there's a pain in the body somewhere. See if the word "I" arises with it. "Oh, now I have a pain. Now I don't feel very good." Or a meditation's going well. "Now I'm having a good meditation. Now my concentration is back." Again, the words "I" and "my" come in.

Does the word "I" ever arise on its own? Does it ever just pop up and go, "I"? It doesn't, does it? Doesn't it always arise in relation to something else? So it's by taking hold of something else and then we put an "I" or "my" around it. You can watch the birth of this "I" over and over and over again.

So what we basically do is we call this "selfing." Selfing comes out of grasping. Anytime there's grasping, there's going to be the arising of self. So as far as I'm concerned, grasping and selfing are synonymous. Same dynamic is being pointed to.

And you can take a look. See when the thoughts of "I" and "my" come. The "I" is always extra. We don't have to say "I have a pain." We can just say "pain." We don't have to say "I'm feeling upset." We can just note "upset" or "agitated." This is the beauty of mindfulness practice. Mindfulness practice sees what's there without adding "I" or "my." And the noting practice really clarifies this.

And then how does it feel when the sense of "I" isn't strong? What's that like? Well, it means we're not strongly grasping at that time. So how does it feel to not strongly grasp? It means in a way we've let go.

Ajahn Chah had this really lovely line. He said, "If you let go a little, there's a little peace. If you let go a lot, there's a lot of peace. If you let go completely, there's complete peace." See what happens when you let go of clinging. How does that feel in mind and body?

So one of the ways that we see the impersonal nature of the aggregates—we'll go back to that simpler expression of body, mind states, and consciousness—sort of three aggregates.

You can see all of these not as yours, not as very personal. You can see them as expressions of nature.

This body came about because our father's sperm met our mother's egg. They united. They multiplied. We popped out into the world, were nourished on milk and water and air and sun and food, and we grew and grew and grew, and then here we are.

Did you have anything to do with the basic way your body turned out? How tall you are, color of your hair, color of your eyes, color of your skin? Did you choose all those? It's just nature. It's physical nature simply doing its thing according to physical laws. And yet we take a lot of ownership, don't we, of the body.

My teacher in Thailand, Ajahn Buddhadasa, put it this way: This body came out of nature. It's part of nature. It never departed from nature. And it belongs to nature. Give it back to nature. That will be a big relief for you.

So the body is just physical nature.

What about emotions? Do you have an emotion that nobody else in the world has? Or do you have every emotion that all of us have? We all have the same emotions, don't we? We all know happiness and sadness and love and anger and all of them. So this is not personal nature either. The stories around them are, but the emotions themselves are not. I call this human nature.

And then there's the element of consciousness. Consciousness is the thing that is most alike in all of us. I don't think that one of us really has a grand consciousness and the rest of us have puny consciousness. We just all have this facility for knowing sense objects. Seems just the same to me. So this is sentient nature.

Physical nature, human nature, sentient nature. This is what makes us up. It's all nature.

When we can see it that way and not take pride and ownership and overlay it with "I" and "mine," it's very freeing. There's such a relief because we see there are bigger forces in the world than we normally acknowledge that are creating our life, creating our experience.

I'm going to close with one quotation, a little story. There was a practitioner at the time of the Buddha named Bahiya who lived in southern India. He wasn't sure if he was enlightened or not, which could have been a clue. Nonetheless, a heavenly being did him the favor and came down, read his mind and said, "No, Bahiya, you're not enlightened."

But he was a quite pure being. He had devotees and lived very simply, with strong renunciation in his life. And so this deva said, "Not only are you not enlightened, you're not even on the path to being enlightened."

And Bahiya said, "Is there an awakened one in the world today?"

And the deva said, "Yes, there is. He's now living in the town of Savatthi in northern India. And you can meet him."

So Bahiya picked up and left and walked hundreds of miles to find this awakened one, this Buddha. He came upon the Buddha while the Buddha was on alms round and said, "Please, sir, I've heard that you're a wonderful teacher. Please give me your teachings in brief."

And the Buddha said, "This is not an appropriate time because I'm on my alms round."

But Bahiya persisted and asked twice more, saying, "Please give me your teachings. Who knows what will happen? The future is uncertain."

You may not live. I may not live. Please give me your teachings.

So the Buddha gave him the teaching. And this is what he said:

"This is how you should train, Bahiya. In what is seen, let there be just the seen. In what is heard, let there be just the heard. In what is sensed, let there be just the sensed. In what is cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then, Bahiya, you will not be in that. When you are not in that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, then you are neither here, nor there, nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

And on hearing this, Bahiya fully awakened.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

When you are not in that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, then you are neither here, nor there, nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

CHAPTER 71

Forgiveness Meditation

Guy Armstrong · 49 min

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive forgiveness meditation as part of the brahmavihāra (divine abiding) series, particularly focused on mettā practice. While acknowledging this is a modern adaptation rather than a formal teaching found in the Pali Canon, Armstrong explains how forgiveness ceremonies are embedded within the monastic tradition.
>
> The meditation unfolds in three parts: asking forgiveness from those we may have hurt, offering forgiveness to those who have hurt us, and extending forgiveness to ourselves. Armstrong carefully distinguishes between wholesome remorse (kukkucca) - which the Buddha considered beneficial for spiritual development - and destructive guilt that leads to self-judgment and aversion. He references the Dhammapada's teaching that "hatred never ceases through hatred, hatred only ceases through love," emphasizing how releasing old grudges frees energy trapped in past memories.
>
> The teacher provides practical guidance for working with resistance, suggesting practitioners can modify phrases when forgiveness feels premature, use vipassanā to hold difficult emotions, or return to mettā for self-care. He emphasizes that forgiveness doesn't require excusing harmful behavior or resuming relationships, but rather releasing the energetic tie to past hurts. This practice aims to unburden the heart so practitioners can enter the present moment with fresh openness, supporting deeper development in both samatha and vipassanā meditation.

This evening, as part of our series on the Brahma Viharas and metta in particular, we're going to undertake a meditation on forgiveness.

It's important to announce this destination upfront because sometimes people don't want to go on this journey. You know how when you board a plane these days, they announce, "You've boarded a flight to San Francisco. If San Francisco is not your destination, this is the time to get off." So if you don't want to explore forgiveness, this is the time to step away.

This is not a formal Brahma Vihara as the Buddha taught it, although it's embedded within the Buddhist tradition. Within the monastic community, there are forgiveness ceremonies that happen at the end of periods of being together as a community. So while it's not foreign to Buddhism, this meditation is a modern adaptation. You won't find these exact instructions in the Pali Canon, but the spirit of it is there.

In tonight's meditation, we'll be bringing to mind or inviting recollection of three areas: ways that we may have hurt others, ways that others may have hurt us, and ways that we may have hurt ourselves. The meditation will take up each of these.

The purpose of undertaking a practice like this is for our own benefit. It's not about being good people in particular. It's really about removing a load on the heart that we may have been carrying for a long time. Life is a rough and tumble business. In the course of living, people—including ourselves—don't always follow the precepts closely, and we hurt one another. Generally, growing up without understanding how to deal with the effects of being hurt and hurting others, things tend to accumulate. Old hurts build up, old patterns of remorse build up.

This meditation particularly is designed to allow those things to come to the surface, and by being understood and looked upon with some acceptance and compassion, to be released. Really, the point of this meditation is to unburden the heart of old loads that it may have accumulated and been carrying.

I like the way Lily Tomlin put it: "Forgiveness means giving up all hope for a better past." If you thought by meditating you might make your past better, that's not going to happen. But we can change our relationship to it.

We bring this practice in at this point for two reasons. One is that in any long retreat, a lot of memories surface. In my first long retreat, I had so many thoughts that I had to make a list of the ten worst things I'd ever done and write them down just to get them out of my mind because I was really beset with memories. Partly, things come up in ways that we haven't been skillful. Memories may come up of ways that others haven't been skillful toward us. We want to be able to work with these, and by bringing greater acceptance and understanding, they can be released to a really large extent.

The other reason to bring it in now is that a week or so ago, metta for friend was introduced in these evening meditations. As you do metta for friend, often you review that relationship. With friendships, there are some things that have gone well and some things that have been difficult. Often it's the meditation on friend that brings up some of these old memories, both of hurting and of being hurt. This meditation then becomes useful.

We're going to invite looking at ways that we may have hurt others. Remember that we talked about the difference between what I call guilt on the one hand and remorse on the other. Remorse is considered a wholesome quality in the Buddha's teachings. We recognize that we've done something that wasn't skillful and we feel regret, we feel badly about it. By acknowledging that, it's considered a positive development in the Buddha's teachings. "Oh, I did something that wasn't skillful, that wasn't correct. I acknowledge that." That's a positive. We will feel badly about it, and there's a wholesome quality in remorse.

But that can tip over into the quality that I call guilt, where we really judge ourselves harshly for having done that thing. We beat ourselves up, we give ourselves recrimination, and we think what bad people we are. In the Buddhist teachings, that extra level of self-judgment isn't necessary and it isn't helpful. It's just coming out of aversion. It creates pain and it's not useful. We want to see the difference between feeling remorse, which is natural and wholesome, but try not to layer on top of it a lot of this quality of guilt and self-judgment.

One of the ways that we can work with these memories that bring remorse is to reflect on how we came to act in those ways. When you think about it, when you were younger, you probably didn't have the same understanding that you have now about how actions impact others.

And you probably didn't have the same mindfulness around emotions and the precepts. So I look back on the actions early in my life, especially in my late teens and early twenties, before I'd heard the precepts, when a lot of emotional turmoil was going on for me. And I reflect—I was really a different person then.

By reflecting in that way, you see you're not the same person now as you were when you committed these earlier kinds of actions. And so you can think, if you like, "Oh, that was a different person. So why should I feel guilty?" Of course, that's not quite true, because the karma continues to influence us. So it's not quite true, but it was a very different version of you.

When I look back on my actions, I see that at those times, leading up to those acts, there was fear, or there was confusion, or there was unhappiness. And looking in that way, I can see the causes and conditions that led me to act that way. When I understand that, I can feel a lot of compassion for that younger person. So that can be a helpful reflection—not quite the same person as now.

Now, in looking at ways that we've been hurt, as these come to mind and the mind is inclining toward forgiveness, you may find there's a big resistance and you think, "I don't want to forgive that hurt. It hurt too much. It went too deep. It was too big a deal. The magnitude of the act was too great, and I'm not ready to forgive."

That is totally fine. If you come upon memories, people, or situations where forgiveness is really not feeling appropriate, you don't have to go there. We'll be repeating a phrase, something like, "If anyone has hurt or harmed me, I offer forgiveness." But if a particular memory comes up, you don't have to say it about that person. You can switch to metta for yourself. You can bring somebody else to mind. If the feelings of hurt are really strong, you could move to vipassana and just hold them. Or if you like, you could acknowledge, "I'm really not ready to forgive this person, but someday I'd like to be able to." So you might say, "I know that it's my intention someday to forgive." That would be fine. That would still be significant.

When we come upon ways that we've been hurt, especially, know that it doesn't get resolved quickly. It can take some time, really, of living with these memories and touching them little by little. I think Jill talked about how to touch a difficult emotion and then back away to something neutral or positive. We can do that with these old memories. We don't have to be with it on and on and on at one time. Touch it a little bit, go away, feel safe, touch it again, go away, and so forth. So this is a process that takes some time. You don't need to rush it.

But until we start to relate to some of these old memories, we're tied to the past to a certain degree. Some of our physical and mental and heart energy has been held captive by past memories, and we're not able really to come fully and freely into the present moment. So again, a lot of this is about how can we release those burdens so that we can come freshly into the present moment with a state of some innocence—just like we were a child, that kind of fresh openness that children have.

Forgiveness extended to someone else who has hurt you also doesn't mean that we excuse their behavior or we condone their behavior. We don't say, "Oh, that was all okay that you did that to me," because it may have been really wrong and really inappropriate. So we don't surrender our discernment about whether that was an appropriate action or not. We might see really clearly that was really an awful thing that someone did. But what we give up is the tie to it as something from the past. And we can release that. So if that becomes able to be released, that's helpful. That feels good.

But it also doesn't mean that when you release some degree of that hurt, it doesn't mean that you have to like the person, or want to be in relationship with the person, or have them be a friend again. Sometimes going through these really difficult situations with other people, you realize, "That person's not safe for me. That person is really not trustworthy."

They broke the trust in our relationship. And so then you can say, "Okay, I want to release this old hurt, but I don't really want to be back in a close relationship with you." And that's perfectly fine. If it gets healed to the point that you can wish them well, that you can have metta for them, that's as far as you need to go. That's actually wonderful. That could represent a profound shift.

I think someone has mentioned this line from the Dhammapada. When we may have been hurt and may have held resentment, the value of letting go becomes clear. As the Dhammapada says, "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is an ancient and eternal law." In a way, what we're doing is letting go of old grudges. And as the Dalai Lama said, "I do get angry, but in my heart I can't hold a grudge." That's what we want to be able to find—a heart that's so open and wide that anger doesn't really stick in it. If we can find that, then much opportunity opens for peace and deepening.

Now we can move into the meditation. We're going to do it in three parts. The first is asking for forgiveness from anyone we may have hurt or harmed. The phrase will be: "If I have hurt or harmed anyone, knowingly or unknowingly, I ask for your forgiveness."

This "knowingly or unknowingly" part—you don't have to say it out loud, but you sort of realize that it's part of the deal. You may have hurt someone and not known it. So whichever way it worked, you recognize that's part of it.

In distinction to the metta phrases which we send to specific people, in the forgiveness practice we just leave it open. "If I've hurt or harmed anyone"—we're not directing it to specific individuals. We're saying the phrase, dropping it into a centered place, and just seeing what comes. Memories may arise, they may not. It's okay. You just continue to say the phrase and hold an open space to see if anyone is going to visit, to see if any memories or incidents come up. If they do come up, then you can let them be there for a while. And then you might want to direct it to the individual who's come. But it's up to you. You don't have to.

The second part of the meditation will be extending our forgiveness to others who've hurt us. And this is where you can just see how it feels. The phrase is going to be something like: "If anyone has hurt or harmed me, knowingly or unknowingly, I forgive you."

You can just try saying the phrase not directed to anyone. If memories, images come up, you can see if that phrase fits that person. And there may be people you say, "I'm not ready to offer that phrase." So you can try: "Know that my intention is someday to forgive you." And if that doesn't fit, you can just let that person go. Continue to say the phrase. See if someone else comes. If strong feelings come up, you can move to metta for yourself or vipassana as a way to hold that.

The third part is to forgive ourselves for the ways that we've hurt or harmed others. So the phrase is something like: "For the ways that I have hurt or harmed myself or others, I forgive myself."

This third part can help the self-blame and self-judgment be eased. We can extend the forgiveness to ourselves too. We can let go of the blame, the guilt, the self-judgment around ways that we've acted because we can bring a heart of compassion to that younger person who didn't understand quite what they were doing.

I think that's enough foundation. We can move into the meditation. So please begin by sitting comfortably.

Yes, the question is: Is it okay to extend forgiveness or allow into forgiveness people who have passed on? Yes, that's absolutely fine.

In this phase, anyone who comes to mind with whom you've had a connection is welcome to enter your practice.

Now please sit comfortably. Let your mind settle, allowing your attention to rest into the body and feel yourself in sitting. Bring your attention into the heart center, the area of the center of the chest—this place where emotions are typically felt. As you connect with the heart center, let this be your avenue to connecting with yourself.

Begin with a sense of your own being, your character, and your good qualities. Simply think of your good qualities in this retreat: your dedication, your skillful effort, your returning again and again with mindfulness and metta. Grounded with an appreciation of your own goodness, you can begin to say the first phrase in the forgiveness practice:

"If I have hurt or harmed anyone, knowingly or unknowingly, I ask for your forgiveness."

Continue to repeat this phrase. Sit with attention in the body, perhaps centered in the heart center or the belly. Simply stay open to whatever appears in terms of memories, images, reflections. Not forcing anything—just saying the phrase and seeing what comes.

If specific memories come of unskillful actions on your part, you can stay with that person for a while. Make the phrase personal to them if you'd like. Also reflect on your state of mind and heart at that time. What were you feeling that led you to act like that? Bring in compassion for that younger person.

Now let go of the reflection on asking for forgiveness and move into the second phase of the meditation. This will be extending forgiveness. In this section, the phrase is something like: "For ways that others have hurt or harmed me, I offer my forgiveness," or "If anyone has harmed me knowingly or unknowingly, I forgive you."

Begin to repeat the phrase, not necessarily directing it to anyone, and see what comes. If a memory comes and it just doesn't feel right to extend forgiveness, see if it might feel right to say, "Know that it's my intention someday to forgive you." If even that intention doesn't feel right, that's fine. No pressure at all on this. Let them move out and let someone else come into your mind, into your images, or you can return to metta for yourself for a bit.

From time to time, come back into the body. Feel the heart center, the belly. Feel whatever emotions may be present. Just allow any feelings—hurt or fear or resentment—to be there, to be felt, and continue to repeat the forgiveness phrase.

If strong emotions feel like they really block the intention of forgiveness, you could open to the emotions with vipassana, just feeling them, acknowledging. You could turn to metta for yourself, or a benefactor or friend, or self-compassion. Bring the mind back into balance using other skillful means.

Now let go of that reflection, letting go of any images or memories that have come with it. Just reconnect again with yourself as you're sitting, connecting through your heart center, your sense of yourself, your good qualities, your commitment and effort.

With that sense of your own goodness, start on the third phase of the forgiveness meditation, the phrase something like: "For the ways I have hurt or harmed others or myself, I forgive myself." Say this phrase of self-forgiveness and see what memories come, see if any images come.

If memories like this arise, just look for a moment: What was going on for me when I did that? How was I feeling? What did those acts come out of? Remember that our younger self may not have understood so well, or even more recently, we may have fallen into some kind of confusion, obscuration.

Now let go of that reflection on self-forgiveness. Just come back into the present moment and feel yourself in sitting, feeling the body, connecting with the heart center. Allow whatever emotions are present to be there, to be filled with acceptance.

Conclude with a little bit of loving-kindness for yourself, connecting with your good qualities.

With all you've put forth on this retreat—all the work you've invested in developing mindfulness, understanding, love, and compassion—these beautiful qualities that are so needed in the world. Reflect on what you've given to bring them about. So with deep appreciation for yourself and your dedication to this process, to this practice—because happiness follows goodness in some mysterious way—directing these loving phrases to yourself:

May I be safe and protected from harm.
May I be happy.
May I be healthy.
May I live with ease.

Now thinking of all of us in this meditation hall, all of us drawn together by this same interest, this same deep wish for welfare and happiness, send the good wishes of loving-kindness to everyone here:

May we all be safe and protected from harm.
May we all be happy.
May we be healthy.
May we live with ease.

And recognizing that this wish extends to all beings everywhere, send your metta outward in an unlimited way:

May all beings everywhere be safe from harm.
May they be happy.
May they be healthy.
May all beings live with ease.

CHAPTER 72

Kamma and the End of Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

In this comprehensive dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's revolutionary understanding of kamma as intentional action, contrasting it with other philosophical views of his time. Drawing from the Dhammapada and various suttas, he explains how the Buddha defined kamma as volition (cetanā) - the mental energy behind our actions of body, speech, and mind. Armstrong outlines the ten unwholesome actions and their wholesome counterparts, emphasizing how actions rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion lead to suffering, while those arising from generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom bring happiness.

The talk explores the relationship between kamma and the teaching of not-self (anattā), using the analogy of mind-streams to explain how karmic patterns continue without requiring a fixed self. Armstrong addresses common misconceptions about kamma, clarifying that the Buddha never taught that all suffering results from past actions, and emphasizes using kamma as a 'future GPS' rather than a 'rearview mirror.' He concludes by examining how dharma practice transforms our karmic stream, ultimately leading to the Noble Eightfold Path and the cessation of kamma in full awakening. This teaching offers both practical guidance for ethical conduct and deep insight into the mechanism of spiritual transformation.

The subject of tonight's talk is karma and the end of karma. It's an interesting concept in modern times because it's a word that has entered our vocabulary—at least in English and probably most European languages—but it's not very well understood in modern societies and non-Buddhist cultures.

A group of Western teachers were meeting with the Dalai Lama some years ago. He used to hold meetings in Dharamsala once a year, and in the course of the discussions, they were talking about this topic of karma. The Dalai Lama told the Western teachers that he thought it was more important for them to teach about karma than to teach about emptiness. Now, as someone who's written a book on emptiness, I found this a little hard to take in. But I tend to agree—it's more immediately practical. And so that's what I want to talk about tonight.

I'm going to talk about things that the Buddha taught about karma. At the very start, I'll say that I'm not able to verify all that he taught, but I figured I need to share it with you anyway. Not that you should believe it, but I think it might be useful to consider. So you can make of it what you will, but I think it's important that you hear what the Buddha had to say about this topic, because I think if we understand it correctly, karma can be our best friend.

Karma has many aspects, and I'm going to talk about it in five different areas: karma itself, the results of karma, the relation to not-self, the relation to rebirth, and finally, the end of karma.

What is the Meaning of Karma?

Karma is a simple word that in Sanskrit just means action. The Pali word is kamma. It was just a common word in the Buddha's time that all the philosophical schools debated about. Every teacher had their own take on what karma was and what it involved.

Some teachers said that actions didn't matter—they don't have consequences beyond the immediate moment. Some people said there are results and after-effects of karma. Some people said you could go out and kill somebody and it wouldn't have any impact in your life following. Some people said actions were predetermined or that God determined all the actions that were happening.

There were all these different views around, and the Buddha had his own definition of karma, which was a new definition at the time. He said, "It is volition, bhikkhus, that I call karma, for having willed, one acts by body, speech or mind."

This notion of putting the motivation at the center of the meaning of action was the Buddha's contribution. That was the new information that he offered as part of his teaching. We've talked quite a bit about this factor of volition—intention, urge, will, motive, or motivation. It's talking about the energy or the mind states that actions come from.

Actions are judged to be either wholesome or unwholesome depending on the motivation behind them. Unwholesome motivation comes from forces of greed, hatred, and delusion. Wholesome motivation comes from their opposites—qualities of generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom. The Buddha actually called these three forces the roots of the unwholesome and the roots of the wholesome. They are where all action springs, either in a positive way or in a negative way.

So it's not the act per se, but the motivation behind it. For instance, if I said to you, "Someone was just observed cutting someone's stomach open with a sharp knife. Is that a good act or a bad act?" It depends. If it was a robber who was holding someone up to steal their money, that's a very unwholesome act. But if it was a surgeon preparing to heal somebody's appendix, it would be a very wholesome act. The act itself is not the determiner—it's the motivation.

Or if a baby is sleeping on a bed at home, rolls over, knocks over a candle, and the candle sets the house on fire, there's no blame. There was no intention in that action, so no blame or unwholesome karma for that particular act.

It is interesting that according to the Buddha, actions have a moral force based on what the intention was.

You'll notice in this definition that actions take place in three spheres: body, speech, and mind. Of course we think of physical action as action. We think of verbal action as action. We're not often used to thinking of mental action as action. But in the Buddha's teaching, even thoughts and emotions have a force that comes out of their volition, out of their intention.

Fortunately for us, the Buddha was really clear about what the unwholesome actions are. He made a list.

He passed them on. It's something really helpful to reflect on and to learn about.

So he broke these down into ten unwholesome actions of body, speech, and mind.

The unwholesome actions of body—you're going to recognize these—are killing living beings, taking what is not given, and sexual misconduct. So these form the first three of our five lay precepts.

The actions of speech begin with false speech, which you recognize as the fourth of our lay precepts. Then there are three other actions of speech that are unskillful: using harsh speech, which basically means angry speech; divisive speech, which means to speak badly of someone to a third person, to turn that person's mind against the other person; and wasting time in idle chatter and gossip. Does this go on on the internet? A little bit.

And then he talked about three actions of mind that are not skillful: covetousness—wanting what belongs to someone else—ill will or hostility, and wrong view. This is an interesting one. Wrong view says if we misunderstand the way reality is or the way it works, we're going to act based on our misunderstanding and we're going to end up hurting ourselves or others, adding to the suffering in the world. So another way to say wrong view is ignorance. When there's ignorance in the mind, we act in unskillful ways.

The ten wholesome actions are to refrain from these. It's just like a lot of things—the Buddha put a lot of things in the negative way. So the wholesome actions are to refrain from the unwholesome. But then there are also a lot of wholesome actions that are built upon generosity and loving kindness. You could extend this list a lot. But he basically said, look, if you keep from doing the ten unwholesome things, you're on a good track.

So the teachings on karma are especially important when we're out in the world in relationship. And half of this group will soon be back in the world and in relationship. And for the rest of us, this is—in retreat, this is a useful time to contemplate action in the world. But the teachings on karma become really important when we're in contact with others and we're acting in a way that is wider.

So we aspire as practitioners to always act from the wholesome roots, to always act from generosity, kindness, and wisdom. But we also know our minds aren't always in generous, loving, wise places. So we aspire to that, but we can't actually control it yet. That's why the path of meditation, the bhavana aspect, the mental purification, is so helpful to our overall development on the path. As our minds and hearts become purified, then our actions naturally spring from the wholesome motives.

And there are lots of beautiful examples of this. There are these people who really exemplify what the Buddha called the bliss of blamelessness. There's a great joy in being able to look back over one's actions and feel good about one's conduct.

So somebody who really exemplifies that for me is the Dalai Lama. Some years ago, he was sitting down for an interview with Oprah Winfrey. You all probably know that she has a magazine called O, which is quite popular. And she's done more than anybody else I can think of in the modern age to bring a kind of wide view of spirituality to a very broad audience. This has been one of her main interests in her speaking and in her literature and her TV network. And it's a beautiful thing to offer.

So she was doing an interview with the Dalai Lama to be put into the magazine O. She started by asking the Dalai Lama, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect," Oprah said. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued. "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Hmm. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

That's a beautiful mind. And you know, some of that peacefulness and depth of meditation is related to his pure conduct in the world. Because if we are doing unskillful things in the world, it will continue to stir up our minds and we won't be settled into meditation. So he is somebody who really exemplifies both of these beautiful qualities.

So that leads into the results of action, and the Pali term for this is vipaka. The basic teaching, as you all know, is that wholesome actions lead to wholesome results—that is, results that make us happy. Unwholesome actions lead to unwholesome results—that is, things that make us unhappy.

This was said by the Buddha at the very start of the Dhammapada:

"Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind, and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind, and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

Some years ago, a friend and I were teaching a meditation class at a juvenile hall in the Bay Area. This was, I think, the first of its kind that I know of in the juvenile halls. It came about because one of the people who worked in the juvenile hall was a meditator and had invited us because she thought it might be useful to the young men who were there.

So we were invited into the maximum security wing. For those of you who don't know the U.S. system, a juvenile hall is where people under eighteen are placed while awaiting trial on serious charges. The kids in the maximum security unit were in there for things like robbery, armed robbery, assault with a deadly weapon, and murder. Fairly serious stuff.

They're all under eighteen, and they're incarcerated, waiting for a trial that could determine years in prison or being released back to their homes. So you can imagine these young men were in a state of tremendous anxiety. There was also not a small amount of aggression within the unit they were situated in.

My friend and I thought: What? We're going to go in as two middle-aged white guys and we're going to teach these young men about the Dharma? Is this going to work?

But we just went in and presented a straightforward approach to meditation by focusing on the breath, then opening up to body sensations and talking about how to work with emotions. For them, I think this was as entertaining an hour as they had in their week, so they didn't resist coming. It was workable because their probation officer sat in the class with us. He was a big, solid guy, and we knew they weren't going to give him any trouble.

Then we got to the part on working with difficult emotions. For me, this is really where the meditation came to life. Cooped up, not knowing what the future of their lives would be, they suddenly had a way to look at their fear, look at their anger, and find ways to work with it. We saw some quite remarkable connections to the practice among these young men. They really found it useful.

We got to the end of the class—graduation day. We'd made up a certificate for them: "Certificate of Graduation from Mindfulness Training." We thought, okay, this is going to be our last time to meet with them. Should we talk about karma? I thought, well, I don't know. That might be a little too speculative or a little too heavy. But this was the last time we'd ever get a chance to talk to them. I think we should do it.

So we did it. What we did was present karma as the science of happiness: If you want to be happy, this is what to do. We gave a little discourse on karma and I said to them, "Does this make sense to you?"

And one person raised his hand and said, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around? Sure, of course that makes sense." It was fascinating to see how deeply this basic idea has penetrated our culture, even without a profound understanding—the fundamental principle had taken root.

At the end of the class, we handed out the certificates, and one of the men took his and asked, "Can I take this to the judge?" "Sure," I replied. "I hope it will work."

The Tibetans have a beautiful way of expressing the four Brahmaviharas. They call them the four immeasurables, and they have specific phrases for metta and compassion. The phrase for metta is: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness"—which is virtue. The phrase for compassion is: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow"—which is non-virtue. Just like the Dhammapada, this ties happiness and unhappiness to the purity of one's actions.

The Buddha expressed it this way: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform, for good or for ill, of that they will be the heirs."

Their actions are the womb from which they are born. According to the Buddha's teachings, this was a direct insight of his—not a speculative view like those of other philosophers of his time. This was something he saw directly through his extraordinary abilities. And according to his understanding, this teaching, this law, applies whether you believe it or not. It applies whether you know it or not. It applies whether your religion believes it or not, and it applies whether your culture believes it or not. It's a universal law that governs all beings based on their actions.

I will also say that our growth on the path really depends on this law, and we'll explore that more later.

This reflection—that all beings are the owners of their karma—provides the foundation for the equanimity meditation as it has come down to us in the classical teachings. Jill spoke about equanimity meditation in her overview of the four Brahmaviharas. In the traditional teachings, going back over a thousand years, the phrase for equanimity is: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their actions"—and we might add—"depend on their actions more than on my wishes for them."

There was a touching scene—did some of you see the movie Kundun? It was Scorsese's film about the Dalai Lama's life. He brought such beautiful sensibility to a culture that was not his own in this biography of the Dalai Lama. At one point, he shows the Dalai Lama still living in the Potala Palace in Lhasa, being trained by tutors. Some of the finest minds of Tibet were offered to provide his upbringing and instruction.

Scorsese includes this scene where the tutors are instructing the young Dalai Lama on the Four Noble Truths. They ask him to restate the Second Noble Truth in his own terms. He responds, "The cause of suffering is craving"—that's the formal statement as the Buddha taught it. But his tutors say, "Put it in your own terms. Don't just give us a recitation. Make it personal."

I'm paraphrasing because I don't remember the dialogue exactly, but he then says something like, "Suffering comes from wanting things." His tutors respond, "No, that's not personal enough. Give us a statement in your own terms." He's perhaps eight or nine years old at this point. He closes his eyes, thinks for a moment, and then opens them and says, "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind."

The tutors respond, "Very good. Very good."

Most of our suffering comes from our own habits of mind. We may wish to project it onto other people in our lives or blame our present circumstances, but most of our suffering comes from our own habits of mind. This is the core reflection about karma.

All beings are heirs to their karma. Another way you could say it is their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own habits of mind.

Now, I want to say that it doesn't depend entirely on one's past actions or one's past habits of mind. It doesn't really hold up for me anyway that way. I think about the children who have been dying in Syria when hospitals are bombed, a government bombing its own citizens. I find it really difficult to believe that all those children are dying because of their past actions. I just personally don't believe that.

So one of the things the Buddha said is we can't figure out the details of the workings of karma—how certain results came about based on past actions. It's considered one of the four imponderables: four things the Buddha said you can't figure out by thinking. The details of the workings of karma, the range of the mind of a Buddha, the power of a concentrated mind, and the beginnings of things. I think you should share that with all the cosmologists. What he says is you'll go mad and experience vexation if you try to figure this out. I'm not sure which comes first.

I don't know if you've seen this in your life, but I've certainly seen it. Someone gets ill and a friend comes to them and says, "Oh, that must be your karma." That is such a not nice thing to say. And nobody knows. That's just a speculative view. It's not a kind thing to say, and it's not in any way necessarily true.

The Buddha never said that everything that happens to us is based on our past actions. He was invited to say that at one time. Somebody came to him and put forward this view and they said, "Other teachers say that. Would you say this is true?" And he said, "That's wrong to say." And he identified several other causes that lead to circumstances in our life. He mentioned illness, diet, climate, accident, assault—all these things could result in painful situations in our life. So he explicitly said you can't go around saying that everything that happens is the result of past karma.

The way I think about it is that there are lots of laws at work in our universe. There are physical laws, there are chemical laws, biological laws, psychological laws, and there are karmic laws. All these things have a place to play in this universe, and karma is not supreme above all of them. They're all going on.

So we need to take this teaching in broad terms: as we act from wholesome motives, wholesome things will come back into our lives. As we act from unwholesome motives, unwholesome things will come back into our lives. But what we can't do is take our present situation and try to say, "Wow, I'm suffering now. What did I do in the past that made this happen?" Maybe the Buddha could have seen that, but you and I can't. So to try and look in that way is just speculation, and it generally doesn't make us much happier.

This is trying to use karma as a rearview mirror. Here I am, how'd I get here? Oh, let's look in the past. We don't have that ability, so I wouldn't even bother. The main way to use karma is as a future GPS system. You want to go toward happiness? Here's the path. Turn right here. Turn left there. Karma will tell us what to do to aim toward happiness in the future. It doesn't really tell us how we got to where we are now. Many, many things have come into play.

Those of us who have been brought up in modern cultures based on science, maybe based on democratic ideals, often have a strong resistance to this teaching. Maybe it's because it says that we're to some extent responsible for our own happiness. Maybe we have a democratic ideal that we should all be equally happy. And so from the light of our view, this view which says we're to some extent responsible for our happiness might seem cold, might seem cruel, might seem heartless. And sometimes people think there's an implication: "Oh, if somebody's suffering, that means they deserve to suffer because it came out of their past actions."

This notion of deserving to suffer is not at all present in the Buddha's teaching on karma. I'm absolutely convinced that if the Buddha could have gone around to the most hardened criminals of his day and removed all the suffering from their lives, he would have done so without hesitation. While he didn't possess that ability, there is one story that beautifully illustrates his attitude—his encounter with Angulimala.

Under the misguided direction of a teacher, Angulimala had killed 999 individuals on his path to reaching 1,000 victims, collecting a finger from each person as proof of his deed. As he approached his thousandth kill, he decided to make the Buddha his final victim.

The Buddha was walking along a mountain path when friends warned him: "Don't go that way. The killer Angulimala is hiding in those hills, and he will kill you." The Buddha simply replied, "I don't think so," and continued walking.

Angulimala swooped down onto the path and chased the Buddha with a knife, yet somehow could never catch him despite the Buddha's steady, unhurried pace. Finally, in frustration, Angulimala called out, "Stop! Stop!"

The Buddha turned around calmly and said, "I have stopped, Angulimala, but you have not stopped."

At that moment, Angulimala realized this person was coming from an entirely different place. Intrigued, he essentially asked, "What's up with you?" The Buddha gave him the teachings and converted Angulimala on the spot. The serial killer immediately abandoned his plan to kill his thousandth victim, came to practice with the Buddha, and—as many of these stories go—became fully awakened in a relatively short time.

Here was a serial killer of his era, yet the Buddha didn't say, "You should suffer. I'm turning my back on you—good luck." Instead, he taught him complete release from all suffering.

Interestingly, when Angulimala went out for alms rounds in nearby villages after ordaining, people threw stones at him. They knew his history as a killer—perhaps some victims had been family members of these villagers. When Angulimala returned to the Buddha saying, "Bhante, they're stoning me," the Buddha replied, "Bear it, my friend, because if you had not practiced and become awakened, your suffering would have been far worse than this."

This wasn't because the Buddha believed in deserving suffering due to karmic law—Angulimala had already become awakened. It's simply how the law operates. Expecting to do something unskillful or hurtful without consequences would be like expecting gravity not to function—like expecting a ripe apple to fall from its stem and not drop to the ground. Gravity operates. Karma operates. This is the universe we inhabit. We cannot stop these laws.

Hearing the equanimity phrase, some people mistake it for an excuse not to care: "Oh, beings are owners of their actions. Their mental habits brought this suffering upon them, so I don't need to be concerned. That's your problem, not mine." But this isn't equanimity—it's equanimity's near enemy, which Jill discussed: indifference, or uncaring.

True compassion doesn't concern itself with the source of suffering. Compassion simply wants to alleviate anyone's suffering, regardless of its origins—and suffering arises from many different causes, which we'll explore in a moment.

If equanimity practice or reflection on karma leads to indifference, the antidote is to strengthen metta and compassion. Bring loving-kindness and compassion toward the person you're feeling indifferent about, allowing these caring brahmaviharas to suffuse your equanimity. Ideally, we want all four brahmaviharas to awaken in our hearts together, not in isolation.

The results of action manifest in at least six ways. Carol discussed three of them in her talk on generosity—remember how she described the wholesome feeling that arises when you're about to give? Then the wholesome feeling present in the actual act of giving?

And in reflecting on your giving, you have a wholesome feeling. So in this way, our actions come alive in three different times: before we do the action, while we're doing the action, and after we reflect on the action. This is true of all our acts. These are three ways that we can feel the impact of an action, any action that we do.

The fourth way that they come back is our actions affect the way that people relate to us. If we relate to people from friendliness, from warmth, from care, from interest, then they respond to us in that same way. If we relate to people from not caring, from lack of interest, from hostility or criticism, then people will shrink back from us and not really want to approach. So this is the fourth way our actions come back.

The fifth way is in habitual states of mind. Why does the mind move when you're in meditation? And where does it go? It's just reflecting habit patterns. Our minds move into areas where we've invested energy, into areas where it's gone before. This is from the Buddha: "Because whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty, then their mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will, and cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of generosity, kindness, and compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of generosity, kindness, and compassion."

Basically through our patterns of thinking we wear a groove in the mind, and that gets played out again and again and again. There's this very nice quote that's often attributed to the Buddha. I haven't found it anywhere in the Buddha's teachings, but he might have said it: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit and habit hardens into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings." So this is just attending to our habits of mind and keeping them in a wholesome track.

One of the facts of life is that some of our habits of mind kind of got put there by forces outside of ourselves, and then we are left to replay them somewhat involuntarily. Instances like childhood abuse, instances of societal racism, instances of early trauma or traumatic loss go in so deeply before children have a chance to know what's happening or how to work with them that they kind of get programmed before we have any awareness of them. And then when we come into meditation, we find, oh, these are the habit patterns of mind that I have to work with now.

Even though we didn't request them, and even though we certainly wouldn't have chosen them, they are what we bring into meditation. These are the things we have to work with. So as adults, we recognize these are the habits of mind I've gotten. Whether that's fair or not, these are the habits of mind that I need to understand and transform.

So that's five ways karma shows up. And the sixth is the tricky one. The Buddha said that the results of our actions will show up in mysterious ways in the future, in ways we can't really understand. They may play out in this life. They may play out in some future life. And there's no way to know exactly how that's going to work. The detailed workings of karma are an imponderable.

But even the basics, the basic teaching that virtue brings happiness—how does that work? That's the basic teaching of karma. Virtue brings happiness. How does that work? That's a mystery. And what it really says is morality is not just an invention of the rational mind. Morality is woven into the very fabric of the universe through this law of karma.

Originally we may have thought that karma was a cold and heartless teaching because it put too much on personal responsibility. But when I look at it, karma infuses our universe with a moral core. The universe is fundamentally a moral place because the law of karma operates for all beings in this universe. To me, this is the caring view.

This is the heartful view of the world. I wouldn't really care to live in a universe that didn't have this moral dimension as part of its basis. But the universe we're in has this dimension.

So the next piece to look at is how karma relates to rebirth. And again, I can't verify all the Buddha's teachings on karma and I can't verify the Buddha's teachings on rebirth.

But I have had teachers who felt they could verify some of these teachings. So I believe some of it is empirically verifiable. I'm just not there yet.

What I would say is if you have a very skeptical attitude toward these two teachings, that's fine. We aren't asking that you believe in either karma or rebirth. But I would also say, what about keeping an open mind to the possibility? You don't have to believe, but if you move into denial and say it's not true, how do you know that? So often we find that we don't believe in something simply because we don't want to believe in it. But the scientific approach is to hold it as a hypothesis and examine it over years, see what your experience is, the experience of friends. And when you die, see where you wake up. These are things you can explore for a long time.

The teaching on rebirth says that the actions we follow through with in this life will affect our next birth. The Buddha gives some general outlines of how this would play out. He said something like, those who are generous in a birth will at some point in the future experience abundance in their life. Those who are kind to living beings will at some point in the future experience good health in this life or another life. Those who inquire deeply when they're around wise teachers will experience wisdom in their future life. This is part of the meaning of karma being the womb from which we're born.

There's another teaching on this: "Grain, possessions, money" - you realize this comes from an agricultural society 2,500 years ago - "grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, workers, family, and dependents, none of these can you take with you. You must cast them all aside. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession. That is your real possession and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner. Therefore, do good actions, gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings after death."

Your actions are your real possessions. They're the womb from which you will be born. Maybe you don't believe in this, but what if it happens to turn out to be true? Wouldn't you like to act in accordance with it? And if it turns out not to be true, but you had simply lived a good life, that wouldn't be a bad outcome either. There's a whole discourse in the Majjhima Nikaya number 60 where the Buddha outlines this reasoning for believing in karma and rebirth.

Rebirth can also be understood as a moment-to-moment process. It's not the only way the Buddha meant it, but it is there in the suttas also. We are changing from moment to moment. A new sense of self is being born many times during a day, conditioned by the previous senses of self. This is going on all the time.

One of the criticisms of rebirth is: isn't there some lasting thing in a being that would have to be reborn in order for that continuity to take place? And the answer to that is no. Just as there is no lasting thing in you that goes from moment to moment to moment, and yet a consistent personality shows up moment after moment after moment, more or less. You don't go to bed and wake up as Deepa the next day. There's some consistent personality that wakes up the next morning that is you.

In the same way, there's some consistency that goes after death into the next birth that carries some of these karmic patterns, but there's not a fixed thing that continues or endures. One moment conditions the next, conditions the next, conditions the next. That's how it happens in this life. That's how it happens into the next birth. Ajahn Amaro had a nice way of saying this. He said, "The process of going from one life to the next is not very different from the process of going from one moment to the next." It's a nice one to reflect on.

Then we come to the question of karma and not-self. Because these two can seem contradictory. If there's no self, then who is affected by the actions, by the results of karma? In fact, one of the bhikkhus at the time of the Buddha asked the same question. The bhikkhu was in front of the Buddha and said, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" That is basically that question. And the Buddha said, "You haven't been listening to me." He didn't explain it, didn't answer it any further. He just said, "You haven't been listening."

But let's explore this a little deeper. Remembering that not-self doesn't deny individuality—each of us is a unique being. It's just that there's nothing fixed at the center. There's no core, no observer.

An analogy often used is that of a stream. You could walk down to Gaston Pond—not today, maybe not tomorrow, but one of these days when it's cleared and safe—and look at the stream flowing out on the north end. That stream has certain characteristics: it's relatively small, runs fairly fast, has pretty clear water that you can see tumbling downhill. It's definitely a stream.

But if you stand on the edge and look down, what is a stream really? It's flowing water. Is there anything fixed in it? No. You never step into the same river twice, as the old philosopher said. It's just a changing flow, but it has a pattern. That stream has certain characteristics.

If you drive west of here for about forty-five minutes, you'll cross the Connecticut River, which is also a stream but of a very different nature. It's broad, slow, muddy—looks completely different from the Gaston Pond stream. Yet they're both streams with individual characteristics, and we can give them names.

In Buddhist understanding, each of us is a stream. Particularly, we're considered to have a mind stream. There's a flowing river of thoughts and feelings and perceptions, views and opinions, likes and dislikes, warmth and coolness, generosity and selfishness that run through us, changing moment by moment. Yet there's a consistent pattern to this, which is what we call someone's personality.

Each of us has a unique way of showing up in the world based on the particular mix of all these qualities flowing through our mind streams. So it's always changing, nothing is fixed, and yet each of us has a unique combination of patterns. This is what we call personality.

Personality comprises the ways people think and speak and act and feel. Does this sound like karma? Thinking, feeling, speaking, acting—this is what constitutes the field of action. So personality is basically our karmic stream, running according to our conditioned habits of mind for a very long time.

Personality may be consistent, but it's not solid. It's not fixed. Although personality isn't fixed, do you find it easy to change? This is part of the understanding of practice, isn't it? Changing our habits of mind is not easy because they have tremendous momentum. The Buddha would say lifetimes of momentum lie behind these habits of mind.

As the Buddha taught: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin." Living beings are bound by karma like the chariot wheel by the pin. It's this habitual momentum the Buddha points to here. It's not easy to shift momentum we've been cultivating over at least decades, if not longer.

But the point of practice is to transform it—to transform the unskillful tendencies of mind into wholesome habits of mind. And as you all know, it's hard work. It doesn't happen overnight.

The good news is that nothing in our mindstream is fixed.

The teaching of not-self reveals that nothing in our mindstream is fixed, and this truth makes transformation possible. Our ignorance is not fixed. Craving is not fixed. Greed, aversion, and delusion are not fixed. They are all mutable, all capable of being transformed.

The difficulty lies in recognizing that these are strong karmic patterns. Dharma practice uses the principle of karma to transform karma—we are using karma to change karma.

When I came into practice, I carried many unwholesome habits of mind that felt quite compulsive. The greed, anger, reactivity, and confusion played out repeatedly in endless cycles. My mindstream was flowing in a particular direction, which I describe as a lake designed by M.C. Escher—where the outflow wraps around and feeds back into the source. What flows out becomes what flows back in, filling the lake again. We call this Lake Samsara, because it endlessly cycles the same material: fear, confusion, anger, greed.

Then Dharma practice enters like a tributary flowing from a different direction, carrying different content. Suddenly the volitions begin changing. No longer only greed, aversion, and delusion, but mindfulness, loving-kindness, generosity, wisdom, equanimity, compassion, patience—all the beautiful qualities begin flowing in. This transforms the karmic makeup of the stream.

As we change the karmic composition, the stream heads in a new direction. It no longer cycles back into Lake Samsara but flows toward the Nibbanic Ocean. Whether you thought you wanted to go there or not, that is where you are heading. I share this in the spirit of Yogi Berra, who said, "If you don't know where you're going, you could end up somewhere else." But now you know—you are flowing toward the Nibbanic Ocean.

This transformation becomes possible because nothing is fixed within us. Those old karmic patterns directing the stream need not remain, as the new karmic patterns of Dharma begin shifting us in a different direction. Liberation is possible because none of the old patterns are permanent. Ignorance, craving, clinging, grasping, becoming—all can be uprooted.

Karma explains the development of the path. The karmic power of intentions that we place into each moment of Dharma practice begins reshaping us, bringing far greater happiness into our lives. As we examine this factor of intention, we discover how critical it is to practice. I would say it is the only real tool we have for change.

Here we are as human beings, all sharing the same situation—afloat on a changing sea of circumstances that is unpredictable, chaotic, always shifting. Whether we look at mind or world, we see the same: change, impermanence, fluctuation, conditions not subject to reason, unpredictable and often chaotic.

We have only one way to steer on this ocean, and that is with our intention. Picture yourself on a boat upon this vast, changing ocean of life with countless unpredictable events unfolding. The rudder of that boat is your intention—this is how you navigate to safe harbor. By continuously placing intention behind the wholesome factors of the path, you reach safety. It is the only reliable rudder we possess: the intentions of mindfulness, loving-kindness, generosity, compassion, non-harming.

This brings to mind a dialogue from Nisargadatta Maharaj, an Advaita Vedanta teacher in Bombay.

And he mostly worked in dialogue with people. So one student came to him and said he wanted to talk about transformation and destiny. And Maharaj said, "Well, your own will has been the backbone of your destiny."

And the student said, "Well, surely karma interfered."

And Maharaj replied, "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life, but the attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

I love this statement: your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character. That's what we're doing here. We're shaping our character and we're shaping it in a way that only leads in one direction. It leads to peace and release and nibbana.

So the Buddha said that when one becomes fully awakened, there's no more generation of karma. It doesn't mean that one stops acting, but no new karma is being created. And that's what he called the end of karma. And he said, "What action is neither painful nor bright, with neither painful nor bright results, which leads to the end of action?" And he said, "It is this noble eightfold path: right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration."

Essentially, it is the letting go of all of our self-centered activities, all of our activities that are just about the small me and our small desires and small aversions. By letting that go and trusting this stream of Dharma to carry us, in a way, I would say, by stopping doing so much, we are carried along by wholesome intentions to that final freedom and final awakening.

So again, as the Buddha put it, it is this noble eightfold path that is the way leading to the cessation of karma, leading to the full awakening and release from suffering.

So let's just sit for a moment together.

Karma shapes the circumstances of your life. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character.

CHAPTER 73

Morning Instructions

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this opening session of a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong provides essential meditation instructions rooted in the Mahasi Sayadaw lineage. He explains how mindfulness serves as the direct path to liberation, as outlined in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), where the Buddha describes the four foundations of mindfulness as leading in only one direction: to complete freedom.
>
> Armstrong introduces three possible meditation anchors for beginning practitioners: whole body awareness in sitting posture, open receptivity to sounds, and mindfulness of breathing sensations. He emphasizes that these anchors help stabilize attention in the present moment before gradually opening to the full range of experience at all six sense doors. The instructions follow the systematic approach of Mahasi Sayadaw, the influential 20th-century Burmese meditation master whose method maps precisely onto the Buddha's teachings on mindfulness.
>
> The talk contextualizes vipassanā meditation within the threefold training of sīla (ethical conduct), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom), explaining how simple present-moment awareness can lead to complete liberation when properly supported and developed. Armstrong also provides practical guidance for formal walking meditation and outlines the retreat structure, emphasizing a sustainable pace for the long journey ahead.

Good morning, everyone. I hope you had a restful night because we had quite a rousing opening last night with the thunder and lightning right in the middle of our opening. I remember people used to tell me that in the land of Goenka retreats, they considered a major storm at the start of a retreat a really good omen. So I think we had a really good omen last night. I hope you slept well and found your way to breakfast this morning.

Today, as we talked about last night and as you've seen from the schedule, it's a light opening day. There's quite a bit of free time, open time, time for conversation or going for walks, helping pull some of the apples down from the many trees down below. They do get used in cooking, so bringing them down now will help you eat later. It's a good investment, and it's also just fun to do something in community.

I want to give preliminary instructions this morning for our meditation. Sally began last night, and I'll go over some of that same ground. But I wanted to step back and take a big-level view of meditation and our style of meditation.

There are so many different lineages of meditation in the world. I think every major spiritual tradition has its own approach. Certainly you find it in Christianity and Judaism and Islam and Taoism and all the yogic schools. In the Buddhist schools, there are many different techniques that could be applied.

In the realm of insight meditation, which of course we practice here because it's the name on the building, it tends to center around this practice of mindfulness. Mindfulness is becoming a big word in the world today. It's amazing to me how widespread the interest in mindfulness has become, and a lot of it is through secular doorways—mindfulness-based stress reduction, secular mindfulness, mindfulness magazine, and so on.

But it was presented originally by the Buddha as the direct path to liberation. He says that really clearly in a discourse, the Satipatthana Sutta. The development of the four establishments of mindfulness is the direct path that leads in only one direction, and that is to liberation. So that is really the cornerstone of insight meditation.

All the different retreats that you'll attend here and at Spirit Rock are under this banner, with the exception of the Brahmavihara retreats. They're focused on metta, compassion, joy, and equanimity. So we're in the realm of mindfulness practice, and we will be for the six weeks or three months, including metta practice along the way.

What is amazing to me is that this simple quality—mindfulness has something to do with an attention to the present moment—that this simple attending to the present moment can take us from here all the way to complete liberation. In fact, if you didn't know you were heading in that direction, you're going there anyway. As I think Sally said last night, if you start and you continue, that's where it ends up. So just a warning: if you don't want to be on that path, you've taken the wrong flight.

How can it do that? We'll be talking a lot about mindfulness and how that works, how that function works. But I would say in the whole spectrum of mindfulness practices, they're distinguished by basically two things. One is what we choose to pay attention to. And the second is the way that we connect with what we're paying attention to. You'll see as the instructions go on, there are different ways of connecting. It may not be immediately apparent, but there are different ways of connecting.

Obviously you know there are lots of different things you can pay attention to. I'm sure you found that in your earlier retreats: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and emotions is the basic outline of what we pay attention to. The Buddha made this really clear in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the Satipatthana Sutta, which is the basis for Vipassana practice in general.

What was revolutionary in his teaching is that this simple faculty of paying attention in a certain way leads to liberation when supported by ethical conduct and when trained to lead onward to wisdom. So it's really these three branches that come together for us: the basis of ethical conduct, or sila, and we'll emphasize that when we do a formal retreat opening this evening. We'll all take the five precepts together as a community. The development of mindfulness is our primary meditation, and how that leads onward to developing liberating insight—how that leads to the wisdom that frees us, frees our heart and mind.

So we already know there are all these different things we can pay attention to with mindfulness: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, emotions, and more. And then in terms of how we connect, sometimes we're instructed to really pierce the object with our attention, to make a really strong connection to the object called piercing it.

Other times we're more encouraged to be relaxed, receptive, and just let the object come and touch it gently. These two differences will have an impact on our attitude and our relationship to the experiences through our six senses. We'll give instructions on both the objects and the way of approaching as we go.

Once we have that as the field, in the three-month course, we give instructions in a specific way. It is a way that follows the teaching—and I would say very brilliant teaching—of Mahasi Sayadaw, who was a Burmese monk from the 20th century. I would say that Mahasi Sayadaw was the most influential meditation master of the 20th century. He established hundreds of centers in Burma. His followers have established hundreds of centers around the world, both in Asia and the West—this being one of them, Spirit Rock being one of them.

The beauty of his meditation instructions is that they map onto that whole range of experience that the Buddha outlined in a very precise and systematic way. We are going to try to convey what we understand as the essence of those instructions in this retreat. This is not just a random fancy of one of us. The IMS three-month team as a whole—meaning both part one and part two—have made the decision to adopt Mahasi Sayadaw's instructions as our basis. So that's what we'll be teaching.

Now you may come from a different lineage within the Vipassana world. You may have come from the lineage of Ajahn Chah or Ajahn Sumedho, the Thai forest tradition. You may have been practicing in recent years with Venerable Analayo, a bhikkhu who's resident just down the street and currently in retreat. You may have practiced with S.N. Goenka, whose instructions came from his Burmese teacher, U Ba Khin.

All of those approaches are fine. We're not exclusive about how you want to practice. If you want to bring in other approaches, talk with your teacher. Let your teacher know what you're doing, what you'd like to do, and you all can work it out. We're not rigid. We love the other approaches. Most of us have practiced in many other styles, found they brought a lot of benefit, and so we're very open to that. But what we'll be teaching are the Mahasi Sayadaw instructions, modified as they've evolved over many years of three-month teaching.

When Mahasi Sayadaw gave the instructions, he basically told everyone up front how to relate to experiences at all the sense doors. So on the first day, you'd get instructions about breath, body sensations, sounds, sights, thoughts, emotions, subtle experiences of mind. That's a lot to take in. We don't want to overwhelm you on the first morning. What we're going to do is kind of trickle these instructions out day by day, adding a little more detail until finally we cover the whole range.

The aim as we present meditation in this three-month retreat is for you to be able to be mindful with any experience you're having in any of the postures—sitting, walking, standing, lying down—at any time. Basically, if it's in your experience, it's grounds for our mindfulness practice. That's where we're aiming. Many of you have followed these instructions for a long time and you know what I'm talking about. If you haven't been at a three-month course, you may not have gotten them in quite this sequence of instructions. So that's the approach we're going to take.

We recognize that as we begin with simple objects like breath, body, sounds—as Sally did last night—it's not that you aren't having thoughts and emotions. You are. And you may know already, hopefully you do, how to work with them. Those instructions will come a little later, but if they're arising and you're able to be with them mindfully, please do.

We're going to begin by offering the suggestion that you start with something we call an anchor. In this style of vipassana practice, an anchor is an object that you come back to repeatedly out of preference, out of choice. Actually the three areas that Sally talked about last night are all suitable choices for anchors.

Classically, the anchor is the breath. When Mahasi Sayadaw presented the instructions, I think that was the anchor that was offered. As we've evolved the instructions over the years, we've found that it's helpful to offer a choice of anchors for meditators. We'll offer those three choices, and I'll explain them again in the guided meditation.

The value of an anchor is that in the early days of the retreat, you choose to come back to that same point again and again. You're with the anchor. You're with the anchor. You're with the anchor. Thoughts come. We're carried away in thought. At some point you wake up—oh, back to the present moment. What should I do? Oh, come back to the anchor. So we reconnect with breath, body, or sounds. And that sets us on the mindfulness track again.

We find that having an anchor is helpful because it tends to build up our ability to maintain stable attention in the present moment. Once that stability has grown somewhat, we like to open up to all the changing objects that are happening at all six sense doors. But if we go into all six sense doors immediately, it can feel a little overwhelming, distracting, and difficult to remain stable. That's why we're going to build up through this emphasis in the first few days on an anchor. I'll include that in the guiding as we start the meditation, and I hope you'll get a sense for it.

So with that as preface, welcome to the world of Mahasi Sayadaw. Please sit comfortably. Normally in our style of meditation we sit with closed eyes—this reduces the distraction a bit. But if you're used to sitting with eyes open and you prefer that, that's fine too. Mostly we sit with eyes closed.

As you settle into your meditation posture, rediscover that element that Sally talked about last night: the combination of uprightness with the spine being somewhat straight, and relaxation. You're starting from a point of ease, not needing to change anything in your present experience, but allowing yourself to rest in it.

As you settle into the present moment, take a moment to notice what's here. What's in your experience right now? There are body sensations. There are sounds. There's some mood that you've come in with or find yourself in. Thoughts may be coming and going. Images can arise and pass. There is a visual field, but with eyes closed, not much going on—just a little gray.

With that kind of wide open look at what's here, we can start to narrow the attention a little bit. Part of the training in mindfulness is developing the ability to guide the attention, to train the attention. So first we allow the attention to settle in the body posture as you're sitting. Feel the uprightness of the posture. Look throughout to see if there are any obvious areas of holding. You can relax the forehead. Soften the eyes. Let the jaw be unclenched. Let the shoulders drop. Let the belly be soft. And let your sitting base support your uprightness with strength.

As you sit with the attention on the whole body posture in sitting, can you get the sense that the body posture itself could be a focus for mindfulness? Can you possibly take in at a glance the whole body in sitting? From the top of the head through the torso and pelvis, the legs and feet. You may not get 100% with a glance—you might get 50, you might get 75. But see how that feels, bringing your attention to the whole body posture in sitting.

This reference point, the posture in sitting, can become an anchor. It's a reliable thing to come back to again and again because it's always there.

Now open your attention up and let it become wide. Let your attention open to all the sounds that are around you. Some may be in front, some behind, right or left, or overhead. Sounds from inside—my voice, the fans, each other. Sounds from outside. When your attention is open and a sound arises, you don't have to make any effort to hear. The sound arises and it's known spontaneously. You just have to be receptive, ready to receive, open and ready to receive.

You can have a sense in the meditation on sounds that it can be very restful. The way you're not directing the attention anywhere—you're just sitting in the middle of all the sounds, very open, in a receiving mode, not sending the mind out, just receptive. Receptive. Taking sounds as a focus can enhance the sense of easefulness, relaxation. So this is the second possible anchor: just an openness to sounds wherever they arise.

Now, bringing the attention back into the body posture, can you be open to the body in the same way as to sounds? That is, you're just in the mode of receiving all the different sensations throughout the body.

What's being felt within the body right now. We're not trying to keep the attention on the whole body—we're simply opening to what's happening in the body. Can we just receive that, without judging or trying to fix it?

As you connect with the body in this receptive way, you'll naturally notice the sensations connected with breathing. Every time there's an in-breath, certain sensations are felt. Every time there's an out-breath, different sensations are felt.

Now narrow the focus and bring your attention to the sensations of breathing. Breathing in, where are sensations felt in the body? Breathing out, where are sensations felt? And how is it just to feel those sensations—to notice them as breathing and simply feel them?

As to where you feel them or where you direct the attention with the breath, there's not one right way. Some people naturally feel the sensations most clearly around the tip of the nose. For others, it might be in the belly, or it could be in the chest. Or it could be through the whole body—keeping the perspective of the whole body while sitting and feeling the breath. See where for you it's easiest to connect with breathing. It could be in any of these ways. Then choose that as your primary focus in the meditation for now.

So the breath is the third possible anchor. Many of you have spent considerable time with the breath—it may be very accessible. If that's so, this can be an excellent anchor for you.

In the remainder of this sitting, play a little with these three choices of anchor: the whole body in sitting, sounds, or breath. See which one feels most reliable for you as a way to stay connected to the present moment. That's the purpose of an anchor.

Of course, whichever one you choose, thoughts will come, and you'll be swept away for periods of time. We'll lose the connection to the present moment, following some train of thought. Then after a while, we'll wake up from that thought excursion and be back in the present moment. Appreciate that return—that unwilled return to the present moment—and then choose to connect again with your anchor.

This willingness to come back from thought excursions and connect again with the present through your anchor—this is what will build the stability of mind and stability of attention.

So in your formal sittings today—and there are several more formal sittings on the schedule—please continue to play with this concept of an anchor. See if one of these focuses works well for you: body posture, sounds, or breathing, as a way to stabilize the attention in the present. That's really what we're trying to develop over the first few days of the retreat. Then as we go day by day, we'll open up the instructions, refine these guidances, and bring in other objects as we go. First few days, we're trying to stabilize.

Of course, today is really a day for settling in. You're in the three-month course—six weeks or three months. It's not a sprint. So don't knock yourself out in the first hundred yards of this journey. Enter at your own pace, at a sustainable pace for now. You can always pick up the pace later—don't worry.

As you go through the day today, there are formal structured sitting periods. Continue as you like with other sittings and formal walking during the day. There are also some informal times. We really wanted to build in time because you're coming for such a long stretch. If there are business items or personal items from home that you need to finish before you can really go fully into silence, please take today to do that.

A few words about the schedule today: After we finish this session, the managers will come in and give a talk about details of the retreat, answering any questions you have about logistics. We'll finish about 9:15 here, and then there will be a fifteen-minute break—basically a bathroom break. Please stay in silence through that break. Come back in for the managers' announcements at 9:30.

When the managers' announcements finish—they have 9:45 as their scheduled finish—I've never seen managers finish announcements in fifteen minutes, however may it be so—at 9:45 or thereabouts is an open time.

You're invited to participate in apple picking. You're invited to carry on your own practice as you like. And just a guideline for that open period, which goes basically until 11:45 on this schedule, but really until lunchtime: please keep all the buildings in silence—certainly the meditation hall, dorms, walking rooms, but even the dining hall. Once people start talking in there, if others are trying to maintain their mindfulness and quiet through the day, the dining room gets very, very loud. So throughout the building, please keep it quiet so those who wish to enter more fully into the silence can be supported in that. But if you'd like to be outside from 9:45 to lunch, and again there's a period in the late afternoon, feel free to talk, connect, help with the apples.

Take care of any personal business that's still remaining. As you go through the morning, if you'd like to do some more formal practice, I'll give really brief instructions for walking meditation. We'll really expand these starting tomorrow when we move into a full schedule of sitting and walking.

Many of you, probably most of you, have done formal walking before. There are some traditions where it's not taught. And so I'll just say briefly that the formal walking is about as exciting as the formal sitting. So that is to say, you're not going for a walk to enjoy nature. You pick a walking path, maybe twenty to thirty paces long. You walk from one end to the other, experiencing primarily your body in movement. A convenient focus is the activity in the legs and feet. But some people like to be with the whole body. Some people like to be more focused just on the sensations in the feet. That's fine. Starting off a retreat, I like to stay with the whole body or the legs and feet all together.

Find a pace. You can experiment with pace. We have more or less three gears that we talk about. One is normal pace. One is a little slower. And one is really slow—what we call the creeping or tortoise pace. So you'll probably see people doing all three. Find the one that keeps you relaxed and present. That's really the guideline: what keeps the mindfulness steady and continuous.

So walking from one end to the other, twenty to thirty paces. Stop when you reach the other end. Take a moment to orient in standing. Standing is also a great meditation posture. Mindfully turn and then walk back to the other end, trying to be with each step, with your chosen focus—whole body or legs and feet. Reach the other end, stand, turn around, walk back. So again, it's not so much going for a walk as just finding a comfortable and convenient way to sustain the mindfulness in the best way possible, meaning be present to your experience as best you can. Keep the same attitude of being relaxed and alert. It's a little harder to fall asleep in walking, so it provides good energy balance.

At three o'clock this afternoon, there will be in the hall a meeting for all of you called Being in Community. A few of us will lead you through some exercises, give you a little chance to connect with one another formally, and talk about what it means to be in a diverse and inclusive community as IMS is growing into and seeks to become. That will be from 3:00 to 3:45, and we ask that everyone please come to that. I think you'll find it enjoyable and interesting.

Then this evening at five with the light dinner, we go back into full silence. So the return to silence really marks the entry into the formal retreat atmosphere, and we will make that very clear tonight with a formal course opening. The 7:30 dharma talk tonight will be a formal entryway into a long retreat, and we'll also take the refuges and precepts together as a community to demonstrate our shared commitment to values and to care for one another.

Carol just suggested that I say a little bit about interviews. In this retreat, we will be meeting with you for individual interviews. Sally likes to call them practice meetings. I'm in the old school frame of thought where we've called them interviews for about forty years. But we're not really interviewing you for a job or anything. They're meetings to talk about how your practice is going. So we will begin with those on Friday in a few days. In this retreat, all your practice meetings will be one-to-one. So you'll be meeting one-to-one with two teachers who will alternate with you. Generally, you'll get two or three interviews in a week. The teachers do take days off in the long retreat.

These are affectionately called Teacher's Mental Health Days. So there will be a couple of days each week when we're not doing formal scheduled interviews, but there will be five days of one-to-one interviews every week, with you alternating between two teachers.

In addition, Monica is kindly offering optional sign-up interviews in the afternoons. Generally on a day when you haven't had a formal practice meeting in the morning, there will be the opportunity to sign up for a limited number of spots to meet with Monica for a practice meeting in the afternoon. This is really for people who have something actively happening in their practice—it's not just a chance to hang out with Monica because she's such a nice person, although she is, and you will enjoy hanging out with her. But please come to her if you have something related to your practice that you really want to talk about. There will be sign-ups on the board after the morning sit. I believe she will start to offer those tomorrow.

So that's all I can think of for now. We wish you well in this day of transition, and we'll continue to see you throughout the day. Enjoy your day of settling.

We now have a fifteen-minute break, basically a bathroom break. Please maintain the silence, and then the managers will be here at 9:30.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 74

Mindfulness of Breathing: Ānāpānasati Practice and Its Central Role in Buddhist Meditation

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents a comprehensive exploration of ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing), drawing extensively from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and Ānāpānasati Sutta (MN 118). Armstrong examines why breath awareness holds such a central place across all Buddhist traditions—Theravāda, Tibetan, and Zen—and was praised by the Buddha as "a noble dwelling, a divine dwelling."

The talk begins by defining mindfulness through the lens of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, emphasizing the key Pali term pajānāti (knowing/understanding) that appears throughout the four foundations. Armstrong proposes that mindfulness is essentially "knowing our present experience" with the intelligence that opens into wisdom. He explores how mindfulness of the body serves as the foundation for all meditation practice, citing the Buddha's extensive praise of kāyagatāsati in the Aṅguttara Nikāya.

Armstrong discusses both the benefits and potential obstacles of breath practice. The benefits include its constant availability, neutral feeling tone, natural rhythm that brings sukha (pleasure) leading to samādhi, and its capacity to fulfill all four satipaṭṭhānas. He addresses common difficulties including striving, aversion to thoughts, self-judgment, and boredom, offering practical guidance for working with these hindrances. The talk concludes with the Buddha's teaching that mindfulness of breathing is "peaceful and sublime" and "calms unwholesome mental states whenever they arise."

In this evening's talk, I'd like to explore mindfulness of breathing in greater depth. While we've already discussed mindfulness extensively, I want to focus specifically on this foundational practice.

Most of you probably know that mindfulness of breathing stands as the premier meditation practice in the entire Vipassana lineage. Virtually every Vipassana teacher I've practiced with has placed it at the center of their instructions. The Buddha positioned it prominently in his teachings as well, as I'll discuss shortly. Moreover, this is the only meditation practice I know of that is shared in common among the three major Buddhist meditative traditions: Theravada, Tibetan, and Zen. All three traditions regard this as a primary practice, and I know of no other meditation technique of which this can be said. This widespread adoption speaks volumes about its significance.

Regarding the Buddha's teachings, he actually didn't offer many meditation techniques. Having read through more than 2000 pages of his discourses in English translation, I find relatively few devoted to specific meditation instructions. However, two discourses are most central for understanding mindfulness of breathing: the Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness, called the Satipatthana Sutta, found in the Middle Length Discourses or Majjhima Nikaya, and the Discourse on Mindfulness of Breathing, also found in the Middle Length Discourses, called the Anapanasati Sutta.

I realize many of you may not be interested in becoming Buddhist scholars, but I will offer some scholarly details along the way for those who are curious. There aren't many opportunities outside the three-month course where you'll encounter this material. We'll discuss the sutta names in Pali and these collections of discourses in their original language. Once you hear these terms a few times, they become familiar, and perhaps subversively, you become a Buddhist scholar yourself.

The Satipatthana discourse, which is the central teaching on the foundations of mindfulness and truly the foundation for Vipassana practice, contains a crucial clue to the meaning of mindfulness. The Buddha never explicitly defines mindfulness—as Sally mentioned the other night, if you asked around, we could probably generate a hundred different definitions. Search the web and you'll find dozens more. When I examine the Satipatthana Sutta, however, I discover an interesting point that points to what I believe is a central understanding.

The Buddha describes four foundations in that discourse: the body; feeling tone, which can be pleasant, unpleasant, or neither; the mind and mind states as the third foundation; and the fourth foundation, somewhat mysteriously called dhammas, which I think of as dhamma principles—like mini-dhammas within the fourth foundation.

Let me read excerpts from all four foundations. From the first foundation, when the Buddha describes practicing mindfulness of breath: "Breathing in long, one knows 'I breathe in long.' Breathing out long, one knows 'I breathe out long.'"

From the second foundation on feeling tone: "When feeling a pleasant feeling, one knows 'I feel a pleasant feeling.' When feeling an unpleasant feeling, one knows 'I feel an unpleasant feeling.'"

From the third foundation: "One knows a lustful mind to be lustful and a mind without lust to be without lust."

And from the fourth foundation: "If sensual desire is present in one, one knows 'there is sensual desire in me.' If sensual desire is not present in one, one knows 'there is no sensual desire in me.'"

Having heard these excerpts from all four foundations, one word stands out that links them all. That word is "knows."

This word "knows" is crucial. The Pali word being translated is pajanati, which shares a root with the Pali term sampajanya, meaning clear comprehension. This word pajanati indicates that something is being understood. When Bhikkhu Bodhi translated this discourse, he rendered pajanati as "understands," while Bhikkhu Nanamoli translated it as "knows."

This key word pajanati, used throughout all the mindfulness instructions, reveals that we understand what's happening to us.

And this is what Sally was pointing to last night in her talk on samasati—we know what's happening. We understand what's happening.

So I'm going to suggest that we take this as our working definition for mindfulness. At least I do. And that is: mindfulness is knowing our present experience. That's it in brief. And then the postscript to that would be: in the context of the Buddha's view of reality.

You notice this knowing is connected with the four foundations. The four foundations are the Buddha's own categories, so it's in relationship to these categories of experience.

I find this a really beautiful thing to understand from two points of view. One is it's really simple, isn't it? To know what your present experience is. Let's say you're in the middle of a thought storm. The thought train has been running for a while and you've been to Bali and your home and your future work and your marriage relationship. Then you come back into the meditation hall and you go, "Wow, where am I? Where have I been?" All you have to do to get back is to notice what's happening. You can just ask, "Oh, what's happening now?" That restores mindfulness. It's so simple—what's happening now. And you take a look.

The other thing that's beautiful about this approach is this word pajanati has understanding within it. That was Bhikkhu Bodhi's translation related to sampajanya. And what that means is there's intelligence there—there's intelligence in mindfulness. It's a native intelligence that we all have. All human beings have it. And when we're mindful, we're manifesting it.

This intelligence is the opening point of wisdom. This is how wisdom starts to develop in our practice, because it's an intrinsic part of mindfulness. And then it grows. Based on the properties that mindfulness brings along, the wisdom grows. But it's really right there in mindfulness—that's the start of wisdom.

So it's amazing that something this simple—"Oh, I know what's happening right now. I'm breathing in. I'm breathing in long. My mind is full of lust. I know what's happening"—it's so powerful.

This is a section from the end of the Satipatthana Sutta: "This is the direct path for the purification of beings, for the surmounting of sorrow, for the disappearance of pain and grief, for the attainment of the true way, for the realization of nibbana—namely the four foundations of mindfulness."

How does this simple thing do all that?

The first thing I'd like to mention is this cartoon in the New Yorker that I thought was really quite insightful. It's in three panels. The first panel shows someone on their PC at work—they're sitting at a desk, working on their PC, typing away on the keyboard. But there's a thought bubble above their head, which is an image of them out on the golf course playing a round of golf. So that's kind of where they'd imagine themselves being.

The next panel shows them out on the golf course playing a round of golf. But there's another thought bubble, and that thought bubble is of them at home making love to their partner.

And then there's a third panel. The third panel is the person at home making love to their partner, and the thought bubble is of being back in their office at their desk on the PC.

This is kind of the opposite of "be here now," right?

This is what we might call "be anywhere but here" rather than "be here now." And this is precisely where our thoughts tend to take us, as Sally also spoke about last night. They transport us into past and future, into places where we are not.

When we engage in this mental time travel, we sometimes call it a distraction. We hop on a thought train—it's a kind of distraction that pulls us away from the present moment. Sometimes these fantasies can even be quite enjoyable; it doesn't seem too problematic.

But I invite you to take a closer look. When you've been riding a thought train and then return to the present, how is your mind? Is it calmer? More harmonious? More peaceful? More loving? More attuned to what's around you? Or is it agitated? Stirred up?

Has that past and future thinking brought up uncomfortable emotions? Often when we journey into the future, we might feel anxiety or desire. When we drift into the past, we might feel grief at loss or embarrassment about something we did. These thought excursions open us up to genuinely disturbing emotions. This is the price we pay for not being present.

Mindfulness undoes this pattern. It keeps us here and prevents these disturbances. They're not merely distracting—for the most part, they're genuinely disturbing in their effects. This is something you can notice in your own experience when you return from a thought excursion: What has the effect been? To calm or to stir up? You can investigate this for yourself.

This is what the Buddha called unwise attention. He taught that it's unwise attention when we direct our awareness to things that will lead to more suffering. It's wise attention when we give our attention to things that will lead to wholesome states of mind, beautiful states of mind. Mindfulness is one of those most beautiful qualities, and it brings other beautiful states along with it. It's a very wholesome seed for further development.

This is mindfulness in general. Within this broader understanding, the Buddha identified the four foundations of mindfulness. The first foundation is mindfulness of the body—truly the foundation of the Satipatthana practice.

In the Anguttara Nikaya, the numerical discourses, there's a remarkable passage where fifty suttas appear in sequence, all in praise of mindfulness of the body. This represents a powerful statement of emphasis. The Buddha truly highlighted this practice, saying: "When one thing is developed and cultivated, the body becomes tranquil, the mind becomes tranquil, extraneous thoughts subside, and all wholesome qualities that pertain to true knowledge reach fulfillment. What is that one thing? Mindfulness directed to the body."

So mindfulness of the body was truly central to his message. This is fascinating because ultimately meditation concerns itself with the mind. The qualities that cause suffering originate in the mind. The beautiful qualities originate in the mind. The hindrances are there. The enlightenment factors are there. The Brahma Viharas are there. They're all elements of the mind.

Yet the Buddha strongly encourages us to direct our attention to the body. Why might this be?

The body offers several profoundly positive aspects for meditation practice. One key quality is its constant availability. Mindfulness of the body can always be accessed, and it grounds our attention in a reality that's relatively stable.

The Buddha once said that if you're going to identify with anything—that is, create a sense of self around anything—do it with the body rather than the mind, because the mind changes so much more quickly than the body.

You can get a sense of this. I think one of the reasons that sitting meditation is so powerful is that we take our seat and don't move for long periods of time. It's not that it's wrong to move if you're in pain or getting sleepy—you may need to adjust the posture or stand up. But there is a virtue to having the body be still. The virtue is that stillness of the body communicates a stillness to the mind. It's almost like the mind soaks up, through osmosis, the stillness of the body.

Sometimes I've often felt in sitting that the body is there relatively like a rock, and the thoughts and emotions are just crashing, crashing, crashing. But the body is a rock that just stays steady. Over time—and it may be over years—that stillness communicates a sense of stillness to the mind and becomes a source of equanimity to us. We have the sense we can sit through anything. We're not afraid of sitting through anything because we've done it so many times and come out the other side.

One of my teachers in Thailand was Ajahn Buddhadasa, who was a great master from the twentieth century. He had a saying: "Don't do anything that takes you out of the body." He was a great scholar who loved to study, a great meditator who loved the mind. Yet he said, "Don't do anything that takes you out of the body." That's how important it is.

Being in touch with the body also keeps us in touch with our emotional life. When a strong emotion comes, it will be felt in the body. Sometimes that's the first thing we notice. Oh, the body's feeling shaky—maybe there's some anxiety. Oh, the body's feeling tight—maybe there's some anger. Or the body's feeling really soft—maybe there's relaxation in the mind. The body tells the truth. There are books: "The Body Doesn't Lie," "The Body Keeps the Score." It's becoming well known. We can use it to find out what's going on in the mind as well. It's very helpful that way.

Within the mindfulness of the body comes mindfulness of breathing. In the Satipatthana discourse, mindfulness of the body is the first foundation. Within the first foundation, mindfulness of breathing is the first paragraph, the first pointing. That's how central it was in the Buddha's teaching.

The Buddha himself—this surprised me when I found this out—after he was enlightened, he still went into retreat. That could have just been because he was the administrator of a large and growing body of unruly bhikkhus and bhikkhunis. It was like, "Let me have some peace and quiet here." But he still went into retreat, and he came out of a three-month retreat where he had practiced mindfulness of breathing for the whole thing. He said, "If anyone could say of anything that it is a noble dwelling, a divine dwelling, the Tathagata's dwelling, it is of concentration by mindfulness of breathing that one would rightly say this."

That's high praise. If it was good enough for the Buddha, maybe it's good enough for us.

So I want to talk about why breath can be a really useful focus. I'm going to talk in praise of mindfulness of breathing. But I also want to point to some of the obstacles that can come up with it. I don't want to sell it as the be-all and end-all in meditation. It's really good for some people, quite good for a lot of people, and not the best for a lot of people. So I want to talk about both the strengths and some of the potential pitfalls in mindfulness of breathing.

Why is it so useful? Number one, it happens by itself. Breath is part of the semi-autonomous system in the body, so it's always there. It's always happening, and we don't have to do anything to make it happen. So it's a focus that's always available to us. It takes care of itself.

It is basically a neutral object. Breath is not strongly pleasant, it's not strongly unpleasant—it has a neutral feeling tone. So it's not objectionable, but we also don't develop a lot of desire for it. That helps keep the mind in balance. Although it's not intrinsically pleasurable to a high degree, it brings pleasure with the mindfulness of it.

The first thing we notice when we can be with the breath is that we've stepped out of the disturbing thoughts. And in time we find, oh, that's kind of pleasant not to be bombarded by those thoughts and emotions. As we settle into the breathing, there's a sense of being able to relax more and more with it. So it does bring a sense of comfort and ease and some rest. That has a certain pleasant feeling in the body.

Once we discover the possibility for enjoying the breath as a focus, that enjoyment will bring us back to meditation more and more often. And that's a very helpful thing. To want to meditate is a wonderful opening. One other thing is that this quality of pleasure—the Pali term is sukha—is the proximate cause for concentration. As sukha, this feeling, develops in the body and mind, we become more contented. We're happy to rest there because it's pleasant, it's peaceful, and it's satisfying. So it's an opening for concentration.

As we tune in to the rhythm of the breath, we let the rhythm be natural. There's something calming about the rhythm. There's something soothing in it. You might just feel this for five seconds, but you can start to notice the breath has a soothing quality. That's part of its draw. That's part of its pleasure.

When I've done long retreats focused on the breath, what it reminds me of—the rhythm of the breath, and I may be making this up, but it's the image that came to mind—was being rocked at my mother's breast. Sally and I were in the San Francisco airport on our way here on Sunday, sitting around at the airport, and there was this young couple with a young daughter with them. I watched them for a while because I didn't have a lot to do, and they seemed like a kind family. The mother was often touching the daughter, just establishing that physical contact.

Then the mother sat down, leaned back in her chair a little bit, and the daughter crawled into her lap, put her head on the mother's shoulder and just kind of clung to her. The daughter was about three, I'd say, so she was still small, and she could fit on the mother's chest with her feet on the mother's legs. Her head was on her mother's chest, turned in my direction. The look on her face was one of absolute ease and comfort and trust. It was like there was nothing wrong in the whole universe for that little girl because she was on her mother's chest and being held. It was really a beautiful thing to see.

So that starts to come in—that sense of being rocked, being calmed, being soothed. The more we can let go of any attempt to control the breath, let the breath find its natural rhythm, and then that soothing quality starts to come through.

In the beginning, that's hard to do. It's hard to be mindful of breathing and not control it a little bit. We find ourselves directing: now breathe in, now breathe out, now breathe in. You may not say the words, but there's some intentionality often going on. That's okay. Don't worry about that. A little bit of control in the beginning is not a problem. But as the meditation deepens, the more that can be let go of, the more the natural rhythm of the breath can come through, the more we can let go and just be rocked by that.

Once we make a commitment to a certain focus in meditation, we know where we want to be when we are in the moment. That commitment really highlights when we're not there. So we'll know, oh, I wasn't with the breath for this period of time, which means I was away in some distracting thoughts, images, etc. The breath focus highlights the times we're away. And so it provides a very clear reflection of how the mindfulness is doing or not doing. We learn from that. We want to know when we're mindful and when we're not. The breath focus really reflects that in a very skillful way.

Breathing is a very elemental event. In the Buddha's language, one of the four elements is wind, the wind element. You could say air, the movement of air. Breath is all about the movement of air, which is nature, right? The air all around the planet—it's just part of nature. So an interesting question is, when does the air start being part of the planet and start being part of us?

We breathe it in, and there's a point at which coming in through the nose or through the mouth, it changes from being nature to being us, and then we breathe out, and it becomes part of nature again. How far does it go in before it becomes us? How far does it go out before it's not us anymore?

We start to see that us and nature, which we normally think of as external, not-self, are permeating each other all the time, going back and forth. This offers some interesting insights into anatta, not-self. The boundaries are to some extent constructed, conceptual.

Another fascinating aspect of mindfulness of breathing: the Buddha says in the Anapanasati Sutta that it actually fulfills all four foundations of mindfulness. It fulfills the body foundation right away—that's where it's based. In the second foundation, the sutta says, "I shall breathe in or out experiencing pleasure." There's the pleasant feeling tone of vedana, the second foundation. The third foundation of mind appears when the text states, "I shall breathe in or out gladdening the mind." Here's the mind state of gladness arising through contact with the breath.

For the fourth foundation of dhamma, "I shall breathe in or out contemplating impermanence." Wisdom can arise based on the changing nature of the breath. Is there anything really solid there? When you look closely at the physical sensations of breathing, is there anything solid or is it just like a ripple of tiny sensations? Up and down, in and out. Gone. Breathing lends itself to insight into anicca, impermanence.

And I love this instruction: "I shall breathe in or out, liberating the mind." Liberating the mind. Freedom in impermanence. The practice of breathing, mindfully breathing.

It's interesting—there's some new technology around these days to help train people in mindfulness of breathing. The whole breathing thing has become very secular. There's a company that has a headset you put around your forehead. It's basically an EEG machine, an electroencephalogram that measures your brain waves. There's an app on your phone that connects to the headset and tells you how your brain waves are doing.

A friend of mine had one of these on loan from the manufacturer. Sally and I were having dinner with them, and he offered to let me try it. I said, "Sure, I like technology." So I put this thing on and he revved up the app. He said, "Okay, now be mindful. Be mindful for five minutes. When you're mindful at a certain level, the app is going to make birds sing. That's the auditory feedback that tells you you're in some kind of a groove."

I started out and there were not many birds, but I thought I'm going to try mindfulness of breathing. I went to my nose where I've spent a lot of time in meditation, got very focused inside the nostrils. The birds really started going. The birds just went on and on while I was in touch with the air moving in and out of my nostrils.

Then at one point I thought, "I'm going to try kind of expansive awareness, sounds." The birds shut right up. It was so interesting. In a way, I thought, well, it's really measuring concentration because I was still mindful. I don't have 100% reliability on what the app claims to be measuring, but they definitely were on to something with those birds. It could be a really useful training device for a particular kind of meditation—not the be-all and end-all, but a very interesting pointing.

These are some of the beautiful things about mindfulness of breathing. Now I want to talk about some of the difficulties that can come, some of the obstacles. The first thing to say is breath may not work for everyone as a primary focus. I think we said that in the beginning. That's why we offered body posture and sounds as alternate anchors.

Because for some people, the breath is not the right choice. This doesn't mean you're a bad meditator or lacking some essential quality for awakening. It simply means that your particular system, the way it's constituted, will find some other focus more skillful for deepening practice. There's no blame or judgment in this.

One group I often see having trouble relating with the breath is people who have had asthma. If you've experienced asthma, especially as a child, and gone through that fear of not being able to get enough breath when young, paying attention to the breath can trigger that fear again and lead to panic. In such cases, focusing on breathing wouldn't be skillful, and there are other excellent focuses available.

Similarly, if you've had an injury—perhaps from a car accident that left an impact in your chest, whether from hitting an airbag or steering wheel—the memory of that trauma can be triggered by placing attention on the breath in the chest. This would also indicate that breath focus isn't the most skillful approach right now.

There can be other sources of trauma as well, whether from childhood or adult experiences. When focusing on breathing becomes triggering rather than calming, it's not helpful.

In such cases, we offer other focuses. One is the whole body posture. Perhaps the area affected by trauma recedes when breath isn't being focused on there, allowing you to be with the sense of the whole body sitting and gain stability from that practice. The stillness comes into the mind from the stillness of the body.

Alternatively, there may be a part of the body unaffected by past trauma, illness, or injury where you can place your attention. I remember one Asian master giving instruction to a student whose mind was too restless: "I just want you to be with the touch point of your seat in contact with the cushion. I want that to be your primary object for a long time." This approach successfully calmed the thinking mind.

There are many ways to move forward skillfully.

Beyond these physical considerations, there are particular mental reactions that commonly arise when we commit to focusing on breath. I want to discuss four of them: striving, aversion to thoughts, judgment, and boredom. Sound familiar?

Striving is very common. By striving, I mean the desire force—the force of wanting in the mind when it connects to the field of meditation. For instance, you may have had wonderful retreats in the past, or even good experiences with breath in this retreat, but they've passed. Then what happens? "I want them back." We'll do anything in our power to recreate that former experience.

Or we pick up experiences we've heard about from friends, read in books, or seen on social media, thinking, "That person had that experience. I want that one too." We try very hard to make it happen.

This represents a fundamental difficulty. Because the breath can lead to states of calm, peace, and pleasure, we often develop lovely meditation experiences through breath practice. But when they go away—which they always will—we desperately want them back. So we try hard to recreate that experience.

But trying hard is acting out of desire. When desire is present, we won't have peace and calm—these are counter-tendencies. All the good movements in meditation, all beneficial unfoldings, come from acceptance of the present moment just as it is. When we're dissatisfied with our current experience and trying to make it different, we're in conflict. Reality is one way, our desire another. Guess who wins? Reality always wins.

We must learn to recognize striving and do our best to let it go.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 8/11). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

Some years ago, I went to Burma to practice for six weeks with a Sayadaw I'd heard wonderful things about. His name was Paok Sayadaw. He had a monastery in the southeast of the country and was a deeply respected master of both concentration and insight. He had developed very powerful systems for both. I especially wanted to explore the concentration aspect with him.

When I arrived at his monastery and met him, he already knew I was coming. He'd heard that I was a teacher—though he didn't know whether I was a good teacher or a bad teacher, which was probably for the best. But knowing I was a teacher, he saw me every day for practice meetings where I would report my experience to him.

I want to say a word about Paok Sayadaw. He was a wonderful being and a wonderful teacher. He was always kind in every interaction I observed with him—with students, with other practitioners there. He was consistently kind. He had these twinkly eyes, and there was nothing he loved more in our relationship than to hear a good report on my meditation. That's what made him happiest—when I came in and reported some degree of progress.

We would have these practice meetings outdoors on his porch in the warm weather when it wasn't raining. I would often be behind other people waiting to speak with him, so I could hear their practice reports. I'd hear this young Burmese monk say, "Oh, I just spent yesterday in the meditation hall sitting for three hours in third jhana." Then I'd deliver my report, which was not quite so impressive.

Because he knew I was a teacher, I felt like I wanted at least for him to think I was reasonable. When I would go to sit, I'd notice this striving tendency come up. I wanted to experience something really positive that I could report to my teacher. I knew I was striving—I could feel what was going on in my body. My body got tight.

So I went to him to report this because I thought he would have a really good solution for my striving, really good advice for how to solve it. I explained that I was striving for a particular experience. His reply: "Don't do that."

Okay. So I went back to my little kuti and had to learn by myself how not to do that.

What I saw—and you've probably seen this a million times too—was that I was looking for a particular experience instead of just being with the breath the way it was. To be with the breath the way it is—this is innocence. This is our innocent interest in being with the present moment exactly the way it is, without trying to make it anything other.

When I could do that, just come back to the present moment with that innocent mind, things unfolded beautifully and the deepening started to happen. When I was with the breath in order to get somewhere else, nothing would happen. Caught.

Look at this "in order to" mind state. We aren't with the breath with that kind of motivation in the moment. We're with the breath partly out of an understanding that it leads to wholesome states, but in order for it to lead onward, we have to approach it with innocence, openness, and acceptance. Then everything opens up for us.

This is the first thing—striving—because the breath can lead into pleasant experiences and we want them to happen again.

Another thing that develops is that we can develop an aversion to thinking. We start to realize that we're with the breath except when we go off on these thought trains, and we might be gone for quite a while. While we're away on our thought trains, we're not developing the relationship with the breath. I can't tell you how many times I've thought, "Oh my gosh, if it just weren't for these thoughts, I'd be doing great."

This can develop into an attitude: "They shouldn't be happening. If I'm meditating, I shouldn't be thinking." Because thinking is obviously what's causing the problem. That's a real bind, because none of us are going to stop thinking anytime soon. If we think that we shouldn't be thinking, we're going to tie ourselves up in knots.

Asaida Utajaniya says very directly: our practice is not to stop thinking.

Thoughts aren't the problem. The problem is our not seeing them. Thoughts will continue to come—there's nothing we can do about that. If we get the idea they shouldn't be happening, we're going to try to suppress that energy, and that's going to bottle it up. Eventually, it's going to explode. So we have to remain open to the arising of thoughts, but the aim is to see them soon enough that we don't get on the train. That's where mindfulness plays this protective role—it's a guardian of our mind states. We don't take those trains because they eventually lead to more dukkha.

This is where that phrase Sally introduced last night comes in: "not now." We see an appealing thought coming and we say "not now." Joseph Goldstein has a very nice phrase: "Nothing is worth thinking about." Take that to heart.

Now, of course, that's in a certain context. If nothing was worth thinking about, we wouldn't have made it here for this retreat together—we had to think to get here. But in the context of formal meditation practice, it's not worth thinking. Your most brilliant creative urges? Not now. Great insights that you want to explore further with long dharma reflections? Not now. Any kind of thought that comes up, you can say "not now" for the purpose of developing mindfulness.

There is a place for reflection in dharma practice, for sure. There are times to reflect on the teachings and how they relate to our own experience. On retreat, I tend to do those reflections during informal times—meal times, going for a walk after a meal, lying down before I go to sleep. And I tend to do them briefly, making sure to keep the thought on a short leash. A few reflections, then come back. Check in with the breath, check in with the body.

Sometimes we think that if we think about a problem long enough, we'll solve it. Meditation can look like a really good place to think objectively about our problems in the hopes that we'll solve them. I like this quote from Einstein—I'm sure you've heard it: "We cannot solve our problems with the same level of thinking that created them."

Basically, conceptual thought doesn't solve emotional problems. Where emotional problems get solved is from a deeper level of stillness. Then we take a new look at them. We see things in a new way—we're seeing with new eyes, we have a new view. To get to that level of creativity, we need to let the mind still, let the conceptual mind drop into a deeper place of heart and mind and body that is more like our real home. From that kind of place, emotional problems can be seen in a new light and resolved or softened or let go. They don't get solved by thinking.

The next area that becomes difficult with mindfulness of breathing is the problem of judging ourselves—self-judgment in relation to the meditation. It's very easy to think as we settle down for a period of connecting with the breath, "I want to be with every breath this sitting. I'm going to try really hard. I'm not going to let one breath get away."

I used to notice I had an anxiety in meditation around missing a breath, because I thought it was bad to miss one breath. That was making me tight. Finally I understood: I can't get every breath. So missing some is okay. That helped me to relax.

When thoughts take us away, we feel badly—both that they take us away and how long we were gone.

Especially that harsh inner voice saying, "Oh, I'm such a crummy meditator. I was gone for so long." We judge ourselves for not living up to some imagined standard.

So I want to ask you: what's the right amount of time to be gone? Do you know? Is it in your control at all? This is what's so silly about this kind of judgment. We're assuming that we're failing or falling short, but falling short of what standard exactly? What standard? Has anybody ever told you what the right time to be away is? No, there's no answer to that.

And then we feel badly because we're only with a certain number of breaths in a row and we think we should have been with more. What's the right number of breaths in a row to be with? Has anybody ever told you that? No. But we judge ourselves for not measuring up to a standard that is entirely unarticulated. It's never been spoken. And yet we're convinced we're falling short. Oh, this is sad.

You all are here because you've received tremendous benefit from this meditation practice. You wouldn't have come and committed your six weeks or three months if you hadn't experienced huge benefits. What this means is the meditation is working for all of you. All of you are successful just the way you are right now. You're succeeding in the meditation.

This retreat is going to be like your other retreats—you're going to succeed. You're going to learn a lot and grow in the Dharma. There's no possibility for failure with people who are committed the way you are, who have received the benefits the way you have. So simply don't believe those judging thoughts. You're making a good effort.

Steve Armstrong has a beautiful saying: "Make your best effort and let that be enough." It's a very good guideline.

The last challenge that comes with the breath is boredom. Anyone ever experience boredom with their breath? Because each breath looks suspiciously like the last one, doesn't it? "I've already been here ten thousand times today. What am I doing here again?" This is really common.

A couple of things to understand about boredom: boredom is basically aversion to the neutral. It's really important to see this because the breath is neutral—which is what makes it a good object—but we will occasionally get averse to it precisely because it's not enchanting us with desire or terrifying us with threat. It's so right in the middle that we think, "Who cares?"

Just notice that boredom is aversion to the neutral, so it's in the realm of aversive reaction. But the other component inherent in boredom is not enough interest. The antidote is to find a way to become more interested in your breath, in your breathing. Sally suggested a couple of approaches this morning with noting and counting. Over the next couple of days, other teachers will add more techniques so that you can truly come to rely on what Dawn spoke about—that spirit of gentle perseverance.

Just keep coming back, moment after moment, sit after sit. Keep returning to the breath. It may not be the most exciting object, but your relationship to it will deepen. You will discover things of genuine interest in it. We'll provide specific techniques in the morning instructions to help with that.

But there is always so much going on with one breath. Just look a little more closely. This means looking for more subtlety and looking for more detail. This is part of a factor of investigation, which is one of the enlightenment factors here, that really will help support and encourage your meditation and bring in energy. We need to bring in an appreciation for the fact that we're breathing.

So these are some of the really beautiful qualities about being with mindfulness of breathing and also some of the obstacles. We will mostly hit those obstacles at some point in our practice if we go long enough.

I also want to mention one other thing. This is a quotation from Ajahn Suchito, who was the abbot of Chithurst Monastery in England for many years. He's an English bhikkhu with a good sense of humor. He says that anytime you commit to a technique, you are eventually going to run into cravings. That is really true with mindfulness of breathing. You will want it to be a certain way. Of course, craving is difficult. But we need to learn to work with it in the context of our meditation practice.

Just because there are these obstacles doesn't mean you should throw it out unless there is something in your constitution that makes it not a suitable object, not the best object for your focus, in which case there are other excellent objects. So please talk to your teacher if breathing is bringing up particular difficulties as a focus, and your teacher can help you find something that just works better. That's totally fine.

In the beginning, we have to do this mindfulness stuff with a lot of prompting. We have to keep bringing our attention back and encouraging ourselves: come back and connect with the present moment. Over a long time, this habit develops a lot of momentum of being in the present moment. There can be more and more of a sense of resting in the present moment and then opening to all our experience. We'll open up the instructions as we go over the next ten days and move in that direction.

Then you can have a sense of what Ajahn Sumedho calls an intuitive awareness. You trust in this awareness that is just able to know and respond to all the changing elements of our experience and still stay in balance and still stay peaceful. This will come.

Let me close with a quote from the Buddha: "Mindfulness of breathing is peaceful and sublime. It is an abiding in happiness that breaks up and calms unwholesome mental states whenever they arise."

This is where we're heading. At the end of the talks, we'd just like to sit in silence for a few moments and let the words settle.

Thank you all very much for your care around the COVID protocols. Hopefully in another twelve hours, we can relax them and watch each other smile. That would be sweet.

We have about half an hour now for walking. Then at the last sitting of the day at nine, Greg will lead chanting again. I really encourage you to come. It's a beautiful text that he's going to be teaching. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 75

Morning Instructions: Mindfulness of Sensations in the Body, with Special Attention to Bodily Pain

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong provides detailed instructions for developing mindfulness of bodily sensations (kāyagatāsati), with particular emphasis on working skillfully with pain. Drawing from the traditional Buddhist practice of kāyānupassanā (mindfulness of the body) as outlined in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), Armstrong offers practical guidance for meditators on how to relate to painful sensations without aversion or fear.

The talk addresses the common Western tendency to immediately medicate or avoid pain, contrasting this with the Buddhist approach of mindful investigation. Armstrong explains how to distinguish between useful pain that can deepen meditation practice and potentially harmful sensations in vulnerable areas like knees and back. He introduces the principle of working with pain rather than agony, emphasizing that pain can actually serve as a powerful meditation object when met with proper mindfulness.

Key instructions include maintaining an anchor point (breath, posture, or sounds) while allowing attention to naturally move to predominant sensations, investigating the bare physical nature of sensations without conceptual overlay, and noting practices for maintaining present-moment awareness. Armstrong also discusses the importance of softening mental aversion to pain, recognizing how resistance creates additional suffering through bodily contraction. The talk concludes with practical guidance on eating meditation and the optional nature of devotional practices like bowing, making this accessible to practitioners from various backgrounds while maintaining traditional Buddhist wisdom.

This morning in meditation, we're going to continue our focus on sensations in the body, the approach introduced yesterday. I want to add some specific instructions on working with pain, because of all the kinds of sensations that visit us in meditation, this is one of the most regular guests. We need to have a special awareness not only for the sensations of pain, but just as importantly, how we're relating to it.

When a sensation of pain arises, most of our mainstream cultural backgrounds have not given us very many tools for relating with it. The typical advice is to rush to the medicine cabinet and grab some Advil, or it launches a whole wave of opioid addiction that has led to so many deaths in this country. Doctors make a living trying to take care of people's physical pain. Some of it is appropriate and accurate response, but much of it stems from an overblown fear of feeling any pain in the body.

In meditation, especially as we're encouraged to sit still for up to an hour at a time, we have many opportunities for revising our relationship to pain. This is truly an opportunity because there's tremendous learning in this area. Just because something is unpleasant doesn't mean that it's dangerous. The first conditioned response to pain is often: "It's attacking me. It's going to harm me. It's going to cripple me."

There are some pains we need to be wary of in sitting meditation, particularly in two areas, especially if you're sitting on the floor—though you should look out for them in chairs too. One is knees and the other is back.

With knee pain, I've had friends who decided to sit through very intense knee pain as a demonstration of resolve, of adhitthana—the determination in sitting. They got up to find they had injured themselves, putting too much stress on a vulnerable joint by sitting through pain that was actually a warning signal saying, "Take care of me."

The other area that can be overlooked is back pain. For meditators, much of the postural work rests in the lower back. If we stress that too much, we can cause greater weakness and instability. In these two areas—knees and back—you don't want to push blindly through pain, though you can push a little bit.

The way to test this is: if you get up and walk out of the hall, does the knee pain or back pain go away within a few minutes of walking? If it does, you're okay. If it persists longer than a few minutes, that's a warning sign. You might want to shift your posture for the next sit, or for another day, perhaps moving to a chair. If you're sitting in a chair and getting knee pain, lying down meditation might be better. That's perfectly fine. We can talk later in the retreat about how to practice lying down meditation. There's a risk there too—you might fall asleep—but there are ways to work with that.

With pain that's intense in the knees and back, be careful. Check it out afterward with a little walking. In general, working with pain is such a fruitful area for exploration, but we have a guideline: it's useful to work with pain, but not so useful to work with agony. Whatever that borderline is for you—there's no objective standard here—if it's veering on agony, then it's fine to shift your posture. Simply get up, stand for a few minutes, then sit back down, or make an adjustment to the way you're sitting. Sometimes even leaning forward or rocking from side to side can alleviate some of the pain, and then you can settle back in and start fresh. This is totally acceptable.

There are types of retreats where you are not allowed to move at all. I was sitting a Zen sesshin once—just once—and in the middle of it, one of the attendants came up and gave me a firm whack on the shoulder with a stick because I had moved slightly. I hadn't even been aware of it, but he had keen eyes. We're not like that. Nobody's going to be coming around and whacking you.

So if you need to shift your posture a little bit for ease in the sitting, that's totally fine. But in the guided meditation, I want to give instructions on how to work with pain when it comes. I don't need to talk about it beforehand, but I'll give those instructions as we go in the sitting. But remember, if it feels like the pain is too much, you're fine to shift your posture. Try to do that shift slowly and mindfully. Be present. Notice the sensations in the body as you shift. But it's fine to shift.

So a guideline on when to shift: when the pain is overwhelming the mindfulness. When it's basically really hard to stay present because the pain is strong enough that it captures the attention and our reactivity is strong. I'll talk more about that. Okay, so with that as a prelude, pain is useful, agony not so much. Feel free to shift if it's getting near that kind of border.

Okay, so we can begin the formal meditation. Please take your posture, which is both upright and relaxed. And you're probably beginning to realize that this balance of the posture really refers to a balance in the mind. We want to find a balance in our mind that's alert, energized, and interested, and at the same time relaxed, tending to calm, not striving. So the posture of the body sets the tone for the mind's approach, for the mind's attitude.

So first, just settling into the experience of the body and sitting. Letting go of any obvious areas of holding in the forehead, the eyes, the jaw, the shoulders, the belly, the hands, and having the sense that your attention can pervade the whole body. Mind can be in contact with sensations throughout the body. No part is closed off to our attention.

Throughout the body, there will be areas that are showing the arising of sensations. There may be areas where no sensation is apparent. That's fine. Don't worry about that or make a problem. That's the way the body shows up for us.

Opening the attention to sounds to bring in this receptive and effortless quality. Notice that sounds can be heard in front, to the back, to the right, and to the left, and even above with the fans in a 360 degree way. Consciousness goes all around us.

And with that same open and receptive attention, coming back into the body, feeling the sensations connected with breathing. Notice how some sensations arise on breathing in and different sensations on breathing out. You can start to tune into the feeling of an in-breath, a feeling of an out-breath. Energetically, they're a little different.

If the sensations of breath are more apparent to you in one specific area, then it may be quite natural to let the attention settle there, in the belly, the nose or the chest. Some people like to feel the breath through the whole body, maintaining kind of a frame of attention that takes in the whole body and noticing the impact of breathing within that. Some people like to feel the trace of the breath in the body, the way it enters the nose and expands the lungs and then expands the belly and reverses on its way out. Following the whole breath, one whole breath is also fine.

So hopefully at this point in the retreat, each of you has found a focus that serves well for you as an anchor. Whether it's breath, body posture, or sounds. Something that you can reliably come back to again and again. That's your avenue of connection to the present moment. A suitable focus. It's not disturbing.

And essentially the way we'll be suggesting today that you practice is to stay with that anchor as long as nothing else predominant is presenting itself in the body. So you're staying with the anchor and then if something stronger comes along felt as a sensation in the body that naturally calls the attention, don't stay fixed to the anchor. Don't feel you have to hold on to the anchor. Let the attention naturally move to where it's being called. Or maybe there's pressure in the knee. Maybe there's the touch of the hands. Maybe there's slight tension in the shoulder. When the attention is drawn there, let it move.

And as it lands with the new sensation, let it really feel it. Don't hold back. Let the attention go right into the center of the new sensation and allow it to be felt completely. Get to know its bare physical nature.

It might be an area of tension or tightness. It might be a sense of vibration, pulsation, or tingling. It might be warm or cool. It could be expanding or contracting. It could be pressure. Get to know it in its bare physical nature.

The part of the body where it's occurring is not this bare physical nature—that's a concept. Head, knee, shoulder, hand—these are concepts. But as we get close to the reality of the sensation, its physical nature will express itself in one of these forms: pulsing, tingling, vibration, pressure, warmth, coolness, and so on. See if you can notice just that physical nature.

Once the attention is drawn to that sensation, it's helpful, after you've felt into it, to name it. If you're using the noting practice, see if you can find a note that expresses its characteristic—pulsing, tingling, vibration, and so forth.

You can let the attention stay with that sensation as long as it's still predominant, as long as it's drawing the attention. Sometimes that's just a few seconds. If the sensation is strong, it may last for the better part of a meditation period. Either way is fine.

But if the sensation subsides and stops being predominant, then let the attention return gently to your anchor—breath, posture, sounds. Be open to the next predominant sensation and let the attention easily move there, connecting with its physical nature. If you're using noting, name it simply, with one word if possible.

Again, with the noting practice, try to keep the note really light—like five to ten percent of the overall experience. Direct most of the attention to just the sensation itself, feeling the sensation. You don't need to do anything with it but simply notice it, feel it.

If the sensation that draws the attention has the nature of being painful, then this can present a new kind of challenge. We want to develop real skill in relating to these sensations.

First, don't be afraid when some pain shows up. It's not actually dangerous. It's not threatening, except in very rare circumstances. But sometimes there's a reluctance to go into it, a reluctance to feel it. So notice if that's there—there's a little shying away, a mild form of disliking. See if you can overcome that and let the attention go right into the painful sensation and really let it be felt.

Notice its bare physical nature. Is it in the form of pressure, an ache, a pinching, a stabbing, contraction, heat, or cold? Name it if that's helpful, if you're noting. As long as that pain remains predominant, see if you can keep the attention with it.

You'll discover in doing this that you don't actually have to fix the pain or make it go away. Pain can actually be a good focus in meditation because it naturally draws the mind, and so the attention can naturally rest in it.

But there are a couple of other things that happen when we're with pain. One of them is that because of a long-standing habit of avoidance, the mind might want to skitter away into thinking. You might notice that when painful sensations are felt, thoughts ramp up as an escape hatch. If that is happening, see if you can note the thinking and gently return the attention to be with the painful sensation. As far as possible, learn to stay steady in direct contact with pain.

The other thing you might notice is different flavors of aversion coming strongly into the mind. Often there's an unease in feeling pain, so it's very likely that there will be some disliking going on, which could be mild or strong. When the disliking of pain is strong, it turns into felt aversion—a force in the mind that will cause a contraction in the body. When the body is in contraction through aversion, that contraction itself may feed the pain, strengthen the pain.

So if you can, notice the presence of aversion as the mind's reaction, and see if you can soften the mind in its relationship to the sensation. If you can soften the mind, that will have a softening effect on the pain. The pain may still be there, but it may soften a little and it will be held with a better attitude, more acceptance.

Sometimes the response to pain may be anger, resentment, irritation—"This isn't supposed to be happening in my meditation." If that grows, it will also cause a contraction in the body. Pain is not an indication that you've done anything wrong. It happens to all of us in meditation. So don't make it a grounds for judging. It's just part of the body's natural expression. Again, try to soften the attitude, soften in relation to the pain.

If you've been with the pain for a while, you may notice that the mind is getting weary. It's tiring. It takes effort to be in touch with pain again and again. So if you find the mind getting tired, find a way to give it some ease, give it some space. That would mean changing the focus of your meditation. You might open your eyes. You might go to sounds for a while. You might go back to your anchor. Find something neutral or pleasant in your field of experience and let the mind have some relief from that ongoing contact with what's difficult.

If it feels comfortable to stay in that more neutral focus, do that. It's fine. If you feel re-energized, you can bring the attention back to the painful sensation. If you ever feel overwhelmed with the pain, feel free to adjust the posture. Stand up. Shift. Slowly and mindfully. Then the meditation won't be interrupted as you make that slight shift. And again, if no particular sensation is drawing the attention, then be content to rest with your anchor—with the body, with sounds, or with the breath.

In this way, the meditation can become a very natural sort of flow within the body, posture, breath, sounds, or sensations that draw us. It doesn't need forcing. You'll discover this easy flow of attention with the anchor and then being willing to go a little beyond into the specifics of sensations.

As you're exploring sensations throughout the body and connect with an individual sensation, you can add at this point a little bit of investigation. Ask: Is there anything solid and unchanging in that sensation? Or as you pay attention to it, can you see its own nature of change—whether it be vibrations, pulsation, or tingling quality? Even with pain, does it go up and down a little in intensity, moment to moment? Add just a little bit of interest in looking for the manifestation of change in sensations.

So in your meditation today—and it may serve you for the rest of the retreat for that matter—as we unfold the instructions, the anchor is a very helpful place to prefer. If nothing else strongly is drawing the attention, it's really nice to have a place you're comfortable to rest the attention. But we're not clinging to it. If something else comes up that naturally draws our attention, our interest, we easily let it move there, let the attention move, and we make the relationship of mindfulness with the new focus.

Today we're practicing in that way with sensations. As we open up, we'll practice with other focuses as well. So continue to take your anchor and the field of sensations in the body as your focus for today, appreciating the opportunity to work skillfully with pain, even if difficult.

I'd like to address a couple of questions. There were two questions focused around thought, so I thought I'd start with that. One was highlighting the alternation between craving for peace and calm and the aversion to the thinking that blocked that. Does this sound familiar? This is the meditator's basic dilemma—what we're dealing with moment after moment.

Thoughts come in a lot for most of us, especially at this stage in the retreat when we're still settling. Sometimes they go on and on and on. So how to relate? First, the desire for calm itself is a form of striving. It's a wholesome intention.

It's a wholesome aspiration. But if it shows up as craving—which means there's frustration when it's not coming—then it moves into an unwholesome area called striving. So just recognize that the craving itself in the moment for a particular experience is not helpful. This is the second noble truth. We're landing in the realm of suffering. The more we see this again and again—oh, if I want this particular experience, I'm going to suffer—wisdom will learn from that. And we will let go more and more of that craving while still maintaining the aspiration to move in that direction. They're really two different impulses.

So we want to do what's skillful to develop states like calm, but if we want it already, this is not the patience that Greg was talking about last night. All we can do is plant the seeds, and we don't have to yell at them. We just plant them through moments of mindfulness. That's the best we can do. And then we let nature take care of their growing. We know we're doing the right thing to head in the direction of calm.

It was like when I used to go on road trips with my parents as a kid. We'd drive for two days to get to my grandmother's house. And us kids would be sitting in the back seat asking our parents, "Are we there yet? Are we there yet?" That's craving. Our parents knew the route. They knew how to drive and they knew how long it was going to take. That's patience. And we don't know exactly how long it's going to take. It's more than two days. But the destination is known. The destination of peace, freedom, whatever you want to call it, is known. It'll take as long as it takes. And we don't have to keep asking, "Are we there yet?" So this is the patience part.

We're going to talk more about working with thoughts in a couple of days in detail. But for now, I just want to say one thing I found really helpful. If there's a kind of thought that's running over and over and over—repetitive thought patterns—drop out of the thinking part and ask yourself: is there an underlying emotion here? Often there's something driving the thinking, and that's on the emotional level. It may not even show up in the words of the thoughts, but it's a mood and a feeling in the body that's providing the engine power for the thinking to take off from. If you can move from the thinking and connect with that emotion, you're at the source. That's where mindfulness can be most powerful. So if you can, move from repetitive thinking into the underlying emotion. That would be helpful.

Another question came up around bowing, and I don't really think we've explained much about that yet, so I'll just take a couple of minutes. Bowing in this setting is entirely optional. You'll probably see that most of us do some form of bowing to the Buddha when we come in or before we sit down, or bowing at the end when we leave the hall. And that's an expression of what I would call our devotion or our reverence or our appreciation for the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha. They all kind of go together for us.

If you have that feeling of reverence or devotion, then I encourage you to express it in some way that feels right for you. If you don't have that, there's no need. It's fine—just come in and sit down. You don't need to make any gesture toward the stage. This is just a wooden statue. And so we're not reverent to a wooden statue.

But I want to say something about one thing the Buddha said. He said it's difficult to dwell on the spiritual path without reverence or devotion to something. He said, "I looked around the world with my psychic vision, and I did not see anyone more skilled than myself in ethical conduct, meditation, or wisdom." And that's not an expression of arrogance. That's just, for him, a statement of fact. And yet he said, "I wanted to dwell with devotion and reverence."

So I chose to dwell in devotion to the Dhamma. That is always present for us as an aspect of devotion.

I myself find devotional practices very rewarding, inspiring, and helpful. They really touch my heart. My heart has been touched by the Dharma and the teachings for so many years, and there's a lot of gratitude there for me. So I love to express it through devotional chanting, through bowing, through other offerings. The chanting that Greg leads in the evening is one form of that. Bowing can be one form of that.

But it's not essential. It's only if it speaks to you, if it's something that you feel drawn to. When we encountered these teachings in Asia, there were many more devotional elements in the monasteries and meditation centers where we practiced that we haven't brought over. So if you think we're at all heavy on the devotional practices here, you haven't seen anything yet.

Little by little, I think those of us in this country are starting to appreciate a little more of those devotional energies. They're powerful. There's a whole branch, as you probably know, in yoga called bhakti—bhakti yoga, devotional yoga—where that is the main engine of spiritual development. So it's a wonderful thing if it draws you. It may not at this point, but if it does, it's a wonderful thing to express.

What are we devoted to when we bow to the Buddha? It's not the statue. It is a representation of the physical human being, the man who lived 2,500 years ago. But this question came up in his lifetime. There was somebody who was following him and thought, "Oh, he's so handsome, this Buddha fellow. He's so handsome, I really want to be devoted to that." The Buddha happened to read the person's mind and said, "If you mistake this body for an object of devotion, you're missing the point." And he said, "One who sees the Dhamma sees the Buddha. One who sees the Buddha sees the Dhamma."

So it's really in devotion to the Dhamma that we bow. And one of the aspects of the Dhamma is our own capacity for awakening. The same capacity the Buddha realized fully, we also have. It's in each of us. It takes a while to appreciate that, but that capacity for enlightenment is within each of us right now. That capacity is what I feel devoted to. That capacity is what the Buddha manifested so fully. So if that connects, it's a beautiful thing.

A few announcements: There will be a guided meditation this afternoon in the Brahma Viharas, and we're going to start with an introduction to loving-kindness meditation. This is optional. It's at the 3:30 sitting. Greg is going to lead it this afternoon, so you can come and get a dose from his metta heart—a lovely experience.

Each Tuesday afternoon at 3:30, in that sitting from 3:30 to 4:30, one of us will be here to lead a guided meditation. If you're staying for the three months, what usually happens is the other team will go through the other Brahma Viharas in the second half—compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity. They'll give guidance in that. In these six weeks, we're going to give guidance in loving-kindness because it's the foundation in our tradition for the other three.

So please come, even if you're a member of the "I Hate Metta Club." It's fine. Come and check it out.

We have a little gap, as you may have noticed, in the practice meeting schedule. This morning, three of us—Greg, Sally, and I—are doing our practice meetings. But today, Carol, Vance, and Dawn are off, and they're going to resume their practice meetings tomorrow. So please check the board. We've indicated whether we're Tuesday or Wednesday. Today is Tuesday, if you're lost.

So if you're scheduled to be seen—meaning you had a meeting two days ago—you'll be assigned to either today or tomorrow. Please check the board for your specific day, and note that you'll also have a day off as part of this adjusted rhythm.

Monica will be offering sign-ups this afternoon. If you don't have a scheduled practice meeting, feel free to sign up to see her then. In general, please check the bulletin board regularly—our basic minimum is once a day. This is where we post any notes from teachers or messages from outside, as well as your practice meeting schedule. Staying current with these announcements helps everyone and will be much appreciated.

Since I have two minutes left, I want to talk about eating meditation.

The dining hall is one of the most challenging places to maintain mindfulness during the entire retreat, in my experience. You walk in and there's so much happening—everyone's gathered there, sometimes creating urgency around the food. "Is there going to be enough? Do I need to get to the front? Can I slip in ahead of that person?" Tension runs high in the dining room.

The preparation for eating meditation begins as you're walking toward the dining hall. Put your mindfulness on high alert—start practicing carefully now because you're going to encounter various feelings and reactions. There may be that urgency, the press of other people, judgments arising, or fear of being judged. When we all come together, moving and acting in proximity, we see each other more clearly, which can trigger both judgment and fear of judgment.

As you enter, resolve to be extra attentive. What's the whole experience of moving into the dining hall? One helpful suggestion—I think Joseph offered this—is to shift to seeing meditation, mindfulness of seeing. This creates a spacious frame around the entire experience.

Once you're in line getting your food, attention to arms and hands becomes particularly helpful. You could even use noting: reaching, lifting the serving spoon, moving, dishing, replacing, stepping, lifting, serving, moving. Make mental notes of every movement of hands and arms—this keeps you connected to the moment-by-moment unfolding.

Then carrying your dish: walking, stepping, stepping, stepping, sitting, placing the dish on the table. As you begin eating, continue with arms and hands: reaching, lifting, moving, placing in the mouth, chewing, chewing, tasting, tasting, swallowing, reaching, lifting.

I strongly encourage putting your fork down after filling your mouth, and don't reach for it again until you've swallowed. This introduces space into the experience, because eating tends toward compulsiveness—our survival depends on it, so naturally there's urgency. But you can slow it down to truly be present with each moment.

This approach can create a continuous period of mindfulness. I encourage you to explore careful attention to all the activities of eating. We used to distribute raisins at this point in the retreat and guide you through an eating exercise, but we've decided you're ready now—you don't need that level of guidance anymore. We're trusting you to apply these instructions.

Please experiment with this. See if it keeps you present and centered. And given how wonderful the meals have been so far, it's certainly something to look forward to.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org.

CHAPTER 76

Concentration

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> Guy Armstrong provides a comprehensive exploration of concentration (samādhi) as a foundational element in Buddhist meditation and the Noble Eightfold Path. He distinguishes samādhi from the English concept of concentration, explaining it as the unification of mind (cittassa ekaggatā) rather than mere exclusive focus. Drawing from his experience teaching three-month retreats, Armstrong traces the historical development of concentration practices, from the Buddha's early teachers who emphasized formless attainments to the discovery of the Middle Way that balances samatha (tranquility) and vipassanā (insight).
>
> The talk examines how concentration develops through continuity of mindfulness, referencing the sequential relationship between right mindfulness and right concentration in the Eightfold Path. Armstrong discusses various approaches to developing samādhi, including single-pointed focus (as taught by Pa-Auk Sayādaw), momentary concentration (kaṇika samādhi) in the Mahasi tradition, and Ajahn Sumedho's understanding of ekaggatā as "the one point that includes everything." He explains the five jhānic factors (vitakka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, ekaggatā) and offers practical guidance for deepening concentration through formal walking meditation, noting practice, and maintaining continuity throughout daily activities.
>
> This dharma talk provides both theoretical understanding and practical instruction for developing the stability and unification of mind that supports insight and liberation, making it valuable for both beginning and experienced practitioners on intensive retreat.

So tonight I'd like to talk more on this theme of concentration. We've alluded to it and mentioned it here and there. Vance talked a little about the difference between concentration and mindfulness in one of the questions, and I want to go into more detail because it's such an important factor in our overall meditation and in the Buddha's Eightfold Path and teachings.

Concentration has been around in human history for a long time. Go back as far as there is history and there have been priests and priestesses and shamans who have used the power of concentration to develop relationship with spirits or nature or altered states of consciousness to make healing possible. That's been going on as long as history has been around, as far as I can tell, in just about every culture on the face of the earth.

In the Buddha's lifetime, about 2,500 years ago, as he was leaving home and starting to practice—this is the phase we call the Bodhisattva—he set off from his home on his spiritual quest. Normally, when we talk about a bodhisattva in our tradition, we're referring to Siddhartha Gautama before he became the Buddha, when he was journeying toward awakening. In the Mahayana tradition, there are many bodhisattvas, and perhaps you all are bodhisattvas. In the lifetime of our Buddha, he was the bodhisattva in recorded history and our canon.

I should fill in some of this history because there are misconceptions going around. He was not the son of a king. He was not a prince. There were two kings in neighboring kingdoms, Magadha and Kosala, but his father was not among those kings. His father was like a chieftain, the head of a clan, the head of a village. The Bodhisattva grew up with wealth but was not destined to become a king because the kings already had sons. Nevertheless, he left his luxurious lifestyle and renounced worldly life to go off on his spiritual quest to find the end of suffering.

The first two teachers we have record of him studying with taught him deep states of concentration. These were formless attainments of nothingness and neither perception nor non-perception. While he was practicing in those states, he was beyond the reach of suffering. They were temporary states of freedom, but he always had to emerge from them. Once he returned to ordinary consciousness, he again faced the inevitability of dukkha—aging, illness, death, and eventual rebirth.

Even though he had developed strong states of concentration and was so accomplished that his teachers asked him to teach alongside them, this wasn't what he was seeking. Thank goodness the Bodhisattva moved on and discovered for himself a true path to liberation—what we could call perpetual liberation, unshakable deliverance of mind.

The Bodhisattva set aside those strong concentration practices as inadequate, continued on his journey, and found his way to the path of liberation that we have practiced and you have practiced today. This factor of concentration remains very central in the Buddha's teachings, so I want to talk about that centrality tonight—what concentration is, what it means, how it's developed, what obstructs it, and some of the deepening levels that are possible for us as practitioners.

In reference to this centrality of concentration in many spiritual traditions, you see cartoons referencing it frequently these days. I think this indicates something archetypal in the experience of concentration—all these cartoons about the guru on the mountaintop appearing everywhere. There's something archetypal they're tuning into.

One cartoon I particularly liked shows a seeker climbing up a cliff. On a plateau at the edge of the cliff, probably in the Himalayas, sits someone dressed in yogic garb—basically just a loincloth—a male sitting in lotus position. The seeker comes over the top of the hill and sits in front of the master, presumably. The caption reads: "If I knew the meaning of life, would I be sitting in this cave in my underpants?" This I take to be on the wisdom end of the cartoons.

But there's also something archetypal in the image of meditators. For me, the archetype of concentration is someone, male or female, sitting still, eyes closed, wrapped up in a shawl. This personifies something essential about concentration.

What I love about sitting on a long retreat, as you all are doing, is that if I come into the hall early in the morning or late at night when it's fairly empty, there will almost always be somebody sitting like that—sitting still, wrapped up in a shawl, embodying that archetype.

Several things emerge from this archetype and from observing you when you're sitting like that. One is the quality of stillness. The body is unmoving and there's a sense that attention is drawn inward. There's this drawing of attention into stillness and a wrapped-upness that the shawl symbolizes. But the wrapped-upness is also an inner quality. With that inner stillness comes a sense of being withdrawn from the world and being in touch with some dimension of mind that's more satisfying than normal worldly activities.

This is what the image of concentration represents for me, and it's something you all have been developing. We've been in retreat now for ten days.

For some of you, 10 days might be the longest period of retreat that you've done, or perhaps the longest you've done in a while, since we've essentially been closed for most of three years. So this is already a substantial period of retreat, and I'm definitely feeling in the meetings that I have the factor of concentration developing for people. This is happening for you already.

But I was really struck by something. Many of you have been to Spirit Rock. There are a lot of people here from California, and many of you have visited Spirit Rock. You know there's a beautiful meditation hall perched up on the hill where the retreats happen, and dormitories where people live when they're on retreat. But that is a relatively recent development—Spirit Rock was purchased about 10 years before that meditation hall went up. So for the first 10 years, the field where the hall is now and the residences was all open land.

If you look at the shape of it, as you're looking toward the meditation hall from the road going up, on the right-hand side is a curve that faces the hillside going up to your left, and it kind of makes a natural amphitheater. And then there's a creek that runs by the meditation hall down the middle.

In one of the early years that Spirit Rock was there, we invited Thich Nhat Hanh to come and teach. We set up a big platform on the right-hand side for him to sit on, and then the amphitheater—the natural amphitheater, the slope of the hillside—was filled with about a thousand meditators. He came to teach a daylong.

Of course, maybe the Buddha could speak to 500 people at once and they'd all get enlightened, but today we needed amplifiers. So we set up big speakers on towers. Thay was on a big platform and everybody could see him due to the shape of the amphitheater. He started speaking and teaching meditation, and as I was sitting in the crowd, what I felt happening was that he was casting a spell of samadhi over the whole crowd. He just emanated stillness, and as you tuned into him—both his words and his body language—he communicated that stillness to a thousand people. It was like this layer of samadhi just settled over the whole crowd. You could feel it; it was tangible.

And then in a break, he took everybody for a walking meditation to the other end of the property. There's still this photo at Spirit Rock of Thay leading this troop of about 500 meditators walking behind him, going up to the other end of the property and then walking back. It was really a beautiful day and a beautiful manifestation of the depth of meditation—something contagious about it.

Concentration comes up in so many of the Buddhist teachings. It is the last factor in the Eightfold Path, and the Eightfold Path is somewhat sequential. So in a way it is building to this factor of concentration. It follows mindfulness, so if you think of it as a sequential deepening, concentration comes after mindfulness in the sequence.

Today in the media, there is all sorts of emphasis on mindfulness. We've got a magazine now called Mindfulness—you've really made it when you've got a magazine. So all the attention and most of the research is on mindfulness. There are so many academic studies now on the psychological benefits of mindfulness, the health benefits, the social benefits, and so forth.

But in the galaxy of the Buddha's teachings, in the Eightfold Path, concentration is the brighter star. It's one step further than mindfulness along the path. So I would say, let's wait for the magazine called Concentration. But the thing is, that largely depends on people practicing mindfulness long enough to reach it, which takes some time. You've probably noticed that. It takes time for concentration to develop.

As I say, just in the last few days, I've been feeling in the practice meetings the evidence of its developing in many of you that I've spoken to. But this is something that takes time. When we look at our practice over many years, concentration will continue to deepen, and that also takes time. It takes time really to grow concentration into great strength.

One of the things that Vance talked about in answering the question on concentration and mindfulness was a translation of the word samadhi, which is the Pali that we translate as concentration. And Vance said it's not a very good translation. I agree with that.

It misses the nuances or brings in connotations that aren't accurate. In English, concentration refers to an exclusive focus of attention. It's like trying to do homework—don't distract me with that music. Although how many students actually say that? They're more likely to say, "Please turn up the music."

Samadhi does not carry that connotation of exclusive focus. It can, but it doesn't have to. Samadhi isn't about a focus of attention, either narrow or wide. Samadhi is about the quality of mind. Vance talked about a possible synonym being this factor of stability. That's a good way to think about concentration. When concentration arrives, the mind feels stable.

One of the definitions found in the discourses is the Pali term cittassa ekagata—unification of mind. Cittassa means "of the mind," and ekagata means "unification" or "oneness." This is a beautiful way to understand what concentration, what samadhi, really means: the mind becomes unified.

How is our mind usually in daily life? Often distracted—running off to past, running off to future, getting involved in analyzing, getting involved in remembrance. Not unified. But when the mind becomes unified, something really powerful happens.

Wordsworth wrote: "The world is too much with us. Late and soon, getting and spending, we lay waste our powers." That distractedness wastes our powers. When the mind's whole energy is brought back together in that unification, the mind's natural power is returned to it. We find that when the mind comes back together, it becomes strong, stable, steady, and penetrating. This is really what's involved in the term samadhi.

Much more than just a narrow exclusive focus, it's the mind coming back into itself. Now it is concentrated in a sense—the same way frozen orange juice is concentrated. Frozen orange juice means that all the non-essential stuff has been squeezed out, and what remains is quite powerful. It's concentrated. That's the way the mind becomes. When it gets concentrated, it's strong. And that's what we're developing.

One of the first things that happens with that stability of mind is we start to feel peace. This is a wonderful development. When I came upon this in my early months of retreat meditation, I thought, "How come nobody ever told me about this peace being possible?" I hadn't known it in my daily life. My mind was so busy. I was trained to think—I went through university, and probably many of you had a similar experience. Going through university, we're trained to think, and I thought that was a solution to all my problems. So I kept thinking. Only through meditation could I find that settledness that brought a degree of peace.

I'm sure some of you have noticed and reported that when the mind acquires this kind of stability, thoughts are not so problematic. Thoughts arise, but due to the stability, they just pass away. There's enough presence that we don't grab after them, and they don't actually disturb this inner peace that has been growing. We're not so buffeted by the changing weather within.

It's really important that we start to recognize the presence of concentration in our direct experience, because as we recognize it, we find our way back to it more easily. We think, "Okay, this is a possibility." We start to learn how it arose.

This is part of the fourth foundation that someone will talk about, not too long. This is the path to bringing into existence that factor of concentration, which is one of the seven factors of enlightenment.

So we start to see that one of the characteristics is its stability. And what's stable? Our present moment attention. Our attention is stable in the present moment when the mind becomes concentrated. And that means that we can be with a number of moments of experience in a row with mindfulness. That's one of the great benefits.

So we start to notice when it's present. The Buddha recommended this in the Third Foundation: "The practitioner understands concentrated mind as concentrated mind and unconcentrated mind as unconcentrated mind." So we start to recognize it and how it arose. And also we'll see how it passes. It's not permanent.

When I first came upon it, I had an idea that meditation was like a linear development. And now that I'd reached this state of concentration, it was going to last. And I thought, "Wow, my life will be fantastic when I go back with this state of concentration. Nothing's going to upset me. I'm going to get great jobs and find a great relationship, because I'm going to be such a stable guy."

It didn't last past the next sitting.

So concentration is impermanent. It will arise. It will pass away. Don't worry. Once you've learned the pathway to it, you can develop it again.

So let's talk about why we would like to develop samadhi. I've already talked about part of it. First, it makes us calm. And that's a wonderful thing in and of itself. There is, with peace, the feeling of wellbeing and ease. And I think this is what so many of us have looked for in meditation, whether in the secular version through mindfulness-based stress reduction, or in this intensive version here on retreat—we're looking for a degree of peace of mind.

And as it develops, it's very satisfying. I don't know how one can live a happy life truly without some access to this kind of peace of mind. For me, it's just become a foundation, kind of a baseline that things may come along and disturb, but the mind knows how to find its way back there. And so there's a real sense of protection and refuge in that discovery and a source of happiness.

The Dalai Lama says, "Inner peace is the key. If you have inner peace, the external problems do not affect your deep sense of peace and tranquility." Samadhi, collectedness, is a big part of this.

So first it makes us calm, and that brings a significant measure of happiness. And second, it sets us free if we continue to develop it in the direction of insight.

When the mind is stirred up, it can't see very clearly. We're thrown all kinds of ways by the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. And we can't really see so clearly the way things are. As the mind settles, now we can start to see clearly. From that base of peace, we can see things more the way they are.

This is from a discourse of the Buddha: "The purpose and benefit of concentration is the knowledge and vision of things as they are." I'm going to read that again because it's really important: "The purpose and benefit of concentration is the knowledge and vision of things as they are."

That is, when the mind settles, we can see things truly. We can see things accurately. We can see things the way they are. And what's the purpose of seeing things as they are? That's what leads to liberation.

So the same discourse goes on to explain how this seeing leads to liberation. So concentration is a really key ingredient on the path to liberation—a key ingredient for insight.

It's a little bit like, suppose you're on a merry-go-round, right? You've hopped on one of those painted horses and you're going round and round and round.

It's a lot of fun. But a friend of yours walks up to the side of the merry-go-round and holds up a newspaper. You're spinning by and you think, well, it must be important because my friend is holding it up. What does it say? Can't read it.

Then the merry-go-round starts to slow down. You come to rest in front of your friend and you can read the headlines: "Everything changes. If you hold on, you suffer. Letting go is freeing." Oh, I got it.

So that's what collectedness lets us see. We can read those headlines about the way things are in this life.

How does concentration develop? Again, as a few people have said, one of the key things we're going to say again and again—in Vance's talk it was the second job of the yogi—is to build in continuity of mindfulness. It is from continuity of moments of mindfulness that concentration develops.

When I say continuity, I don't want you to think that it's absolutely continuous, like one string going on and on. Rather, it's like there's a moment here and then we get lost. Then there's a moment here and maybe we get lost. Then there's a moment here and we get lost. That's okay. Later there'll be a moment here and a moment here and a moment here and a moment here. Then we get lost. And then we go back to it and build it up here and build up here, build up here.

So continuity doesn't mean absolutely continuous. It just means we put it in more and more frequently.

Joseph Goldstein loves to teach and talk about the noting practice. One of his metrics for you to use to gauge how your noting practice is going is what he calls NPMs—how many notes per minute are coming through? A note is a moment of mindfulness. How many moments of mindfulness per minute are coming through?

This may be a little too quantitative for some of you. Being a math minor in college, I love it, but you don't have to. So this is one way to think about continuity. A more accurate term would be frequency—the frequency of moments of mindfulness.

This is why mindfulness precedes concentration in the Eightfold Path. We put in right effort to develop right mindfulness, and right mindfulness is what develops right concentration. By and large, we can't jump from right effort to right concentration. That's not within our power for most of us. Someone like Dipa Ma, yes. Someone like you and me, not yet. So we have to go through mindfulness to get to right concentration.

Say you've been concentrated for a period and it falls away. What often happens? Oh, I want it back. If we try directly for concentration—I want to reproduce that feeling of concentration—it leads to striving. Because we can't regenerate that concentration. We have to go through the process of mindfulness. And not mindfulness with forcing and over-efforting, but a calm, relaxed interest in the present moment. That will lead onward to concentration.

So basically, it's about doing one thing at a time and giving it your full attention. The unification of mind means give it your full attention in this moment.

A lot of you probably have heard of this Korean Zen master who used to teach, who founded a center in Providence, Rhode Island. His name was Seung Sahn. He was very famous in Korea, and when he came here, nobody knew him. He didn't have a community. He didn't have a sangha. He went to work repairing machines in a laundromat to support himself while he established Korean Zen meditation in this country.

But he was a fantastic teacher and drew lots of students and became quite famous. He came to IMS one year at the end of a three-month course. I've never heard so much laughter in the hall as when Sansanim was speaking. He was really an interesting, creative teacher.

One of his ways of encouraging practice was to tell people: when you sit, just sit. And when you eat, just eat. This is like doing one thing at a time. But he was living in community with some of his students, as they do in the Zen world. And one of his students said, "But Sansanim, I've seen you at breakfast and you're sitting and eating at the same time."

Not at a loss for words, he replied, "When you sit and eat, just sit and eat." But do it wholly, do it wholeheartedly.

So it develops from sustained moments of mindfulness. There's this fifth century meditation text from Sri Lanka called the Visuddhimagga. It is one of the key ancient texts in our lineage in the Theravadan tradition. It was compiled by a monk named Buddhaghosa, and it's still used today as a basis for teaching meditation.

In the Visuddhimagga, which means "path of purification," there are forty different meditations recommended for developing strong concentration. They include things like corpses, kasinas—which hardly any of us have heard of—they're like colored discs or just color or representations of the elements that one focuses attention on. There are recollections about death, about Buddha, Dharma, Sangha. And then the last two are ones that are much more common in our community today: mindfulness of breathing and the brahmaviharas.

Any of these can be used as focuses to develop strong samadhi. Usually these kinds of practices are lumped in a category called samatha practices. Samatha is usually translated as tranquility. Specific practices are offered many times to develop the quality of tranquility and at the same time develop concentration or samadhi.

Samatha practices are contrasted with the other side, which is vipassana—insight practices. That's really what we're engaged with here. So we have practices of samatha, practices for vipassana.

In the Buddha's teachings, he didn't distinguish between those two. He talked about the development both of tranquility and insight, but he didn't say, "Do this to develop tranquility and do this to develop insight." More of the flavor you get from the Buddhist teachings at the time is that when you practice mindfulness, you will develop both samatha and vipassana. You will develop both calm and insight. So that's the way we tend to hold it.

Yet it is true that some practices will emphasize one more strongly than another. So for people who really want to pursue the path of tranquility, we do recommend at times in retreat practices like mindfulness of breathing or practices of the brahmaviharas. This is something that sometimes goes on in these six-week or three-month retreats. People will choose to focus on a samatha practice for a period of time. It's something that you don't decide on the spur of the moment here. You really need to work it out with your teacher ahead of time, if that's something you want to do. And that means your teacher needs to know your overall practice by that point. So it's not something that we do a lot, but we occasionally do.

The Buddha said this very interesting thing: that samatha and vipassana have different purposes. Samatha is for the abandoning of lust—and that's in the broadest possible sense, all forms of desire. In other words, the development of strong tranquility itself can offset desire because there's so much contentment in the present moment. The mind is not pulled outside. Samatha is for the abandoning of lust. Vipassana is for the abandoning of ignorance.

Ignorance is the fundamental blindness that keeps us trapped in samsara. When we cut to the root of ignorance and truly abandon it, then the heart and mind are truly free. Heart and mind are truly free and it's possible then to abandon the cycles of samsara, samsaric existence.

And just speaking again in praise of samatha, there's this very beautiful passage—one of the most beautiful passages in the Pali Canon, which I want to come back to in a later talk—where the Buddha talks about more or less a glide path into Nibbana, into the realization of the unconditioned or enlightenment. And one of the first steps in the glide path is the stilling of all mental formations. And the Pali is sabba-sankhara-samatha. Sabba-sankhara-samatha. The last word means the stilling. It's samatha.

Saba means all. Sankara means mental formations. Samato—all mental formations go to stillness. This is the entryway into the realization of nibbana. Based on that understanding, I sometimes wonder if a better translation for samatha might be "stillness." It has a deeper ring than tranquility. You might like to think of that—stillness meditation. It's a very appealing notion for me.

We've talked about samadhi as the unification of mind. A synonym for this is ekagata, which is included as a definition at one point. But ekagata has often been translated in this tradition as "one-pointed." You can see the similarity—unification of mind or one-pointed. Which do you prefer? I'm drawn to "unification of mind," but the concept of one-pointed also works and applies. It implies one point of focus, like the breath.

When I was practicing with Pa-Auk Sayadaw, this is definitely what we were practicing. The one point of focus was right underneath the nose, around the upper lip. That was the only point I was meant to attend to all day long. This is a powerful practice, as a number of people here who have practiced it will testify. Very powerful and very useful. I learned a lot from Sayadaw.

But it's not the only way that concentration develops. This single focus is one approach that features prominently in our tradition, but concentration can also be developed on changing objects. This is what the Mahasi Sayadaw instructions do so brilliantly.

We've already started to expand, haven't we? We began with an anchor—focusing on sounds, body, or breath. That was, in a way, a form of one-pointedness. We were restricting the attention, honing in on something. But then we started to open up to body sensations, emotions, thoughts, sounds. We'll keep opening to more potential places to focus.

In the Mahasi system, as this opens up, we may start by connecting with the breath, but we allow the attention to go to anything else that draws it, becoming mindful there. We are still developing mindfulness moment after moment, but with different objects. This is what you've been doing already as you've moved through these instructions. The mindfulness has been developing and the concentration has been developing.

As long as there are still these moments of mindfulness, even if the objects are changing, the concentration will grow. This is based on a concept called khanika samadhi. Khanika means momentary. So there's a momentary focusing, a connection with each new object. Then that drops and moves to the next, with a focusing on the new one. The samadhi builds up moment by moment on changing objects.

This works very well in the Mahasi Sayadaw system and can take one to very deep levels of concentration. You'll see it as it unfolds for you.

And it's another very effective way to develop concentration that's not just single-pointed. But it unifies the mind by bringing fullness of attention moment after moment.

Now there's one other approach to ekagata that I want to share. Ajahn Sumedho, who is a wonderful teacher in the Thai forest lineage—the first Western disciple of Ajahn Chah—established Chithurst Monastery in England and Amaravati Monastery in England, from which there are now many branch monasteries and nunneries throughout North America, Europe, and Australia. He's a really wonderful monk and teacher.

Ajahn Sumedho likes to translate ekagata as "the one point that includes everything." So it's not like focusing on this tiny area underneath the nose. What's the one point that includes everything? How about the present moment?

This really opens up from a narrow focus to potentially a very wide focus. How wide is the present moment? How wide is your consciousness? It's wide. And that's all in the present moment. So I love this approach also to the significance of ekagata. If the mind is fully in the present moment, however wide the focus, concentration will develop.

So these are three different approaches to this unification of mind. We will all continue to develop this factor as we continue with the retreat. It's really unavoidable. As long as you keep developing the mindfulness, the concentration will grow from it.

There is a wide range of individual abilities with concentration, much more so than with mindfulness. If we ask all of you to be mindful for a moment, I really feel each of you will get there. In that moment, mindfulness will be there—no problem for anyone here. If we ask each of you to become strongly concentrated by tomorrow, the results will not be uniform.

Concentration is an innate strength for some people. It's a little bit like athletic ability. I tend to limit myself to one sport because otherwise I get too distracted. The sport that I really love is tennis, because I've played it for a long time and I love to watch people play it well.

In the world of tennis, I've really loved watching Roger Federer and Serena Williams play because they have this natural athletic ability that involves power, strength, agility, speed, and hand-eye coordination. They are so fun to watch. Unfortunately, they're both retiring—so sad. But they've been beautiful to watch. They have abilities that I could never, ever have reached because they came in with that athletic potential.

Concentration works a little bit like that. Some people come in with a real power for concentration. I was not one of those people.

I remember being on a staff retreat here—I think it was around 1979. The staff here at that time was Carol and I together. I think we were eleven people in total running this facility. Now the staff is about fifty, but we have the Forest Refuge also. I don't know if we actually worked harder or we just ended up not doing as well, but anyway.

There were eleven of us, and in the winter we would have a week's retreat together. The center would close down, and we'd be on retreat together. We were four or five days into the retreat, and we were sitting in this upper walking room—we closed it off to save heat. Sometime through a sitting, I opened my eyes for some reason and looked at one of my friends who was sitting next to me, another staff person whom I'd gotten to know over the past year.

She was sitting there in some other space—not making it up, but genuinely absorbed. And I had never gotten to that space before.

And I just thought, "She's got something I don't got." But I realized that wasn't in my blood or whatever. So I was happy for her, but I wasn't there.

You may have heard stories about Dipa Ma. She had that. On one of her first retreats—it might have been her very first retreat, I'm not sure—she went deep very quickly. She was walking up to the meditation hall, which was at the top of a number of stairs, and all of a sudden she couldn't take another step. She couldn't move forward. She didn't know why. But she just stood there, like five minutes, ten minutes. And then finally she looked down—a dog had gotten a hold of her ankle. And she hadn't felt it. She was so wrapped up in her inner experience, she didn't know that a dog had bit her ankle. Finally it let go and she could continue walking. But she was so absorbed.

There's a Thai teacher named Ajahn Jumnian who used to come and teach at Spirit Rock. In his early years, his father had been a monk at one point and taught him meditation when he was young. His father had taught him meditation. At one point, Ajahn Jumnian, who didn't really like to meditate, was carrying out his father's orders and went into a deep state of absorption. And the father said, "Okay, you can come back now." Didn't return. "Come back now." He just stayed meditating. His mother would come over: "Darling, it's time for dinner. Please come." Didn't budge.

This went on for a day. And he showed no signs of wanting to leave his meditative state. It was probably quite comfy in there. Finally, his mother used her sweetest maternal voice and pleaded with him: "Please, darling, come back. We are missing you so much." And then he came out.

But his father realized at that point he had a meditation prodigy on his hands. So as he grew up, he was trained in both Buddhist practices—both samatha and vipassana—and also in a shamanic tradition in his village. He learned healing arts through his shamanic training.

When he was teaching at Spirit Rock, he would sit up on the stage, and you wouldn't see this most of the time—he was wrapped up in his monk's robes. But in the middle of a teaching once at Spirit Rock, he had his translator point out a woman in the audience and say to her, "Is your stomach upset now?"—because he had psychic powers.

The woman said, "Well, yes." She was a little surprised. "Yes, as a matter of fact, it is."

Then he opened his robe, and underneath he had this big vest that was full of hundreds of pockets and pouches and zippers and clothespins and so on. In that, there were amulets and statues and medicines and pills and lotions and potions. He took out this little bottle of white fluid and said to the translator, "Have her drink this. That will help her stomach." So she did. I don't know what happened after that—she didn't report back to us. But he had very strong powers of concentration.

So some people have it in spades. Others of us don't. I did not. But because of that, I realized that it was something I needed to develop. So I worked really hard to develop concentration. What I did—this happened mostly in the nineties—

I would come here in the fall to sit six weeks, practicing Samatha with the Brahmaviharas. After doing this a number of times in a row, and then practicing with Pauk Sayadaw for about two and a half months, my concentration improved significantly. It's still not great, but it's much better than before.

I'm deeply grateful for the time I spent in those periods of Samatha practice because I believe it changed the cells in my body. The relaxation and ease I discovered, the inner peace that emerged through that practice, transformed my body on a cellular level. I still feel the benefits today.

What blocks Samatha development? I think it's fairly obvious—getting lost in thought. When we're no longer developing mindfulness moment after moment, we lose the accumulation of power that mindfulness provides. As we get lost in thought, we stop developing concentration. That movement has been short-circuited.

The main factor—and this is why we stress it—is the continuity of mindfulness throughout the day. This is what will develop concentration. Things that obstruct it include excessive thinking and thought trains. Not just a single thought, but entire thought trains will block this development.

The other major obstruction is, of course, the hindrances. When Monica spoke about the five hindrances we work with, I'm sure you received the clear message that these obstruct mindfulness until we learn how to work with them skillfully. We can actually develop mindfulness with the hindrances present if we observe the hindrance itself rather than the object it's pointing toward. But if we become captivated by the object it's pointing to, we lose the development of mindfulness. The hindrances also obstruct the deepening of concentration.

I want to say one more thing about the positive development of concentration, specifically in the direction of jhana. Most of you have probably heard of these states called jhanas—states of strong concentration, often described as absorptions, because the mind tends to become collected within itself, folded inward. This was the territory the Buddha-to-be was exploring with his first teachers, though we begin at a much more accessible level than the states he described.

Jhana is the outcome of sustained concentration development for many people. It is possible and achievable in this day and age for some practitioners. The entry point involves examining what are called the five jhanic factors. There are four jhanas total, and the entry point is the first one, with each successive jhana becoming deeper.

The first jhana is composed of five factors of mind. We work toward it by developing what we can of these factors, which then influence the growth of the other factors. If you're interested in developing concentration to the level of jhana, these are the five factors to monitor. We're not teaching jhana in this retreat, but I want you to know about it. You might consider exploring it on a future retreat if it calls to you.

The five jhanic factors are—I'll say them in Pali, then explain: vitakka, vicāra, pīti, sukha, and ekaggatā.

Ekaggatā we've already discussed—unification of mind. Pīti means rapture; you've probably heard about it from the seven factors of enlightenment. Sukha means pleasure or happiness, which you may have encountered from various sources.

Tonight I want to focus on vitakka and vicāra. In early translations, these were rendered as "initial thought" and "sustained thought." But what would initial thought have to do with jhana? What would sustained thought have to do with jhana? Not very much. These translations miss the mark because vitakka and vicāra aren't about thinking at all.

The way this has been taught to me is that vitakka means aiming for or connecting with the object of meditation—aiming or connecting. Think about this in relation to the breath. When you sit down to become mindful of breathing, what do you do? You direct your attention to the sensation of breathing. That's vitakka.

Once you land there, vicāra comes into play.

Vichara means sustaining your attention with that experience for a little while. Half a breath is enough. So you connect with the breath and then you sustain there. Half a breath or a breath is enough. That's what gets the concentration engine going.

So these two factors, vitaka and vichara, you can apply over and over and over again in your mindfulness. And it's helpful to start tuning into them. You aim for something, connect, and then you sustain it or you rub it. You rub it with your attention. So you have the sense you get close to the breath through aiming, and then you rub it. You rub that sensation by sustaining.

By the rubbing, you get really a feeling for what's there. You see its individual characteristics—rough or smooth, long or short—and you also see its universal characteristics. It's impermanent. If you try to hold on, it's unsatisfactory. There's nobody there doing the breathing. Aiming and rubbing is something we can do again and again with any of our focuses.

If you're interested in increasing the development of concentration here, what can you do? What specific steps can you take? There are a number. This is going to be the last part of this talk. I'm just going to run through a bunch of things. I'm not going to comment on them much. You can work with them or ignore them as you like. But here are some tips.

First, you can take a primary focus on the breath. You can continue with that as a primary object. Even as other objects come in when the attention is drawn, by staying with the breath as a primary focus, you're going to be building that stability more and more.

If you use noting or counting with it, it will heighten that continuity of mindfulness. Counting is not just for beginners. When I was practicing mindfulness of breathing with Pauk Sayadaw, he instructed me to use counting, and I used it in virtually every sitting for two and a half months when I was practicing with him.

Even if you're not with the breath as a primary focus, the continuity of noting will be very helpful for developing many moments of mindfulness. When you're using noting regularly, you really know when you're with mindfulness and you really know when you're not because the notes have stopped. So the noting practice is very helpful for sustaining the continuity of mindfulness.

Then in all the activities of the day, see if you can stretch out the continuity of mindfulness—in eating, in walking around, moving around your room, taking a shower, doing your service meditation, whatever. See what can sustain the continuity of mindfulness there.

Fourth, use walking periods for formal walking. There will be more moments of mindfulness, I will wager, in a period of formal walking than in a period of walking the loop. I'm just guessing, but there probably will. So I don't know to what extent everyone is engaging formal walking in your daily schedule. If you're not yet, I really encourage you to try a period morning or afternoon where you do a sitting, move immediately to a formal walking, and back into a sitting. Just that degree of continuity, if you haven't been doing it so far, will make a notable difference.

Fifth, slowing down in all your movements. So when you're moving around the building, between the meditation hall and your room, between your room and the dining room, when you've finished a meal and you're coming back into the meditation hall, walk slowly, move slowly. One meditation master said, "Yogis should act like old persons." Act like you're already a little decrepit, even if you're not. And that will slow you down and bring in more mindfulness.

Guarding the sense doors. Now, sometimes people think guarding the sense doors means we shut them off. You know, "I should just keep my eyes down and not look anywhere else. And the less sense contact I have, the better. And it's better if I don't see or hear or smell or taste. That'll keep me more protected."

That's not the meaning the Buddha put on guarding the sense doors. It's fine to be open. What guarding the sense doors means is being very careful when you do see or hear or smell or taste. Don't let the mind proliferate off that.

Don't get caught up in reactive formations—judging each other, desiring each other, craving more of that food. Watch what happens on the basis of sense contact closely. Guard it that way. It's not that you can't look. Don't pursue what comes out of it. Let it go.

And the last thing to say is: to the extent that you are able to, without pushing too hard or striving too hard, extend your hours of formal practice in a day. That will definitely help in the development of the momentum of concentration.

When I would sit in retreats here—the three-month course and six weeks and so on—I would take the schedule from 5 in the morning until 9:30 at night as my starting point. When it said sit, I sat. When it said walk, I walked. And then I would, as the retreat went on, add on to that. Normally I found that six hours of sleep a night was fine for me. Sometimes I would reduce it further. But six hours was kind of a good cruising level for me. The rest of the day I was just doing sitting and walking.

Now, this works well for some people and not for everybody. So if you are young and strong and healthy, or you are older and strong and healthy—and I mean both mentally and physically really well—then you're in a position to try this. If you are suffering from bodily limitations, from ill health, from aging joints, from sore knees, if there's a lot going on internally with emotions and there's past trauma or history of difficulty, this might not be the right fit. But strong, healthy, interested, keen, eager—this can be really useful. Talk with your teacher to see what makes sense for you. But it can be really, really helpful.

I apologize for going on, but I have one more quote. So I'm going to close with this quotation from the Buddha: "When my concentrated mind was thus purified, bright, unblemished, rid of imperfection, malleable, wieldy, and steady, I directed it to the knowledge of the destruction of the taints. I directly knew as it actually is: This is suffering. This is the origin of suffering. This is the cessation of suffering. This is the way leading to the cessation of suffering. When I knew and saw thus, my mind was liberated from the taints. I directly knew: Birth is destroyed. The holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more coming to any state of being."

So let's just sit for a moment, please.

When I knew and saw thus, my mind was liberated from the taints. I directly knew: birth is destroyed, the holy life has been lived. What had to be done has been done. There is no more coming to any state of being.

So thank you for your attention. We have about twenty-five minutes for walking now, and then someone will cheer you up at the end of the day. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 77

Choiceless Attention

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents choiceless attention as the culmination of mindfulness training. This approach involves deliberately releasing attachment to any meditation anchor and allowing attention to move freely among whatever experiences arise - sounds, sensations, thoughts, emotions, or breath. Armstrong contrasts three relationships to meditation anchors: exclusive focus (samatha approach), preferred but non-exclusive focus, and choiceless attention where no preference exists.
>
> The practice embodies the natural flow of awareness while maintaining moment-to-moment mindfulness through vitakka (initial attention) and vicāra (sustained attention). Armstrong explains how this develops kaṇika samādhi (momentary concentration) without the striving often associated with single-pointed concentration. He addresses balancing this open approach with anchor-based practice, comparing meditation effort to tuning a lute or holding a bird - finding the middle way between too tight and too loose.
>
> The talk includes practical guidance on noting whatever draws attention, managing the insecurity that can arise in open awareness, and alternating between choiceless attention and anchor-based practice. Armstrong also discusses the jhānic factors of pīti (enjoyment/joy) and sukha (pleasure/contentment), emphasizing how deep concentration requires the brightness of mindfulness to remain balanced and insightful rather than dull.

Good morning, everyone. Nice to see your faces.

We are basically two weeks into the retreat today, and we have almost finished the instructions. A lot of mornings from now on we'll be sitting in silence. There will be a couple more days of instructions, but we're almost done. I don't know if any of us ever imagined that instructions would go on for two whole weeks, but here they are. We've really tried to examine the whole scope of activities you may run into. We've stopped short of telling you how to trim your toenails, but I think everything else we've covered.

This morning, what we're going to do in the instructions is put it all together. This is a style of practice that we call choiceless attention.

So far we've been learning how to be mindful of any experience that arises as we're meditating, whether we're sitting or walking or standing or eating, lying down or whatever. Now we want to join all those together in what I see as the logical outcome of the Mahasi Sayadaw instructions. Basically, when he presented his instructions, he would give all this on day one. I think it's good that it's been parceled out a little bit. We get a little more familiar with each area, but now we have the possibility of putting it all together.

Before I give the instructions, I want to give a little background on this approach. I want to start by talking about how we relate with our anchor. We've talked about using three possible anchors: breath, body posture, sounds. For purposes of simplicity, I'm just going to talk about breath. But when I say breath, if you're using body or sounds, you just substitute your anchor for that. Those are all fine.

I want to talk about three possible relationships to the anchor—let's say breath. One is we take an exclusive focus on it, meaning no matter what else is happening, the world could be exploding next door, atomic bombs could be going off outside or inside our system, we don't move our attention from our chosen object. This is the approach favored when you're doing samatha practice. When I went to practice with Pauk Sayadaw, he gave me the instruction to be with the breath at my upper lip all the time, all day long—sitting, walking, standing, eating, whatever. This was the only point I was allowed to be at. This is very powerful for developing the factor of concentration. It also is tough to try to ignore everything else or leave it in the background.

The second approach to breath is that the anchor, let's say the breath, is the preferred focus for mindfulness, but it's not exclusive. This is kind of the way I think we've been presenting it so far. We encourage you to make a good connection with your anchor, but if anything else comes up that is predominant and naturally draws the attention, easily let go of the anchor and connect with that new experience with mindfulness. All the other experiences can be an equally good focus for mindfulness. But if there's nothing strong going on, then we tend to prefer being with the breath. This is the second way—it's not exclusive, but there's a preference.

In the third approach, which is what we're going to do this morning, there's no preference for the anchor at all. You deliberately let go of the anchor or breath or whatever. That sometimes requires kind of a conscious unhooking because over time the anchor becomes quite a gravitational pull. You don't even have to make a firm intention, but you sit down and you're naturally drawn there. So in some cases it may mean a little bit of conscious unhooking from your anchor.

Then we let the attention be with whatever calls it. It can be anything—sounds, other sensations, thoughts, emotions, feeling tone, intention. All these things may draw the attention from time to time and we let it go there. When we unhook the attention from the anchor, we let the attention flow freely. This is why it's called choiceless attention.

Now, through years of habit, it's often been described as choiceless awareness. But I think that's a little misleading because actually what we're not choosing is where to direct the attention. So the appropriate term is choiceless attention.

I want to do a little exercise first. When we use attention in the way that the Buddha used it, it is the faculty of mind that highlights one—let's call it an object—one aspect of our experience from the whole field. As you know, as you've noticed, there are a lot of things going on in any given moment. There are a bunch of different sensations through the body. Sounds may be arising. There's a mood.

There may be thoughts going through. The breath is still coming and going. Feeling tone is there all over the place. So there are many places you could put your attention, many places you could spotlight.

In this exercise of choiceless attention, you don't direct it. You're not choosing where to place it.

I want to ask you to do a little exercise first. This can be with eyes open or with eyes closed. Sit quietly. Don't do anything. And start to notice where your attention goes. Can you sense that left to its own, it does skip around a little bit? It might be with this sensation or that sensation, or with seeing or with hearing or with a thought or with the mood or with an in-breath. Left to itself, the attention will move.

In this meditation, we're letting it do that. No attempt to control it. The challenge is letting mindfulness land where the attention lands. And this can be anywhere.

We've gotten familiar probably with our anchor, and the attention finds its way back there again and again. Now when we open up, we're going to let the attention go anywhere, and as you've just seen, it will. It'll go anywhere.

This requires a very fresh and alert presence in the moment. Anything can pop up as the focus of attention, and when it does, that's where we want to establish mindfulness—just for that moment of that experience.

This is where the terms vitakka and vicara come in handy. When the attention lands on a new object, take enough time with it to connect and sustain briefly so that you really feel into that experience. If there's a sensation, you connect to it and you feel into it enough to know what kind of sensation this is. Is this a pulsing or a tingling or a pressure or a heat or a coolness or an itch? Sustain just long enough that you could, if requested, put a label on it. It's this kind of sensation.

Once you've connected to that extent, you don't need to stay there any longer. But that connecting and sustaining—vitakka-vicara—is an important piece for establishing the mindfulness with changing objects.

One of the beautiful things about this practice is it's very natural. There's no forcing in it. It's really hard to build up striving when the attention is allowed to move so naturally. We're just sitting back. Whatever arises is fine. Whatever comes into our field of view is fine. There's no pursuing anything or trying to land for a long time on anything—just the moment-to-moment receiving of where the attention has landed.

This can lead to a lot of ease and relaxation. In contrast to a samatha practice where we're really making a strong effort to be with a single object, this is very open, very easy, very natural, very relaxed. Please take the time to appreciate that aspect of ease and openness in this meditation.

Are we abandoning the development of concentration? No, because the mindfulness can still be steady moment after moment. This is the sense of kanika samadhi, momentary concentration. As the mindfulness connects with each new arising, we are still putting together, moment after moment, these experiences of mindfulness. That's what strengthens concentration.

This approach can lead to very strong concentration, but it's not narrow, single-pointed, and doesn't have to involve any kind of striving. It's very natural, relaxed, easy.

This is one way to describe this practice in terms of where the attention goes—being there for where it lands. The other way is it answers the question: what's happening now?

If I just popped into your mind in meditation and asked, "What's happening now?" you'd know. Oh, there's an in-breath. Oh, there's hearing.

Oh, there's pressure. So really simple—what's happening now? And that's the focus for mindfulness.

So either way you like to think of it—letting the attention move and keeping up with it, or just moment after moment asking what's happening now—both approaches describe this practice.

Because we're open to such a wide range of experience and there's no anchor, it's fairly easy for the attention to drift off and get lost in thought. Getting lost in thought obviously interrupts the moments of mindfulness. So it can be helpful to keep the attention in the present moment by adding noting to where the attention is landing.

For instance, as I'm sitting in my experience right now, I might note: seeing, pressure, in-breath, metta, thinking. Just like every two or three seconds, make a note that reflects where the attention has landed—whatever degree of detail you can see in body sensations, thoughts, moods, and emotions. And then be ready for the next landing of attention.

If you ever get lost because there are a lot of things going on—sometimes you go, "Should I be with that one? Is this one calling? My breath? Which is predominant? My breath is coming up again. Am I getting lost with my breath?"—if that ever happens, just go back to a simple experience. For some of you, it could be the breath, it could be sounds, it could be the body posture. Pick one simple thing, be with that until the mind calms a little bit, and then try opening again to the wideness of everything.

Let's try the meditation. I'll give instructions as we go.

Again, feeling in your posture this balance of energy and relaxation, alertness and calm, feeling the body in sitting. And from that connection with the sitting base, just noticing how many things are going on in your experience—sensations throughout the body, sounds coming and going, experience of breathing, a certain mood or state of mind, thoughts passing through, all with feeling tone.

First, to bring in the sense of openness, let go of any connection to your anchor, if it's breath or body, and open to the experience of hearing. Let the attention become very wide, spacious, extending in front and in back, to left and to right, above. If there are no clear sounds, you can just be in touch with the vastness of the silence.

Now, with that same open and receptive attitude, we can begin the practice of choiceless attention. Start to notice where the attention is drawn. It will keep landing moment after moment. It may stay somewhere for a while naturally—that's fine. It may sometimes go back to your anchor because it's so familiar—that's fine. But we're not trying to place it anywhere. We're just trying to be fresh and alert in the moment to notice what's being highlighted by attention.

The main thing is just to notice what's being highlighted. And hopefully it's an experience you've become familiar with through all the earlier instructions. You know how to relate mindfully. And the key thing is the noticing.

If you like, you can pair the noticing with a soft mental note, just naming where the attention has landed: out-breath, tingling, pressure, thinking, hearing.

See how it feels to be with this wide open attention that's allowed to go anywhere, to any sense appearance, and still be present moment after moment.

Sometimes you might find that the attention moves so fast that it's noticing like three things in a second. If that happens, then you don't need to try to connect and sustain to each one. Just the noticing is enough, and you don't have to try to note them. Just let that noticing happen if the attention is moving quickly.

Sometimes in this openness, having let go of our anchor, we might feel a little insecure, a little exposed or unprotected in that wide open space. If that happens, notice that mind state. Oh, insecurity, anxiety. And see if you can hold that connection with the feeling for a bit. Notice it's another emotion. And then at some point, if it feels like enough or too much, just come back to the anchor. Settle again in the present. And if you feel inclined to open again, then try again. This way we can approach the openness of this technique little by little.

What's happening now? Where is the attention in this new moment?

Can there be mindfulness with it? Without fixing on anything, we allow the attention to be free again, to go where it will.

If you connected with this meditation, this can be a really skillful approach for you for a long time in practice—certainly for the rest of this retreat. Its benefits are the openness, the ease, the relaxation, the lack of pressure and striving. You're not looking for any particular result, just being with what's appearing.

In comparison to being with the anchor, this practice can more easily lead to spacing out, getting lost in thought, because there's not that firm commitment to one point, one place you keep coming back to again and again. So part of the learning, I think, for most of you at this stage in the retreat, is going to be how do you combine this wide open attention to changing objects—with all the benefits that it has—with what you've already learned of the benefits of being with your anchor, such as the breath.

What I suggest, and your teachers can help you refine this or find your own way with it, is to do some kind of alternation between the two. That second approach to the anchor that I mentioned this morning—where the attention's not exclusive, but it's preferred. There's a preferred connection to one simple experience: breath, body, sounds. But in that, if something is strong and draws the attention, whether it's an emotion or a sensation or a thought, easily go to that new thing. If nothing particularly is drawing the attention, just stay with the anchor and you'll get all the benefits of the deepening concentration from that.

And then from time to time, venture forth. Let's open up and see what's out there. It might be scary. It might be beautiful. But I'm going to open up and check it out and see if the continuity with the present moment can still occur in that wide open field of changing experience.

If you have developed both of these meditation approaches to a degree of skill, you'll always find a suitable home. Feeling a little tight, a little over-efforting? Open up. Just let it be natural and relaxed. Feeling a little drifty? Tensions getting lost in thought more easily? Ah, come back. Collect a little more around your anchor.

Learning how to combine the two, how to alternate, when it's right to bring in one, when it's right to bring in the other—that can be your direction for a long time in practice.

A couple of questions. One I'm going to ask myself because this has come up in conversations over the last couple of days: "I really liked your talk on concentration, but when I tried to put it into effect, I got into a lot of striving. What should I do?"

Well, you already know the answer to that, right, from Sayadaw U Pandita? Don't do that. So you already know. How do you not do that? That's kind of the question.

The first thing is, when I gave a list of different ways that you could strengthen samadhi during the retreat, it came at the end of the talk and I didn't really take the time to put a frame of reference around all those suggestions. So a couple of key things about if you want to play with those suggestions: don't do them all at once. Phase them in gradually, play with the ones that appeal to you, and try a little bit at a time.

The second thing is, if you've settled into a way of practice that seems harmonious for you—body's not too tight in terms of striving, mind is present a lot more than it was when you began two weeks ago—that's good. You've already got a good meditation developing. So these things can be regarded as fine tunings. You're just getting a tune-up on your engine to make it run a little more smoothly or efficiently. You don't have to change anything. But if you want to, play with them one by one. And do it with a balanced mind.

This is a really important instruction in any meditation retreat: try to keep your mind in balance. If you find it's getting out of balance with over-efforting, then find a way to back off a little bit. Bring the mind back into balance.

When we talk about the level of effort, Vance used this beautiful image of holding a bird in the hand. If you hold it too tightly, you'll crush it. If you don't hold it tightly enough, it will fly away. It's just like our attention.

Another image the Buddha used was tuning a lute. If you make the strings too tight, it's going to make a really loud, unpleasant sound. If you make the strings too loose, they're just going to flop around and you don't get a pleasing sound from it. So you want to find the place where the strings are just right. That means a balance of effort that's not too harsh and not too loose. In other words, somewhere in the middle.

How do you know where the middle is until you've gone to one end or the other? Or preferably both. So I regard it as not misfortune to be caught up in striving for a while because you'll learn, "Oh, that was too much. I tightened the strings too much, and I need to come back with more relaxation." And then you might find yourself having gone too far in relaxation. The mind's drifting off a lot. That's not a bad thing either. Because once you know where the ends of that spectrum are, you'll have better luck at finding the middle.

Now the other interesting thing is that the middle is not a fixed point. The middle keeps changing on us. When the mind is calm, it doesn't take much effort at all to be present. So you can go way to the end of relaxation. When the mind is turbulent, it takes more effort to be present to find that middle point. So play with it. Look at the mind being in balance as a really important factor as you tune.

And then on the question particularly with sleep, I recommend moderation in sleep. And this is already happening for a number of people. I've heard this in the interviews. People will say, "You know, nine-thirty comes along, I've just done the chanting, but I'm not really sleepy yet." So don't go to bed if you're not sleepy. If you still have energy, you could do another walk, come back for another sit, and in that way the hours extend naturally.

Other people have said, "Yeah, I'm pretty much doing the schedule, but then I wake up at four. And I feel alert." Oh, good time to get up. It's starting to happen naturally. So you don't have to press too much on sleep, but listen to what your body is telling you. If energy's there, you don't have to go to sleep. If you wake up early, energy's there, you can get up.

You could try, if you want to experiment and not make a big commitment, just sit up in bed. Sit up on your pillow. Lean against the wall or the headboard and see what it feels like. Then you might be encouraged. "Oh, I'm alert. I'll get dressed, go to the hall, meditate." Let it unfold in a natural way.

Another question: Can there be too much samadhi? How to know and how to balance it? The answer to that is no. There cannot be too much samadhi because Dipa Ma, she took it to levels that I haven't even dreamed of yet. If you read her life story, which is a very inspiring biography—I think it's just called Dipa Ma—she was an amazing practitioner due to the depth of her concentration, which went beyond being bitten by a dog and not knowing it. That's not actually a real onward-leading aspect of meditation experience. But she developed her concentration so strongly that she explored all the jhanas and formless attainments, and on the basis of that was able to develop psychic powers that were documented by a university researcher in Calcutta. She's just a very inspiring yogi.

So there can't be too much samadhi, per se. But you do want to refine your attention to it. As you go into samadhi, you can get wrapped up. And it becomes a little bit dull because it can become so cozy. Like that image of the yogi wrapped up in a shawl. It can get very cozy in samadhi. And what happens is the light of mindfulness cannot be present.

So what you want is, if you're going into samadhi, you want to keep it balanced with the brightness of mindfulness. What's happening now? What's happening now? What's happening now? If you're going into the development of jhanas, then that doesn't apply. But right now, what we're all doing is vipassana. And so as the concentration deepens, you really want to keep this brightness of mindfulness happening moment after moment after moment.

Another question that came in the bowl, and I think this is an interesting one.

What's the difference in feeling with piti and sukha?

So I think I mentioned that there are five jhanic factors: vitakka, vicara, piti, sukha, ekaggata. What's the difference between these two middle ones?

Piti is more or less the first one to develop. These factors are somewhat sequential. Piti is the first one to develop. It's usually translated as rapture, but I don't think that's a very good translation because it just aims very high. This is like being swept away. It puts too high a bar on the quality. Bhikkhu Analayo translates it as joy, and I think that's a nicer translation. It's also maybe a little too high in my estimation. I like to think of it as enjoyment.

When you start finding that you're enjoying meditation in the moment, to me, that's the first sign of piti. "Oh, this being in the present is kind of nice. This opening to sounds is really spacious, relaxes me. That's kind of nice." That's the start of piti. As it builds, as the enjoyment builds, it does get into joy. It can get into bliss. It can get to very strong physical expressions. Sometimes so strong, the energy is uncomfortable. That's okay, because who we have waiting in the wings is sukha.

Sukha is usually translated as pleasure. That's a good translation. Vance was describing the tones of vedana. They're described as sukha, dukkha, or neither sukha nor dukkha. So pleasure is a good translation. And it comes with an emotional sweetness that I like to think of. Sukha sounds kind of like sucrose or sugar. When sukha arises, there's a pervasive sweetness in the body and the mind. So it has this warm flavor that brings a deep contentment. And then there's the feeling that, oh, it's so good. The mind can just settle into itself because it's so inviting and there's so much contentment. One teacher translates it as happy comfort of body and mind.

So piti, there's enjoyment. There can be some bodily energy, but with sukha, there's a real wave of sweetness. Very satisfying.

A couple of announcements. This morning there will be a guided loving-kindness this afternoon at 3:30, so the second in the sequence, and Sally will be leading that. Vance's schedule for practice meetings went up a little before the sit, so if you think you might be meeting with Vance today, please check that after this sit. There's plenty of time.

There's a long history in meditation centers of what we call the window wars, where different meditators have different views on whether windows should be open or closed. And there have been occasions when the temperature of coolness or heat actually brought yogis to blows in the meditation hall. Not here, not here, but elsewhere. So we don't want that to escalate.

At some points in the past, we've assigned a service meditation to a yogi to monitor the windows. But if you think striving for samadhi puts pressure on yourself, being responsible for the windows in this hall is like unimaginable responsibility. So we don't want to put that burden on any of you. It's really too much.

So we've consulted with the staff and we've made a decision. We're going to leave windows open in the front and at the back all day long, all night long. If the temperature dramatically changes, we may revise that, but a staff person will do it. And the rest of the windows will be closed. So we ask you all to take what's given with the window situation. Some of you will be too warm.

C'est la vie. Some of you will be too cold. C'est aussi la vie. So please accept what's offered in the way of windows and know that the staff will manage it. There is ventilation going on all the time. There's an air circulation system that IMS has installed that is always on and will be circulating air. It's not going to get stuffy. So windows are open.

Air will be moving through. And if the window setting is not suitable for you, you might want to move to a window that has been preordained to be open or closed and find your balance that way.

I hope you really have a wonderful day playing with this choiceless attention. It can be really opening. And if at first you feel a little lost, go back to your anchor and try again. It's really a wonderful long-term way to be in the present moment.

Have a choiceless day.

CHAPTER 78

Seven Factors of Enlightenment (Satta Bojjhaṅga)

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong presents the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅga) as the most important list of wholesome mental factors for meditators. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), he explains how these factors—mindfulness (sati), investigation (dhammavicaya), energy (vīriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā)—develop sequentially and support one another. The first three are arousing factors that bring up energy, while the last three are pacifying factors that calm and stabilize the mind. Armstrong emphasizes the need for balance between these qualities, illustrating with practical examples from his own practice and stories from great teachers like Dīpā Mā and Milarepa. He concludes with Ajahn Liem's remarkable account of complete awakening, demonstrating that such profound realization remains possible today. The talk offers both theoretical understanding and practical guidance for recognizing and cultivating these essential factors in daily meditation practice.

You may have noticed that we've been a little heavy in the beginning of the retreat on working with difficulties. Monica talked about the hindrances, Vance talked about greed and aversion, and Sally talked about delusion. You may think, oh, that's all there is. So far, you've probably been rescued by Greg's teachings on metta. Thank goodness there's been something uplifting, right? Otherwise, it's been maybe hard going.

But the retreat is starting to turn a corner where we're really going to be encouraging you to pay as much attention to wholesome factors as difficult factors. The talk this evening is the start of that.

Tonight I want to talk about the seven factors of enlightenment. The Buddha talked about a lot of lists of wholesome factors—there's the Eightfold Path and the Brahma Viharas and the five spiritual faculties. But in my opinion, the list of the seven factors is the most important one for meditators. Because as you take up the process of meditation as part of the Eightfold Path, these are the factors of mind that carry you, carry us to liberation. These are the things that we want to start keeping an eye on as our practice unfolds, as it develops.

In the Fourth Foundation of Mindfulness, the Buddha only mentioned two lists of mental factors. One was the hindrances and the other was the seven factors. So I think this points to its central role, as he saw it, in the unfolding of our Satipatthana practice. Sally said that one of the ways we understand our Dharma practice is that we begin to starve the hindrances. We don't feed them any longer. And in turn, we grow, we build up the factors of enlightenment. So at this stage in the retreat, it's really helpful to start tuning into the growth of these wholesome factors. How wholesome can it get?

Dipa Ma was teaching a three-month course here one time. She was one of the teachers on a three-month course. And it was really sweet to see her because every afternoon after lunch, she would be doing walking meditation in front of her house. She was staying in the house across the street. After lunch, about one o'clock, you could see her there doing her walking meditation. Someone as developed as Dipa Ma still doing her walking meditation after lunch.

So one of the yogis at one point in the retreat asked her—they were trying to figure out, what's it like to be you? But they had to ask it in a more refined way. So they said, what's in your mind? And Dipa Ma replied, she only had three things in her mind: peace, concentration, and metta. That's a nice mind. That's a nice place to hang out. That was her mind. And she was still doing walking meditation. She was still developing the path.

This is from the Buddha: "Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future, all will do so by surmounting the five hindrances that weaken wisdom, by firmly establishing their minds in the four foundations of mindfulness, and by correctly developing the seven factors of enlightenment."

So here it is in a nutshell. We learn to work with the hindrances, we apply the four foundations, and we build up the factors of enlightenment. This is our path in a brief description.

So what are the seven factors? I want to go through them briefly and then I'll talk a little more about the group. They are mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, tranquility, concentration, and equanimity.

When you look at this list, you see it starts with mindfulness, and that's the factor that keeps them all in balance. This is a little bit what Monica talked about in her talk, how mindfulness herds the other factors, keeps them in order.

The next three factors—investigation, energy, and rapture—bring up energy. So they're called arousing factors. And then the last three factors are called the pacifying factors. Calm, concentration, and equanimity settle that energy down and bring in basically the factors of tranquility.

So this is the broad sweep of the seven factors, and the Buddha said that they are sequential. One leads to the next, leads to the next, leads to the next. So we'll talk about how that works. They're sequential and they also support one another. So it's not like you have to get all the way through mindfulness and only then does a little investigation come up, and only then a little energy comes.

They all grow up together.

I don't want this talk to sound too idealistic because I think all of you have been experiencing these factors already, but sometimes briefly and sometimes not noticed. But it's really helpful to begin to notice them because when we understand how they feel, we also understand how they come into being and how they grow to maturity. This is part of what's pointed to in the fourth foundation. We are to understand their arising and their growth. So by putting more attention on these wholesome factors, we'll be fulfilling that fourth foundation, and it really helps them to grow.

"Just as all the rafters of a peaked house slant, slope, and incline towards the roof peak, so too, when a meditator develops and cultivates the seven factors of enlightenment, that person slants, slopes, and inclines to nibbana." So in other words, these factors are leading us to liberation. Whether you want to go there or not, that's where these are going. And I hope you like that destination because that's where it's headed.

So you can understand this in two ways. One is that these factors lead in that direction, and that's why they're called factors of enlightenment. The other way to understand it is that these factors describe a mind that is so balanced and so developed that it is next door to nibbana. So in a way, we can't make the opening to nibbana happen. The opening to the unconditioned happens by some kind of grace. All we can do is cultivate the factors that bring the mind close to that. And that's what the seven factors of enlightenment do. They bring the mind as close as can be developed to nibbana, and in a way the factors converge on nibbana. And at some point they get close enough that the mind tips over and opens into the unconditioned. So this is really our work, to bring the mind as close as we can to the realization of the unconditioned.

One small note: generally it's understood the first glimpse of the unconditioned is called entering the stream. One understands then the full possibility of freedom and one has entered the stream of the Dhamma. So this is called the moment of stream entry, this realization. This is where the factors of enlightenment are going.

There's a little bit of controversy around the word. The Pali word is bodhi and it can be translated as either enlightenment or awakening. So you've probably heard both. Different translators will use one or the other. It's interesting, Bhikkhu Bodhi and Bhikkhu Analayo have recently had some dialogue through articles about which is more appropriate. Bhikkhu Bodhi favors enlightenment and Bhikkhu Analayo favors awakening. So you can take your pick.

I'm going to use enlightenment because it's a word that has fallen out of favor in Dhamma circles these days. Awakening seems more generic and more broadly appealing. Enlightenment sounds a little elitist, whereas awakening seems—oh, anybody can do that. Anybody can wake up. But it leads to titles like I saw for a workshop at one point at a different Dharma center: "Awakening Through Journaling." We're not encouraging that here. We don't think journaling leads into the seven factors of enlightenment by and large. So the word enlightenment means something special in the whole Buddhist tradition. So that's the word I'm using tonight. You can translate it in your own way.

So these factors are sequential. Mindfulness kicks it off, keeps them in balance. The first three bring up energy, the second three calm it down. And it really points to, we need to develop them in such a way that the arousing factors and the calming factors are balanced. That's what brings the right mind of meditation. And we've been pointing to this many times with our emphasis on body posture: have a body posture that is alert and energized, but at the same time relaxed. So this balance of factors is really needed. I'll talk at the end about what happens if it gets out of balance one way or another.

The first factor is mindfulness. We've talked a lot about mindfulness. Dawn just gave a talk on the First Foundation. Monica gave a talk on sati and how it brings factors together. I gave a talk on mindfulness of breathing. So I don't need to say a lot more about mindfulness.

You've been doing it. That's the most important thing. You've all been doing it.

I just want to emphasize this word in the Satipatthana Sutta: "breathing in long, one understands, one breathes in long." "Feeling a pleasant feeling, one understands, I feel a pleasant feeling." This word "understands"—pajanati—is very closely related to sampajanya, which is clear comprehension. And this is the opening of wisdom.

So mindfulness has within it the movement to wisdom. One of the things that happens when mindfulness starts to relate to our experience is it gets interested. There's a wisdom aspect that's getting interested in what's going on, that's getting curious within mindfulness. And that's what leads directly to the next factor, which is investigation.

The Pali is vichaya dhamma. Vichaya means investigation. Dhamma, in this case, can be interpreted three different ways. It's kind of interesting. The Buddha explained it two different ways. The commentaries explained it another.

The first is vichaya dhamma as investigation of the dhamma—the teachings, the truth, nature, the way things are. That's the broadest sense of investigation.

Then the Buddha also described vichaya dhamma as investigation of states—meaning states of mind. What's wholesome and leads to freedom, what's unwholesome and leads to suffering. This is an important discernment to make to support our practice in the right direction.

The third meaning of dhamma, probably from the commentaries, is dhamma as phenomena. Dhamma is also used meaning all the phenomena of our experience. So investigating our experience.

It can be understood in our tradition in all these ways. They all have relevance. They are all useful. They're all useful ways to explore.

So how do we investigate? In meditation practice, investigation is mainly nonverbal. We could get really conceptual about any part of our experience. We could get conceptual about mindfulness, about the six senses, their objects, the sense bases, all of that. But this is not really the purpose of investigation. It's to feel our direct experience more closely.

So investigation means let our attention come closer to the object. And this is kind of illustrated well by vitaka vichara. We aim and we rub toward anything—toward the breath, toward sensations, to sounds, thoughts, emotions, moods, feeling tone, intention, sights, tastes, smells, anything that's part of our experience. We bring our attention close to it and then we rub to get the feeling of it. That's the investigation.

In that rubbing, we start to notice, oh, is this permanent or impermanent? Is this personal or universal? So as we rub, we're picking up these universal characteristics that lead to insight.

Investigation especially among the factors is a wisdom function. Mindfulness has it within it. Investigation is strongly a wisdom function. It really looks to understand the nature of things, the dhamma of things.

Sometimes people ask, how do I develop more wisdom in meditation? One answer is, develop this factor of investigation.

Like everything else, it has to be done with balance. One can over-investigate. And that means looking too much for something more. It's like we can get into trying to milk our practice and conceptualize around it. And that stirs the mind up more.

So this investigation described as wise attention in Pali is yoniso manasikara. Manasikara means attention. Yoniso is often translated as wise or appropriate or getting to the root.

The origin of this term reveals something profound: yoni means womb. So yoniso can be understood as a womb-like attention. This means we encompass the phenomena, we nourish it, we nurture it. There's a quality of warmth in this kind of investigation that we bring to any aspect of our experience.

This is a way of approaching nature through our experience. We want to be womb-like in our surrounding of it with attention.

There are various ways to investigate. Dawn spoke about in a guided meditation the other morning looking for the beginning, middle, and end of an in-breath—beginning, middle, end of an out-breath. Many of you played with that and found it really helped with continuity. Bringing an interest, bringing a curiosity can help us stay connected to what we're paying attention to.

Sayadaw U Pandita used to give meditators an instruction like this. He'd say, "All right, next time you come for an interview, I want you to report three sensations that you notice with an in-breath. Three distinct sensations. And just saying 'in' is not a sensation. It's things like pulsing or tingling or pressure or relaxation, expansion, contraction, warmth, coolness. Can you pick out three separate sensations that happen when you take an in-breath? And then can you pick out three separate sensations that happen on an out-breath? Come report that to me next time."

If you were reporting to U Pandita, that would pick up your interest. So people looked. I looked because my teachers asked it of me. And so you would go back to U Pandita and you'd report these three. And then he'd say, "Okay, next time bring me one more that's different. Keep investigating. Don't rest on your laurels. Keep looking."

This is fun if you want to play with it. We're not going to ask you for it, so you can be relaxed. But see if it brings in that interest in investigation that is the opening of wisdom. You notice when you're interested in something—like are there three sensations—the attention is there really naturally.

I was riding a bike the other day down Pleasant Street, and this deer walked across the road in front of me and then reached the other side of the road and then made this beautiful leap into the woods on the other side of the road. As soon as it came, my attention was just there with it, not forced, not straining. It was just a delight to see. This is investigation.

When we investigate, it takes some energy. That picks up and leads into the third factor, which is energy. The Pali here is viriya. This is an interesting word. We translate it as energy. It could also be effort, energetic effort, strength, courage, ardor, enthusiasm. All these things point to the mind state of viriya.

Viriya is this kind of effort and energy that's directed to the path. So just having physical energy in the body—that alone is not viriya. Viriya needs to be directed to developing the meditation, developing wholesome qualities of mind.

The root of it is the Pali word vira, which means hero. So you can think of this as a heroic kind of effort. Do you ever get the feeling in these two-plus weeks that you've been making a heroic effort? You have. You have. That's this factor of viriya. I think every one of you has been making a heroic effort.

And it has the same root as the English word virile—vira, virile, the same root word. The Buddha said, "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the work of cultivating wholesome states." So this is the quality of virya. We're willing to put in the work to develop the path even when it's hard.

Of course, this comes out of our motivation for practice. If we don't have motivation, we won't put in this kind of energy and effort. When I think about this quality, I think about the training that world-class athletes go through. It is arduous. You look at these figure skaters, gymnasts, somebody like Simone Biles—I think she's probably been training since she was like five years old, maybe younger. Hours and hours and hours of training go into the kind of agility and balance and strength that she has.

In the field of tennis, which is my interest, Andre Agassi used to train so hard in Las Vegas with his physio trainer that he would be running up hills until he threw up from fatigue. That's what the trainer demanded from him. And then I also sometimes follow pro bike riding. The Tour de France is awesome. A cyclist was quoted as saying, "Every time I race, I know I'll have eight hours nonstop pain." And the training is the same. They train on hills. They train in the Alps. They train in the Pyrenees. Eight hours of nonstop pain. This is just for fame and fortune. You know? We're after something a lot bigger than that.

So it's beautiful to see you all making this kind of heroic effort. One three-month course, I was practicing—Joseph and Sharon were my teachers, and they were into a very virya kind of phase. They kept encouraging us to really shrink, shrink, shrink our hours of sleep. That was really hard. But we'd come into an interview—this is a phase they were in, they're not doing it now, we're not doing it now. Every time we walked into the interview, we'd have to report: How many hours did you sit, how many hours did you walk, and how many hours did you sleep? There was no hiding. I really worked hard to bring my sleep down and to try and come up to the standard that they were looking for. That was very useful, but it was a lot of work.

Virya expresses itself in this kind of heroic endeavor. It also expresses itself in perseverance. There was a Tibetan yogi, one of the most famous yogis in the whole Tibetan history named Milarepa, who was a fantastic yogi in around the 11th century. He spent a lot of his time meditating on his own in remote mountain solitudes. But he also developed some very strong students who would come and practice near him and get instruction from him. He had two primary students that I know of, Gampopa and Rechungpa.

At one point he'd been training Gampopa for a number of years in this remote retreat location, but he now thought it was time for Gampopa to go off on his own. So he was sending him off. Gampopa didn't really want to go because he had a great love for his teacher who was very inspiring to him. So they bid farewell. Gampopa was sad, but he was walking down the trail, leaving the retreat.

He got partway down the trail and Milarepa said, "Wait, wait, come back. I have one more teaching." So Gampopa walked back up to Milarepa. One of the things about Milarepa that was so outstanding is that he would dress through the Tibetan winters in just a pair of white robes, white cotton robes. He would practice through the winter in those robes because he had developed this practice called tummo or inner heat.

So Milarepa called Gampopa to him and said, "I have one more instruction for you."

And Gampopa said, "Yes, venerable sir, what is it?"

Milarepa turned around, flipped up his cotton robe, and showed him his backside. And what he said was, "There is nothing more profound than meditating on this pith instruction: the qualities in my mind stream have arisen through my having meditated so persistently that my buttocks have become as hard as a camel's hoof."

So this was the last teaching—develop buttocks that are as hard as a camel's hoof. He said, "My son, you must also give rise to such heartfelt perseverance and meditate." This is his last instruction to Gampopa, who went off to become a very famous yogi and teacher in his own right. So my noble children, please remember this instruction.

This quality of viriya can also express itself simply as perseverance. You don't have to stay up all night to manifest viriya. Sometimes it's just perseverance.

This is from Sayadaw U Tejaniya: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort which is simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this, you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

When there is this energy and the mind gets connected to our experience, eventually that brings about a kind of delight in what we're seeing. When the delight starts to come into the meditation, this is the quality we call piti. Usually translated as rapture, but to me rapture aims really high. Rapture to me is an experience of profound bliss, mind and body. And rapture doesn't start off like that. Simply noticing that you're enjoying the meditation, you're delighting in the meditation, is the sign of piti.

I'll call it rapture because it's the common translation—I don't want you to get confused when you go to read other teachings. But it can also be called joy. It can be called rapt attention. It can be called joyful interest. But there's that sense that in connecting to the present moment, some enjoyment of that starts to come in. This is piti.

You find out the meditation is kind of where you want to be. You're not so much forcing your mind back into the moment, but the mind starts to enjoy being in the moment—partly because we're stepping out of the disturbing excursions into past and future, partly because there is this innate pleasure in being here and being present. There's something satisfying about it.

One teacher in Australia—I don't know if anyone has mentioned this, I think someone may have—Ajahn Brahm, talks about discovering the beautiful breath in meditation. If you can start to see the breath or your anchor as beautiful, it really helps keep the attention with it. So you can look for that. We can learn to perceive things as beautiful. Even if they start off neutral, we can start to see the beauty in something like the breath.

So rapture is a mental factor. All the seven factors are mental factors, but it's often accompanied by physical signs and accompanied by rising energy in the body. The energy can take different forms. The commentaries explain it as minor rapture, where there are kind of goose bumps all over. As momentary rapture, sometimes there's just a flash of energy like lightning that goes through the body. As showering, and this is where it feels like waves of energy are passing through the body, but they do pass through. There's uplifting, and one can feel almost as though one could float up off one's chair or cushion. This is actually the energy that when strengthened leads to yogis being able to levitate. This is not an illusion. Yogis who develop this quality actually have the ability to levitate. And then all-pervading, where the energy is throughout the body.

Mostly rapture is a pleasant experience. But sometimes the energy can become so strong that it's uncomfortable. If that happens, one may be tempted to back off from developing the factors to get more ease. But the general advice is to continue because as the factors continue to develop, this factor of sukha comes in, which translated would be pleasure. But it's a kind of sweetness of mind and body that brings a real mellowing to the experience of the energy of rapture. So we work through the little bit of discomfort, and as the meditation goes on, then there's a natural calming down.

But because the rapture is essentially pleasant, it naturally leads into the next factor in the sequence: tranquility.

Tranquility takes the energy of rapture and, once it's been joined with sukha, begins to calm it all down. The Pali term is passaddhi, which can be translated as tranquility, ease, serenity, calm, or relaxation. This is the first of the factors that begins to bring in peace, pacifying our experience of mind and body.

Because the rapture has had a pleasurable quality, and then it's joined with peace, it brings about a sense of inner contentment. The mind feels that it can settle in itself from that contentment.

Don't necessarily look for this contentment to be a full-blown experience that lasts a whole hour with strong intensity. In the beginning, this may be quite fleeting. But you notice it by the factor of calm—it feels okay. This okayness is the start of a contentment that can really deepen. So you look for it in its less intense form at first, but it's a real form, a real appearance. These moments of calm, moments of tranquility—notice that there's something satisfying in that, even if it doesn't last long.

From the Buddha: "For one whose mind is uplifted by rapture, the body becomes tranquil and the mind becomes tranquil. On that occasion, the enlightenment factor of tranquility is aroused by the practitioner."

I really appreciate this expression of the body becoming tranquil. We don't often hear much about this in meditation, but the fact is that this tranquilizing of the body, this calming of the body, is a really important movement. Most of us, when we come into meditation—I was certainly this way—have had so many chaotic experiences in our lives that our bodies have accumulated a lot of stored tension. So when I sat down, the body wasn't tranquil. When I stilled it, there was all this wild energy running around that wanted to be released. But what it really wanted was to calm down.

In time, the body energy does calm down. When the body becomes tranquil and the mind becomes tranquil, that really opens the door for this contentment to come through. Then there unfolds, as it grows, a new ease in meditation. We can settle into the moment without so much struggle. We're not looking to get rid of things. We're not looking to develop anything special. Just the way it is becomes okay.

In this calming, thoughts also begin to settle. We're not being so assaulted by the movement of thoughts and emotions. When we first discover this experience of calm in meditation, it's often completely new. I had not known this in my outer life. This was something completely foreign to me when I first encountered it.

One meditator told me that when they first came upon this and tried to note it, all they could do was say, "Calm? Is this it? Is this what they're talking about?" Because it was a completely new kind of experience. So it takes time to get to know it.

In my meditative journey, it was like I'd crossed a stormy ocean with big thundering waves and pirates on the open sea and giant squid attacks coming at us. Then suddenly we landed in this broad harbor that felt calm and peaceful and safe.

There's this lovely poem by Emily Dickinson that points to this. I'm going to read it twice because the wording is a little archaic: "Futile the winds to a heart in port, done with the compass, done with the chart, rowing in Eden."

This "rowing in Eden" is the summation line. Let me read it again. If you're not a native English speaker, the word "futile" is an odd word not used very much—it means useless. She's saying the winds are useless when the heart is in port. And the word "chart" here means the map that a captain or pilot would navigate by with their ship.

"Futile the winds to a heart in port, done with the compass, done with the chart, rowing in Eden."

That's what it feels like—we've landed in Eden in our meditation.

So the mind discovers that its own peace and ease are quite natural things. Ajahn Amaro has this meditation instruction that really emphasizes this. He says, "Rest in the natural peace and ease that is the natural peace and ease of mind and body, and then pay attention to whatever disturbs that." And we see that if we aren't disturbing ourselves with our wandering thoughts and all the emotions they stir up, if we stop disturbing ourselves, that natural peace and ease is always accessible. It's always there. We can learn to rest in it. We can find a reliable path to that and learn to rest there.

When we discover that kind of contentment in meditation, the movement of desire doesn't seem so relevant. Why would I want to go there when I've got this here? So then the mind is less inclined to go away to past and future.

This is not necessarily an easy place to know what to do. I think Sally mentioned last night that when the mind moves into subtle or neutral experiences, we can often not know how to respond. And this can be a factor of delusion—that's the kind of not knowing. We might feel like, oh, nothing's happening now. And we might get a little bored.

I don't know if you've tracked this cartoonist, Gahan Wilson, who has done cartoons for many years. Toward the later phases of his career, he started setting a lot of his cartoons in Zen meditation halls. There's this one cartoon where there are two monastics, one older and one younger, sitting next to each other in the hall. The older one is leaning over to say to the younger one, and the caption just says, "Nothing happens next. This is it."

You might have felt that from time to time. Whoa, it's calm. What happens next? We're so used to dramatic emotions of highs and lows and intensity. When that goes out, it's like we're adrift. What happens next?

But calm can be a wonderful experience to soak in. So I would note it, recognize this is calm. It has been spoken of fairly highly by the Buddha and others. Appreciate the opening and learn to make a home there. It's a really wonderful ally on this whole journey. It is the foundation of contentment.

The Buddha said something interesting at one point. We don't talk about this a lot, but he said, "Peace is the highest happiness." I think it's really interesting to contemplate: Do we believe this? If we believe this, then calm, tranquility is what we've been looking for. If we don't believe it, we think, well, this is a nice stopgap, but what I'm really after is the next high, a more intense bliss, a more full-body kind of rapture. That's what really should be happening.

But according to the Buddha—and I don't think he was kidding—peace is the highest happiness. See if that starts to make sense to you.

One of the nice things about believing that is that peace is always accessible. When the mind lets go of past and future and all that it brings, peace is available. I find this a really interesting comment on human psychology. Somehow I don't think Western psychology quite understands this yet. But I think the Buddha's pointing was profound and accurate.

So then this tranquility is also onward leading. And of course where it leads is when the mind settles in itself, it becomes unified. This is the next factor of concentration. We talked about concentration as the unification of mind. The proximate cause—I don't know if I said it in the talk last week—the proximate cause of concentration is happiness. This contentment is really what allows the mind to settle and unify. That is where concentration develops from. Again, from the Buddha: "For one whose body is tranquil and who is happy, the mind becomes concentrated."

It truly is that simple. When the body is tranquil and the mind is happy, concentration naturally arises. On that occasion, the enlightenment factor of concentration is awakened within the practitioner.

Since we explored concentration in detail last week, I won't elaborate extensively here. But it's worth remembering that concentration offers two profound benefits: it feels deeply nourishing, and it opens the path to insight. This dual quality makes it such a valuable factor in our practice.

As the mind becomes unified, it develops a strength previously unknown. Before finding tranquility and concentration, the mind gets tossed about by every thought and emotion that arises within, by external circumstances that unfold around us—even in a protected environment like this retreat, events occur that can stir us up. As concentration deepens, the mind derives a strength and stability that remains unshaken by both internal experiences and external conditions.

This strength naturally leads to the next factor: equanimity, known in Pali as upekkhā. You may recognize upekkhā as the fourth of the brahmaviharas. I noticed a request for someone to speak specifically about equanimity, and indeed, someone will offer a full talk on this topic. For now, I'll share just a few essential points.

Fundamentally, equanimity is a state of mind born from strength—a quality that remains unmoved by pleasure and pain. When pleasurable experiences arise, they don't trigger greed. When unpleasant experiences emerge, they don't provoke aversion. Neutral experiences are simply noticed, as the mind no longer churns restlessly.

The root meaning of upekkhā comes from its etymology: "looking upon." It suggests the capacity to step back from entanglement in the flow of objects and observe from a place of stability.

Sometimes, particularly in English usage, equanimity carries the connotation of not feeling, or that emotions shouldn't be present—that if you're experiencing emotions, you haven't achieved true equanimity. This misunderstanding distorts the genuine meaning of upekkhā. True equanimity allows emotions to be present without being disturbed by them. It doesn't mean we cease to care.

In the brahmaviharas, the near enemy of equanimity is indifference—a complete lack of caring. When someone suffers and we think, "It doesn't matter to me; I'm equanimous about that," we've actually slipped into indifference.

This reveals the beautiful balance within the brahmaviharas. Equanimity must be supported by mettā, compassion, and muditā, or it will inevitably deteriorate into cold indifference. When equanimity is present alongside the other heart qualities, it maintains a balance that is neither cold nor detached.

One year, at the conclusion of the three-month retreat, we held a discussion group right here in this hall with all the practitioners who were completing their retreat. They shared their learnings and retreat highlights. Many spoke of gaining a new ease with life's changing conditions as one of their most significant discoveries. This capacity represents the essence of equanimity.

To me, this stands as the most reliable outcome of extended retreat. While it emerges in shorter retreats as well, it becomes more pronounced after longer periods of practice. We develop greater balance with life's changing conditions, no longer thrown about so easily by the inevitable ups and downs. It's truly beautiful.

I asked these practitioners whether this balance felt cold during their meditations, whether their emotions had been shut off. They responded unanimously: "Not at all. It was a place of tremendous warmth. Because I wasn't so disturbed, mettā and compassion flowed much more freely."

This captures the authentic meaning of equanimity. When we're settled, we gain greater access to love and compassion, not less. It's never a cold, withdrawn state. When equanimity begins sliding toward indifference, it simply needs to be warmed again through mettā and compassion.

Equanimity appears across multiple frameworks in our tradition: the brahmaviharas, the paramis, the factors of enlightenment, and the progress of insight described in the Visuddhimagga. In every one of these lists, it appears as the final factor, indicating that everything else leads toward this culmination.

In our tradition, equanimity represents the closest worldly state to nibbāna. When we reach equanimity in our development—properly balanced with the other factors—we find ourselves at the threshold of opening to the unconditioned. All these various lists point toward the same reality, the same unfolding development of awakening.

As you practice, you can start to tune in to when these factors are showing up. They don't have to be strong or overpowering or last an hour—they can appear quite briefly. Calm appears. Interest appears. A pleasurable experience in meditation arises. Some stability manifests. Some ease emerges. This is the arising of all these different enlightenment factors. So take care to notice them. The more you notice, the more you'll understand how they got there, and then also how to grow them. We want to learn what leads to them and what leads to their cultivation. That starts with noticing when they're present.

And then you want to keep them in balance. If the arousing factors are out of balance with the calming factors, the mind is likely to be alert but agitated. If the calming factors are stronger than the arousing factors, then the mind may be stable but dull. Sometimes we call this sinking mind. You've been developing calm, some degree of concentration, but then it feels like you're almost nodding off in dullness—this is sinking mind, because the energy has gotten low. The pacifying factors are high, but the energy is depleted. You need to bring up the energizing factors.

I try to practice in such a way that if my teacher came up and tapped me on the shoulder and asked about the factors, I would always know where mindfulness, energy, and concentration were in my experience. These three kind of sum up the whole system. Mindfulness originates and keeps everything in balance. Energy represents the arousing factors. Concentration represents the calming factors. So start to monitor where these three factors are through your sittings, through your walking meditation, and through your in-between moments. See if they can be brought up and then balanced—mindfulness, energy, concentration. If you keep these three in balance, the path is really going to develop beautifully.

One of the questions that comes up is: Okay, you're teaching us to bring our mind to the doorway of enlightenment. Does this happen for people in the West? It does. Some opening to the unconditioned does happen with some regularity on long retreats, both at IMS and at Spirit Rock. This does happen in this day and age.

And so then the question is: What about complete liberation, the kind the Buddha was talking about? The Buddha said, "Practitioners, these seven factors of enlightenment, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering." The complete destruction of suffering. Does this still happen? It's rare.

But I'd like to read you a section from the autobiography of Ajahn Liam. Ajahn Chah was a great meditation master in Thailand who lived in the last century. He came here and taught at IMS in the early days—he was the first teacher for Ajahn Sumedho and Jack Kornfield, a truly charismatic monk and wonderful teacher. When he was no longer able to teach, he passed on the abbotship of his main monastery to Ajahn Liam. Ajahn Liam is still alive and is still the abbot in Thailand of Wat Ba Pong. He's still teaching. You can still meet him.

This is a description from Ajahn Liam of his practice one year when he was with Ajahn Chah. Around the middle of the rainy season, Ajahn Chah encouraged the monastics to practice with special intensity, so Ajahn Liam increased his efforts and results became evident.

This is from Ajahn Liam: "Keeping this teaching in my mind, I kept on meditating. Normally, I would sit meditation until about ten or eleven p.m. and then stop to have a rest. But on this day, I continued sitting without moving or making the slightest change in posture. A feeling of peacefulness shot up and pervaded throughout the whole body, as if something were taking hold over it. It felt cool, a coolness that suffused the whole body, an experience of the body becoming completely light and at ease, peaceful, quiet, and still. The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness."

The body felt tranquil and light. This experience continued throughout the whole year, not just for a day or two. In fact, it has continued unchanging for many years, all from that one time. It feels like there are no sankhāras, no proliferations of the mind. All the suffering that arises with kilesas that had bothered me before, all kinds of ambitions that I had—I don't know where they all disappeared to. This is the kind of peace and tranquility that arose.

There isn't anything to be concerned about now. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. Questioning myself about dukkha, there wasn't any. And the experience of this feeling has lasted on continuously all the time since then. There has been no change all the way up to the present day. This same state still lasts on, and it has been stable, continuous, and without change.

This is Ajahn Liam's confession, you might say, of his complete awakening. It's beautiful that he would be that revealing with us. He's still alive and teaching in Thailand. So this still happens.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

The only experience left was that of utter peace and stillness. As concerns dukkha, I don't know what dukkha is like. This same state still lasts on and has been stable, continuous, and without change.

So thank you for your attention. We have a little over thirty minutes now for walking meditation, and then the last sitting of the day with chanting.

CHAPTER 79

Working With Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this profound dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses one of meditation's most challenging aspects: working with strong, difficult emotions that cannot be ignored or left in the background. Drawing on the third foundation of mindfulness (cittānupassanā), he explores the nature of unwholesome mind states rooted in lobha (greed), dosa (aversion), and moha (delusion).
>
> Armstrong examines four primary afflictive emotions that commonly arise in practice: desire (wanting something pleasant in the future), fear (anticipating something unpleasant), grief (loss of something pleasant from the past), and anger (reaction to past unpleasant experiences). He demonstrates how these emotions are sustained by conceptual time—past and future thinking—rather than present-moment awareness.
>
> Using personal retreat experiences and stories ranging from a five-year-old's wisdom about the "mad fish" to the Dalai Lama's imprisoned monk, Armstrong illustrates how these challenging states become our greatest teachers. He emphasizes three components of working with strong emotions: feeling the bodily sensations, recognizing the mental flavor or mood, and observing the accompanying storylines. The talk concludes with Rilke's poem about letting "everything happen to you, beauty and terror," pointing toward the transformative potential of meeting our difficulties with complete acceptance and understanding.

The subject of the talk tonight is working with difficult emotions. At this point, we've talked quite a bit about how to relate to the hindrances and the kilesas. The thing about hindrances and kilesas is that they can span quite a large range of intensity. Sometimes they can be fairly mild. It still helps to tune into them, but you could almost at times leave them in the background and keep your attention somewhere else.

What I want to talk about tonight are when emotions come up that are quite strong and really can't be ignored or left in the background. You may not be having any of them recently, but you probably have had some in the past, and all of us probably will again in the future. So it's really helpful to learn how to work with these states. These are qualities like fear, shame, anger, loneliness, grief, wanting, humiliation, despair. They're kind of big events.

They can be big sources of suffering in our life outside and also in our life in retreat. Outside it's kind of interesting because they often come up in situations that are quite complicated. We have a child who has gotten addicted to opioids. What do we do? Or a partner leaves us or goes off and has an affair. Or there's a boss at work who's bullying us. In these outside situations, the situation and relationships are so complicated that the emotions sometimes get lost in the middle of all the other stuff that's going on.

But when we're in retreat, it gets really simple. There are two sources of suffering. There's physical pain and there's emotional pain. That's pretty much it. And so we really are brought right face to face with both of these. And as the First Noble Truth says, our job is to understand dukkha. These are the two primary forms of dukkha. We need to grow to understand them. So this is part of the curriculum. Not an easy part of the curriculum, but it's part of the curriculum.

And then as meditators, we're really lucky because we have a third source. And that is the wandering mind—the third source of dukkha. It doesn't stay where we put it. Now, for most people in the world, that's not a problem. But for us, that's a problem. So this is a very privileged form of suffering. Not quite as intense as the first two. But when we don't understand the big events of physical pain and emotional pain, they can be overwhelming. So in order to ensure our stability, we need to find ways to work with both of them.

The good news is that in working with emotional difficulties, we can gain access to a lot more freedom than we had in the beginning of meditation. This is one of the biggest immediate benefits of Vipassana practice. We can feel it start to happen right away, and it opens up a lot of possibility of freedom that we didn't know was available. So it's a wonderful area for us to explore and grow in because we change not just our relation to the emotions, we change the emotions themselves as we learn to work with them. They become less intense and they come less often. So this is something that can be seen in the course of our practice in a reasonably short period of time.

And this is something that we really do need to do. This is from Pema Chodron: "The basic obstacle is that we don't like the way reality is now and therefore wish it would go away fast. But what we find as practitioners is that nothing ever goes away until it has taught us what we need to know. If we run 100 miles an hour to the other end of the continent in order to get away from the obstacle, we find the very same problem waiting for us when we arrive."

So these are things we can't just run away from. We really need to meet and come to terms with them. Don gave a beautiful talk the other night about how when we meet suffering honestly, we can find that it transforms into faith and then gladness in the mind. So this is a beautiful pointing and a beautiful opportunity.

This is from Suzuki Roshi: "We say, pulling out the weeds, we make nourishment for the plant. We pull the weed out and bury it near the plant to make nourishment for it."

So even though you have some difficulty in your practice, those weeds will help you. You should not be bothered by the weeds you have in your mind. We should be grateful for the weeds because eventually they will enrich your practice. If you have some experience of how the weeds you have in your mind will change into mental nourishment, your practice makes remarkable progress.

In this talk, I want to explore how the difficulties we encounter with these emotions eventually come to sustain and support our journey to awakening, our journey to freedom. They really do become compost and enrichment for our unfolding.

What we're talking about tonight falls within the third foundation of mindfulness—the realm of citta. This Pali term is sometimes translated as mind, sometimes as heart, or sometimes heart-mind, because it encompasses both emotional and conceptual components. While we tend to think of the English word "mind" as conceptual and associate "heart" with emotion, citta contains both. The translation I prefer, though it's not common, is psyche. All these elements—both thinking and feeling—are part of our psyche. This is where these emotions land in our practice.

As you know, the states of mind in Buddhist teachings fall into two categories: wholesome and unwholesome. The unwholesome mind states are those that lead to suffering. This is a very pragmatic view, not moralistic. We're not immoral because we have these states; they simply lead us into suffering. Their roots are always some combination of greed, aversion, and delusion—what the Buddha called the roots of the unwholesome.

The wholesome mind states lead to happiness. Again, this is practical rather than moralistic—it's simply about what leads to the state we ultimately want to find. The roots of wholesome states are non-greed, non-aversion, and non-delusion.

This use of negation is quite interesting. In ancient India, these negative formulations were often used to point toward positive qualities. Non-greed—the opposite of grasping—manifests as either renunciation or generosity. Non-aversion becomes a synonym for metta; when there's no aversion in the mind, there's openness, acceptance, a form of friendliness. Non-delusion is essentially synonymous with wisdom, with clear seeing, with understanding things as they are. So we could say the roots of the wholesome are generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.

The whole point of the path is to increase wholesome states and reduce unwholesome states, which means we're more securely planted on a path toward happiness and away from suffering. This is the definition of right effort—this is what we're working toward.

Looking at these teachings over many years, I find it amazing how through the tools the Buddha gave us, we can shape the mind in any direction we want and to any depth we want. How would you like your mind to be? Would you like it to be loving? Do a lot of metta practice. Compassionate? Do compassion practice. Wise? Do investigation and vipassana practice. Calm and placid? Do samatha practice. Any direction you would like to go, there are tools to shape the mind that way to any degree you desire. It's quite remarkable.

We'll talk more about wholesome states as we progress through the retreat. Tonight I really want to get into the unwholesome.

With difficult emotions, we need two things to change. First and foremost, we need to change our attitude toward them. Normally our reaction is: I don't like it, I want it to go away, I resist it. This has to change to acceptance.

These difficult emotions show up—this is simply reality. There's no point in being in conflict with what is. We need to learn this fundamental acceptance. Remember, the A in RAIN is accept or allow. We must learn how to genuinely accept and allow these states to be present.

The other essential element is understanding them better. We need to comprehend the true nature of these difficult emotions, these afflictive states. They share the same nature as all other conditioned phenomena—they're impermanent, they're unsatisfying, and they're not me or mine. When we learn to see them through this lens, they become far less troublesome.

But why aren't they me or mine? They certainly feel like mine when they arise. They're not me or mine because we all have them. When you step back and take a broader view of where you're situated, we're all part of the human species. Every member of the human species carries all these emotions until they're truly awakened. So how can it be your personal mistake? How can it be your individual failing? This is simply part of the package that evolution has gifted us with. We don't need to identify with these states—we try not to identify. They're just part of the human package.

The first step in this process of understanding is knowing what we're feeling. And we must do this when we're actually feeling it. You cannot decide ahead of time, "I think I'll get rid of fear on this retreat," without actually experiencing fear. Liberation doesn't work that way. You cannot think your way through fear. You cannot think your way to freedom.

To become truly free of these states, we must relate to them as they're arising in the here and now. This might seem like unwelcome news, but this is how things actually work. We become free by engaging with these emotions as they manifest.

The first step is knowing what we're feeling. I don't know about you, but neither my parents nor my school teachers taught me how to recognize my emotional states. This wasn't part of my curriculum—not at home, not at school. So when I entered the meditation hall and was instructed to observe my states of mind, I had no idea what I was looking for.

But gradually, through descriptions like the five hindrances, the kilesas, the seven factors of awakening, and the Brahmaviharas, I learned there was an entire world unfolding within. I developed familiarity with this rich inner landscape, and it was wonderful to begin understanding the complexity that exists there.

Imagine if we taught children this awareness. How would society transform if children grew up knowing what they were feeling and understanding how to work skillfully with their emotions? It would be revolutionary.

There's a nonprofit organization called Mindful Schools, operating in California and expanding elsewhere, where teachers trained in insight meditation go into middle schools and teach children how to meditate with their emotions. The work is tremendously rewarding, with measurable, practical results.

Even with younger children, we have a sangha member in California who has practiced for many years and wanted to bring this learning into preschool. These are children three, four, and five years old. She established a preschool in Marin with the specific intention of teaching preschoolers how to meditate.

I couldn't imagine how one would approach such a task. You cannot simply tell a three-year-old to sit still and pay attention to their breath—they'll be running around within moments. But she truly understood children and was remarkably skillful. She began by teaching them yoga first.

There was considerable demand for places in her school, but she maintained one requirement: she wouldn't accept a child unless the parents were also meditators. She didn't want the children to become wiser than their parents.

The parents had to meditate to get their kids in. So here are these three-, four-, five-year-olds, and she taught them yoga first so that they'd be moving their body and stretching and getting their energy out. Then at the end of the yoga, she'd have them lie down on the carpet in the school and she'd lead them in a visualization.

The visualization is this: She had them close their eyes and said, "Imagine a big lake. There's a big lake, and you're the water. Now, in this water, there are all kinds of fishes that swim through. There's a happy fish. There's a sad fish. There's a lonely fish. There's a mad fish. There's an excited fish. But you're the water. You just let them all swim through. It's no problem. The fishes are just swimming through the water."

You probably know that for a long time, a body of water, like a lake, has been a symbol for consciousness. So the kids kind of grok this on some deep intuitive level, even though if you said to them "consciousness," they wouldn't have a clue what you were talking about. They're becoming the lake, and they're just watching the fishes swim through.

At the end of one of these exercises, she asked, "Well, how was that for you?" This five-year-old boy put up his hand and said, "You know, I could let all the fishes swim through except the mad fish. I couldn't let the mad fish swim through." She said, "Oh, you know, why was that?" And he says, "Because if you don't know you're the water, the mad fish makes you hurt people."

This is from a five-year-old. It's so brilliant.

We need to learn what we're feeling when we're feeling it. And it's not always easy. An example from my own practice: I was on a three-month course, sitting in the hall a lot. At the end of every sit, I'd go out that back door, go down the stairs, and go to a patch of grass that was still there—there's still grass there, there was more back then because it's gotten filled up with buildings and plantings. I'd do my walking back and forth on the grass below this hall.

I was about two weeks into the retreat, so I was getting settled and enjoying the walking. I walked out the back door and I was being really mindful: lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. Then I looked down to my path where I'd been walking every walking period for two weeks, and there was somebody there. I couldn't believe it. What are they doing in my path? I've been in that path every walking period for two weeks. Lifting, moving, placing, lifting, moving, placing. Are they playing games with me? Did I cut in front of them in line this morning? Lifting, moving, placing.

I just kept mindfully walking down, and there was a bigger patch of grass. I found another patch of grass that, to my great surprise, worked just as well. I didn't think it would, but it did, and I did my walking. It was thirty minutes in before I realized I'm angry. It took me that long to see it.

I thought I was being really mindful, lifting, moving, placing, but I was missing the main thing that was going on. I hadn't picked up what I was feeling. I was angry. As soon as I saw it, like I'd been telling myself the same story—they shouldn't be there because it's my path—for 30 minutes. Finally, when I saw I'm angry, then I had a way to work with it.

So if we don't recognize what's going on, these hindrances just slip in under our mindfulness radar. I was in the present moment, lift, move, place, but I missed this thing that had slipped in. So that's delusion at work. We're not fully aware of what's happening. So always good to kind of keep one eye on the mind state as you go through your day mindfully. Keep an eye on what's going on in the mind because these things just slip in.

As soon as I could see it, I could release it. I thought, this is silly. And I could just release it. Until I knew I was so identified with being angry, I couldn't operate with it with any kind of skillful approach. So that's why it's so important to know what we're feeling, and if you can, to name it. You know, develop a vocabulary so that you recognize the different emotions that are coming. There's a kind of release that is possible when you align the note with the emotion that's being felt. There's a wisdom that develops when you're able to do that. So take a little bit of time and care. Develop a vocabulary that matches the range of your emotions. It's really helpful.

So as we've said many times, the key in working with hindrances and these emotions—the emotion is going to point us towards something else. Like it was pointing me to the guy who was walking in my path. And that's where my attention was for about 30 minutes. And then I was stuck. But as soon as I recognized what was going on inwardly, that is to the hindrance itself, then I could work with it and release it. So instead of going where the hindrance is pointing, come to the hindrance itself. That's the way that it can be released.

It's very interesting, this naming of emotions. There have been a lot of studies about how to manage anger because it's such a destructive force in the workplace and personal relationships and so forth. So there are a lot of anger management courses going on in the world and a lot of different techniques have been tried. So there was one study in an anger management class where they offered a few different approaches. One of the approaches they offered was just tell the people, every time you feel anger, just name it anger. Don't do anything else. Just name it anger. They found out that that approach worked as well as any of the other systematic approaches that they tried in calming down people's anger and tendency to fly off the handle out of anger. Just naming it was a lot.

So I want to talk about some of the states that we run into with difficult emotions. And I see, I'm on the end of listening to a lot of people, I see a number of states, a select number of states that come up again and again and again in reports from meditators. And rather than name them, I want to see if you can name them.

So one of the things I'm going to say is that if you have a really beautiful emotion like love or compassion, that can be totally in the here and now. You just see something beautiful and love comes up. You see someone struggling, compassion just arises. But these afflictive emotions tend to get tied up in time, in concepts of time.

Vance was talking this morning about how location is not an aspect of reality. It's a concept. Time is also not an aspect of reality. It's a concept. When you come into the moment fully, there's no past and future. Past and future are only thoughts. But these thoughts of past and future are needed to sustain these afflictive emotions.

So, bear with my background a minute. I want you to imagine a graph that has two axes, one horizontal and one vertical. You love seventh grade algebra, right? We're going back there. So the horizontal axis is going to be time. It's going to extend from the past on your left to the future on your right.

And the vertical axis represents feeling tone—pain at the bottom and pleasure at the top. The horizontal axis represents time, and the vertical represents feeling tone, marking off four quadrants.

Let's examine the first quadrant: pleasure in the future. If there's something pleasurable that you anticipate in the future, what emotion accompanies that? Greed. Yes—desire, wanting. That's what arises. Something pleasurable in the future generates wanting. This is the first of these strong forces that arise frequently for people.

Now let's take the lower quadrant: something unpleasant anticipated in the future. What's the emotional response? Basically fear. You might call it worry or anxiety, but these are forms of fear. That's another big one.

What about something pleasant in the past? And when I say it's in the past, I mean it's truly over. What arises then? Grief. When something has been pleasant in the past but is now genuinely gone, the response is sadness, grief, loss. That's the third emotion that surfaces again and again.

And what about something unpleasant in the past, particularly connected with people or persons? Anger. "Somebody did that to me," and we feel anger. This is the fourth of these major emotions. A subset of anger is self-criticism, self-judgment. We review our past, feel dissatisfied with it, and so self-judgment arises.

I find it fascinating that these unwholesome states of mind are propped up by time—by past and future. Relying on time in meditation is delusion because the present moment is where we want to be and is the only place we truly are.

These are the four major emotions I want to explore: desire, grief, anger, and fear. Let's examine each of these.

What I want to explore with each emotion are the three components of a strong emotion. When an emotion arises in a powerful, difficult way, there will be a response in the body. A subtle emotion like compassion might ripple through, and you might not feel very much. If you were feeling very subtly attuned to the body, you'd probably sense that ripple. But if you're not subtly in touch, it might pass through the mind without making much impact.

However, with these emotions, when they're strong, we feel them in the body. So the first approach is to bring attention to the part of the body where the emotion is felt. Let the attention go directly in and feel the sensations.

The second element is that each emotion has a particular flavor—a mental component. The flavor of wanting differs from the flavor of fear, which differs from the flavor of love or compassion. All difficult emotions have a physical expression and a mental tone or flavor or mood.

By connecting with the body where the emotion is felt, you can more easily stay in touch with the emotion itself. If you try to stay in touch only with the mood or flavor of the emotion—just the mental phenomenon—it's somewhat insubstantial and difficult to maintain connection with. But by grounding the attention in the body where the emotion is felt, you can stay connected to both the sensations and the mood of that emotion.

The third component is that there's usually a story being told in the thoughts. So examine the thoughts accompanying the strong emotion. Like with my walking path being taken by another meditator—the thoughts were saying they were wrong and I was right. Usually at the root of anger is something like "they were wrong" or "they did something wrong to me."

So take a look at all three of these components when working with difficult emotions. When that story went away and I saw it wasn't really my path, the anger crumpled. So the thoughts sustain the emotion. When you get a mindful handle on all three—the thoughts, the bodily sensations, and the mood—it's very helpful.

Let's examine the first of the difficult emotions: desire, something pleasant projected into the future. This happens frequently on retreat. We want a pleasant experience. Sometimes we're thinking about home, sometimes about friends, sometimes about someplace we'd rather be—any place other than here.

Notice how desire shows up. There's something comforting in wanting. You may find that when things are boring in the meditation hall, a pleasant fantasy arises because it brings comfort, bringing to mind something pleasurable. This happens often: "Oh, a little bored with my experience? Let's remember something pleasant."

But the desire that sources that fantasy brings a bittersweet feeling because the object isn't here now. Desire always has this unfulfilled quality to it. We always want something we don't have. Do you ever find yourself wanting an elbow? No, because we already have one. What we want is always something we don't have. So we think about it—it's comforting, but there's built-in frustration, built-in dissatisfaction. Craving is the cause of suffering, as stated in the Second Noble Truth.

Some years ago, I was teaching a retreat in Italy with Carol. I loved working with Italian yogis because I found them so fluent with their emotions. They talked easily about feelings, were well in touch with what they were experiencing, and weren't shy about discussing it. The practice meetings were very lively and interesting.

There was this one young man who came to the first practice meeting. When I asked how he was finding the retreat, he said, "I don't want to be here."

"What's going on?" I asked.

"Well, this is August, the time when in Italy we go on vacation. Some friends of mine were going to the Caribbean, so I could either go there or come to this retreat."

"Why are you here?"

"I couldn't get a ticket to the Caribbean."

He was having trouble settling into the retreat because he kept thinking about his friends in the Caribbean—how warm it was, how beautiful the waters were, how great the food would be. They were there and he was here in this "miserable retreat." He just didn't want to be here.

I suggested, "Maybe the retreat isn't the problem. Maybe wanting something else is the problem. The desire itself is what's making this experience so frustrating for you."

He was willing to consider this possibility—that the desire was stirring him up, and that's why the retreat wasn't satisfying.

A few days later, at the second practice meeting, he had totally settled down. "I took your advice," he said. "I let go of thinking about the Caribbean, and then it was fine to be here. Now I'm enjoying it."

This is what desire does: it blinds us to the present moment and the possibility of what's actually here. Often with desire, we're not unhappy because the object is lacking—we're unhappy because the wanting itself is creating a gap, creating frustration. It wasn't the absence of the Caribbean that was making him suffer; it was the wanting.

That's a good thing to keep in mind. Another form of desire that often comes in retreat is sexual desire. Monica talked about this when she discussed the hindrances. I just want to add one little piece, as this has come up a lot for me in retreat.

One of the ways I found most helpful to work with it is to take a look at the direct experience of what's evoking the wanting. In my experience, when sexual desire arises, there are usually two compelling pieces. One is a visual image—for me, it's usually connected with a fantasy. Some image is there. And the second is sensations in the body. So the image is very pleasurable, and the sensations in the body are very pleasurable.

I switched from noticing the image and the sensations, which I would do with noting—seeing, seeing, sensing, sensing. That didn't cut it so much. But when I tuned to the feeling tone of the image and the feeling tone of the sensations, that really cut it. So I would just note pleasant, pleasant for the image, pleasant, pleasant for the sensations in the body. And that cut through it for me.

This has happened a number of times. I don't think it's just random, because I kind of saw what this fuss is all about—it's just pleasant feeling tone. That's all it is. It drives the world crazy, but it's just about pleasant feeling tone. So it was very helpful to unhook me from that feeling tone.

The next area to look at, the next strong emotion, is anger—a particular form of aversion. Notice how it feels. When anger is up for me, the body feels very tight, contracted, constricted. I feel it especially in my shoulders, neck, head. Everything's bunching up around that top part of the body, and there's a burning quality to the energy there. It feels like the area's on fire.

The storyline is usually, "I'm right and the other person's wrong." As we tell that story again and again with those thoughts, it's like the fire just keeps growing. Every thought adds another log onto the flame that's building. We can keep doing that. We want to keep making it hotter? Keep adding those thoughts of blame and self-righteousness. But that's what causes the anger to grow.

So the solution, obviously, is to stop thinking those thoughts, stop holding on to the blame, the blaming ideas and the self-righteousness. But one of the things that's tricky about that is sometimes those thoughts might be true. Sometimes the other person really has done something harmful, thoughtless, cruel even, and we've suffered from it. So sometimes it's hard to let go because we actually have a correct perception that they did something unskillful and we suffered as a result.

This is where it needs some careful investigation to see that the two don't have to be connected. You can have a clear perception that someone did something unskillful and unhook from the blaming thoughts about it. This takes some skill. It takes some subtlety. But this is an avenue to becoming free.

So another example from my practice. I was on a six-week retreat here, and I was doing metta practice. I'd been in a couple of weeks, and the metta was flowing, the phrases were flowing, the concentration was developing. The tricky thing here was my difficult person was also on the retreat. The person who had been most difficult for me over the past year of my life was also sitting that retreat.

And so in going through the building, we would often cross paths. As soon as we did, I would go, "I can't believe what they said. I can't believe what they did." And the anger would just start going again. So often I would be lost in it for like thirty minutes, and then finally, I'd get bored of it or something.

I'd come out and I'd reconnect with the metta. But that kept happening, and it wasn't pleasant. So I had to learn to work with it.

The way that I eventually got weaned from it was to feel how painful it was. I'd been cruising along with metta, and it was so satisfying and so delightful. And then I pitched myself into this hellfire of anger. I'd done it myself. And I was really burning. At some point, I just realized, I don't want to burn anymore. And so I gave it up as the only way I could restore peace of mind.

Sometimes we just have to feel the pain of anger before we'll know to let go. In the text, it's said that getting angry at someone is like picking up a hot coal to throw it at them, but first you pick it up and burn yourself. Or it's said to be like drinking poison and hoping that the other person gets sick—which they don't. Because the other person didn't know what I was going through at all. It was just all in my head. So it's a really self-injuring approach.

It's not easy to let go of anger because sometimes it is accurate. The Dalai Lama tells this story about a monk that he used to know in Tibet. He thought this monk was a good guy, but a kind of middling practitioner in the Dalai Lama's estimation. The Dalai Lama had fled Tibet in 1959 when the occupation started. This other monk did not leave and he was imprisoned for twenty years—his crime was being a monk.

After twenty years he managed to get out of prison and escape and come to India. At that time the Dalai Lama was trying to meet all the people who had come out of Tibet and found refuge in India because he felt so strongly connected to their plight and the cause of the Tibetan people. So this monk made his way to India and got to meet the Dalai Lama. In the course of the conversation, the monk said, "You know, I felt I was in prison for twenty years and I felt I was in danger." And the Dalai Lama said, "Oh, I can understand. You must have been feeling in danger of being tortured." And the monk said, "No, I was tortured. But that's not the danger I was talking about. I was in danger of getting angry. But I didn't."

The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of that monk's level of practice. So this is a human possibility. I consider this very advanced practice, but it's a human possibility not to get angry even in a situation like that. I like to remind myself that that's something that people in my lifetime have experienced and worked with. And it helps me to put my problems in perspective.

Another way that aversion comes out is that it gets turned toward ourselves, and we fall into self-judgment, self-criticism. We might recognize there's this underlying criticism of ourselves. We have a feeling that we're not good enough in some way—we're not quite valuable as a person, not fully valuable, not valued by people. We can look back at our past and see, "Oh, this came from my parents or my teachers or my peers and that criticism." But honestly, knowing the source of that doesn't release that feeling. In meditation, you may come upon the source, but it's not much help in becoming free of the feeling of self-judgment.

This kind of self-judgment can go quite deep and be very subconscious, and yet we're carrying it. I came upon it in my practice in early years, and I felt physically weighed down by it. I felt like there was a weight on my shoulders from not measuring up to some standard or other.

This is more difficult, perhaps, if you're a member of a marginalized community in this country or where you grew up. In this country, there's a dominant culture, which is white and heterosexual and middle class. If you're from a group that isn't aligned with that dominant norm, the message you get from the dominant culture—from the media and books and commentators—is that you're not as good as. This is a very tragic state of affairs, but this is a reality in our country today, in the U.S. at least. One may grow up with a feeling of not being as valuable because of one's ethnicity, because of one's sexual orientation, because of one's gender identity, and so grow up with this sense of not being lovable or not quite belonging here.

And it's subtle, right? But when we start to meditate, we can maybe really feel it strongly. And then we really need to use the tools of the meditation to hopefully work our way through those feelings. And the loving-kindness practice is really valuable for this. And so is solidarity with other members of those groups. Very, very helpful.

Something that really impressed me that I read shortly after it first came out was Michelle Obama's memoir. It's called Becoming, and it's a really beautiful book. You all know she was, if you're not from the U.S., you still probably know she was the first lady, wife of Barack Obama. And she's an amazing woman. She grew up in an ordinary household in a not very prosperous part of Chicago and went to schools that are kind of associated with not very prosperous areas of cities. And yet, she wanted to advance herself.

And so in her school years, she worked really, really hard. And she also had the support of her parents who were very loving. I think that's a big element of what saved her. And so through the work through her school years, she was able to get in one of the hardest to get into high schools in the Chicago area. So there she received really good education. And again, she worked really hard. And then she got a scholarship to Princeton. And at Princeton, she worked really hard and she got admitted to Harvard Law. And there she worked really hard and she got a job at this prestigious law firm in Chicago, which is where she met Barack. She was Barack's mentor when he came into that law firm. That's how they got connected.

She said in the memoir, it's very moving, she describes at every step of the way how she was plagued by self-doubt and the doubts of the authority figures around her that maybe she wasn't good enough. Because of her background and the color of her skin and all the difficulties she'd had in growing up, the self-doubt plagued her at every step. And yet she just moved into it and developed and grew. And you look at her self-confidence today, you just don't see that kind of doubt. But she really had to work to grow into the person she is. And that's why the title of her memoir is so impressive. It's called Becoming. It's sort of the story of how she became the Michelle that we know and love. Beautiful story.

So sometimes these patterns are fairly deeply rooted and will come up again and again. And it can seem like, oh my gosh, am I ever going to get free of this? And the reason they're so strong is that they're karmic patterns that we have repeated over and over and over many times over many years. It's our own now. When we were young, we didn't have an option. But now we're repeating these same judgments and opinions. That's what makes it a karmic pattern. And so it's gotten entrenched in our psyches. And so this can be frustrating.

I was on a retreat one time with Trudy Goodman. And one of the yogis raised their hands to ask a question. And they asked Trudy, and they said, "I keep seeing my same old stuff, and I'm so tired of it." And so Trudy's response was, "Whose stuff would you like to have?" Right? We're going to have somebody's. Might as well take ours.

So the next one is sadness. Sadness. And we've all had disappointments in life. We've lost friends or partners or relationships or jobs, family members. We know what that is like. One of the greatest losses probably is for a parent to have a child who dies. Personally, it's hard to imagine a greater loss for me than if I had a child who died. So in California, we had, as a Sangha member, a parent whose child had committed suicide. And that would make it even more difficult. And so there was a lot of grief, a lot of feeling of loss, a lot of sadness.

But this person was committed to the dharmic path and kept coming on retreat to try to work with and hold the grief that this brought about for them. Every retreat they'd come and the grief would be hard to bear—kind of overwhelming. It was really what their practice was about: just being with the grief and the sadness and that loss. This happened year after year.

Then one year, the person came back on the retreat and the grief was gone. The missing was still there, but the overwhelming nature of that grief had just been worked out. This is something I think it's really helpful to understand about grief: it has its own timeline. If we're able to open to and feel it, it will pass through.

Sometimes we're afraid to feel sadness or grief because we feel like, "Oh, it's too big a pool. If I open to it, I'm going to drown. If I really open to it, it's going to go on forever." But grief has its own timeline and timeframe. We can learn to open to it and hold it with mindfulness, and eventually it does move through. This is a really powerful demonstration of that for me.

The last of the big areas I wanted to talk about is fear. This is my personal favorite, because this was my big difficulty emotion for many years. The hard thing about fear is that every time it came up, I'd get scared. I didn't know how to handle it. It wasn't what I wanted—I wanted to be calm. The fear would come up and I'd think, "No, not that again." So it was hard to get in to feel it, but the instructions were to feel the body sensations, so that's where I would bring my attention.

My stomach was clenched. I had this fluttery feeling all up and down my chest. I felt kind of shaky and ungrounded. It was really unpleasant, but I could connect with the sensations in the body. What my teachers instructed me to ask was, "Are they bearable? Could I bear those sensations?" I didn't really think so, but I looked and I saw I was bearing them. I went through a whole sit and I had them and I came out the other side. I had been able to bear those sensations.

Then I tried to get close to the mental tone. But it's hard because the mental tone of fear is moving away from. Every time I got close to the mental tone, it would kind of repel my attention. It says, "You don't want to come here. This is scary. Don't get too close." But over time, I got closer and closer to the mental tone of the fear.

Then I looked into the belief I had about it, and it was something like, "I can bear this moment, but the next moment's going to be unbearable." That was kind of the story within fear. So I'd open up to those three parts and got more and more familiar with it.

At one point, one of my teachers said, "Okay, if you think you're accepting it, ask this question: Would it be okay with you if the fear was with you for the rest of your life?" So I asked myself that question—would that be okay? And the answer came immediately: no way. That was not going to happen.

But then I was in struggle with the fear, right? I wasn't really accepting it. So I had to look: why did I feel that? I couldn't open to it. All these reasons came up. If fear was always with me, I couldn't get into music the way I had been able to get into music. I couldn't open myself to a sunset the way I had been able to.

I couldn't fall in love again if I was full of fear. So there were all these future things that I wanted. But by holding out for them, I was making the present moment full of conflict and avoidance and fear. I was sustaining the fear.

So I gave up. I said, "Okay, I'm going to open to fear even if it wants to be here for the rest of my life. That's going to be okay with me." And I did open and I really meant it. And at that point, when I opened in that way, it broke something in the fear. It cracked its spine in some way. And fear has never had the same power over me again that it had before, because of that degree of opening.

For a long time in my practice then, I didn't care if fear came or not. If it arose—totally fine. If it passed away, totally fine. If it wanted to stick around, totally fine. If it wasn't there, totally fine. I really didn't care whether fear came or not. And from that point on, I knew that fear would come again, and it has come again, but it's never felt crippling. It's never felt like it really scared me because now I know how to work with it.

Once I realized that, I understood it wasn't just fear that I had learned to work with. I had discovered how to work with any emotion. I knew how to go through the same process with any difficult emotion that came up. And that gave me a huge amount of confidence. I just had the feeling nothing that's going to come on the emotional level can really deeply block me any longer.

So I had to dig really deep to get to that kind of relationship with fear. I had to find a kind of courage that I didn't even know was there to open that thoroughly to fear.

This is a quotation from Ajahn Liam. Do you remember I read something about Ajahn Liam the other night about his enlightenment experience as a disciple of Ajahn Chah? This is Ajahn Liam. He was in conversation with another abbot late in his practice life. The abbot asked him, "What was the hardest thing in your practice?" And Ajahn Liam said, "I'd have to say that the hardest thing was fear." And then he paused. "But just to say that it was hard isn't quite right. I would have to say that it was a worthy opponent. Working with it brought about the growth of a lot of wisdom. It was a worthy opponent."

And that was the same way it was for me. I had to grow my skills in meditation and my strength as a human being in order to discover freedom in relation to fear. And that growth and confidence has served me well ever since.

So these mind states that come along in your practice that look like a disaster—they may be your lifeboat. You climb on that lifeboat and it really fuels your journey to freedom, to awakening, to liberation. Because you develop strengths you didn't know you had. They're there potentially, but we all need to bring them out.

So in the beginning I kind of had the idea in practice that I needed to get out, get away from confusion in order to find freedom or awakening. Confusion is this agitated state of mind where we feel kind of lost and adrift and we're not sure what's what or where to go. I thought all that had to go away before I could find awakening.

Well, that's not the way I understand it now. The way I understand it now is that I have to find my awakened mind in the middle of the confusion. And it's finding the awakening in the middle of confusion that transforms it and makes it weaken and little by little fall away. And then awakening is right there for us.

So it's not like we get rid of this stuff and then we find awakening. We awaken in the middle of all these difficult emotions. Whichever one is our main song—

We awaken in the middle of that and we find stability, equanimity, acceptance, compassion, friendliness right there. And then we find awakening is not far away. This is what we're practicing for. And it's possible. It's possible in a retreat like this to unfold in that direction.

So I want to close with a poem by Rainer Maria Rilke. He wrote a collection of poems when he was in his twenties—they're his most accessible poems. It's called The Book of Hours. He was traveling around Europe, especially Germany, but some neighboring countries, going to churches. He got into a Christian phase, and you can really feel the awakening of his spirituality as you follow the poems that he wrote on this journey.

The setting of this particular poem is that before God makes us and before he releases us into the world, he speaks to us. So this poem is what God says as we're about to be admitted to life:

God speaks to each of us as he makes us,
then walks with us silently out of the night.
These are the words we dimly hear:
You, sent out beyond your memory,
go to the limits of your longing.
Embody me.
Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in.
Let everything happen to you:
beauty and terror.
Just keep going.
No feeling is final.
Don't let yourself lose me.

Nearby is the country they call life.
You will know it by its seriousness.
Give me your hand.

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me.

Thank you for your attention, and you know what happens next. Good night.

CHAPTER 80

Q&A on Noticing Non-Self and Selfing

Guy Armstrong · 14 min

> In this Q&A session from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses a practitioner's question about noticing non-self (anattā) without inadvertently creating a sense of self through the very act of noting. Drawing on teachings about the absence of a fixed self anywhere in our experience, Armstrong explores the dynamic process of "selfing" - the continuous construction of I-ing and my-ing that creates agitation through wanting and not wanting.
>
> The discussion centers on developing perception (saññā) as a foundation for mindfulness practice, explaining how strong perception enables clear recognition of experience. Armstrong offers practical guidance on noting the absence of selfing, suggesting alternatives like "empty" when "non-self" triggers self-consciousness. He references the Buddha's teaching to Ānanda about the world being empty of self and what belongs to self, connecting this to the experience of natural calm that arises when selfing activity subsides.
>
> Using Joseph Goldstein's analogy of an inverted ramp, Armstrong illustrates how the mind's natural resting state gradually shifts from agitation to calm as practice deepens. This talk offers valuable insight into recognizing the correlation between the absence of selfing and the arising of natural peace, helping practitioners trust their perception and develop familiarity with states of non-self as a foundation for deeper meditation.

Good morning, everyone. Nice to see your bright faces this morning. Hope it feels bright inside. You look good.

We have a few questions this morning, so I'll go through a few and see how far we get.

Carol spoke about noticing moments of self-arising and also noticing when they're not. It seems like as soon as I note non-self—is this even how you would note it—a sense of self arises. Is it possible to notice non-self without evoking a sense of I noting this? If so, how?

I think this is an interesting instruction. I didn't hear Carol's talk and I hadn't heard her give that instruction before, but it's an interesting one. One of the key pointings, I'm sure, in her teaching and as the note indicates, is that there's not a fixed self anywhere in this system. But a sense of a self does come into being at times.

The sense of self arises. I think Sally talked about this in her talk on Bahia as I-ing and my-ing. So it's the activity—and we could even call it the activity of selfing—that takes place. There's never a self there, but we construct one again and again.

To notice when the self is arising in that formation is very helpful. And then to contrast it with how it feels when there's not a sense of self arising. I want to point out that even though we may not notice a sense of self arising, there could be a subtle sense that we're not seeing. It's usually easier to notice the movements of greed and aversion because there's a movement toward something, either to hold on or push it away. But the activity of delusion is not so easy to pick up. So even at times when it feels like, "Oh, I'm not seeing a sense of self coming," there could be a subtle sense of self that's not being seen.

But don't go looking for that. Because we don't know what we don't know. That's why delusion is so hard to actively investigate. We don't know what we don't know. The only time delusion becomes clear is when we see the truth of something that had previously not been seen. And we can't force that. It comes when it comes.

So let's say a relative lack of self is seen. It's clear there's movement of wanting or not wanting, liking, disliking, holding on, pushing away. Those are clear activities of self. When those calm momentarily, there can be a sense of some relief. In this moment, those movements of I and my are not apparent.

So it is really good to notice that. Why? Because we want to find our way back to that more and more often. And as we do, our experience of that place where the self is not so active gets clearer and deeper. So as we settle in more and more to this experience of no obvious self, that deepens and then other layers of the self may be shown and then can drop away. So we get to more subtle experiences of the absence of self.

This is a really helpful thing to notice. So then the question arises, how might it be noted? Not-self or non-self is a fine note, if that works for you. I'm not able to interrogate the questioner at this point, and so I'm not sure why the noting necessarily brings up a sense of self, except that it could be a new experience.

As we move into this territory of not-self, it's new terrain for most of us. And so there can be a sense of excitement or thrill or a little bit of pride or an aha moment that can lead to a sense of self around that seeing. So that can happen and that's fine. If it's like that, just greater familiarity with the activity of noting the absence of selfing will lay that to rest.

When we first come upon something, it seems new, fresh, exciting. Once we get familiar with it, it's like, "Oh, there's that not-self again. So boring. Nothing exciting is happening." I mean, often when people get into calm, they go, "Nothing's happening. I want something to happen."

So this is similar. I want more selfing. No, not really. So if that's the source of the "I" arising with the noting, that will wear away in time. Don't worry about it.

Or it could be even the putting in of the word "self." Oh, "self" means "I." So then the "I" sort of wakes up. Are you talking about me? Wakes up again. So another note, maybe it's a little more verbally neutral, would be "empty."

We haven't really talked about this, but we will at some point talk about the sense of emptiness in dharma practice, because it's really very central. Ananda once came to the Buddha and said, "Venerable sir, you say 'empty is the world, empty is the world.' What do you mean by that?" And the Buddha said, "The world is empty because it is empty of a self or what belongs to a self." That is, it's empty of "I" and it's empty of "my."

So this word emptiness in the Buddhist discourses mostly points to this perception of the absence of a self. And this is something that hopefully will be happening for you all.

Let's talk for a moment about this term perception because it's an important term. Roxanne's going to talk about it more tonight. She'll unfold it more. In Western psychology, perception, as I understand it, often means the data of sense contact. Oh, there was a sound—that equals perception. Or there's a sight—that equals perception.

In the Buddhist language, the translations we use, perception means recognition of something. So if you hear that, the arising is just a sound. We call that contact. In the Buddha's language, that's contact. The perception is "hearing" or "finger snap." Both of those are recognition of the sound. That's a different level than contact. That's clear, right? The contact just happens by itself and the mind comes in and recognizes it.

It's said that the proximate cause for mindfulness to arise is a strong perception. That just means you notice something in your experience. Based on a really strong and clear perception, mindfulness comes and says, "That's what just happened."

So the noting practice really reflects this. And one of the reasons the noting practice is so powerful is it's strengthening that factor of perception: in-breath, out-breath, hearing, sensing, thought. So moment after moment, the perceptions are being brought to the surface and named. That's what's going on.

This highlighting of clear perception is what brings mindfulness alive. Mindfulness is knowing what our experience is in the present moment, and it's perceiving in these terms: in, out, sensing, hearing, thinking, and so forth.

Anything within our experience can be perceived. That's the foundation for choiceless attention. Anything we experience can be perceived. The experience of absence of selfing can be perceived. And when it's perceived, which is a natural function of wisdom, as your wisdom is growing, you're going to perceive this from time to time, it can be noted.

So the main thing is noticing it. Absence of self right now, as far as I can tell. And then find a note that suits. Could be "not self," could be "empty," could be something else that you discover. "No I," could be something like that. Find a note that matches, but trust your perception. Trust your perception, and this can become an extension of mindfulness.

At other times, you notice selfing is active, clear, and that's usually experienced as some agitation, because there's wanting and not wanting, liking and disliking, holding on and pushing away. Recognize that and feel the agitation of it. The activity of selfing usually goes with agitation. The lack of selfing usually goes with a degree of calming.

Start to notice that correlation. As you become more familiar with this calming, it may be momentary at first. It doesn't have to last the entire meditation period—it can be just for a few moments, but you feel calm. Notice that. Observe that part of this experience is the absence of any strong expression of selfing.

This is a perception you want to encourage, because eventually this kind of calm approach to your experience can become the baseline of your practice. Things will still come along to disturb it, but the calm can become the foundation. Then we begin to discover what I would call the natural mind, or the natural state.

This language emerges from the Thai forest tradition. It's not so much found in the Mahasi Sayadaw instructions or teachings, but you hear it frequently in the Thai forest. We come to realize that if we're not stirring this stuff up, the mind has an intrinsic peace that's very natural. We recognize this quality and realize it's completely unforced. You don't have to do anything to construct that peace. When you stop selfing—stop claiming "I" or "my"—the peace is there, and it settles more deeply.

This is an approach to looking at your experience that can really support relaxation and trust in that element of calm. When it shows up, notice the absence of selfing. Notice how that feels. Observe that you're learning to find your way back there more and more. This can become the baseline for your relationship to meditation, your relationship to others, your relationship to life, unfolding in a very natural way.

Let me share one final analogy, since we have a couple minutes remaining. Joseph used this frequently in the early years of his teaching—the analogy of an inverted ramp, or a U-shaped ramp. He said that at the beginning of practice, the mind is like a ball rolling up and down this ramp. Initially, we do a lot of work to get it up to the balance point at the top, where it's steady. But give it just one little push, and it goes sliding off one side or the other—into desire or aversion. It's very difficult to keep it steady at the top because the slightest push sends it tumbling.

As practice develops, this ramp levels out, and the mind can come to rest in the flat area in the middle. It will still move off a little with a push, but it's quite easy to bring it back. It's no longer an uphill struggle to return it to center.

Over time, that ramp inverts, with the U going down to the bottom. The mind more naturally rests at the bottom of that ramp. Things will still come along that push it up one side or the other, but it naturally wants to find its way back. Its karmic pattern becomes this returning to the resting point in the center.

We want to start observing this kind of development, and calm is really the doorway to begin seeing it. Notice the presence of calm, the absence of selfing. You can't force the duration of calm, but you'll observe that it begins to extend naturally. This is a sign of the meditation deepening in its own organic way.

CHAPTER 81

Kamma and the End of Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this comprehensive dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's profound teaching on kamma - not simply as 'action' but specifically as intentional action or volition (cetanā). Drawing from the Dalai Lama's emphasis on kamma's importance for Western practitioners, Armstrong explores five key aspects: the meaning of kamma as volition behind actions of body, speech and mind; how wholesome actions rooted in generosity, loving-kindness and wisdom lead to happiness while unwholesome actions rooted in greed, hatred and delusion lead to suffering; the relationship between kamma and anatta (not-self); implications for rebirth; and what the Buddha meant by the end of kamma.
>
> Armstrong clarifies common misconceptions, explaining that the Buddha never taught that all experiences result from past kamma - illness, accidents, and other factors also cause suffering. He emphasizes kamma as a practical teaching for cultivating happiness through ethical conduct (sīla) and mental purification. Using the analogy of mind-streams like rivers - constantly flowing yet maintaining unique characteristics - he shows how personality consists of karmic patterns that can be transformed through dharma practice. The talk integrates teachings on the brahmavihāras, particularly equanimity's recognition that 'all beings are heirs to their kamma,' while maintaining compassion for all suffering regardless of its origins.

Kamma and the End of Kamma

The talk this evening is on kamma and the end of kamma. This word has come into our English vocabulary and is quite widely used in the wider culture, but it's not very well understood. I thought that a three-month course is a place where a talk on this topic can fit. It's not something we talk about on shorter retreats, so I want to address this topic tonight.

I'm going to take the authority of the Dalai Lama to justify this focus. He used to meet with groups of Western teachers who would travel to Dharamsala, perhaps twenty at a time, to discuss how the family business was going—how Buddhism was evolving in the West, what the problems were, what the issues were. At one of those meetings, he told the Western teachers that he thought it was more important for them to teach about kamma than to teach about emptiness. Now, as somebody who's written a book about emptiness, I thought this was not very good publicity. But nonetheless, I do agree with it because kamma is more immediately practical for us than emptiness is.

So it is an important topic, and it fits if you take a step back and look at the Buddha's main teachings. Consider the Four Noble Truths, Dependent Origination, and the Law of Kamma. All of these are basically about cause and effect: suffering and its cause, liberation and its cause, the chain from ignorance and how that leads to suffering, and then the law of kamma, of cause and the effect of kamma. There's an interesting similarity to all the main teachings, and it's basically because if you take the self out of the picture, then everything happens simply because of causes and conditions. So all these central teachings are pointing to that truth.

Tonight I want to tell you about what the Buddha said about kamma. First, because I think it's really interesting. Second, because I think it can be helpful. Third, because it's not often talked about in these retreats, and so it's not widely known exactly what his teachings are. But as I talk about it, I want to preface this with the acknowledgment that there's a lot of this I can't verify by my personal experience. A lot of the teachings on mindfulness and the development of the Eightfold Path and the Seven Factors of Enlightenment we can verify. But a lot of the teachings on kamma came about because the Buddha had a really profound vision that most of us don't have. For him, the insights into kamma were not speculative or theoretical. These were things he actually saw in his direct understanding.

So I want to make sure to pass that on to you, but without any assumption that you should believe it, because it's not something that's experienceable for most of us. Some people aren't comfortable believing things that aren't experienceable. So I would encourage you to hold the teachings on kamma at least with an open mind, because it's easy to say, "This is not true, this can't be true." But the fact is, we don't know that either. You may not know from firsthand experience that these teachings are true, but I would wager that you don't know from firsthand experience that they're not true. Therefore, I would encourage you to have an open mind. For myself, I've had to hang out with a lot of these teachings over years to get a sense of my own confidence and trust in them. So I'm passing on to you what the Buddha said, but it's of course for you to decide whether it resonates or not.

In this evening's talk, I want to look at this question of kamma from five different angles. One is what the word means. The second is what are the results of kamma. The third is how does it connect with the teaching on not-self, because these could seem to be opposed. The fourth is how does this influence the idea of rebirth. And the fifth is what did the Buddha mean by the end of kamma. I'm going to touch on these five points tonight.

In her talk the other night on intention, Carol actually gave quite a good introduction and overview of kamma, so I don't need to repeat a lot of that at length. I'll just summarize the things she said. She didn't go into this detail, but I want to put this in: In the time of the Buddha, there were a lot of different opinions and philosophies around the notion of kamma. The word kamma is a Sanskrit word that just meant action. The Pali term is kamma with a double M. It just meant action.

Every different school had its own take on action. Some of them said actions don't really matter—that actions don't have results for the person who's doing them. You could murder somebody or you could heal somebody and neither of those would have any clear effect in your own life or in your own mind. Some people said that action was all predetermined, that it really didn't matter because it was all going to happen automatically anyway. Some people said it doesn't matter because God is doing it all, so there's no room for individual will. All these different philosophies were circulating, and the Buddha, with his insight, offered a new definition of kamma.

that is the one that we'll be using and talking about. He said, "It is volition, bhikkhus, that I call karma, for having willed, one acts by body, speech, or mind."

This factor of volition—sometimes translated as intention—is really the key. It is the motivating force behind the action. We could call it motive, volition, intention, will, impulse, or motivation. It's the activity in the mind that leads to an action—that is its volition.

As Carol said, actions are wholesome or unwholesome according to the volition that drives them. They can be driven by the three roots of the unwholesome—greed, hatred, and delusion—or the three roots of the wholesome: generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.

The meaning of wholesome or unwholesome is very pragmatic. Actions done from a wholesome motivation end up having a wholesome effect in our life, meaning they lead to happiness. Actions done from an unwholesome motivation end up having an unwholesome effect in our lives, meaning they end up causing some degree of suffering. It's not the act per se, but the motivation behind it that is the key.

Let's look at a couple of examples. If a baby is lying on a bed at night, rolls over, knocks over a candle in the baby's sleep, and the candle burns the house down, there's no karma. There's no volition in that action, so there's no karmic consequence.

Or the same action can have two different meanings. If I say to you, "I observe somebody slicing someone's stomach open with a sharp knife," is that good or bad? It depends, right? If a person was cutting someone in the abdomen in order to steal their money, that wouldn't be so good. But if a surgeon is making an incision in order to heal their appendix, that would be very good. It depends on the motivation behind the action.

The first thing I note about this that's kind of interesting is that actions have an intrinsic moral force—an intrinsic moral force that's based on the mindset from which they spring.

As Carol said, actions take place in three spheres: body, speech, and mind. We're comfortable with actions of body and actions of speech. We may not have thought before that mental events are also actions, but in the Buddha's teachings, they are. Thoughts also have volition. Emotions can have volition.

The Buddha was very clear on what the unwholesome actions are that we want to stay away from. Just to run through them briefly: three actions of body, which are killing living beings, taking what is not given, and engaging in sexual misconduct. Four actions of speech, which are false speech, harsh speech, divisive speech, and idle chatter and gossip. And three actions of mind: covetousness—wanting what belongs to someone else—ill will or hostility, and wrong view.

Here's what's interesting: wrong view is actually an unwholesome form of action. You can kind of see this because if we don't understand reality the way it is, we're going to act in the world based on misunderstanding, based on confusion. And that's going to lead to problems for others and for ourselves.

The ten wholesome actions are to refrain from these. If you just don't engage with these unwholesome actions, that's considered wholesome conduct. I would put a postscript on it, which is there are lots of forms of wholesome action that go beyond this. Forms of generosity, of loving-kindness, of compassion, acts that actively reach out to help are also wholesome. We'll get into that later.

Anyone reading this would think, "Well, I always want to act from a wholesome motivation, right? All my actions should come out of generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom." But is that possible? Not as long as greed, aversion, and delusion are still active in the mind. Then it becomes very difficult.

To me, this raises an interesting question about free will. If we really had free will, we could ensure that all our actions sprang from wholesome motives. But we don't. Greed, aversion, and delusion are compulsive forces in the mind that sometimes make us act in ways we even know at the time are unskillful. This is our situation.

But understanding them correctly and refining our actions more and more over the course of years of dharma practice means that our actions align more and more with wholesome intentions, wholesome motivation. This is really helpful for us. This is what guides us on the path to greater and greater happiness.

You can see this possibility in somebody like the Dalai Lama, who is so refined in his action because he is so refined in his heart and mind. Some years ago, he was being interviewed for O Magazine by Oprah herself. I really have to give Oprah a lot of credit because more than anyone else I can see in the West, she's been responsible for bringing really helpful forms of spirituality to a very wide audience. She has a lot of openness to different traditions, and she's really popularized a lot of these teachings.

Before there was a mindful magazine, there was Oprah. So Oprah starts this interview with the Dalai Lama, and she says, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?" That's an interesting question, isn't it?

The Dalai Lama paused a moment, and he said, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said.

"My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable," the Dalai Lama continued. "Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

That's pretty amazing. As engaged as he has stayed in worldly activity, and his meditations compared to those who have spent years in the mountains practicing meditation with single focus. That's pretty incredible.

One of the things I see in that answer is how the refinement of his conduct has created such a stable platform for his mind to rest in. To go to meditate and know you have no regrets—that's a good beginning. May we all start from a place like that. That's wonderful.

So that's the basic overview of the meaning of karma: wholesome and unwholesome actions in these three spheres of body, speech, and mind. The next question is, what about results? What can we say about results?

Sometimes when in the West we talk about karma, what we're really pointing to are the results. I think there was a pop song, "Instant Karma," many years ago, and I think it was really pointing to results of action. But karma just means the action.

The basic results: wholesome actions lead to happiness, unwholesome actions lead to unhappiness. And I think Carol also quoted these lines from the Dhammapada: "Speak and act with an impure mind, and sorrow will follow you like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

Some years ago, I was teaching a course on meditation at a juvenile hall in California, in the Bay Area. I got invited in along with James Baraz, who's a good friend. The reason we got invited in is that one of the Spirit Rock meditators worked in this juvenile hall. If you're not from America, you may not know juvenile hall is where people are held who have been arrested for some suspected crime before they go to trial. And juvenile means they're below the age of eighteen.

So we were in a men's wing, and it was one of the more secure wings of this juvenile hall. Young guys who were like fifteen, sixteen, seventeen years old were in there because they were being charged with things like theft, grand theft, murder, attempted murder, assault, and so forth. Some of it was fairly serious stuff. They were going to be tried in a matter of weeks or months, and this is where they were held in the meantime.

We thought, are they going to listen to two middle-aged guys who don't really understand what their lives have been about? But we thought, we'll give it a shot. We started off the same way we started here. We started with paying attention to the breath to calm the mind, attention to body sensations to land in the body. Then we opened up to thoughts and then emotions.

This is where the meditation started to gain some traction because you can imagine—you're fifteen, sixteen, seventeen years old. You're in jail. You're going to go before a judge in a few months and you could be sent away to prison for years if you're convicted. Or you might be released back to your family, back to your home. And they didn't know which way it was going to go for them. So the level of fear in that population was quite high.

Also, as you might imagine, there was a certain amount of aggression within the group, and the level of anger was sometimes quite high. By giving them the tools to feel the fear and the anger in their bodies, it started to give them a way to work with and shine a light on all this turbulent energy they didn't have any understanding about. The practice proved to be genuinely helpful for them on the level of mindfulness of emotions, and some of them became quite engaged with it.

I remember giving them one simple instruction: "Do you fall asleep on an in-breath or an out-breath? Check it out and see." One of the guys kept coming back every week saying, "I still can't find it, but I'm still looking." They were really applying themselves to the practice. It was very sweet to witness.

So we came to the last class—the final time we would be meeting with them. Normally we would explore the precepts, practice in daily life, and introduce the teaching on karma. We wondered: should we go there with this group? This might not land well at all. After some consideration, we thought, it's our last meeting—we'll at least try it.

We briefly outlined the idea of karma and asked, "Does this sound like anything you've heard before? Does this sound reasonable?" One of the young men immediately said, "Oh, you mean what goes around comes around? Sure, yeah, we've heard about that." So they could connect with the fundamental principle of karma.

One of the senior members of the group surprised us. After we left, he told the others, "You know, you should send metta to the people in the other gang because they have mothers and sisters also." That unexpected sweetness happened after our departure—a beautiful flowering of the practice.

We also created something special for them. We made certificates that we tried to design like diplomas, complete with curly cues and fancy script. Each one read: "This person"—and we'd write in their name by hand—"has successfully completed a course in Mind Power." It was mindfulness training, but we called it "mind power." We dated each certificate and signed our names. I think those certificates meant something to them. One of the participants looked at his and asked, "Can I show this to the judge?" We said, "Sure, we hope it will help."

This idea of karma was finding its way into their understanding. The way we presented it—as the science of happiness, the reliable blueprint for building happiness—seemed to make sense to them. If you want to be happy, you act from these kinds of motivations and you don't act from those other motivations. Honestly, that's how I understand it for myself.

Viewed in this light, the teaching on karma becomes our best friend. It offers a genuinely reliable path to happiness. You may not believe this, but having grown up in the Dharma over about forty-five years and maintained relationships with a consistent group of friends throughout much of that time, having watched my friends' lives unfold and witnessed my own life develop within these teachings, I have deep faith in this truth: acting from wholesome motivations brings genuine happiness.

This is another beautiful dimension of the meditation aspect of our practice. It refines the heart so that wholesome motivations arise more and more naturally. It becomes increasingly easier to act from that place and to restrain the impulses that emerge from unwholesome states. This restraint itself brings happiness, but then it factors into the actions we perform. It influences our karma—our actions of body, speech, and even thought. This creates another layer through which purification develops and generates momentum.

In Tibetan practice, they also hold the Brahmaviharas as essential cultivations. They call them the four immeasurables because they're intended to extend to all beings everywhere—in that way, they become immeasurable. They use slightly different language. For loving-kindness, the phrase is: "May all beings have happiness and the cause of happiness, which is virtue." For compassion: "May all beings be free from sorrow and the cause of sorrow, which is non-virtue." You can see how the teaching on karma is woven directly into these four immeasurables statements.

I want to explore in more detail this relationship between the cause of happiness and karma. The Buddha stated it like this: "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions."

Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform for good or for ill, of those they will be the heirs.

You can see how important this teaching is. We inherit our actions and they show up either toward happiness or toward unhappiness. And again, as I said, this was a direct insight that the Buddha had. This was not a speculative philosophical view. This was something he saw operating. In fact, he saw it the night of his awakening. It's described in one of the discourses in the Majjhima Nikaya, how he surveyed the world and saw the truth of this.

According to the Buddha, this applies whether you know the law or not. It applies whether you believe this law or not. It applies whether your religion believes it or not. It applies whether your culture believes it or not. It's a universal law that applies to every sentient being everywhere.

Interestingly, our development in the path is based on this law. The path is a karmic unfolding, but I'll return to that point later.

As you know, the four Brahma Viharas are loving kindness, compassion, altruistic joy, and equanimity. There's a phrase for the equanimity practice just as there is for metta, compassion, and joy. The traditional equanimity phrase is: "All beings are the heirs to their karma. Their happiness and unhappiness depend on their own past actions, more than on my wishes for them." This really illustrates how we inherit our actions. Our happiness and unhappiness depend on our past actions.

I don't know if you saw the movie Kundun. It was a film by Martin Scorsese, probably released about twenty years ago. It tells the story of the life of the Dalai Lama from childhood onward. It's a fictional account, not a documentary, but it's a really high-quality film. I highly recommend watching it if you haven't seen it before.

The film tells the story of the Dalai Lama's growth from a child living in Tibet, growing up in the Potala Palace in Lhasa. He had the very best teachers they could find to prepare him to be the spiritual leader of Tibet. There's one scene in the movie that I found really touching. He's about eight or nine years old, and his tutors are three old monks gathered around him. They're teaching him about the Four Noble Truths.

As part of the teaching, they ask him to tell them what the Second Noble Truth is. He says, "The cause of suffering is craving." The tutors say, "No, no, no. We want you to put it in your own words. Don't just parrot something back to us. Put it in your own words. What's the Second Noble Truth?"

The young boy thinks for a minute and says, "I suffer because I want things." They say, "Not good enough. Make it really personal, in your own words." He sits and reflects some more. Finally he says, "Most of my suffering comes from my own habits of mind." They say, "Ah, very good, very good."

Most of our suffering comes from our own habits of mind. This is the pointing of this phrase in equanimity meditation. Our happiness and unhappiness depends on our own actions.

There's an obvious flaw in this strict formulation, which is—I'll tell you my problem with it. I look at the suffering of the children in Ukraine right now. Children have been killed, their parents have been killed, they've been injured and wounded, their homes destroyed, their towns destroyed. There's a huge amount of suffering going on for the children of Ukraine in certain areas. I don't believe that all of that is because of their past actions.

I mean, it's possible, but I personally can't see a reason to believe it.

So I take this phrase with a little modification, and we'll come to why that is later. But when we say, especially speaking for an adult, your happiness and unhappiness depend on your own habits of mind, that can be seen to be true. We can see that in our own experience. We can see it in our friends' experience. We can see it in people that we know well. Our habits of mind determine our level of happiness and unhappiness.

But one of the things the Buddha said you cannot figure out are the detailed workings of karmic results. This is actually one of the four imponderables. I think I mentioned the four imponderables in an earlier dharma talk. One is the range of mind of a Buddha. The other is the power of a concentrated mind. The third one is the detailed workings of karmic results. You just can't figure out how one action led to another, and another, and another, and ended up in this result. The Buddha said often that he could see in some individual's life how it had turned out, why it had turned out the way it did, but we can't see that. And so it doesn't help to think about it. The Buddha said that one who thinks about this will go mad and experience vexation. He didn't say which came first. Maybe both. The fourth imponderable is the beginning of things. Don't tell that to an astrophysicist. But that's what the Buddha said.

So there are ways that we kind of misuse this teaching. I've heard it misused. A friend gets a diagnosis of some serious illness and some other friend comes up to them and says, "Oh, that must be your karma." That's not a nice thing to say to someone. First, because there's no way that person could possibly know the truth of that. That's a completely speculative view. And it's not helpful to the person who's ill. It would be much more helpful to refer them to good medical treatment.

So the Buddha never said—and this is one of the things I want to underline and make really clear, because this is one of the misinterpretations of the teaching on karma—the Buddha never said that everything that happens to us is the result of past karma. Never said that. In fact, there's one discourse where he was invited to say that. Some wanderers came to him and said, "These other teachers are saying that all pleasant and unpleasant feeling is the result of past action. Can you confirm that?" The Buddha said no. He said they shouldn't be saying that. It's wrong for them to be saying that. And then he identified a number of other causes of unpleasant feeling. They can be caused by illness, can be caused by diet, can be caused by climate, can be caused by accident, can be caused by assault—other sources of unpleasant feeling not connected to past actions.

Don't assume that everything that happens is because of karma. Karma is one of the laws operating in this universe, but there are other laws. There are the laws of physics, the laws of chemistry, the laws of biology, the laws of psychology, the laws of genetics. All these laws are at play, and the law of karma is also at play.

So the way that I think this teaching works best is to take a really broad view of it. How can we best support our happiness going forward? It's to act from wholesome motivations, as much as possible. Sometimes it won't be possible, but as much as possible, that will put us on this track toward greater happiness.

But to use it to say, "Oh, I've gotten a certain amount of unhappiness in my life right now. I must have done something really bad in the past"—that's not a skillful reflection. We don't know that. And so just to assume it kind of loads us up with more guilt that's purely speculative. We don't know why these conditions have come about in our life. And so to assume that it's something we did in the past, we don't know that. It's kind of like you want to use karma as a rearview mirror, right? "Oh, I got here. How did I get here?"

Looking in the rearview mirror doesn't reveal the truth. We don't know that our present circumstances are even karmic results in many cases. This kind of speculation is just ideation without grounding in reality.

Although I will say, there was one occasion when I saw this kind of karmic reflection used skillfully. When Dipa Ma first came to this country in 1980, Carol and I had just recently left staff, and she was housed in a home in western Massachusetts for a month that was rented by Joseph and Sharon and some friends. We had gone off staff and were in our dharma bum phase at that time. Joseph and Sharon asked us if we would help look after Dipa Ma, so we moved into the house with her for a month and helped cook and clean and shop.

During this month, one of the friends who came often to visit—a student of hers—had gone down to New York. While he was there, someone had broken into his car and stolen his tape player. This was back in the days of 8-tracks, so you know how old that was. He came back to the house, and we were all sitting around at dinner while he told us the story. He'd parked the car on the street, came back, and somebody had broken in and taken his tape player.

This launched us into a whole discussion about big cities and how sad it is that this kind of thing happens when you're just being innocent, parking to go to a restaurant. We felt so sorry for him—the whole sympathetic routine.

Dipa Ma asked to have the conversation translated. She didn't speak English, but her translator gave her the overview of what had happened and what we were saying. She just looked at our friend with a little smile on her face and said, "You too have stolen."

That was it. "You too have stolen."

It completely flattened all the conversation about blame and victimhood. I don't know if she could see that karmically or she just knew that everybody has at some point taken something that wasn't given. But it was a good reminder of the universality of actions. Over so many years and so many lifetimes, we've all done everything. Somewhere back there is a cause for anything that can be showing up, but we don't know what it is.

Sometimes Westerners feel resistance to the teaching on karma, perhaps because we have very strong democratic ideals of equality—everybody should be equally happy. But we're not. This view says that we're to some extent responsible for our happiness. To some extent. When somebody's suffering, this can look heartless, like blaming the person who's suffering. Cold, uncaring, cruel even.

Some people take away the idea that the Buddha is saying some beings deserve to suffer. If you've done things in the past that are bringing this on, well, that's because you deserve it. You've done unskillful things, so that's your just desserts.

But it doesn't mean that. The Buddha never said that or meant that. I'm convinced that if he could have taken away the suffering from every individual on the face of the planet, he would have done it instantly. It's not within his power. It was not then. It's not now.

You can see this in the story of Angulimala, if you ever doubt this. Angulimala was a serial killer who was actually a very spiritually inclined being who had hooked up with the wrong teacher. This teacher had given him an instruction to collect the fingers cut from the bodies of a thousand people he had murdered. At this point in his development, Angulimala—mala means necklace, anguli means finger—had a necklace of 999 fingers, which he wore.

He was hiding out in the hills around the area where the Buddha was staying. The Buddha said, "I think I'm going to walk through those hills tomorrow."

His attendant said, "No, no, no, no, no. Venerable sir, please don't do that. There's a killer out there. He's just going to wait for you to walk on the path and bring out a knife and kill you."

The Buddha said, "I don't think so."

So he went ahead and walked on the path. As he was walking, Angulimala came running down from the hillside, jumped onto the path behind the Buddha and started running after him. But the Buddha kept walking forward at a good pace, and Angulimala could not catch him.

Run as fast as he might, he couldn't catch the Buddha. And finally he shouted out, "Stop, stop!" And at that, the Buddha just turned around and calmly said, "I have stopped, Angulimala, but you have not stopped."

That stopped Angulimala. He said, "This guy is on to something else." And so he came to him and basically asked to be his student. He said, "You've got something. I'd like to learn what it is." He saw the Buddha had no fear of him.

And so the Buddha took him on, allowed him to ordain within the Sangha, gave him instructions to free his heart and mind. And in a matter of a few weeks, Angulimala became fully awakened, because he had had a very deep spiritual inclination from being very young. So he became one of the Arhats in the time of the Buddha.

And when he went on alms round in nearby villages, people would stone him because they knew of his reputation as the person who had killed almost a thousand people. So he came back to the Buddha and said, "Every time I go on alms round, people want to stone me." And the Buddha said, "You have to bear that. That's the fruit of your actions. But if you hadn't joined the Sangha and meditated, your destination would be a lot worse. So bear it. You just have to bear it."

So this was an act of compassion to a very entrenched serial killer. The Buddha was interested in bringing him out of suffering.

So it would be nice, perhaps, if people could engage in all kinds of actions and not suffer the consequences, but this is a law. Expecting to do unwholesome actions and not suffer some suffering as a result would be to expect the law of karma not to operate. That would be like expecting gravity not to operate. That would be like saying, "Yeah, the apple can get ripe and detach from the tree, but it won't fall to the ground." You can't suspend the law of gravity, and you can't suspend the law of karma. Unwholesome acts lead to unwholesome results.

And then people might think this is an excuse for not caring. We see somebody suffering, but we think, "Well, they brought it on themselves, so it's not my problem. Let them suffer." But this is not equanimity. In the tradition, this is the near enemy of equanimity, which is indifference. It's not caring. It's cold.

Compassion looks on suffering and says, "I don't care where it came from. I don't care if it's external. I don't care if it's internal. I don't care if it's mental. I don't care if it's physical. I'd like to help that person come to the end of their suffering." That's compassion. Indifference is not part of the Brahma Viharas. It's a near enemy. It's not a wholesome state.

So compassion wants to respond to suffering anyway.

So we can see these results of actions in a number of different ways. You can see the karmic result. You see it before we act. When Vance talked about thinking about being generous, there's a good feeling that comes. In the act of giving, there's a good feeling. After giving, we reflect on our generosity. There's a good feeling.

We see that our actions come back to us in ways that people relate to us. If we've been warm and caring and friendly to people, then they welcome us and want to have contact. If we've been cold or critical or angry or judgmental, then they'll pull back and not want to be friends with us. This is the fourth way we see the actions coming to result.

And in habitual states of mind. Why does the mind move when you're sitting quietly?

Why does it go anywhere at all? Why isn't it just still and peaceful? And when it does move, why does it go to where it goes?

As the Buddha taught: "Bhikkhus, whatever a person frequently thinks and ponders upon, that will become the inclination of their mind. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of sense desire, ill will or cruelty, then the mind inclines to thoughts of sense desire, ill will or cruelty. If they frequently think and ponder upon thoughts of generosity, kindness, or compassion, then their mind inclines to thoughts of generosity, kindness, and compassion."

With our thoughts, we wear a groove in the mind, and that's where the mind tends to return. There's a lovely quote that captures this process beautifully: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit and habit hardens into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings."

Our thoughts form into intentions, the intentions form into actions, the actions become habits, and the habits shape our character. Then we're grown adults with all this conditioning.

But I want to add an important caveat. Some of these habits were instilled in us when we were really young. We may have suffered from abuse as children. We may have suffered from the racism that permeates society. We may have picked up intergenerational trauma. We may have had a traumatic loss early in life. When these things happen to young people, they go in so deep and form very strong coping habits that the children had no opportunity to reflect upon, to observe, or to try to modify.

We grow up as adults often carrying conditioning that we didn't really assent to, but that simply landed on us when we were too young to understand what was happening. So we often come into meditation bearing grooves in the mind that we didn't really choose. But then as meditators, we have no choice but to take responsibility for those grooves and to work with them. It's not fair, it's not really just, but this is where we find ourselves. And this is where, as adults, we simply have to work.

The sixth way that results show up is that they will occur in the future. It might be in this life, or it might be even a future life in mysterious ways that we can't understand or predict. And we usually can't verify. But this is an integral part of the teaching on karma.

This points to a really interesting connection: acts of goodness lead to happiness. How does that happen? That's the heart of the karmic riddle. How does that happen? It's a mystery. The workings of it are a mystery. But this is the heart of the teaching on karma, part of what the Buddha is pointing to.

This connection between virtue and happiness fascinates me, because it's intrinsic to sentient beings. It's not just an accident of Buddhist practitioners—it's intrinsic to sentient beings. What this says to me is that morality is not just an invention of the rational mind or some spiritual figure or religious leader. Morality is woven into the fabric of the universe. Goodness leads to happiness. This is in the very construction of the universe we're in—a universe that has sentient beings and hearts and minds. That's the kind of universe we're in.

To me, that's a heartful universe. If I lived in a universe where that wasn't true, that would seem like a universe lacking in morality, an amoral universe. To me, that would be the cold universe. But we live in a universe that has this caring built into it as an element of happiness. There's no escaping it.

Another place where this shows up is in relation to anatta, and this seems contradictory at first.

Because if there's no self, why does karma land here? Why do the results come back here if there's no self? There was a bhikkhu in the time of the Buddha who asked a question like this: "What self, then, will actions performed by the not-self affect?" Basically that question. And the Buddha's only reply was, "You haven't been listening to me."

But actually, karma and anatta need each other. You can't really separate them. They need each other. Why is that?

The teaching on anatta doesn't deny individuality. We are all unique beings. We have a unique history and we have separate bodies, and our consciousnesses are not exactly the same thing. So the individuality is true. It's just that within this process, there's nothing fixed. That's what the teaching of anatta or not-self means. Nothing is permanent and ongoing within this changing field of experience.

One way this makes sense is through the analogy of a stream. A stream is a flowing body of water. If you wanted, you could go down to Gaston Pond and look at the outlet, and there's a stream that flows out of it and then runs downhill a little way. You could stand and watch that stream and observe its characteristics. It's fairly small. The water is quite clear. At this time of year, it's pretty cold. And it's disappearing all the time. Every second, there's new water flowing by. And yet, there is something that we can call a stream, and it makes sense. If I talk about the Gaston Pond Stream, you kind of know what is being pointed to. There's nothing fixed in it—all flow, changing water—but it has its own kind of personality.

If you drive forty-five minutes west from here, you'll come to the Connecticut River. That's a very different kind of stream. It's very broad, hundreds of yards wide. It's brown water. It's flowing much more slowly than the water out of Gaston Pond. So that stream has a different personality. It has a different look. And its water is also just passing by, passing by, passing by, nothing fixed. Yet that has a different shape and color and speed than the Gaston Pond stream. They're very different.

This is what beings are like. We all have unique presentation and characteristics. Within this mind stream, there's a flow of experience. We are like a mind stream, and it contains sights and sounds and smells and thoughts and emotions and views, all kinds of feelings flowing on, always changing. In it, there's nothing fixed. But each of our streams is unique. We're our own river.

Looking at this river, I want to ask: what is personality? What comprises a human personality? We look around and know people who are generous and who are not generous. We know people who are very warm and people who are kind of cool. We know people who are a little bit shy and people who are really extroverted and confident. All those things go into making up their personality.

To me, personality is about the way we think and feel and speak and act. Maybe that sums up somebody's personality—mental, emotional events. Thinking, feeling, speaking, and acting—these are the three fields of karmic action, aren't they? So maybe personality is just the karmic bundle that each of us manifests.

And it's somewhat consistent, isn't it? You look at yourself, you look at your friends. Our personalities are kind of consistent from day to day. You know, it's not like you're going to go to bed tonight and wake up as Dipa Ma tomorrow, or I'm going to wake up as the Dalai Lama. I wish it could happen, but it's not going to happen.

So the personality is somewhat consistent, and it's not easy to change, as you know from observing your thoughts and feelings and so on for all these weeks. It's not easy to change personality because these habits of mind, which have worn a groove, have lots of momentum. There's a karmic momentum to all these habits of mind.

Here's a quote from the Buddha, and I'm going to use the word action rather than karma, but it's the same thing: "Action makes the world go round. Action makes this generation turn. Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin." Living beings are bound by action like the chariot wheel by the pin that holds it to the axle. This is how fixed our habits of mind and heart are. Living beings are bound by our karma. We have so much accumulated momentum in these habits that has built up certainly over decades of this life, and maybe many lives before, that makes it hard to change.

But it can be changed. Nothing within this flow is fixed. The ignorance isn't fixed. The craving isn't fixed. The clinging isn't fixed. The becoming isn't fixed. All the kilesas are not fixed. They can all be taken out. So the purpose of the path is to transform these habits of mind.

And how do we do it? I want to move from the stream to a lake, and say that we are in a lake that was designed by M.C. Escher. And being designed by M.C. Escher, the input comes in one way, flows into the lake, the output goes another way, but it circles back in to become the input again. Right? That's the kind of lake Escher would design, isn't it? Going round and round and round with the same streams, habits of mind. This is Lake Samsara. And this is where we are. Our outflows become our inflows and we just repeat the same habits.

Now we come into Dharma practice. And what happens in Dharma practice is some new streams start to come in with new intentions and new volition: mindfulness, loving kindness, patience, generosity, sila, compassion, wisdom. So all these new streams start to come in and they start to affect the outflow. Now the outflow is not heading back the same way; it's heading in a new direction. And where the outflow is going is to the nirvanic ocean. You may not have known, but that's where you're heading. It's going to the nirvanic ocean because this is the purpose of the path. The path brings in new intentions that shape things in a totally new way in the direction of freedom.

So I'm going to close with this quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj, who's an Indian Advaita Vedanta teacher who lived in the last century. A wonderful teacher who mostly taught in dialogue. He didn't tend to give talks, but he would entertain seekers and have dialogues with them.

In one conversation, Maharaj made this statement: "Your own will has been the backbone of your destiny." And the person in the room, the questioner said, "But surely karma interfered." And Maharaj said, "Karma shapes the circumstances of your life, but the attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

That's what we're doing. We're shaping our character.

in the direction of wisdom, love, compassion, and peace. And that character will shape our lives in completely new ways—unexpected, wonderful ways.

So let's just sit for a minute with this truth: ultimately, your character shapes your life, and you alone can shape your character.

[Silent pause]

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 82

Q&A on Kamma

Guy Armstrong · 21 min

In this dharma talk from a three-month retreat, Guy Armstrong addresses fundamental questions about kamma and its relationship to rebirth. Drawing from the Majjhima Nikāya accounts of the Buddha's enlightenment night, Armstrong explores the three insights that led to the Buddha's awakening: recollection of past lives, understanding of karmic consequences across lifetimes, and the destruction of the āsavas (taints).

The talk addresses whether belief in kamma requires belief in rebirth, explaining how the Buddha saw these teachings as intimately connected. Armstrong discusses what carries forward between lives in the absence of a permanent self, touching on the role of viññāṇa (consciousness) and karmic imprints. He examines the relative karmic weight of thoughts versus speech and bodily actions, emphasizing how mindful awareness can transform our relationship to unwholesome mental states.

Practical guidance includes understanding kamma as both constraint and liberation - while past actions create present conditions, meditation practice can 'undo' kamma through mindful witnessing of mental habits. Armstrong encourages practitioners to appreciate their rare opportunity to encounter and practice the Dhamma, rather than postponing spiritual development. The talk concludes with retreat logistics and community acknowledgments, maintaining the supportive container for deep practice.

Good morning, everyone. I hope you've been sleeping well, practicing well, and feel rested.

I ended the sitting a few minutes early because I wanted to pick up the topic of karma this morning. There were some things I didn't get to in last night's talk, some things I promised and didn't address. I wanted to touch on them, and I thought we might do some live questions. In fact, the questions in the bowl were exactly about the things I had hoped we would talk about, so we'll consider that sufficient. I'll address some of the questions from the bowl, and then we have a couple of announcements at the end.

The first question asks: "To fully believe in the principle of karma, does it require a belief in rebirth?" It depends—that's up to you. But it's clear from the Buddhist teachings that the Buddha saw the two as very closely connected. Let me tell a story about the night of his awakening.

This account appears in detail in one of the discourses in the Majjhima Nikaya. There are a couple near the front—suttas 4 and 26—that describe his enlightenment in some detail. He sat under the Bodhi tree and resolved not to get up until he had understood what he was looking for. As the night wore on, he had three major insights. In describing all of them, he says, "When my concentrated mind was thus purified, bright, steady, malleable and wieldy, I directed it in a certain way." Malleable means it can be shaped or formed easily, like soft clay. Wieldy means it has power, like a lightsaber that can be effectively used.

The first thing he directed his concentrated mind to was the recollection of his own past lives. He said that with his psychic vision, he could see one past life, two, five, ten, a hundred, a thousand, a hundred thousand past lives that he had experienced. He reviewed them very quickly. That was the first insight of the night.

I'm going to add some interpolation here—this isn't described in the sutta, but I think it's likely it would have happened. After reviewing his past lives, the next question that would have arisen in my mind would be: why did they unfold in that way?

In the next insight, he directed his concentrated mind to understand why beings die and then get reborn in certain conditions. With his psychic vision, he could see many thousands of stories of people who had died and then were reborn, and how that unfolded the way it did. What he saw was that people who had embraced good conduct in the previous life had a fortunate birth in their next life, while people who had unskillful conduct were led into a painful birth. This, of course, is the basic origin of the law of karma. He doesn't use that term in describing this insight, but it's the basic seed of the teaching on karma. He saw it in his own vision before he was awakened.

Then what I think might have gone through the Bodhisattva's mind was: "Oh my gosh, even if I act really well in this life, I'm still going to be reborn. And that means dukkha." Remember that dukkha is birth, aging, illness, and death. This means that the wheel of samsara just keeps going and going for everyone—even one who acts as well as one possibly can act—the wheel of rebirth continues.

I believe this is what motivated the Buddha to seek something beyond birth and death, to seek the deathless. So in the final watch of the night—the last four hours—he took his concentrated mind and directed it to the destruction of the taints, which means essentially destruction of the kilesas, the destruction of all the unwholesome elements of mind. This happened for him right at dawn, when he realized the unconditioned state he had been looking for: the release from birth and death. This was the attainment of nibbana, of the release from all cravings. In that liberation, there was complete ending of dissatisfaction.

I think someone mentioned that he then spent the next seven weeks still by the Bodhi tree, enjoying the bliss of deliverance. Many more insights came to him during that time, and it was out of those seven weeks that he decided to teach the Four Noble Truths—his first and central teaching.

You can see in this account of the insights leading up to his awakening that there was the understanding of action conditioned by wholesome states leading to rebirth that is positive, happy, favorable, and agreeable. In the Buddha's teaching, in the Buddha's understanding, these two teachings on karma and rebirth are very closely tied. But it doesn't mean that they have to be joined like that for you.

The teaching on karma may make sense to you, but there's still skepticism about this idea of rebirth. When I came into the Dharma, I was coming out of a scientific background. My training was in physics and math and computer science. And this didn't hold any sway for me. But over years of living with this view, it's become really kind of obvious to me that it just makes sense. Basically, if there is still desire active at the time of death, that is going to carry something forward that will result in another birth.

In the Buddha's teachings, if one acts in a certain way, certain results will happen. One of the things he said is that if one is generous in this life, then in the future or in a future birth, one will be endowed with abundance. That is basically the fruit of generosity. If one cares for living beings in this life in a non-harming way, one will enjoy good health and a long life, either in this life or some future life. If one pursues wisdom in this life, the Buddha basically said by inquiring of wise people, that is interested to learn from wise people, then one will be reborn with a mind that leads to wisdom.

So basically the way that we acquire wholesome qualities in the future is to manifest them in this life. And then they grow in a future birth. So that's the basic teaching. And to me it just makes a lot of sense.

This is one of the Buddha's quotations about rebirth. Remember, he came out of an agricultural society, so these are agricultural terms: "Grain, possessions, money, all the things you love, workers, families, and dependents—none of these can you take with you. You must cast them all aside. But whatever karma is made by you, whether by body, speech, or mind, that is your real possession, and you must fare according to that karma. That karma will follow you just as the shadow follows its owner. So do good actions, gather benefit for the future. Goodness is the mainstay of beings after death."

So this is the potential promise and reward that karma offers us: Live happily now and that will set the stage for future happiness as well.

Now, when I was meditating in the early years and I was running up against a lot of emotional issues—you know, I had fear and insecurity and confusion, a lot of stuff going on—I thought, wow, I must have really engaged in a lot of unwholesome conduct for all this stuff to be showing up in my mind. What on earth have I done? Of course, when I reviewed my life in the 60s, that provided some answers.

But what I think about, if you have thoughts like that, is just to think how fortunate a birth you are having. How many people of the seven billion people on the planet have heard the Dharma, understood the Dharma, and found time to practice the path to liberation? All of you have incredibly fortunate circumstances that brought you here and have cemented your relationship to the Dharma. So don't take these passing emotions as being definitive of your past or your goodness or your conduct. You're all very, very blessed.

And then there's the question of if there's no self, what carries forward from one birth to another? Trungpa Rinpoche had a kind of funny answer to this. He said, what gets reborn are our bad habits. But that's coming from a view that our basic nature is pure. So that pure nature will always go with us. Call it pure awareness or original mind, whatever. That will always be with us. Then what gets reborn are some bad habits. But our wholesome qualities go forward too. He liked to be a little bit cynical.

So how does that happen? In the list of the aggregates, the one that the discourses show as continuing to some extent is consciousness—the fifth aggregate of vijñana. And it's not clear exactly how, because the Buddha didn't lay out a lot of these details. He didn't consider them essential to liberation. But there are discourses where he clearly lays out that the ground for a new being to arise is the moment of conception, being joined with a consciousness from a previous birth.

So in the Buddhist scheme of things, this is how we all got here. At the moment of conception, some elements of a consciousness from our previous birth got merged with that embryo. And then they grew up together. How that consciousness carries the karmic imprints isn't clear to me. He didn't describe it.

But somehow, consciousness, even in its impermanent nature—arising and passing, one moment conditioning the next, conditioning the next, conditioning the next—this rising, passing consciousness somehow carried karmic imprints that joined with the embryo at the time of conception and led to the being growing up with this combination of consciousness and physical qualities. So that's as much as is stated in the discourses about what happened with that.

Another question on rebirth: if we have many more lifetimes to practice, why do we have to worry about getting enlightened now? My answer to you is, how do you know that your next birth will let you practice the Dharma? How do you know that you'll be reborn in a land where the Dharma is available, where there are authentic teachings, where you have the leisure and understanding to practice to liberation? There's no guarantee. No guarantee.

And that's why it's so important to take advantage of this rare and precious opportunity to clarify as much as we can within the mindstream. And that clarification then will carry over, hopefully, into the next birth. But it's good not to postpone when the opportunity is here.

Another important question on karma: Do thoughts have less karmic weight or impact than actions of body or speech? Yes. By orders of magnitude.

The understanding generally is that actions of thought are the least impactful, actions of speech a little more impactful, actions of body most impactful. You can think this through with an eruption of anger. If you become angry at someone but you restrain it, that restraint itself is a wholesome action. So there is the anger, which is karmically unwholesome, but the restraint is karmically wholesome, and the mindfulness of it is even more karmically wholesome. So you've got other qualities there with the anger that make it a not totally unwholesome experience.

But suppose you shouted at somebody out of that anger. Feel this the next time—I hope it doesn't happen for you, but if it does happen, feel how that acting out with the shouting and the raised voice intensifies the impact on you. Taking a step like that more or less locks the anger into our body and mind for a longer period of time. You can feel this experientially if you act it out. And then if you went to the extent of punching someone, that's going to have a lot of repercussions—worldly repercussions—and you're really going to be stuck with that result for a long time.

So thoughts themselves, especially if met with mindfulness, don't have that negative a karmic impact. They're strengthening the groove, but if mindfulness is there with it, they're not making it worse for the future. They're starting to wear it down.

Nagarjuna was a great philosopher of emptiness. To my mind, the wisest author in the Buddhist tradition after the Buddha himself. He was a philosopher somewhere around 100 AD in India. And he said very clearly, basically, karma is undone by meditation. So as we witness these karmic habits with true mindfulness, that wears down their impact like nothing else. And then as we become more and more awakened, some of those habits are actually uprooted. So karma is ended through meditation.

And that's the freedom from the past. This path leads to freedom from the past—past hurts, past habits, past trauma. This way leads out of all of that into a fullness of presence in the moment that's uncontaminated by past suffering. Part of the beauty of this path.

A couple of announcements: Today, Dawn will be seeing people in her practice meetings as regularly scheduled. Most of us will see people tomorrow. Dawn will be meeting with people today, and her meetings will be in the afternoon. So please check if you're planning to see Dawn shortly. Roxanne will be offering sign-ups today, and her sign-ups will also be in the afternoon. So please check if you'd like to see her tomorrow.

And then I want to talk a little bit about the ending of the first half of the retreat. It is coming. It formally ends on Tuesday. If you weren't aware of that, you get the gold medal star for present moment attention. So we bow to you.

But some of you may have simply noticed that some of the group will be leaving on Tuesday. For those staying for the three months, your schedule remains unchanged. Every aspect of the schedule continues going forward, so pretend nothing's happening.

For those departing, the schedule will shift starting tomorrow. On Sunday afternoon and Monday afternoon, we'll do some integration work with the six-week yogis. This will include a return to speaking in a mindful way and listening in a mindful way. There will be talks and discussions about taking the practice from here back into daily life, along with manager's announcements relating to all the details of closing up your room and other logistics.

There will be a manager's talk tomorrow afternoon after a meeting with the teachers. After the manager's talk, Period One yogis are welcome to pick up your phones. Then there will be some time late in the afternoon for conversation. If you want to check in with anyone at home, you can retrieve your phone tomorrow afternoon after the manager's announcements. Sunday afternoon will also include time with teachers and some time for conversation.

Due to this transition, today is the last affinity sitting time for the LGBTQI community for the six-weekers. The LGBTQI sitting at 2 p.m. will continue for the three-monthers without interruption, but if you're a six-week yogi, this will be your last time with that group. It might be a meaningful occasion to join up with a community that has supported you and that you've supported. We hold it as a silent group, but it might be a time, if you wish, to bow to one another and acknowledge the support and friendship of that community.

The BIPOC group at 6:15 can continue through Monday evening, so that one is not closing now. Similarly, with the BIPOC group, if you want to acknowledge each other with a bow at the end of the sit, feel free to do that. I know it's been a good support for many people.

We have another beautiful New England day ahead. We're in the peak of the fall experience, so I hope you enjoy it mindfully.

CHAPTER 83

Introduction to Emptiness Retreat

Guy Armstrong · 49 min

> In this opening talk, Guy Armstrong introduces a unique retreat format combining silent vipassanā meditation with study of śūnyatā (emptiness), one of Buddhism's central teachings. He outlines how emptiness has evolved through 2,500 years of Buddhist thought—from the Pāli suttas through Mahāyāna developments like Prajñāpāramitā and Nāgārjuna's Madhyamaka philosophy, to Chinese Chan and Japanese Zen. The retreat explores emptiness as the absence of fixed, unchanging essence in both persons and phenomena, while examining how the mind becomes empty through letting go. Armstrong emphasizes balancing theoretical understanding with meditative inquiry, warning against grasping emptiness as a fixed view that could diminish compassion. The format includes twice-daily Dharma talks, afternoon discussions, and extended periods of silence to develop both investigation (dhammavicaya) and concentration (samādhi). Sally Armstrong and Gil Fronsdal join as co-teachers, each bringing different perspectives to this transformative teaching that reveals the hidden nature of reality while maintaining appreciation for conventional truth.

Good evening, everyone. It's lovely to see you all here tonight. I see a lot of familiar faces out there, people who've spent many, many hours in this particular hall, and also a lot of new faces that I don't know and look forward to getting to know over the week together. The three of us are very excited to be here. We've been planning this retreat for some time, and it's a topic that we all feel a lot of enthusiasm about. So I hope we'll be able to share that enthusiasm and have a terrific week together.

My name is Guy Armstrong. I'm one of the teachers here at Spirit Rock. And on my left, this is Sally Armstrong. The last name is not a coincidence—we're married. And on my right is Gil Fronsdal, who's the head of IMC Meditation Center in Redwood City. People often get us mixed up by name. So just again, I'm Guy. This is Gil. Those three-letter words starting with G are a little too similar, so we'll keep stating that.

We've been planning this retreat for about two years, and this is the first in what we hope will be a series of retreats here at Spirit Rock. We want to have one retreat every year that is specifically for senior students—something with a little bit different subject matter, not just the standard Vipassana 101 retreat, which we have here a lot. This is the first in an annual series. Next year, the theme will be the Abhidhamma, and that will be led by Steve Armstrong. So something to look for and put in your calendar if that interests you.

But this is a theme that we particularly wanted to bring to the forefront, to share something that has been important in our meditation and our reflection. The topic of emptiness has been one of the central concepts in Buddhist thought for the last 2,500 years. Maybe if you had to pick one concept, it would be the most often mentioned concept over all this time. Even as Buddhism has gone through many different evolutions from the early days of the Buddha and the Pali texts into the early Mahayana sutras, the Prajnaparamita and the writings of Nagarjuna, through the later Mahayana, the schools of the Yogacara or mind only, Chittamatra, and then as it moved out of India into China and the concept of emptiness infused the Chinese understanding of Chan and later in Japan as Zen—this theme of emptiness has been there running all along, although its interpretation and understanding have also changed over the centuries as it's moved from one culture to another.

The theme was enunciated more strongly in the Mahayana, that is the later versions of Indian Buddhism that migrated to China, Japan, and Tibet. But the concepts, the key concepts, the primary concepts are all there in the Pali works as well. So in the teachings of the Buddha, in the commentaries of the Pali scholars like Buddhaghosa, the concept of emptiness is found, is clearly enunciated, is developed from a few different angles. So it's very much there within our tradition of the Theravada.

Over this week, we want to look at a number of different ways the word has been understood and used over the centuries, but we'll draw mostly from the Theravada, partly because that's the lineage that we represent here at Spirit Rock, and also because it hasn't been pulled out or described so extensively from our tradition here at Spirit Rock. So it's something we feel we can contribute to the overall Dharma picture in the West.

As the write-up of the retreat talked about, I hope everybody understood, we'll be looking at this topic both in theory and in practice. That means we're going to connect it to readings, and I hope you picked up a copy of the study guide when you registered. If you didn't, hopefully the retreat managers will have additional copies. There should be enough that everybody has one. And we would appreciate it if you would bring this, which will form the main basis of our textual study. Bring it to the talks and later as the retreat unfolds to the discussions that we have. This will be what we'll read or study from.

But we also want to connect it to our meditation practice. The purpose of learning about emptiness is to free our hearts and minds. It's not just to become smarter or intellectually clever. So we want to find out how these concepts can inform our understanding. And that happens through our meditative inquiry. So we're trying to structure the retreat in the way that will nourish the best of these two approaches, the study and the meditation practice.

If you've looked at the schedule, you'll have noticed that most of the day looks like a regular retreat of sitting and walking. But unlike a usual retreat, we're going to have two Dharma talks every day. One will be in the morning at 9:30, the other will be at 7:30 in the evening, which is sort of the usual time that we do talks here at Spirit Rock. And there will be times for questions around both of these talking periods.

So this will be the opportunity for us to stimulate some reflection and for you to start to play with the concepts that you want to feed into your meditation. But then the rest of the day will be in silence and will be a standard practice of vipassana or mindfulness.

So we want to try to find this balance where there's enough silence and quiet time that the concentration develops so that you experience that stilling of the mind that you associate with your retreat practice. But we also want to put in enough conceptual content that it starts to spark insight for you.

And in this way, we hope to balance the factors of enlightenment. We want to put a lot of emphasis into the second factor, which is investigation. And we also want to put a lot into the sixth factor, which is concentration. You could say the investigation produces some of the arousing alert energy and the stillness and the quiet will produce the calming. So this is the balance that we're trying to find in this format.

And we'll see how it goes. I don't want to say we haven't done it before, but we haven't done it quite like this before. So it's a little bit of an experiment and we look forward to your telling us how it's working for you.

When you stop and think about it, this word empty is kind of a funny word to put at the center of a religion or a philosophy. It's not that appealing a word, is it? For me, it conjures up ideas of an empty cupboard or a glass half empty or an empty house. And it has a little bit of a bare and bleak connotation in English. So I've always wondered, well, was that something that's just lost in translation? How can a central philosophy be built on a word like that?

But in fact, the word that the Buddha used and the word that's been used in generations after is basically a daily, everyday word that means the same as our word, empty. So, for example, you know that famous quotation of the Buddha where he's pointing in the forest and pointing out places for the bhikkhus. He said, "Monks, there are these roots of trees. There are these empty huts. Meditate or you'll regret it later." So the empty huts - the word used is the same word as for emptiness. The Pali word is sunya. The noun form is sunyata or emptiness. So it was an ordinary everyday word in the Buddha's time. It's an ordinary kind of everyday word in our time.

So the meaning of this word is explained a little bit on page one in your study guide. You don't need to read it right now. You can feel free to read it later when you go back to your room. But we wanted to give a little bit of a description or explanation on page one so that you can keep referring to that as the basic sense or meaning of the word.

So when the Buddha used the word empty to refer to aspects of our experience, what is it empty of? What's not there? And as a simple way to remember this, you might describe it as empty of a fixed or unchanging substance or essence. This is kind of the simplest or universal meaning that we'll come back to again and again.

This has a few implications because if you look at what we take to be a human being, how the Buddha described a human being, a fairly important part of what we look at in meditation, it's empty of something. It's empty of some fixed core, some abiding, unchanging entity at the center. If you look at the phenomena of the world that come through our six senses, they're empty of some kind of lasting substance also. So these are two important ways that we're going to be talking about this word empty.

And a third important way, which we also mentioned in this explanation, is the sense that the mind can become empty through letting go of things that don't need to be there. You know how often our thoughts are involved in drifting into the future or looking back at the past, and we construct senses of existing and belonging out of those thoughts of past and future? Those don't really need to be there. And as the mind gets simpler, more focused in meditation, there's an emptying process that goes on. And this is also another key point that the Buddha was pointing to.

But a lot of our exploration is going to be around this sense that the world is not the way it appears to be. And this is kind of the promise of emptiness, that it can reveal to us some kind of hidden truth about the way things are, about the way we take ourselves to be, about the way we take the world to be.

So part of our reflections during the week will be inquiring into questions like, what is real? What's reality? What's real in a human being? What's real in the experiences through our senses? And therefore what's not real in those things.

Because these are kind of fundamental questions, one sometimes, actually I'll say often, in meditating on emptiness has a feeling that the rug is being pulled out from under one to greater or lesser extent. And this is one of the functions of this inquiry, is to see where have we assumed that there's solid ground where there may not be.

So as we start to pull that carpet out, as we collectively all work at pulling that carpet out, sometimes this material can be a little disconcerting, a little unsettling. What we thought was solid ground may not be. So just be aware that that is part and parcel of the investigation, and different feelings will come up about that.

And he said, in Tibet, people are poor, but in the West, people are suffering. And that was the end of that answer.

And I said, well, what do you think Western meditators most need to learn? This was my attempt to get something useful for our community. And he said, through the translator, "Emptiness." And that was the end of that answer.

So when Sally and I decided to do this retreat on emptiness, I thought back to that conversation with Mingyur Rinpoche. He felt that Western meditators particularly needed to understand emptiness. And I think there's wisdom in that assessment.

We in the West can be very solid about our sense of self, very solid about our opinions, very solid about our positions. We can get quite rigid in our thinking patterns and our emotional patterns. And the understanding of emptiness is particularly liberating for minds that tend toward solidity and rigidity.

It's a wonderful antidote to the kind of psychological and spiritual materialism that can creep into our practice—where we start to think that we're accumulating something, that we're getting somewhere, that we're becoming someone special through our meditation practice.

Emptiness cuts through all of that. It shows us that there's nothing to accumulate, nowhere to get to, no one to become. And paradoxically, this understanding can be profoundly liberating and joyful.

But as I mentioned, it can also be unsettling. So as we go through this week together, please be gentle with yourselves. Go slowly. Take breaks when you need them. Talk to the teachers if things feel too intense or if you're getting confused.

Remember that the point of all this is not to become a philosophical expert on emptiness. The point is to taste the freedom that comes from seeing through our solid sense of things. To experience directly what the Buddha was pointing to when he spoke of the liberation that comes from understanding the true nature of reality.

And that liberation is available to each of us, right here, right now, in this very moment.

He said, yes. End of that answer.

With the language barrier and everything, we weren't getting much conversation going. So we were walking around this path that's about eight feet wide around the top of Mount Tam, and I thought I'd try a different approach because I wanted to get to know him a little bit.

I said, "Can you tell me what's the difference between these two schools in Tibetan Buddhism—the school founded by Nagarjuna called the Madhyamaka, and the school of Dzogchen, which is a meditative school in the Nyingma tradition? What's the difference between the Dzogchen view and the Madhyamaka view?"

His eyes lit up. He said, "The first thing you have to understand is there are eighteen different kinds of emptiness, and I want to tell you about them."

So he sat us down right there on the path. All five of us sat in a circle—Mingyur Rinpoche, the translator, Sally, Mary Ann, and I. And he started going through the different kinds of emptiness and how that affected the view of the Madhyamaka and the view of Dzogchen.

So this topic can proliferate into a lot of talking and thinking, but we want to keep bringing it back to our actual experience. That will be our focus. While we're aware of the rich philosophical implications, keep bringing it back to how we feel it here and now. So don't worry too much about all the complexity that's available. We want to try to keep it relatively simple.

But because there is a lot of complexity, all of us will have our own perspectives on it. One of the things I look forward to is hearing what my colleagues are going to say, because I don't really know. We haven't talked about a lot of this beforehand. So you may hear one of us say things that the other person contradicts in the next dharma talk. I don't know.

We certainly have, as we've discussed a little bit going in, somewhat different angles on it. And we've selected the topics for our talks that reflect our personal interests. So I hope that will make it alive for you as well. But we have different views on how we understand it, how we apply it, how we meditate with it, and how we'll talk about it. So don't worry if there are some contradictions. There are grounds for differing views on this topic. But on the central views, I think you'll see that we all agree.

Just briefly, I wanted to say—and we'll talk about this more as we go—that as we uncover this hidden secret about the world, it doesn't deny the conventional way that we understand the world. The understanding of emptiness, the insight into emptiness, doesn't negate conventional truths.

I'll give you an example of how this can be misapplied. There's a wonderful quotation on the front page of the study guide taken from a basic Nagarjuna text: "Like a snake poorly grasped or knowledge inappropriately applied, emptiness viewed wrongly destroys a dim-witted person."

So it's easy to take hold of emptiness as a view and lose touch with another level of reality. I'll give you an example. I was watching television the other night, and someone was interviewing a politician who favors extending the tax cuts for the wealthy. You know, this is a topic that's really up in Congress and the administration these days. The interviewer, the journalist—I think it was CNN—asked the politician, "Well, why do you favor extending the tax cuts for the wealthy? Do they really need the money? Do the rich need the money?"

And the politician answered, "There's no rich, there's no poor. We're all interconnected," and he made this gesture. And I thought, that's applying emptiness wrongly. To negate the concepts of rich and poor blocks one's compassion, because on another level, there are rich and poor. And they're suffering because of the poverty. And they're suffering because of the richness.

Emptiness, when held wrongly—not seeing the immediate truth of it, but held as a fixed view—can close our hearts. It can have a dampening, reductionist effect on the world, as though we said, you know, normally we say this is a striker. This piece of wood wrapped in cloth is here to strike the bell and make a sound. If we look at it from the point of view of a quantum physicist, we say, "Oh, it's just atoms and molecules—just protons and neutrons bound at the center of the atoms and electrons orbiting at a great distance around them, and mostly it's space." And then we look around and see everything's just atoms and protons and neutrons. So what does it all mean? It doesn't mean anything.

But conventionally speaking, it still works as a striker. So conventionally speaking, there are still rich and poor. Often, it's important—or really helpful—to maintain the view of compassion, to keep unfolding the compassion as a practice within us as we deepen the understanding of emptiness. And that will prevent us from falling into this trap of grasping onto a view and applying it wrongly.

So compassion is a really important part of the understanding of emptiness. And we have one talk during the week on the connection of emptiness and compassion.

So this is basically just setting the frame of what we'll be doing during the week. As you look through the study guide, you can take a look at the kinds of topics that we'll be addressing, some of the material that we'll be studying and reflecting on.

And so now I'd just like to talk in a little more detail about the structure of the days as we go through them together. We will have two talks every day. Both will be preceded by sittings. So the morning sit will be from 8:30 to 9:15. We'll have a little stretch break, and then the morning talk at 9:30 will be an hour and a quarter, including time for questions and discussion. The evening talk—there will be a sitting at 6:45 till 7:15, a little break, and then an hour for a talk from 7:30 to 8:30, also including time for questions. So those will be the two main talking parts of the day.

Then most afternoons—not the first day, so not tomorrow, because we want to use tomorrow as a quiet day to settle—most afternoons at 4:15, there will be an hour time for discussion, mostly in small groups in the hall together. We'll seed the discussions with some exercises or questions. But it will be really a time for you to explore the meaning of the concepts as you understand them, as you experience them, and to share them with your fellow practitioners. So it's really a time for you to feel the working of sangha and share with one another from your own understanding and experience.

We've been doing a lot of this kind of work through the Dedicated Practitioners Program, which Sally has been running for a number of years now. So it's a style that I know many of you are familiar with and we're quite familiar with too. It makes a good complement for both the silent meditation and the lectures.

The rest of the day will be in silence, combination of sitting and walking. After the afternoon discussion, we'll close with a short sit so that the words can settle before we go into tea.

During the retreat, we will have regular interviews. Everyone will have two meetings, basically, with us. One will be in the form of a small group, and the other will be an individual interview. So those will start on Saturday with two days of group interviews and then two days of individual interviews.

As we go through the days, please do take care with the silence. It's really going to be the part of the retreat that brings the deepening, brings the factor of concentration that will allow the insights to go deep and be more transformative. As you get to know each other, as there's more talking during the day, there's going to be more temptation to speak to one another than on a regular silent retreat. So please take good care with holding the silence. You'll all find it a really valuable support.

Please do bring the study guide into the future talks and discussions. We'll be referring to the quotations and—did everybody bring a pen and some paper? Just want to get a sense. Okay, I think we can cover you all. We had asked that an email be sent to ask you to bring those. It wasn't able to go out in time, so it's our mistake for not getting the word to you, but we'll find ways to gather that.

And just one last word on logistics. Some of the sits are close to work periods, and I think particularly the sit after tea. There may not quite be enough time if you have a job after tea—and this is mostly pot washers and dishwashers—there may not be enough time for you to completely finish your job before the sitting. If you're one of those people who has work, then it's fine to come into that sitting a little late. Don't feel you have to stay outside, finish your work, and then are excluded from the sit. Because of the work period, if you need to come in a little late to the sit right after a meal, then feel free to do that.

Okay, I think that's all I wanted to say as a way of opening the retreat. I'm really happy to be here with all of you, looking forward to getting to know you and exploring this together. So now I'm going to turn it over to Sally who's going to talk for a bit.

So I'd also like to extend my welcome and greetings to all of you. As Guy said, it's nice to come in the hall and see both so many familiar faces, but also people that I don't know that I'm looking forward to getting to know. And I'm particularly happy to be at this retreat, teaching with Guy and Gil. Obviously more than good friends—one more than good friend and one good friend.

I appreciate this opportunity to work with Gil and Guy as a teaching team. Both are extraordinary dharma companions who bring their own unique gifts to our shared exploration.

I've been advocating for retreats like this at Spirit Rock because I believe it's essential to expand our offerings, giving people meaningful opportunities to deepen their practice and explore the full depth and breadth of the Buddha's teachings. This retreat represents an ideal beginning for our series of experienced practitioners' retreats.

Having served as one of the primary teachers in our Dedicated Practitioners Program through three complete cycles now—and knowing many of you have participated in that program—I've witnessed firsthand the transformative power of taking a specific dharma theme and exploring it through both meditation and dialogue. As we prepare to launch our fourth cycle, the interest continues to grow.

What sets these retreats apart is their interactive nature. Unlike our foundational silent retreats, these gatherings invite discussion, inquiry, and the kind of meaningful exchange that deepens understanding. For many of us, myself included, learning happens most effectively through dialogue—through the opportunity to ask questions, receive feedback, and engage in genuine inquiry together. This interactive approach creates a rich forum for authentic dharma investigation.

Even with the comprehensive study guide before you—filled with profound suttas that may initially seem impenetrable—please know that this teaching need not remain mysterious. I want to be clear about my role here: I'm essentially the "every person" on this teaching team. While Gil has formal academic training—didn't you complete graduate studies in Hawaii specifically focused on emptiness? And Guy, as many of you know, has read extensively throughout the suttas—I come to this material as a dedicated practitioner rather than a scholar.

I've read considerably but certainly not comprehensively. More importantly, I don't feel the need to know everything, nor should you. What I do know is that this theme of emptiness is profoundly important and entirely accessible. We can each understand what we need to understand for this teaching to become truly transformative—a gateway to deep awakening, genuine letting go, and authentic liberation.

This is the perspective I'll return to throughout our time together. You need not be a scholar or an advanced adept. The meditation practices we'll explore aren't obscure or esoteric—they're simply our regular meditation, approached through this particular lens. My intention is to present these teachings in ways that make immediate sense, that you can recognize and understand within your own direct experience.

What we're exploring isn't mystical or unknowable. Emptiness is a very accessible, understandable teaching. Naturally, at its heart lies profound depth and transformative potential, but we'll approach it organically, allowing understanding to unfold naturally.

All you need bring is your willingness to show up fully, maintaining an open mind and heart, staying present to what's happening right now. Everything else will emerge from this foundation. I'm genuinely looking forward to this week of shared exploration.

Thank you.

I'm certainly delighted to be here as well, and I suppose I'm the one who's filled with emptiness! Reflecting on this theme today, I'm reminded that a blank canvas offers infinite creative possibilities—you can paint virtually anything upon it.

In Buddhism, the concept of emptiness functions similarly. The word "emptiness" itself has been used not as describing a completely vacant canvas, but rather as pointing to something empty of any fixed, inherent meaning—which is, ironically, quite an "empty" thing to say about emptiness itself.

There are so many varied interpretations of emptiness down through the centuries and in the modern world. It's almost like a blank canvas onto which people have projected all kinds of interpretations and ideas about this beautiful word. But in thinking about that, I'm struck by how many people have found in the word emptiness something that's been incredibly meaningful for them—something that really touches their hearts, touches their intimate relationship with the world around them, their freedom, their compassion.

That's what I hope for as we explore emptiness together—that this won't be an abstract topic but something that will point us back to something quite beautiful in our hearts and minds, something that some people would call quite sacred, something that will touch you and be meaningful for you as we're here.

I think this is what this hall and Spirit Rock has been built for—for all of us to be able to meet ourselves, meet our lives in their depth, with all their struggles and sufferings and joys and possibilities for liberation. To find something really blossoming beautifully within us so that we can bring that out into our world as gifts to the people around us, to our community and our world. The topic of emptiness is really a beautiful way to hopefully access something that's quite precious and profound.

I want to emphasize that this is meant to be a retreat. I hope that all the talking we'll do—which is more than in usual retreats—doesn't distract you from this fact, or distract you from the possibility of using this time as a way to drop in, to touch into that which is most meaningful for you. To drop into that place where your heart can blossom and grow. My hope is that as you hear these teachings on emptiness, you'll be challenged by them, but challenged in a way that encourages you to come back to yourself, come back to your own direct immediacy of this life here.

In my Zen training, I loved that aspect of various emptiness teachings that pull the rug from underneath the places I stood. Rather than feeling like I was tumbling or falling and crashing, I felt like I was flying. So I hope that if some rugs are pulled, you grow wings in the process.

We have a beginning of a retreat. We have this formal way of starting, which is chanting the refuge and precepts. It's a way of collecting ourselves and collecting our intention to be here, of all getting on the same page. We create the retreat together.

We're the sacred custodians of each other's time here at the retreat. We support each other, we nourish each other, we protect each other, and we offer our practice as a gift to the people we're with.

In that spirit of collectively creating this retreat, we provide the basic support, the basic foundation that allows people to open their hearts, to look at themselves deeply, and to discover enough trust in life that at least here they're willing to look and open to some of the deepest places we can access.

The precept of not intentionally causing harm, not to kill, is very meaningful in a world where people often cause harm. The precept of not taking what is not given is very meaningful in a world where your things are usually not safe if you leave them on the street or leave them someplace. The precept of not engaging in sexual misconduct is very meaningful in a world where there's a tremendous amount of harm caused in the name of sexuality or ideas about sexuality. In a world where there's a lot of deceit, a lot of lying going on, it's phenomenal to come to a place where there's a group of people committed to being honest.

Here, there's more talking than usual because of the afternoon discussions and the question and answer sessions. Part of our understanding of the fourth precept is the idea of noble silence—that there are periods of time here where we're really committed to keeping the container and the stillness and the silence so as to allow something to bubble up and move through us.

In a world where people experience tremendous suffering because of alcohol and drugs, it's a phenomenal gift that we give our world—not just to our retreat, but to the world at large—that this is a place people know is a safe place from drugs and alcohol. It's a refuge and a support. We come here and try to create that container for all of us and for ourselves, to create the conditions of clarity for our minds and hearts so that some of this deep work can happen.

We call on the Buddha, we evoke the Buddha, we evoke the Dharma, we evoke the Sangha. Because we don't do this alone. We do it with the example of the Buddha, the possibility of awakening. We do it with the potential that we all have to have the mind free and awake. We do this together with the support of the practices, the teachings, and the Dharma. We do it with the support of community.

It seems very helpful to evoke and call and remind ourselves that we're doing something that people have been doing for many, many centuries. We're joining a beautiful current and stream of people who have offered the best of themselves in order to let the best of themselves come forth—the best possibilities of freedom, of compassion, of kindness, of goodness in their hearts into this world.

Retreats sometimes can be difficult, and it's good to remember that we're being held, supported by this wide field of goodness that is represented by the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha, and that is nourished by people living an ethical life, living by the precepts.

Since I understand that you're all somewhat seasoned practitioners, I'd like to invite you to chant this together rather than being led. There's the chant sheet so that if you don't know it, you can read along. I'll start and then you can join me.

[The chanting follows]

Thanks, Susie.

We want to finish the evening with a short sitting just to let the words and the energy settle back into silence. You have been sitting for a while already. If you want to just stand in your place and stretch for a few seconds, adjust your posture, please feel free to do so.

And we'll just sit for ten minutes or so, just as I said, to let the energy settle a little.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org.

CHAPTER 84

Formation of Self-View

Guy Armstrong · 1h11

> In this dharma talk from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong investigates the formation of self-view (sakkāyadiṭṭhi) and how our sense of personal identity arises through identification with the five aggregates. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching in the Middle Length Discourses, he examines the four ways we mistakenly regard material form as self: seeing form as self, self as possessing form, form as within self, or self as within form—patterns that extend to all five khandhas.
>
> Armstrong guides practitioners to observe how peaceful states in meditation often coincide with a weakened sense of 'I,' while disturbances typically involve contracting around 'I' and 'mine.' He explores the Buddha's declaration that 'the world is empty of self or anything pertaining to self,' explaining how this understanding leads to liberation from the burden of selfing. The talk includes practical guidance for recognizing the constructed nature of personal identity and cultivating the wisdom that sees phenomena as 'not mine, not what I am, not my self'—the path toward the unshakable peace of nibbāna.

So to begin this morning's session, I'd like to ask about your experience in the meditation we just had. We were looking at disturbances that come into our experience in meditation. What are they about? What are the different things that can upset the mind? And how does that feel in the body when the mind gets upset about something?

A couple people be willing to share anything you noticed.

"I notice that the ease comes with this sense of extension into space. And it's so delicious to rest there. Then to turn into the body, to notice the effect on the body of something—one of those thoughts that you don't know where they come from started. There was something about Harry Potter. So then my mind went, 'Harry Potter, for God's...' And as soon as that complaint or exasperation came, I understand now why we use the word 'upset' because it seemed to lift up and overturn this wonderful, easy, out there, in there. But mostly, and then with the non-deva realm experience, after quiet came, it was very interesting to observe how that right ear—for me the right ear—was still hypervigilant, kind of had that energy of checking, checking, and to feel how that settles the mind-body process. It felt like, well, I hate to say these things, it just felt like my body were not too... that there was again just an ease when the other thoughts did flow through. It was just continually surprising to me how it's all about me. It's just so much self."

Good. Thank you. So noticing that a thought brought a sense of exasperation—why that thought?—a sense of upset from the energy coming up, and then a way to settle back into that vast peace and ease, and a comment that many thoughts that came were all about me.

Anybody else? We'll take just one or two.

"Fatigue and then this thing which always happens and gets more and more over long retreats of this something comes up that causes this physical jerking. And I know over long ones I've practically gotten epileptic, so still not sure what that's all about."

Thank you. So sometimes it's a movement in the body that comes and seems to disrupt the sense of peace.

"Mine was like the first speaker where there's this real expansion and it feels like it can hold—it feels like it's kind of floating—it can hold any pain, any of the big hurts. There's room. And then when a thought comes, there's a real tightness, and it goes to the small me. So I'm straightaway relating it to me. And then the other thing I noticed was there's an ache in my gut, which I really confuse with hunger. So there's this real sense, oh, I could eat, and that would rest it. And then I could physically make the expansion happen again and hold it. So it was a really interesting thing to see that I could do that."

Lovely, thank you. So feeling the expansiveness, the peace of that, the contraction into the small me, and then with breathing being able to let go of that constriction, tightness again.

Okay, thank you all. We'll come back to this later in our discussion this morning, but I just wanted to pull out some of the common themes that sometimes we can hold those waves that come through us in the space or in the peace. Sometimes we can't. They're disturbing, they're upsetting, and in that there's a sense of contraction, a tightening, a narrowing, a focus. That's what the disturbance tends to bring, often connected with "I," and then that can be relaxed, expanded again, and retouch the peace and ease.

Good. Thank you.

So that's a good introduction to what I'd like to talk about this morning. The topic is the formation of self-view. And on the study guide, we're up to page five now. This, of course, is not a simple thing. How the self comes to appear seems to exist. It's not trivial. It's considered one of the roots of our bondage, as Sally talked about last night with the three characteristics. I would even go so far as to say it has kind of cosmic implications.

I don't want to sound too pretentious here, but when you think about this process of coming into human existence, there's a deep mystery to it that we tend not to reflect on in our day-to-day lives. But how is it that this quality of consciousness got joined with this element of matter that is our body so that the body can be in the world and yet pick up the sights and sounds and smells and tastes and sensations of that world and then re-display the world through our sense phenomena, through our sense creations, really? As the Buddha said, within this fathom-long body is contained the world, its origin, its end. How is that possible? It's really a mystery that no one has explained.

I like to think of it along the lines, just to kind of set the perspective for what we're working with, of different creation stories or creation myths about how this all came to be. Of course, the theistic version is very common in our culture. A god was there from the beginning and created all the rest of this. And who knows how it works, but God knows, so that's all we need to worry about. It's never quite explained how God came to be there, but we don't worry about that part. So that's one approach to the creation story.

The predominant creation story in our day and age is the scientific one, which is a materialist explanation that at one moment there was nothing, and then there was the Big Bang. And through the Big Bang, the universe exploded incredibly fast into forms of matter, probably just protons and electrons at that point. And over time, that material substance collected, formed stars. Through the explosion of stars, that debris created planets. Through the enduring of planets over the ages, water collected, and with heat and some form of electricity, maybe lightning bolts, in this cosmic setting, some life started to appear in that water just through chemical reactions, blind chemical reactions of nucleic acids.

And those one-celled organisms which first appeared on this planet over three billion years ago, according to geologists and biologists, grew up and became you and me. That's basically the story of Western science. How did consciousness come in? Where did consciousness come from? For me, there's something that doesn't quite make sense—that consciousness could come out of dumb matter.

So for people like me, there's an alternate creation myth. And this we might call the mentalist creation myth. And in this creation myth, mind was first. Not matter. Mind was first. And there's the sense—I'm not telling this from any particular text, but it's suggested by a few texts—that in the beginning there were no objects. There was no matter. But there was something that could be called a kind of primordial sense of luminosity or a primordial potential for awareness. And that's all there was.

This was a non-dual state. Because it's all there was, there was nothing that could be known by it. But you might say it knew itself. So because there was no other, there was only peace and bliss, immovability and non-duality. Then something stirred. Something stirred within this vastness of mind, something stirred that was a reaching for something different or something other. And then it's said that fragments of this luminosity or consciousness separated, lost the understanding of their source and went looking for matter, and ended up finding or creating—the story isn't quite clear—bodies and the world. The consciousness inhabited the body and then was able to look out and have contact through the senses of the body.

This is an alternate creation myth. So which way do you lean? Do you lean to a scientific materialist view? Do you lean to, let's say, a philosophical idealist view based on mind? I don't know. Both of them have their merits and neither one fully explains the situation that we're in. One explains the fact of physicality, the other explains the presence of consciousness or mind, but I regard them both just as stories, or if you like, myths, if they have that quality for you. But reflecting in this way kind of opens us up to the mystery of how this all got started and how we originated, where we came from.

So, what did the Buddha say about this? The Buddha said, don't think about it. He said the beginning of things is one of the four imponderables, along with the range of mind of a Buddha, the power of a concentrated mind, and the specific workings of karma. And he said that anyone who dwells on this and tries to figure it out will experience vexation and go mad. So maybe we should send a letter to the cosmologists and let them know.

About where we are now, the Buddha said that matter and consciousness lean on each other like two stocks of reeds that have been tied up and are leaning and supporting each other. If you take one away, the other collapses also. So if you take consciousness away from this system, the life force of the body will collapse.

If you take the life force of the body away, consciousness will collapse. So in the Buddha's view, it's kind of a middle way between these two ideas, and both are dependent upon one another.

But at any rate, somehow out of this mystery of beginnings, we have accumulated into these bodies. And we find ourselves born and sort of wondering, what's this all about? Rumi put it very well. He said, "Where did I come from and what am I doing here? I have no idea." That's kind of our situation when we start to wake up. We don't know where we came from and we don't know what we're supposed to do. But here we are in this human setting.

So our human setting is described by the Buddha in the quote at the top of page five. It says, "Monks, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life. It is simply the eye and sight, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and taste, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. Anyone who said they were going to describe anything beyond this as the totality of life would not be speaking of something they knew about."

So this is our situation. Somehow consciousness and form have become married, and the result is that we have contact through the six senses: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch. Mind objects refers primarily to thoughts and emotions. Can also include meditative states such as concentration, equanimity, feeling, perception. Basically thoughts and emotions.

So whatever it is that has urged us into this field of contact, this is our situation, and it's really what we're here for. I was on my first three-month course a long time ago, and one of my fellow meditators asked Joseph Goldstein, who was one of the teachers. She came up to him outside a formal session in the hall, grabbed him in a hallway one time and said with great urgency, "Joseph, why are we here?" And Joseph said, "Do you mean here on this retreat or here at all?" And she said, "I mean here at all. Why are we here?" And Joseph said, "Well, it's because you wanted to see and hear and taste and touch and smell."

That is kind of the Buddhist understanding. It's out of this longing for sense contact, for something different, for differentiation, that we have taken birth. Some kind of urge for those experiences. Nisargadatta Maharaj puts it this way: "Desire for embodied existence is the root cause of trouble."

It is, isn't it? Because as soon as we open ourselves up to this wide-ranging sense contact, as Sally talked about last night, we find that it's out of our control. We can't control sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or mind objects. So we're bombarded. This is what it means to be a sentient being, to be a human being. We're bombarded by a mix of pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral experiences at the six sense doors, and it happens all the time. All the time we're awake, at least.

Can you turn that off? Not possible. That's asking, can I go unconscious? Not possible in our normal waking hours to turn that off. And it's this constant bombardment of pleasant, unpleasant, neutral experiences that forms the ground for our reactive mind. It really forms the ground for self. So we sort of distinguish ourselves apart from what we see and sense and hear and feel. So that gives us a sense of difference, a sense of separation. This body is separate from other bodies.

And this sense of separation gives the being, gives the human being a sense of isolation. Scientific researchers have started to investigate this quality of isolation and found that it's one of the most painful things about being a human. And the more isolated one gets, the more direct pain is experienced as a result of it. Also, being in a body, we sort of become the custodian of it. We're the guardian of it.

We have to take care of it. And this can be a burden, too. We have to protect it, defend it, nourish it, feed it, keep it safe, and so on. So all of this is the burden of the aggregates.

We have this body. It exposes us to great potential for pain and suffering. And there's a sense of fear. Almost every human being, unless deeply trained, has a fear of dying, fear of death, a fear of this experience coming to an end. This is all part of the consequence of this embodied existence.

So finding ourselves in this situation, we make a project. And this is the central work of the self. The project is: keep only pleasant experiences coming and keep painful experiences away. That's our basic strategy.

If you look at how it's expressed from children, from an early age, as it continues through adolescence into adulthood, this is what we orient our life's activity around—keeping the pleasant coming as steadily as possible. Permanent would be good. Permanent pleasantness would be a good solution. But again, as Sally said, because of the truth of impermanence, that's not possible to arrange.

Or at the very least, if we can't have permanent pleasantness, let's have permanent absence of unpleasantness. So anything that comes into the field of experience that's of a painful nature, we want to push away.

This sets up the basic work of desire on the one hand and aversion on the other. And as you investigate the mental reactivity that comes in the middle of peaceful periods, this is what the reactivity is about—pulling toward us what's pleasant, pushing away what's unpleasant. These are the reactive movements of greed and aversion.

They're also accompanied by the third of the kilesas, the third of the tainted mental states, which is delusion, because we fail to see that that's what's happening. As we grow up, we think this is just a normal, natural, unavoidable way to relate to life. It's only when we come to meditation and turn our mindfulness to the activity that we start to realize—maybe it helps us get a little more pleasure, maybe it helps us keep away a little of the unpleasant, but we are paying a huge price.

And the price is constant activity, constant turmoil, constant effort to control the environment, to control the inner experience so that it's only pleasant and never painful. This is the project of the self. This is how we try to take care of our needs.

And these forces spring into the mind again and again and again—desire, aversion, and the delusion of not understanding. These forces combined are called craving by the Buddha. He summed these up as the force of craving: greed, aversion, and delusion.

This is a quotation from the Buddha: "Obstructed by ignorance and fettered by craving, beings have been wandering in this samsara since beginningless time."

So from the Buddha's point of view, this is not a momentary dilemma, a temporary dilemma, or a trivial dilemma. This is our inheritance as sentient beings. These twin forces of ignorance and craving are what propelled us into this embodied existence. And until we can resolve them, we are at the mercy of them.

So this is usually our situation as we meet meditation or spiritual practice, spiritual life of some sort. We start to feel the impact or the burden of this heritage. We start to feel the suffering that's involved in the turmoil of this approach to life. And we look for a resolution, a solution.

This is again from Nisargadatta Maharaj: "All yogas have only one aim: to save you from the calamity of separate existence." This believing ourselves to be separate is a calamity. This is the view that's responsible for all the struggle and turmoil. And we search for a way out of this extremely difficult and hard to resolve situation.

The suggestion, as Sally pointed to last night, is that this sense of separation is to some extent an illusion. Yes, the bodies are separate, but in many ways not much else is. Our beings interpenetrate one another. That's what sangha is for. You're part of my experience in this moment, and I'm part of your experience. Because of our ability to feel into each other's states of heart and mind, we share our beings with one another.

As we grow together in a sangha, we share our spiritual strengths with one another—our patience, our persistence, our loving kindness, our wisdom, our compassion. All of these are shared and felt within the community of sangha. So we're not entirely separate, but it looks like we are, and in the beginning we think we are because of this fixation on the view of self.

So one of the central inquiries in Dharma practice is to look into the sense of self—how it's created, in what ways it may be real, and in what ways it may be unreal.

The first thing we notice is that when we try to find it within our actual experience, it's not really findable. All we can find when we look are sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts and emotions, and mind. Mind in this context is consciousness, or what's doing the looking. So there are the experiences of the six senses and the knowing of them, the consciousness. That's it. There's no thing, no central entity that is the center of all that or experiencing all that.

William James said, "When I go to look for myself, all I can find is a tickling at the back of my throat." It's very elusive when we sit down and look. And the Dalai Lama said, "When something seems obvious, but you can't actually find it, it means that there's some delusion present."

So we are deluded about this thing we call I, which is the central feature of our existence. Almost everything we do and think about and care about has something to do with this I. And yet, we're deluded about it. So this suggests the first thing we should do in going to some depth in our Dharma practice is try to clarify this question: What is this thing we call I?

The confusion is revealed in our ordinary language. If I ask you, "How old are you?" it's not a hard question to answer. I would say, "I'm 62." But when I say I'm 62, what I really mean is this body is 62. My thoughts aren't 62—I just had some of these thoughts this morning for the first time. The thoughts aren't 62. My feelings aren't 62. They're being born right now and they're very much like a child's feelings in many ways. But the body is 62 years old. So when we say, "I'm 62," we're identifying I am the body.

But I could also ask you, "What color are your eyes?" And I would reply, "My eyes are brown." But this is a different relationship. Last time I was the body; now I'm somebody that owns eyes. These are my eyes. So now I become the owner of the body. So which are you? Are you the body or are you its owner? You can't really be both, can you? Or how many selves do you have?

We could also talk about it in relation to emotions. Somebody might ask you, "How are you today?" And you'd say, "I'm very happy, thank you," or "I'm sad today." So here, the I is the emotion—happiness, sadness, loneliness, fear, joy. But we could also talk about my joys, my sorrows, my happiness, my grief. And here the I becomes the owner of the emotions. So which is it? Are we the emotion or are we the owner of it?

So these are four different ways that the I manifests in our language, in our speech. And we tend to believe them all. That's what's so interesting. We don't normally see any contradiction in believing all of these.

And another central way that the I manifests, that we feel it, is that the I is located just behind the eyes, somewhere in the center of the head, maybe in the region of the brain, and it's what looks out on the world all the time as observer. And this is maybe one of the more deeply felt senses of I—the hidden observer.

One of the things I really enjoyed about doing practice in the style of U Ba Khin or S.N. Goenka was moving my attention through the whole physical body. Every piece being explored as fully as possible with really precise, minute, attentive mindfulness. I explored this area all over my head and inside my head and the feelings between my ears. I couldn't ever find that observer. Couldn't locate it.

Even modern brain research done through fMRIs that I'm sure you've read about also finds there's no central organizer within the workings of the brain. Many different independent activities are happening. There's no controller within the brain itself.

So here are five ways we might think of the "I." And this last one I would say is an identification with knowing, maybe an identification with seeing, because it's often connected with the eyes. And there's also no ground for that one. But it is interesting that we tend to attach the "I" to all these different kinds of experiences.

Let's take a look at quotation number 20, also on page 5. "Venerable Sir, how does personality view come to be?"

This term "personality view" is quite an interesting one. The Pali is sakkāya-diṭṭhi. It's the sense that one is a person or personality, and it's holding this view. Every time we express a word like "I'm 62..." and we haven't, let's say, seen through this false identification with the self as body, we're expressing a view about our personhood. Our person is 62 years old.

So this personality view could also be described as a self view or the activity of forming a self. Really what the person is asking is, how does a sense of self come to be formed?

And so this is the Buddha's answer: "Here, bhikkhu, an untaught ordinary person regards material form as self." Material form is all the matter in the world. It includes the body, but it's not limited to the body. It's also outside matter. But here, it might be useful to think of it for illustration as body and see how this works.

"Regards material form as self, or self as possessed of material form, or material form as in self, or self as in material form." And then he goes through the other five aggregates in the same way. "That is how personality view comes to be."

So let's just look at some of these. "The untaught ordinary person regards material form as self." Do we ever take the body to be self? Yes. "Or self is possessed of material form." Do we ever think this body is mine? "The eyes are..." "These are my eyes." "This is my health." "Or material form as in self." This is kind of an unusual one. When you think about the body, do you ever think about the body being within yourself?

So let me ask you, in terms of the meditation we did this morning, which was an expansive meditation, what if you identified with that vast awareness as being who you really were, and this body was appearing within that awareness? Might that be a way that material form was seen as being in self?

So if we identify with the vastness of awareness as being who we really are, then body appears to be within self. "Or self as in material form." This is kind of the sense of the observer. "Oh, I'm really in the middle of the head behind the eyes. That's where I'm located. I'm somewhere in the body."

So what the Buddha is saying is that in relationship to the first aggregate of material form, we identify or we construct a sense of self in any one of these four ways. And you can see this in your experience, especially the first, second, and fourth are very clear and happen all the time. But this is considered to be misleading or deluded.

And we look at quote number 19, which is just above that: "In whatever way they conceive [of self], the truth is ever other than that."

Again, we have this word "conceive" that there was a question about yesterday. I bracketed the words "of self" because they're not actually in the text. The text is just "in whatever way they conceive, the truth is ever other than that." But the commentaries and Bhikkhu Bodhi as a translator said that generally the word "conceive" is used to mean conceiving about oneself. So that's why I put those in bracket.

In whatever way we conceive of ourselves, the truth is ever other than that.

One of my teachers put it a little more directly. He said, "Everything you think is wrong."

So all these different ways—and then, of course, the Buddha goes through the other four aggregates in the same way—twenty different ways that identification is created, twenty ways that a view of self, a view of personhood can be created. The truth is ever other than that.

So what is the right understanding? We can look back to an earlier quote, number 11, which is on page three. To me, this is one of the most interesting of the Buddha's quotations on emptiness.

Venerable Ananda went to the Blessed One and said, "It is said that the world is empty, the world is empty, Lord. In what respect is it said that the world is empty?"

And the Buddha replies, "Insofar as it is empty of a self or anything pertaining to a self—that is why the world is empty." The Buddha then goes on to describe what is empty of a self, and it's all the six sense bases, internal and external, that we were just talking about.

So the world is empty of a self or anything pertaining to a self—or as the other translation I've often seen puts it, anything belonging to a self. This means that anytime we form and believe in these concepts of I and mine, we're not seeing clearly. This is the element of delusion that comes in.

There was another quote I think Sally mentioned yesterday. We're back on page five, quote number 14: "Nothing whatsoever is to be clung to."

Ajahn Buddhadasa offers a gloss on this in the next quote, number 15: "If one amplifies the meaning a little, it may be rendered as: no one should grasp at or cling to anything as being I or mine."

Because this is what we do, isn't it, when we take the body? We cling to the body either as being self or as belonging to self. And we have a lot of concern about the body, a lot of anxiety. We don't even like to get a little cut, much less lose a limb, much less lose our life.

Ajahn Buddhadasa continues: "As being I refers to the feeling called 'eyeing'—ahankara, the grasping at a soul or abiding ego entity. As being mine refers to the feeling called 'maying'—mamankara, the grasping at phenomena as being connected to ego or self."

I love these two words: ahankara and mamankara, which mean "eyeing" and "maying." We could think of it this way: The self is not a solid thing. We may have read a lot about Buddhism before we came to practice and think, "Oh, what I have to do is uproot the self." But there is no self there to begin with, so there's nothing to be uprooted.

The sense of self, though, can be felt. We can feel the grippingness, the solidity, the stickiness of the sense of I—my body, myself, my feelings, and so on. This sense of I is created, but it's not there from the beginning.

So we can say that the self isn't a noun. It's not something we're going to find within this mind-body process. The self is a verb. We could more properly talk about "selfing."

And so the question is: How does the self take shape? We create it.

How important this is, the Buddha described in the next quotation, number 16. He was in conversation with Sariputta, one of his chief disciples. I find this a very poignant passage because you can almost hear the Buddha's lament in it. You can almost hear it as a sadness about the efficacy, the usefulness of his teaching.

He says to Sariputta, "Whether I teach the Dhamma briefly or at length, those who understand it are hard to find." Remember, this was his concern about whether to teach in the first place. He said beings have a lot of dust in their eyes—they won't get it. And here he's been teaching for quite a while, and he says, "Those who understand it are hard to find."

Sariputta replies, "Then, oh Blessed One, now is the time for it. Now is the time to teach the Dhamma in brief or at length. There will be those who will understand."

And the Buddha puts it very briefly here: "Well then, Sariputta, this is how the training should be done. Concerning this body with its consciousness, let there be no self-centered imaginings of I and mine and no such bias. With regard to external objects, let there be no self-centered imaginings of mine and no such bias. We shall then abide in the attainment of the heart's liberation and the liberation by wisdom."

This is a pointer to that state of peace you all were talking about, that you've discovered in meditation—and then the arising of disturbance around finding places for I and mine to fixate.

This is really the area, the state of peace as somewhere around the third noble truth. And the disturbance, the clinging, the making of I, somewhere around the first and second noble truths—some activity of craving that solidifies, constricts into a sense of self, a sense of I.

So take a look and explore through your meditations those times when there is a sense of greater peacefulness and see if at those times the sense of I is weak. Notice how the frequency of thoughts about I die down. In this state of peace, the actual sense of the I being formed is not so strong. When a disturbance comes, it tends to whip up the I thoughts—I or my—and see what that does to the sense of a self being there in those moments.

Another way to think about this in relation to the formation of self or self-view: does the I ever arise on its own? Do you ever have a sense where it just goes, "I..." Or is it always I and something else? Is it always about me in relationship to this pain in my knee, this mood in my mind, this relationship in my daily life, this view or opinion about something? The Buddha said there are four kinds of clinging: we cling to sense pleasures, we cling to views, to rules and vows, and to a sense of self or a doctrine of self.

This is interesting to see. As you rest in some degree of peace and then find a disturbance, is that disturbance out of your control or did you have some part to play in it? Are you simply the victim of these disturbances or are you encouraging them in some way? For there really to be a disturbance or suffering, we have to take hold of it. We have to pick it up.

Someone mentioned that it was quite possible for different thoughts, moods, emotions to arise and pass, but there not be any reactivity around them. Other times we know very well that same thought, that same emotion could come and we make a big deal about it. So somewhere in relation to these events of our experience, it's when there's a fixation and a holding on to one piece of the passing show that the self is being created.

We could really say that the act of grasping itself creates a sense of self. So these three concepts go really well together: grasping, clinging, and fixation. Actually, in most of the Pali translations, grasping and clinging are translations of the same Pali word, which is upadana. You'll meet it again when we do dependent origination. So grasping usually refers in English to the momentary act where we first take hold of something. Clinging refers to the fact that sometimes that grasping happens for a while and doesn't let go. But they're both the same movement—there's a taking hold of.

So out of all the different elements of the passing show of phenomena, there's a fixation with our attention on one element and then a taking hold of. And once we've taken hold of, some narrowing happens. And in that, some kind of self is born, even if it's just: I'm the owner of this thing I've grasped, whether it's a problem or a pleasure. I'm defined by this grasping. It creates the sense of an I, simply because we've taken hold of it.

You can start to see this in your meditation practice. When we grow up as children, generally we have a lot more space. If we've had a reasonably cared for upbringing, we have a lot more space in the mind. Then as we come into adolescence and the ego formation gets further and further down the road, we tend to be thinking a lot. And as we grow up into adults, that thinking gets rather continuous. Most of the thoughts end up revolving around I, me, and mine.

If we don't see them—that is the factor of delusion—if we're not seeing the construction of self, if we haven't seen through the false identification, then these thoughts, one after another after another, tend to create an ongoing steady sense of self. This is how the self starts to feel solid, because we think it again and again and again. And this is usually our experience as we come into meditation.

So as we come into meditation, mindfulness develops, the ability to be in the present moment, concentration develops, and this flow of thoughts starts to slow down. And then we start to see it's not continuous, but there's some space. We can tune into that space between two thoughts. Then we start to feel some of the peace that has been discussed because if you look at the space between thoughts and investigate its quality, it's generally of the nature of peace.

So then it may just be a brief moment of peace. More thoughts come in. We cling to those, the disturbance happens, we recreate the sense of self, we may be lost for a while. But as we continue our meditation, the mindful attention, the quality of concentration develops, the slowness happens, the sense of space starts to expand.

I'd say one of the greatest benefits of meditation, both in the short term and the long term, people describe as the development of the factor of equanimity. Equanimity is the last of the brahmaviharas and the last of the seven factors of enlightenment. And how it's felt is as a greater sense of inner space. We have more openness, more spaciousness, more acceptance of the coming and going of everything.

So as the equanimity develops, as the spaciousness develops, the self is being recreated less frequently, with less force, and because of the ongoing mindfulness, we're seeing it clearly.

We can see clearly the moment when a self arises out of a period of relatively little self. And then we can start to study that formation and how it makes us feel. Because normally the self and disturbance are connected. When selfing thoughts are going on and are strong, they're usually upsetting in some way because we're trying either to make things more pleasant or to make things less unpleasant. So there's that turmoil of activity.

Then we can start to see with what the Buddha described as wisdom. Phenomena come along, even if they're not pleasant, we don't have to make a self around them. So this is in the quote carried over at the top of the next page: "Bhikkhu, any kind of material form whatever... one sees it as it actually is with proper wisdom, thus: 'this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself.'" And similarly for the other aggregates.

This is the activity of wisdom. One sees form, feeling, perception, formation, consciousness—but one doesn't put the label "I" or "mine" on any of it. In coming to relate with our own inner experience, as the Buddha was suggesting, the words "I" and "mine" aren't even necessary. Because truly, all there is is form, feeling, perception, formation, consciousness. Or if you like the six sense bases: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects. There's no need for an "I" to arise in relation to any of it.

As our meditation practice deepens, this comes to be more and more our experience. These things are just arising, but they're not clung to as "I" or "mine." And this is wisdom—the wisdom that can liberate. Of course, sometimes the sense of "I" will still express itself, but when we're seeing clearly, we can see that and know that it's not true. We've investigated, we've seen the incorrectness of making that assumption, and we can let it go.

So when wisdom is active, there is not taking up the burden of self—even though there may be pain in the body, even though a difficult emotion may have come into the mind. The burden of self around these comings and goings goes out. And with that, the problem goes out.

Jack Kornfield had a wonderful meeting early in his practice days in Sri Lanka with an old monk who had a lot of happiness about him. This monk knew that Jack had trained in Thailand, and so he asked Jack, "Well, you've been practicing Buddhism. What's your understanding of the essence of what the Buddha taught?" And Jack said that the root understanding is that there is no self within this stream of phenomena, no fixed core. And the old monk said, "Yeah, no self, no problem." And he just laughed.

No self, no problem. When the self goes out, the problem goes out, even if there is still pain, even if there are still difficulties.

I just want to finish with a couple of quotes because I think they're so interesting. One from the Sutta Nipāta, one from the Middle Length Discourses: "Whatever be the phenomenon through which they think of seeking their self-identity, it turns out to be transitory. It becomes false, for what lasts for a moment is deceptive. The state that is not deceptive is nibbāna." And below: "His deliverance being founded upon truth is unshakable. For that is false which has a deceptive nature, and that is true which has an undeceptive nature: nibbāna. For this is the supreme noble truth, namely nibbāna."

As these phenomena of senses pass through us, we're deceived into thinking that they're objects. When the word illusion is applied to our misunderstanding, what we mistake is temporary passings for something real and lasting. This is the deceptive quality when we haven't seen fully with wisdom. Something that lasts for a moment we ascribe a longer duration to. Really all the phenomena of our senses, internal and external, are just temporary flashings. Sally was pointing to that last night in the talk on impermanence. But when we take them as enduring objects, then we think there's something that we can hang on to.

When we see how they're all simply coming and going, that that's really the truth of things, no one at the center, then our understanding shifts. And this is pointed to in this last quotation from the Visuddhimagga: "There is suffering, but there is no one who suffers. There is no doer of deeds, nor one who reaps their fruits. Empty phenomena roll on."

This view alone is right and true.

So by examining the self in this way and coming to see its constructed nature makes it easier to let go. When we can let go, we're returned to that place of peace and equanimity where everything has its life, all phenomena come and go, but we don't have to form a self-cling in relation to any of them. And when we don't form that self, then we're in alignment with the statement of the Buddha that the world is empty. We see the truth—the world is empty because there is no self or anything belonging to a self.

That's really what I wanted to share this morning, and we have time now for any comments, discussion, or questions.

A participant asked about the distinction between grasping, clinging, and fixation. I take fixation to be the moment where attention locks onto one of the phenomena that we're aware of and doesn't let go. So it's almost synonymous with clinging or grasping. Sometimes this word is helpful because it points to the fact that out of all the things that have passed through our experience, we fixated on one of them. We could be aware of anything at any of the six sense doors, but we've selected out one and fixed the attention on it, and then with grasping behind it, become fixated.

Now it's possible to direct the attention to something without the quality of grasping. We could select breath as a meditation focus and not have a quality of grasping about it. But when I use the word fixation, I mean singling out something and having some energy of grasping at the same time.

Another question arose about whether all thoughts are self-conceiving. Not all thoughts are self-conceiving. The Buddha uses the word conceiving, as I understand it, to refer to thoughts about self. There are many thoughts that are not self-conceiving or even self-referencing. A thought of generosity, a thought of loving kindness, a thought of compassion—these don't necessarily have to be motivated by any kind of selfing.

Someone shared experiencing fatigue and headaches when contemplating these teachings, asking how to work with that resistance. Many different hindrances come into the middle of meditation and into the middle of Dharma talks. I would work with it like any hindrance. The most important thing when it happens is not to try to keep focusing on the words and concepts or quotations, but to restore your inner balance.

I'd suggest letting go of the content of the talk and the quotations being referred to, and just be mindful of the sense in the body—the pressure in the head, the experience of tiredness that you feel. Breathe a little until you feel yourself coming back to balance. When you feel ready again and restored, then come back into the content. The main thing is to restore your own sense of balance first.

This is a really important and big topic, which is the integration, you could say, of the conventional and ultimate levels of understanding.

I had another whole piece of this talk that I just didn't have time for today, which is what the conventional sense of self means and how it's a valid thing to consider. For instance, the Buddha's teaching on anatta doesn't mean that everything in the universe gets coagulated into one primordial lump. We are still separate beings to some extent.

We have our own bodies, speaking conventionally. We have our own paths. We have our own hindrances. We have our own minds and emotions. For example, the Buddha became enlightened, but that didn't solve my problem. He clarified his mind stream. That didn't clarify my mind stream. So we are still acknowledged to be individual beings, with the responsibilities that involves.

From a conventional point of view, you could call this person a being, could call yourself a being, or you could call it a self. Conventionally, we could say this accumulation of mental and physical phenomena, which I call a being, I could also call my conventional self. That's perfectly fine as long as we understand that this is all changing. There's nothing fixed within it.

Then we come into the realm of what makes sense for selves or beings as modes of interaction. The discussion shifts to the realm of intention, because how we relate to each other depends on our intentions in carrying out actions of thought, speech, and body.

Here in the realm of intention, the important factors—wholesome, skillful factors to consider—are generosity, loving-kindness, compassion. Generosity, loving-kindness, compassion are really spoken of as relational factors. They're factors that have to do with one human being relating to another, with the assumption of different beings, separate beings.

That realm has its own laws. It's very important to understand it and work within it and not to discount it. It would be like the politician who said, "There are no rich, there are no poor, we're all interconnected." That's an example of using the ultimate level of understanding to deny the conventional.

So we want to be able, as practice develops, to work easily within the conventional level of human relations and responsibility and care for one another—care for children, care for family, for parents, and so on. That's a really important part of our human experience.

But if we don't join that with this other understanding that there's no abiding self or core in any of it, then we don't know how to free ourselves from the suffering or entanglement of the world of relationships.

Really, as we mature as practitioners, we want to be able to go back and forth between seeing the conventional way of looking, which makes for harmonious relationships and skillful development of our own hearts, and then also to be able to see this ultimate level of truth—of empty phenomena rolling on, coming and going—so that we don't cling.

The two come together because when we're not clinging, we're not disturbed inwardly, and that's a state that we're referring to as empty of self. That's a state from which generosity, love, and compassion come naturally. So the two really support one another. As we refine our outer relationships through generosity, loving-kindness, compassion, there's less inner turmoil for us to deal with. The mind calms more easily and we can see these deeper truths more evidently.

"In the past I was taught a method of focusing on the head, putting my awareness there as feeling that sense of ease and then noticing when any disturbance would happen. So that was focusing on one particular part of the body. In the exercise you taught us this morning it was more of a spacious awareness, containing everything. I'm wondering—I'm guessing that both are skillful under different circumstances and haven't experimented enough with the spacious practice to have much experience with that. But I wonder if you could give me some comments on under what circumstances you think either one might be skillful."

You know, there are so many different meditation techniques and all of them in our tradition aim to bring some natural sense of peace and ease. Some of them are very narrowly focused. A lot of people start off doing meditation on the breath just at the tip of the nose. It's a very narrow focus, but as it's developed, it brings about quite a lot of peace and ease.

Other people may feel the breath in the abdomen or the whole body. Some people like to work with the whole body posture as an anchor. Other people like to work with sounds or the vastness as we did this morning. Every one of those techniques is designed to bring in both the feeling of tranquility or peace and ease and the opportunity for insight. So it's a very personal question which one works best for an individual.

So I just encourage people to try different ones, see where they resonate, and then work with that for a while. In general, the basic guideline is that the narrower focus strengthens the quality of tranquility, while the broader focus strengthens the quality of relaxation. They both point in the same direction, and then it's simply a question of finding which one gives the right balance for your particular circumstances.

We need to stop there, as we have interviews in just a few minutes followed by a walking period.

A few announcements about the interviews, which will begin this morning in small group format. Gil is located in the council house across the drive where you registered. Sally is in room one, and I'm in room two. Those rooms are just beyond the bathrooms—outside the meditation hall, turn left down that corridor.

The purpose of the interviews is really for us to check in on your personal experience. We'd like to hear about how things are going for you personally—perhaps how you're settling into the retreat, how the meditations are developing for you, or how the themes in the talks are settling and integrating into your experience. The interviews aren't meant to be discussions of the readings or concepts themselves, though certainly as they affect you personally, that's welcome. Keep it personally based—that's really what we'd like to hear about in the short time we have with you.

One other announcement: we'll have practice leaders covering some of the sittings during the day. There's quite a full schedule for us as teachers with the talks, interviews, and discussion periods. For some of the sittings, we'll ask practice leaders to sit up front and lead the opening and closing bells. If you'd like to do that, there's a sign-up sheet on the bulletin board where you can volunteer for any of the available sittings in the next few days. We appreciate your help.

Gil is thinking very practically—half of you will be seen today in interviews. If your name wasn't on today's list, it will be on tomorrow's. He asks that if you don't have an interview this morning, perhaps you could let those who do have interviews go to the bathroom first. This will ease the beginning of the interview groups.

Thank you for your attention, and enjoy the walking period.

CHAPTER 85

Morning Instructions on Dhammavicaya (Investigation)

Guy Armstrong · 39 min

> In this morning meditation instruction, Guy Armstrong introduces dhammavicaya (investigation), the second of the seven bojjhaṅgas (enlightenment factors). He emphasizes that investigation in meditation is primarily non-conceptual, focusing on becoming intimate with our direct experience rather than analytical thinking. The teaching explores how investigation serves as the catalyst for paññā (wisdom) by bringing awareness closer to phenomena like the breath, bodily sensations, and mental states.
>
> Armstrong provides practical guidance on investigating two key aspects when disturbances arise during meditation: identifying what the disturbance is about (whether related to the five nīvaraṇas, bodily discomfort, or mental proliferation) and observing how it manifests in the body. He warns against papañca (mental proliferation) - the tendency for thoughts to multiply and take practitioners away from direct experience.
>
> The session includes a guided meditation that begins with establishing a sense of natural peace and ease, expanding awareness like vast space, and then mindfully investigating whatever disturbs that equilibrium. This approach provides practitioners with tools for developing both sati (mindfulness) and paññā through careful, intimate observation of their meditation experience.

This morning in meditation, I want to introduce the factor that I discussed on opening night: the factor of investigation. Investigation is the second of the seven enlightenment factors. The understanding is that as we start to pay attention to our experience, we become a little interested in what's going on, and then we apply this factor called investigation—dhammavicaya.

Investigation in the context of meditation is different from what it might be in philosophical thought or ordinary life. It's mostly non-conceptual. So what we want to do in meditation this morning is investigate our experience, but in a non-conceptual way. Of course, we have to use concepts to describe it. You'll use concepts to report it, even to describe it to yourself. But the basic movement is not about thinking.

The real process we're going to be looking at is something Gil talked about yesterday: becoming intimate with our experience. As you notice the breath, for example, where do you feel it? Where in your body do you feel the sensations of breath most clearly? As you experience the sensation connected with the breath, what is the physical sensation that you're experiencing? Is it tightness? Is it relaxation? Is it expansion? Is it contraction? We don't have to think a lot about that. What we need to do is bring this factor of awareness closer to the experience that we want to know about. This is the quality of intimacy.

How close can our attention get into the sensation of the breath? For instance, just right now, if you take an in-breath and feel your abdomen, can you bring your awareness, your attention, right into the sensation of that rising movement? As you breathe out, can you bring your attention right into the sensation of the falling movement? It doesn't require a lot of thought. It just requires coming close to our experience.

This is the main attitude behind this factor of investigation. As we come close with our attention to the experience, that's when we learn about it. We learn about its personal characteristic of expansion or relaxation or tightness or ease. We also learn about the universal characteristics that Sally talked about last night: it's always changing, and there's no self or essence inside it.

The purpose of investigation is to spark or ignite the factor of wisdom. When we think of bringing more wisdom into our overall practice—and wisdom is one of the key factors of mind that we're developing—the factor that we can initiate that starts it off is this factor of investigation. We'll be using it this morning and probably in a number of meditations throughout the week as a way of exploring our experience.

The tricky thing in using investigation is: don't proliferate. This is the trap. You start to get into it: "Let's see, I'm feeling that rising motion. Now, is that expansion or is that pressure? Let me see. If I look on one side of the abdomen, it feels like pressure, but that reminds me of where I had an operation when I was five years old, and I don't really want to think about that..." You see how the thoughts can take off.

As you investigate, keep thinking on a very tight leash. This requires some vigilance. You're going to use words a little bit to investigate, but you don't want to rely on the concepts to be the investigation. The investigation comes from the meeting of the awareness and the experience. So just be guarded, be vigilant about this tendency to proliferate with our thoughts. Bring it back to the direct experience of the moment.

In the meditation this morning, we're going to continue a little bit along the track that Gil suggested yesterday, which is to have this natural sense of peace and ease and then be alert to whatever disturbs it. And things will disturb it. You know, this is the second day of the retreat. In a normal week-long retreat, this is the evening we would give the hindrance talk.

Why? Because this is when they really start to wake up. So be aware that as you're adjusting to the retreat experience, the hindrances—sense desire, aversion, sleepiness, restlessness, doubt—are all becoming activated. Certainly today, if they weren't yesterday.

Just be mindful that this will be part of your experience during the day, part of your experience during the meditation. Don't expect that you'll be able to abide in forty-five minutes of unbroken peace and ease. If you can, I bow in your general direction. But if you can't, then you're like me this morning.

So the meditation instruction is going to be: rest in this natural peace and ease and observe the phenomena of the senses. I'll give some instructions on how to do that. Then notice whatever disturbs that natural peace and ease. Particularly, I want to ask you to investigate two things.

When a disturbance comes, number one: what's the disturbance about? It could be about a number of things. It could be about just one of the hindrance energies being present, and there's a discomfort from it. There could be a pain in the body that's starting to disturb your balance. It could be a thought about a daily life situation, something at home from either the past or the future. It could be a reaction to something that's happening here on the retreat, something that you don't like. It could be a judgment about yourself that comes up, a way that you don't think you're good enough or lovable enough.

So notice just what the disturbance is about. And the second thing to investigate, once you've noticed it: how does that feel in the body? When there's a disturbance in the system, it will generally be reflected in the body in some way. So how would you describe that? Is that a feeling of being agitated? Is it a feeling of being tight or tense? Is it a feeling of being hot or cold? Is it a feeling of being shaky or fluttery?

These are the two things to investigate. What's the disturbance about? You can sum it up really briefly: thought about home, judgment about retreat, something like that. And second: how does that feel in the body? Then staying with that, if it passes, just return to being with the natural peace and ease and the phenomena that are coming.

Those are the basic instructions. This will be our kind of entryway into working a little bit with this factor of investigation, the second factor of awakening.

Please sit comfortably. You can begin the meditation by just bringing the attention into your experience of the body. Sitting in a relaxed way in the here and now. Not needing to change anything about your experience. Letting the body be as it is. Relaxing as far as possible into the body as it is.

Relaxation is an expression of trust. We can trust the present moment in the way that it is. Let your mind be the way it is. Any mood that's present, notice it and allow. Any thoughts that are passing by, just allowing them to come and go.

As a way of suggesting this quality of natural ease, I'd like to invite you to let your awareness become really wide, filling the whole meditation hall, expanding beyond so that your awareness becomes like a big empty sky, or like vast space surrounding you on all sides—above, below. In this vast space, just noticing any sounds that arise there. Could be sounds from inside the room, the sounds of one another, sounds from outside, the sound of my voice. If there are no sounds, then just become aware of the vastness of the silence.

This awareness is like a big empty sky. All the sounds just appear and disappear. And then also becoming aware of sensations throughout your body. Sensations are also appearing, changing, passing in the same open space of awareness. You might have the sense that they're like little points of sensation, little points of feeling that are glimmering like stars in the sky at night.

Just allowing sounds and body sensations to come and go in this empty space of knowing. As you rest in this knowing, see if there's a sense of peace. See if there's a sense of ease.

Sometimes we find ourselves supported by this vastness. Things can arise and pass, and they can be held in a place of peacefulness.

Notice too that thoughts and moods can come and go within this space of awareness. Allow them to arise, express themselves, and pass through like clouds drifting across the sky.

We can simply rest with all this knowing of phenomena. There may be a sense of ease in it.

Then notice whatever comes to disturb that ease. What is the disturbance about, and how does that feel in the body? This is our investigation.

Remain clearly mindful of your present moment experience—sounds, sensations, thoughts, emotions. Investigation rests upon the foundation of mindfulness. Only when we're clearly in touch with this moment can we bring our attention closer to investigate it.

What's the nature of peace? What's the nature of disturbance? What's the response in the body?

This investigation into the very fabric of our experience reveals the wisdom that lies within each moment—the understanding that all phenomena arise and pass away in the vast, unchanging space of awareness itself.

CHAPTER 86

The Emptiness of Phenomena

Guy Armstrong · 57 min

In this dharma talk from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the Buddha's teaching on the emptiness of phenomena, drawing primarily from the Phenapindūpama Sutta (Connected Discourses) where the Buddha compares the five aggregates to insubstantial things like foam, bubbles, and magical illusions. Armstrong argues that this teaching on śūnyatā (emptiness) is present in early Buddhist texts, not just Mahāyāna literature as commonly assumed.

The talk explores how our experience through the six sense bases (āyatana) and five aggregates (khandha) - form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness - reveals the constructed nature of all phenomena. Armstrong uses scientific understanding of perception and personal anecdotes to illustrate how what we take to be solid reality is actually momentary appearances arising in consciousness without substantial existence.

Through careful investigation of our meditative experience, we begin to see how sensations, thoughts, emotions, and even visual appearances are constantly flickering in and out of existence. This insight into the dreamlike, rainbow-like nature of phenomena naturally leads to disenchantment, dispassion, and ultimately liberation from clinging. The teaching concludes with reflections on how understanding emptiness cultivates both wisdom and compassion, embodied in the figure of Avalokiteśvara (Quan Yin) who perceives both suffering and its empty nature.

So far in the retreat, we've talked quite a bit about the emptiness of self—the absence of an enduring or fixed entity within mind and body. We've explored the aspect of not-self, examining how self gets formed and how the sense of self comes into being.

Tonight I want to talk about the emptiness of phenomena. This is the other side of the emptiness of all appearances, a topic that the Mahayanas have claimed as their own for the last two millennia. Over that time, they've been criticizing us poor Theravadans, claiming that we don't have this understanding. They say, "You see, we Mahayanas have both emptiness of self and emptiness of phenomena. But you poor benighted Theravadins, all you have is emptiness of self. So you're only halfway there."

What I want to do tonight is take a key text from the Buddha's discourses that is all about the emptiness of phenomena and refute 2,000 years of mistreatment.

We've been investigating our experiences as human beings this week. Normally, when I look at a human being, I tend to see a person. When I see you all walking, doing your meditation, when I see you come into the hall, I think, "Oh, there's a person."

In the Visuddhimagga, it says that this is not very wise or very educated seeing. They compare this to a skilled butcher carving up a cow who, as he carves the different pieces of meat, keeps saying "cow, cow, cow." But a skilled butcher who knows the carcass very well would instead be saying "sirloin, tenderloin, rump, ribs."

So someone who is skilled in investigating the mind-body process would not just say "person," according to the Visuddhimagga. They would see it in more detail. They would see the components that they've become very familiar with. This is part of what we've been exploring over these days.

I suspect that when the Buddha looked at a person, he saw in one of two ways. The first way is as we read in the Sutta on Totality: "Bhikkhus, attend! I will tell you the totality of life. It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind objects. That's all there is." These are the six senses.

When I first read this, I thought it was very interesting that it outlines human experience, but I wondered: when I sit down and practice and become aware, I'm aware of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, sensation, and mind objects, but I don't usually notice eye, ear, nose, tongue, body as organs, and mind as an organ. Why do you think the Buddha put those in? Why didn't he just say the totality is sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, sensation, and mind objects? Did he miss the point? Was he hallucinating? Is there some importance to these other six things?

I'd suggest the reason he put them in is to show that sight, sound, and so forth are dependently arisen. They don't exist on their own—only because we have the sense bases as a body, a human being in a body, do we allow that contact and those experiences of the senses to arise. If he had just said there's only sight, sound, and so forth, it would have seemed like those existed independently. Including the sense organs shows the dependent nature of their arising. So I think it's an important piece.

That's one way we train ourselves to look through the six sense bases—both internal (meaning the organs) and external (the phenomena that arise in them).

The other key framework the Buddha used is the one we've been exploring today as Sally has presented it: the five aggregates—form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness.

Are these describing two different totalities? Is there one totality described by the six sense bases and another described by the five aggregates? No. They're describing the same totality of experience, just slicing it up differently. If you'd like to go through and make the association of how the six sense bases map onto the five aggregates, that's extra credit—you get a lot of merit for that. It's actually a fun thing to play with, to see how they line up.

I think it was Bhikkhu Bodhi who said that the Buddha tended to use the six sense bases to show how to cut through craving, since our desire and aversion tends to form around sense bases. But he used the five aggregates to cut through wrong view and establish right view. That's what we've been reading all along: "One sees with proper wisdom thus: material form is not myself, feeling is not myself," and so forth. So the aggregates tend to be used when the Buddha is teaching us the right way to understand the world in order to free the mind and heart.

Sally talked a lot about these five aggregates, and you all explored them in your exercise this afternoon.

Perception may be the most underrated faculty that we possess and not often talked about in our teachings. Notice that the very start of the chant we've been doing in the evening, the Heart Sutra, says that Avalokiteshvara Bodhisattva, when practicing deeply the Prajnaparamita, perceived that all five aggregates are empty and was released from all suffering.

This quality of perception is associated with insight. When we have an insight, it usually comes because we perceived something new about our situation, about our experience, about the world.

Here's another example where the Buddha uses the word in a powerful way: "When the perception of impermanence is developed and cultivated, it eliminates all sensual lust. It eliminates all lust for existence. It eliminates all ignorance. It eliminates all conceit, 'I am.'" This is powerful. Just the perception of impermanence developed and cultivated again and again leads to full awakening. So this perception is a powerful quality in us.

The other factor I wanted to touch on briefly because it will bear on our discussion tonight is consciousness or vijnana. As Sally explained clearly, it's consciousness that knows all the arisings of our experience.

The way I understand it happening is that when we have an experience like a sound, the sound is material form, the first aggregate. The knowing of it is the fifth aggregate, consciousness, which is mental. These two rise up together in a unified whole so that a human experience of hearing a sound has both components. It has a physical component, which is from the material world—the sound—and it has a mental component, which is the knowing of that sound.

They come up at the same time. They're joined together. I would say that as a human, it's a unitary experience for us. Hearing is just one moment of experience, but we can look at it as having both these aspects. There's a sound, which is physical, and there's the knowing of that sound, which is mental, and that's the activity of consciousness or vijnana.

Just as an example of how these two things can be together: in holding up this little bell, is it round or is it gold? It's both at the same time. You can't really separate them. You can see the two aspects depending on where you focus, but it's both at the same time—both round and gold.

Similarly, with an experience like hearing a sound, it's both things together. You can focus on seeing one or the other. You can focus on the sound or you can focus on the knowing of it. But they're inextricably linked together, arising together.

It's also said that in every moment of experience all five aggregates are present for us. Simple example: when you hear the bell at the end of a sitting, there's the sound, which is of the form aggregate. There's the feeling tone, and that sound at the end of a sitting is usually very pleasant—one of the most pleasant sounds of the day.

There is the perception. You recognize that that's the bell that ends the sitting, the clear recognition and understanding. Then there's usually a mental formation that accompanies. There's a thought: "The sitting is over." And I don't know about you, but so many times I hear that bell and the thought is, "Oh, now I could sit forever." Then there's a sense of great ease because the sitting's ended. Those formations of thought and the ease—that's the mental formation, the fourth aggregate.

And the knowing of all of those is the activity of consciousness. The sound, the feeling tone of being pleasant, the perception of bell, the thought and the emotion—consciousness knows each of those as they unfold.

So why is it liberating to understand our experience in terms of the five aggregates? Basically because we start to see as we investigate: that's all there is. There is only form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness. Examine as we might, there's nothing else there.

And so what's missing? The "I" that we normally think is at the center of all this, that experiences each of the aggregates, that owns them, that sees them.

But as we examine our experience closely, there's nothing else in the mix. The sense of I arises from a certain stickiness among all the aggregates coming together so rapidly. We don't see them apart, and they happen so quickly that it feels like an I is created by all that coming together. But when we look closely with refined mindfulness supported by concentration, there's nothing else there. There are only the aggregates.

I'd like to turn to the quotation on page eleven, number thirty-five under the heading "Emptiness of Phenomena." This is from a sutta in the Connected Discourses called "A Lump of Foam."

"On one occasion the Blessed One was dwelling at Ayodhya on the bank of the river Ganges. There the Blessed One addressed the bhikkhus thus: 'Bhikkhus, suppose that this river Ganges was carrying along a great lump of foam. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a lump of foam? So too, bhikkhus, whatever kind of form there is—past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a bhikkhu inspects it, ponders it, and carefully investigates it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in form?'"

Given that one of the key uses of the word "form" is this body, basically the Buddha is saying here that our body is void, hollow, and insubstantial like a lump of foam—and similarly for the external world. This is not our normal understanding of these things. So in what way could we say that a body is like a lump of foam?

A few years ago, I was teaching a retreat here—I think it was a February retreat—and giving a dharma talk at this same time of day. From outside, there came this kind of wrenching sound. It was a plaintive, tearing, heart-wrenching sound that happened in the middle of the dharma talk. I mentioned it but kept going and completed the talk. Afterwards, I went out of the hall toward the source where we'd heard the sound, and there was a young deer dead not far from the council house.

A couple of staff people had also come out to check, and they said they'd seen a couple of large dogs running away around the time that the deer was killed. It looked like the dogs had attacked the deer and broken its neck because its neck was bent back at a very unnatural angle. A bunch of us gathered around the deer and did loving-kindness for it, wished its spirit well on the journey, and held it as best we could. The caretakers who live on the land said they would arrange for the SPCA to come take it away.

The next morning, the body of the deer was taken down near the front of the property, near the parking lot where you all left your cars, and was left by the side of the road, hoping that the SPCA would come and pick it up. But they never did. So over the next few days, we got to watch what happened to the body of that young deer.

Every day, a little more of the body just disappeared. Some of it was decay, but for the most part, it was being eaten by other animals that were around and coming by and finding it. After a few days, all that was left of that deer was pretty much the hide, the hooves, the skull. All the bones had been picked clean. Some of them had been carried away. There was very little left. We were able to observe that process day by day.

That brought home to me that this body, too, is like a mass of foam. It can be here very substantially today and in a very short period of time just be gone—disappeared, decomposed, turned into other elements, turned into nutrients, gone into the earth, gone into other beings. It can vanish like that.

The words that Bhikkhu Bodhi translated as "void and hollow and insubstantial"—interestingly, the word śūnya or "empty" doesn't appear in this sutta. But I asked Bhikkhu Bodhi about these words. The word being used for "void" is the Pali word rittaka, which means "devoid of." The word being used for "hollow" is the Pali word tuccha, which literally means "hollow." The Buddha often used this word to describe or scold a monk who didn't really have much substance, who misspoke the Dhamma. The Buddha would call such a monk a tuccha purisa, a hollow man, not a person of substance.

Bhikkhu Bodhi said these two words, rittaka and tuccha, are synonyms for śūnya, synonyms for "empty." So even though the word śūnya isn't used here, the meaning is clearly the same. It could have been used here if the Buddha had wanted to.

Further on in this sutta—I wish I'd put it in the handout; I'm sorry I omitted it, and I can't understand how I left this out because this is a very interesting passage too—the Buddha compares the aggregates to a magic show. This passage goes like this:

"Suppose, bhikkhus, that a magician would display a magical illusion at a crossroads. A person with good sight would inspect it, ponder it, and carefully investigate it, and it would appear to them to be void, hollow, insubstantial. For what substance could there be in a magical illusion?"

In this continuation of the teaching, the Buddha takes us through each aggregate, asking what substance could there be in form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness? It's like a magic show, he tells us, and he beautifully summarizes this understanding with a poem that appears in our handout:

Form is like a lump of foam,
Feeling like a water bubble,
Perception is like a mirage,
Volitions like a plantain trunk,
And consciousness like an illusion.
So explained the kinsman of the sun.

"Kinsman of the Sun" is simply another name for the Buddha. But let me clarify one analogy that might not be immediately clear—the plantain trunk. A plantain is a type of banana tree, and if you've ever observed a banana tree, you'll notice something remarkable: it only grows once. After the fruit ripens and is harvested, the trunk decays and falls over because it lacks a solid core. The banana trunk grows up just once, and without that solid foundation, it inevitably collapses. A new one must grow for any more fruit to develop. It's a perfect symbol of hollowness, of emptiness.

So all five aggregates are compared to these profoundly insubstantial images: a mass of foam, a water bubble, a mirage, a hollow trunk, and a magical illusion. This is the very nature of our human experience.

What's the point of comparing our experience to a magic show? Well, magic is truly amazing when you don't understand how it's constructed. Have you ever watched a magician and been completely in awe of what they could accomplish? I have, and it's mind-boggling.

I was reading about Harry Houdini, the great magician from about a century ago. Houdini would perform this incredible trick repeatedly: people would tie him up with ropes and chains, binding his entire body with his hands secured behind his back. Then they would lock those chains with a padlock, place him in a wooden box like a coffin, and nail it shut. Finally, they would toss that box into a cold river where it would sink.

Houdini's feat was to free himself and surface without drowning. When he performed this escape, it seemed like pure magic because spectators witnessed every step—they saw him being tied, locked, nailed into the box, and thrown into the frigid river water.

But was it really magic? According to his own accounts, he had ingenious solutions for each form of confinement. First, the rope binding his hands was deliberately not tied tightly, allowing him to free his hands. For the locks securing the chains around his body, he concealed tiny wrenches in his mouth. Once his hands were free, he could retrieve these tools and, even in the darkness underwater, pick the locks.

Of course, this required time, so he had trained himself to hold his breath for three minutes, even in the shock of cold European river water. He would undo the chains and ropes, but still remained trapped in the boarded-up box. His final trick: one side was very lightly attached, and he could kick it out before swimming to the surface.

The crowd would gasp, "Wow, it's magic!" It's genuinely impressive, but once you understand the method, it loses some of its mystique, doesn't it? It's still remarkably skillful—I certainly couldn't do it—but you realize it's simply a collection of techniques, not magic at all.

What the Buddha taught about the formation of the aggregates follows this same principle: when we see them clearly as they really are, we become disenchanted. The enchantment of the magic show dissolves because we understand its workings. We comprehend the insubstantial nature of how it's all been assembled.

This is precisely why we investigate. We discover the secret of how this self, this being, has been constructed—how the sense of self gets built, how clinging attaches to various aspects of our experience, how that clinging can be released, how the emptiness of self can manifest in that space of peace and spaciousness.

Becoming disenchanted, the teachings tell us, the mind becomes dispassionate. And becoming dispassionate, the mind becomes liberated.

So this is why we want to see through the magical illusion in this way. Because it takes out the "I" at the center that we hold as a center.

There was one period of time a few years ago when I was on an extended period of retreat at home, and I was reading several different versions of this book by Nagarjuna, the Mula Madhyamaka Karika, which is referenced on the first page of the quotations if you need the title. The whole thesis of the book is emptiness. He unwraps one layer of substance and peels that away. You think you're getting a stand on the next layer of substance, and then he unwraps that and peels that away. Going through the twenty-some chapters of the book, little by little, everything gets taken away.

I was very into this analysis while I was sitting, and I was quite open and focused. And I had a dream about it one night. In the dream, I was standing in front of a full-length mirror, looking at my reflection. I asked the question: "Why is emptiness important?" And the image in the mirror replied: "Because it means that you don't exist."

Of course the body exists. Of course feeling exists. Perception, formations, consciousness. But this "I" that we take to be at the center of it isn't really there in the way we think it is. It means that I don't exist. So the world doesn't contain me as a problem. Again, this is pointing to the absence of "I" in the middle of it.

I want to talk a little more about this form being like a lump of foam, because again, this is hard to understand. One of the beauties of our particular meditation practice is that as we get focused, we start to investigate physical sensations really closely. As you investigate physical sensations closely and your concentration strengthens, what happens to the substance? As you're investigating the sensations in the body, as a retreat goes on, the substance tends to go away, doesn't it? You just feel kind of the momentary flickering nature of a sensation anywhere you turn your attention. You just feel pulsation, vibration, tingling, like little lights pulsing on and off. All you see is the nature of change—nothing fixed or solid in the whole experience of the body through the sense of touch.

When you turn your attention to other aspects of experience, you get a similar sense. Sounds become very fleeting. An airplane might fly by, and you can follow that sound until it's completely gone. But all along the way, you just feel its vibratory, changeable nature, and you feel it fade away until it's gone. Sounds are just momentary, arising and passing.

Tastes and smells are really hard to capture, aren't they? You ever go down and really want to smell the food, and you can smell it for a while, and then the smell just becomes harder and harder to find, as though it's floated out. Tastes are similar—an explosion of taste with the first bite, and as you chew, chew, chew, it gets thinner and thinner until it goes away.

Many of you report in interviews that as your mindfulness gets stronger, you turn your attention to a thought, and as soon as it's seen, it falls away. A thought collapses as soon as mindful attention is placed on it. This is a more difficult area, but we often hear reports of this too: even emotions that might normally come and be difficult to deal with—a flicker of anxiety or fear or anger—can arise and you see it so clearly that it just dissolves right in that moment. There's no way to sustain any sense of substance around it.

So through our meditation, through clear mindfulness and concentration, we start to see how all these senses are just coming and going, just flashing into existence momentarily and then passing away.

But for me, the experience that was always hardest to get that sense with was sight. When I would look out on the world, it seemed unchanging. If your eyes are open now and you look at this lovely pale yellow wall behind me, it looks pretty constant, doesn't it? If you touch the floor, it feels pretty solid. But sight especially doesn't seem to change. It seems to reveal a real and solid physical world that we are embodied within.

So how can we look into this sense particularly, which is hard to see the insubstantiality in? Science can be a little bit helpful here. Although science generally tends to posit a materialist and—in the nineteenth century—quite solid worldview, modern science has really revealed through quantum physics the space in all matter, the formation of fundamental particles like protons, neutrons, and electrons. There's a lot of space in every atom—more space than matter. That's one way that it suggests the emptiness of what we see.

But another way that is just a little more immediate for me is to think about how light works, how a sight arises. We know from science that for a sight to arise, light from some source has to fall on an object, get reflected off that object, come to our eye, land on the retina, which then transmits an electrical signal along the optic nerve up into a certain region of the brain where it ignites certain neurons. And then something really amazing happens: the consciousness of the sight appears.

What's the connection between neurons firing and consciousness happening? I have no idea, and I don't even know how scientists are going to start to solve that riddle. But for now, you and I know that that's what happens. Somehow, through this chemical interaction in the brain, consciousness reveals a sight.

When we think further, we realize if we go far enough into the earth, we go out the other side and there's only space. So the ground that we take for granted is only resting in the middle of vast space. The earth doesn't have any ground—it's just hanging in the middle of vast emptiness.

This ground is also just held in our consciousness. What we take as ground is merely a sensation of hardness. It's also held in consciousness, and we realize that consciousness itself doesn't have any ground. What is your consciousness resting on? Nothing. Nothing. Consciousness is just hanging there.

So all the phenomena of the world are simply arising in this consciousness which has no ground. We don't know what's actually out there, but we know that how we experience the world through our sense phenomena is insubstantial—only arising in consciousness.

As I understand it, our world of the senses is what the Buddha considered to be reality. This is the reality that he described and encouraged us to look at. I don't think he ever tried to comment on what kind of reality is out there. He was talking about the reality of the six sense bases and the five aggregates—everything coming through the factor of consciousness, which itself is groundless.

There's another fun way to play with this. If I ask you what color this book is, it's pretty clear, right? Let's say it's primarily blue. So we say the book is blue. But again, because you understand through science how light works, actually what's happening is that the blue is being reflected off the book to your eyes, and that's why we see blue. All the other colors are being absorbed.

So truthfully, wouldn't it be more accurate to say the book is everything but blue? The blue is being lost and bounced back.

So where is this color blue? Is it in the book? Or is it only in your consciousness? I'd say it's only in your consciousness. This color blue is not necessarily found anywhere in the book, but it's arising in our senses, and that arising is real.

So this is the world that we actually inhabit. This is the reality of our human experience. We don't know the real world beyond our senses. The world we inhabit is the world of our senses. It's a representation of reality held in consciousness.

Normally, what human beings do is assume that's the real solid world out there. And they don't take the time to reflect that what's arising is only an appearance in consciousness.

So sometimes the vocabulary is helpful to remember. Instead of talking about objects in the world—objects like this striker or objects like this book or objects like the wall—let's talk about them as appearances. Everything that's in our experience is just an appearance, and it's constructed from some interplay between whatever's there and our sense apparatus.

In this way, this is why the Buddha described consciousness as a magic show. The Tibetans called this whole thing a magical display. It's arising in consciousness moment after moment after moment. And the arisings have their own laws. There are physical laws and chemical laws and biological laws governing all the arisings. It's not chaotic, but it is kind of magical that this world keeps appearing.

It's often compared to a dream when we start to see this insubstantial nature. And it's kind of interesting to reflect—in just a moment of experience in waking life or in a dream, can you tell the difference? Now, of course, you know it's different when you wake up. Then you know it was a dream.

I remember a dream one Christmas Eve when I was about ten years old. I had a dream that I went downstairs into my basement and the basement of our house had been filled from floor to ceiling with toys. And they were all for me the next morning. And I was so happy. I couldn't believe it. This is like everything I wanted. And I woke up and then I knew it was a dream. It was so disappointing. But I knew it was a dream, so I could let go of it quickly.

But what if we knew this was a kind of a dream? Would we cling as hard as we do? The reason we look into impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, selflessness, is so we don't hold on as tight. Emptiness the same way. As we investigate these empty appearances and see their insubstantial nature, the more clearly that's seen, the less tendency there is to hang on because it's kind of dreamlike.

So there are a lot of similes that are used for this kind of insight. The ones in our text tonight: a lump of foam, a water bubble, a mirage, a hollow trunk, a magic show. You're probably familiar with a list from the Diamond Sutra, one of the Mahayana texts: "Thus shall you think of all this fleeting world, like a star at dawn, a flickering lamp, a bubble in a stream, an echo, a mirage, and a dream."

Which do you like better, Theravada or Mahayana? They're both pretty good, aren't they? And aren't they the same pointing? It's exactly the same pointing in this sutta as in the Diamond Sutra.

Another image that's used a lot is the image of a rainbow. It's a beautiful one because it's so clearly appearing in the sky and yet there's nothing to grasp there. There's actually nothing colored in the sky. It's just the effect of sunlight doing two reflections off of water bubbles—one refraction and reflection off the back of a water bubble, splitting according to the prism-like effect of the water bubble. It looks like there's something there, but there's actually nothing in the sky that's red or orange or yellow, green, blue, indigo, or violet. Just an appearance. It's also compared to a rainbow.

Of what use is this kind of insight? It doesn't solve our human problem immediately, and it takes a long time to incorporate—or you might say to integrate. But just like the Buddha said, if the perception of impermanence is cultivated and developed, it leads to the end of desire, the end of ignorance, the end of the conceit "I am." Similarly, these insights into the emptiness of phenomena—emptiness of appearances—lead in that same direction. But we have to cultivate them. We have to continue to develop them.

There's a wonderful text from the Mahayana tradition from a teacher named Atisha called the seven-point mind training. It's just a series of pith instructions, and one of these instructions is: "In post-meditation, be a child of illusion." What this means is when you're not doing formal meditation practice—when you're not practicing awareness in a serious way—when you're walking around, going to the meal, taking a shower, getting dressed in the morning, in post-meditation, post-formal meditation, be a child of illusion.

The meaning is: remember this insubstantial nature of things. It's not saying that everything is an illusion. The illusion is if we take them to be solid and real beyond representations from our senses. The illusion would be attributing reality and solidity to those appearances, forgetting that they're constructed by the senses and consciousness.

Seeing this is like an insight into impermanence—it's something we have to develop again and again. It doesn't solve the problem right away. There's a short passage from Leonard Cohen that I like from a song called "The Street": "I know the burden's heavy as you wheel it through the night. The guru says it's empty, but that don't mean it's light."

So you might know yourself that it's empty, but it doesn't immediately make it light. But in the long run, it does. It makes it a much lighter relationship with the whole world—with the body, with external things, with people, with emotions, with birth and death. Everything becomes lighter.

One of my teachers, a Tibetan teacher, put it this way. He said, "Everything that appears has no real existence whatsoever." That's maybe a little strong. But how about: everything that appears has no substantial existence whatsoever? It's all just a momentary flickering, triggered by the senses and brought into consciousness, held in consciousness. Just a momentary flashing into existence.

So how do we actualize this insight in our practice? As both Sally and Gil have said a number of times, we don't need to do anything different than what we're doing. It's the close attention to the details of our experience that reveal this stuff. It reveals the impermanence. It reveals the unsatisfactory nature. It reveals the lack of owner or controller or center of the experience. The closer you bring your attention to it and the more stable that attention is, the more these qualities will just be seen, just be revealed. Emptiness is one of them that shows itself in the same way.

Cultivating the perception of impermanence will help this seeing. Impermanence is kind of like the easiest way in to emptiness and to not-self. It's something that we can always understand, and change is fairly easy to see. So developing this perception of impermanence will start to open these other doors as well.

Emotions are sometimes another of the stickiest points. Even when you can see—oh, I get it, the wall's not solid—fear seems solid. Or anger seems solid. These can be the most impenetrable. It's good to practice when the mindfulness is strong and the emotion is weak. When that combination is there, that's when the mindfulness of an emotion can just make it go poof. And you can see how light and cloud-like it is.

At other times, the mindfulness isn't as strong. The hindrance is thicker. That poof doesn't happen. It's not possible to see the emptiness right then. But just keep practicing and the emotions get thinner. They get more transparent, easier to see through as we go.

So this may have sounded like a kind of cold and rational and maybe even heartless analysis, but it's not meant to be that way, and it's not that way for me.

The time I first became deeply interested in the aggregates was after my older sister died. I have two older sisters, and one of them passed away about fifteen years ago. She wasn't that old—she was fifty-two. She had been ill for a while, but not seriously ill. She had a chronic ongoing condition, but nothing life-threatening.

One evening, she went into cardiac arrest. The paramedics were called but could not bring her back. She died in the emergency room that same evening. It was a huge shock to all of us—she had three children who were in their late teens and early twenties, a tremendous loss for them and for me too. I had felt really close to her.

I went through what happens with grief: a couple of months of depression and darkness, not wanting to get out of bed in the morning because I didn't see the point. What confounded me about her passing was the suddenness of it, though death is always sudden. We may be preparing in the lead-up to it, but the moment of death is always sudden.

What I couldn't quite understand was how she had been so vital and present and real and herself just a couple of days before—I had talked to her on the phone, and she was healthy for her condition, relatively healthy. Then two days later, she wasn't here anymore. How could that happen? It boggled me. I couldn't figure it out.

The only way I started to make sense of it was to understand myself, and then by extension her, in terms of the five aggregates. Then I saw how this appearance of a being—a substantial, solid character with a personality—I saw how it got put together. And then I saw how it could come to an end.

Since then, it's not like death isn't a mystery to me anymore. I still wonder, where did they go? But the process isn't as boggling as it was before. And this reflection reveals tremendous compassion, because it's our shared human situation. The way these aggregates came together to make up this human being—in the same way, they can fall apart.

I want to read you a passage from a senior students' class some years ago, a group of Spirit Rock students. We were talking about this fact of emptiness of self, emptiness of phenomena, and I asked them to reflect on it at home. This is what one person reported in the next weekly class:

"It's spooky. I would look at everything, like this Japanese lamp that I love, and I'd see that it's just an appearance. Where that took me is that we're all appearances. When I went from an object and saw it's an appearance to a person and saw they're an appearance, it made my hair stand on end. But it's true, and it makes you both more compassionate and more vulnerable. When I look at my friend Mary, I see that she's changing all the time. When you start thinking like this, you have to be more compassionate because we're all in the same boat and we're also fragile."

So emptiness is not meant to take us into a cold vacancy, but really to awaken this heart quality of connection and loving-kindness and compassion. This is clearly in the teachings of our tradition as well.

You probably know the figure of Kuan Yin, who is the female representation of the bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara, whom we've been chanting about. Kuan Yin became the feminized version when the bodhisattva went to China. Kuan Yin is said to be the deity, the enlightened being, who listens to the ten thousand cries of joy and the ten thousand cries of sorrow in the world. She's always listening and always hears when we call on her.

Kuan Yin is a bodhisattva. That means she's not a beginning meditator. So Kuan Yin understands that there's suffering, but she also understands there's no "I" at the center of the suffering. Suffering arises when we try to hold on to what's changing, which is why one meditator described it as rope burn. Suffering is rope burn, but there's no one holding the rope.

She understands there's suffering, but no "I" who's doing the suffering. So her smile—her half-smile—is this beautiful balance of wisdom and equanimity, compassion and equanimity. Through seeing emptiness, the heart becomes less burdened, less caught. But out of this opening, the fact that our heart isn't burdened, come loving-kindness and compassion. That's Kuan Yin looking on the world with its joys and sorrows.

This quotation has been attributed to Kuan Yin in the myth of her being: "The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness."

Whom can they harm?

The winds of circumstance blow across emptiness. Whom can they harm?

So let's just sit for a minute, please.

So we have time for walking and then we'll have the last sitting a day with chanting.

CHAPTER 87

The Empty Nature of Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 1h08

> In this dharma talk from an emptiness retreat, Guy Armstrong guides practitioners in shifting attention from meditation objects to awareness itself. Drawing on the Thai Forest tradition and Yogācāra teachings, he explores the paradoxical nature of mind as both empty and knowing. Armstrong discusses how consciousness functions as the activity of knowing while the agent behind it—mind—remains unfindable yet present. He references teachers like Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Sumedho, and Tibetan master Śabkar to illuminate how this empty awareness can be accessed as a meditation technique for releasing clinging and opening to the heart's natural responsiveness. The talk addresses the concept of Buddha nature (tathāgatagarbha) as the potential for awakening present in all beings, examining different Buddhist schools' views on whether mind is permanent or impermanent. Armstrong offers practical guidance for resting in this aware emptiness while phenomena arise and pass, suggesting this approach as another pathway to the selflessness central to liberation.

The theme this morning is the empty nature of awareness. Normally in Vipassana practice, all the instructions and all our attention is directed toward the objects that we're paying attention to: breath, sensations in the body, sounds, moods and emotions, thoughts and so on. But in the meditation that we just did, the big mind guided meditation, there was an instruction to turn the attention not to the objects, but to the awareness itself.

When you make this shift from focusing on objects and then turn the attention to the awareness itself, this creates an inner shift in experience. People describe this shift in various ways: entering something like a hypnotic state while still remaining present and noticing; experiencing twisting, falling, shifting, a bit of confusion; questioning; loss of boundaries; feeling wobbly. In many of these descriptions, the word that comes to mind is groundless—this direction takes away some kind of ground. Others describe it as a kind of relief from the claustrophobic nature of the mind, like stepping outside in the morning.

One particularly insightful observation is that awareness doesn't care what comes in front of it. It could be anger, it could be a thought of universal brotherhood—it doesn't make any difference. Sometimes this quality can be a little confusing.

All these comments indicate that when we turn toward this direction, some kind of shift happens. Perhaps a common feature is a loosening of our normal fixation or what we're usually set upon, placing it into a bigger container. Sometimes it's not clear exactly what that bigger container is, and we might feel a little adrift or tumbling in the middle of that.

By clarifying what this experience is, we can make this a reliable part of our meditation. We can take some of the conceptual confusion out and lean more into that quality of relief or release and the impartiality that emerges. This is a valuable technique that I've found really useful in my years of practice.

It's important to note that Dharma teachers use the word "awareness" differently and have different meanings. Every time a Dharma teacher says awareness, it's always good to ask them what they mean by that, because it's a slippery word. Sometimes it's used to mean mindfulness. Sayadaw U Tejaniya in Burma has a book called Awareness Alone is Not Enough—but by awareness, he means mindfulness. He's saying mindfulness alone is not enough. What mindfulness needs is wisdom. Mindfulness is a means to awaken wisdom. Wisdom is really what liberates.

Other teachers use this term as consciousness, and this morning in our discussion, that's what I'll use it as. We'll use it synonymously with consciousness, but in a slightly different context. Consciousness we usually use to mean the knowing of an individual object—sight consciousness, ear consciousness, nose consciousness, and so forth. It's that which knows one thing arising. I'm going to use awareness to mean this quality that you were feeling into during the guided meditation: the extent of consciousness, the range of conscious activity, that broad, vast quality. But it's still consciousness.

It was very interesting to me, after doing years and years of vipassana practice, to discover that I could tune into this quality of consciousness itself. It reminded me of something I'd read in D.H. Lawrence. It's fascinating how artists sometimes go really quickly to the essence of what's happening in the mind. Lawrence had a passage—I can't remember it exactly—but it said something like: it's as though we've been sitting by a fire, and we've been really entranced and enchanted by the objects that are illuminated by the firelight, but we've never thought to look at the fire itself.

The role of awareness is to illuminate the objects of the world and of the body, but this is the time we can take a look at the light itself. What is that light of awareness or consciousness? What is its nature? This, in some way, is more or equally fundamental, equally important.

As we investigate this quality of awareness or consciousness, some of the confusion and drifting that was mentioned is an indication that it's not so easy to find this quality of mind. Because awareness is not an object. Consciousness is not an object. Everything else that goes on we can say takes form and is an object: sound, sensation, breath, thought, emotion. Even though emotion is a little insubstantial, we can still take it as an object and pay attention to it. But awareness isn't an object like that. It's what's knowing.

So when you're asked to become aware of awareness, that's a little bit of a double bind, and that's part of the confusion in this practice. Yet it can be really suggestive, and I think many of you felt some shift happen when you made even that attempt, even though it's not a clear meditation instruction.

This is from Ajahn Chah: If you have difficulty finding awareness, it's like you're riding on a horse and you're asking, "Where's the horse?" It's happening all the time. It's filling our world. It's making our world. And then we go, "Well, where is it?"

Ajahn Sumedho put it like this: Just like the question, "Can you see your own eyes?" Nobody can see their own eyes. I can see your eyes, but I can't see my eyes. I'm sitting right here. I've got two eyes, and I can't see them. But you can see my eyes. Looking in a mirror, I can see a reflection, but that's not my eyes—it's a reflection of my eyes. But there's no real need for me to see my eyes because I can see.

It's ridiculous, isn't it? If I started saying, "Why can't I see my own eyes?" you'd think Ajahn Sumedho is getting weird. So we may not be able to see awareness like an object, but we know that it's active, that it's functioning, because we're aware. There's no doubt about that, is there? As you're sitting here, you know you're aware.

Wei Wu Wei is a very interesting writer. He was an Englishman living in Hong Kong who started to get into Chan and Zen writings.

And then he crafted his understanding into these pithy little aphorisms. One of them that he offered is: "What we are looking for is what is looking." This captures the essence of our inquiry. We're looking for this quality of awareness, but that very awareness is what is doing the looking. That's not so easy to find.

Think of awareness or consciousness as this knowing of phenomena—the appearances that arise through our senses. It's not an object because it's more of an activity. Knowing is a verb, and consciousness is performing that function. That's its very nature.

But as you become familiar with this understanding—that consciousness is the activity of knowing—then a question naturally arises: If that's the action, what is the agent? What is it that's doing the knowing?

Joseph Goldstein likes to give this as a meditation instruction. You'll be walking along, and instead of saying "I feel the sensations in my feet or legs," he'll suggest you phrase it as "sensations are being known"—putting it in the passive voice so there's no "I." Sensations are being known. And then he poses the question: Known by what? What is doing that knowing? Can you look and find it?

What happens when you look?

There was a little shift in the mood of the room when I asked the question, "What is the agent?" Did you notice a shift in yourself? What was that shift? How would you describe it?

"Really looking," someone offered. Yes, really looking.

"Imponderable," said Betsy. "A koan."

"Not knowing. More spacious, less me."

Sarah added, "Dropping into it, dropping into awareness."

These are all excellent reflections of what happens. The mind kind of stops. The thinking mind pauses. The ego's constant self-referencing ceases, because this inquiry really is imponderable. And in that stopping, there's an intensified quality of looking and seeing. Like a koan, it brings that heightened sense of interest: What's there?

And yet, did you find anything? Could you locate that agent?

No.

This is actually significant. You may think it was frustrating, but it was actually profoundly significant.

This is from a Tibetan teacher named Shabkar, who was a great yogi in the early 1800s—actually late 1700s, early 1800s. He spent years and years in a cave in the wilderness, and then wrote many wonderful teachings. His book that speaks to me most deeply is called "Flight of the Garuda." This is his account of the looking:

"Now, come up close and listen... When you look carefully, you won't find the merest speck of real mind you can put your finger on and say, 'this is it.' And not finding anything is an incredible find."

Friends, to start with, mind doesn't emerge from anything. It's primordially empty. There's nothing there to hold on to. It isn't anywhere. It has no shape or color. And in the end, nowhere to go.

So this is a kind of discovery in meditation. When we look to find this agent and we don't find it, we just are in this space of knowing or looking or awareness, whatever you want to call it. That's an important move. That movement is a beautiful place to be, meditatively speaking.

There are a number of words in Pali that we tend to translate as "mind." I don't really want to get into that complication. There's citta, there's vijnana—more often translated as consciousness, but sometimes as mind—and mano. Mano is the word that's used in the six sense bases. When it says eye and sights, ear and sounds, and so forth, it says mind and mind objects. That word is mano.

But let's say for the purpose of our conversation, we'll use "mind" to mean this agent that's doing the knowing. So let's just define mind as that which knows. Other things that are part of mind's activity—like thoughts and emotions and feeling and perception—we'll call those the objects of mind, as described in those six senses. So mind is what we're going to use for this discussion. Mind is what's doing the knowing, which is consciousness. Is that clear enough?

The question is, I said a moment ago we looked and couldn't find an agent, and now I'm saying the agent is mind. But maybe it's mind that's unfindable. Maybe there is something, but we can't find it. I'm using "awareness" synonymously with consciousness, which is doing the knowing, which we can feel. We can feel the knowing taking place.

I asked you a moment ago if you knew you were aware, and finally heads nodded. So you know you're aware—that means you know consciousness is taking place. We can know consciousness. You can't find it as an object, but you can feel it happening. So think of consciousness as the activity of knowing. We can feel that knowing is happening.

If you doubt it, think about what it means to be unconscious. When you faint or fall into a coma or go to sleep or go under anesthesia, you're not conscious for some period. What does that mean? It means things aren't happening to you. You lose the awareness of things happening. But as long as you're awake and your senses are functioning, you know things are happening. That knowing is consciousness.

So we ask the question: what is the agent of consciousness? We can't find it, but we're going to use this term "mind." Maybe it doesn't even exist. Maybe I'm putting a label on something that doesn't even exist, but we're just going to play with that. That's what this exploration is.

So I'm asking you to take a little bit of a leap of faith. If I use the words "the agent behind consciousness," you could grant me that and we'd all know it might be fictitious, because you can't find it. But I just want to shorten it and use the word "mind" in this exercise.

Other times in general Buddhist language, we might use mind to mean something else. We might use it synonymous with consciousness. But just for this morning, I want to use mind to mean that which is doing the knowing. And then we want to explore whether that might exist or not exist, or if it exists, in what way it might exist.

Someone asked about experiences of hallucinating or being intoxicated, questioning how that relates to consciousness and whether it creates a separate person. The question touches on whether we're really unconscious when we're asleep or when we're drugged. I used that as a simple example of how to think about what being unconscious would mean - the experience of not knowing for a period.

This isn't really central to our discussion of whether there's consciousness present during sleep or dreams, which there probably is. But the general experience of not knowing is something we all touch from time to time. I was just trying to illustrate what knowing might feel like by contrast.

Let me clarify: the period of not knowing isn't really critical to our exploration. Whether you do or don't know isn't the central point. There have been periods when I fainted, for example, and coming out of the faint, there was a time I don't remember anything happening. So that's all I can say - I don't remember anything happening. It's not that nothing was happening. Maybe I was aware of something, but I have no memory of it. So it feels to me like nothing was happening and that I was unconscious then, but I can't swear to that.

If you can relate to the question of consciousness as being awake and knowing things, that's all we need to move forward.

This not finding - looking for the agent that we're calling mind and not finding it - is a sign, as Shabkar said, that there's some emptiness to it. This agent of mind, not findable, not discoverable, so we could say that points to its emptiness, its empty nature.

But knowing is happening. So this agent, what we call mind, you can't entirely say it doesn't exist because knowing keeps happening from it. We say that its nature is two-fold: it's empty and it's knowing. These are the two qualities of that agent that we're calling mind - empty and knowing.

There's a quote from the study guide: "This mind, O monks, is radiant, but it is obscured by visiting defilements." The Buddha also points to the sense of the mind being radiant. He doesn't exactly define what he means by that mind, but there is this sense.

This quality of knowing is sometimes described as awareness, sometimes described as luminosity, clarity, or radiance. All these words are used for this power that cognizes. The cognizing power has the ability to illuminate our experience, to illuminate phenomena as they arise.

The empty aspect of this mind is like space, as we saw in the meditation when we talked about this field of awareness as being like vast space, vast empty space. There are two qualities connected with this emptiness and space-like quality.

The first is that it can hold all the phenomena. Just as space holds all the phenomena of the physical world, mind holds all the phenomena of the sensory world, of the six senses. The second quality, because of its basic emptiness, is that nothing is there from the beginning. Anything that appears in this thing we're calling mind can also go away. Nothing is there from the beginning—it's part of its basic emptiness.

Part of what this means is that any afflictive emotions, any karmic patterns, any ignorance, any suffering aren't there from the beginning, so they can end. This is the side of dependent arising that we've been talking about from the beginning. Whatever is of the nature to arise also has the possibility of ceasing. This is the beauty of this empty quality of mind—anything that arises can also end.

When we do a meditation like this and we look at this nature, we probably see both these qualities together. There's an empty quality, which is like sky or space, and there's a knowing quality, which is the awareness, the functioning that illuminates all the phenomena. These two always go together.

We say that the basic nature of mind is emptiness and awareness combined. Ajahn Buddhadasa said we should call the mind emptiness, but because of its awareness, we call it mind. Its basic nature is empty from the beginning—everything within it can come and go. But because of this cognizing power, its functioning power, we call it mind. These two aspects of emptiness and awareness are always joined. They make up the nature, the basic qualities of mind.

We've been talking a lot during the retreat about when there's not clinging or grasping or selfing, then something shifts within us. Out of that place, which we're calling emptiness of self, there's more space. There's more equanimity. There's peace. There's ease. Also from that empty space, the beautiful qualities of heart come out easily, naturally—qualities like love, compassion, joy, contentment. When we're not bound up in the struggle of grasping and clinging and selfing, another way to that empty place is to notice this basic nature of mind. It's the same kind of space that we're talking about opening up. It's the same kind of inner quality that we're talking about coming to.

As we've been talking about emptiness of self, this looking for mind takes us to the same destination. Another way to empty of self is to notice the mind's basic nature, which is this combination of emptiness and knowing.

It's said that when we can recognize that—you look in, you see it's emptiness, but there's still knowing—then there's a third quality that's active, and that's called responsiveness. Sometimes this factor is described as unceasing compassionate activity. The meaning is that when we are empty of self, when we see that empty nature, then compassion can flow out naturally. Love can flow out naturally. Joy can flow out naturally.

When we recognize this empty aware nature, then it opens up the third aspect of the nature of mind, which is responsiveness or sometimes called unceasing compassionate activity. That responsiveness rests on the recognition of emptiness and awareness. It's another way of saying when the self is empty and you know it, then these beautiful qualities come out naturally, come out easily.

This is a continuation of that quote from Shabkar: "Mind's nature is vivid as a flawless piece of crystal, intrinsically empty, naturally radiant, ceaselessly responsive." This has the three parts we talked about—intrinsically empty, the empty aspect; naturally radiant, like the quotation from the Buddha, this is the illuminating quality that cognizes phenomena; ceaselessly responsive, which is the opening up of the beautiful qualities of love, compassion, wisdom, joy, and so on.

"When you say ceaselessly, does it imply permanent?"

Let's say always available. But we'll come back to that question. You could say there are actually two different interpretations of this ceaselessly responsive. One is that it's always responding by knowing. I've heard some teachers put it this way—it's always responding by knowing, and that's ongoing.

The other way that I've heard it explained is when there's the recognition, then it responds with the beautiful qualities of love and compassion.

So this threefold makeup includes the clarity aspect, a cognizing aspect, and an empty aspect. The empty aspect is seen by the clarity aspect. These three aspects of emptiness, awareness, and responsiveness together make up what's called Buddha nature.

I want to talk a little bit about what that word means. This concept was not in the Buddha's teachings. It was not in the early Mahayana. It came in the later Mahayana from a school called the Yogacarans, who emerged about the 4th century of the modern era in India. Sometimes they're also called the Chittamatrans or mind-only school.

The Sanskrit word that's been translated as Buddha nature is actually Tathagata Garbha. Tathagata is the word the Buddha called himself—the thus come one, the one thus come. So it means a fully awakened being. Garbha means womb. So it doesn't exactly mean Buddha nature. It actually means womb of the Buddhas.

These three qualities of mind are the ground or the womb from which fully awakened beings come, or from which full awakening comes. But in the original Sanskrit, the sense is more of a potential than of a fixed or abiding quality. When it's called Buddha nature, it feels like it's something fixed here and now. When it's considered as a womb, then it's more of a potential.

So think of it as somewhere in between these two. It means that every human being has this seed or potential of Buddhahood within. And more than every human being, every sentient being has these qualities. The dogs and cats and turtles and birds and cows and worms all have this potential with these three parts.

Sometimes people say that because there's Buddha nature, it means that compassion is permanent or a fixed part of us. But I understand it rather as the potential being there, but it comes out when circumstances are appropriate. Even when someone is quite awakened, it's not necessarily the case that compassion is present in every mind moment.

If an awakened heart looks on suffering, then compassion emerges. If an awakened heart looks on joy, then sympathetic joy emerges. If an awakened heart isn't being stimulated, then perhaps it just rests in equanimity. So there are many different beautiful qualities that come out of this responsiveness. Compassion is one, and that potential is there for every one of us.

So, is this quality of mind permanent or impermanent? Let's go back a minute to consciousness. Consciousness or vijnana is the fifth of the aggregates. Is consciousness permanent or impermanent according to the Buddhist teachings? Impermanent, yes.

All the aggregates are characterized by impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and not-self. So this quality of consciousness comes and goes. I would say the same for awareness, the way I'm using it here today.

But when you look at this field, does it seem to come and go? When you look now, is awareness happening? And when you look now, is awareness happening? The knowing of the awareness isn't always happening because it depends on our turning our attention to it. But every time you look for it, is it there?

Is awareness internal or external? As the guided meditation highlighted, awareness is both inside and outside in one of its ways of being. So I understand it as being kind of beyond the qualities of internal or external.

And to what extent we share it—my understanding is that there is some individuation even within awareness or consciousness, so that there's a kind of individual consciousness, stream of consciousness within each being.

And of course they interpenetrate each other, but there's some separateness to the consciousness.

Tony raised a comment about this awareness being here now, dependent on this organism. If we didn't have the body and the five senses, we don't know what would happen to that awareness. This raises the question: is awareness coming and going? When we fall asleep, is it not active?

Let's hold that question in the background and see if this next piece will help resolve it. What I'm going to suggest—and this is just a model, a way of looking that I don't want to nail down—is that this agent called mind might be permanent, or let's say not subject to arising and ceasing. But the functioning of that agent through knowing objects comes and goes.

This is just one model. Some schools like this approach; some schools within Buddhism hate it. I'm simply presenting one possibility here. This thing we're calling mind may not be subject to arising and passing, but its activity—which is knowing individual things—is always coming and going. The suggestion that there may be some degree of awareness through sleep, through anesthesia, through fainting, would be supported by this concept of mind being permanent.

And death? That's the big question, another profound inquiry.

Let's say at least for the span of a human lifetime, maybe this mind is not subject to arising and passing. But its activity as knowing is coming and going all the time. Then what happens at death?

First, there are different schools on this basic question. The core Theravadan schools that you might find influenced by the Abhidhamma and the Visuddhimagga—as you might find in Burma and Sri Lanka—would throw this concept out the window, rejecting anything like mind not subject to arising and passing. But other schools—many of the Mahayana schools, certainly the Yogacara, and to a certain extent Chan and Zen schools that have been influenced by Yogacara, including Dzogchen and Mahamudra—would go along with this view that this agent called mind is lasting.

At least—we'll just take it as permanent for the duration of this body, not subject to arising and ceasing.

In Theravadan Buddhism, there is one element that's not subject to arising and passing. What is that? The unconditioned nirvana. The suggestion in these other schools that hold mind as not subject to arising and ceasing is that mind and nirvana are synonymous. That's why this becomes such an interesting question.

What this says is that it's not awareness that's permanent. It's not consciousness that's permanent. Rather, it's the source of—or that behind, that which is doing the knowing—that may be permanent. Another way to say it is maybe nirvana has a quality of cognizance associated with it.

This is difficult to conceptualize, but let me give an example of how you might reconcile these two views. Consciousness is impermanent—we all agree on that. But maybe this source of consciousness is lasting.

Here's an image: Let's say you're on the outer edge of the solar system and you're looking away from the sun. Your back is to the sun. As you're looking out into space, what do you see? Let's say you're looking at an area where there are no stars, just for the sake of argument. What do you see?

Blackness.

Is it the black that's a color black, or is it the black that's an absence of light? It's a total absence of light, isn't it? But is there actually light in that space? Your back is to the sun. The area you're looking at is filled with sunlight, isn't it? It's pervaded by sunlight. So there's light but we don't see it—that could be considered the unborn at this point.

Now let's say from below a meteorite comes streaking through that space. Do you see it? Yes. There's a bright flash of light off that meteorite, which is the reflection of the sunlight off the object back to us. That's the born. That's an appearance. That's an arising in knowing. So in this example, mind is the sunlight filling empty space. Consciousness is that flash of light as the meteorite streaks through. As the meteorite passes away, what happens to the image of it? Gone. Arise and pass.

This is just an image. Analogies aren't perfect, but it suggests a way that this agent called mind could be lasting, but the activity called consciousness could come and go.

This is the presentation from some schools, and one of the schools that follows this is the Thai forest tradition. You'll find this concept strongly in teachers like Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Mahabua, Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Buddhadasa. They all express this in different ways.

I have a nice quote from Ajahn Jemnian about this. Ajahn Jemnian is a Thai forest teacher who's been at Spirit Rock for a number of years. This is from a dialogue we had with him in 1997:

"Within this body, there are the six elements: earth, air, water, fire, space, and consciousness. The best way to develop a great awareness—and the word he used for great awareness was mahasati, great mindfulness—is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

So there's that sense that the knowing continues because it's the activity of what doesn't pass. All the phenomena come and go. When we rest in the knowing, then we touch that peace. We have that peace that is unchanging.

Yes, that's a good question. The question is, within this faculty of mind, there's another quality—which is a will or intention—that chooses which phenomena to notice. What is that faculty, or how does that work beyond conditioning?

Many of those choices of volition are strongly conditioned. Maybe all are strongly conditioned. But it's certainly a central quality of being a sentient being. It's a really key part of the path also, because it's through that quality of intention or volition we not only direct our attention, singling out what to attend to or be aware of, we direct our actions of body, speech, and mind. So that becomes the whole field of karma or volitional action.

I'll talk about that tomorrow night—what this whole field of karma is and how through practice and sustained attention that force of intentionality gets smoothed down somewhat, gets refined and gets developed out of more wisdom.

Yes, I mean, it's quite possible. The comment was that in that video where the gorilla appeared but some people didn't notice it, likely that information was fed into our brain and our neurology and was known at some level, but we just didn't tune into or perceive it.

And maybe, therefore, knowing is permanent.

I think I would say that it may be the activity of knowing is permanent, but what is known keeps changing. And so with each one, there's kind of a new moment of knowing, new moment of knowing, new moment of knowing. But the activity may be ongoing out of this unceasing, the unceasing nature of the agent or the mind.

Yeah, thank you.

Let me just finish up one piece and then we'll open it up for general questions.

So the question is then—some people like this model, some people really don't like this model. Whether you believe it or not, it can still be a skillful means in meditation. In other words, this guided meditation that we did this morning on the big mind can work whether or not you believe there's such a thing as Buddha nature, whether you believe there's any ongoing quality to mind.

And the way that you can use it, if that meditation is helpful, is basically to tune into the quality of awareness. And if you can see the awareness and the emptiness together—this spaciousness, this lack of fullness, the fact nothing's been there from the beginning—you kind of understand that everything that's arisen can or will pass away, then that's another avenue to this emptiness of self or freedom from clinging.

So one of the main things that happens for me when I turn back to look at awareness itself is clinging drops. If it's very strong, then it won't. But in a lot of cases, if the clinging is weak to medium, and I turn back and look, that drops the clinging. So it can be simply a skillful means to empty the self through releasing some kind of grasping or clinging. So please try it in that way if this appeals to you.

How could you do it as a meditation practice? At any point—there doesn't need to be clinging there first—at any point, you can do that turning toward awareness. And there are a few ways to do it. One is to kind of look back. You know when Ajahn Sumedho talked about not being able to see his eyes? What would it be to look at what is seeing? So you can ask, who is seeing? And that's kind of a way to get back to that sense of awareness.

Another way is this spaciousness that we talked about with the big mind meditation. Getting in touch with the big field of awareness. The space-like quality. Sometimes a word that works for people is simply "aware of awareness." That does that turning. Turning back. So explore some different ways, see what works for you.

And then if you want to practice with it as a practice, you can make that turning, kind of notice that empty, aware presence, and then just rest there. And as you rest there, as Ajahn Jimnian was describing, everything can come and go. But this place of knowing—as he said, is the place of the deathless. That's always available. Anytime you want to drop into that, that's there. So it has kind of an undying quality.

So in that place of rest, everything comes and goes, but you're not moved. You're not stirred by them. Then, sooner or later, some kind of grasping will happen again. Some kind of configuration of self will come. When that happens, notice it. Sometimes just the noticing of it will release it and you're back into that emptiness. Other times that won't happen. In that case, turn the attention back to awareness again.

So develop a technique. This part of it is a technique of turning the attention to notice awareness. Once you've looked, then some seeing happens. This is the moment that's like the koan or the not knowing or the just looking. Then just rest there. You don't need to do anything from that place. But awareness still happens, knowing the things arising and passing.

So that's a sequence. Notice the awareness, the empty quality, rest there. If a formation of clinging or grasping or selfing happens, turn and look again and rest again. So that's a way to use this as a meditation technique.

Okay, so at this point we can open up if there are questions.

[Question from Sarah]

So I'm wondering if there's a next step. Because for me, the last few years has been about not just noticing awareness, but then going to "and who am I?" And then noticing that I am that awareness. So then I'm still sensing a duality in this approach here. And I'm curious if there's then, coming to "and who am I?" in that?

I mean, earlier, it's funny because earlier I was going to say, well, how about using the word mystery versus mind as the agent? And then you used the word nirvana. I was like, okay, that's closer for me. So for me, it's the mystery. And then what am I? I don't know.

That's been the exercise and the inquiry for me for the last ten years—who am I? And then realizing that. And I can go in and out of that, but coming back to the awareness still feels like duality versus, well, who am I? Oh, I am that. And then that eliminates the duality for me.

So the question or comment was about awareness introducing a duality. I guess I see it a little differently. I think that awareness and what it knows seem to always come together. There's always awareness and something being known together. Like we were talking about the bell—is it round or is it gold? It's got two aspects, but there's just one thing happening. So I don't see the intrinsic duality of awareness and phenomena. We can discriminate the two sides of that, but they come as a single experience. I guess that's the way I would express it.

So you see it as the same? You're saying that we're saying the same thing?

Well, I'm not sure that we're saying exactly the same thing, but regarding the duality—maybe you could say a little more about what duality you see in this description with awareness?

I guess I just see there's still a separation between this idea of me and then awareness. And so how does one reconcile that? And to reconcile it, I ask the question, who am I? And then that helps bring the... It's like duality disappears. Boom. I actually am that awareness. I am the phenomenon that is there, that is resting in that, that creates everything too. Like, yeah, there's just all of a sudden no separation. Not that I live in that place 24-7 at all. But the inquiry for me goes to who am I versus going back to what is awareness. It feels like there's still like a millimeter of separation going on.

I guess I'd say from a Buddhist point of view, the "I"—if we say "I am awareness"—the "I" isn't actually necessary. There's awareness and there are phenomena, but we don't have to place the "I" either in the phenomena, which is what we usually do—this body is me, that car is mine—or in the awareness.

There's a tendency in doing this kind of practice to identify with the witness or the awareness. And we say, "Oh, now I realize I'm not the objects, but I'm the consciousness." But from the Buddha's teaching, that would just be identifying with another aggregate—identifying with the aggregate of consciousness rather than the individual objects that consciousness is illuminating.

And that's why in the Buddha's description of the aggregates, there's not a need to place an "I" anywhere. So we don't have to say that we're the objects.

We don't have to say we're the owner of the objects. We don't have to say we're the consciousness. We don't have to say we're the owner of the consciousness. It's just all these different factors of mind and materiality coming and going and interacting. So I would look at it from this perspective: Is the "I" a necessary piece of that equation? Perhaps it's not.

A participant asked about free will and volition: "Given that intention is conditioned and everything else is conditioned, how does that leave space for free will? I have heard in Buddhist talks that there is space for free will. How is that possible, even given that everything is conditioned?"

This is obviously a profound philosophical question that has persisted through the ages. The more one investigates this factor of volition, the more one sees its conditioned quality, which really starts to undermine one's belief in free will.

But if one goes in the other direction and says that everything is deterministic, the Buddha analyzed this position and noted that it leads to a lack of effort. We give up trying because there's an idea of fatalism—we feel we can't influence the stream of intention, and therefore of karma, and therefore of outcome. So that's not a useful view to hold either.

What I've found on the path is that it's useful to act as though there's choice. We discover that one of the factors that influences volition more and more is the factor of wisdom. As we understand how the path works, then that understanding starts to bear on the arising of volition and the discernment about which volitions to follow and which to drop. The practice works if we act as though we have that choice.

The growth in the factor of wisdom and the spaciousness of mind that comes from meditation gives us more of a feeling of choice, and then the path unfolds. So without being able to resolve totally the question of free will or not, it's skillful to act as though there's choice.

Another participant observed that the very fact that we're talking about conditioning and developing the mind would suggest free will, which is what we're exploring in this retreat—conditioning the mind in wholesome ways, training it in wholesome directions.

A final question came about where Nagarjuna would stand on the idea of a permanent mind. I think he would toss it out completely. The one Mahayana school that doesn't tend to endorse this view are the Madhyamikas, who are followers of Nagarjuna. He was pretty relentless in his pursuit of emptiness.

CHAPTER 88

Emptiness and Karma

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

In this dharma talk from a retreat on emptiness, Guy Armstrong explores the essential relationship between emptiness (suññatā) and karma, demonstrating why cause and effect has been a central theme throughout Buddhist practice. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that "empty phenomena rolling on" arise and pass according to causes and conditions, Armstrong examines how karma operates as the "science of happiness" - the understanding of which actions lead to wellbeing and which to suffering.

Armstrong explains how karma, rooted in cetanā (volition or intention), connects right understanding to right action through the Noble Eightfold Path. He details the ten unwholesome actions across body, speech, and mind, and emphasizes how careful attention to the precepts creates the "bliss of blamelessness" that supports deeper meditation and liberation. Through stories ranging from young people in juvenile detention to Mahā Ghosananda's work in Cambodian refugee camps, he illustrates how karmic understanding applies universally.

The talk addresses common Western misconceptions about karma, clarifying that it doesn't mean "deserving" suffering or that all experiences result from past actions. Instead, Armstrong presents each person as an individual "mind stream" - unique yet constantly changing, where moment-by-moment intentions serve as our "rudder" for navigating life. This integration of anattā (not-self) and karma reveals how transformation is possible precisely because nothing is fixed, culminating in the Buddha's teaching about karma "neither dark nor bright" that leads to liberation through the Noble Eightfold Path.

From the beginning of our retreat, we've talked quite a lot in relation to this topic of emptiness about cause and effect. In a very early talk, Gil talked about this general form of dependent arising: when this is, that is. When this is not, that is not. We've often alluded to the Four Noble Truths—the cause of suffering, the end of suffering, the way leading to the end of suffering. Sally talked about the twelve links of dependent origination, the step-by-step causes that lead to suffering. So there's a reason that this has been a significant theme running all the way through.

Why is cause and effect such a significant theme in terms of emptiness? I think it's because when we take the "I" out of our understanding of the universe, then we see that there are just phenomena arising and passing according to causes and conditions. When we have the whole universe mapped onto the "I" view, we think there's an agent in the center of everything, that everything revolves around and is somehow influencing it, causing it, making it unfold, keeping it going. When we see that that "I" isn't at the center of everything, then we really see how everything comes and goes according to its own causes and conditions. And that's what the unfolding of the universe is: empty phenomena rolling on.

So we come this evening to another of these areas of cause and effect, one of the other great laws that the Buddha talked about again and again—the teaching on karma, the cause and effect of karma.

As we head back into daily life, our main field becomes not the field of silent contemplation, although we hope that still continues both on the cushion and off, but much more of our attention has to go into the field of action. So it's really helpful at this point in the retreat as we near an end to take a closer look at this field of outer action—actions of speech and body, and how they depend on actions of mind.

Let me tie this into the Eightfold Path. You know that the first spoke of the Eightfold Path is Right View. That's the beginning of the section on wisdom. The Eightfold Path consists of three sections: one on wisdom, one on ethical conduct, one on meditation. It begins with Right View. If we don't understand something, we won't take the rest of the steps. So it begins with right view, and the middle section is on conduct or action. What's the appropriate action to further the path? The Buddha spells these out as right speech, right action, right livelihood.

What's the link between right view or understanding and right action? There's one other piece of the Eightfold Path that goes in between those two: Right Intention. So we have right view, right intention, and then the area of right action. Intention provides the link between our understanding and our action. As we understand the world, so we act in it. And one of the key elements of right view or right understanding is the teaching on karma. So the Buddha is basically saying if you want to act appropriately in the world and use your actions to further your path, further your awakening, then right intention is the key component from understanding that makes that link.

I think it's for this reason that the Dalai Lama made this statement. Somebody asked him, "I'm going to be speaking to Westerners about Buddhism. Would it be better to talk to them about emptiness or about karma?" He said it'd be better to talk to them about karma. So we may have been wasting your time this week—we could have gone here a lot sooner. Because this is so important in the field of action and as it affects our whole path, it's important to understand this properly.

I sort of think of karma as the science of happiness. If we want to be happy, what action should we take? This is really the point of the teaching. This is the cause and effect relationship—what leads to happiness and what leads to unhappiness.

One of the things I have to say in talking about karma is that a lot of it I can't verify from personal experience. So I'm going to tell you some of the things the Buddha said about it, which he said that he could verify from his own insight. But it takes an extraordinary mind to be able to verify the workings of karma through direct experience. I'm not that person. My aim is to let you know what his teachings were, and then you can figure out how you want to relate to it.

I don't think it's my job to convince you, only to let you know what he said, although I think it would be to everyone's benefit if we were convinced. That's my intention—just to let you know what he said.

So I'm going to talk about basically four aspects in tonight's talk. One is what karma is, how the results of karma appear or happen, how karma directly relates to emptiness, and what's involved in the ending of karma. These are the four topics for the talk.

The word karma you probably know is Sanskrit. The Pali word is kamma. I might use either one tonight. And the word again is one of those simple words that the Buddha took—it just means action in Sanskrit or Pali. It's just an ordinary word that means action.

In the time of the Buddha, all these different philosophical schools had lots of different views and opinions about action. Action matters or it doesn't matter. There are consequences to action or there aren't any consequences to action. Action is determined already or there's free will in action. All these different philosophers and spiritual teachers would debate about all these points, but nobody really seemed to know.

The Buddha came along and made a unique contribution to the understanding of what action pivots on. And this becomes the meaning of the teaching on karma in his teachings. That is, he pointed to the crux of it as being this quality—the mental quality of volition. Or sometimes we say intention, but be aware it's a different word than the intention in the Eightfold Path. That's right intention in the path, which is samma-sankappa. Volition here is the Pali word cetana.

But I might use volition, I might use intention. As I'm using them in the rest of the talk, I'm referring to this factor that's involved in karma. This is quote 66 on the last page of the handout:

"Volition, O monks, is what I call action. For through volition, one performs the action."

Synonyms for volition: intention, urge, impulse, motivation. So you get the sense that what the Buddha is pointing to is the mental force or emotional force that drives the action to take place—this impulsive energy that the action comes out of, some energy of mind or heart that makes action happen.

The word karma refers to what we do in the present moment. We've heard this phrase "instant karma"—it's entered the pop culture. But that's really pointing to the result, and that's a different word. That word is vipaka. So we talk about karma and then vipaka, its result, which comes later. Karma is just the action in the present moment.

The Buddha considered—this was his teaching—that actions are skillful or unskillful depending on the quality of the volition. If the volition's a wholesome one, the action is skillful. If the volition's an unwholesome one, the action is not skillful. He said that the roots of the unwholesome are our three old friends: greed, aversion, and delusion.

So actions that are influenced by or under the spell of the kilesas—greed, aversion, and delusion—are considered to be unwholesome or unskillful actions. Given what we've been talking about this week, when greed, aversion, and delusion are operating, that's what we've been describing as craving or being caught up in the self. This operation of these kilesas makes the feeling of self, brings about craving and therefore clinging, and they blind us to seeing clearly. When we're under the spell of greed, aversion, delusion, we don't see so clearly.

When these are absent, or at least weaker, and we have non-greed, non-aversion, non-delusion—we could put those in positive terms—that means the forces in the mind are non-greed, more like generosity or letting go. Non-aversion or non-hatred is more like loving-kindness. Non-delusion is wisdom.

So the wholesome roots of action—when the mind is being shaped by generosity, by loving-kindness, by wisdom—then we trust that the action that comes is a wholesome action coming out of those volitions, those roots.

The Buddha described the action that he's talking about as happening in three spheres. Body and speech, clearly—that's what we normally take as action. But he also talked about mental activity as being action of mind. So the three spheres of mind, speech, and body are all in the area of karma. Even thoughts and emotions have karmic weight and can be either wholesome or unwholesome.

Now, just so that we wouldn't have to always be examining our volition to see what things to do or not to do, the Buddha also talked about a list that he called the Ten Unwholesome Actions. This is really helpful because it makes a very clear guideline of what he suggested not to do, to refrain from. The Ten Unwholesome Actions are divided into spheres of body, speech, and mind.

And he answered, "'Once when I was young, I shot a bird with an air gun. After I shot the bird, it occurred to me that this beautiful little creature was probably enjoying its life, and I had brought its life to an end for no purpose. For many years afterward, whenever I saw a beautiful bird, I remembered that negative deed. Even now, at age sixty-eight, that feeling still comes to me.'"

So here's the Dalai Lama, and he's still feeling remorse for this one action of killing a bird when he was a child. And Oprah asked, "'How do you handle that feeling?'" And he said, "'I purify the negative action by feeling regret, and I try to engage in more wholesome activities.'"

What strikes me about this exchange is the extraordinary level of sensitivity that the Dalai Lama has maintained. Here's someone who has devoted his entire life to nonharming, who has faced the destruction of his country and the suffering of his people with incredible equanimity and compassion. Yet this one childhood act of killing a bird still moves him to regret.

This gives us a sense of how refined this practice can become. Now, I'm not suggesting that we should torture ourselves over every small mistake, but there's something beautiful about maintaining this level of sensitivity to the preciousness of life and the weight of our actions.

The cultivation of this sensitivity is actually a sign of spiritual maturity. As we develop in practice, we become more aware of the interconnectedness of all life, more sensitive to how our actions ripple out and affect others. What might have seemed like small matters before begin to carry more weight as our awareness deepens.

This is one of the ways that ethical conduct and meditation practice support each other. As our mindfulness grows stronger, we naturally become more aware of our motivations and the consequences of our actions. And as we become more careful in our conduct, our minds become more peaceful and concentrated, which supports deeper insight.

The Buddha often emphasized this reciprocal relationship. Good conduct creates the conditions for good meditation, and good meditation naturally leads to more skillful action. They're not separate practices but aspects of an integrated path of awakening.

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued, "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

So I hesitate to say that this is exactly where freedom from remorse leads, but it certainly goes in this direction. And he's only had about fourteen more lifetimes than us to practice it, so he's a little bit ahead of most of us.

This is the area of karma—taking care with the outer action and the intention. The Buddha also talked about what happens, what are the results of taking that care. This is a famous passage, the opening of the Dhammapada, where the Buddha says: "Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with an impure mind, and sorrow will follow you, like the wheel of the cart follows the oxen. Mind is the forerunner of all things. Mind is chief. Speak and act with a pure mind, and happiness will follow you, like your shadow, unshakable."

This is the basic message of the teaching on karma. Wholesome actions lead to wholesome outcomes—that is, happiness. Unwholesome actions lead to unwholesome outcomes or suffering. That's the basic message. Again, this is one of the fundamental laws of cause and effect that works in the universe according to the teachings of the Buddha. You can see that this is also in that general form of dependent arising: when this is, that is; with the arising of this is the arising of that. It's just another form of that general teaching on cause and effect.

It's interesting that karma has become a common word in the culture today. Even if it's not quite clearly understood yet in the West, at least it's got a kind of fluency here.

A few years ago, I was teaching a class at a juvenile hall in San Mateo with James Barnes. We'd gotten an invitation from one of the nurses who worked with the kids to come in, and so we offered a six-week meditation class to them. We were in the maximum security unit—juvenile hall. If you're not American, you might not know this is where young people are held who are below the age of eighteen and not yet ready to go into the adult jail system before they're on trial.

So they were all awaiting trial. They were under eighteen, and they were awaiting trial. And in the maximum security system, they were charged with things like assault, grand larceny, attempted murder, murder. Some of them were sixteen, seventeen years old. They were in for really serious things.

You can imagine what it's like being that age, tossed into this holding pen, not knowing when your trial's going to come, not knowing what the outcome is going to be, and the fact you could be sent away for the next twenty years of your life. Think of the anxiety that those boys would be living with and the state of fear that they probably experienced. Combined with the fact that there are probably some fairly aggressive characters in that mix, you've got a mixture of fear and aggression that's really hard to live with, plus the uncertainty about their future.

So we went in and taught them meditation, and we taught it pretty much like we do in classes here. We started with the breath, we went into the body, and then we went into emotions. We taught them how to bring mindfulness to their emotions, and in doing that, that it was possible to create some space. Some of them became really motivated meditators—one, because they had a lot of time on their hands, but two, because they really needed the tools. They would lie down in their beds at night, this fear would just be going through their body, and they didn't know how to deal with it. Of course they didn't have any tools to deal with it, and mindfulness gave them a way to deal with it.

So they started to get a little receptive to us.

And those were rough places. I mean, here you have people who have lived through unimaginable trauma, who have lost everything—their families, their homes, their entire way of life. Many had witnessed unspeakable violence. The refugee camps were overcrowded, under-resourced, and tensions were running extremely high. There was a lot of anger, a lot of despair, a lot of people who had nothing left to lose.

So Maha Ghosananda made a decision that, from a conventional standpoint, looked completely foolhardy. He decided to go into these refugee camps—essentially alone, as a monk with no protection—and start teaching the dharma. He would walk into these places where people were carrying weapons, where violence could erupt at any moment, where the accumulated rage and trauma of years of brutalization were concentrated, and he would simply sit down and begin to teach.

Now, what's remarkable about this is that he was putting his complete trust in the law of karma. He believed absolutely that if he went in with a heart of loving-kindness, if his intentions were purely to serve and to help heal these traumatized people, then he would be protected by the natural law of cause and effect. Not protected in some magical way, but protected because kindness generates kindness, because compassion creates the conditions for safety, because when you approach others without ill will, you're much less likely to be met with violence.

And it worked. Not only did he not get killed—which many people expected would happen—but he began to have an extraordinary effect in these camps. People who had been consumed by hatred and revenge started to find some peace. Communities that had been fragmenting began to come back together. He would teach them the basic Buddhist practices—mindfulness, loving-kindness meditation, the understanding of karma—and gradually, the atmosphere in these places began to shift.

What Maha Ghosananda understood is something that goes to the very heart of Buddhist practice: that the law of karma isn't just some exotic metaphysical concept. It's describing something quite practical about how our actions create the conditions of our experience. When we act from greed, hatred, and delusion, we create the causes for suffering—both for ourselves and others. When we act from generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom, we create the causes for happiness and peace.

This is why the Buddha called this teaching a "universal law." It's not dependent on belief systems or cultural conditioning. It's simply describing how consciousness works, how actions and intentions shape our experience. Whether you're a Buddhist or a Christian or an atheist, if you approach others with genuine kindness, you're more likely to be met with kindness in return. If you approach life with generosity and honesty, you create conditions that support wellbeing. This isn't mysticism—it's psychology.

So Mahagosananda moved there to begin teaching them. I can't even imagine what it would have been like to be in those refugee camps. Probably most people had lost relatives, close family members, friends in the genocide because something like a million people out of six million died during that time. So everybody there would have had their hearts broken. They would have been enraged at what they'd witnessed.

Mahagosananda's task was to minister to them, to bring the healing message of the Dharma back to people who had lost their whole monastic order, lost the Buddhism in their country. What he conceived was that there needed to be reconciliation first and foremost—that nothing could proceed if the antagonism and conflict continued.

One of his main teachings was these pamphlets he printed with a chant in Pali, which many of the people had heard years before when they had been living in a Buddhist culture and could remember. It contained this great verse from the Dhammapada: "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is an ancient and eternal law."

Mahagosananda would hold these services once a week and hundreds of people, maybe thousands, would come to attend. He'd teach through loudspeakers, but mostly what he wanted to get all the refugees doing was chanting this Pali verse: "Hatred never ceases through hatred. Hatred only ceases through love."

But there were still Khmer Rouge in the camps, and there started to be death threats against him because they could see how much power this old monk had with people, how much respect and love he commanded. Some of Mahagosananda's supporters collected money—probably Western aid workers—and said, "We need to get you to France. You go to France, you'll be safe. You won't be killed. Look, we've collected the money. Go to Bangkok, buy a plane ticket, and get to Paris. You'll have safe haven."

So Gosananda took the money, took the train to Bangkok. But a few days later, he came back. They said, "What happened?" He said, "Well, we were running out of brochures, so I got some more brochures printed up." He had ten thousand more brochures printed that said, "Hatred never ceases through hatred," and passed all those out through the camp. That was his trust in this law, this eternal law.

When the Buddha was talking about the results of action, he put it pretty strongly. He said, "Beings are owners of their actions, heirs of their actions. Their actions are the womb from which they are born. Their actions are their friend, their refuge. Whatever acts they perform for good or for ill, of that they will be the heirs." This is the way the cause and effect relationship is understood.

Notice in this passage, the Buddha's not talking about the five aggregates. He's talking about beings. Just be aware that this is not one of the passages that points to the emptiness of things. This is one of the passages that's talking about relational activities, how we relate in the world. In that case, you don't need to look at the breakdown into the minute parts.

Westerners often feel some resistance to this message on karma—that beings are heirs of their actions—as though it implies that if someone is happy, that's their doing, and if they're unhappy, that's also only their doing. As though beings maybe deserve the suffering that they've got. That can seem like a really heartless view. You see someone in suffering and you say, "Oh, that's your bad karma. Too bad."

But that's a distortion of the teaching. First of all, there's no concept of deserve in karma. It's like the apple didn't deserve to fall to the ground and get smushed. That's just what gravity does. But also the Buddha didn't have any idea that beings deserve to suffer.

Do you remember the story of Angulimala? Angulimala was a spiritual practitioner whose teacher told him—because he wanted to get him in deep trouble—to collect a thousand fingers from people that he murdered. So Angulimala went out in the forest and started accumulating these fingers, which he wore on a necklace around his neck. Anguli means finger, mala means necklace.

So he wore this finger necklace, and he got up to 999 fingers. He only needed one more. And the Buddha was walking by Angulimala's area on that day. People told him, "Don't go there. Angulimala will take you as his thousandth victim." And the Buddha said, "I don't think so."

So the Buddha walked by. Angulimala tried to catch him to kill him, but through his psychic powers, the Buddha kept walking and Angulimala could never catch up to him. Finally, Angulimala shouted, "Stop! Stop!" And the Buddha turned around and said, "I have stopped, Angulimala. Now you stop. Your mind is on fire with greed, hatred, and delusion. Now you stop."

So they met. Angulimala said he'd never met anyone who wasn't afraid of him before. If there was anybody in the whole range of the suttas who deserved to suffer, I would have thought it would be Angulimala. The Buddha didn't see it that way. He taught him the Dharma. Angulimala practiced sincerely and with great effort. In a fairly short period of time, he became fully awakened—one of the arahants. The Buddha wanted him to come out of his suffering. There's no concept that beings deserve to suffer or should suffer. But sometimes the law just takes us there.

The other view that sometimes corrupts this understanding is: "Oh, that person's suffering is of their own creation. That's their problem, not my problem." That's also not what the teachings say. Compassion wants to alleviate suffering wherever it sees it. It doesn't matter what the causes are. The urge of compassion is to feel that suffering and want to take care. This quality of turning away from suffering is called indifference, and it's the near enemy of the brahmaviharaof equanimity. I think Sally talked about the near enemies. This is the near enemy of equanimity—indifference.

So we act, different fruits come to us. We can't understand all the details about how they happen, but they happen in certain ways. The Buddha said if you try to figure out how these actions come from karma, you'll experience vexation and go mad. This is one of the four imponderables—very complicated.

But he never said that everything that happens to us is a result of karma. He was asked one time, "Does all the pleasure and pain that comes to a being depend on someone's past karma?" And he said no. People who say that are wrong. He said you can look around the world and see other causes of pleasurable and painful feeling. He mentioned causes like illness, diet, climate, accident, and assault. These are other operative causes that also bring pleasure and pain to our experience.

The law of karma is one more, but it's not the only law. In our current language we might say there are physical laws, chemical laws, biological laws, psychological laws, and the law of karma. Many different kinds of cause and effect are operating. The law of karma is one, but it doesn't mean that everything that happens to us is because of past actions.

Sometimes the law of karma feels very weighty because we're in a difficult situation, difficult circumstances, and I've had people say, "I wonder what I did that was so bad that got me here?" We can't use karma that way because we can never answer that question. We don't know if it was one of our past actions or one of these other causes. That's like trying to use karma as a rearview mirror—what was on the road behind me? We can't see that.

But what we can do is use karma as the steering wheel of where we want to go in the future.

So how does that work? This is where karma and emptiness come together. At first glance, these two seem really contradictory, or they did to me anyway, because emptiness says there's no abiding or fixed self in this whole system, and karma says something that you do previously will come back to you. It's not that it comes back to somebody else. It comes back to you.

So a monk at the time of the Buddha was obviously confused by this and said to the Buddha, "What self then will actions performed by the not-self affect?" And the Buddha basically said, "You haven't been listening to me."

Actually, karma and emptiness need each other. I think Gil talked about this early on. They require each other for all this thing to make sense at all. So let's talk about how this teaching on not-self interfaces with the teaching on karma.

First of all, the not-self teaching doesn't deny individuality. The Buddha's enlightenment solved his problem. It didn't solve ours. Each of us has a body. Each of us has a mind. And although we're interdependent, we're also to some extent independent. We each have an individual nature.

So I'd like to think a little bit about the image of a stream—the little creek that runs behind the dining hall. We tend to call that Spirit Rock Creek. I don't think it has water right now, but it will in a few days. It runs really well through the winter.

If you ever sit by the side of a creek and watch it for a while, it's very interesting to reflect on this concept of not-self. A river or a creek is a useful term. You know, if I say Spirit Rock Creek, everybody kind of knows what I'm talking about and where it is. And it's different from the Mississippi River—very different. So everybody knows that's the body of water we're calling Spirit Rock Creek.

But if you sit down by the edge of it and you look at it, is there anything fixed? First you have to ask, well, what's the creek? For the purpose of this discussion, the creek will be the body of water—maybe in geological terms we should also include the banks, but I want to talk about that body of flowing water that runs between the two banks.

Is it fixed when it's running? No. You know that old statement: you never step in the same river twice. It's changing in every moment. There's new water passing through. The water that was here five minutes ago is no longer here at all.

So the stream is a really good image for not-self. There's always stuff going on, but it's always changing. It's always new. It's useful to talk about Spirit Rock Creek. We know what we're talking about. It's different from other bodies of water. But if we look in it, there's nothing fixed.

In some schools of Buddhism, they talk about each of us as a mind stream. Within us, there is always this flow of mental activity—the saṅkhāras of the aggregates, the fourth aggregate—and feeling and perception. Mental factors are happening, emotions are going through, thoughts are arising and passing, and intentions arise and pass. And out of intentions, we sometimes act through body, speech, and mind.

So each of us is individual. We're unique. We have a different body of mind stream within us, but they all kind of work the same, and none of them are fixed.

Of the objects that are flowing in our mind stream, one of the key ones is this element of intention because intention is the core of karma. If we start to bring forth wholesome intentions and we start to not act on unwholesome intentions, that starts to change the flow of the stream. And this is really what the path is about—choosing what actions are skillful, what actions are not, which intentions we follow and which intentions we don't.

Then we start to see that the path itself is a karmic unfolding. The path operates by laws of cause and effect based on the quality of intention and the qualities of mind that we choose to strengthen and the qualities we choose to weaken.

So let's say we come into Dharma practice and our mind stream is flowing. As we all have when we first come, there's plenty of greed, aversion, and delusion in that mind stream, and plenty of actions coming out of greed, aversion, and delusion. Such a stream has a certain destination—let's call it Lake Samsara. Our stream's flowing along with this mixture of wholesome and unwholesome, moving toward Lake Samsara with our mix of pleasure and pain.

Then we start to hear the Dharma, and we begin to drop in new intentions. We start to drop in intentions for loving kindness, for compassion, for wisdom, for patience, for generosity, for stillness, for understanding and empathy. Little by little, it starts to change the flow of the stream. It doesn't feel like much in the beginning, but as we keep strengthening those intentions and those qualities start to arise in us, the whole direction of the stream moves in a different way. Instead of going to Lake Samsara, it's flowing toward the Nirvanic Ocean.

The only thing that's changed is our moment-to-moment intention. When you really think about it, that's all we have to change—that's all we can change.

For me, coming into the Dharma was like being adrift on an ocean that seemed chaotic. I didn't know where my life was going, didn't know if it was moving toward happiness or not, or how to guide it or where to go. I felt really adrift, a little bit lost. Then we start to hear the Dharma and understand we have a way to steer. We have a rudder on this boat that's in the midst of the chaos of life, and that rudder is intention. That's how we steer the boat.

So we start to direct our intention toward these wholesome ends, and we let that be the activity of our inner work of meditation or bhavana. We let that be the guiding force for our outer relationships and actions of speech and body. Then we're in tune with the wholesome side of the law of karma: "Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

Now, the only reason that karmic transformation can work is because there's nothing fixed in here from the beginning. If our ignorance was fixed, we couldn't change it. If our hatred was fixed, we couldn't change it. If our suffering was fixed, we couldn't change it. But nothing's fixed. That's the message of not-self—nothing is fixed in here. That's the groundless part. It's a little unsettling sometimes, but that's what makes liberation possible. Because nothing is fixed, we can shape it the way we want.

The power to shape our hearts and minds is entirely up to us. It just depends what direction we want to go and how many moments of intention we're willing to shape in that way. That's our Dharma practice. That's where you see the fruit in somebody like the Dalai Lama, who's been shaping it for so long. You get an idea of the possibility, the degree of development from this shaping process that only happens moment after moment after moment, based on this factor of intention. That's the engine of the whole path.

Let's look at a couple of the quotes on page 20. Here's one that someone mentioned early—it might have been Sally—number 67: "The Blessed One took up a little bit of soil in his fingernail and said to the bhikkhu, 'Bhikkhu, there is not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change. If there was this much form that was permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering could not be discerned. But because there is not even this much form that is permanent, stable, eternal, not subject to change, this living of the holy life for the complete destruction of suffering is discerned.'"

So not only is there nothing on the outer form that's stable—not even a small smidgen—there's nothing of the inner either. And therefore this transformation of mind and heart is possible.

For karma to be able to unfold in us, we need this foundation of emptiness—the emptiness of self, the openness, the non-fixedness, the non-stuckness. And then as the path develops, we start to see this transformation taking place.

This is a quote from Nisargadatta Maharaj about this process. He was a teacher of Advaita Vedanta who died around 1990 in Bombay. He worked in the form of dialogue, and in the course of one such exchange, Maharaj said to a questioner, "Your own will was the backbone of your destiny."

Can you sense how that intention, as we understand the shaping quality of karma, creates a kind of trajectory for our life? Your own will was the backbone of your destiny.

The questioner responded, "Surely karma interfered."

Maharaj replied, "Karma shapes the circumstances. The attitudes are your own. Ultimately, your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character."

Your character shapes your life and you alone can shape your character. This is the teaching about intention as our rudder in life.

The Buddha said that when one comes to the end of the path, one who is fully awakened—the arahat—has come to the end of karma. This is a really intriguing idea. I have no idea what it means. He says it in a number of places. Does it mean that there's no self-centered volition happening anymore? Or does it mean that intention is still active, but the fruits of karma are getting burned up really quickly, so there's no result of karma? I don't know.

But in the last quotes on page 20, he talks about this process of the ending of karma. In quote 69: "These four types of karma have been understood, realized, and made known by me. Which four? There is karma that is dark with dark result, karma that is bright with bright result, karma that is dark and bright with dark and bright result, and karma that is neither dark nor bright with neither dark nor bright result leading to the end of karma."

This is very cryptic, but there's some kind of unusual karma that leads to the end of karma, and he calls it neither dark nor bright. This is explained a little more in passage 70:

"And what is karma that is neither dark nor bright, with neither dark nor bright result leading to the ending of karma? Right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration."

As he says again in quote 72: "It is this noble eightfold path that is the way leading to the cessation of karma."

It's very interesting characterizing the path as neither dark nor bright karma, because normally one would think of the path as the brightest kind of karma. But he says it's neither dark nor bright. My intuition—and I don't have any strong source for this except a little reference in quote 69—is that he says, "What is karma that is neither dark nor bright? The volition to abandon the other karma."

It's as though in coming into the path, we come into this place of deep letting go. Letting go of preoccupation, of obsession, of selfing. Letting go of this controlling instinct that is so integral to the self. Letting go of effort and striving for a result, trusting more in faith. Letting go of all the mental formations that we're accustomed to generating over and over again, and opening to that place of the stilling of all formations, the abandoning of effort, the abandoning of striving, the abandoning of action and volition.

And then from that place where there is so much stillness, so much surrender to the way things are, perhaps out of that there's an opening to the deep realization and liberation that is really the end of karma.

So let's just sit for a minute together.

CHAPTER 89

Where Does Happiness Come From?

Guy Armstrong · 55 min

> In this dharma talk from a February monthlong retreat, Guy Armstrong investigates the fundamental question of where happiness originates, drawing from the Buddha's teachings and personal observations of a remarkably joyful monk. Armstrong outlines five progressive sources of happiness found in the suttas: sense pleasures (appropriate for laypeople when enjoyed ethically), merit (puñña) through the practices of generosity (dāna), virtue (sīla), and loving-kindness cultivation (bhāvanā), concentration (samādhi) which brings inner peace and stability, insight (vipassanā) leading to understanding of impermanence and non-clinging, and finally awakening itself—the unconditioned happiness beyond all suffering.
>
> The talk emphasizes that happiness is not random or mysterious but can be cultivated through reliable practices tested over millennia. Armstrong skillfully balances teachings for both monastic and lay practitioners, acknowledging that while renunciates may abandon sense pleasures, laypeople can ethically enjoy them while developing higher forms of contentment. He illustrates these teachings with vivid examples, from museum visits that naturally evoke joy to extraordinary acts of generosity, showing how meritorious actions create 'streams of the wholesome' that fulfill our deepest aspirations. This practical approach to Buddhist happiness offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners clear guidance for cultivating lasting well-being through dharma practice.

The subject of this evening's talk is: where does happiness come from? I think this is an important question for us to reflect on because the whole journey is about happiness. The Buddha framed it in the Four Noble Truths as the end of suffering, but that's just different language for the development of happiness. When suffering ends, there is something in our hearts and minds, there's something in our nature that brings happiness forth. So we don't have to think of these as two separate questions. When suffering ends, happiness is present, or we can talk about it as the development of happiness.

When I look around the world, I see such a wide range of happiness in the people that I meet and see. It's always been curious to me, why is that range the way it is? Is happiness just something random and mysterious and unpredictable? Some people are blessed with it and other people are not? Does it all have to do with our parents? That would be a convenient explanation, but hopefully that's not the final word. Is it sort of fatalistic or some kind of destiny that we can never really figure out or understand?

As practitioners, hopefully we all understand our journey as being about the development of happiness, the movement to happiness. The question is, what makes that journey possible? What makes it work? Because happiness is a very important concept in dharma practice, not just in current popular expressions, but all the way back to the words of the Buddha. This quality of happiness comes in again and again. Although the Buddha talked about the end of suffering and used that kind of negative language, there are also many words for the beautiful states of happiness of heart and mind in the suttas and in the Pali.

Just to mention a few, because I know that you're familiar with some of these. The word sukha is usually translated directly as happiness. For me, it means a very settled kind of contentment—not necessarily a bubbly or overflowing happiness, but a very settled, contented state of mind. I like the association of sukha with sugar. It may be the same root, I'm not sure, but the sweetness of sugar is kind of suggested by this word sukha. It has a sweet quality of contentment.

The word piti, which I think many of you know from the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, is often translated as rapture. It's a meditative quality when the mind discovers a delight in being with the meditation subject. So it's sometimes translated as a joyful interest. When we connect with our experience in a way that makes it come alive and is delightful, that's a factor of piti in the mind, one of the enlightenment factors.

There's the word ananda, which means bliss, which you hear as the name of the Buddha's companion, a very sweet monk that Sally mentioned the other day. This word appears in many monks' and nuns' names. There are a group of nuns living in San Francisco. I don't know if you've had the good fortune to meet them yet. They're under an umbrella organization called Saranaloka. They intend to establish a permanent nun's residence, hopefully in the Bay Area or Northern California. I think it's very inspiring for women practitioners to see the nun sangha taking root here. One of the nuns in that community is named Ananda Bodhi—the bliss of awakening, the bliss of enlightenment.

There are other words too, but I don't need to do a Pali primer this evening. I just wanted to suggest that this word happiness is very important in Buddhist practice, going back to ancient times.

There's a wonderful modern scholar who I want to recommend to you named Bhikkhu Analayo, who is a linguist, a translator, a researcher. He wrote a very wonderful book called Satipatthana: The Direct Path to Realization, which is a commentary on the Satipatthana Sutta. I regard him as a very authoritative speaker on our tradition. In the book Satipatthana, he said this of the path: "The entire scheme of the gradual training can be envisaged as a progressive refinement of joy." I like this coming from a monk. It's deeply within our tradition, this development and refinement of joy in our practice.

This question of where happiness comes from came to me strongly this past summer. I was sitting in a retreat with a teacher in the Buddhist tradition who is a monk, and I was struck many times during the time that I spent around him by the level of his happiness. It was just very apparent and tangible—one of the most remarkable things about him. He laughed easily. He smiled a lot. He was very playful. I got to see him both behind the scene and in his teaching role. In both settings, he had this joy that was just very easy to touch and contagious. Because of that, he had a certain charisma.

A lot of people loved this monk. I'm not going to say who it is because I don't want to foster a cult of personality, and I don't want to make statements about him that might not be accurate. I want to share my inferences about him, my impressions of this fellow, without being bound to defend particular claims about any individual.

As I watched him, so struck by the degree of his happiness, a question arose in my mind: where did that come from? How can this one person have such a strong experience and expression of happiness? I should mention that this isn't just subjective interpretation. He was taken to one of these MRI machines—you know how they're running tests on advanced meditators? These functional MRIs look directly at the centers of activity in the brain as one is meditating or experiencing the present moment. They recognize certain neural patterns as being indicative of happiness, and his numbers were off the chart, which led some people to call him the happiest person in the world. Of course we can't know that because we haven't all been tested—that person could be here. But at any rate, he had a very high degree of happiness.

I started to reflect: what is that due to? As a practitioner himself, he has had some hand in developing the happiness that he enjoys—maybe a lot of hand in developing that level of happiness. So I began to reflect on what I understand from the Buddha's teachings about the growth of happiness and where it comes from. I thought that as I understand the teachings, there are basically five ways that the Buddha talked about happiness being developed.

Those are the ways I want to share this evening. The reason I want to do this is to bring happiness out of the realm of the mysterious or the random or the fatalistic—out of a sense of destiny—and communicate my belief that happiness is achievable for each of us by following these practices. I think what the Buddha was pointing to is that we can each create the heart and mind that we wish to have, that we wish to enjoy in this life. These are, I feel, reliable guides to developing our own happiness. As practitioners, it's just a question of faith and then effort to carry out this kind of development.

Let me name the five first and then talk about each one of them. But before I do, I want to say this is not an exhaustive list. There are lots of routes to happiness. I'm sure you have your favorites. Our good friend James has written a book and leads a class called Awakening Joy. He has thousands of followers and it's transformed people's lives—some Buddhist principles, some principles of his own discovery that have helped people find great measures of happiness. They may not all fit in the five I'm going to name tonight. So the list is broader than what I'm going to talk about. You may have your own ways.

I did a short search on the word "happiness" on Amazon this evening before I came, and 20,000 results popped up in the category of books. So there are a lot of books on this topic. In fact, Sylvia told me that when she was writing one of her books—Sylvia Boorstein, who teaches here—her publisher suggested a title and told her that the best-selling books in this general field have three words in the title: freedom, happiness, and easy. So it's a tip for all you authors out there.

These may not all be so easy, but they are all really reliable. They've been tested for thousands of years. They do seem to work.

The five I want to talk about tonight, in kind of increasing order of happiness, are: sense pleasures, merit, concentration, insight, and awakening.

The first is sense pleasures, and it may seem a little odd to hear a Buddhist talk about sense pleasures as a valid type of happiness, because you probably know there are some strong warnings against sense pleasures, especially for monastics, in our tradition. But let me read you the way the Buddha defined the term of sense pleasure and you'll get a sense of their power.

This is from the Samyutta Nikaya, and the Buddha was talking to his attendant Ananda: "Ananda, there are these five chords of sense pleasure. What five? Forms cognizable by the eye"—that basically means sights—"forms cognizable by the eye that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, sensually enticing, and tantalizing. Sounds cognizable by the ear," using the same description. "Odors cognizable by the nose. Tastes cognizable by the tongue. Sensations cognizable by the body that are desirable, lovely, agreeable, pleasing, sensually enticing, and tantalizing."

Now who can resist that? This is the appeal of sense pleasures. The pleasure and joy that arise in dependence on these five types of sense contact are called sensual pleasure.

So this is a big part of life as laypeople. I assume for most of us, these five kinds of sense contact and their pleasurable quality constitute a significant portion of what makes lay life enjoyable to the extent that it is.

I was reminded of this recently. Sally and I went to a museum exhibit in the fall—a number of you probably saw it too. The de Young Museum in San Francisco had borrowed many paintings from the Musée d'Orsay in Paris because the museum there was undergoing renovation. They divided the collection into two exhibitions: the first called "The Birth of Impressionism," and the second featuring the post-Impressionists.

In September we went to see this exhibit of some of the greatest French Impressionist painters who ever lived. The works were arranged chronologically, so you walk in seeing the earlier period of Impressionism—paintings by artists like Manet and Degas who were somewhat more on the realistic end. As you move through the exhibit, advancing in time, you eventually reach the later works of Renoir, Monet, and Pissarro.

I noticed as I walked through that a smile began to spread across my face. The beauty of what I was looking at, especially in the later galleries—that raw play of light and color—was simply delightful. I wasn't trying to smile or thinking about smiling; I just observed the smile growing on my face. That's the realm of sense pleasure: beautiful sights, beautiful sounds, beautiful touches that bring a certain uplift to the mind.

Part of what makes our lay life as pleasurable as it is comes from these different kinds of experiences. It could be sharing a wonderful meal with friends at a good restaurant, listening to your favorite music, making love, or enjoying a beautiful sunset.

When we come on retreat, many of these experiences become inaccessible to us. The loss of those sense pleasures is often one of the more difficult adjustments we make entering the retreat experience. You may find yourself missing friends from home, a comfortable chair, television, movies, music, or all the familiar comforts you're accustomed to.

The Buddha spoke of this as part of the sorrow of the renunciate life. Giving up the pleasures of lay life and entering this more austere lifestyle creates conditions for sadness—a natural missing of those things. Over time, as we continue practicing, joy arising from the meditation practice itself gradually takes the place of those missing sense pleasures. But there's a transition period where the mind can feel somewhat sad at moving away from the pleasures of daily life.

As I mentioned, the Buddha offered many warnings about sense pleasures that were specifically directed to monastics. When we read these teachings, we may develop something of a guilt complex about enjoying sense pleasures as laypeople. Let me share just one passage—there are many, but this one is particularly significant.

This comes from the very first discourse the Buddha gave after his awakening, when he set in motion the wheel of the Dhamma. Finding his five former companions in Sarnath, he explained the Four Noble Truths. Before presenting those truths, here's how he prefaced his teaching:

"Bhikkhus, these two extremes should not be followed by one who has gone forth into homelessness. What two? The pursuit of sensual happiness and sensual pleasures, which is low, vulgar, the way of worldlings, ignoble, unbeneficial; and the pursuit of self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble, and unbeneficial. Without veering toward either of these extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the middle way, which gives rise to vision and knowledge, which leads to peace, to direct knowledge, to enlightenment, to nibbana."

But notice—this teaching was directed to "those who have gone forth into homelessness," that is, to renunciates. In teachings to monastics, the Buddha also compared sense pleasures to a bone dried up with no meat remaining, or to dreams that are fleeting and insubstantial.

For laypeople, however, the Buddha did not condemn sense pleasures. In fact, he said that one who enjoys sense pleasures may be praised, provided that person has come by their wealth lawfully and uses it not only for personal enjoyment but also shares it to bring happiness to others.

So for laypeople, sense pleasures are perfectly acceptable. For monastics, it's not so much that they're wrong as that they constitute a kind of diversion from the spiritual path.

We have a foot in both worlds. We live our lay lives in the everyday world, and when we come here, we adopt a renunciate lifestyle. It's quite interesting to be in this position where sometimes we're living more or less by a monastic ethos in a renunciate style, while at other times we're fully engaged in lay life.

I feel we must listen to both sides of this discourse to understand when sense pleasures are appropriate and when it's skillful to let them go, as we're practicing here. On retreat, we're practicing mostly in a renunciate style.

But to think that they're wrong for lay people would be misinterpreting the Buddha's teachings. They do give an uplift to the mind, and it's helpful to acknowledge that.

I remember one time Sally and I were having lunch over our kitchen table and we had just pulled some fresh chocolate chip cookies out of the oven. I was eating one, and I remember saying to her, "You know, it's really hard to be unhappy when you're eating a fresh chocolate chip cookie." So just tune into that way that delightful sensual experiences uplift the mind. As lay people, we don't have to resist that or condemn it.

But then the Buddha continues in that quote where he describes the five chords of sense pleasures being lovely and agreeable. He continues in this way: "Though some may say this is the supreme pleasure and joy that beings experience, I would not concede this to them. Why is that? Because there is another kind of happiness more excellent and sublime than that happiness."

So sense pleasures are just the first in our list, and there are other pleasures more sublime than that. As I was observing this monk who I was around last summer, I looked at his relationship to sense pleasures. As a monk, he doesn't really have a lot of them, so he was not very attached—I never saw him being attached. But I would see him enjoying food and having slight preferences for this kind of food or that kind of food. Sense pleasures didn't play a big role in his life or his happiness.

So the second area of the development of happiness is around this word called merit. Merit is the translation of a Pali term, puñña. A lot of Westerners have a real reaction to this term merit. Maybe it reminds us of somebody who was like the teacher's pet at school who always brought the apple in for the teacher. Maybe it reminds us of collecting merit badges when we were in Girl Scouts or Boy Scouts. It just seems a little too goody-goody.

But this translation is in wide use in the Buddhist world. I don't think we're going to change it overnight, so I'm going to use it and live with it. But let me talk a little bit about what puñña means. Puñña is basically just skillful action or wholesome action—action from a good intention. And the understanding is that when we act from that kind of good intention, a caring intention, a loving intention, a giving intention, then happiness comes from that.

You probably all recall this famous quotation from the Dhammapada, which I think Carol mentioned in her talk last night. This is from the opening verses: "All states come from mind, are preceded by mind, are ruled by mind. Speak and act with a pure mind and happiness will follow you like your shadow, unshakable."

So puñña just refers to these acts of speaking and bodily action that come from a pure heart and mind. And the Buddha said, if we always act from that kind of place, happiness comes to us. Happiness follows us like our shadow, unshakable.

As practitioners, as we gain some trust in these teachings, we can take this message to heart as a kind of practice direction. And the more we have faith and trust in this as an avenue, and the more we're inclined to have our actions come from good intentions, loving intentions, generous intentions, we can create for our lives this kind of happy outcome. It's not mysterious. It's not random. It's karmic. It's just one of the outcomes of the law of karma.

In the Buddha's lifetime, his basic instructions for lay people were to do meritorious actions. Most lay people in his time, most lay people in Buddhist countries today, are not interested in pursuing this kind of intensive meditation practice that we're engaged in here. If you go to Thailand or Burma or Sri Lanka, you'll see that the majority of lay people are more interested in doing things like visiting the temples, the nunneries, the monasteries, and making offerings, doing some chanting, doing prayers. But they rarely sit down and practice in the way that we do.

Originally, when I went to Thailand, I thought, "Wow, that's not taking the teachings very seriously." But actually, there's a stream of the Buddha's teachings that is designed for lay people that emphasizes this kind of activity. So even in the Buddha's time, he didn't expect most lay people to practice like this. Generally, at the time of the Buddha, if you wanted to practice like this, you became a renunciate. You became a nun or a monk, at least for a period of time.

Because we have a foot in both worlds, I think it's really good for us to learn about the lay practices as well as these more secluded practices. And I think as teachers, as we brought these teachings to the West, we haven't put very much emphasis on these lay practices, the practices of merit. So partly why I want to mention this tonight is to put it forth as another way that we can bring happiness into our lives as lay people. We don't have to wait for the next retreat. There are lots of things we can do in lay life that encourage this development.

When the Buddha talked about skillful action in terms of merit, he talked about three main activities or three main areas, which in the Pali are known as dāna, sīla, bhāvanā.

Or in English, dana is generosity, sila is virtue or wise conduct, and bhavana is a very interesting word we might translate as mental development or development of heart and mind. When bhavana is used in the sense of merit, it generally refers to the area of loving kindness and compassion.

I'll say a little more about each of these three as excellent practices in lay life.

Generosity is one of the most accessible practices for us as lay people, and it was one the Buddha taught over and over again. It's the first of the ten paramis which were described as the way to Buddhahood. And it's something that you see a lot in Asia. Over the course of this retreat, Carol and I will both probably talk about our experiences of generosity around the monasteries in Asia because it's quite extraordinary. Hanging around this scene for a long time, you just run into some outrageous examples of generosity.

I was coming back from a retreat one time and a woman who had been on the retreat gave me a ride, and I got to hear her story. Her story was that she had been a management consultant—very highly trained, highly functioning professional—until she was about fifty. In the course of her career she had saved quite a bit of money. She had invested in the usual vehicles, plus she had bought property and invested a lot in real estate.

Then she got into meditation practice in our style, Vipassana practice. She was so inspired by the practice and its roots, because she'd visited Asia before, that she decided she wanted to give all her money away and support especially nunneries and also monasteries in Thailand. So she went over to Thailand with the intention of retiring from her career, supporting the nunneries especially and also the monasteries, and then settling down in one of them to live and practice for the rest of her life.

She cashed in her securities. She sold all her real estate around the states except for one property, which she kept. She took the money and started giving it away to these different spiritual centers there. She settled in and prepared to live out her days in probably a nunnery environment.

But then something happened. She got sick. It was a kind of sickness that was fairly serious, life-threatening, and she felt she needed to come back to the West to get treatment. So she uprooted herself from Thailand. She sort of lost her practice and living situation, came back here, and only had one property left. She sold that to pay for her health care. She got well, fortunately, and then she resumed her career as a management consultant to support herself again. She continued to do meditation practice.

So it was at this point that I met her and heard her story. She'd given away all her money. She had gotten ill, and she had to come out of her retirement to start over again. But what I found so beautiful—she had given away hundreds of thousands of dollars, I don't know the exact amount, it could have even been a million—and then she was almost broke. And she had no regrets. She would have done the same thing again, she said.

For me, that was a really beautiful pointing to the power of generosity because I could see how that impulse had sustained her over the years that she was planning it. When you think about doing something generous—not something you have to do, like giving an uncle a gift because it's his birthday, but something you really want to do—it's joyful to think about that, to think about a gift that would really please someone. When you buy it and then offer it, there's a wonderful feeling because it makes the other person happy. And then afterwards when you reflect on it, you get that warm feeling all over again because it's a beautiful thing to recollect.

So this is the force of generosity. It brightens the mind. It uplifts the mind. It gives us beautiful qualities to reflect on afterwards.

And there's something else that generosity does that's more subtle, often not seen or acknowledged, that I want to point out. Generosity works because we're able to put ourselves in somebody else's shoes. We're able to look at someone else and understand what their need is because we can imagine: if I was in that situation, here's what I might feel and here's what I would need. The generosity really rests on this sense of connectedness or empathy.

Then underlying it is something like: I have so much, they have a certain need, let me give some of what I have so that their life can be improved. Underlying generosity is this deep feeling of connectedness. And I would even go so far as to say some intuition of oneness.

We understand that we're really not separate from the person that we're giving to. We can feel their situation as though it was our own. So we act out of that sense of connection. And when we act and make the offering, that action sets a kind of karmic seed in the mind that implants that sense of connectedness even more deeply. Acting on a belief through our body and through our words implants that in our karmic stream more solidly. So that's part of the power of the act of giving.

The second of the bases of merit, as the Buddha called them, is this quality of sila—virtue, or wise conduct, or integrity. We all know what that feels like when we violate it. We know that it causes harm to others and it causes a lot of remorse in ourselves. Similarly, when we know someone who has a lot of integrity, they create a kind of zone of safety around them. When you're around someone who's very careful with their conduct, you feel safe, the other people that come into contact with them feel safe, and conduct is generally good around that person. I mean, how many people do cruel things around the Dalai Lama? I bet not very many.

So that sense of integrity creates an atmosphere of safety. Everyone who comes into that presence can feel it or is touched by it, benefits from it. The Buddha talked about this kind of integrity as being a different kind of gift. He says that when we follow care with our conduct, we're giving unlimited beings freedom from fear. This is the gift of harmlessness that we offer when we take care with our own conduct.

The third of the bases of merit is this factor called bhavana, or mental development. I just want to mention the etymology here. The word bhava in Pali means being or existence or becoming. It refers to a quality of coming into existence. The bhavana makes an emphasis on the kind of process that's going on. So what I think of the word bhavana as pointing to is bringing into existence or bringing into becoming. It's often a synonym for meditation. So it really refers to when we do certain practices, we are bringing those qualities into existence in our hearts and minds.

Bhavana is often associated in this basis of merit framework with the practice of loving-kindness, generating a loving heart, a compassionate heart toward ourselves and others. I love this image that when we practice loving-kindness, we're creating our heart. We're bringing our heart into being. That is part of the gift that practice offers us. This is really what we're doing with all of our meditation practice—we're bringing ourselves into being in a beautiful way.

There was a French poet, Paul Valéry, an imagist poet who wrote toward the end of the 19th century. One of his unpublished works from his lifetime were his private notebooks that he wrote in every day. He kept a long series of these things called cahiers, notebooks. He did them very consciously as a spiritual practice. When they were published posthumously, you could read through and they were not just his poems, but his reflections on his readings and some poems and some essays and his thoughts on a wide, wide range of topics. But he did it as a spiritual practice. And he put it this way: he said, other people are writing books, but I am making my mind.

That's the sense of bhavana. With bhavana, we make our mind and heart. We shape it in the direction that we choose. And in this sense of merit, we shape it toward loving-kindness, compassion, and connection.

Here's what the Buddha said about the fruits of merit from dana, sila, bhavana: "There are these streams of merit, streams of the wholesome, nourishments of happiness, which are heavenly, ripening in happiness, and which lead to whatever is wished for, loved and agreeable, to one's welfare and happiness."

It's understood in our tradition that these streams of merit lead to the fulfillment of our aspirations—whatever that aspiration is. So the streams of merit may lead to different results for different people. They lead to what each of us wishes for. If what we wish for is a comfortable life in the world and some material prosperity and basically harmony of mind, then the accumulation of merit can lead in that direction. If what we wish for is true freedom of heart and mind, or liberation, then the streams of merit will lead in that direction, of course if also supported by wisdom.

These are very helpful things for us to develop and actualize. They lead to what is wished for. When I looked at the lifestyle of this monk that I was around last summer, I could see the merit just being formed all the time with him. He was very generous with his time, with his teaching, with sharing his understanding. He was someone who took very little personal time for himself, but was always involved in activities that gave to others, receiving people, reaching out.

He went into this deep absorption that lasted three days. His parents tried calling his name, shaking him, but he was completely unreachable. They became quite frightened and called other people to help, but nothing worked. Finally, after three days, he naturally emerged from this state.

When he came out, he told his parents that it had been the most wonderful experience of his life - far better than playing with the other children. From that moment on, he became passionate about meditation. By the age of twelve, he was teaching meditation to adults in his village.

Meeting Ajahn Jumnian is an extraordinary experience. He carries this quality of deep peace and steadiness that you can feel immediately. There's something almost magnetic about being in his presence. This is the power of well-developed samadhi - it creates a field of peace around a person that others can sense and benefit from.

This brings us to the fourth avenue to happiness, which is wisdom or insight - the Pali word panna. While the other three paths can bring temporary happiness and peace, wisdom offers something more permanent. Wisdom sees through the fundamental delusions that create suffering in the first place.

The Buddha taught that there are three root causes of suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion. Wisdom directly addresses delusion - our fundamental misunderstanding about the nature of reality. When we see clearly how things actually are, rather than how we imagine them to be, suffering naturally decreases.

The insights that bring this freedom are not intellectual understandings, though intellectual understanding can support them. Rather, they are direct, experiential realizations that change our relationship to life at the most fundamental level.

One of the most powerful of these insights is the recognition of impermanence. When we truly see that everything is constantly changing - including ourselves - we begin to hold everything more lightly. We stop grasping so tightly to experiences, relationships, and even our own identity, because we understand that everything is in flux.

Another crucial insight is understanding what the Buddha called anatta or not-self. This doesn't mean we don't exist, but rather that what we think of as "self" is much more fluid and interdependent than we usually imagine. When this is seen clearly, the desperate need to defend and promote the ego relaxes, and a natural compassion emerges.

The third fundamental insight is recognizing that trying to find lasting satisfaction in changing conditions leads to suffering - what the Buddha called dukkha. When we truly understand this, we stop looking for happiness in all the wrong places and begin to find the peace that doesn't depend on external circumstances.

So his father knew what was going on because he had been a strong meditator himself. He knew that this young boy had fallen into a strong state of concentration, but the boy wouldn't surrender it. So the father kept talking to him, saying, "You're in a strong state of meditation. Come out. You can find it again. Don't worry." Ajahn Jinnian wouldn't leave. And of course, you know what would reach a young boy. His mother talked to him. So his mother finally sweet-talked him and told him how worried they were about him, and her heart was heavy with worry. Finally he came out, responding to her love.

Once they realized that he had this talent, they began to train him both in vipassana style and concentration styles of meditation. He developed a very strong concentration practice. You can feel that in him today. He has very high energy. I've never seen him get tired. I've never seen him unhappy. He says that he hasn't had anger in twenty-five years. And I believe it. Every time I see him, he's energetic and happy.

So when he was first coming to Spirit Rock, we thought, well, maybe he'd like to go out sightseeing in the area, you know—Point Reyes, Golden Gate Bridge, San Francisco. People would ask him, "Would you like to go to see the ocean? Would you like to go to see the city? Would you like to go to see the bay?" And his answer would always be the same. He'd say, "You know, if you want to take me somewhere, I'm happy to go. But are there people who'd like to hear the Dharma? Then I'd like to teach them the Dharma. But if you want me to go, I'll be happy there. And I'll be happy teaching the Dharma. I'll be happy anywhere. So it's all okay with me." But there were usually people who wanted to hear the Dharma, so Ajahn Jinnian would give teachings there.

He had a kind of bubbly, infectious energy that partly came from his depth of concentration and loving-kindness. Loving-kindness is a path to concentration as well. So just to know, this is one of the factors that develops very naturally on these kinds of retreats. I think Carol mentioned that this morning in response to a question. What you're doing now in your vipassana practice will develop concentration very strongly as long as you apply that moment-to-moment mindfulness.

So concentration will develop for all of you while you're here. Some people choose to take a long period of time like this and devote it to especially strengthening this factor of concentration. And Carol mentioned some specific practices called samatha practices that we offer. And for those, there will be a few people on this retreat practicing those particular kinds of practice out of a particular interest. But that quality will develop for all of you.

So I'd just like to read one description from the Buddha about one of the states that develops from strong concentration. This is a description of the first jhana. There are eight jhanas in all, so this is the entry point: "She enters and abides in the first jhana with rapture and pleasure born of seclusion. She makes the rapture and pleasure born of seclusion drench, fill, steep, and pervade her body so that there is no part of her whole body unpervaded by the rapture and pleasure."

When this experience is accessible, imagine your whole body being filled with rapture and pleasure and being so fully in the present moment that there's no worry about the future and no regret about the past. That state brings a certain degree of happiness. Again, it's temporary, so we can't pin our whole meditation career on temporary states. But it's a very strong experience and gives a lot of confidence, a lot of happiness.

One of the things I noticed about the monk that I was with is that he had a lot of inner peace and a lot of stillness. Even in a busy day—we had to go out, give teachings outside, come back, give teachings, meet people, film videos—his mind was very balanced, steady, and still through it all. A lot of practice had gone into that.

The fourth of the areas of the development of happiness is insight, or we could call this wisdom. We're going to be talking about this a lot over this month.

This is the theme of this retreat, really. So I'm not going to spend much time on it tonight.

Just to say that as we pay close mindful attention to our experience, we feel its individual characteristics. A breath is long or short, relaxed or constricted, calming or agitating. We feel each breath differently.

But as we pay close attention, we also start to notice the universal characteristics of the phenomena that we're paying attention to. We notice every phenomenon we pay attention to is of the nature of arising and passing. Everything comes and goes. This comes very naturally out of bare moment-to-moment attention to what we're experiencing.

As we notice this coming and going of everything, the truth of impermanence just becomes more and more obvious. Sometimes it's presented in dramatic ways in our practice. Sometimes it's presented in more subtle ways. But that truth comes home to us. I'd say every day in a long retreat like this, as we see that again and again at deeper and deeper levels, we see everything's coming and going. What sense does it make to hang on to what's naturally passing? It really doesn't.

So we learn not to cling as much, not to hold on as much, because nothing is lasting very long. That light approach to our experience gives a lightness of mind. And that was another thing I very much appreciated about this monk. He didn't seem to take anything too seriously. He touched everything he did with a very light heart and a light gesture. A lot of ease came out of that understanding of the nature of things.

The fifth element, avenue to happiness, is the quality of awakening itself. As insight deepens, stillness settles in very new and, I could say, unshakable forms. There's the possibility of the mind opening to that which is unchanging beyond the phenomena that are arising and passing. This is what's referred to in our tradition as the process of awakening, the opening to this unconditioned element.

When that awakening happens at different degrees for different individuals, it has the power of removing from the mind altogether certain kinds of stains or fetters that bring suffering. In the end, it has the potential to remove all the causes of unhappiness from the mind stream permanently. And that is what the Buddha referred to as the complete end of suffering.

This is possible through the deepening of insight and this experience of awakening. This is really what's referred to as the experience of full liberation, full awakening, full enlightenment. When the mind is so free from the causes of suffering that it can really be said to be completely released and freed.

So I asked this monk about the experience of freedom, the causes of freedom to this degree, and his response was, the primary cause of that freedom is happiness.

So all the other practices that we do—enjoyment of our lay life, the development of merit, cultivating the quality of concentration and developing wisdom through insight—all those streams can go into the access to and the release of this factor of liberation, the highest kind of happiness that the Buddha talked about.

So let's just please sit together for a minute in silence and let the words settle.

CHAPTER 90

The Seven Factors of Awakening

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

> In this dharma talk from a February monthlong retreat, Guy Armstrong presents the seven factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga) - the fundamental mental qualities that the Buddha identified as leading directly to liberation. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) and other core teachings, Armstrong explains how these factors work sequentially and in balance: mindfulness (sati) establishes awareness, investigation (dhammavicaya) deepens understanding, energy (vīriya) provides momentum, rapture (pīti) brings joy, calm (passaddhi) settles the mind, concentration (samādhi) creates stability, and equanimity (upekkhā) maintains balance. Using vivid examples from great teachers like Dīpamā and practical meditation instructions, he shows how these wholesome states naturally arise when we 'starve the hindrances and feed the factors of awakening.' Armstrong emphasizes that while we cannot control the moment of awakening itself, we can cultivate the mental conditions that prepare the mind for liberation - creating what he calls 'the meditator's best friend' on the spiritual journey.

There was a story that made the rounds around the time of 9/11, one that came from the Native American tradition. Many of you probably heard it at the time.

A young boy had gone to school one day and had a very hard time because his classmates were picking on him and giving him great difficulty. He came home from school disturbed and related the story to his grandfather, saying that he wanted to go back and fight with the other kids who had picked on him. He asked his grandfather what he thought he should do.

The grandfather said, "Oh, I know this place well. I have had these same struggles all through this life." He continued, "It's as though there are two wolves living inside me. One of them is angry, enjoys hatred, and wants to seek vengeance. But the other wolf is kindly, full of concern for people, and wants to find harmony with everyone, even those who have hurt me. They struggle inside for my heart. Each one tries to dominate and wants to win."

The young boy said, "So grandfather, which one wins?"

The grandfather replied, "The one that I feed."

I like this story not only because it has great relevance for our life and for spiritual life in general, but also because the vocabulary is very similar to language the Buddha used in describing the course of our spiritual journey. The Buddha talked often about how our journey unfolds by starving the hindrances—those five difficult energies that Winnie talked about last week—and feeding what are called the factors of awakening.

So I want to talk tonight about these positive qualities within us that it's the purpose of our practice to feed and make grow, as we simultaneously weaken or starve the hindrances so that they tend to fade away.

There are seven qualities that the Buddha talked about, and he gave them the name "the seven factors of awakening." You may have also heard them called "the seven factors of enlightenment." The root of the word in Pali is bodhi, which comes from the same root as Buddha. It means to awaken. This translation of "enlightenment" is a strange Westernism, but really the word in Pali clearly points to waking up, awakening. So I'm going to use the term "the factors of awakening" here.

We shape our minds through cultivating these seven wholesome qualities through the practice we're doing, as we weaken the afflictive forces—you could call them the hindrances or the kilesas or the taints. This is how the meditative journey unfolds. This is how our spiritual path unfolds in this tradition.

These seven factors lead us to awakening and describe the mind that you might say is perched on the edge of awakening. They are capable of great depths of development. There may not be a limit to the development of these seven qualities. We get a sense of that potential when we meet great teachers who have developed these qualities extensively.

I mentioned the other night the Thai teacher Ajahn Jimnian, who has come to Spirit Rock many times and I'm sure we'll have him again. He was a great concentration prodigy when he was a child, but he also has a lot of insight and has developed his mind through Vipassana as well as Samatha practice. He said once, a few years ago, when talking about the development of his own heart and mind, that he hasn't had any anger in 25 years. And it seemed like that when you met him. That's a great development.

The other teacher that impressed me greatly in this regard was Dipa Ma. Dipa Ma was an Indian woman from Bengal who trained in Burma with great teachers there and then studied under Anagarika Munindra, Joseph's first teacher, for many years. By the time I met her, she was probably about 60. Her first visit to the United States was around 1980, and I got to spend a month looking after her when she came to Massachusetts.

I got to see her both in her teaching role and behind the scenes, and in both roles, she seemed the same. I was especially interested in watching her outside the meditation circle. She brought with her daughter, whose name is Dipa. Dipa Ma is just a name that means "mother of Dipa." So Dipa came, along with Dipa's son Rishi, who was four years old at the time.

Rishi was quite a little whirlwind when he was four. What was wonderful is we would take them out shopping in the nearby town and go through shopping malls because they wanted to buy clothes and sheets and bedding to take back to India, where you could get higher quality items here.

So we'd be going down the aisles of the department stores and Rishi would be kind of running out front, pulling hangers down. Clothes would be flying all over the floor, and it was generally just chaos in his wake. And then Dipa Ma would be running behind him, trying to put things right and hopefully slow him down—this little sixty-year-old woman in her white robes, flapping behind her as she ran down the aisle of the department store. And there was always a little grin on her face.

I thought, if she can laugh at trying to control a four-year-old in an American department store, that's good integration. Dipa Ma had that kind of unflappable quality.

And then in the Dharma seat, you got a sense of her tremendous inner strength. She's one of the strongest people I've ever known. Joseph Goldstein would sometimes go to visit her and she would say, "Oh, you look like you've been busy. I think you need to sit for a couple of days." But she didn't mean sit and walk and sit and walk. She meant sit down for two days and don't get up. That was her idea of sitting for a couple of days.

She was teaching at IMS one time in a fall retreat, and people were always struck by her presence. She had a very strong emanation. So they asked her, "Well, what's in your mind?" They were trying to get a handle on it—what's going on in there? What's in your mind?

She said, "There are only three things in my mind. There's loving kindness, there's concentration, and there's peace. That's it."

That's a pretty beautiful mind. That's what she was like. She sort of radiated all those qualities. There's a lovely biography of her out that's just entitled Dipa Ma. And I found that women practitioners especially relate very strongly to her. We don't have a huge number of teaching figures—women teaching figures in this tradition—and she is a really wonderful one to relate to. So I really recommend that book to you all.

These are the qualities that we grow and can grow to a great extent. The Buddha made, as you know, a lot of lists. There are a lot of lists of the unwholesome qualities of mind. There are a lot of lists of the beautiful qualities of mind. But I would say for meditators, this is maybe the most important list of qualities of mind.

Of course, in the beginning, it's really important to get to know the hindrances, the list that Winnie talked about earlier last week. As the retreat progresses, you gain more facility at working with the hindrances, and those become a little less important as the retreat goes on. You start to move into these beautiful states of mind with more frequency.

And then the list that gives the best map of these beautiful states of mind for a meditator on this journey is the list of the seven factors of awakening. So I hope you will regard them as great tools on your journey. I kind of regard them as the meditator's best friend, because these are the forces in the heart and mind that will carry us to awakening, carry us to liberation. This is from the Buddha. They lead to awakening. Therefore, they're called factors of awakening. Very sensible.

I'll just mention what they are and then I'll talk about each of them in a little more detail. The seven are mindfulness, investigation, energy, rapture, calm, concentration, and equanimity. They are all described as maturing in release. That is, when we first encounter them in our practice, they're small growths. Our practice in the initial stages is dominated by the hindrance forces and especially desire and aversion. And as these factors of awakening come through, they're small in the beginning and they look weak. It's easy to overlook them.

But as we continue to cultivate them, they grow up and they grow stronger. And when they mature, their result is release or freedom or liberation. This is their function. It's their destination. This is from the Buddha also.

Investigation in the context of Buddhist meditation is more of a direct knowing, a kind of intuitive inquiry that happens through awareness itself. It's the quality of mind that wants to know experience more intimately, not through thinking about it, but through being present with it in a receptive, open way.

When mindfulness shows us what's happening—breathing, sensation, emotion, thought—investigation is the factor that leans in with interest. It's like the difference between noticing that there's a flower in the garden and actually moving closer to really see it, to know its texture, its fragrance, its particular way of being. Investigation brings that same quality of interested, receptive attention to whatever is arising in our experience.

This isn't an aggressive probing or an analytical dissection. It's more like gentle curiosity. When a sensation arises, investigation might notice: Is this sensation hard or soft? Is it changing or stable? What happens to it when I don't resist it? When an emotion comes up, investigation observes: Where do I feel this in my body? How does it move? What is its essential nature?

The Buddha sometimes described investigation as the factor that distinguishes between what is beneficial and what is harmful, what leads toward freedom and what leads toward more entanglement. So investigation has a natural wisdom to it. It begins to see the patterns of our experience, recognizing what brings suffering and what brings peace.

As this quality of investigation develops, it naturally energizes the mind. When we become genuinely interested in our experience, when we start to see the fascinating interplay of mind and body, of arising and passing away, energy begins to build. This is how investigation leads to the third factor of awakening, which is energy or effort—viriya in Pali.

This energy isn't the kind of striving effort that comes from willpower or determination, though those qualities certainly have their place in practice. The energy that arises from investigation is more like enthusiasm. It's the natural energy that comes when we're engaged with something we find genuinely interesting. Think of how you feel when you're absorbed in an activity you love—there's an effortless quality to the energy, a sense of being naturally drawn forward.

In meditation, this manifests as a willingness to stay present, to keep showing up for whatever is arising. It's the energy that sustains our attention through difficult moments and keeps us engaged during periods when practice feels routine or challenging. This energy has a brightness to it, a sense of being alive and awake to the moment.

Investigation emphasizes a non-conceptual awareness. The better way to think about it is that investigation draws our attention closer to our experience so that we can feel it more intimately. That's how we investigate—not by thinking about the experience, but by taking an experience like the breath and moving the attention closer to it so that mindfulness knows it better, knows it more closely, knows it in more detail, knows it more thoroughly, feels it more directly.

When this happens, there's quite a lovely movement that happens in the mind. We have a natural affinity for the present when we get interested enough to get close to something.

A simple example: I came up for tea tonight and got to the dining hall just before tea time. I looked up toward the meditation hall and there was a small herd of deer grazing on the lawn out there. Further up the hillside, the late afternoon sun was casting those long shadows and that kind of golden light on the hills all the way up to the ridge. It was just a very beautiful scene.

Of course, our Spirit Rock deer are different. They're not like the deer in the rest of Woodacre. These are really cooled-out deer. What you'll notice is you can get fairly close to these deer, and they don't get afraid. I think it's the result not of genetic traits passed along—because we have deer at our house ten minutes from here who are spooked much more quickly than these deer—but of being around people who are peaceful, moving slowly, and non-threateningly.

There was this lovely group of six deer just grazing very slowly and meditatively out on the lawn. I was transfixed by the sight. I just stood at the entrance to the dining hall for a while, watching them because it was so beautiful.

When the interest is there, when the curiosity is there, the mind is naturally drawn to closer contact with what we're feeling or observing. It's a natural process.

Then you get a feeling for this other word the Buddha used a lot for the kind of attention we give in meditation. It's often translated as wise attention. I might rather call it careful attention. The Pali word is yoniso manasikara. Manasikara means attention. Yoniso is the Pali word being translated as wise, or, I would say, careful.

Now the root of this word yoniso is yoni. If you know Hindi or Pali or Sanskrit, this refers to the womb. So probably a more literal translation of this word is womb-like attention.

People sometimes criticize Buddhism for being too masculine or too patriarchal, but in the Buddha's elaboration of this very central kind of meditative attitude, he calls it a womb-like attention. What's involved in that image of being womb-like? The womb is embracing, sheltering, nurturing, and holding with care and love. This is the kind of attention we're asked to bring to our experience.

Mindfulness in its fullness is said to be without greed, hatred, or delusion—alobha, adosa, amoha. This word adosa literally means without hatred, but the Buddha often used this negative language to imply the beautiful quality of it. Within this womb-like attention, there's a sense of the absence of hatred, which is actually pointing to the presence of loving-kindness, the opposite of hatred.

I think of mindfulness as having intrinsically this warm, nurturing, womb-like quality that establishes an embracing kind of relationship with our experience. Investigation can deepen this relationship of mindfulness to the experience that we're with.

Investigation is one of the factors that can be strengthened very directly by your effort in the present moment. Let's look at some simple examples of that.

Let's say you're experiencing the breath and you want to heighten this feature of investigation. How could you do it? I think James led a guided meditation the other morning that went through a few different ways to bring a greater sense of interest and investigation. I'll just mention a couple here.

One is that with every in-breath, there's a beginning, a middle, and an end. With every out-breath, there's a beginning, middle, and an end. Can you see each of those three stages in an in-breath and an out-breath? When you look to find them, you're heightening investigation and you're bringing the awareness closer to the object of the breath.

Here's another suggestion. Sayadaw U Pandita, who's a very demanding meditation teacher, would ask his students at the beginning of a retreat as they were first coming into relationship with the breath, a question like this: When you breathe in, can you notice three distinct sensations in that in-breath? And when you breathe out, can you notice three distinct sensations that are part of that out-breath?

In other words, we might think as we begin that an in-breath is one sensation. But if we look more closely, there are lots of sensations on an in-breath. An in-breath lasts a few seconds. Whether you follow it at the abdomen or the nose, you'll feel a lot of little dancing particles of sensing coming alive and passing away.

Moment by moment in an in-breath, moment by moment in an out-breath. So can you find and name three distinct sensations in an in-breath, three distinct sensations in an out-breath? And then he would say, "I want you to report them to me in the next interview. So you're really going to be on the spot in a few days." Believe me, you get motivated to look closely.

And then you would come back and report to him your three sensations. And then he would say, "Okay, next interview I want you to tell me one more that you haven't seen before." So again, one is motivated to look closely.

If we're investigating our emotions, we might look at three aspects of an emotion. The mood or coloring that it has in the mind—the way joy tastes different than contentment, the way that irritation tastes different than frustration. So look at the tone or the mood directly. Look at its expression in the body. If the emotion is strong, you'll feel it somewhere in the body. And the third is to look at what kinds of thoughts come with an emotion. Emotions tend to generate thoughts that are like them. So those are ways of investigating the emotion. Look at those three aspects of the experience and get close to each one.

This quality is one of the most direct expressions of the faculty of wisdom. We often talk about our practice as being, in the end, all about wisdom. It's really what we activate that enables us to understand our experience. And it's the understanding that frees us. Experiences come and go, but wisdom grows. And the more wisdom grows, the more we understand what's happening and the less we get caught. So wisdom is really the high person on the totem pole in Buddhist practice. It's the liberating factor. It's what we're really working toward.

But how do you activate it? What is wisdom? It's kind of an abstract concept. It's not conceptual either. It doesn't come from thinking about things. Insights are its expression, but insights are not always there. They come when they come and they're not always there, and you can't force them by thinking about them. That doesn't work.

So how do we support or activate wisdom? Investigation is one of the most direct ways because we're asking the question, "Let me know more about what this experience is. Let me see more deeply into it. Let me understand it more thoroughly." So we're activating that wisdom factor immediately with the growth of investigation.

As you develop this quality of investigation, one of the things you'll notice is that it generates an even greater sense of interest in what we're experiencing. And with that greater sense of interest comes a kind of alertness. It's as if the mind wakes up. There's a brightness of energy and we want to look even more closely, and that kind of waking up quality and the added alertness that comes leads to the next factor, which is energy.

Investigation brings with it the arising of energy. Energy is a direct translation of the Pali word virya. But there are many translations of this word. None of them quite hit the mark. So let's talk around the word by the different translations. Another translation that's often used is effort. And then another popular translation is energetic effort, because people couldn't decide whether it's energy or effort, so they just shoved them together. Some of the other words I like to translate virya are courage, ardor, and my current favorite, enthusiasm. When we're enthusiastic about our meditation, we give energy to it. And that picks up our practice a lot.

From all of these, you'll get a sense of what's involved in virya. It is a kind of energy. It can be both of body and of mind, and you'll experience it both of body and of mind. It's the energy that keeps us awake and refreshed and coming to sittings. It's the energy that makes us want to look closely. But it's energy not in a random way—energy that's directed toward the path.

This quality reflects the very nature of mind itself. As the Buddha taught: "Energy is aroused for the abandoning of unwholesome states and the development of wholesome states. One is strong, firm, not shirking from the responsibility of cultivating wholesome states."

This quotation illuminates both the direction and the attitude that underlies virya. The energy flows toward wholesome states, but there's something more—an unmistakable heroic element. Virya comes from the Pali root vira, meaning hero. This heroic quality is essential because the work of abandoning the unwholesome and cultivating the wholesome isn't easy.

As you well know, unwholesome states carry tremendous momentum built through endless repetition of our karmic patterns. For years and years—perhaps lifetimes—these tendencies of greed, aversion, and delusion have gathered force behind them. When we enter into direct relationship with these patterns, we feel their impact again and again, moment after moment. Yet in the midst of this challenge, we must simultaneously develop wholesome qualities.

This is the great work of practice—anything but simple. Virya is the element in mind that enables us to return to this relationship moment after moment, transforming whatever unwholesome states we encounter into the beautiful qualities that represent our deepest potential.

The strength of virya depends largely on our level of motivation. None of you would have undertaken the work you have without strong motivation driving you forward. When I contemplate motivation, I find it helpful to look at other fields of human endeavor, particularly professional athletics.

Take tennis, a sport I've long been passionate about. I've played for years, love discussing it, watching matches on television, attending tournaments live. What fascinates me most are those who truly excel. Consider today's top players—Roger Federer and Rafael Nadal. Their athletic conditioning is superb. They can spend five hours on a blazing hot court, running at full speed, battling each other with fierce intensity. Federer barely appears to perspire, while Nadal looks as though he could continue for five more hours without missing a beat.

Their physical conditioning is remarkable, and the financial rewards substantial—Federer's earnings likely exceed twenty million dollars. When Andre Agassi dominated the circuit, I read extensively about his training regimen. Living in Las Vegas—that desert city where heat dominates most of the year—he worked with a demanding coach from the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. This coach would take Agassi into the hills surrounding the city, forcing him to run sprints up steep inclines in the scorching mid-day heat until Andre would vomit from sheer exhaustion. Only when he reached that point of complete depletion would his coach say, "Good, that's enough for today. Now you can shower."

This was Agassi's chosen path to the level of athleticism he sought. Yet of all the athletes who've impressed me with their dedication, professional cyclists remain the most extraordinary, especially during Lance Armstrong's era. Though he won the Tour de France seven times, what captivated me wasn't just his success but his mastery of one of the most grueling feats humans undertake.

The Tour de France spans nearly a month—July into August—crossing some of France's highest mountains, through the Alps and Pyrenees. Day after day for more than twenty stages, with only occasional rest days, these athletes must ride at maximum intensity against the world's finest competitors. They're literally riding their hearts out.

Lance once explained that his advantage came from an unusually high tolerance for pain. Every time he mounted his bicycle for a race, he knew he faced eight hours of unrelenting suffering. That was simply the nature of his chosen sport—what all cyclists at that level accept as their reality.

But consider: what drives such dedication? Fame and fortune, certainly. Yet how does this compare to the motivation for liberating the heart and mind?

That's like small stakes compared to what we're doing. But each of us is making that same kind of heroic effort in our way. Every time we come in here and we're willing to meet the physical pain or the restless mind or the pain of the heart that may be years and decades old, we're exhibiting that same kind of heroic quality with our meditation.

Sometimes meditation encourages us to really take this heroism to our limit. I came on one three-month course during a year when the teachers were all practicing and studying with Sayadaw U Pandita, this demanding teacher from Burma that I mentioned, and they were teaching in his style. So we were told when we entered the retreat that we were expected to sleep four hours a night, not more, and we should be doing continuous mental noting for the twenty hours that we were awake.

I was a little taken aback because I was used to sleeping six hours a night in retreat. I could cruise pretty well at six, but I'd never tried to get down to four. And I did mental noting some of the time, but I had not been used to doing it all twenty other hours. So I thought, okay, this is the instruction, I'm going to do it. And then every day in the interview, my teachers would ask me, "How many hours did you sit, how many hours did you walk, and how many hours did you sleep?" So I'd have to keep track of that and report to them.

After many sleepy sittings and sleepy walkings and even sleepy standings, I did manage to get my sleep down to four hours a night. And then I found that I could cruise at that level. I mean, it was hard work, but the sleep was not a problem after a certain time. I'd go to bed at eleven, I'd get up at three, and I got kind of used to that rhythm. And then I did the noting practice very continuously in the other twenty hours.

I have to say it was one of the most fruitful periods of meditation practice that I've done. It was definitely the hardest, but I also learned a tremendous amount. Some things I don't think I could have learned any other way. So it was very valuable. It was a challenge to my level of energy. It was not easy. But now that I look back, I'm really glad that I did it. It was very fruitful.

So that's one model of viriya, of the heroic approach to practice. But there's another kind of viriya that is simply about perseverance. Energy that simply goes on and on and on will also reach the goal. So it doesn't have to be this most intense kind of all-out effort, but simply doing our practice steadily on and on and on will also reach the goal.

There's a great figure in Tibetan history named Milarepa, who I'm sure you've heard of, a great eleventh-century yogi who spent most of his time out in the wilds and caves, living on nettles, dressing very simply in a white robe and doing inner heat practice to stay warm. Milarepa had a couple of very famous disciples, Gampopa and Rechungpa, both of whom went on to found great schools in Tibetan Buddhism.

This story is about Gampopa. He was completing a period of training under Milarepa and had gotten lots of teachings, lots of empowerments, lots of transmissions, and was about to go off on his own and do his own solitary retreat. Very sad to leave his teacher, but he knew that he had to go off to do his practice. So he was taking his leave of Milarepa and started wandering down the mountain path to go off into his own hermitage.

He got partway down, and Milarepa said, "Wait, come back." Gampopa came back. Milarepa said, "There's one more pith transmission that I want to give you." Gampopa was very curious, very eager. Oh, this is really the heart of it. So Milarepa turned around, he turned his back to Gampopa, flipped up the hem of his white robe and bent over, showed him his backside, which was described as being as hard with calluses as the hoof of a camel, and then said to Gampopa, "This is the secret of my success. Persistence in meditation is really what you need. I've only gotten to where I am by meditating with this kind of dedication. So as you go off, please also meditate with this kind of diligence to achieve your own success."

So just that carrying forth, carrying on. This is from Sayadaw U Tejaniya, the Burmese teacher we've mentioned a few times: "Right effort means to keep reminding yourself to be aware. Right effort is persistent effort. It is not energy used to focus hard on something. It is effort which is simply directed at remaining aware. It is not difficult to be aware or mindful. It is difficult to maintain it continuously. For this, you need right effort, which is simply perseverance."

Of this perseverance, Bhikkhu Bodhi had a really lovely comment in a book of his on the Eightfold Path, where he said, "In order to reach the goal, you only need two things. You need to begin and you need to continue."

And if you do those two things, the outcome is assured. That's the persistent quality of virya, just keeping going.

So as we make our effort, as we exert ourselves in this practice with this bright, alert energy, in time it brings the next quality, which is called rapture. The Pali term is piti. We use the term rapture because it's gotten somewhat standardized, but it's an odd word, isn't it? Do you use it much in everyday conversation? I hardly ever hear this word outside of religious context, so it's a little peculiar. But I think a better translation is something like rapt attention or joyful interest.

So this brightness that comes when the energy is there and we're making a connection to our meditation subject—we find a kind of joy in coming into relationship with it. In the beginning, say when we're with the breath or the body, it just seems like a lot of hard work. Doesn't seem like much fun. But as the interest rises, as the energy rises, over time this becomes a happy kind of activity. Our relationship to the object starts to light up with some kind of pleasure, some kind of enjoyment as we connect with it. And it's this enjoyment of the focus that is pointed to by the word piti or rapture. So we find that we like being where we're turning our mind.

In the beginning it seems like a lot of work and there are many things that are far more interesting, but at this point we like being there with the object. Even the breath, which seems very neutral and not particularly sexy, starts to seem appealing.

There's a teacher in Australia named Ajahn Brahm. If you follow Buddhist news, you will have heard of him because he carried out an ordination of bhikkhuni in the Theravada tradition. I believe this was the first Western bhikkhuni to be ordained, to take full ordination, which means 254 precepts for a woman. It threw the monastic community into something of a tizzy because it was quite unorthodox. Ajahn Brahm wanted to make a strong statement, and he did so, and there have been follow-on ordinations of other women in the bhikkhuni lineage.

Ajahn Brahm teaches concentration practice on the breath. One of the phrases he uses to incline people to that practice is to tell them to look for the beautiful breath. When you can discover the beautiful breath in your practice—discover the beauty that is with the breath—then your mind will go there naturally, easily, in an unforced way. And this is the quality of rapture, piti.

It's a mental factor, born out of our relationship—the mind's relationship to the subject—but it's a quality that has physical expression. When people are describing rapture or piti, they'll often talk about the energy that comes in the body. It's an arousing factor and brings up energy in the body.

Classically, there are different descriptions. There's minor piti, which is a kind of trembling all over the skin. There's momentary piti, which is like a flash of lightning of energy in the body. There's showering piti, which is like waves of energy passing through. There's uplifting piti where the body feels very light, as though it could lift up and float away. This is the quality responsible for yogis being able to levitate.

Do you remember when Maharishi Mahesh Yogi used to teach levitation? They'd go off into those retreats in Indiana—everybody who wants to come levitate, come for a meditation retreat. I was very skeptical about those retreats, especially about the advertisements. But I met someone this summer who was on those retreats, and she said many people were bouncing across the hall because they had learned to lift. They couldn't quite sustain it, so they'd come back down, but they were moving under the power of this kind of piti. The Buddhist texts also describe this phenomenon, so this is what's responsible for levitation.

And there's an all-pervading rapture where it fills the body. Mostly, this is a pleasant experience. There's the joy of being with the object, and then as the energy comes up, there's a pleasurable quality to it. It's often paired with this word sukha. Descriptions of the jhana speak of rapture and pleasure filling the body and pervading the body.

But in the early stages, as the rapture gets strong, the energy is sometimes so strong that it's not pleasant. It can become a little too intense or even overwhelming at times, and its experience is uncomfortable. There's simply too much of it happening. This is the culmination of the arousing cycle of the seven factors of enlightenment.

That over-strong energy of piti is dealt with by the second half of the seven factors as they unfold. The pleasure in being with the object takes away much of the mind's restless movements to past and future out of either sense desire, because it's already pleasurable, or aversion, because the current experience is pleasurable.

So the mind starts to settle based on the likableness of this present moment experience of rapture. The mind discovers through meditation itself—not through external objects, people, or relationships—a source of pleasure and happiness. It finds its fulfillment to some extent here and now, just through the meditation. That cuts down many of the movements outward toward pleasure or in reaction through aversion. And so it begins to bring about a settling of the mind in the mind-body experience, a settling within ourselves.

This is the development of the next factor, the first of the tranquilizing factors, which is called calm. The mind isn't moving around so much, things start to calm down, and one's mind settles within the mind-body present. It is this deepening of calm that starts to modulate, starts to soften, starts to temper the piti energy if it's gotten too strong, if it's gotten a little too intense.

This experience of calm is not something that happens often in most people's daily life. When meditators come upon this, sometimes for the first time in practice, it's occasionally a little unexpected. A common reaction is, "This is not very interesting. This is kind of boring. I mean, look, a few days ago I was having a lot of strong emotions. I was really processing this old relationship that I hadn't come to grips with before. There was a big opening in the heart that was accompanied by a lot of pain, but a lot of release. The energy was up. It was really interesting. I had something to talk about in my interviews. And then that all sort of went away, and now, well, really, I have to tell you, I'm sorry, but there's nothing happening in my practice anymore."

This state of "nothing happening" is actually quite an interesting point because it's announcing the emergence of the quality of calm. And as you probably know, the Buddha said that the state of peace was really a pretty good place to be.

At first it may seem like it's not very interesting because the experience is fairly neutral. And boredom is basically an aversion to the neutral. We can deal with it in two ways: we can become more comfortable with the presence of the neutral, or we can heighten the quality of investigation to get more interested in what's going on. Boredom is basically a result of not looking closely enough to find interest.

We can work with it in either of those ways, but mostly we want to start to appreciate the sense of peace that is growing, that we're discovering, and let ourselves simply sink into it and let it continue to enlarge. If we just accept it and settle, it will continue to enlarge by itself.

Then it leads into the next of the factors, which is concentration. Concentration, you remember, is this quality of collectedness of mind. So calm comes as we start to find some fulfillment within. Concentration comes as we deepen that willingness to let go of the mind going out and come more and more to collect the energy in the present moment in our experience of mind and body.

This experience of concentration brings a certain quality of strength into the mind. As you've discovered as you've been exploring it here on the cushion, when we sustain our attention in the present moment for a while, there's something that feels really solid in our awareness. It feels like it's not so easy to be shaken by a passing thought, by a mood, or even by a pain in the body—a much greater steadiness of attention even as things are changing around us.

The strength of this quality of concentration is important. In the years before we built the retreat facility here, this hall and the residences, this side of the road and the hillside on the other side formed a kind of natural amphitheater. Once every year or two, we invited Thich Nhat Hanh to teach here. We built a platform for him on the other side of the creek that was high enough that people could see him, and then we would all sit in this natural amphitheater on the ground and his voice would be amplified. We would have 1,500 people here for a day of teaching from him.

It was quite extraordinary—his presence in this setting. He has such stillness of body and slowness of speech that it was as though his stillness cast a spell over the whole 1,500 people on the hillside. The spell that he cast was of concentration. Just by his presence and tuning into it, everybody there just settled in, and the whole crowd became very quiet. There's a photo of him taking almost a thousand people from that day for a walk up the road to the end of the path in those two meadows—silent walking meditation. It was very beautiful.

Concentration has two major benefits. One is that it brings with it a sense of well-being. The quality of peace and the sense of self-sufficiency just feels great. In some ways, it's what we're looking for through meditation—it's one piece of what we're looking for.

The other great benefit is that when the mind gets still, that is the best foundation for insight to arise. When the mind's moving all over the place, we can't see so clearly. It's like you're on a merry-go-round, spinning round and round and round, and a friend comes up with a newspaper and holds it in front of you and says, "Can you read it?" No, because you're going by too quickly. But as the merry-go-round slows down...

You come to a halt in front of your friend, and then your friend says, "Now can you read the newspaper?"

"Yeah."

"Well, what does the newspaper say?"

"It says life is change. If you hold on, you suffer. There's not really any self there in the first place. So just let go."

It's concentration that lets us read the news and understand that's the way things really are.

As we develop this sense of stillness and steadiness, the mind gets stronger. All the changing movements of pleasure and pain that normally create stirrings in our mind—our human situation basically is we're stirred up by greed and aversion in reaction to the passing show of pleasure and pain. That's the whole problem. As the mind gets stronger, the passing show of pleasure and pain doesn't make so much impact. And when it doesn't make so much impact, those things actually get less significant. They don't stir us as much. We don't have to care about them as much. And we find that the mind can stay in balance even as the passing show goes on.

This is the last of the seven factors called equanimity. Equanimity is no longer being so moved by the changing factors of pleasure and pain. Equanimity is a very high state of the conditioned states that we can develop. It's the last of the seven factors of enlightenment. It's the last of the ten paramis. It's the last of the brahmaviharas. And it's the last stage in the progress of insight described in the Visuddhimagga before awakenings. You might say that equanimity is the closest conditioned state to the unconditioned.

So this is the culmination of the seven factors of awakening. When all of these are brought together and in balance, then the mind has this alert stillness that's really poised either for good mundane insight or for supramundane insight, for the opening to the unconditioned.

Let me close with two quotations from the Buddha:

"Because these seven factors of awakening, when developed and cultivated, lead to peace, to direct knowledge, to awakening, to Nibbana. They are noble and emancipating. They lead the one who acts upon them to the complete destruction of suffering."

"Whoever has been liberated, is liberated, or will be liberated in the future—all will do so by overcoming the five hindrances that stain the mind, by firmly establishing their minds in the foundations of mindfulness, and by cultivating the seven factors of awakening in their true nature."

Let's just sit for a minute together, please.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 91

Mettā: Tenderness & Connection

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this dharma talk from a February monthlong retreat, Guy Armstrong delves into the profound but often subtle benefits of mettā (loving-kindness) practice. While the immediate effects of loving-kindness—increased warmth, reduced self-judgment, and diminished criticism of others—are readily apparent, Armstrong focuses on two deeper transformations that emerge gradually: tenderness and connection.
>
> Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on the eleven benefits of loving-kindness practice, Armstrong explains how mettā develops our innate human sensitivity into a spiritual strength. Through the brahmavihāras (divine abodes), we learn to hold both joy and sorrow with an open heart, cultivating what Chögyam Trungpa called our "soft spot"—a vulnerable tenderness that becomes our gateway to genuine compassion.
>
> The talk explores how loving-kindness practice reveals our fundamental interconnectedness, breaking through the illusion of isolation that causes so much suffering. Armstrong shares the Buddha's teaching that through countless rebirths, all beings have been intimately connected as family members, leading to the Metta Sutta's instruction to cherish all beings "even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child." This recognition can blossom into bodhicitta—the awakening heart that aspires to liberation for the benefit of all beings. Through stories ranging from whale rescues to the Dalai Lama's responses to criticism, Armstrong demonstrates how mature mettā becomes a source of strength, wisdom, and fearless compassion in daily life.

So it is unusually cold today. In case you wondered if that was really real, it is really real. On top of Mount Tam, which is the highest peak in Marin, there are three inches of snow tonight, with about two more inches expected. So that's really unusual. So it is really cold.

That's why tonight I wanted to talk about mettā. I thought it would warm us up a little bit. Really, I want to do it because we haven't talked a lot about mettā, and I'm a very big enthusiast of this practice. It's really a wonderful practice that brings so many benefits to us. Some of the benefits are somewhat clear early on. Some of them are not so apparent, and those are the ones that I want to talk more about tonight—the ones that are not so apparent.

But early on from doing the loving-kindness practice we can feel the growth in us of more warmth and more sweetness and more relationship with the people that we bring in, the friend and benefactor and even perhaps the difficult person. So we feel that warming up of our emotional field very immediately with the practice of loving-kindness.

We notice that as we feel better about ourselves, as the mettā for ourself starts to grow, other problems immediately go away. We feel less in conflict with ourselves, less self-judgment. We tend to feel less in conflict with other people. Someone commented in an interview today that as the mettā for self has grown, the judgments of others have gone way down just very naturally.

I noticed that a lot when I was doing intensive mettā practice. I started off, as we usually do in a retreat, with a reasonable amount of hindrances, a reasonable harvest of hindrances to work with. But as the mettā started to kick in, the judgments went completely away. Any judging thoughts of other people just disappeared. So these are some of the things that we notice immediately.

The Buddha talked about eleven benefits of loving-kindness practice. I'm going to read them a little slowly so that you can kind of feel into each one. These apply to a mind that has really become mature or steeped in loving-kindness: One sleeps easily, wakes easily, and has pleasant dreams. People love you. Devas and animals love you. Devas protect you. Weapons can't harm you. The mind is joyful. The face is serene. You die peacefully and you have a good rebirth.

It's almost worth doing for those reasons. It's a good list.

But tonight I want to talk mostly about two benefits that aren't so obvious right away, but these are kind of like slow-growing insights that dawn on us over the course of doing mettā over a period of time. These may be two of the deeper shifts that happen to us, and I'm going to call them tenderness and connection.

So this quality of tenderness is something that grows little by little. You know the best things in meditation grow little by little. A lot of things can happen with a bang, but things that come quickly also tend to pass away quickly. Or as one of my teachers said, experiences are like clouds—they come and they go. But realization is like space. You sort of don't notice it. And wisdom, he was tying this with wisdom, grows slowly.

You can think about this when you think about the real lasting fruits of your meditation practice. One of the main ones is equanimity, the balance of mind that lets you be even with all the changes that life presents. This quality of equanimity can't be rushed.

It's not something that you can figure out in one retreat. It takes a lot of steady application over years to develop a strong sense of equanimity, but it's one of the most lasting strengths that we can have in our lives.

So the growth of tenderness and connection are a little bit like this too. They don't necessarily hit us over the head right away, but they grow slowly and strongly and they're really important.

This quality of tenderness—there's kind of an inherent tenderness to being human because we're very sensitive beings. We're very sensitive to changes of pleasure and pain. The fact that our skin is not covered by a thick fur is one factor that makes us more sensitive than most other creatures. The horses down there in the front field, I don't know if you've noticed, but sometimes it can be raining and they won't go under cover. Notice that? This rain will be coming down, you know it's cold, and they just stand there because they have very thick coats and thick hide.

It doesn't penetrate so much, but we're very sensitive as human beings. And then we take this innate sensitivity and in the practice of loving kindness, we're developing it every moment by tuning into our metta person and going, "Are you well? I hope you're well. Are you happy? I hope you're happy. Are you healthy? I hope you're healthy." This is what we're doing all through our metta practice. We're kind of checking in: How is this experience of life for you?

As we tune into the compassion practice, which I think James introduced today, then we also tune into the potential for suffering. So we're always, through the Brahma Viharas, we're always kind of holding people's hearts in our hands and saying, "How is your experience of life? Is it happy or is it sorrowful? I care about that. I want it to be happy. I don't want you to be in sorrow." So we're developing this sensitivity or tenderness in every moment of doing our practices of love and compassion for people. We're waking the heart up to the joys and sorrows in life, our own and others'.

This is from Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche on something that he called our soft spot: "It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for tenderness. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate. A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound, which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere, so we are not completely covered with a coat of armor all the time. What a relief."

So this tenderness is kind of a vulnerable thing, but it's also our way into feeling and our way into opening the heart. One of the reasons we're vulnerable is we know at any time anything can happen. Anything can happen. And so we're faced with the potential of loss, of hurt, of pain, really at any moment. As you know, you can go into a doctor's office for a checkup. They do one test on you, and a few days later you get the message that changes your life. It can happen any time.

Other things. One of our friends was making a spiritual journey and a little bit of a vacation to India a few years ago. And he was there with his partner. They were staying in a bungalow very close to the beach. And he went out on the beach one morning to do some exercise and just enjoy the tropical air. This was down near Madras. But the morning happened to be December 26, 2004.

And he was standing on the beach. And all of a sudden, this big wave came up and knocked him over. He said, "That's strange. Usually it's a very placid beach." And so he got up, and as he was standing up, he watched the wave going out. And he noticed that it left this huge gulf behind it. It swept too much water out to sea and he got alarmed and he went into his bungalow and pulled his partner out and said, "Come on we've got to get to some higher ground." So another wave was coming so they jumped up on this brick stone wall.

And he grabbed a hold of a palm tree, and his partner grabbed a hold of him, and they just stood there, anchored as well as they could, about four feet above the beach. And then the second wave came. And you probably know that's the wave that was the real tsunami that killed thousands of people in that part of the ocean, India and Thailand and Sri Lanka. But because he hung on to the palm tree and his partner hung on to him, they were okay. They were rattled as the wave came up, but they hung on and they were all right. There's one point where you don't want to follow the advice of non-clinging. Clinging saved his life, so that was helpful.

But anything can happen. Just a normal day in South India.

Another kind of interesting story is the life of Nyoshul Ken Rinpoche. He was a very great teacher in the last fifty years of the twentieth century, one of the great Dzogchen masters of Tibet. He was born in ancient Tibet and grew up in that system where he spent many years in retreat, received teachings and training from great masters, and practiced really deeply.

In 1949 the invasion happened and things started to become more difficult for the Tibetans. Finally he fled in 1959 with the Dalai Lama. He fled to India. He was highly recognized at that point—thirty-seven years old and very well known, a great master. But he was in a strange country where the Tibetan community had not gotten well established. So his life was a little bit of a wandering life.

He said, "Sometimes I gave empowerments to great assemblies of people, including dozens of tulkus and thousands of monks. At other times, I was utterly poor, living hand to mouth on the streets in Calcutta, wandering around with my hand out begging for pennies. So many unexpected ups and downs. Who can describe them?"

We just never know.

A few years ago, I was teaching a long retreat at IMS on the East Coast. There was a young man who had come to practice, very devoted to meditation practice, Dharma practice, and he became very inspired during the three months. At the end of the time, he wanted to go off and ordain as a bhikkhu somewhere—maybe the U.S., maybe England, maybe Asia. So he went home and was putting his life in order so that he could go off and devote his whole life to Dharma practice when he came down with this mysterious illness.

It affected his digestion so seriously that he couldn't eat a normal diet. And he had a lot of pain, bodily pain, no matter what he did. So the possibility of going off to ordain was no longer an option because his health wouldn't allow it. So here he was, young, seemingly in the flush of youth, on fire for practice, and his body wouldn't support him. What to do? Not an easy situation.

I've kept in touch with him over the years. He's still very into practice, practices when he can. His health is improving. He's understood more about diet. The situation is still not easy for him.

So life throws us these unexpected situations. How do we respond? How does the heart get strong enough to hold these kinds of changes, to hold these unpredictable events that can be so difficult to adjust to?

One of the beautiful things about the system of the Brahma Viharas is that it shows us how an awakened heart can respond to the joys and sorrows of life. Metta is the heart opening, compassion shows the response to suffering, sympathetic joy shows the approach to happiness, and equanimity holds it all in balance. So it gives us an overview of what's possible for our human potential.

But then how do we develop it? How do we move into that wisdom?

I like this quote from Bob Dylan. This is from his memoirs, Chronicles. He said, "My grandma was filled with nobility and goodness. Told me once that happiness isn't on the road to anywhere, that happiness is the road. Had also instructed me to be kind because everyone you'll ever meet is fighting a hard battle."

This is that attitude of caring and compassion that can pervade our relationship to life if we let it. And it means opening up in each new moment and seeing who we're in touch with and what's happening for them and what's happening for ourselves. This constant tuning in to the experience of sentient beings is what creates this connected feeling. It's really quite amazing.

So then there are these stories that illustrate these moments of connection that are very strong. There was a story that appeared in the San Francisco Chronicle a few years ago. Most of you probably know that humpback whales do annual migration from further north down the coast of California. Then they go to Baja California in the spring where they breed. They have their babies in the warmer waters.

So one December, there was a female humpback whale that was going by the coast near San Francisco, actually near the Farallon Islands, which are about fifteen miles off the coast here. Some fishermen came upon her, and unfortunately she had run into an area where crab fishermen had set up their traps. The way that crab fishers set up their traps is they lay out these nylon ropes with what are called crab pots hanging off them. The crabs get caught in the pots and the fishermen reel them in. Well, the thing is that these ropes with the pots are really quite heavy.

So she had gotten tangled up in numerous ropes, some wound around her body four times—around her back, her flipper, her tail, and her mouth. Each line carried about a thousand pounds of weight from the crab pots attached to it. The fishermen who discovered her could see that the ropes were cutting deeply into her flesh, and the tremendous weight was pulling her down. She was struggling desperately to swim to the surface for air, fighting a losing battle against the relentless downward pull. Without intervention, she would inevitably sink beneath the weight.

The fishermen called the Marine Mammal Center on the Marin headlands, and a rescue team was quickly assembled. It took several hours to locate her, but when they arrived with a group of divers, the enormity of the challenge became clear. How do you approach a creature of such immense size and power? One flip of her tail could easily kill a human being. Yet here was a whale drowning, and they faced the terrible choice between risking their own lives and watching her perish.

The divers chose to enter the water.

Armed with curved knives, they began the painstaking work of cutting through the ropes. One diver later described working around her massive head, carefully cutting the line that encircled her mouth. "Her eye was right there," he said, "watching me, winking at me. It was an epic moment of my life." Can you imagine swimming alongside that enormous, gentle eye as you work to free her from her bonds?

After an hour of careful, dangerous work, they managed to cut through all the lines. The moment the whale realized she was no longer burdened, she began swimming in circles in what appeared to be pure joy. Then something extraordinary happened—she swam deliberately to each diver and nuzzled them, one by one.

One rescuer described it this way: "It felt to me like she was thanking us, knowing that she was free and that we had helped her. She stopped about a foot away from me, pushed me around a little bit and had some fun. She seemed kind of affectionate, like a dog that's happy to see you. I never felt threatened. It was an amazing, unbelievable experience."

Such moments are rare gifts. Imagine that kind of heart-to-heart exchange with a mammal of such magnificent size, feeling her sentience and joy at being freed. These are the experiences that break through our ordinary barriers and remind us of something profound about connection.

This is precisely the kind of connection that the brahmaviharas make possible for us. It's so powerful because most of the time, we don't recognize how deeply connected we actually are. We forget. It's remarkably easy to forget, because the ego-mind has this persistent trick of making us feel isolated. We tell ourselves that we're fundamentally different, unique in some essential way—either better than others or worse than others. One way or another, we convince ourselves we're separate, not like everyone else.

By repeating this story to ourselves over and over, we begin to believe it completely, and it creates an profound sense of separation. "I'm not really part of the human family," we tell ourselves. "Everyone else belongs, but I don't fit because of this quality or that quality. I'm outside. I'm on the outside."

The brahmaviharas directly challenge this sense of isolation. I remember teaching a retreat for scientists a couple of years ago—we occasionally hold meditation retreats specifically for people in the physical sciences, social sciences, and neuroscience, because there's such growing interest in the intersection between neuroscience and contemplative practice. We want neuroscientists to experience these states from the inside, not just study them from the outside.

During one of these retreats, as we were discussing metta and the nature of connection, one scientist mentioned a recent study showing that one of the deepest sources of unhappiness for people was precisely this sense of isolation.

One of the greatest normalizing qualities was a sense of being connected. And you can look at this culture where so many threads of connection have gone. The family is not held together so strongly. The communities are not so functional. And people often feel isolated in their apartments or homes. This creates a deep sense of unhappiness, as though we are not part of the family—the human family. So metta shows us something different.

I want to talk about how this happens. First I want to read a little bit of this poem from Naomi Shihab Nye called "Kindness." She's a Palestinian-American poet and has some really beautiful creations. This is just a fragment from a poem called "Kindness":

"Before you know kindness as the deepest thing inside, you must know sorrow as the other deepest thing. You must wake up with sorrow. You must speak to it till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth. Then it is only kindness that makes sense anymore. Only kindness that ties your shoes and sends you out into the day to mail letters and purchase bread. Only kindness that raises its head from the crowd of the world to say, it is I you have been looking for, and then goes with you everywhere like a shadow or a friend."

What I love in this passage is the line, "till your voice catches the thread of all sorrows and you see the size of the cloth." The size of the cloth is all sentient life. All sentient life knows sorrow, knows happiness, knows pain, and knows pleasure. And as we sink into this realization through loving-kindness practice, we start to realize that we're all in that same boat. All of us are dealing with these basic problems of the succession of pleasure and pain that's out of our control and how anything can happen. Our life can be taken away. Our health can be taken away. Our loved ones can be taken away. We're all that vulnerable in the same situation.

So this is one of the great connecting truths of the Brahmavihara practice. Our basic concerns are the same. Those four phrases that you've been working with—they apply for everyone. Safety, happiness, health, and ease. We're all looking for the same things. So that's one level of connection. We see that basically it's the same heart in each of us, open to the same kind of joy and sorrow, and open to the same possibility of love in each of us.

Then there's another way we're deeply connected that the Buddha talked about. The Buddha had different kinds of psychic vision that are described in the ancient texts, in the suttas. And with that psychic vision, he could see back into the history of different people's lives and existences. And he said, from looking at that vision, all of us have lived so many different lives in the past and have been in touch with each other over many different lives in the past. And he said because of this truth of being born and dying and being reborn again and again and again, countless times since beginningless time, we've crossed paths in really intimate ways. He said, because of this, it's not easy to find a being who has not been at some time in the past, your mother or your father or your sister or your brother or your son or your daughter.

So you may or may not believe in this whole teaching on rebirth and past lives, but what if it was so? What if that was true? And just looking around the room tonight, that we all have been family to each other maybe many times before. There's a possibility that we're much more intimately connected than we ever imagined that we were. The Buddha said it's like that. He said that he could see that was so. And so what if that was true? What if the person sitting next to you had been your mother? What would you want to do for her or him?

And that's where we come upon the line that's in the sutta that we've been chanting every night from the Metta Sutta: "Even as a mother protects with her life her child, her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings, radiating kindness over the entire world." The instruction is to treat every being as though they were our own child. That's the possibility that the loving-kindness practice directs us to look at.

So another little story. Jack Kornfield, the founder of Spirit Rock, has a daughter named Caroline who's about twenty-five now. She's in law school at Berkeley. She's planning to become a human rights activist through her work as a lawyer.

So she was driving from Berkeley back to Woodacre one day, traveling along the six-lane stretch of Sir Francis Drake Boulevard near the ferry crossing where the ferry departs for San Francisco across the bay. The traffic was slowing down in a way that seemed unusual for that time of day, and she couldn't understand what was causing the delay.

As she drew closer, she discovered what was happening: a mother duck was attempting to cross the road to reach the bay, followed by six little ducklings. Cars were slowing down and coming to stops, trying to navigate around them. But this being Marin County, nobody really wanted to stop completely—heaven forbid being five minutes late to catch the evening news. So traffic crept forward while people drove around the duck family, honking their horns in growing frustration.

When Caroline and her friend reached the scene, she stopped her car right in the middle of the road. Her friend got out to flag down the other vehicles, ensuring they came to a complete stop. Caroline then carefully shepherded the duck family across three lanes of traffic to the center divider. The mother duck hopped up easily enough, but the little ducklings couldn't make it—the divider was too tall. So Caroline gently gave each duckling a boost up to safety.

Thinking the rescue was complete, Caroline watched as the mother duck hopped down on the other side, preparing to cross three more lanes to reach the bay. Immediately, traffic in the opposite direction began exhibiting the same behavior—slowing down, honking, drivers getting out of their cars wondering what the holdup was. So Caroline and her friend stopped those cars as well, escorting the duck family across until they finally reached the other side with a clear path to the water.

This is what caring for all sentient beings like they're your only child looks like—that quality of love that puts the welfare of others above traffic schedules and personal convenience. It's one of those gestures that moves us deeply.

This attitude of caring for all living beings as though they were our children can blossom into what's considered a very powerful motivational factor. Let me explain this development step by step.

When we genuinely care for all sentient beings—as you've been practicing in the loving-kindness meditations over these past days—we develop a sincere wish for people to be happy. In compassion practice, as you'll discover, this extends to genuinely wanting people to be free from suffering. But if we truly want someone to experience complete happiness and freedom from suffering, what does this actually require?

They need to awaken, don't they? As long as we remain unawakened, we're trapped in this cycle of birth, death, and suffering, with our hearts continually clouded by confusion and reactivity. So when we take loving-kindness and compassion for all beings to their logical conclusion, we realize what we truly want is for everyone to awaken.

This raises an important question: How can we help others awaken if we haven't awakened ourselves? The answer is, we probably can't—not effectively. Someone like the Buddha could guide others to awakening because he had completed that journey himself. But without having traveled that path ourselves, our ability to truly help others remains limited.

This understanding gives rise to a particular motivation: "Let me awaken so I can help others awaken and transcend the boundaries of suffering, moving into true happiness—the deepest happiness possible."

This specific motivation has a special name: bodhicitta. "Bodhi" means awakening, and "citta" means heart or mind. It's sometimes translated as "the heart of awakening" or simply "the awakening heart." As our heart begins to awaken and this sensitivity and interconnection permeates our being, we naturally want to bring all beings along with us on this journey.

This aspiration to awaken for the benefit of all beings—so that all beings can be brought to freedom—forms the core of the Bodhisattva movement and the Bodhisattva vow. It's the foundation of the Bodhisattva path.

It's as though this unlimited, boundless love and compassion we sometimes touch in practice returns as motivation for our own spiritual development. "I want to awaken as the most effective way to help others emerge from suffering and discover true happiness."

This is called the practice of bodhicitta, and we can incorporate it more or less as an expression of our love and compassion. We can make it part of our intention in meditation practice. This is why we sometimes say we meditate for the sake of all beings.

We wish to awaken for the benefit of all beings.

Now, that's not easy to maintain. That's a very lofty aspiration. So it's not like it has to be a big flame that's burning us all the time in our practice, but just a little candlelight that can inspire us from time to time to practice for others. We can start a sitting and remind ourselves that that's our inclination. At the start of every sit, I say something like, "May I come to awakening for the benefit of all sentient beings." It's just a reminder that that's a piece of my motivation. And then that can grow.

We don't expect it to grow huge. It's very difficult to make that huge, but it's a piece. It can be a piece. Even the Dalai Lama says for him, it's not huge. He says, "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration. Deep inside me, I realize how valuable and beneficial it is. That is all."

This is, in a way, a grown-up side of our own love and compassion—this factor of bodhicitta. If it appeals to you, it's helpful to do it as a practice. If you like it, you could say it at the start of every sitting or every walking, every period of practice. Remind yourself it's part of what you're here for, if that connects for you.

Metta also has a big influence on our intention and our conduct. Really, the care for others, this loving kindness for others, is a true source of our commitment to sila, to compassionate, wise conduct. When we practice the precepts, we're offering people that sense of safety, what the Buddha called freedom from fear.

This development of sila can be taken a long way also. Normally, for most of us, I like to think we don't take the precepts expecting to keep them perfectly. We take them expecting to break them. That's why it's a training. We don't think we're going to be perfect with this. We know we're going to fall short. That's okay. We learn each time. But then you look at somebody who's really developed this practice, and it's pretty impressive.

A few years ago, Oprah Winfrey interviewed the Dalai Lama, and the interview got published in her magazine, O. I have to say, I keep getting more and more respect for Oprah because of the way she brings these teachings and so many beautiful sources of wisdom to such a broad audience. First there was her afternoon talk show and then the magazine, and you probably know she started her own TV network called the Oprah Winfrey Network. In describing it in an interview when it was launched, she said, "What I consider the Oprah Winfrey Network to be is mindful television."

She really understands she wants to make a positive impact in people's lives, and she has access to a lot of people. She's featured on her show or in her magazine people like James Baraz, Sharon Salzberg, Jack Kornfield, Joseph Goldstein. I think Joseph was in O doing an interview about non-attachment in relationships, for which he gained the nickname Dr. Love. Oprah's kind of infiltrating these nuggets into mainstream society, and I think it's really wonderful.

So she was interviewing the Dalai Lama, and it became quite interesting. She began by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?"

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "An insect? Hmm, okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bed bugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly. "But major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated, mulling over the idea. She fell silent. There was awe in her voice when she continued, "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

Regarding service to Tibet, the Dalai Lama said, "Service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators—even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind—I don't lag too far behind."

So he's only about sixteen lifetimes ahead of us on this journey, so we'll catch up. That's the possibility of development that's there. And this refinement of meditation that he has is what allows him to practice his sila so effectively. The two go together.

When the mind has a lot of greed, aversion, and delusion rampant, it's very hard for conduct to become purified. But as the mind gets more and more quiet and established in loving-kindness and compassion, it's much easier for the conduct to reflect that kind of skill.

Carol talked a lot about generosity the other evening, and loving-kindness is also the source of generosity. We have to tune into what somebody else needs and wish for their happiness before we're inclined to be generous toward them.

There are a lot of dark forces in the world today. I can't speak so much for Europe and Canada, but for the United States, this is probably as sour a mood as I have felt in many years—a very pessimistic mood in the nation. So it's rare when we can look around this society and see glimmers of hope.

But one of the big ones was pointed to by a recent book by Paul Hawken. I just want to read you the title. He called his book Blessed Unrest: How the Largest Movement in the World Came into Being and Why No One Saw It Coming.

What he's pointing to, the research that he did, was thousands of individuals and small foundations who are motivated by a sense of generosity and justice and caring, going out independent of governments, just making an attempt to do in the world what they can. He started to catalog all these organizations and came up with something like a million that he found around the world—just people who have dedicated their lives or come into some money and dedicated a chunk of their money to doing good in the area that they can access immediately.

He gives many examples. I'm sure you've heard a lot. Dr. Paul Farmer in Haiti, Greg Mortenson with the schools in Afghanistan and Pakistan, schools for girls there. So many different movements.

But just from our scene, we have three friends who are doing relief work in Burma through three different groups. Carol talked about the money that she took in and the work that she does every year looking after nunneries and providing food for villagers who lost a lot through the cyclone. We have another friend who has made schools in Burma his main priority. Every year he's gone in and taken about $100,000. In Burma you can build a school for $25,000, so every year he's gone in and established four new schools in different, usually remote rural areas of Burma, the money provided by generous donors. Once you establish a school, the government generally will commit to send a teacher. So it's not just putting in a building and then it goes away—the government has continued to supply teachers for these schools.

Then another of our friends has really given up his life in business and devoted his work life to a nonprofit called Foundation for the People of Burma. He's one of our past board presidents—I don't know if you know, Sally is currently president of the Spirit Rock Board, and he was the president before her. His name's Hal Nathan. In 2009, I think it was, Hal raised something like $650,000 for the people of Burma and went in and worked with established nonprofit groups to deliver healthcare and sanitary drinking water in many villages that had nothing because the government doesn't provide.

So all these individuals are just taking it upon themselves, out of their care and kindness, to make the difference that they can in the world. I've never seen anything like it before, and it's happening all over. It's quite impressive.

This movement of good-heartedness is active in the world. It's really happening. We come to appreciate it as one of the mature aspects of dharma practice—maybe one of, along with equanimity, one of the real great testaments to dharma practice.

I like this quotation from Alice Walker, you know, the author of The Color Purple. She said, "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness, because this can inspire everything."

I think Winnie said that metta and compassion are two of the three aspects of right intention, the second factor in the Eightfold Path. This good-heartedness, as you could say, is a path factor—a central path factor.

So Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche goes on from that story I read a little earlier about the soft spot, which is talking about an outer wound on the body that's sore that we don't want to touch. He continues: "There's also an inner wound called Tathagatagarba or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion."

When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made up of one complete sore spot altogether. That is called bodhisattva fever. That vulnerability is compassion. We really have no way to defend ourselves anymore.

This is the truly ripened heart of compassion that is in the world to give, that is in the world simply to make a difference, to alleviate suffering, to bring happiness. This kind of attitude was expressed beautifully in a short poem by the Japanese hermit monk Ryōkan, when he said, "Oh, that my monk's robes were wide enough to gather up all the people in this floating world."

As we begin to feel that we truly are doing this for all beings, all beings become part of our consideration in our practice and in our daily life. What will best support us? And then as this quality of tenderness grows, we find that far from making us weaker, it actually makes us stronger. Originally we think, "I can't be tender in the world—I'll get wiped out. People will take advantage of me and use me if I'm too soft." But we discover that as we develop this tenderness along with the other qualities of mindfulness, equanimity, and joy, it makes us stronger. We find new skills, new powers for dealing with all the difficult mind states that come our way.

Take, for example, criticism. One of the things that's hard to deal with in the world is praise and blame. When we get criticized, it's painful. We had a very interesting lesson on this from the Dalai Lama in this very room, on this very spot. He was here several years ago at a conference of Buddhist teachers. About two hundred of us assembled for a few days and spent a day and a half with him here.

The format involved different people presenting topics to him to get his mind turning, then asking for a response. Sometimes it was a little bit like turning a fire hose on him—somebody would present, then somebody else would present, then somebody else, and then we'd ask for a response. After one such sequence, someone said, "Well, Your Holiness, what do you think?" And he replied, "Oh, all gone from up here. Don't remember anything. First somebody talks, and then I could think of something to say, but then somebody else talks. I forget it all. Nothing left." He laughed heartily, totally unconcerned that he'd forgotten it all.

One of these presenters was rather bold—I would say a little bit cheeky. He started off saying, "Well, Your Holiness, I'd like to ask you about Buddhism's place in the world today. It's becoming very popularized. We see advertisements for a perfume named Samsara, or a resort that says it will carry you to nirvana the first day. And you yourself, Your Holiness, are the biggest popularizer of them all. This risks trivializing the Dharma and losing its essence. What do you think about that?"

The Dalai Lama fell silent and reflected for a moment. Then he answered in a way that really moved me. He said, "Some people, you see, call me living Buddha, or they call me the God King. No, I am not. I am just a simple Buddhist monk. But other people call me counter-revolutionary or a wolf in monk's clothing. But you see, I look back at my own intention. If my intention is sincere, then that is what is important. How others perceive me is up to them. I don't care." He said that very strongly: "I don't care."

That was such an expression of confidence from knowing his own mind, from a mind free from ill will and confusion. I thought, "That's amazing that he can feel that," because he's in a position of such responsibility—more than just about anyone I know. He's perhaps the only person who may be able to help the six or seven million people still left in Tibet. Something like a million people were killed after the invasion, and the hopes of the Tibetan people for their culture and any degree of freedom rest on his persona in the world.

And yet he can still say, "How others perceive me is up to them. I don't care." That's the strength of loving kindness and compassion and equanimity.

With anger, the heart of metta is one where it's hard for anger to gain a foothold. It's said that loving kindness creates a mind that is so spacious, anger can't stick. It's compared to tossing a bucket of paint through space—it can't stick to the space. And anger can't stick in a mind that's full of loving-kindness.

I'm sure you've read that Aung San Suu Kyi was recently released from house arrest, and she's given a few interviews. I didn't expect anything else, but she said it very clearly in one of her first interviews: "I have no anger toward the military leaders. No anger. I'm ready to sit down and talk with them at any time for the benefit of the people of Burma."

I know, and you probably know too, that she practiced a huge amount of loving kindness during her house arrest. She was under house arrest for most of the last seventeen years. During that time, she was receiving instructions from a well-known Burmese

Sayadaw, and part of what he instructed her in was loving kindness. She did a lot of loving kindness practice, and with that, she was able to deal with what I imagine would have been a lot of anger, so that she doesn't have it now.

I was reminded also of something that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. said along these lines: "Never succumb to the temptation of being bitter. As you press for justice, be sure to move with dignity and discipline using only the instrument of love." That is why he was such an amazing leader—that he could follow that. He could see the huge injustices that were being done and keep his own heart in a place of love as he moved forward, as he taught, as he acted, as he spoke.

So this development of tenderness and the insight into connection has a very healing quality in our life, in our heart, in our practice. Sometimes it touches parts of difficulty from the past. Memories come up, hurts come up, resentments come up.

This is from an Australian poet, Michael Leunig: "When the heart is cut or cracked or broken, do not clutch it. Let the wound lie open. Let the wind from the good old sea blow in to bathe the wound with salt and let it sting. Let a stray dog lick it. Let a bird lean in the hole and sing a simple song like a tiny bell and let it ring."

So when we come upon these difficult places in practice, we hold them with this heart of loving kindness. And the loving kindness changes those wounds. They heal under its warmth and under its light.

We commit ourselves more and more as our practice goes on. We commit ourselves to this idea that we don't have to move out of the place of loving kindness. When I came into dharma practice, I thought, "Well, my anger is a useful thing. I'm always going to keep it so I can be strong if somebody infringes on my rights." But the more we practice and see the strength that comes from loving kindness, the more we trust in the possibility of being able to always act from that place.

It doesn't mean that we don't act forcefully. It doesn't mean that we don't act strongly. It doesn't mean that we're shy about speaking our truth or speaking to power. You can see that in the Dalai Lama. You can see that in Martin Luther King. But we let it come from this place of compassion and care. That is a possibility.

Because we always remember through metta how much alike we all are—that we all want safety and happiness and health and ease. We all want the same. And you start to wonder, how different are we anyway?

You look at our bodies—they're small variations, but they're much the same. Two eyes, two ears, a nose, a tongue, a mouth, a heart. You look at our minds, and we all know sadness and fear and anger and wanting and longing and embarrassment. And we all know love and compassion and joy and contentment and happiness.

So what is so different? Same body, same heart. It's kind of like one organism that's been poured into different jars, and then those jars have gone off and had different experiences.

And so they've gotten shaped or colored a little bit differently. But basically it's the same jar with the same stuff in it. And so metta makes us realize that. We're all basically the same. And that's a deep kind of understanding of connection.

There's this beautiful quote from Rumi's teacher, Shams of Tabriz: "I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions." These are not true distinctions in the eye of loving-kindness. We see the unity that underlies all the apparent differences. And that takes away this sorrowful sense of isolation or separation or not belonging, not being connected.

So I just want to close with this end of the interview Oprah had with the Dalai Lama. And before I quote him, I just want to mention that in the Mahayana tradition, the Tibetan tradition, compassion is the primary brahmaviharā. In our tradition of Theravāda, loving-kindness is the primary brahmaviharā. But these two are very, very close. So when we say mettā, we could say compassion, and when we say compassion, we could say mettā. Think of them as virtually the same.

So Oprah finishes by asking the Dalai Lama, "In my magazine, I do a column called 'What I Know for Sure.' What do you know for sure? The one thing on which you have no doubt." The Dalai Lama did not hesitate: "Compassion is the best source of happiness. For happy life and happy world, there is no doubt."

So let's just sit for a minute together. Loving-kindness is the best source of happiness for happy life and happy world.

CHAPTER 92

Nature of Awareness

Guy Armstrong · 56 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Guy Armstrong delves into one of Buddhism's most subtle and important topics: the nature of consciousness and awareness. Building on the foundation of the five khandhas, particularly the fifth aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇa), Armstrong addresses a fundamental question that has divided Buddhist schools for millennia: Is there something unchanging in the nature of awareness that relates to the unconditioned (nibbāna)?
>
> Drawing from both Pali suttas and various Buddhist traditions, Armstrong carefully distinguishes between consciousness (viññāṇa) - which the Buddha taught as dependently arisen and impermanent - and a broader understanding of mind or awareness that some traditions view as having unconditioned aspects. He explores how different Buddhist schools, from orthodox Theravāda to Thai Forest tradition, Yogācāra, and Tibetan lineages, have approached this question.
>
> The talk offers practical meditation guidance for investigating the nature of awareness itself, turning attention inward to recognize what is doing the knowing. Armstrong presents this exploration as skillful means (upāya) that can lead to the release of grasping and a direct taste of the emptiness and openness that characterizes our deepest nature. He concludes with beautiful teachings on integrating this understanding of our empty, aware nature with our conventional responsibilities as embodied beings walking the path to liberation.

Sally talked two nights ago about the five aggregates and the fifth aggregate of consciousness, or in Pali, vijnana. This aggregate always raises a lot of questions because it's not like the others. Tonight I want to talk in more detail about this fifth aggregate of consciousness and its relationship to other words that we hear in Buddhist dialogue, such as awareness and mind.

There's a fundamental dilemma that has emerged from questions since Sally's talk. The Buddha described all five aggregates as impermanent, and yet when we look, it seems like this quality of consciousness is always there, as long as we're not asleep or knocked out. It seems like consciousness is always happening. So the fundamental dilemma is: is consciousness impermanent or is it permanent in some way?

This is an important question because in Buddhist understanding, there's only one Dhamma, only one thing that's not subject to the law of impermanence. Nirvana, nibbana, the unconditioned. There's only one element that's not subject to conditioned arising and passing. So if there's any truth in the supposition or the intuition that there's something in the nature of consciousness or awareness that is unchanging, that means it is related to the unconditioned, nirvana.

The reason this is important is that it's only the realization of nirvana that can completely free our hearts and minds from the fetters that bind us. This suggests that potentially exploring this quality of awareness could lead to some deep understanding or liberating understanding. I want to put that in as a motivation because otherwise this discussion could seem just intellectual and abstract. But in fact, maybe the whole future of your enlightenment is riding on it.

I want to make one disclaimer about this evening's talk. You probably know that after the Buddha became enlightened, he thought that maybe he wouldn't teach. The way he put it was, this Dhamma that I have discovered is profound, subtle, and hard to understand. And if I were to teach it and no one understood, that would be vexatious for me. I can't say that tonight's talk will necessarily be profound or subtle, but it may be hard to understand. So I'd encourage you to be in a very receptive mode for this talk and don't try to figure it out too hard. There will be some pointings and indicators to experience. Let yourself ride those pointers and don't worry too much about all the intellectual stuff.

In order to clarify this topic, we'll come at it from a few different angles. I first want to go in a little more detail into this question of consciousness that Sally introduced two nights ago, the fifth of the aggregates. She explained it as the knowing of objects at the six sense doors. This is the important thing to understand: it's the knowing of an object, of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, or mental object. It's said that there are six types of consciousness, but we don't need to worry too much about that. Just knowing that it's consciousness of phenomena will be enough.

The understanding is that consciousness, that knowing, arises with the object and passes with the object. And that's why it's considered impermanent.

Even in the Buddha's day, some of the bhikkhus had the idea that what he was pointing to was something permanent and something that would survive the death of the body and then go on to the next life. This bhikkhu was walking around making this statement, basically that this consciousness is permanent and continues. The Buddha heard about it and said, "I want to talk to that bhikkhu. Send him up to see me."

So the bhikkhu came to see the Buddha, and the Buddha asked him if he was in fact saying that. The bhikkhu said, "Yeah, I said that." And the bhikkhu said, "As I understand the Dhamma taught by the Blessed One, it is this same consciousness that runs and wanders through the rounds of rebirths, not another one." Basically, this is his way of saying it's permanent.

And this is the Buddha's reply: "Misguided man. Have you ever known me to teach the Dhamma in this way? Misguided man, in many discourses have I not stated consciousness is dependently arisen, since without a condition there is no origination of consciousness. But you, misguided man, have misrepresented us by your wrong grasp."

Then the Buddha goes on to explain that consciousness is dependently arisen because it depends on the meeting of a working sense organ and a sensory object. In other words, if the ear is working and a sound arises, then there is hearing consciousness. But if the sense organ wasn't working, if the sound did not arise, there would be no hearing consciousness.

So the Buddha explains that consciousness is dependently arisen, and therefore it also passes away. Does this make sense? This fundamental understanding from the suttas is unequivocal. If we were to say otherwise, the Buddha would call us "misguided man or woman." We cannot argue with this understanding of vijnana—this is orthodoxy, 2,500-year-old canonical orthodoxy.

Now I want to introduce another word: mindfulness. We've been talking about mindfulness extensively, describing it many times as the knowing of our experience in the present moment. When a sound happens, consciousness reveals the sound, but mindfulness recognizes "a rising phenomenon—sound," something like that. It knows hearing. These two are very different properties.

As long as you're awake, do you have any choice about being conscious or not? Can you turn your consciousness off? Can you say, "Let me not hear, let me not feel body sensations"? No. Consciousness, although dependently arisen, operates pretty much on automatic pilot.

Can you choose to be unmindful? Are there times when you are unmindful? Rather regrettably, yes. So mindfulness requires some intention or volition. It takes a little work for us to be mindful. Consciousness happens all on its own—the sound arises, we know it. But mindfulness takes effort to be present.

What about this word "awareness"? Where does that fit? Mindfulness and consciousness are central to the Buddhist teachings. Consciousness is the fifth of the five aggregates describing this mind-body operation. Mindfulness is a critical factor in the Eightfold Path—the Pali word is sati. But what about awareness? Does anybody know a Pali term for awareness?

There is none. The Buddha never used another word that we need to translate as "awareness." What has happened through the years of Buddhadharma being translated into English is that different people have used this word to mean different things. That's why it's confusing, especially in the context of the suttas, the original Pali teachings—there's no word that corresponds to it.

Carol has used it to mean mindfulness. This is how Sayadaw U Tejaniya uses it. He has a book titled "Awareness Alone is Not Enough," which you could just as well say "Mindfulness Alone is Not Enough." The implication is that what's needed is wisdom accompanying mindfulness or awareness. But other teachers might use it to mean consciousness.

I want to suggest there's a spectrum of meaning between mindfulness and consciousness, and awareness can be a slippery customer that slides between those two ends. It's a fascinating word in how it slides. On one hand, awareness connotes the spontaneous quality of consciousness. I could ask you, "Is there awareness present in your experience right now?" and you'd say, "Yeah, I'm aware—I'm receiving sense impressions." That would be synonymous with consciousness.

But awareness also has a connotation of some intelligence. "Were you aware of your intention before you said what you said?"

That's a phrase in which "awareness" is used like "mindful." Were you aware also means were you paying attention? Were you noticing? Were you really with it? There's a little bit of a wisdom factor there.

So awareness is this very convenient word that we can toss in to mean whatever we want it to mean—sometimes the automatic nature of consciousness, sometimes the choice-fed or volitional nature of mindfulness. So it's slippery, and when a teacher, especially in this hall, uses the word awareness, it's good to ask what they mean by it.

Now, in some other traditions, like certain Tibetan traditions, they use it more consistently and aligned with their Tibetan vocabulary and understanding. It may have a more precise meaning. But as we use it, it's a little bit floppy.

So tonight, I want to use awareness more or less synonymously with consciousness. For instance, let me just invite you into a meditative state. You don't have to close your eyes, but if this was a meditation instruction, think how this would feel: Allow your mind to become like a big empty sky, and notice that all the appearances simply come and go within the vast space of awareness.

Have you heard an instruction like this before? So here, awareness is being equated with this big space, and things are just coming and going within it.

But I'm going to use awareness in a little bit different connotation than the word vijñāna or consciousness. I'm going to use consciousness for the knowing of an individual object—the arising of a sound, hearing consciousness; the passing of the sound, hearing consciousness passes. But I'm going to use awareness to mean this broad field in which many different things come and go. What's coming and going is all being known through consciousness, right? There are just lots of little individual acts of consciousness happening in that field of awareness.

So some people have come and said something like this: "Well, when I feel the sensations in my body, I know that's consciousness. But out here, there's just pure awareness and there's no object. There's just pure awareness. That must be the unconditioned—there's no object there."

So I want to take that away right now. There is an object there, and what's being known is physical space. Partly when you rest in this vast space of awareness, what is giving it that spacious feeling is physical space. When you hear a sound, it's at some distance from you, and that sense of distance is built on physical space. So when people are sensing that physical space, it feels like they're not knowing anything, but in fact, you're knowing physical space.

I want to say also that just as consciousness always has an object, the same is true for awareness, the way I'm using it. Awareness always has an object, so it doesn't exist on its own. Even though it's this vast field, we don't experience it empty of phenomena. We experience it with different kinds of phenomena, and of course they change, but there's always something being known. There is no such thing as awareness without something being known in our normal experience. There are altered states in which that can be revealed, but that's a different talk. For the purpose of exploring our normal experience, awareness always comes with things being known.

So we're going to explore a little bit the nature of this awareness, this human awareness that we have, and every sentient being has. To be a sentient being is to have awareness like this. As we look into this awareness, can you grab hold of it?

If I ask you to find your awareness... Can you kind of locate it and then show it to me? Not really. It's elusive. You know, just like this fifth aggregate, vijnana, is elusive. Awareness is elusive in the exact same way.

The reason is consciousness—we'll go back to consciousness for a minute because it's simpler. Consciousness is not an object. Consciousness is that which holds other objects. Anything we know as an object—a sight, a sound, a smell, a taste, touch, thought, emotion—is being held in consciousness. That's what an object is. It can be known by consciousness, but the consciousness can't grasp itself. So it's tricky to find. It's subtle.

Part of the understanding is that consciousness and the object arise together. And that's what I want to suggest. When you hear a sound like this, there's only one experience happening. But that one experience which you are all having has two aspects. One is the sound and the other is your knowing of it. And it's really important to see that these are distinct aspects of the one experience.

So how can one thing have these two aspects? If you look at this circular bell, I could ask you, is it round or is it gold? It's indistinguishable, isn't it? There's only one object here, but you can look at it either in its roundness or you can look at it in its goldness. It's the same with any sense experience. You can look at it in its physical aspect of sound—that's in the first aggregate of rupa—or you can look at it in the fifth aggregate of vijnana, which is your knowing of it.

So awareness, the same thing. There's a thing being known and then there's this knowing that we do. So awareness is subtle. It's just consciousness—we're using them synonymously. It's hard to grasp because it's not an object, but we know it's there.

Ajahn Chah was talking about how this factor of awareness is hard to get a hold of. And he said, "It's like you're riding a horse and you're going, 'Where's the horse?'" Because we're aware all the time, aren't we? We know awareness is happening, but it's hard to find. So this is our situation.

Ajahn Sumedho, a disciple of Ajahn Chah, explained it this way. It's just like the question, can you see your own eyes? Nobody can see their own eyes. I can see your eyes, but I can't see my eyes. I'm sitting right here. I've got two eyes, and I can't see them. But you can see my eyes. But really, there's no need for me to see my eyes because I can see. It's ridiculous, isn't it? If I started saying, "Why can't I see my own eyes?" you'd think, "Ajahn Sumedho is really weird, isn't he?" Looking in a mirror, you can see a reflection, but that's not your eyes. It's a reflection of your eyes. There's no way that I've been able to look and see my own eyes. But then it's not really necessary because there's knowing.

So in the same way, we can't quite grasp this factor of consciousness or awareness. But we know it's happening.

Wei Wu Wei was a British student of Zen who wrote in these pithy, mysterious, short epigraphs. And he put it this way: "What we are looking for is what is looking."

So it's tricky. It's tricky.

So I like to think of this factor of consciousness or awareness not as a thing but as an activity. Knowing is a verb, isn't it? So it's something that's happening. Consciousness is a happening. It's not a thing. It's a doing. It's a function. Something in us has the function of revealing or illuminating our experience. A sight goes by, consciousness reveals that. It reveals the world to us. It lights up, it illuminates all the events of our experience. So there's an activity that is the knowing.

So then the interesting question is, what's doing the knowing? Look. The activity is happening. Knowing is happening. Objects are being known. By what? If there's an activity, there must be an agent. What is doing the knowing?

What I want to suggest is that consciousness comes and goes, so awareness of things comes and goes, but that which is knowing does not come and go. So in a way, we could say that there's a capacity for consciousness that is a dimension of our being, an integral part of our being. It's what makes us a sentient being. There's a capacity for consciousness. It's here.

And I'm going to suggest—there's just a view. I'm going to explain, there are different views. My view is that that capacity for consciousness does not come and go. That capacity for consciousness is unconditioned. This is just a view. I'm going to give you the opposition's view later. But this is our hypothesis. So it is some mysterious dimension within us whose functioning is revealing all the events of our six senses. And that is what is stable—that dimension, that faculty, whatever it is.

Now, I want to come back to experience and kind of practical matters for a minute. When I first asked that question, what is doing the knowing, did you feel any kind of shift inside? Did you feel a little shift in your experience? Because I felt a shift in the room. What was that shift? How would you describe it? What happened?

"Don't know." So this is one very common reaction. This is an important and honest reaction. I look for that thing that's doing the knowing. I don't know what it is.

"Yes, I'm not positing an I, but I am suggesting the possibility of a something. So you're right, I am positing something. It's not an I, and we'll get to that."

"When you said that, the sense that I had was that even though it was something that we were all experiencing, it wasn't personal."

Her comment was that when she turned in that direction, even though it was something we're all experiencing, it wasn't personal. Anybody else? Because there could be a number of things that happen in that moment of shift when you look in that direction.

The question is, am I referring to the citta? It's in that direction. Yes.

So did anybody feel stopping? A kind of stopping of thought or conceptualization? Anybody feel a widening? Anybody feel a heightening of interest? Sense of investigation?

From the point of view of skillful means in meditation practice, this kind of turning—whether there's something there or not, maybe I'm positing something that doesn't really have any reality—opens us up in new, interesting, and mysterious ways. It opens us to something that may be transpersonal, that brings a level of interest and stillness and openness. So as a meditation technique, it could be very useful.

On the metaphysical plane, I recognize there are questions or doubts about whether such a thing exists or not. That's a very fair question. So let me address this from the Buddhist tradition.

This question of whether such a thing is or not has been, in my opinion, the primary fault line in Buddhist philosophy for at least 2,000 years. There are many schools on one side who say, yes, there is something there. And there are many schools on the other side who say there is not something there.

In particular, orthodox Theravadans—strict followers of the Pali lineage, such as followers of the Visuddhimagga and most of the teachers in Burma—will answer the question, no. There's nothing real there. Later in the Mahayana, followers of Nagarjuna, who was a great philosopher in Buddhism around 100 AD, also say no. Nothing there.

But on the other side, if we want to have a football match, there's one team. The other team would be followers of a later Mahayana school called the Yogacara, whose descendants include Chan in China, Zen in Japan, Tibetan schools of Dzogchen and Mahamudra—basically the Nyingma and Kagyu lineages—as well as the Thai forest tradition. If you listen to teachings from Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadasa, Ajahn Mahabua, Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Amaro, you'll hear this referred to again and again.

So even in the Theravadan lineages, there are two different views on this. If you're worried about being politically correct, there is a weight of opinion, scholastic opinion on both sides. What that says to me is I can be a good Buddhist and view it either way. Both ways have their strengths and their weaknesses.

So I regard it as a skillful means. If you find this kind of looking and exploration helpful for your meditation practice, feel free to use it with the confidence that many thousands of practitioners have used this over thousands of years to come to awakening. If you feel that it is positing something unnecessary and you don't want to go there, take that view. Many thousands of practitioners over thousands of years have come to awakening following that view.

I wouldn't get too hung up on the philosophy because either one can take you to freedom. Rather see what suits your own temperament and supports your way of opening and exploring the way things are for you.

So, end of the philosophy.

I want to suggest that maybe what this thing is that knows—that's doing the knowing, the unchanging thing—might be something that we could call mind in a limited sense. This might be what we would call mind.

In this kind of terminology, normally in mind we would include things like feeling, perception, mental formations. I'm going to talk about those as the contents or the objects of mind. And I want to focus on this faculty that knows.

So for the purposes just of this talk, I'm going to call that which knows—this agent that's doing the knowing—mind. And then I want to explore a little bit what this thing we call mind might be like.

First of all, its nature is to know. That's what it does. That's its basic activity or role or function in existence.

But there's another quality that is equally important to this knowing. Do you remember when we did just that short meditation? We talked about the big empty space of awareness.

Take a look at this thing we're calling mind, that which knows the changing phenomena. Is there anything stuck in that entity? Is there anything fixed that has been there from beginningless time? Or is this mind of the nature to allow anything and everything to come and go and pass through it?

Can this mind allow any and all changing phenomena to come and go?

So in that sense, I would say in itself, it's empty. It doesn't have anything that's crowding it up or taking up space, because everything that appears within it is of the nature of arising and passing. So we say its essence is emptiness. In this vast space of mind, nothing is fixed. It's originally, or by essence, empty.

There's another way to arrive at this understanding of emptiness. When you looked for mind—that which knows—could you find it? Could you come up with anything substantial? Something with a personality, red hair, located in one corner of the ceiling? Could you locate it anywhere? No.

This not-finding is actually significant. This is from a Tibetan master named Shabkar, who lived in the 1700s, perhaps the 1800s:

"Now, come up close and listen. When you look carefully, you won't find the merest speck of real mind you can put your finger on and say, 'this is it.' And not finding anything is an incredible find. Friends, to start with, mind doesn't emerge from anything. It's primordially empty. There's nothing there to hold on to. It isn't anywhere. It has no shape or color. There's no trace of its having been there."

This unfindability—its not being an object—also points to its emptiness. It doesn't have substantial form.

When we consider this thing we're calling mind, these two factors always go together and can't be separated: the emptiness and the awareness. It's always empty, but it's always revealing things. This is the nature of our mind—this union of emptiness and awareness.

Ajahn Buddhadasa from the Thai forest tradition said, "We really should call this mind 'emptiness,' but because of its awareness, we call it 'mind.'" I hope you can see how these two qualities are inseparably together.

Now, how can we make this a meditation practice? This turning to look at what's doing the knowing can become a meditation practice for us. How can we use it practically?

The basic approach is working with what we've got, which is awareness itself. Normally, awareness is directed outward. In daily life, we're constantly keeping an eye on people, places, things, even our own body—which can seem outward in this sense—thoughts, emotions, all the phenomena arising around us. So awareness habitually flows outward.

What would happen if we took that awareness and turned it back on itself? What if we suggested to ourselves to become aware of awareness itself? Instead of turning out, we would turn in. What would you find? Do you get any kind of shift?

It's subtle. It's like an eye trying to see itself—you realize you're not going to be able to find it exactly. But the exercise of turning, just like asking "what's doing the knowing," might create a shift. That's something to explore experientially.

Meditation. Again, you don't have to close your eyes, but let your awareness become broad and expansive. Within that space, everything arises and passes. Put your attention on that vast space of awareness.

Does that make a shift? What happens when you feel that shift? A thrill? A sense of expansion, moving out? As you feel more spaciousness, what happens to the sense of grasping? Does it sometimes fall away?

Grasping is basically a contraction into smallness. You can feel it as a constriction in the body, accompanied by thoughts of "I." When we move to this more expansive awareness, sometimes that grasping just relaxes.

One of the things this shift accomplishes is taking our attention away from objects and placing it in the knowing itself. This can be a skillful means for releasing any holdings—a doorway to dropping clinging or grasping.

Normally our attention fixates on objects, and we often relate to them through clinging or grasping, creating a constriction of the small self. When we move our attention to the vastness of awareness, we take the emphasis off that fixation. In moving away from the fixation on objects, the grasping can release.

I want to share another comment from Ajahn Chah about this emptiness: "The roof is a becoming. The floor is a becoming. But in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. When there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness."

The suggestion is that as you connect with the emptiness of mind, you're connecting with something unconditioned or undying. One way to understand it as undying is that it's always available—always there when you turn to it. This space is not subject to coming and going. It's deathless.

Now I want to make one more philosophical gesture. We have the Theravadan view from the suttas that says consciousness is strictly coming and going. We have the view from other traditions that says this bigger thing called mind may not be subject to coming and going. Can we reconcile these two? Is it possible to have a foot in each camp and validate both views? That's where I personally stand, and I want to share my way of understanding it.

To do this, I'd like you to join me in a thought experiment. In physics—I majored in physics in college—we were taught that we could prove things in three ways: mathematical proof, experimental proof, or thought proof, called a gedanken experiment. If the gedanken experiment was logical and well thought out, we could establish things.

So in this experiment, imagine you're standing on the edge of the solar system with your back to the sun. We won't worry about spacesuits and vacuums—that's taken care of through new technology. You're looking away from the sun, out into space, into a part of the sky where there are no stars. The sun is at your back, you're looking into a starless portion of sky.

What do you see? Nothing.

What color? Yes, it's just black, isn't it? The black of the night sky where there aren't any stars. So you're looking out away from the sun, totally black.

Is there light there? Right. There is light, isn't there? Because our back's to the sun. So the sunlight is actually pervading that empty space. But we don't see it. It's full of light, but we don't see it.

So as you're looking into that blackness, which is pervaded by sunlight, let's say a meteor flashes up in front of your eyes. Do you see it? Yes, because the light gets reflected off an object back into our eyes. Then the meteor goes away. Any more light? You don't see it, do you?

So the light only gets reflected back if there's an object that does the reflecting.

I want to suggest that this sunlight pervading empty space is the cognizant or aware nature of mind. And the flash of light that comes when the object appears—the meteor—is the impermanent flashing of consciousness. The impermanent flashing of consciousness couldn't happen unless the steady sunlight, which was always there, was in place.

So that sunlight pervading empty space is what I'm calling the illuminating power of mind. But the temporary flash that comes and then goes is this impermanent factor of consciousness that only knows because an object is present for a brief period and then passes away.

Ajahn Jumnian, who's another Thai forest teacher, said that because of this relationship, consciousness has both conditioned and unconditioned aspects. Can you kind of get that feel? It couldn't happen without the light that's always there. But nothing gets revealed until there's a condition for it to be reflected back.

So the source of consciousness is ever-present, but it can't function without an object. So that's the way I hold it. Both traditions can be right in their own way and make sense in their own way.

For us as meditators, then the interesting question comes to be: if this skillful means connects for us, how can we access it? Tomorrow morning, I'll lead a longer meditation that's on this theme of turning the mind to the awareness. But I'd also suggest that you can play with it in a few other ways.

For some people, this notion of taking the awareness which is normally out and turning it back on itself can be very evocative. You can even think of a hand gesture that does that turning for you.

I don't know if any of you have heard of a British writer named Douglas Harding. Harding was a follower of Ramana Maharshi and was in India contemplating the question, "What am I?" or "Who am I?"—a question that Ramana Maharshi, a Vedanta teacher, used a lot. And he'd been contemplating this question for months. This is another question that kind of turns in that direction.

One day he was hiking in the Himalayas. Because he'd been asking this for so long, the inquiry was just kind of going on. All of a sudden, his mind stopped. The thought activity stopped. And he came to this place of deep peacefulness.

Then he said what he did was he looked down. And he saw, of course, his body. He saw his two trouser legs disappearing into his shoes. He saw his two sleeves disappearing into his arms. And then he tried to find what was above that. He looked and he realized, "I have no head."

He said where he was expecting to find a head, he only found the vast space of the world, completely full of mountains and trees and rivers and snow. And that was the title of his most famous book: On Having No Head.

So again, this image—you look at the body and you get up here, you look back, and it just opens into the world: the vast empty space of knowing.

Another way that is helpful for some people to go in—maybe you're in the middle of a thought and you ask the question, "Who's thinking?" You're in the middle of feeling some emotion and you ask, "Who's sad?" And that also can kind of light up that empty space. So we'll talk about that a little more tomorrow morning.

I want to close today with a couple of quotations—one poem and a quotation from the Buddha. A lot of the maturing of dharma practice is coming to integrate this understanding of our nature as being empty and aware with the understanding that we're a human being in a separate body and responsible for our actions. We need to be able to see from both ways: to see the emptiness and then to see the responsibility of a human individual.

This is Rumi's discussion of that integration:

Live in the nowhere that you came from, even though you have an address here. That's why you see things in two ways. You have eyes that see from that nowhere and eyes that judge distances, how high and how low. You own two shops and you run back and forth. Try to close the one that's a fearful trap, getting always smaller. Checkmate this way, checkmate that. Keep open the shop where you're not selling fish hooks anymore. You are the free-swimming fish.

And then I'll close with a quotation from the Buddha on the nature of the unconditioned:

One who is dependent has wavering. One who is independent has no wavering. There being no wavering, there is calm. There being calm, there is no desire. There being no desire, there is no coming or going. There being no coming or going, there is no passing away or arising. There being no passing away or arising, there is neither a here, nor a there, nor an in-between. This, just this, is the end of suffering.

Let's just sit together for a minute, please.

CHAPTER 93

Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

> Drawing from Thai lay teacher Upāsikā Kī's phrase "unentangled knowing," Guy Armstrong explores the nature of spiritual freedom as both path and goal. The talk examines how we become caught through the process of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), particularly the crucial links of contact, vedanā (feeling tone), taṇhā (craving), and upādāna (clinging). Armstrong demonstrates how each moment of clinging creates a temporary "self" that experiences birth and death, leading to dukkha.
>
> The key insight centers on discovering the gap between vedanā and taṇhā—the space where feeling tone doesn't automatically trigger reactive craving. This non-reactive awareness, supported by samatha (tranquility) and vipassanā (insight), allows practitioners to experience what the Thai Forest tradition calls "the deathless"—a state unentangled from becoming. Armstrong offers practical approaches including checking attitudes for greed/aversion/delusion, resting in open awareness like space or water, and recognizing the unfindable nature of mind. He emphasizes that these moments of freedom are available throughout daily life, not just in formal meditation, representing places where the spiritual path and its ultimate goal converge.

The nature of our spiritual journey is that we are traveling from something that we could call suffering or bondage to a state of release or freedom. As we make this journey, it's really important that we become acquainted with both halves of this traverse.

We spend a lot of time, certainly early in retreat, exploring the nature of how we're caught. We spend a lot of time with the first two noble truths, a lot of time with the hindrances and the afflictive emotions, a lot of time looking at greed, aversion, and delusion. As the retreat progresses, it's important that we also give good care and attention to the second half of the journey, which is the nature of freedom.

Tonight I want to talk about freedom—how it is both a goal of our practice, but also how the discovery of it becomes our path. Freedom becomes both a path and a goal along this journey.

The subject of tonight's talk is called "Unentangled Knowing." It's from a phrase by a lay woman teacher in Thailand named Upasika Ki. Upasika simply means lay woman supporter. She had a meditation center and taught, which was rather unusual for a lay woman in Thailand. She started in the 1950s and taught into the 1970s. Her teachings have been collected in what I consider a very beautiful and inspiring book called Pure and Simple. I'll be reading a couple of quotes from her tonight.

This phrase, "unentangled knowing," is the way her translator, Thanissaro Bhikkhu, explains her instruction. For those who aren't native speakers of English, this is a very unusual word, so let me explain it for a moment. A tangle is a twisted mass of strands like hair or string that happens when they all get knotted up together and snarled. Like if you have long hair and ride in a convertible, then come to the end and try to put a comb through it—you can't because it's gotten tangled. "Entangle" is the verb of making that tangle happen. "Unentangle" is making it all come straight again after being tangled. So this is a kind of knowing that leads to unentanglement.

Here is the line from Upasika Ki that we'll return to later: "An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside."

The image of the tangle appears often in the Buddha's teachings. It refers to the way that our desires and our fears meet with the objects of the world and get us caught and ensnared and bound with conflicting wants and fears and hopes. One line from the Buddha points to this: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn."

There's another quite famous quotation that comes from the Samyutta Nikaya and forms part of the Visuddhimagga, a sixth-century commentarial text. Somebody comes to the Buddha and asks him a question: "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gautama this question: Who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

Here we have again this process of unentanglement that needs to take place for our journey. It means all our inner conflicts and the ways that we're knotted up inside, bound up with different forces of craving, need to come apart and be released for the mind and the body to be clear and straight.

The Buddha's answer to this question was that the one who succeeds in disentangling the tangle is one who develops sila, samadhi, and panna—virtue, meditation, and wisdom—which is what we're doing here. So you're all on the way.

Unentangled knowing is a phrase that Upasika Ki uses to refer to a state of mind that is very aware, very mindful of what's happening, but isn't enmeshed or entangled with the objects of our experience. Tonight I want to communicate something of what that feels like or looks like.

This is not a meditation technique. I wish it were that simple, that we could just say a few words and you could go to the technique. It's more of a pointing to a state of mind and a relationship. So hopefully by these pointings, it might give you some hints in your practice of how to find this state of being. It's really a state of mind or a state of being that constitutes a relationship to our experience. It's not as simple as saying "place your attention on the breath."

All the different quotations and passages I read are hints at what this is like. I think that these moments of being unentangled happen to all of us here many times during a day, but we may not be prepared to notice it. So I also want through this talk to encourage you simply to notice when this way of being is present and to appreciate the quality of freedom that is inherent in it. This is also an encouragement to discover the freedom that can be there along the way—freedom as we journey.

But before we talk about freedom in more detail, I want to discuss this question of bondage in a little more detail. How is it that we get caught? How is it that we get tangled up in the world of appearances?

The Buddha described this in great detail in a teaching that he called Dependent Origination. In the teaching of Dependent Origination, he outlined twelve links...

sometimes depicted as a circle that explain in a moment-by-moment basis how suffering arises and we get caught in it.

Now, parts of this chain—for it's referred to as a chain of these twelve links—are somewhat philosophical. They're very interesting, but I don't want to go into the philosophy so much tonight. Instead, I'm going to focus on the experiential component, which comprises roughly the four middle links of the chain. There are four links that form the heart: five previous links, then these four links, and then three further links. I'm going to focus on the four links that are the heart of dependent origination because they really point to our experience.

In order to look at this closely, I want to ask a question and invite you to reflect on our basic situation as sentient beings. What's a basic situation that sentient beings share, or that we as human beings all share?

One way I would describe it—something that's true in every moment of conscious experience—is that we are constantly having sense experience through the six sense doors. This is true for you, it's true for me, it's true for Buddhas, it's true for unenlightened beings. We are continually having sense experience through the six sense doors. And it is out of this experience that we become caught, that we become bound.

The Buddha described this beautifully in a sutta called the Sutta on Totality. He was talking with a group of monks and said, "Monks, what is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life."

That's quite a statement. Not many teachers have said something like that. Freud couldn't say that. Einstein couldn't say that. Karl Marx couldn't say that. The Buddha said, "I will teach you the totality of things."

So he said, "And what is the totality of life? It is simply the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, and the mind and objects of mind. Anyone who would describe a totality beyond these six would not be describing something they knew anything about."

So this is it, isn't it? This is the field of human experience: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects—primarily thoughts and emotions.

It gets pretty simple when you look at it this way. Joseph Goldstein is fond of saying, "There are only ever six things happening. That's all there is." And yet all the complexity of modern life and all the tangle of our inner experience is built around our relation to these six things.

Each of these expresses itself through—and I think we've talked about this before—a moment of contact. In a moment of contact, there is the coming together of the sense object, the sense organ, and the sense consciousness. So when your eyes are open, you may see the front wall. That's a sight. Your eye is working so that image appears, and your consciousness holds it, reveals it, knows it, displays it to you.

This moment of contact has with it a valence, a feeling tone that the Buddha called vedanā, whose nature is to be either pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral—neither pleasant nor unpleasant.

So this is the operative experience that we are dealing with moment after moment from a dharmic point of view. We are constantly being, you might say, assaulted with these experiences at the six sense doors, most of which we have no control over and which always continue to alternate in their qualities of being pleasant, sometimes intensely so, or painful, sometimes intensely so, or neutral.

It's no wonder this kind of drives us crazy. How do we hold ourselves in equilibrium knowing that at any moment we could be met with intense pleasure or intense pain or neutrality? This is the challenge of being human, and it's why we get so disturbed by all the arisings at the sense doors.

We talked quite a bit earlier in the retreat about the importance—the critical importance—of this feeling tone. Because it's the basis for the reactive states of mind. If the feeling tone is pleasant, it conditions a quality of holding on or desire. If the feeling tone is unpleasant, it tends to condition a reactive formation of aversion, of wanting to push away. And if the feeling tone is neutral, it tends to condition a reaction of delusion. We don't pay attention because it's neither gratifying nor threatening. We say, "It doesn't have anything to do with me. I can just space out on this one."

So these qualities of greed, aversion, and delusion are all triggered by this element of feeling tone.

This then gives rise to the next link in the chain of dependent arising. It is said that feeling conditions the arising of craving. Remember that craving, although it sounds like a desire force, actually means the preference of the mind. Craving can mean wanting what's presented, or it can mean not wanting what's presented—preferring something else. Desire and aversion are two sides, really, of the same coin, which is having a preference.

So we're kind of, in this habitual way, always reacting to our experience. "I like this. Let me keep it. I don't like that."

Let me push it away. Or there's the delusion of simply ignoring what's arising, turning away from it altogether. This is the next step in the chain of dependent origination called craving, which then leads to the following link: clinging.

On a moment-to-moment basis, clinging is understood to always follow right after craving. It's simply a matter of building up and intensifying. The mind turns and relates to some pleasant or unpleasant experience. An urge arises—either to hold onto it or push it away. Then the next thing that happens is we actually take hold of that object with the mind in some way, which is the act of clinging.

Once there's clinging, suffering is an inevitable result. So the chain goes: contact, feeling, craving, clinging—and I'll skip a couple of steps because there's more than I want to get into right now—leading to suffering. And then it picks up again. "Okay, we got caught on that one. Here comes another one. Here's more contact, another opportunity for feeling, craving, and clinging." This is how the wheel keeps turning and how we get hooked on the round of samsara.

Each of these moments of clinging gives birth to a kind of "I." You can see this if you look at the history of your life as a person. We come into the world as young babies. Consciousness is very open. But these delightful and threatening experiences start happening: mother, love, breast, food, school, teacher, graduation, work, taxes, death—you know, Britney Spears, all the rest of it. This whole parade of objects goes by us. Some of them are very seductive and some of them are very threatening. So the mind is always, just by its conditioned habits, reeling from this changing array. And as we form grasping or clinging to these things—either to the pleasant or to the unpleasant—we take birth as a new "I."

Let me give a couple of simple examples of this in the retreat setting. Yesterday there was a very nice tea—the potato bar. There were baked potatoes and a whole range of toppings: butter and sour cream and cheese and chives. You could just lay on as much as you wanted. And then I thought, "What about the poor eight-precept yogis who have innocently come down to the dining hall looking for their little glass of filtered juice with no solid substance at all, and they get a whiff of the potato bar?" Oh, that's potential for suffering.

I could imagine if I had been an eight-precept yogi yesterday, coming in and seeing the potato bar and thinking, "I haven't been eating very much this whole retreat. I've been pretty hungry since about four o'clock today, and I have a glass of filtered juice to look forward to. There's the potato bar. It smells so good. It looks so good. I'd really like to have it, but I'm not going to. I can't have it because I'm observing my eight precepts. But I really wish I could." And then we start thinking about how good that would taste, or other kinds of food that we might like. Pretty soon we've taken birth as the hungry yogi.

We can be born in that state for like an hour. You can think about food for quite a long time on a retreat like this. So we take birth as the hungry yogi, and then sometime later—maybe by the time we go to the sitting, or during the sitting—we let it go. And the hungry yogi, which is not far from a hungry ghost, passes away. So there's been a birth and a death over that hour.

In that case, we have a kind of painful birth. It's not much fun to be hungry and desirous for an hour, feeling like you're missing out on all the good stuff. There's a painful birth, but death may be welcome because it's an escape from this hungry "I."

But the other side is this: suppose you come in and you have a really good sitting. It's very clear, you're very present—not very pleasant, sorry—very present, without many distracting thoughts. You feel a certain degree of stillness and strength in your mindfulness. You're able to be with things moment by moment and not get disturbed by thoughts and emotions. You start to realize, "Oh, this is the factor of concentration that people have talked about."

And my body feels pretty relaxed. My mind feels steady. There are not a lot of hindrances coming up. This is a pretty pleasant state. You think, "I knew this kind of sitting was going to happen sometime this retreat, and I finally got it. Now I'm in the groove. I've got the retreat really going now."

And then the bell rings. It's time to get up and walk. You do your walking, but you sort of can't wait to come back because the next sitting is going to be so good again. Of course, you come back, and what's that sitting inevitably like? Concentration gone, restless thoughts, a lot of emotion, mind can't find the breath or the body, and it's really difficult. There is expectation, disappointment, struggle—"I can't accept this, this is not the way it's meant to be. What did I do wrong?" We start blaming ourselves and judging ourselves.

So here, we took birth as the concentrated yogi, and we thought that birth was going to continue. We thought we'd have a nice long life as the concentrated yogi. We couldn't wait to get back and live another round. But we come into the hall and the concentrated yogi is gone. That pleasant birth has ended, and that dying is painful.

So here it was a pleasant birth, but a painful passing. In any case, if we cling based on pleasure or pain, there's suffering as a result. Either the birth is pleasant and the death is painful, or the birth is painful and the death is welcome. Either way, there's suffering. This is the result of clinging. We either suffer soon or we suffer later due to change, due to impermanence. So clinging doesn't lead to happiness. We can see that again and again on a moment-by-moment basis.

What we start to see is this very act of taking hold of something in our experience, whether it's the smell of the potato bar or the experience of the concentrated mind. Once we take hold of it, in some way we've set up a self, and that self is always involved in birth and death.

Andrew Olenski, who's the executive director of the study center in Barre, writes: "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds onto or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

So grasping takes place—it's another activity that doesn't require a self, but it generates the self, the sense of self. It's not that grasping is done by the self, but rather self is done by grasping or created by grasping.

Before we come to meditation, and this is true I think of most people in the world, we don't know any other way than to cling. We cling to one thing and generally only let it go when there's something else to switch the clinging to. So life is a succession of these cycles of dependent arising where clinging is just done over and over and over again. That's why life without meditation feels so tiring, so exhausting—like we're just on this round over and over again.

The analogy that's used in the tradition is of a monkey. You've probably heard the mind described as monkey mind—it's just always running. One of the analogies is that a monkey, as it swings through the branches of the jungle, holds on to a vine and won't let go of one vine until it's got another one to hold on to. That's what the monkey mind does in our daily life.

Ajahn Chah made the comment that even in spiritual life, seventy to eighty percent of spiritual life is knowing that we're clinging but not being able to let go. So I'm sure you feel this a lot. You know there's some struggle, you know there's holding, and it's not possible to release. This factor of clinging is around a lot.

But as meditators, we do find another choice starts to open up. We do find there's a possibility.

And we can find it by looking into this chain of dependent arising. Contact is inevitable. We have contact, the Buddha had contact, enlightened beings have contact. That's going to keep happening at the six sense doors—alternating pleasant and painful. Feeling, therefore, happens. An alternation of pleasant and unpleasant happens for Buddhas, happens for us.

But the next step is not necessary. Feeling does not have to give rise to craving. It's possible for us to know the pleasant, unpleasant or neutral quality of contact and not move into greed, aversion or delusion. This is a very important point. This is where the chain of dependent origination can be cut.

If there is enough mindfulness, enough steadiness of mind, we don't have to form a reaction to the feeling. And then we can, as it were, rest in that gap. There opens up a space between feeling and craving. The non-reactive state feels like spaciousness. And this is the opening into equanimity.

So we discover a new possibility that wasn't there before we looked closely. You could call it equanimity. You could call it acceptance. It means that we can be with pain and not have to hate it. It means we can be with the pleasant and not have to hold on to it. We accept their coming and we accept their going and we don't get disturbed.

This really becomes the sweet spot in meditation. This is the place where if you look in your meditation and you don't find greed and you don't find aversion and you don't find delusion, the meditation takes place much more easily. One teacher said the whole of the Buddha's path consists of resting in the gap between feeling and craving. The whole of the path is resting in that space between feeling and craving.

So we can start to explore what that feels like. When feelings are present but you're not reacting to them, you're fully aware but non-reactive, what does that feel like? Generally, it feels comfortable. But the quality that I want us to start tuning into is the freedom of it.

Because here the mind is not being driven by conditions. Generally, the untrained mind is completely driven by the changing conditions. With pleasure, we act with greed. With pain, we act with aversion. But now all of a sudden we're discovering that conditions can be there and we're not driven by them—that the mind can find a place that's not fixed by the conditions that accompany it. And this is what freedom's about. Freedom is finding a place that's not determined by these conditions.

Ajahn Chah talks about this as seeing conditioned things as conditioned things and seeing the Dhamma as the Dhamma. I'm going to read a little section from one of his teachings. It's a little long, so I hope you can stay with it because there's a nice pointing here:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself. The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

"The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are, as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know directly."

So this is Ajahn Chah's pointer for stepping out of conditions, stepping out of conditioned things. And this is what in the Thai forest tradition they call the deathless. This gap between feeling and craving is not the source of a new birth.

There's no "I" emerging because there's no grasping happening. This gap is always available. It's a space that can be found in any moment, in every moment. And that's why it's talked about as deathless. It doesn't partake of birth and death. So we can always tune to it when we like.

There's a dialogue that the Buddha had. In the Sutta Nipata, a group of Brahmin youths come and they each ask the Buddha the most important question that they've been holding. One Brahmin youth asks the Buddha, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you have liked to ask the Buddha that? What's it like on your side for one who is freed?

And the Buddha replied, "The sage is without desire. He has nothing. He is unentangled in becoming." He has nothing and he is unentangled in becoming.

I want to share again this quote I mentioned in an earlier talk by Ajahn Chah on becoming. He was giving a Dharma talk, probably in an open-air hall. Open-air halls in Thailand have roofs and floors, but there are no outside walls—just pillars holding up the roof. It was probably a setting like that.

So Ajahn Chah was speaking and he said, "The roof is a becoming, the floor is a becoming, but in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness."

So the deathless is this place where we're not becoming. That means we haven't taken birth by grabbing hold of something. Resting in that gap means that we're in something that's unborn and uncreated, an open kind of space.

This is from Ajahn Chimney, another teacher in the Thai forest tradition: "The best way to develop a great awareness"—and the word he used here was mahasati: maha means great, sati means mindfulness, so a great mindfulness—"The best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

So can we start to recognize this quality in our experience, in our meditation, of not having taken birth? The quality of resting in that space between feeling and craving, where the reactive formations are not happening.

The Buddha said that the path, the Eightfold Path, has the deathless as its ground, destination, and goal. To me, that indicates the path itself partakes of this freedom. The path has the deathless as its ground. The path comes out of the deathless. So this resting in the deathless is both a freedom here and now that we can experience—have the fruit here and now—but it's also part of the path, meaning that the more we rest there, the more that furthers the journey to the final freedom, the final liberation.

The path and the goal come close together. And you can start to feel this as you develop that ability to rest, that there's a satisfaction in that. There's a kind of fulfillment in that ease.

One of my teachers in Thailand was a great forest monk named Ajahn Buddhadasa. He was both a scholar and a meditator. He was resting in this place a lot. His mind was very unmoved by changing circumstances. And as a young monk, I found that kind of disorienting, because I would come up to talk to him, ask him a question or something. And he wasn't like a Western Vipassana teacher who welcomes you into the room and makes sure you're settled and gives you a tissue if you need one—very welcoming and friendly.

Ajahn Buddhadasa never really moved out of his meditation. So I came up and he just sort of held me in his meditation. I was another arising in his consciousness, and he was neither drawn toward me nor repelled by me. But I wasn't used to this kind of coolness as a way of relating, and I thought he just wanted me to go away.

Later we arranged to have regular teachings with him, and I felt his metta more in that exchange. But in my early exchanges with him, I didn't feel that there was a metta attitude toward me, and I felt like I was imposing on him. It was only after I got to know him better I realized he was just holding me like he held everything.

He didn't mind if I was there. I could have stayed there all morning. There were roosters that gathered around his feet and hopped up on his bench. He didn't mind them either. There were some dogs that sat around his feet who loved to bark at the Western monks. I swear they could tell that we didn't really belong there, and they would hound us. But he didn't mind them either.

So he didn't mind me, but I couldn't pick up on that. He was just meditating with me. He was unentangled by my being there.

One starts to see that this ability to rest in this way, to not fall into reactive formations, depends on two things that we've been cultivating all along: samatha and vipassana.

Samatha is the quality of tranquility that develops naturally out of all the practices we've been doing, whether you're doing meditation on breath or body, or choiceless attention, or one of the brahmaviharas. All of these serve to calm down the mind-body system. Normally when Westerners come into meditation, we've been very amped up by our culture. Our culture is overly speedy in terms of a harmonious way to live. And as members of that culture, we've all gotten mostly too speedy before we come into meditation. That's why it's so hard for the mind to slow down when we first start to sit. It's busy, busy, busy. It's hard to stop the thinking mind. If we look within our body, we often find the same thing. The bodily energy is going a little too fast.

When we come into meditation, we have a big history of doing, and sometimes it's very hard to stop the mental doing and come to any tranquility. But moment by moment, just making touch with the present moment, relaxing in the present moment, allowing it, the mind starts to slow down. This is the quality of samatha. And as you have all slowed over the course of these three weeks, there's a lot more natural mindfulness that comes. You notice sometimes it feels like you're effortlessly present. You can just be here and notice things moment after moment without a lot of work. That kind of effortless mindfulness comes out of this base of samatha or tranquility. That's needed in order to have this experience of resting without becoming reactive.

The other thing that's needed is the quality of vipassana or insight, seeing things clearly. Our practice is designed to encourage you to examine the objects that come at the six sense doors again and again to see what they're like, to see that they're of the nature to arise and pass away, that they're not self or owned by self. And especially to examine the energy of the hindrances and not to get so caught or reactive with mind states of fear or sadness or loneliness or wanting, just to allow those to also come and go, to know them clearly, but not to get caught in a struggle with them.

So this careful examination of all the arisings at the six sense doors really gives us an intimate familiarity with our experience so that when the samatha collects, the understanding collects, we're able to abide in the midst of all these changing phenomena and not be pulled out by them, not have to get entangled with them out of confusion, out of wanting, or out of resistance.

This is not a practice that someone could walk in at the beginning of a meditation retreat and fall into, this kind of resting and open knowing. But it is a practice that some of you are experiencing now. I hear descriptions of it in the interviews. That's why I wanted to talk about it tonight.

There are a few different meditation approaches that lend well to this quality of open attention without getting caught up. We've talked about all of these in little ways. I just want to do a review.

One of them is the practice we've learned from Sayadaw U Tejaniya of checking the attitudes. Do you remember this practice? We're noticing things at the sense doors, and we very often check: how am I relating to those things? Am I relating out of greed, aversion, or delusion? We check by asking ourselves simple questions.

To check greed, we say: am I wanting something to be happening that isn't? To check aversion, we ask: am I resisting something that's happening and want it to stop? To check delusion, we ask: am I not in touch with what's happening?

There's a very simple way. Ask these three questions and we can find out if the mind is in a reactive place or if we're relating wisely to the things that are coming and going. Generally, when one starts this practice, one might be connecting in choiceless attention or with a chosen object, using that to anchor the attention in the present, and then turning back regularly to check the attitude. Could be five times a sit in the beginning. And then you can do it more often. You can do it ten times a sitting. And then you can do it more often. So that eventually, your main practice, especially as this quality of resting develops, can be: is the mind in a reactive formation or not? Or is the mind in this place of freedom?

This also resonates really well with Upasika Kee, who puts it this way: your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. This means watching the mind states, the reactive formations of mind.

When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on.

Do you get the sense of that—that you can just kind of abide with taking a look at where the mind is going in relation to the things that are arising? Am I trying to hold on, to grab closer, to push away? Am I ignoring? Just keep looking.

Ajahn Chah has a nice metaphor for this. He's talking about looking at all the different states of mind that come and how they get attached to objects. He said, "If you want to see a train, just go to the central station. You don't have to go traveling all the way up the northern line, the southern line, the eastern line, and the western line to see all the trains. If you want to see trains, every single one of them, you'd be better off waiting at Grand Central Station. That's where they all end. Just look right here," he pointed at his heart, "at Central Station. Greed arises here. Anger arises here. Delusion arises here. Just sit here and you can watch all these things arise. Practice right here because right here is where you're stuck. Right here is where the determination arises, where conventions arise, and right here is where the Dhamma will arise."

So this is a practice direction: just stay at the heart and notice its movements.

When I practiced with Sayadaw U Tejaniya, he was so firm on this point. I said to him, "You know, I could observe the movements of the hindrances much better if I followed the breath for a while. Can I just follow the breath for a while?" And he said, "No."

"But my mind would really be a lot steadier and I could pay better attention. Can I just follow the breath?" "No."

He insisted, for me anyway, just to stay there watching the movements of the mind. That was the only practice he would let me do.

The second of the approaches we talked about quite a bit before—it's an open awareness where you turn the attention to awareness itself. But I want to give another image for it. We talked about it as a sky before in the guided meditation, but another image that's helpful I first heard from someone who teaches children.

One of our Sangha members runs a Dharma preschool. If you live in Marin and have children who aren't in school yet, it's like a heaven realm for your kids, because she has about twenty kids and all the parents are into meditation and have given her permission to run this preschool as basically a Dharma training for these young kids. So she teaches them yoga. They do spiritual stories together and they meditate in silence together. These three-to-five-year-old kids, she says, will stay silent for like thirty minutes at a time because the atmosphere is so inviting. And it's not a strict silence—if they want to talk, they can come up and sit on her lap and whisper in her ear, so they know they have some outlet.

So she teaches them meditation, usually after she does some yoga. She'll have them lie down. But she says with children, you can't use words like "awareness" and "mindfulness"—that's too abstract. Or even "emotions"—that word is too abstract. So she uses the image of a pond.

She says, "Lie down and imagine that you're in the middle of a big pond and all these fish are swimming through it. You can watch the fish come and go. There might be a happy fish that swims through. There might be a sad fish that swims through. There might be a loving fish. There might be an angry fish. Just be the water and let all the fish swim through you. And it's no problem."

At the end of one meditation, this little boy who was, I think, five years old, raised his hand and he said, "I have a problem."

And she said, "What's that?"

He said, "I can't let the angry fish come."

And she said, "Well, why is that? What happens?"

And he said, "Well, when I forget that I'm the water, the angry fish makes me do things that hurt other people."

So this image of water is actually quite a nice way to think of awareness. Not long ago, I was standing by a pond, and the surface was basically still. It wasn't windy, but it was raining—there was a light rain falling. And each little drop, you know, you just see how it impacted the still surface and caused these ripples. And then it would fade. But of course they were going all the time, all over.

And that to me was an analogy for sense impressions. So it's kind of like our awareness is this flat pond, and sense impressions are being dropped in moment after moment after moment. Now, if we can stay in the flatness of the pond, we don't have to make a big swirl around any of the sense impressions. But if we forget, then we make a big fuss, and it gets the water very stirred up to the point where we lose that flat, even, peaceful nature of the surface.

Again, Upasika Ki: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside.

So this is the same encouragement. We stay with this inward staying knowing, and we look for anything that will disturb it. And we just don't allow the mind to go out and grab a hold outwardly—whether outwardly is sounds and sights, or whether outwardly is bodily sensations, thoughts and emotions. We don't let the mind travel very far from this peaceful knowing of its own nature.

This is from a French poet named Paul Valéry. It's interesting how artists have these very cool insights. He described his process this way: "I only refer to my pure self, by which I mean absolute consciousness, through which one turns loose from everything else." It's kind of the same experience. Turning to the knowing cuts the fixation with other things.

But we don't lose touch with the world. We stay connected to the heart and its movement, but that doesn't cut us off from people or risings or sounds or emotions or anything else. We know them, but we don't let ourselves get entangled with them.

And then the third way that I also mentioned in an earlier talk was seeing the empty nature of the mind. And in turning to the empty nature of the mind, it's sort of like you recognize that this mind is basically unfindable, and you let your attention go into this limitless, unfindability. And as you do that, it kind of takes the pressure off any attempt to hold that's close.

And this unfindability is important dharmically. There's a story in the Zen tradition about Bodhidharma, who was an Indian monk who took Buddhism to China for the first time. And in doing so established, it said, the Chan lineage in China. And it said that he meditated in a cave for nine years, a cave in the snows.

And at one point, a very devoted student came and wanted teachings from Bodhidharma. And his name was Hui Ko. And he waited outside the cave and he waited outside the cave, and it was snowing and very cold, and Bodhidharma wouldn't give him any instructions. So finally, to prove his sincerity, he cut off his arm and he tossed it in and said, "I'm really sincere." We might have some qualms about allowing that yogi on a retreat like this, but it seemed to work because Bodhidharma finally responded.

And he said, oh, Hui Ko, as he tossed the arm in, said, "Your disciple's mind is not pacified. I beg you, Master, pacify it."

And Bodhidharma said, "Show me your mind and I will pacify it."

And Hui Ko replied, "I have searched for the mind, but I have never been able to find it."

And Bodhidharma replied, "There, I have pacified your mind."

And at that moment, Hui Ko was enlightened and became the Dharma heir of Bodhidharma and the second great founder of Chan in China.

We find a pointing like this also from the Buddha. He was talking to his son. The Buddha had a son when he went away and left the household life. And when he came back later, enlightened, his son was seven years old. His son's name was Rahula, and he taught his son. And eventually Rahula became an Arhat at age seven.

So this was part of the Buddha's teaching to his son after he had returned. "Rahula, develop meditation that is like space. For when you develop meditation that is like space, arisen agreeable and disagreeable contacts will not invade your mind and remain. Just as space is not established anywhere, so too, Rahula, develop meditation that is like space."

It's as though as we let our attention go into this limitless and unfindable space, we become unhooked, unbound from the phenomena of the sense world. We don't lose touch with them—we're still there—but the heart finds itself in a free place and in a free relationship to them.

So start to tune into these moments of the day when you're relatively clear of greed, aversion, and delusion, and start to notice the freedom that's there. Sometimes these moments are very ordinary. They don't announce themselves with big banners—"Liberation, turn right." They just arise as quiet moments of ease.

They could be when you're walking. They could be in a sitting. They could be in the dining room at lunch. They could be when you're folding laundry or taking a shower. Notice when the heart is momentarily clear and appreciate the ability to rest there. Appreciate that freedom. That's where the path and the goal have come together. And you can just rest with that kind of awareness.

I'll close with a quotation again from the Suttanipāta, another one of the Brahmin youths who's asking questions of the Buddha—again, a very heartfelt question. This youth asks the Buddha: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir. The island is the refuge in the middle of the flood."

And the Buddha replies: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing—that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbāna, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

So let's just sit for a minute together: having nothing, clinging to nothing. That is the island. There is no other.

CHAPTER 94

Loving Kindness; Reflecting on our Goodness

Guy Armstrong · 36 min

> In this guided meditation from a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong explores a crucial but often overlooked aspect of loving-kindness practice: reflecting on our own goodness. Drawing from the Buddha's repeated recommendations, Armstrong explains that the proximate cause for mettā to arise is seeing the good in someone—including ourselves. This practice challenges Western conditioning that may view self-appreciation as pride or arrogance.
>
> The session provides detailed instructions for cultivating mettā, beginning with connecting to the heart center and consciously reflecting on our positive qualities and kind actions. Armstrong guides practitioners through the traditional sequence of directing loving-kindness toward oneself, a benefactor, those nearby, and all beings everywhere. He emphasizes how recognizing goodness in others—their generosity, compassion, wisdom, and kind heart—naturally opens our hearts and can transform difficult relationships.
>
> This approach to mettā practice, rooted in the brahmavihāra teachings, offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners a concrete method for developing authentic loving-kindness. By grounding the practice in genuine appreciation of goodness, rather than forcing artificial feelings, practitioners can cultivate sustainable compassion that extends naturally from self to all beings.

Every day at this time we'll have a guided meditation. Normally what we'll do in the afternoons is move through the other Brahmaviharas so that we'll give pretty detailed instructions for how to meditate with compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity. We also add forgiveness, which is almost like a fifth Brahmavihara. So in the other afternoons we'll be moving through those, but we felt it was a little too much for the first day, so this afternoon will be a guided meditation on loving-kindness.

But I'm going to emphasize something that has been mentioned but not maybe fully developed. And that is the importance in doing metta practice of reflecting on our goodness. The Buddha recommended this again and again. And when we hear this as Westerners, it kind of comes out of the blue. It seems like an instruction we may never have heard before or we thought was vaguely sinful. Because it sounds like a form of pride. Like, I should step back and think about the good things I've done? Isn't that a little arrogant or something?

But it's said that the proximate cause for loving-kindness to arise is seeing the good in someone. So in order for metta to arise toward ourselves, we need to see the good in ourselves. And all of you have a lot of good in you. I haven't met all of you yet, but I can tell. So it's just a matter of discovering where that lies.

In the meditation, I'm going to give a few instructions for how to discover those qualities in us. And I wanted to explain it at the beginning so you won't feel shy or like you're going off into strange territory, but this is really an integral part of the metta practice. We learn to do it for ourselves. We also learn to do it for our benefactor and the other individuals that we'll be bringing in later. And it really is a good way to open the heart to somebody. If you're having a struggle with somebody in your life and you can turn and remind yourself of their good qualities, it can often shift the relationship, even if it's just a little bit. So that will be included in the meditation as we go into it.

So please sit comfortably. Be relaxed in your sitting posture. At the same time, be a little bit upright. Have a sense that your spine is supporting you with some strength, that you feel some dignity in your posture. If you're comfortable, you can let your eyes gently close. If you're more used to meditating with your eyes open a little bit, that's fine too. Generally, we allow the eyes to be softly closed.

You might begin by letting go of any obvious areas of holding. And let the forehead be smooth. The eyes be soft. The jaw be relaxed. The shoulders be dropped. Let the belly be soft, not clenched. Then let the hands rest easily on one another, in your lap, or on your thighs.

So bring your awareness into your body as you sit, feeling the whole body, open to the whole body, just letting it be as it is. And then bringing the attention into the heart center, area in the center of the chest. And maybe feeling this area from the inside, not just on the surface. The heart center is a place where a lot of emotions get felt, get experienced.

So as you connect to the heart center, come in touch with your sense of who you are. And you might do this by just feeling your body and mood, just as they are here and now. Usually a very familiar sense of the body, familiar mood. You might like to bring up an image of yourself. Sometimes it's helpful to recall an image where you see yourself in a place that makes you happy, remembering a photo when you were smiling.

And so as you connect with yourself, either through the felt sense or through an image, take a few moments and reflect on some things you like about yourself. Some of your good qualities as a person. If you met somebody who was just like you, wouldn't that be wonderful? Someone to share your sense of humor, your good taste in retreat centers, your love of nature. Taking a few moments to reflect on the things you appreciate about yourself. Could be your care for the environment. Your willingness to look after pets. Generosity with friends. Care for those who are struggling.

Sometimes when put in this abstract way, it may be hard to find many of our good qualities even though they're there. So another way in is to remember some good things that you've done—some things you've done for others that show your caring, show your kindness.

Take a moment and reflect on some actions you've done that have benefited others. It doesn't have to be a big thing. It can just be little things. A time you reached out to a friend who was sick, or checking in on an aging parent, or an act to preserve our environment. Donating to a good cause.

And as you remember a few of these small things, take a look back and remember: what was the intention? What was my motivation in doing that act? And so getting in touch with the fact there's some kind of generosity, some kind of kindness or compassion, some caring about another. These are all forms of goodness that have been shown through our actions in the past.

And anytime we do loving-kindness for ourselves, it's helpful to remember a few of these. These are the grounds for us to feel friendly, appreciative toward ourselves. So we begin with a kind of faith that these good qualities are already there in us. They've been shown through many actions in the past. And so metta is a natural fit where there's goodness, where we can see this kind of caring.

So we can start to direct the phrases of loving kindness now to yourself with that faith in your own goodness:

May I be safe and protected from harm.
May I be happy and peaceful.
May I live in harmony with my body.
May I live with ease.

So continuing to just gently repeat the phrases of loving kindness for yourself. And if one phrase really connects, you can stay with it for a while.

And if you feel ready, you can move on to the benefactor. And so bringing in the benefactor perhaps by saying their name, bringing up an image of them. Imagine them sitting in front of you or next to you. Whatever active imagination you can do to bring the sense that they're alive in the room at this moment. Because when you get a strong sense of their presence, the connection is easier.

So once you've connected with the benefactor, you can also take a few minutes to reflect on their good qualities. What are the things you really love and appreciate in this person? There can be quite a few, so take a little time with this. So it's like looking at your benefactor from a lot of different angles. Like you'd look at a piece of crystal to see all the facets. You might see their happiness, contentment, their generosity, compassion, their skill in communication, the care they take with their conduct and speech, their wisdom, their good heart.

It's helpful to do this a little bit each time you begin to meditate on someone. Remember what you like about them. And then it's also helpful to remember sometimes they've been kind to you. Benefactor is often someone who's helped you, supported you, taken you under their wing, shown you the right way. So let yourself recall some of those particular incidents when you've been with a benefactor and felt their benefits.

So now having a sense of their good heart, confidence in their goodness, you can begin to direct the thoughts of loving kindness to your benefactor:

May you too be free from danger.
May you have mental happiness.
May you have physical happiness.
May you take care of yourself happily in this world.

You can take your time with each phrase because offering it with this sincere spirit really is an act of generosity. So it's like offering a gift to the person. You can take the time to say it and then sometimes afterwards you might like to feel how that felt to offer that phrase, that wish. And you can come back and place the attention in the heart center and just feel how that felt—to connect with your benefactor, wish them well, have that connection.

When you've rested a little bit the mind at the heart center, you can begin again with the next phrase. If it feels like the presence of the benefactor has faded and it's hard to connect with them, you can renew that sense of their presence by doing what you did at the beginning: saying their name, bringing up an image, recalling their goodness. And then begin again with the phrases.

And then as a way of ending the sitting, you might begin to send some loving kindness thoughts to the people right around you—although sitting right around your seat, if you can remember any faces or socks or clothes, holding those people in your heart...

And extending the same phrases, have a sense that maybe it can radiate around you, the wish.

"May all of you be safe and protected from harm."

We all have the same deep wishes.

"May all of you be happy. May your body support you with strength. May you live with the ease of well-being."

You might reflect on their goodness at this moment, reflecting on all the work they've done today. Not an easy practice. Appreciating their determination and courage and effort. Extend the phrases again to them.

And then letting the loving kindness go out in an unlimited way, including all beings everywhere. All beings have the same basic wish to be happy and not to suffer. So letting your wish extend in all directions—above and below, right and left, back and front.

"May all beings everywhere be safe and protected from harm. May all beings be happy. May all beings be healthy. May all beings live with ease."

CHAPTER 95

Mettā: Near and Far Enemies

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong provides a comprehensive exploration of the near and far enemies of loving-kindness. Drawing on the traditional Brahmavihāra teachings, he explains how the practice of mettā naturally brings up both wholesome and unwholesome mind states. The near enemy—attachment tinged with desire—manifests in our relationships as wanting approval, needing more closeness, or clinging to pleasant experiences in meditation. The far enemy—ill will or aversion—appears as self-judgment, anger toward others, or fear. Armstrong shares personal stories from his own practice, including insights from his time as a monk in Thailand and experiences working with difficult people on retreat. He emphasizes that encountering these challenging states is not a mistake but an integral part of the practice's purifying process. The talk offers practical guidance for working with these obstacles, including the use of forgiveness, switching to compassion phrases, or applying mindfulness. Armstrong concludes with Śāntideva's teaching that all joy comes from wanting others' happiness, while suffering arises from self-centered concerns, highlighting the transformative potential of genuine mettā practice.

When I was in my early twenties, before I had encountered meditation practice, I started to have very strong openings in the area of love. I connected with this experience through relating with people and through relating with nature. Although we haven't talked about it extensively, I know that nature is a really important piece for many of you in your metta practice. You almost can't go out and look at the hillsides and the deer and the turkeys without getting some connection of loving kindness for this landscape. So it was through people, through nature, through art, through music. This was the most fulfilling thing that I had discovered in my life, at least in young adult life.

But it wasn't very stable for me. These experiences of love would be very intense, but they'd come and go quite randomly. I didn't know what was behind their changing nature. For me, one of the big draws to Dharma practice was wanting to find out how to stabilize and live more from that place.

One of the things I discovered pretty early on is that to have regular access to love, I needed to understand wisdom. The wisdom was basically about not holding on, not clinging. That was an important piece. The other thing that was really important for me was discovering the practice of loving kindness. In our tradition, in our lineage, this is the avenue to love. And it's a very reliable one. It's been practiced and undertaken by men and women for 2,500 years, this very kind of practice that we're doing here. It does work. You look at somebody like the Dalai Lama and you can tell it works. This is great ground for our faith in this practice.

But one of the other things I came to learn is that the practice is not just a straight line to metta. We don't just come in and immediately get there without moving again. The practice is best understood, I think, not as a zip line to that destination, but rather the practice of metta is really an exploration. In that exploration, we go around many different mind states that all come together to lead in the direction of loving kindness, but we touch many other places along the way.

If we have the idea that only metta is valuable and all these other places are mistakes, then we'll have a lot of problems in our metta practice. But if we understand that metta and all these other points we touch are all really valuable places to learn from, then all of our metta practice makes sense. Then it all becomes workable and it's all part of the unfolding of the Dharma.

The terrain that metta wanders around—and it does this better than any other practice I know—is the territory of the heart's response, or we could say responses. What we're really exploring is how the heart responds to the changing conditions that life presents us. As human beings, we have lots of changing conditions. There are beautiful things that happen to us, sort of medium things that happen to us, and sometimes disastrous things that happen to us. The heart has different responses, some conditioned, some less conditioned, to all that changing situational landscape of our life. So what we really want to learn about is: how is my heart responding?

This perspective accomplishes two things. Number one, looking at the metta practice this way opens up a broader view of what we're doing. It makes it easier to accept all the things that come. Number two, it shows that there's a lot of understanding that comes out of this practice. Not only are we retraining the heart to respond in the most beautiful way possible, but we're also learning about how its responses affect us in all the directions that it goes. So there's a lot of insight in this practice.

I don't know if you've ever felt this, but sometimes as a metta yogi, I get an inferiority complex with vipassana yogis because they're a little bit smug. They say, "Well, okay, you're 'opening the heart,' but we've got insight. And insight is the real thing because that's what's going to liberate us. All you're doing is poking around and feeling a little better." But I want to say that we have a lot of insight, too. So you can stand up to those vipassana yogis and say you're also on a great path of understanding and learning.

The first area that we start to explore is the area of the Brahmaviharas themselves—loving-kindness and the other three. This term Brahmavihara is made up of two words. Brahma refers to something heavenly or divine. It's a pointer to a really refined way of being and way of feeling and manner of existence. The term vihara means a spiritual home. Often a monastery or a nunnery is termed a vihara, a place to live that has a spiritual connotation. So we could call this combination Brahmavihara our divine home, or heavenly abiding, or sometimes it's called our best home.

All these, I think, are good translations.

The original teachings of the Buddha in the Pali Suttas describe these Brahmaviharas in different ways, but here's a passage that comes again and again from his words: "I will abide pervading the entire world with a mind imbued with loving-kindness, abundant, exalted, immeasurable, without hostility and without ill will." He repeats this formulation for the other three: compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity.

This is where the journey of exploration is leading—to pervade the whole universe with this mind of loving-kindness that's abundant, exalted, and immeasurable. Immeasurable because it's vast and because it doesn't exclude any beings. It can reach and include the whole range of sentient life throughout the universe without hostility and without ill will. This is a beautiful place to be.

Because it's so lofty a vision, we understand that we only reach the fullness of this state from time to time. It's like a peak experience when we experience the Brahmaviharas in this degree of fullness. It's not that we expect to be there all the time, but we can start to get a taste for it. The immeasurability expands as we practice more and move into that space.

In our tradition, we take loving-kindness as the foundation for all four Brahmaviharas. In the Mahayana traditions, compassion is more often taken as the foundation, but in our tradition, we see loving-kindness as the foundation. We understand that when the heart becomes open with the caring of loving-kindness, then when it looks on suffering, it automatically morphs into compassion. Compassion comes naturally when the open heart of loving-kindness sees suffering.

When that open heart looks on someone's happiness, then automatically what emerges is appreciative joy. We get happy with their happiness. If the open heart isn't being stimulated in any particular way, then it can rest in the balance of equanimity. Equanimity doesn't mean that there's no feeling, but it means that the mind is balanced and peaceful amid the changing conditions.

First we begin in this retreat by exploring loving-kindness in a simple way. We develop it through these simple phrases. Sally talked about it this morning, saying that in this practice we're really just planting seeds. I want to emphasize that—every phrase that we say plants a seed, because these phrases are expressing an intention.

The basic practice is we bring someone into our heart and we feel, "I hope you're happy." That's all it is. But that is the heart of the metta practice—to hold someone, "I hope you're happy"—and then we say it in different ways.

This "I hope you're happy" is an intention that comes out of our heart and mind toward the other person. That intention carries power because intention is the root of karma. What we're doing is planting karmic seeds of these caring and loving intentions moment after moment after moment. The way that karma works, this develops a force over time. This develops a power, and it results in fruit, because karmic actions have fruits. Wholesome intentions bring wholesome fruits.

Exactly when those fruits come, we can't say. It's just like if you're a gardener and you plant a tomato seed in your garden—can you tell when the tomatoes are going to come? No. You put it in there and you give it the right conditions: water and plant food and sunshine and hopefully warmth. But if you get too impatient and you go in there and scrape away all the soil and try to pull up the little sprout, you're going to rip it out.

We have to be really patient and understand that our job as gardeners is to plant the seed, but it's not to tell the plant when to grow—because only nature can do that. We remember that a synonym for nature is Dharma. So we plant the seed and Dharma provides the growth, provides the fruits. But it will do it at its own pace, given whatever the conditions are.

That's why in the metta practice all we need to take care of is that simple intention: "I hope you're happy," in its different forms. If we do that, we've done our job. We've planted those seeds moment after moment after moment, and then we can just trust the Dharma to provide the water and the sunlight and the warmth for those seeds to grow.

There was a lovely moment in our interview group yesterday when we were talking about the fact that there's insight in the metta practice, and we were discussing different aspects of how to do the practice. Someone said, "From the comments in the group, I'm starting to understand that all we really have to do is say the phrases and take what comes." I said, "That's exactly right."

If we could just give that as one simple instruction, we could be done: Just say the phrases and take what comes. That really is the whole of the practice.

Of course, we want to refine it a little bit. We want to say the phrase and mean it. So it's not just a mantra. In mantra practice, you say the words and the words take care of the energy or the vibration. The words do the work. But in the metta practice, we want to say the words and mean them, because it's the meaning—I hope you're happy—that provides the power of that intention. So the more you can mean the phrase when you say it, the purer or clearer or stronger that intention becomes. And that intention is the karmic engine of the practice. That's really what makes this practice work.

All you have to do is sincerely care when you say that phrase. It sounds easy, doesn't it? All I have to do is sincerely care. But you know, about sixty times a minute and eighteen hours a day, it gets hard to do it again and again and again. Yet each time, this is all the practice needs: that simple intention of caring for ourselves and for someone else.

There's no technique that produces the caring. This is why it's a creative practice. We have to find the caring. And if we find the caring, we found the metta. It's a practice where we're asked to basically produce it on the spot. You want to have metta? Let's see it. You want to have metta? Okay, produce it in this moment.

That's really what we're doing—producing this metta out of our own heart and understanding moment after moment after moment. That's all it is. That's all we're doing. But that's not so easy. It's easy to do it once. It's not so easy to keep doing it moment after moment after moment. But the more we understand, the easier it gets, because we understand we just have to do that, and then we let go of the outcome.

I think Kamala said that on the first morning: We let go of the outcome in the sense of wanting it to change the person. And I think Sally said something this morning about letting go of the outcome in terms of trying to produce an immediate result. We say that phrase, we mean it, and then we take what comes. Because there's a deep trust that the exploration of the heart's response will lead us to greater understanding, greater love, and greater freedom.

So we don't mind if we wander. Because everywhere we wander, we're going to learn and we're going to open. It's a slow transformation, but it's happening with each phrase that we can say with sincerity. And the Buddha put it this way: "Don't disregard the accumulation of wholesomeness, saying, this will come to nothing. By the gradual falling of raindrops, a jar is filled."

That's what we're doing—filling the jar moment after moment. It's like the image Sally used this morning of the rain falling on the rock and wearing it away. Slowly, slowly, moment by moment, we're changing our hearts.

One of the ways that we change our hearts is this: normally our intentions run to self-centered motives. I'm sure you've noticed. Normally we're thinking about what we can get from here or how we can prevent fear or threat from arising over there. So instead of those self-centered motivations that activate through our thoughts, we're replacing them with caring thoughts. This is the first and most straightforward way we purify the mind. We're dropping the self-centered motivations and putting in caring motivations. This starts to change the way we feel, starts to change the way we are.

But there's another way that we clean the heart or purify it that I want to talk about. Metta practice really acts as a scrubbing technique. It gets in and goes after those old accumulations of hurts and fears and rejections and sorrows and disappointments. And it's interesting the way it does this, because it does it through relationship reflections.

We reflect on ourselves, our benefactor, friends, other people in our lives, all beings. Through these relationship reflections, much of this old accumulation begins to surface.

This is the other part of the exploration. We start to encounter the accumulated material in the mind—and it doesn't feel like loving-kindness, though it was dislodged by loving-kindness. It's rather like taking a magnet with a certain orientation and running it through the body. Loving-kindness has a really strong positive pull, and as you draw that through the system, everything that's unlike loving-kindness gets drawn to the surface.

I'm sure you've experienced this. We turn to ourselves and wish ourselves well, and suddenly all the reasons we shouldn't be happy come to the fore. Or we direct our thoughts to the benefactor—"I wish you well"—and some little regret or feeling of hurt arises in response.

This is not a wrong direction. This is not a mistake. This is what metta practice does. This is how it purifies us. In order to clean up these old hurts, we first have to shake them loose. By bringing them into the light of awareness, we create the possibility of releasing and transforming them. This is why this practice is so healing, so deeply healing—because eventually it goes through all our relationships and cleans them up.

Relationships are mostly where we've been hurt. Human beings generally get wounded through interactions with other human beings. That's why this relationship-oriented reflection is so powerful and reaches so deeply into us.

As we explore and these other reactions arise, they too become an integral part of the practice. They're so integral that in the Brahmavihara system, they're given their own designations. As you learn the complete map of the Brahmaviharas, you discover they encompass not just the four divine abodes, but each divine abode also has a near enemy and a far enemy. The whole map actually contains three states for each Brahmavihara—twelve in all. We'll explore all of these together during our time this week.

The near enemy for each Brahmavihara is a state that closely resembles the wholesome state but carries an unwholesome tinge. It's like an imposter, masquerading as a beautiful state while missing the mark. The far enemy is the direct opposite—and the opposite of a beautiful state will always be an unwholesome state.

The near enemy for loving-kindness is a kind of affection or liking that's tinged with desire. The far enemy is the opposite of loving-kindness itself. As we've discussed before, the opposite of goodwill is ill will, hostility, or what we might call aversion generally.

So the near enemy relates to desire, the far enemy to aversion. Do these sound familiar? Desire and aversion are the first two hindrances, the basic deluded movements of mind we all experience. We're pulled toward the pleasant and want to push away the unpleasant. This is the reactive mechanism of samsara—what keeps us bound.

Metta encounters these same forces. The near enemy manifests the desire force, the far enemy the aversive force. They appear through the Brahmaviharas as well. But exploring these responses means exploring the terrain of the heart's reactions. We learn how the heart responds to relationships with wanting and how it responds with pushing away.

These are the two responses I want to explore this evening—the near and far enemies.

The near enemy involves liking somebody but with a quality of holding on, attachment, desire, or wanting woven through it. You can see how this operates. You move through life and encounter people you really like. There's this instantaneous feeling of metta with them—you like how they look, how they dress...

You like the way they speak. You like the way they carry themselves. You like the way they think. In that, there's a lot of metta, because there's an appreciation and a kind of love for the person's being. But then, because of our conditioning, we think, "I want more of that." And so we form a desire or an attachment in relation to that person. That desire or attachment is what creates the problem in the relationship.

Metta has this warmth. Love is very uniting. When there's pure love with somebody else, there's a real feeling of union and drawing closer. Well, attraction also has this. Desire has this. And that's why sometimes they're hard to tell apart.

Let's talk about how this desire force plays out in some of these basic relationships.

With the benefactor, if it's somebody that you respect, what we often want is their approval, or their attention, or their recognition, or their acceptance. I was meditating for a long time on a six-week retreat. I used one benefactor who was a teacher of mine. I discovered as I was doing this practice that my ability to really open to him suffered from part of this attached feeling. I really appreciated him a lot. I had a lot of pure metta. But I had wanted a friendship with him that wasn't going to happen because for him we weren't on equal footing—he was my teacher and he saw me as a student. So the friendship wasn't really going to develop, although I would have liked it to.

I had to let go of that in order to just really open to my benefactor and appreciate who he was and all I'd received from him. It wasn't that I resented not having that kind of friendship, but it limited my ability to feel wholly and purely loving toward him. Often with the benefactor, that's the dynamic—we want maybe a little more than they're able to give.

With a friend, this dynamic often comes in. Sometimes it's one-sided, where there's more desire on one side and less on the other. We may be the one wanting more closeness, more contact, more intimacy, more connection. We feel the friend after a while start to pull away because they don't want it quite as close. It comes up in little things: "I invited them for dinner, but they never invited me back," or "I called them last week and they never returned my call." We start feeling insecure and not knowing where we stand. Then we start to withdraw. Sometimes friendships drift apart because there's not the mutuality of where the people are heading.

It's also easy to get resentful. If we're in the situation of wanting more contact and we're feeling rejected, it's easy to become resentful. We can also become resentful if we feel the other person is too needy in relation to us. The resentment can come from either side. Sometimes friendships end because of that imbalance, and sometimes that's appropriate. But it's unfortunate if the friendly feelings end because of resentment or frustration.

It's quite possible to have a friend who's distant—not exactly the friendship you want, but you could still have a lot of metta toward that person. Often what we find as we go through our friend meditation, which we'll start tomorrow morning, is that some of these old disappointments and hurts or rejections or feeling the other person was too needy have really clouded our ability to feel the metta. As we reflect on our friend and their happiness and their safety and their health and their ease, all these things come to light. We can see how maybe we've been obstructed in our metta for them by these old feelings. Once they come to light, there's a possibility of releasing them.

Forgiveness is a really powerful ally, especially in the friend relationship. That's why we wanted to introduce it early, so that you could begin to work with it—not just for yourself, but also when the friend is introduced tomorrow. Often we find there's a lot of forgiving that has to take place between even our closest friends, or sometimes especially with our closest friends.

Another place where there's a lot of desire is in our intimate relationships. Romantic love has this attractive quality with a very strong component of desire or wanting. There's usually desire for companionship, sexual desire, desire for appreciation and affection, desire for sharing mutual interests—all the friend dynamics. But you can especially see with romantic love, if the desire isn't getting fulfilled, how quickly the love can turn into aversion. Many romantic relationships become very conflicted because one partner feels they're not getting their desire satisfied. It can become even violent and abusive because of the frustration of the desire component.

Often romantic love starts with a big component of metta and appreciation.

But if this other side of desire isn't seen, then that part can cause problems.

I've often thought that there should be a romantic love song that captures this whole dynamic. A lot of pop songs are about this, and there should be a pop song that says something like, "I want you, I need you, I love you, and I'll kill you if I can't have you." That's kind of the gist of it, isn't it? I love you until I hate you.

And that's why often we don't use the word love when we're talking about metta—because it gets mixed up with this culture's idea of romantic love.

Sometimes it's not so easy to tell the difference between metta and romantic love or this desire component. But just a couple of things to reflect on:

Romantic love is usually limited to just a few people. Like if you look around this group, which is about 100 people, the number of people that you might want to fall in love with is probably pretty small. So romantic love and this desire force is usually very limited, but metta is meant to be universal. And I expect you will feel at the end of this retreat that you could feel metta toward everybody here. Even if there are difficult people here, I expect you will feel metta for them over the course of the week together. So far, I haven't seen many difficult people, which is lovely. I mean, this seems like a really nice group, and I hope you'll find metta for all of you really easily, because that's the way this group feels to me.

And the other thing about romantic love is that it's more focused on my desires and less concerned with the other's actual well-being. That's another difference with metta.

So most intimate relationships have a mix of metta and desire, and it's why we don't usually use our romantic partners as our friend in the practice. When we talk about the friend category tomorrow, I'll recommend that you pick somebody who's not a romantic partner for you. And the reason for that is that it's hard to tease out these two strands in our romantic relationship right away. But if you pick somebody who's a friend where there's not a romantic attraction, then the metta is usually purer or a little cleaner, and then it's easy to tell the difference. And when you move to a romantic partner, then you can feel how it changes. So that's our recommendation for an intensive retreat generally.

Over time, we really refine this relationship to our partner. Sally and I have been together now for—it's getting close to 30 years, I think it's 28. And in the beginning, I had a lot of desire mixed in with my affection for her. And it continued—we would fight about my desires. I'm sorry to say, but I was a young practitioner then and I didn't know any better.

And then I started reading books about the Bodhisattva path. And I got very inspired. Shantideva's Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. And I took the bodhisattva vows with one of my teachers. And I was reflecting a lot on becoming free so that I could help all beings come out of suffering. So I had this very inspired motivation to help all sentient beings come through their own suffering and awaken.

So I'd be doing these reflections and then I'd be thinking about what I needed from Sally. And I thought, wait, this doesn't make sense. I'm going to save all beings, but I need her to save me first? So I really started looking at that question of need and whether—for a Buddhist practitioner, I don't want to say anything about people in general, but for a Buddhist practitioner—whether the idea of need, in terms of emotional need from a relationship partner, can really be justified. And that's been my reflection and direction since I started considering that, the bodhisattva ideal, and I argue less now. I'm happy to say.

So another form of attachment that comes out of the metta practice is we can want the object of our metta practice to be a certain way. We'll be wishing them well and we'd think, well, you know, you'd really be a lot happier if you changed this. Or I would really like you better if you changed this. And maybe we even want to make a metta phrase that kind of encourages them to be a better person, the way we would see them being a better person.

So I was teaching loving kindness once in a weekend retreat, and a woman raised her hand and said that as her benefactor she was using her son, who was currently in college and living at home. And she said she got to the line that said, "May you live with ease," and she said, "Wait, he's living with way too much ease already. I wish he'd get up earlier and do his homework on time and clean up after himself. This is like way too easy." So she wanted to change her metta phrase to, "May you develop more discipline and have more backbone."

So I said that that might not quite have the quality of acceptance that loving kindness is meant to bring about. So I encourage her to stay with the standard phrase and just reflect on it a little more.

Another form of attachment or desire is that we get attached to the experiences that we have in the metta meditation. It is a beautiful practice and it opens us at times to really beautiful states and kind of peak experiences, both of loving kindness and of concentration. And then there can be a strong desire to have those again.

So this came clear to me. I was doing a long metta retreat and I was about 10 days in and the metta and the concentration were both developing really nicely and I was really enjoying the retreat. And then something came from the outside and it shook it up. It threw me off track and broke the concentration, broke the metta, and I felt like I was starting over.

But I really wanted to get back to where I was, so I worked really hard. I put tremendous pressure on myself, said the phrases as regularly as I could, and tried intensely to see the person and direct the phrase to them on the out-breath. But I was tying myself up in knots, and it was because I wanted that experience. The practice had become fueled by desire.

So I went to see my teacher, who was Joseph Goldstein at that time, and I told him, "Joseph, I lost it, but I'm trying really hard to get back, but I just can't get there. It's so frustrating." He just stopped and said, "Guy, this practice is not for us. It's for the other." That completely cut through the holding. I got it. I have to care about the other person—not self-centeredly care about my experience right now. I have to develop the caring for the other person because that's the whole engine of this practice.

When we sincerely care about the other person, all the fruits come. But if we try to grab hold of it and control the metta to make some immediate result, then it becomes self-centered and it doesn't work. So this is a really important lesson on right effort. We have to go back to the simplest, most innocent intention, which is just to care for the person, ourselves or another. If that's there, everything else comes. But if we try to force it, that puts too much pressure on the heart.

One of the things we have to learn about the heart's responses is that the heart doesn't respond well to pressure. It doesn't respond well to forcing. It doesn't respond well to the mind telling it what it should be feeling. What it responds well to is a relaxed place of listening. This again is where the insight and the understanding become so important. If we settle back and just want to learn how the heart works, it will tell us. It will show us. But we have to go into that receptive, open, curious, innocent place in order to do it. Then it will reveal everything to us. But if we put too much pressure, it'll close down. It gets very shy, and it won't open nicely.

So these are some of the areas of attachment and desire that come up in metta practice—that's the near enemy. The far enemy of ill will or aversion also comes up frequently in doing metta practice. It is the opposite of metta practice. In the Abhidhamma, the manual of Buddhist psychology, when they list the fifty-two states of mind that human beings are capable of, they don't include metta by name. The word they use for it, the Pali word, is adosa. "A" means "not," and "dosa" means hatred or aversion. So they point to metta by describing it as the absence of aversion.

The absence of aversion or ill will shows that the mind is ready to move into metta. We see that when the near enemy and the far enemy are both absent, metta is possible. And when metta is strong, it prevents both desire and aversion from coming up as reactions. It blocks desire because metta is inherently happy and satisfied, so there's no need for anything else. And it blocks aversion because it's so loving—it opens with affection to our experience.

But aversion does come up in doing metta practice. It's an important part. One of the ways it comes in is in regards to ourselves. We start to send metta to ourselves and we remember all the different ways that we've failed ourselves or we've fallen short of our expectations for ourselves—things that we've done that are unskillful, ways we've hurt people, ways we've hurt ourselves. That whole ground is what the forgiveness practice really helps to clear up. And it can bring a lot of self-judgment, a lot of feeling that we're not worthy or not lovable or not adequate.

This is delusion. It was really beautiful—the Dalai Lama came to the meditation center in Massachusetts early on, and someone raised their hand and asked him a question: "I feel that I'm not lovable. How can I work with this?" And the Dalai Lama, in what seemed kind of uncharacteristic, just said very strongly, "You're wrong." He was pointing out that every human being is worth loving, is worthy of love, because our basic nature is beautiful. Our basic nature has openness and compassion and love within it.

We need to recognize those good qualities. But many of us in the West carry this element of self-doubt, of self-judgment, of not feeling particularly good about ourselves.

I had just ordained as a monk in Thailand and was traveling up to practice in a forest monastery north of Chiang Mai. My preceptor said, "Look, on your way, I want you to stop at this monastery in Chiang Mai. It's my branch monastery. There's another Western monk there whom I respect. I want you to get to know him a little before you go off on your own."

So I traveled up to Chiang Mai and went to this branch monastery where there was a Western monk who had been in robes for about fifteen years. I had been in robes for about three weeks at that point, so I was very eager to learn.

The first morning I was there, he took me out on his alms round. You probably know that the way monks in Thailand are fed is they take a bowl and walk down the street, and the lay people come out and put food in the bowl—this becomes the monk's main meal for the day.

So I was going out on alms round with him early in the morning, probably about 6:30. The first thing I noticed was the size of his bowl—it was not much smaller than this bell here. It was the biggest alms bowl I had ever seen. And I must say, he himself looked pretty well fed, so I thought, "This will be interesting."

He went out in front as the senior monk. I walked behind him, and then two novices came behind us. The novices are the junior monks, usually under the age of twenty. I thought this was odd—I didn't know why these junior monks were coming, because they don't usually go on alms rounds. But I was just there to learn.

We started going down the street, and this guy knew half the town. Everywhere we went, people were lining up to offer him food. I found out that he spoke fluent Thai, meditated in silence in the morning, and then in the afternoon received visitors. Parents would come see him, children would come see him, and they'd ask advice about their meditation practice, their family life, their business. He was like a pastor to the community—very giving, very warm, very loving, very accepting.

On this alms round I saw he was clearly loved by these people. Within a couple of minutes, both our bowls were completely full. I thought, "We'll go back to the monastery now." But we didn't. We ducked down in an alley, and then I saw why the novices were there. They opened up their robes, and each had a plastic bag hanging off each shoulder. So we took the food from our bowls and put it in their plastic bags until our bowls were empty. The novices covered up, and we went back down the street with our bowls empty.

So they got filled again. We went into another alley and did that again, and so we went out on the street again. We filled up our bowls three times, and then we went back to the monastery. Everybody ate well that day. Based on his loving kindness, we fed ourselves, a bunch of other monks, the junior monks, the nuns, and even the temple dogs with the food we brought back.

I really enjoyed hanging out with him, and as we spent time together over those couple of days, I remarked on how well-liked he was, what metta there was between him and the community. He told me it wasn't always like this. He said, "I spent the first nine years that I was in robes working through my self-hatred, because I had a lot of it when I came in. But I worked with Vipassana, I worked with metta, and it really changed my heart and my mind."

And it was so apparent—he was a being who emanated a lot of metta, and he received a lot of metta in return.

This is a common reaction as we start to meditate, as we direct metta to ourselves—this sense of self-judgment and inadequacy. But metta is very good medicine for it. The Buddha said that metta is the antidote to aversion, so particularly aversion towards self. Metta is really strong medicine.

Reflecting on our good qualities, good intentions, and good deeds is a powerful way to cultivate confidence in our own inherent goodness. In Buddhism, we understand that our basic nature is fundamentally good—this is what's pointed to by the term Buddha nature. Trusting in this understanding becomes an essential part of our world-view.

We can strengthen this conviction by reflecting on our virtuous qualities and beneficial actions. One powerful practice is to reflect on all the dharma practice you've undertaken. This work is not easy—being here, generating intentions for loving-kindness, and sitting hour after hour requires tremendous commitment. The fact that you're willing to engage in this discipline day after day stands as strong testament to your paramis: your courage, determination, loving-kindness, equanimity, and other wholesome qualities. Simply being present for this practice represents profound and powerful action.

Another helpful approach is remembering yourself as a young child—perhaps four, five, seven, or eleven years old. Connect with that childhood innocence, purity, and good-heartedness that still exists within you as part of your essential makeup. Send metta to yourself as that young girl or boy, touching that wellspring of innocence that remains alive in all of us.

You might also reflect on times when you felt truly loved and consider the people who genuinely love you. A particularly beautiful way to practice metta for yourself is to truly embody the role of receiver. When we send metta to ourselves, we serve as both sender and receiver, though we typically find the sender role somewhat easier. Sometimes it helps to simply focus on receiving.

Try imagining yourself sitting with a semicircle of your dearest friends and benefactors before you, all directing the metta phrases toward you. Your only task is to sit and receive their love, receive their metta. Working with a benefactor proves especially helpful because we can open our hearts to loving-kindness through someone we truly care about. This gives us that direct experience: "Oh, metta is alive in me. Metta exists within me in this very moment." When we feel metta alive within us, we cannot doubt our own goodness, because we're filled with that beautiful quality, that wholesome state, that luminous experience.

This points toward that poem you've probably encountered by Galway Kinnell called "Saint Francis and the Sow," where he writes: "Sometimes it is necessary to reteach a thing its loveliness, to put a hand on the brow of the flower and retell it in words and in touch, it is lovely, it is lovely, until it flowers again from within of self-blessing." This beautifully captures what we're doing with metta for ourselves—we're teaching ourselves again our own loveliness so that we can have faith in that goodness and flower from within.

Often this reaction of aversion or ill will directs itself toward someone else, manifesting as anger or sometimes fear. It's quite common to be practicing loving-kindness and simultaneously experience strong anger toward another person. This happened to me during another long metta retreat where, by pure coincidence, my difficult person was also attending the retreat. This was someone with whom I'd had numerous disagreements and conflicts over the past year, someone who had hurt one of my friends in what I felt was a deeply unfair way.

We would sometimes cross paths during the retreat while I was practicing "May all beings be happy, may all beings be peaceful." Then I'd return to my room, sit down, and begin thinking about this person and all our interactions from the previous year. I'd become genuinely upset, really angry, spinning through that old territory again. I could get caught in these cycles for twenty or thirty minutes, unable to bring my mind back into metta.

If you've experienced this, you know that anger in a sensitive retreat environment feels particularly painful. When your body has been open and your energy feels very alive and sensitive, anger creates an intense contraction that feels absolutely terrible. I was being crushed by the anger I was feeling, and I simply didn't want to continue this pattern.

I had been somewhat indulgent, letting myself get carried away, but I became truly committed to finding a way through it. So I began examining the anger more closely. I saw that one aspect of anger contains what we call ill will. Good will means wanting someone to feel good, but ill will—as part of anger—means wanting someone to not feel good. I realized that part of my anger involved wanting this other person to not feel good.

Then I recognized that this was just one step away from cruelty. In Buddhist understanding, cruelty occurs when someone is suffering and we actually enjoy their suffering. I saw that I stood just one step away from being cruel toward this person. While I could accept seeing myself as an angry person, I couldn't accept seeing myself as cruel. Yet I recognized how close I was to that edge. In that moment, I simply decided I had to let it go.

So I'd heard that one could practice metta for one's difficult person. I'd heard that. And I thought, that's too hokey. You know, I don't even want to like this person, so I don't want to practice metta for them. But I was desperate. So I tried it.

And it worked. I found that I actually could generate a sincere wish for them to feel well. And that transformed the ill will into good will. And as soon as I could make that move, the anger started to just fade away.

So this was a powerful lesson for me. Number one, not to indulge in anger, but to be really respectful of its power for damage, first to ourself. Of course, I wasn't able to express it, thankfully. But then if we express it, you know, the damage that it can inflict on another and on relationships. So I developed a real respect for its power and I put a lot of care into working with metta as the way to undo the ill will. So I just offer that. In a few days, we'll work on that directly with a difficult person. But it was an important part of the learning for me.

So the other way that aversion tends to go is to fear. Fear. If we don't like what the world is presenting, either we'll push it away, which is kind of the response of anger, or we're afraid of it and we withdraw from it.

So a few years ago, a woman was practicing metta in a retreat here. And by the way, if you like a week of metta, you would love a month of metta. And every February, a few of us here teach the month-long retreat. And there are always a few people who come and do metta for that month while other people are doing vipassana. So I just want to let you know that's an option if you want to do an extended period of metta.

So a woman was here in February doing a month of metta, and in the middle of the retreat she received a phone message that a relative had died. And she had to leave the retreat to go to the funeral. Wasn't a super close relative, so she wasn't terribly distraught, but she had to leave the retreat. And she was in an open and sensitive place.

So she said, "I'm really nervous about going traveling and especially through the airport because airports are so chaotic. The lines and the bustle and the security checks and the pat-downs and you don't know if you're going to miss the plane because it all takes so long and there's jostling at the counter. I really feel nervous about going into the airport. What should I do? Should I go back to vipassana?"

And I said, "No, continue to do the loving kindness. Send loving kindness to all the people who are around you at the airport." Remember Sally told the story of the original origin of loving kindness being how the Buddha taught the monks not to be afraid of the tree spirits? So it's the same principle. If you're in a situation where you might be afraid, try doing loving kindness to all the people around.

So that's what she did. She went through the airport and sent metta to the check-in agents and the security agents and all the other passengers and flight attendants boarding the plane and the passengers on the plane. And she said, "As long as I could stay in that state of metta toward them, I didn't have any fear or anxiety." So it really is a powerful protection against fear. And so if fear arises, again, I encourage you to go to metta.

And again, that's where it's great to have this ally of a benefactor where you feel their very presence can fill you with some strength and a sense of refuge and a sense of connection.

So I'll talk tomorrow morning about more detailed ways to work with these near and far enemies when they come. Basically, you can continue to work with loving kindness. You can change to a compassion phrase, which I'll mention briefly. We'll do a guided meditation on compassion tomorrow afternoon. Or you can switch to vipassana for a while and just be with the emotions in a mindful way. These are three strategies for relating to them.

But as we start to develop this relational practice of the brahmaviharas, we start to feel more and more connected to the life of human beings, the life of creatures, all sentient life. And we start to appreciate this verse from Shantideva from the Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life. And we'll let this be the closing for this evening.

"Whatever joy there is in this world all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world all comes from wanting only myself to be happy."

So let's just sit together for a minute, please.

Whatever joy there is in this world all comes from wanting others to be happy. And whatever suffering there is in this world all comes from wanting only myself to be happy.

So thank you for your attention. We have about thirty minutes for walking meditation, then we'll have the final sitting with some chanting.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 96

Loving Kindness, Movement of the Heart

Guy Armstrong · 46 min

> In this dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong explores the practice of loving-kindness meditation (mettā-bhāvanā) with particular attention to working skillfully with hindrances that arise. He introduces the classical understanding of 'near enemies' (subtle forms of attachment and desire) and 'far enemies' (aversion, ill-will, anger, and fear) that can emerge during brahmavihāra practice.
>
> Armstrong offers three practical approaches for working with these challenging mental states: continuing with mettā phrases when hindrances are mild, shifting to compassion practice when they become stronger, or turning to mindfulness (vipassanā) when neither loving-kindness nor compassion can penetrate the difficulty. The teaching emphasizes holding all experiences—including difficult emotions—within a container of acceptance and friendliness rather than resistance.
>
> The guided meditation introduces the third traditional category in mettā practice: the dear friend, following work with oneself and one's benefactor. Armstrong provides practical guidance for selecting an appropriate friend—someone with whom the relationship is relatively uncomplicated and where physical attraction doesn't interfere with pure loving-kindness. This systematic approach follows the traditional progression found in classical texts like the Visuddhimagga, helping practitioners develop stable foundations in the brahmavihāras while learning to work skillfully with the full spectrum of human emotional experience.

Today as part of our exploration of the movements of the heart, we want to take in not only the Brahma Vihara of loving kindness, but also tune in when the near enemy or far enemy is present, if they come. They'll probably come sometime in the next few days. So I want to talk a little bit about how to work with these forces when they arise in the mind.

Near enemy, remember, are different forms of desire or wanting or attachment in relation to our experience or the people that we bring in. The far enemy is the different forms of aversion or ill will, anger, resentment, fear, self-judgment that come. So as you're saying the metta phrases, if one of these states arises in the mind, don't be concerned. It's a natural part of the unfolding.

There are a few different ways to work when these states are present. If this hindrance—that's a classical description for the difficult states that arise in meditation—if the hindering energy, near or far enemy, is relatively mild, then you can just continue to say the metta phrases, continue to connect to the individual and leave it in the background. The way this works is that eventually the hindrance kind of gets held in the circle of metta that you're creating.

Normally when the hindrances come up, we don't like that they're there. We don't want them there. We want them replaced by metta. There's usually resistance to having them. That resistance itself is part of the far enemy of aversion. So rather than reacting with aversion to the arising of these hindrances, we want to have an attitude of metta or friendliness or acceptance toward these states. We don't need to judge them—they're part of all of us and they will come from time to time. We just want to learn about them when they're there. So we allow the metta to kind of encircle them and hold them, and then we don't need to make too big of a fuss about them.

So that's if they're fairly mild. Just allow them to be in the background, continue to connect with your person and express the metta intention.

But if the state gets stronger—very strong desire, very strong aversion, ill will or fear—you'll go to generate the metta intention and you won't be able to. This negative state is so heavy and thick that it really blocks the intention of caring. We can't find any sincere caring for ourselves or someone else. So if it's like that, the metta phrases won't really have any energy behind them, and then it's more skillful to form a direct relationship with this hindering energy.

There are two ways to do it. One is compassion, the other is vipassana, or mindfulness. I'd suggest going first to compassion. This afternoon we'll have a full guided session on compassion, but for now I'm going to suggest you work with a simple phrase, which could be either, "May I hold this pain with compassion."

This acknowledges that the difficulty is present. Metta sometimes, in the emphasis on happiness, aims too high when one of these hindrances is there. So we can just say, "May I hold this with compassion?" And you can just call it pain, you can call it difficulty, you can name it—ill will, anger, fear, judgment, whatever you'd like. "May I hold it with compassion"—and just say that phrase for yourself, the compassion phrase for yourself, again and again, just as you've been saying the metta phrases.

Over time, that opposing energy will start to settle down, become weaker. When it does and you feel you can return to the metta intention, then do that. You can drop the compassion phrase, go back to your metta phrases, and just carry on with your practice as before.

If you're with the compassion phrase for quite a while and it doesn't seem to be shifting anything—there's no loosening of the resistance, there's no change in the way you're relating—then move to mindfulness practice. Drop the phrases and just sit with an awareness of the experience of this state. You can feel it in your body, feel it in your mind, in the emotional field, and just pay attention to it like you were doing a meditation in Vipassana on a difficult emotion. Then after some period of time, normally that kind of attention will allow the state to come through, open up. We don't resist it. We want to allow it to express itself. And then that will let it move through.

It may take two minutes. It may take five minutes. It may take an hour. It may take longer. But at some point it will move through. And when it does or gets weaker, then go back to your metta phrases.

So these are the three lines of response: If it's not too strong, let it be in the background, continue with metta. That's number one. Number two, if it's stronger and blocks the metta intention, switch to compassion—do compassion for yourself and think, "May I hold this with compassion." And the third way: drop the Brahma Vihara practice and turn to mindfulness. Just be present, allowing the experience of the emotion in the mind and body.

May none of these arise for any of you. Today in the metta meditation we're going to expand again the field of individuals.

And to the self and benefactor we'll add this third individual who's called the friend or the good friend or the dear friend.

As you think about who you'd like to bring in to this category, there may be a few people who want to come audition for the role to have a spot at the table. So it's fine to check two or three people out during this period and feel who would be the best fit for your friend.

It's best to pick someone where the relationship isn't too complicated. Often with friendships, there come in a number of mixed feelings. The simpler the relationship is, the more accessible the metta will be, the straighter metta will be with the friend. So look for a friend where the relationship is not too complicated.

If you pick a friend who's in a lot of suffering, the tone of the metta will tend to lean more toward compassion, which is okay, but it's helpful to pick someone where there's not overpowering suffering so that the metta can come through as metta.

As I mentioned last night, it's good to pick someone where there's not a strong physical attraction so that the desire force isn't so mingled in with the metta. Again, the metta can just be cleaner with someone like that.

So feel free to try a few different friends in this category as we go through the meditation this morning. And as with the benefactor, over the course of the morning or the day, try to settle on one person that you'd like to use as your friend consistently for the rest of the retreat.

To kind of warm the field up, we'll again go through some period with metta for ourself, metta for benefactor, and then we'll introduce the friend partway through the sitting.

So please sit comfortably.

Beginning again by coming into your body and letting go of any obvious areas of holding. Relaxing the face, the shoulders, the belly. Feeling yourself sitting, feeling yourself breathing.

Bringing the attention into the heart center, just the area of the center of the chest. Feeling a few breaths in and out through the heart center. Let the heart center be your avenue for connecting with yourself.

Getting a sense of your own personality and character, your being. Remembering what you like about yourself, your good qualities. Remembering some kind actions you've done toward others. And remembering your wish for happiness, which is a beautiful thing in all of us. It's what leads us to the path and leads us to growth.

So beginning with a conviction in your own basic goodness, knowing that happiness follows goodness, the metta wishes are rightful for you. They're appropriate.

So beginning to direct the thoughts of loving kindness to yourself:

May I be safe from harm.
May I be happy and peaceful.
May I be peaceful.
May I live in harmony with the body.
May I take care of myself happily in the world.

Occasionally after saying a phrase or a set of phrases, you might come back and touch again into the heart center and just notice whatever feeling is present. It could be an experience of loving kindness, its flavors of love, affection, acceptance, patience. There could be one of the hindering energies of near or far enemies—wanting, aversion, fear, judgment.

Just making space for that to be, letting it be just the way it is, not trying to force any particular feeling in the heart, letting the heart tell us what's happening. Allowing all the emotions to be held in the space of friendliness toward ourself, our whole experience held with acceptance.

And now if you're ready, bring in your benefactor. Feeling their presence in the moment through remembering what they look like, the sound of their voice, saying their name. As you feel your benefactor's presence, remember the qualities that you appreciate a lot in them and the ways that they've helped you. So as you stay connected to your benefactor and their goodness, directing the thoughts of loving kindness to them.

And now if you feel ready, you can bring in the person that you will take on as your dear friend. A friend is usually someone who's in more of a peer relationship with us than the benefactor is. You may need to look among a few of your friends and try a couple to see who will be the best fit.

It's helpful as you begin the exercise with the friend to find someone where the metta is fairly straightforward, not colored with too much ambivalence or attraction.

So please take a moment and select the person you'd like to bring in as the friend. As you select the person, then try to feel their presence here and now, as though they're sitting in the room in front of you. You could bring up an image of them or say their name. Remember times that you've spent together.

As you connect with your friend, remember all the things that you really enjoy in this person. All their beautiful and noble qualities—good heart, generosity, care for justice, for the earth, kindness, intelligence, responsibility. Remember the ways that they've shown you their love for you, the ways they've touched you. Remember their own wish for happiness.

their longing for peace, their struggles and joys, their vulnerability. And as you hold all of this in your awareness, allow your heart to extend loving wishes toward them.

Begin to send to your friend the same phrases you've been cultivating for yourself and your benefactor. Feel free to let the words vary slightly if that feels more authentic:

May you be safe and protected from harm, as I wish to be safe.
May you be happy and peaceful.
May you be healthy and strong.
May you live with the ease of well-being.

Periodically return your attention to the heart center, simply noticing whatever emotions are present there. Allow all the different feelings you have about this friend to coexist—the warmth and appreciation, but also perhaps small traces of hurt, envy, or moments of distance that exist even in our closest relationships. This is the beautiful complexity of friendship. Hold it all with acceptance and metta, allowing your predominant intention to be one of genuine caring and well-wishing.

If you can refresh the image of your friend before each phrase or set of phrases, this will keep the connection alive and personal, making the metta more vibrant and immediate.

For today's practice, please continue working with the friend throughout your meditation periods. You'll likely discover that different individuals evoke different flavors of metta within you. The benefactor might kindle one quality of love—perhaps respect or gratitude—while the friend awakens another—maybe tenderness or joy. Some practitioners find the benefactor category really opens their heart, while others discover the friend is their gateway to metta. Both responses are perfectly natural. Give substantial time to each category so you can experience how they each support and strengthen your practice in their own way.

In your sitting and walking periods today, continue to begin with yourself for ten to fifteen minutes or longer if you feel drawn. You can include the benefactor for a shorter time—perhaps five to ten minutes—but dedicate the majority of each period to the friend, really exploring and deepening this relationship through metta.

Questions and Responses

One practitioner shared that his friend feels like such a brother that he finds himself naturally saying "may we be happy" rather than "may you be happy." This inclusive approach is perfectly fine. You might even find yourself walking together down the path in your imagination, held together in that loving "we."

Another question about dealing with sleepiness during metta practice: Use all the same techniques you would employ in vipassana meditation. Open your eyes, straighten your posture, take a few energizing breaths. And absolutely feel free to stand for your metta practice—it's much harder to fall asleep standing up, and standing meditation demonstrates beautiful energy and commitment. Don't hesitate to stand right in the middle of a group sitting if needed.

This afternoon at four o'clock, we'll begin exploring the other Brahma Viharas with a guided meditation on compassion. This introduction will be especially valuable as you continue working with difficult emotions that arise during practice. Compassion becomes an invaluable tool for meeting both your own suffering and the suffering of others with wisdom and kindness.

CHAPTER 97

Brahmavihāra: Equanimity

Guy Armstrong · 58 min

In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong completes his brahmavihāra series by exploring upekkhā (equanimity), the fourth and seemingly paradoxical divine abiding that lacks the emotional warmth of mettā, karuṇā, and muditā yet serves as their essential foundation. Armstrong clarifies that equanimity is not emotional deadness but rather a quality of balanced awareness that emerges when reactive patterns of grasping and aversion settle, creating space for the other brahmavihāras to flow naturally.

The teaching examines upekkhā's etymology as "looking on" - a state of observant awareness that remains unshaken by the arising and passing of experiences. Armstrong discusses how equanimity prevents the brahmavihāras from falling into their near enemies (indifference for upekkhā itself) and far enemies, while requiring their warmth to avoid becoming cold detachment. The practice involves contemplating beings as "owners of their actions" - a reflection on the law of kamma that acknowledges how happiness and suffering arise from conditions beyond our control, fostering acceptance without resignation.

Through guided meditation instructions, Armstrong demonstrates how equanimity practice differs from the other brahmavihāras by cultivating balance within ourselves regarding others' joys and sorrows, rather than sending loving intentions outward. This teaching offers both classical kamma-based phrases and accessible alternatives like "things are just as they are," making this profound practice available to practitioners regardless of their relationship to Buddhist cosmology.

This afternoon we're going to complete the series of the Brahmavihāra instructions with instructions for equanimity, which is the fourth of the Brahmavihāras. In a way it's rather an odd Brahmavihāra, because it's not in itself emotional. It doesn't have that quality of love, compassion, or joy that the other three possess. So it kind of sticks out, and you might wonder what it's doing in the Brahmavihāras, but I'll explain that as we explore it more deeply.

Equanimity is one of the highest mundane states in the realm of the Buddha's teachings. The highest state is the non-mundane or supramundane or transcendent state of nibbāna—the unconditioned, the goal that the path of liberation leads to. But short of that attainment, equanimity is probably the highest state on the journey to nibbāna. It is the last of the Brahmavihāras. It is the seventh of the seven factors of enlightenment.

It is the tenth of the ten pāramīs. In the Progress of Insight described by the Visuddhimagga, it is the last stage before enlightenment in that sequence of unfolding. So it's a very highly regarded quality of mind in the teachings of the Buddha.

So what is it? When I first heard the term and explored equanimity, I thought it meant absence of emotion. I thought it referred to a kind of deadness, the sort of feeling you might associate with a stone Buddha—about as much feeling as a stone Buddha would have. That's equanimity. But that's a real misunderstanding.

Actually, a better word to get into the feeling of equanimity is balance—balance of mind. If you look back over your experience of these five days, when your mind was in balance, how did that feel? And let me ask by contrast, when the mind is in balance, what's not happening? What's absent? Reactivity.

Usually the mind is caught up in these swings of grasping or aversion, of liking or disliking, and that's what creates the sense of being tossed around on the turbulent waves of our emotions. When the reactive formations of grasping and aversion die down, then the mind is said to be in balance, and we're not subject to so much push and pull.

In those times, does that feel good or bad? It feels pretty good, doesn't it? Because it brings in a quality of peace that we don't always have in daily life. When your mind is in balance, is mettā more or less accessible? It's more available, isn't it? When grasping and attachment aren't swinging us and the mind can rest, isn't there a natural ease with mettā, with compassion, with joy?

This quality of balance, rather than making the mind dead, makes it responsive, makes it sensitive, makes that natural flow of love, compassion, and joy easy—makes them open up in a really unforced and uncontrived way. So this is the role of equanimity in the Brahmavihāras. It supports the emergence of the other three. When it's not there, it's hard to find the other three. But when it is there, they can come out easily and naturally.

Also, because of the peace and calm of it, equanimity prevents the other Brahmavihāras from tipping over into their near or far enemies. So equanimity supports the purity of the other three Brahmavihāras and discourages the hindrance aspects of the near and far enemies of the other three. It's really needed as we deepen and strengthen this practice.

The word equanimity is a translation of the Pali word upekkhā. And you'll see it on the name of the fourth dhamma hall: mettā, karuṇā, muditā, upekkhā. The etymology of upekkhā is "looking on." So you get that sense that it's a kind of meditative state that's looking on. It's in touch with things that are coming and going, but it's not being thrown around by them all because there's this quality of observation that's happening.

That's the sense—that upekkhā is settled back, looking on to everything that's going on, but not caught in it. It's a mind that's not caught in the arisings. So there's a kind of coolness in upekkhā, a kind of cooled-out quality. One of the synonyms for nibbāna is coolness. So you can see that it's getting close in the mundane realm to that transcendent quality of peace, the peace that can't be broken or disturbed.

But if it gets too cool, then it fades into its near enemy, which is indifference. As a Brahmavihāra, the near enemy of upekkhā is indifference—"Okay, I'm not moved by what's going on, so I don't care about it."

So somebody could be suffering next to me, but I'm cool. I don't mind. It doesn't bother me. But that lacks compassion—it lacks the warmth of compassion. So that's indifference.

True upekka has the support of the other brahmavihāras. So if someone is suffering, the movement of compassion comes through. If we look on someone who's suffering and the movement of compassion isn't felt, then there's some quality of indifference going on, and compassion has slid into its near enemy.

So just as metta and compassion and appreciative joy need upekka to support them, upekka needs metta, compassion, and joy to warm it. Otherwise it gets too cooled out and too laid back. We're really looking for a balance in the mind that has warmth and balance at the same time. That's the critical role that upekka or equanimity plays in all the brahmavihāras.

All the brahmavihāras can be practiced intensively the way that you're practicing metta this week. Someone asked about this in an interview today. We could do a seven-day retreat on compassion. We could do a seven-day retreat on mudita. We could do a seven-day retreat on equanimity. Those are powerful things to do.

I once took a six-week period where I spent ten days on each of the four brahmavihāras. It was very interesting. This practice of equanimity especially was so insightful because it is basically a wisdom reflection.

Equanimity in vipassana practice is mainly developed around not being so moved by pleasant and unpleasant experiences at the sense doors, the six sense doors. But in brahmavihāra practice, equanimity is about not being so disturbed by what's happening in the lives of sentient beings—ourselves and others—as it alternates between pleasure and pain.

We apply it to the same people that we've applied our metta practice to, in compassion and joy. We notice how, as beings meet their joys and sorrows, they go through stages of happiness and unhappiness in response to the joys and sorrows. And we get either elated or distressed about what they go through as well as what we go through. Those are the near and far enemies of compassion and joy.

This practice of equanimity—what we're doing is looking at the ways people meet their joys and sorrows and finding our own peace of mind in relation to it. It doesn't mean that everything terrible that happens to somebody, we say, "Oh, that's okay that that happened." You know, somebody took advantage, hurt someone else, stole from them, robbed them, assaulted them. "Oh, that's okay that that happened." It's not that—that would be the deadness of indifference.

But we find an ability to remain at some peace in ourselves, even as we look at all the different joys and sorrows that happen in the world. That peace or balance gives us greater ability to act appropriately in the world, whether it's to speak to someone who's causing harm or to take action for social justice, environmental justice, and so forth. Again, it's not a deadening or a turning away, but it's a strengthening with balance in the midst of the joys and sorrows of life.

The classical phrase used in the teachings to develop equanimity is a challenge for most Westerners, but I'm going to give it to you straight up. No pulling punches with this group. The classical phrase is: "Beings are the owners of their actions. Their happiness or unhappiness comes from their past actions more than from my wishes for them." This is a statement of the law of karma.

It's saying that basically beings meet happiness and unhappiness based on their karma. Now I want to say that as I understand this, this is a very broad brushstroke teaching. The Buddha never said that everything that happens in a person's life is because of karma. We might think that. You get ill and a friend says, "Oh, that's your bad karma coming back." You ever have friends like that? Not accurate. The Buddha never said anything like that.

But very broadly speaking, you can see, especially in the realm of the heart and mind, the habits that we act on over and over again become the direction of our hearts and minds. Someone who acts from loving kindness and compassion and generosity—the mind becomes brighter and happier. Someone who acts from greed and hatred and confusion—the mind becomes darker. So it's in that general sense.

But I would never say something like, "Well, every baby who was born into the Holocaust and was killed, that was because of their bad past karma." We can't—I could never know that, and the Buddha never said anything like that. So don't take karma as a rearview mirror.

You know, something happens now, and we think, "Oh, let me look back and think about what might have caused that." It doesn't work for us to do it. We can't see, we can't know. Take karma as a forward view, a pathfinder. This is the forward GPS. If we act in loving, kind, generous ways now, then positive results will come back to us in our lives, and we can trust in that.

So in that broad brushstroke, you can see how to some extent beings meet their joys and sorrows according to the unfolding of their past actions, especially their mental actions. But for a lot of people, this just doesn't make sense. It's too cold and distant. So there are lots of other ways to talk about the equanimity phrase.

Another nice one is to say, "Beings meet their joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature." And we understand there are lots of laws operating in this nature. The law of karma is one, but there are physical laws, there are chemical laws, there are biological laws, there are laws of physics. If a car hits a person, the person ends up not feeling so healthy. So all these laws play in, and it just illustrates that what happens in our life comes from many, many causes and conditions.

What that does when we see it is it takes out the idea that I can control this. We have this underlying assumption. Ego has this underlying assumption: I should be controlling my happiness or unhappiness. But it doesn't work. As you can see from this week, we don't have much control over what goes through our hearts and minds. But we understand that our hearts and minds are formed from many past causes and conditions. And the equanimity practice is built on that acknowledgement and deepening of that insight.

So the classical way is to mention the teaching of karma, but there are other ways to say it that don't have to depend on karma. So I'll just mention a few. "Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding according to a lawful nature." Or, "All beings meet their joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature."

An even simpler way is, "Things are just as they are." This is a great equanimity phrase. Who can argue with that, right? Things are just as they are. Yet it brings that sense of acceptance or being at peace with.

Another way to say it, doing a Brahmavihara for someone is, "I care for you, but I can't control your happiness or unhappiness. No matter how I might wish things to be otherwise, things are just as they are."

A very simple way to say it is, "May I accept things just as they are? May I accept this just as it is?" All these phrases have the flavor of equanimity, and that's the important thing—to bring our own heart and mind into some acknowledgement of the truth of what is now. It doesn't mean we don't work to change that in the future, but right now to come into peace with it, we develop this quality of equanimity.

Another difference with equanimity as a Brahmavihara is we're not sending it to other people. We're not trying to make them equanimous. We're trying to find equanimity ourselves in relation to their life.

So then you can start to see how it offsets the near enemy of compassion, which is despair or grief about the overwhelm of suffering. "May I come into balance myself with the way things are for this person?" Or with mudita, the far enemy of envy, when somebody seems to be doing a little too well, a little too happy in their life, then this quality of balance lets that be the way it is. And understand that maybe there were particular laws that brought those conditions into effect for that person.

So this is the understanding behind the equanimity practice. As we get into the meditation, I'll mention the phrases again so you don't have to remember them all. And then they'll be posted along with all the others on the board outside so you can take a look at them later.

So, ready to dive in? Okay.

And I have to say, I find this a really powerful practice. When carried out, it does have the quality of bringing more peace into the mind. With all the different Brahmaviharas, we start where they're easiest. And where equanimity is easiest is for the neutral person. So, it's true, isn't it? That's who we'll be starting with.

So, sit comfortably. Just let your awareness come into the body. Feel yourself breathing.

Coming into the heart center, connecting with the breath there. And then invite in your neutral person. If you can, get a picture of them. Remember where you've crossed paths. You may not know them well, but let yourself feel what you know of their character and any intuitions about what might be making them happy, how they might be meeting with sorrow.

Appreciate again that the neutral person is a whole universe of life experience and meaning—a whole range of happiness and unhappiness. Then you can begin to repeat this equanimity reflection.

I mentioned the classical phrase and a few alternatives. "You are the owner of your actions. Your happiness or unhappiness depends on your past actions more than on my wishes for you." Or "Beings meet their joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature." As you say this, remember that the laws include karma and a number of other laws—physical, chemical, biological, environmental.

"I care for you, but can't control your happiness or unhappiness." "Things are just as they are. May I accept this just as it is?"

Try on a few of these phrases and see which one you resonate with most. Then select one phrase that you'll use in your equanimity practice. Try to hold your neutral person's felt presence as you say the phrase so that it really applies to a person—to this person.

Now bring in either your friend or your benefactor, wherever you feel a stronger connection right now. As you connect with this person whom you know better, let yourself remember the range of happiness and unhappiness in their life right now—things going well, things that are difficult. Then repeat your equanimity phrase for your friend or benefactor.

"You are the owner of your actions. Your happiness and unhappiness depend on your past actions more than on my wishes for you." Or "I care for you but can't control your happiness and unhappiness." Or "Whether I understand it or not, things are unfolding according to a lawful nature." Or "May I accept this just as it is?"

If you'd like to try this, bring in your difficult person. If you'd rather not, just continue with your friend or benefactor. If you'd like to try a few minutes with your difficult person, bring them into the equanimity.

As you connect with them, also get a feel for the range of happiness or unhappiness in their life. Has their mind been shaped by compassion, by love, by generosity? Has it been shaped by more painful obscurations—selfishness, hatred, fear? Then reflect with your equanimity phrase: "You are the owner of your actions. Your happiness and unhappiness depend partly on your past actions. Beings meet their joys and sorrows according to a lawful nature. I care for you but can't control your happiness or unhappiness."

Finally, bring in yourself as a subject for equanimity. Come in touch with yourself through your felt sense here and now, through the body and mood, or bring in an image of yourself—a memory or photo.

As you connect with yourself, bring to mind the range of joys and sorrows in your life at this period. In recent times, what things have been going well? What things have been difficult or painful?

I hope you can feel how the other brahmaviharas all help to hold this range of joy and sorrow. You can look at them through the eyes of metta, of compassion, appreciative joy, and hold them in that way.

Then repeat the equanimity phrase for yourself: "I am the owner of my actions. My happiness and unhappiness depend on my past actions more than on my wishes for me." Or "I care for myself but can't control my happiness and unhappiness." Or "Things are just as they are."

Anyone want to run out of the room screaming? Sometimes it can be hard to get in touch with. Was it interesting for you? It can be a really interesting reflection.

I find it a useful meditation with family members who are having a hard time, because with family members we can feel the pain and naturally want to go to compassion for them, but we also feel this huge responsibility: "I must be able to fix this. If I just do the right thing, I'll sort out my sister's life for her." And we can't do that.

And so this meditation reminds us of that. One way that I sometimes share as an equanimity phrase is: "All beings have their own journey." This just kind of bows in that direction. Everybody has their own journey, and the amount that one person can influence another's is limited. It's really about our own individual choices. So with family members, often combining compassion with equanimity gives us a good way to hold the big picture.

Do you have any questions or comments?

"Maybe I'm picking the wrong phrase, but I like the one that starts with 'for myself'—you know, 'I can care for myself, but I can't control my happiness and unhappiness.' Not having mastered impulse control and still having some reactivity left, I just kind of want to tweak the happiness part. I assume you're talking about not the moment-to-moment happiness, but a deeper happiness and unhappiness. I want to say something like... it kind of reminds me of the phrase 'you can't control what happens, but you can control how you respond to it.'"

So her comment was about this phrase applied to herself: "I care for myself, but I can't control my happiness or unhappiness." If I can interpret it a little bit, it seems like it abdicates too much responsibility, because another phrase that she likes would tweak it in the direction of saying, "I can't control what happens to me, but maybe I can control how I respond to it."

Just to remember that there is always free will in responding to the moment—but we can't always control that response either. Even with the best of our intentions, the freedom of choice isn't there, the balance of mind isn't there, the spaciousness isn't there. And so we find ourselves reacting in ways that bring unhappiness in the moment and then maybe in the future.

In the deepest sense, we are all not at a level where we can control our happiness and unhappiness thoroughly. An enlightened being can, because they've trained their mind in that way. So this is just an acknowledgment that even on a moment-to-moment level we can't always control it, but we get better at influencing it.

"I find myself at times, when I experience equanimity, sensing a certain attraction and grasping for it because it feels so grounding and so wise—and then it just disappears immediately into desire or something like that. Do you have a reflection on that?"

The comment is that when he experiences moments of equanimity, very soon there comes a grasping or attachment or clinging to it, and then that dissipates the equanimity—because grasping is actually the far enemy of equanimity.

This is actually the case for all the subtle meditative states that arise in practice. We have to develop a new kind of talent—letting the beautiful states be there without clinging, because the clinging dissipates them. So whether it's equanimity or tranquility or concentration or even loving-kindness, if we hold on too tight, that will dissipate them.

Early in practice, it's just a matter of collecting enough attention that the beautiful states start to come into being—so that's happening, which is wonderful. Then the next level of skill is how to trust in that, knowing we don't have to do anything to make them linger. So we just get more and more confidence that we can rest there without having to do anything about it. But that's the level of learning we have to do next.

So just look at that with all the beautiful states that come: "Can I just allow this to be?" Sometimes just saying "Trust in the Dharma, let things be as they are" will incline us in that way. It's a skill that we develop gradually.

"It's easy for me to feel compassion for something going on in the world, or a friend, and then also to understand equanimity whenever I have it. But I think for myself, I have a second dart when I'm feeling some kind of emotional response that perhaps I think I shouldn't be feeling. And then that just gets me more tight and bound up."

I wouldn't go quite as far as absolute control. Meditation is a mind training, and as it develops more and more, we get more and more influence over our reactivity. Control is the wrong word because it's not coming from... control makes it sound like there's a controller, an entity within that starts to manipulate. But it's not felt like that.

It's more like wisdom—the growth of wisdom and loving-kindness holds the reactivity better so that it is smaller and doesn't lead into action so much. So I like to think of it more as influence. All along the path, we get more and more influence about our response to things in life. But until we're really free, we don't have complete choice. So we still get humbled sometimes by the way our responses come out, and we just want to accept that too.

Especially looking at all the craziness that goes on in the world, we're going to have a lot of emotional reactions to that for a long time.

So we just want to then accept that—okay, let me hold this with compassion. Sometimes in doing an equanimity practice, it's good to bring in another Brahma Vihara. "Oh, let me hold this with compassion."

A student asked about the far enemy of upekkhā, and then shared: "I found myself caring, knowing that I can't control others' unhappiness and happiness. I felt like it was a little bit of struggle to do with family and friends, but I found a complete roadblock when I was supposed to turn it to myself because I felt like it was paradoxical. If I can't control my unhappiness and happiness..."

This echoes the earlier question we explored. First, the far enemy of upekkhā is attachment and aversion, or you could say agitation—agitation born of attachment and aversion.

Regarding the second question about not being able to control our own happiness or unhappiness—well, then what can we control? You could even ask, what's the point of meditation then?

This phrase "I cannot control your happiness and unhappiness" is not a classical formulation. It's something we've developed to capture the feeling of the equanimity practice. What meditation and the whole Dharma teach us is how happiness and unhappiness come about.

What we learn is that happiness and unhappiness arise from conditions. If we want to have happiness in our life, we have to start planting the seeds in this moment that will let that grow. For instance, by planting a seed of mettā now, you're laying the foundation for happiness to arise a little bit now but also even more in the future.

We come to understand that if we want to grow happiness in our own life, we have to plant lots of little wholesome seeds. In life in the world, these seeds generally take the form of dāna, sīla, bhāvanā. Dāna is generosity, sīla is ethical conduct, and bhāvanā is mental training—especially in this field, the training of loving-kindness.

In lay life generally, a life that is really built on generosity, ethical conduct, and loving-kindness will bring a lot of worldly happiness. It doesn't necessarily bring the wisdom of liberation, but it brings a lot of human happiness. If that is our goal, we know how to develop that. We know how to act in that way.

But we also understand it takes time for those seeds to get planted and to grow. So we start to develop confidence that we're building in our life the happiness that we want, and we're refraining from the actions that lead to unhappiness. But we have to be patient with the growth of it.

The understanding is: I can't always control it right now, but I gain, through this practice, a greater and greater ability to make that happen and to trust in that.

Another student offered: "I use modifiers, like 'I cannot fully or ultimately control it.'" That's helpful. I wouldn't even use "ultimately" because ultimately we can—but it's a way down the road.

Another student raised an important point about using the phrase for the difficult person: "It kind of came out as, well, this is what you get."

There's an element of truth in that perspective. When we see that to some extent we're responsible for the creation of our own state of mind through many, many moments of mental habits we've reinforced and acted on in the past, it brings a level of individual responsibility for our well-being that is kind of radical in the Western way of thinking.

Western culture doesn't have a good understanding of how a mind gets to be the way it is. It looks random or like luck or good fortune. But in the teachings of the Buddha, our states arise because of having planted these seeds of action for many, many years.

What we acknowledge is that people who are in an unhappy state—and often the difficult person makes their suffering easy to see through their anger or aggression or fearfulness, confusion—we see how that perpetuates their own suffering.

But what's not in the law of kamma is "you deserve to suffer." That's not there at all. I just look back on the character of the Buddha. If he could have met everyone he encountered and simply taken away their unwholesome qualities of mind and brought them to liberation in the moment, he would have done that. There was no sense that beings deserve to suffer. It's just that by the laws of the mind, we do suffer sometimes from our own actions.

To think that's not going to happen would be like thinking that an apple would ripen and come off the tree and not fall to the ground. So we start to hold even the difficult person's state and their responsibility for that state with compassion. Instead of what's actually a touch of cruelty perhaps—enjoying their suffering—we can hold their suffering with compassion at the same time as we understand their responsibility for it.

A participant offered a comment reflecting on the previous evening's discussion: "It must be painful for some of these people to walk around so angry all the time." Yes, it is painful for them to constantly live in that state, just as it is painful for us to be exposed to them. That's the reflection—we tune into the pain they're going through that makes them act in that way. Painful for them, painful for us.

I'm curious—did the karma phrase resonate for some of you? Good. This is indeed the classical expression, and if it works for you, there's a lot of insight in it. Whatever phrase works for you, I hope it will bring that kind of equanimity, acceptance, and peace to balance and support the other brahmaviharas.

Thank you for trying this practice and for exploring how we can hold both compassion and wisdom when facing difficult people. The cultivation of equanimity helps us respond with greater balance, seeing clearly without losing our capacity for love and understanding.

CHAPTER 98

Mettā and Connection

Guy Armstrong · 59 min

In this dharma talk from a mettā retreat, Guy Armstrong examines how the four brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity) along with their near and far enemies provide a comprehensive map for responding appropriately to life's pleasant and unpleasant experiences. Drawing on teachings about impermanence and the contagious nature of mind states, Armstrong explores how mettā practice reveals our fundamental interconnectedness and breaks down the sense of isolation that causes much suffering.

The talk weaves together stories of courage and compassion—from tsunami survivors to whale rescuers to Cambodian monk Maha Ghosananda's response to genocide—illustrating how an open heart becomes stronger, not weaker. Armstrong discusses the beautiful image from the Avataṃsaka Sutta of Indra's jeweled net, where each being reflects all others, and explores how this understanding naturally gives rise to bodhicitta (awakening heart), ethical conduct, and generosity.

The teaching emphasizes that beneath our apparent differences, we share the same fundamental nature and desires for safety, happiness, health, and ease. Through mettā practice, we discover that we are essentially "the same heart poured into different vessels," leading to the profound recognition that in the garden of love and compassion, the distinctions between I, you, he, she, and we dissolve into our basic unity.

I hope those of you who were talking survived the exercise well. And a little shopping therapy always helps to restore balance—that's really why we provide the tables in the lobby.

Someone asked a Zen master one time, "What is the value of a lifetime of practice?" And he replied, "An appropriate response."

When I first heard that, I was really disappointed. For me, that was very undramatic for a Zen master. I thought for a Zen master, the value of a lifetime of practice is that when you come to the moment of death, you sit up spontaneously in full lotus, you utter a haiku that expresses your full dharma realization that has never been heard before, and then you pass away, still seated in full lotus. I thought that would be an appropriate response.

But the value of a lifetime of practice being an appropriate response mystified me until I started thinking about it more. And I came to really appreciate what a profound answer it was. Because what it asks of us is that in every moment of life, when we respond, we do that in an appropriate way. So this is not only the value, but it's the guideline for a lifetime of practice.

How do we do that? One of the beautiful things about the four brahmaviharas that we've been practicing and their associated states of near and far enemy is that it gives us this comprehensive roadmap to look at the way we respond to life.

And life is always changing. The essence of it is that it's constantly hitting us with pleasant experiences and unpleasant experiences and some neutral experiences in the middle. But it's this alternation of pleasant and unpleasant that keeps us off balance. And we develop these habits of mind in relation to those changing conditions.

So I want to take a look at these states—brahmaviharas, near and far enemies—in a little different lineup, just slicing it a different way. The four brahmaviharas that we've been working with—loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity—show us an awakened response. You could say the response from an enlightened mind, or you could say our own mind, when it's free and balanced.

As we've been able to touch these places, we know that these responses are in us. We know that in our human capacity, each of us has these responses as potentials. And then the practice is to bring them out more and more, even as painful and pleasant situations meet us.

But the near and far enemies give us another description of how we could also be responding. So we look at the list of the near enemies and they are: liking with attachment, grief or despair, over-exuberance, and indifference.

Think about that list: liking with attachment, despair or depression, over-exuberance, and indifference. Now these aren't deadly sins, are they? These near enemies are not overwhelming sources of our greatest dukkha. These are just the normal way that in our neurosis we meet things. I think the near enemies are the normal neurotic response of humans to life. Nothing really extraordinary about them. But they're all based on some unclarity, unwisdom, unfreedom, lack of understanding in the mind.

Then the far enemies would go through that list: hatred, cruelty, envy, and agitation. Now we're getting into serious terrain. These are the states that provoke a lot of suffering in our own lives and in the world. And of course we see how these are potential within us too. We've seen and felt and experienced these in our lives also.

So we have the set of awakened responses, the sort of normal neurotic responses, and then we have the heavy kinds of suffering. And anytime we're in relation, we can see where on this map of twelve we're coming from. And it gives us an idea of the quality of our heart and mind at that point.

You can think of it like reacting to the stock market. For those of you who've put any money in the stock market and equities and funds over the last ten years, you've had the experience to have some of these occasions for these things to arise. The stock market goes up, we get elated, we get exuberant, we get over-exuberant. The stock market goes down, unpleasant thing happens, we get depressed. And the stock market here is just a symbol for all the things in our life that go up and down, which they do all the time.

So the Buddha said we go up and down with these changing conditions because we haven't really understood. We haven't really understood that they're all impermanent. He said that's what we lose track of. So we get swung into highs and lows not realizing that each of these changing conditions is going to change again.

As wisdom arises and we get less moved by the passing show, then we can abide more in this place of equanimity or balance of mind. It's not so thrown either into the neurotic functioning or the heavy suffering as the changes of life present. But we find the possibility to go more and more into this free or awakened kind of relation to life.

I think the beauty of this whole map—the map of the twelve—is that as we go back into life, daily life, we're in a relational setting.

as opposed to here, which is mostly inner and solitary. Back in life we're relating all the time to people and events and changing situations. We can use this map to look at how our heart is responding. What's skillful? What's really suffering? What's just a little bit off?

As we carry out this investigation, we start tuning into the movements of our heart and the hearts of others. We begin to see what hurts and what leads to happiness, both for ourselves and others. This exploration brings profound benefits that take a while to develop, but they are deep.

One is that we become more and more tender with ourselves and with others. We grow more sensitive. As you tune into the impact in the heart, you start to feel concern, care, love, compassion, happiness. So we tenderize the heart by touching the play of life in ourselves and others.

This is from Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche: "It is as if we had a pimple on our body that was very sore, so sore that we do not want to rub it or scratch it. During our shower, we do not want to rub too much soap over it because it hurts. That sore spot on our body is an analogy for tenderness. Why? Because even in the midst of aggression, insensitivity or laziness in our life, we always have a soft spot, some point we can cultivate. A more vivid analogy might be of an open wound which is always there. That open wound is usually very inconvenient and problematic. We would like to be tough. We would like to come on strong. But there will always be a sore spot. At least we are accessible somewhere. So we are not completely covered with a suit of armor all the time. What a relief."

This quotation points to this tenderness as also being a kind of vulnerability. It's where we feel life, but it's also where life touches us. We realize that our sensitivity means we're vulnerable all the time because at any moment, anything can happen.

This really came home to us with the experience of a friend of ours. He's a Dharma practitioner who was having some practice time and vacation in Asia a few years ago. He was out on the beach in the morning—a beautiful southern tropical beach—doing some exercises, enjoying the view of the ocean, when suddenly he saw a wave that was a little too big. He happened to be out there on December 26, 2004.

This wave that was a little too big came up and knocked him over. He said it wasn't too scary, but when it went back out, there was this really unusual trough. It was much deeper on the outflow than it should ever be, and that concerned him. So he immediately went to grab his partner who was still sleeping and brought her out of the bungalow, where she was actually sleeping under a big chest of drawers that could have fallen over and crushed her if anything happened.

He took her by the hand and they climbed up on this concrete wall that was about four feet tall. Then he hung on to a palm tree growing beside the wall and she hung on to him. You probably know the next chapter. The bigger wave came—the second wave of that tsunami in 2004—and it was the second wave that was the killer.

So that wave killed tens of thousands of people on that day. My friend was in southern India. It hit there, it hit in Sri Lanka with devastating impact, it hit in Thailand, and it hit in Burma. The huge wave came. My friend was holding on to the palm tree and his partner was holding on to him and they were okay. The wave passed up and then it passed back and they were still standing on that wall. So he survived. He was on a beach near Madras in southern India. One time when the practice of non-clinging was not advisable...

But by holding on, they were both okay. But who would know? You wake up, it's a beautiful beach, it's a sunny morning. Who knows what's going to happen?

This can happen to any of us. Any of us could walk into a doctor's office the next time we have to go and find out that we have a disease projected to be terminal. This could always happen to us. So as human beings, this vulnerability and unknowing is just part of our life's condition.

I was teaching at IMS a few years ago, and a young man was on the three-month course. I was teaching the first half.

And he was very inspired by the Dharma and had a great love for the practice. His intention was to go to Asia after the retreat, to ordain as a monk and immerse himself in long-term practice. He felt a deep calling to be in silent retreat for an extended period.

We talked extensively during the retreat and I kept in touch with him afterwards, offering support for his plans. I believed he would thrive in the robes and do well in Asia. But as we continued our correspondence, he shared that he had developed a mysterious illness affecting his digestion so severely that he couldn't eat without excruciating pain.

Going to Asia with an abdominal problem is not recommended—mostly you go there healthy and come back with digestive issues. His condition became quite severe. He couldn't find a diet that prevented him from doubling over in pain after every meal. So he couldn't go to Asia. He couldn't ordain. He couldn't enter retreat because he had to tend to his health. The pain made it difficult to maintain full-time employment. Despite visiting numerous specialists, doctors couldn't diagnose his condition.

Here was someone young, healthy, bright, full of love for the Dharma and the best of intentions—yet this curious illness blocked his journey. We never know if something similar might happen to us. Fortunately, over the years his condition has improved somewhat. He's learned to work with it better, moderate his diet, and receive some medical treatment. He can practice again, though he's not quite ready for Asia yet. He continues to make progress and maintains his love for the Dharma, but hasn't been able to fulfill that original vision.

We never know what will happen or how we'll respond. We can't always control circumstances. But as we tune into this reality, it awakens our compassion for ourselves and one another because we're all in the same boat—the same place of vulnerability.

Bob Dylan writes in his memoirs: "My grandma was filled with nobility and goodness, told me once that happiness isn't on the road to anywhere, that happiness is the road. She had also instructed me to be kind because everyone you'll ever meet is fighting a hard battle."

As we open to this human situation and the possibilities of difficulty, we develop a connection to life that comes from a different place. Sally shared a whale story the other night—the whale tangled in fishing nets. She mentioned another incident off our coast near the Farallon Islands. I'd like to read from that account.

This humpback whale, a fifty-foot female, had become entangled in crab pot lines—fishing lines with heavy pots dangling at the ends. Four lines, each weighing nearly a thousand pounds, were dragging her down. The Marine Mammal Center sent out a boat of divers to rescue her by cutting the cords.

This is from one of the divers: "The whale floated passively in the water the whole time, giving off a strange kind of vibration. When I was cutting the line going through her mouth, her eye was there winking at me, watching me. It was an epic moment of my life."

Can you imagine working on the whale right next to her eye? He spent about an hour cutting through that line while other divers worked around her. When the whale realized she was free, she began swimming in circles in apparent joy. Then she swam up to each diver, nuzzled them, and moved to the next one.

"It felt to me like she was thanking us, knowing that she was free and that we had helped her," one diver said. "She stopped about a foot away from me, pushed me around a little bit and had some fun. She seemed kind of affectionate, like a dog happy to see you. I never felt threatened. It was an amazing, unbelievable experience."

Can you imagine the connection they felt with her? That is tenderness. That's beauty. These connections—to the people in your meditations, to one another, to the animals here on this land—are very special. We shouldn't gloss over them because there's deep meaning here.

These connections, when we feel ourselves in another's shoes or understand what someone else is experiencing, ease our sense of isolation. We've been teaching retreats for scientists for years, both here at Spirit Rock and at IMS, because neuroscience has become so connected to the Dharma. This didn't happen by accident. Some neuroscientists were meditators who became close to the Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama, with his great appreciation for science, personally and enthusiastically endorsed these yearly gatherings of meditators—many from Asia—and Western scientists, because he felt there was tremendous potential there.

These retreats grew from that recognition. We felt it would be valuable for scientists to have first-person experience of what they were investigating.

This insight resonates deeply with our meditation practice. So if scientists could understand what meditation was about, they could design research more effectively, ask more compelling questions, and truly comprehend what the meditators were experiencing.

The scientists needed a name to present this project to their superiors. Attending a retreat like this wasn't simply a meditation retreat—it was called "first-person research." There was indeed extensive first-person research happening at these scientific retreats, creating a wonderful exchange of understanding. Toward the end, the participants would engage in dialogue with each other.

During one of these retreats, a scientist shared something particularly striking. Among the many different research projects—and I cannot recall which specific study this emerged from—they mentioned that recent research suggests perhaps the deepest source of people's unhappiness is a sense of isolation.

This isolation manifests on multiple levels. In our country today, community has largely broken down. The nuclear family structure has become unstable, the extended family is often absent, and the wider community frequently provides no support at all. We grow up in the West without a sense of deep connection, which differs markedly from established societies in Asia.

This sense of isolation manifests within us in a way that makes us believe we are truly unusual. We lack sufficient close, extended contacts to recognize how normal we actually are. We are all genuinely normal, but we remain unaware of this truth. Each of us grows up within our individual cylinder of personality, convinced we are strange, when we are not. We are remarkably alike.

The Brahmaviharas begin to reveal this interconnection. As we develop these qualities through practice, they break down our sense of being different. This is, in many ways, the consequence of excessive emphasis on individualism. Western cultures place tremendous emphasis on individual rights, while many Asian cultures prioritize social cohesion and accepting some sacrifice of individual choice to align with the community.

Here in the West, we have become overly individualistic, breeding this profound isolation. Within this individualism, we define ourselves by how we are individual or unique. As we mature, we tell ourselves countless stories about how we differ from others. We convince ourselves we are different because we suffer more, or were more wounded in childhood, or because we are the best athlete in school, or achieved the highest SAT scores.

In both directions—whether we consider ourselves better than or inferior to others—we continuously tell ourselves these stories as a distinctly Western emphasis. Each time we repeat these narratives, we believe them a little more deeply, and this isolates us further. What we forget are the stories about how similar we are to everyone else.

The ego, the self-sense, does not focus on connection—it focuses on separation. We create this separation through these stories of our self-image. By repeating them continuously, we come to believe we exist in some isolated corner, when we do not. We share at least as many similarities as we do differences.

I want to explore how both the Brahmaviharas and insight work to reconnect us. There is a beautiful image from the Avatamsaka Sutra, a Mahayana text that formed the foundation for Huayan Buddhism, Dzogchen, and Mahamudra, called the Jewel Net of Indra.

Imagine the universe as a vast net—a rope net spanning all of space. At every intersection where two strands cross, there sits a gem. The entire universe resembles this rope net with gems at each crossing point.

These gems are all different—crystals, diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sapphires—with varying cuts, weights, and facets. Yet each is a gem, and every gem is translucent. When you gaze into one gem, it reflects all the other gems in the universe. Each gem contains reflections of all others.

This serves as a metaphor for sentient beings. Each gem represents one being. We differ from one another, yet we are also translucent. Light shines into us and through us. If you could truly open up any individual, what you would discover is all the rest of us. Your experience right now is composed of everyone else in this meditation hall. This is only possible because you are fundamentally empty.

So she thought, "What's going on here?" She slowed down and got in the slow lane, and as she approached the light, she could see that there was something in the fast lane. And as she got closer, she could see that it was a mother duck with about six or seven ducklings, and they were all just sitting in the middle of the fast lane.

The mother duck wasn't moving. The ducklings were huddled around her, and Caroline could see that the mother duck had been hit and was dying. And all these cars—this is a busy road—all these cars had just stopped. Traffic in both directions had come to a complete halt. People were getting out of their cars. Somebody was directing traffic around the duck family. People were on their cell phones trying to call animal rescue services.

And Caroline said she just sat there and started crying, because she realized that everyone had stopped. Nobody was honking their horns or getting impatient. Everyone recognized that this was a mother with her children, and she was dying, and the children didn't want to leave her. And somehow everyone understood that this was more important than getting where they needed to go.

Caroline said it was one of the most beautiful things she'd ever seen—this spontaneous expression of compassion for this duck family from all these strangers who happened to be driving by. And I think this really captures something about how metta works. There's a natural arising of care and protection that happens when we recognize suffering and vulnerability, especially when we see the bond between beings who love each other.

This is how the heart naturally operates when it's not caught up in its own agenda, when it's not too busy or distracted to notice what's happening around us. The Buddha called this "mudita"—sympathetic joy and care that arises spontaneously when we're present enough to see clearly.

And I think this also points to something profound about how interconnected we really are. In that moment, all those drivers weren't separate individuals trying to get somewhere. They became part of something larger—a community of beings responding to the suffering of other beings. The artificial boundaries we usually maintain between "me" and "not me," between "my concerns" and "their concerns," just naturally dissolved in the face of genuine need.

This is why the Buddha taught that the brahma-viharas—these divine abodes of loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity—aren't really practices we have to force or manufacture. They're expressions of our deepest nature when the obstacles to love are removed. When we're not caught up in fear, anger, jealousy, or self-preoccupation, these qualities arise naturally, just like they did for all those drivers who stopped for the duck family.

There was no reason for the traffic. It was just inching along, and as she got up to where it was slowest, she saw what was happening: a mother duck was trying to cross the three lanes of traffic.

Cars were stopping and swerving around her, trying to go on their way—because in Marin, nobody wants to be five minutes late for dinner, for goodness' sake. So they were still moving, and the mother duck was going in between the cars, with six little ducklings behind her.

Caroline and her friend reached this point and said, "This is no good." She stopped the car and blocked her lane. They both got out and slowed down and stopped the cars next to them, giving the mother duck a clear path to walk to the median and hop up. The six little ducklings walked to the median, but they couldn't hop up. So Caroline scooped each of them up and put them on the median.

Problem solved, right? No. Three more lanes to get to the water.

Cars were slowing down on the other side, people honking and shouting, "Get moving! What's going on?" So Caroline and her friend went over and stopped that line of traffic. They let the mother duck and six ducklings walk across three more lanes, and then they had a clear shot to the bay.

I thought that was such a beautiful gesture. Just stop, you guys. We're going to let these ducks go across. That's protecting as one would protect one's only child—cherishing all living beings like that.

This brings us to a really lovely quality that's discussed in Buddhist practice, one that grows out of this universal love and universal compassion. When we have this feeling of metta for all beings, as Sally led us in this morning with such beautiful imagery, we want all beings to be happy, don't we? I hope you could touch that possibility. Any being we can imagine, we want them to be happy.

As compassion can be extended in the same way, we don't want them to suffer. This is love and compassion together—we want them to be happy and we don't want them to suffer.

What's the best way we can affect that? We can't control the outcome right now, but what's the best way we can influence it? In other words, if you really wanted someone you cared about to be as happy as possible and truly not suffering, what would you want them to do? Wouldn't you want them to wake up and become inwardly free? Isn't that the best security for happiness and release from suffering—this complete inner peace and freedom?

From the Buddhist point of view, it is the best way to help someone attain happiness and come out of suffering. So if our goal is to help all beings become free, what's the best way for us to affect that? Is it to set up a scholarship fund for Spirit Rock? Or would it be to practice ourselves so that we became free and understood the path out of suffering and toward true happiness?

That's the thinking in the Buddhist understanding anyway—that if we can attain our own freedom, then we're in the best situation to help all other beings come out of suffering and into genuine happiness.

This motivation to free ourselves in order to be of greatest benefit to all beings is called bodhicitta. These are two words: bodhi means awakening, and citta means consciousness, mind, or heart. So a beautiful translation of this is "awakening heart"—the awakening heart.

When we have this aspiration to free ourselves so we can best help others achieve happiness and release from suffering, this can become a motivation in our practice that we reflect on, strengthen, and restate to ourselves again and again. It's really just an outgrowth of unlimited love and compassion—the most pragmatic approach to activate our love and compassion for others.

This is something highly recommended in many schools of Buddhist practice: to reflect on your wish to help others in this way, to become free ourselves as the best way to help others become free. This wish then forms the foundation for the Bodhisattva path and the Bodhisattva vow. It's really a statement that "I want to become free so that I can help all beings become free."

This can become a very important direction in our practice. It's a beautiful practice because it will sustain us all the way through. If we have a more limited aspiration, we might give up before the end.

But this one would sustain us all the way through.

So I say something usually at the start of every sit that reminds me of this aspiration. It's something that I would like to accomplish. At the start of sits, I say something like, "May I come to awakening in order to benefit all beings." That may sound a little grandiose, but it's just putting our little bit into the stream. Even the Dalai Lama says he has a hard time really making this a big practice.

So it may not appear like a big burning bonfire right now, but even a little candle flame is good—a little suggestion of this. The Dalai Lama says, "I cannot pretend that I am really able to practice bodhicitta, but it does give me tremendous inspiration. Deep inside me, I realize how valuable and beneficial it is. That is all."

This is one way that we can feel that connection and use that connection as a motivation for ourselves.

Loving kindness is also the source of ethical conduct. When we took the five precepts at the beginning of the retreat, that's really founded in loving kindness and compassion. We don't want others to be hurt by our actions. We want them to be safe in our presence. The Buddha said when we activate that intention, that care with our conduct, we are giving all the beings around us the gift of fearlessness. You know how it feels when you're around somebody who's really safe in their actions, who's really careful? They create a kind of atmosphere where people feel safe around them. And when you feel safe, then you can flower. This can be refined a long way.

So a few years ago, Oprah Winfrey was interviewing the Dalai Lama. I have a lot of appreciation for Oprah and the way she takes brilliant spiritual teachings and offers them to a wide audience. She has taken people like the Dalai Lama, Joseph Goldstein, Sharon Salzberg, and James Baraz, and introduced them to a very wide readership. James's class attendance doubled after his appearance with Oprah.

She was interviewing the Dalai Lama and started off by asking him, "Have you ever had to forgive yourself for anything?" She was asking him about his conduct and how he felt about that.

The Dalai Lama replied, "Small incidents, like accidentally killing an insect."

"Killing an insect?" Oprah said. "Okay."

The Dalai Lama continued, "My attitude toward mosquitoes is not very favorable. Not very peaceful. Bedbugs also."

"And that's it?" Oprah couldn't quite believe what she was hearing. "In your lifetime, that's what you have to forgive yourself for?"

"Small mistakes every day, maybe," the Dalai Lama said evenly, "but major mistakes, it seems, no."

"No major mistakes," Oprah repeated. She fell silent and looked out the window. There was awe in her voice when she finally continued. "You have nothing in life that you have regrets about. That's a great life, to have no regrets."

"Regarding service to Tibet," the Dalai Lama said, "service to Buddhism, service to humanity, I have done as much as I can. Regarding my own spiritual practice, when I share my experiences with more advanced meditators, even those who have spent years in the mountains practicing single-pointedness of mind, I don't lag too far behind."

Of course, part of that beauty of mind and that clarity and stillness and peace is because of his care with his conduct—that lets him enjoy a lack of guilt or remorse or confusion that lets his mind settle. So he's been doing this a little longer than us. We're probably about fourteen lifetimes behind at this point, but we'll catch up. We just have to keep going.

Loving kindness is also the source of this quality of generosity. Kamala talked this afternoon about the practice of generosity and its central role in the Buddha's teachings. Generosity is founded on the sense of empathy that we care about others.

There are a lot of things going on in the world these days that are very discouraging. You read a news report, you read a newspaper—it hasn't gotten a lot better in the last week. So it's easy to have a pessimistic view of the world today. But there are also a lot of beautiful things going on that don't make the papers.

Paul Hawkins's second most recent book—I'm going to read the title—

Paul Hawkins' book is called "Blessed Unrest: How the Largest Movement in the World Came into Being and Why No One Saw It Coming." He documents the countless non-profits, non-governmental organizations, and individual foundations that have emerged from people simply caring—whose mission is to promote health, justice, education, and general welfare for people all around the world.

This represents a huge movement happening in both small and large groups. Consider the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation with its endowment of approximately fifty billion dollars, or take smaller, closer-to-home initiatives. Hawken conducted extensive research and identified about a million of these groups. This is beautiful—almost everywhere you turn, you hear such stories.

Dr. Paul Farmer's work in Haiti exemplifies this. Greg Mortenson's efforts in Afghanistan and Pakistan, despite some criticism, have accomplished tremendous good. Even within our own community, I know four separate friends doing work in Burma.

Kamala and Steve run a schools project there, raising at least one hundred thousand dollars annually to build schools. In Burma, you can construct a school for twenty-five thousand dollars. Over the years, they've built approximately twelve to twenty schools that wouldn't have existed otherwise, since the government isn't providing that funding. Once a school is built, however, the government will provide a teacher.

Another friend collects donations through an email list and last year brought sixty thousand dollars to provide relief to villagers affected by the cyclone, while also supporting nunneries that don't receive as much assistance as the large monasteries. She visits and supports a very small nunnery where two nuns had been planning long-term retreat practice. When the cyclone hit—Burma's version of the tsunami—many children were orphaned after their parents were killed.

Suddenly, twenty young girls from that area found themselves without families. These two sisters set aside their retreat plans and decided what they really needed to do was create a small nunnery where they could raise these twenty girls. Of course, they lacked the financial resources, but they committed themselves to finding ways to have the girls fed, clothed, and educated.

Initially, they lived in ramshackle conditions with leaking thatched roofs and ten girls crammed into a room about six by ten feet for sleeping. Carol and her friends discovered this nunnery and have steadily brought more resources, enabling them to build larger buildings and provide better classroom facilities, books, and robes. When you visit now, you see these twenty little novices with their shaved heads and pink robes—absolutely adorable—receiving support because people care.

Another friend, Hal Nathan, previously served on Spirit Rock's board. Sally currently serves as board president, and before her, Hal held that position. As a deeply valued sangha member, Hal established the Foundation for the People of Burma, annually gathering about six million dollars to bring healthcare to Burma, primarily in rural areas where no health services would otherwise be available.

We witness this phenomenon everywhere. People become inspired and, from their own sense of loving-kindness and compassion, take on these projects, offering assistance to those who desperately need it. This represents one of the most encouraging developments I see in today's world. All of this springs from care.

Alice Walker, author of "The Color Purple," offers this insight: "As I get older, I realize the thing that I value the most is good-heartedness." We begin to feel this ourselves. We start looking for it, recognizing how it manifests in the world, embracing it as our own value.

Trungpa Rinpoche continues from his quote about the sore spot: "There's also an inner wound called Tathagata-garbha or Buddha nature. This is like a heart that has been sliced and bruised with wisdom and compassion. When the external wound and the internal wound begin to meet and to communicate, then we begin to realize that our whole being is made out of one complete sore spot altogether. That is called bodhisattva fever."

That vulnerability is compassion. We truly have no way to defend ourselves anymore. Yet what's beautiful is that as the heart opens in this way, it gains strength. Opening the heart doesn't make us weaker—it makes us stronger.

Consider another story about the Dalai Lama, who operates on a vast stage of global spiritual leadership and has for years carried political responsibility, bearing the weight of Tibet's future on his shoulders. Several years ago, he came to this very hall for a meeting with about 220 Buddhist teachers. The format involved people making presentations to him and then requesting his response—perhaps not the ideal structure, but the one we used.

So one person would present, then another person would present, then another person would present, and then say, "Your Holiness, what do you think about all that?" And at one point I remember he just said, "Oh, nothing left up here. First person present, I had something to say, but now that's gone. I don't remember anything." And he just laughed about it. So straightforward about it.

But some of the presenters were rather direct or I would say even a little cheeky with him. So one of the presenters wanted to ask the Dalai Lama about the popularization of Buddhism that was going on in our culture. And I'm sure you can see there are things like perfume called Samsara. Resorts will advertise with taglines like "In two days here you'll be in nirvana." This is beginning to happen. It's getting commercialized. So this person mentioned all this popularization that's going on and he said, "And you, Your Holiness, are the biggest popularizer of them all. There's a risk that Buddhism is going to become trivialized and commercialized through this. So what do you think about this?"

The Dalai Lama was just quiet for a minute while he reflected on it. And then he said, "Some people, you see, they call me Living Buddha. Other people call me God King. No, I am not. I'm just a simple Buddhist monk. But others call me counter-revolutionary. They call me wolf in monk's clothing. But you see, I look back at my own intention. If my intention is sincere, then that's what is important. How I'm perceived is up to others. I don't care."

I thought that was beautiful. But you know, it takes a strong heart not to care. You're being attacked on the front page of the New York Times and called a wolf in monk's clothing. He says, "I don't care. I look at my own intention." That's a strong heart.

One other story about a strong heart. Metta in the face of fear or anger. It's said that when the mind gets very spacious with metta and when metta is strong, anger can't stick in it. It's said the way if you take a bucket of paint and you throw it through space, the way it doesn't stick in space is the way anger doesn't stick in the mind of metta. There's no place for it to grab.

Maha Gosananda was a Cambodian monk who died a few years ago. When the Khmer Rouge took over Cambodia, he was living in Thailand. He'd gone there to practice years earlier with Ajahn Dhammadharo in southern Thailand. While the genocide was going on, in which most of the monks and nuns were killed—there had been one to two million monks and nuns in Cambodia before the Khmer Rouge, and there were hardly any, like 60,000 afterwards—while all that was happening, Maha Gosananda was living in Thailand. He lost something like seventeen family members in the genocide, and of course many friends who he had been in the robes with before.

Then when the political system changed—the Vietnamese invaded and the Khmer Rouge were pushed out of power—it became safer to live in refugee camps along the border with Thailand. At that point, Maha Gosananda moved into the refugee camps to give some Buddhist support and teaching and solace to his people, the country people. While he was living there, he began to teach what he understood would be needed for the healing of his country.

He had a lot of grounds for anger. He'd lost his sangha. He'd lost almost all his family members. But that didn't change his attitude. So he started holding large gatherings on the holy days, and tens of thousands of the refugees would come and gather to hear his talk on the Dhamma, because there weren't so many monks or nuns left anymore.

And what he had them do—he printed up brochures and handed them out, having them chant a passage from the Dhammapada, that classic Buddhist text. The passage is the fairly famous one that says: "Hatred never ceases by hatred. Hatred only ceases through love. This is an ancient and eternal law."

So he was preaching nonviolence, love, compassion, and reconciliation. He was attracting a lot of interest and a lot of followers. Well, this threatened the Khmer Rouge's power because they were also in the camps, trying to wield what power they had. So there began to be threats against Mahagosananda's life.

His supporters became very concerned and said, "Look, we want you to stay. We want you to survive." He had become, about this point in time, the patriarch of Cambodian Buddhism because he was the most senior monk left. "We don't want to lose you. You're too important for your country. So look, take some money, go to the capital, Phnom Penh, get a flight to Paris, and you'll be safe there. The Khmer Rouge won't get you in Paris."

So Mahagosananda took the money, got on a train, and was away for about a week. When he came back, his friend said, "You're not supposed to be here—you're supposed to be in Paris!" What he had done with the money was print up fifty thousand more brochures with the chant "hatred never ceases through hatred," so he could pass more of the chant books out to the villagers in the refugee camp.

So this is metta in the face of anger, metta in the face of fear. There's enormous strength in this state of mind.

This kind of connection opens up to us. Metta reminds us how much alike we all are. We all want those things in the metta phrases—we want safety and happiness and health and ease in life. All sentient beings want that, human and non-human.

So we start looking around and we start to feel: we have the capacity for the brahmaviharas, we want the same things, we know the near enemies, we know the far enemies. How different are we on a heart level? And as we start to share with other people and hear their stories, listen to how their hearts are moving, we see it's just how our heart would move too in the same situation. We start to feel like the same heart has just been poured into all these different vessels.

And the vessels are not that different either. Two eyes, nose, mouth, ears, heart. Our vessels are not that different. Same heart, same human consciousness, same vessel—we've just had different life experiences along the way. So we have gotten shaped, and our collection of qualities becomes unique, becomes singular. But what it's based on is all the same. Fundamentally, there's no real difference in our makeup.

Ego picks out all these apparent differences of gender and age and race and class and ability—of intellect and athleticism and so on—and makes all these discriminations. When we're lost in that world of dividing, we forget what we all share, because we are basically the same being that's gone through different experiences.

So I'll close with this lovely poem from Rumi's teacher. Not much is known of Rumi's teacher. His name is Shams. He came from a town called Tabriz. But this poem is attributed to him:

"I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of mystic lovers, these are not true distinctions."

Let's just sit with that for a minute. I, you, he, she, we. In the garden of love and compassion, these are not true distinctions.

So thank you for your attention. We have about thirty minutes for walking meditation, then we'll have our last sitting with chanting of the sutta.

CHAPTER 99

Working with Difficult Emotions

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

> In this dharma talk from a July retreat, Guy Armstrong examines the First Noble Truth and our obligation to understand dukkha (suffering). Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10), he focuses on the third foundation of mindfulness - contemplating citta (heart-mind) - to explore how we can work skillfully with difficult emotions.
>
> Armstrong identifies five primary afflictive emotions that arise from our relationship to time and pleasure/pain: sadness (pleasant past), anger/resentment (unpleasant past), desire/wanting (pleasant future), fear/anxiety (unpleasant future), and self-judgment. He emphasizes that these emotions are conditioned arisings characterized by anicca (impermanence), dukkha (unsatisfactoriness), and anattā (selflessness).
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for recognizing these emotional states through mindful naming, understanding their storylines, and developing acceptance rather than resistance. Armstrong shares personal retreat experiences and teaching stories to illustrate how mindfulness, along with the brahmaviharas (especially mettā/loving-kindness), can transform our relationship to difficult emotions. He concludes with Rilke's powerful reminder that 'no feeling is final,' encouraging practitioners to let all experiences arise and pass naturally within awareness.

The Buddha's teaching was all around suffering and the end of suffering. In his very first discourse on the Four Noble Truths, he said that our obligation or our endeavor with regard to the First Noble Truth, the truth of suffering, was to understand it. That's what's to be done in regard to the First Noble Truth. So the understanding of suffering is really the starting point for the whole path.

When we look at the extent of suffering in the world and think that we need to bring an understanding to that, it seems too complex. It seems overwhelming, the reach of suffering in the world and all the causes and conditions for that suffering to arise. In our daily life, we probably know people with really difficult family situations, relationship situations, personal situations that just seem very hard to sort out or understand.

A son is using drugs and his life has fallen apart and he can't support himself. An aging mother is developing Alzheimer's, advanced Alzheimer's, and the family can't afford a facility to provide the kind of care that she really needs. Or the head of the household has lost their job in the current economic downturn, and there's no source of income for the family to be able to support themselves. These kinds of situations are all over on an individual level.

On a societal level, there's the plague throughout society, wherever we look, of poverty, racism, inequality, and injustice, people not being able to be supported and cared for adequately. And on a global level, humans are getting really close to ruining the planet that gave birth to us through climate change and global warming. Along with that, a mass extinction of species is expected. So all these conditions from the personal level to the societal level to the global level can seem impossible to figure out or resolve.

Sometimes that's why it's nice to come into retreat, because the question of suffering becomes a lot simpler. As we settle in here, and in a way we are stepping out of the broader societal problems and family problems for a while, then we bring that intention to understand suffering back to a very personal level. In our direct experience, what is the source of suffering?

It soon becomes apparent when I get into retreat that there are basically only three kinds of suffering. There's bodily pain, which can come from just the posture and sitting too long. It may come from illness. It may come from injury. But there's bodily pain in all its different manifestations. There's not much that we can do about that through meditation practice often. Sometimes it will change as we go, but we can't always control it.

Then there's mental pain, or you could say emotional pain. We're familiar with all the different kinds of afflictive emotions that can visit us. Qualities like loneliness and fear, anxiety, anger, wanting or yearning, sadness and grief. All of these emotions visit both in our daily life, but here we really get to see them as our common companions. In Mahayana Buddhism, it's said there are 84,000 of these afflictive emotions. That gives a sense of the extent. But that was from a long time ago, and life was simpler then. So they've probably doubled by now.

These are the two main things we deal with again and again: physical pain, mental or emotional pain. And then as meditators, we have a third kind of pain that people in the world don't have. And that's frustrated meditations. We can come down and intend to connect with the breath or the body, and yet the mind wanders. When we notice that, sometimes that can get really frustrating. It wanders and we fall into sleepiness. So we have the pain of meditation that doesn't accomplish the goal that we intended to accomplish, this quality of a wandering mind.

If you go out and ask the general person in the street, did your mind wander very much today? Number one, they wouldn't know what you were talking about. Number two, they wouldn't care. But as meditators, we have this privileged circle of pain that we deal with. Restlessness, lack of stability, wandering mind, lack of concentration.

Tonight I want to talk particularly about this second kind: the kind of pain that comes from difficult emotions or afflictive emotions. These are the source of most of the big sufferings in our lives, sometimes in retreat or in our daily life. These are the emotions that are stirred up by the encounters with life, which take many different forms. If people don't understand these emotional reactions, they can be really debilitating. The experiences of depression or anxiety or grief or panic can be so overwhelming in someone's daily life that they are no longer able to function effectively. So these can be a very big burden in outer life. They can be a very big burden in retreat life.

I think one of the biggest blessings of mindfulness meditation is that we can learn to work with all these states. When we bring the meditation to bear on them, we can start to understand them. They all become workable. Originally I came into meditation and I was really drawn by the image of the Zen master who had conquered all these emotions and eliminated them.

I had the idea that at a certain level of development, I would possess about as much emotion as this stone Buddha behind me. That was a youthful, idealistic misunderstanding.

In my understanding now, we don't aim in the near and medium term to get rid of these states at all. Perhaps in the long term, someone like the Buddha or a fully enlightened being has managed to free his or her mind from all the influence of difficult and painful emotions. I believe in that possibility. But in our medium-range practice goals, that needn't be our aim—it's somewhat unrealistic.

What we can aim for is to explore these states of mind and through exploration understand them so deeply that a lot of the sting is taken out of them. In that way, a certain confidence comes into our lives and practice—that whatever life throws at us and however the heart responds, we have the tools to deal with it.

What I really love about our practice that we've received from our teachers is the range of these tools at our disposal. The tools of mindfulness, loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity give us enough to understand this whole range of difficult emotions and bring them into workability, so we can be with them and suffer less and less as our practice develops.

This is from Pema Chödrön: "In all kinds of situations, we can find out what is true simply by studying ourselves in every nook and cranny, in every black hole and bright spot, whether it's creepy, splendid, frightening, joyful, inspiring, peaceful, or wrathful. We can just look at the whole thing." There's tremendous encouragement to do this, and meditation gives us the method.

I feel this is really true. This journey opens up an exploration that is very interesting and rewarding—one of the most immediate sources of freedom from our meditation practice.

Classically, this area of meditation comes under the third foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta. This is the foundation that concerns itself with what in Pali is called citta, which is generally translated as "mind." But it doesn't mean just conceptual mind. Citta encompasses both emotional states as well as the thinking part of mental activity. Sometimes we call it the heart-mind—heart and mind together.

In Thai, where I practiced for a while, the word for mind is jit, which is a direct borrowing from the Pali word citta. If you ask a Westerner where their mind is, most of us will point here to the head. But if you ask a Thai person where their mind is, they will point here to the center of the chest—this is where they understand the jit to be. In Buddhist thinking, many texts point to the center or root of the mind being in the heart center, not connected with the brain.

There's a wonderful story that illustrates this. You all know there's extensive neuroscience research now investigating the effects of meditation to scientifically validate it. One of the foremost researchers who got the whole thing going is a PhD at the University of Wisconsin in Madison named Richie Davidson. I don't know if he tells his professional colleagues this, but he was a longtime Vipassana meditator first, and he got the idea to validate through science the effects of meditation he had discovered for himself. His work was inspired from the beginning by an aim to validate meditation in the eyes of the scientific community.

He developed over the years a great friendship with the Dalai Lama, who strongly supported this project. Richie was the one who did the groundbreaking work where they placed senior Tibetan lamas in MRI machines and mapped their brains through various advanced states of meditation. The results were off the charts in the areas of stillness, compassion, and happiness—dramatically different than anything scientists had seen before.

The Dalai Lama invited Richie to Dharamsala to talk about the research and demonstrate some of the effects. Richie couldn't exactly ship an MRI machine over there—it's bigger than a station wagon. What he took was a cap made of leather with strips going down along the top of the head. From the strips hung electrodes that reached down to the scalp and measured the brain's electrical activity. Each electrode was wired to a computer that could generate a map of brain activity—a simpler form of what they were doing in the MRI.

So Richie was demonstrating this equipment in Dharamsala to His Holiness and about 500 Tibetan monks. He put on this black leather cap with the electrodes and thirty wires dangling off the back, running into a computer, and he felt pretty silly—it doesn't look very noble.

At the end of his demonstration, the monks broke up laughing. Richie thought it was because he had looked so silly. But a Tibetan monk stood up and said, "We were laughing because you think you're going to measure the mind up here, but everybody knows it's actually located here in the chest."

They thought it was simply silly to try and measure the mind in the head.

So we talked a little bit with Richie about how we could possibly measure the impulses around the heart, but we haven't figured that one out yet.

This is the terrain of the third foundation of mindfulness from the Satipatthana Sutta. That section of the ancient text begins like this: "And how, bhikkhus, does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind?" Understanding that mind here includes both heart and mind. By the way, in this context, bhikkhu—which normally refers to an ordained monk—the commentaries say refers to a sincere practitioner of this meditation. So in the context of this sutta and this retreat, we are all fulfilling this term of bhikkhus for the purpose of meditation.

"How does a bhikkhu abide contemplating mind as mind? Here a bhikkhu understands mind affected by lust as mind affected by lust, and mind unaffected by lust as mind unaffected by lust. She understands mind affected by hatred as mind affected by hatred, and mind unaffected by hatred as mind unaffected by hatred. He understands mind affected by delusion as mind affected by delusion and mind unaffected by delusion as mind unaffected by delusion."

This quotation revolves around these three qualities of greed, hatred, and delusion. You can recognize two of them are emotional—desire and hatred—and one of them is more cognitive—delusion or misunderstanding. So you can see how even in the sutta, it weaves together the affective and the cognitive parts of what mind does.

The qualities of absence of greed, absence of hatred, absence of delusion give rise to all the beautiful states of mind—and we'll talk a lot more about those later in the retreat. The qualities of greed, hatred, and delusion in different combinations give rise to all the painful or afflictive qualities of mind. And that's the area I'd like to talk about tonight.

With these painful emotions, there are basically two things that need to shift as we undertake our practice with them. The first is that our attitude has to come much more toward an accepting relationship to them. Normally when these states come in, they're the last things we want. When I first started practicing and fear or resentment or anxiety came in, that was the last thing I wanted to see. I came here to get calm. I wanted to get peaceful. I wanted to get insight. I didn't come to get this stuff. But that attitude doesn't work so well. We can't just push those things out, so we need to develop an accepting relationship with them.

The second big shift is a greater understanding of their nature. We need to understand their particular nature—how anger works, how fear works, how wanting works. But we also need to understand their universal nature. These states are conditioned arisings, and the Buddha said that of all conditioned arisings, they are subject to the characteristics of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness, and selflessness.

Impermanence means they come, and therefore they will go. All these emotional states, once they arise, are also going to pass away if we let them. They are unsatisfactory, and of course the painful ones are inherently unsatisfactory, so that's clear. And they're selfless in that we don't own them and they are not our identity. They're not who we take ourselves to be. They're just passing visitors like clouds.

Once we start to understand them in relation to these three characteristics, they lose a lot of their power and enchantment. Essentially, in seeing these three characteristics, we see the empty nature of emotions. When I say empty, it doesn't mean that they don't exist, doesn't mean that they aren't real, doesn't mean that they aren't something we feel, but we see their essential insubstantiality. And when we see that insubstantiality, we can't take them as seriously as we did before. So that's part of the investigation and the insight that I'll talk about tonight.

In working with all these states, the first step is to know what we're feeling when we're feeling that. Now, I don't know about you, but I never got taught this as a kid. My parents did not go out of their way to say, "Dear Guy, what are you feeling today? Did you have a good time at school? Did people treat you well? Oh, did you feel hurt? Do you feel resentful? Do you want to fight with that guy who belittled you?" This was not the dinner conversation at my house.

So when I came into meditation, I felt there was a whole landscape of my heart that I had to figure out with the help of my teachers, but I basically had to figure out for myself with their guidance. And I just think it would be such a huge contribution to the world if we could teach children in school simply to know what they're feeling. That kind of emotional intelligence would, I think, solve a lot of the problems in the world. And there's an organization that's starting to do this in this country.

They're based in Oakland called Mindful Schools. They have this fabulous program of going into public schools at the elementary and junior high levels, teaching children mindfulness and using it to explore how they feel. The changes are remarkable. Students will say things like, "Now I like to meditate right before I go to bed because it makes me so peaceful," or "When I'm mindful, I don't get angry and hit my little sister." It's really a wonderful program, and there are now about a thousand teachers who've been trained to take this practice into schools. It would be terrific to see this grow.

Here in Marin, we have a Sangha member who runs what is essentially a Dharma preschool. She's a longtime meditator who has found enough parents connected to this Sangha and other Sanghas who want their children to have basically a Dharma-oriented upbringing. She's received their permission to turn her preschool into a Dharma training ground. She has children who are three to five years old, and she tells them stories from the Jatakas, teaches them yoga and meditation, and has quiet periods that last up to thirty minutes. If you can imagine a group of twenty-three to five-year-olds being quiet for thirty minutes at a time, there's some kind of magic happening there.

She explained that when you teach meditation to children that age, you can't use words like mindfulness, investigation, and attention to the object—it's too abstract for them. So she teaches them with images. She told me about one class where the children were doing yoga, and at the end they lay down on their backs as she began leading them in meditation. She said, "Okay, close your eyes and imagine a big lake. In this lake, there's all this water. Let your mind become the water. Through this water, all kinds of fish are swimming. There can be a happy fish and a sad fish and an angry fish and a loving fish. But you're the lake, and you just let all these different fish swim through. Let them come and swim and go through."

She guided them like that for a while, and after the meditation, she asked the children how it was. This four-year-old boy raised his hand and said, "Well, I could let all the fish come, but I couldn't let the mad fish come."

She asked, "Why not?"

He replied, "Well, when the mad fish comes, if I don't know I'm the water, it makes me do things that hurt people."

A four-year-old got it. When he's the water, he can hold it all.

So it's easy not to know what we're feeling. This came really clear to me during one long retreat. I was sitting about two weeks in and was fairly settled. I was walking out from the meditation hall, feeling I was pretty continuous in my mindfulness, noticing the movements of my feet with the lifting and moving and placing notes. I reached the area where I had been walking—I'd walked there every walking period for two weeks, very steadily—and there was somebody in my walking path.

I couldn't believe it. Everybody had been at this retreat for two weeks, and I thought, "Don't they know I've been on that path for two weeks? Did I cut in front of the line at breakfast?" Still very mindful: lifting, moving, placing.

I walked a little farther. "Are they trying to play some head game with me? They must know it's my path. What is going on?" Lifting, moving, placing.

I kept walking and had to find a different path, so I took another patch of grass which, to my great surprise, worked just as well. I couldn't understand that. Every once in a while I'd shoot them an evil look because they were still in my path. Lifting, moving, placing—I felt I'd really been mindful.

It was only about thirty minutes into the walking period that I realized: I'm angry. It took me that long to see it. I felt I was really present, but I missed the most important thing that was happening in my experience.

I was angry. I was with the steps but I missed the main thing that was going on.

This is kind of how these afflictive states or these hindrances work. They fly in underneath our mindfulness radar and convince us to turn our attention to the outside situation. I was so focused on the person who had taken my path and why they were wrong and why I was right that I missed my inner process. So with all these emotional states, that's what they tend to do. They grab our attention and direct it to an outside focus, and in doing that, they take us out of our own experience.

When I realized I was angry, then I had the tools to work with it. I knew how to feel it in my body. I knew how to examine my thoughts. I knew how to release it. So within a minute or two, it was gone. Until I had seen it, I was just locked into the mechanism of it, and there was no way for me to step out.

One of the key underpinnings that keeps these difficult emotions in place is some kind of view or belief about the situation. I'm going to call this the storyline of the emotion. In my case, the storyline that kept the emotion going was I thought that it really was my walking path and they were wrong and I had a right to it. So take a look at this with anger and see if this isn't often the case—that there's a belief or a view underneath that they're wrong and I'm right. And as long as we keep telling ourselves that story, then it sustains the anger. When we turn our attention to the emotion itself, that takes the juice away from the outer situation and then we can start to relate to it with the tools of meditation.

So the first step is to name what's present. In my case, anger or resentment. In other cases, fear or wanting or loneliness or irritation or sadness or grief or envy. There's something powerful about that naming process. And so even if you're not doing noting generally during the day, this silent mental labeling that Kamala mentioned this morning is very helpful to name these difficult emotions. It creates some space around it.

Among the scientific research studies going on was a group studying anger management. They took a group of people who had problems controlling their anger and not letting it act out with others, and as the experiment, they gave them the assignment simply—this is all they did—every time they felt anger, to name it as anger. There was no other instruction, there was no other intervention. This turned out to be a really effective way of anger management, just to name it. Compared to a control group that didn't do anything, these people had a much more successful outcome simply by naming the emotion that was present.

So there's something powerful when we name it. It's like we bring a kind of wisdom to it. Now I know what this is. And then that reminds us, I know how to work with this. As meditators, we learn—now we know how to work with this. So there's not just anger there. Now there's mindfulness, some awareness, maybe some compassion for ourselves, maybe some wisdom that's accompanying it. So in the middle of the difficulty, we're bringing in a bunch of really helpful and positive factors just by naming it.

There are certain states of mind that I see again and again, both in my own life and in meditators that I talk to, that are the big group of these difficult emotions to work with. I want to suggest that all the difficult emotions that we get caught in have to do with time. Time is not necessarily a factor with the beautiful qualities. You can just see someone and have a moment of loving-kindness or a moment of compassion. You can walk out the door and see the light of the sunset and have a moment of joy. These can come in a moment, go the next moment—it's all fine. But a difficult emotion that we get caught with that makes us suffer is going to have something to do with extending over time or relationship to time.

The other thing that difficult emotions are about is pleasure and pain. Our life as human beings is full of a succession of moments of pleasure and pain, sometimes very strong, sometimes rather subtle. But it's the memory or the holding on or the accumulation of those moments of pleasure and pain that cause the stickiness in living.

So there are these two factors: time and pleasantness. We can put time on the horizontal axis, going from past to future, and the pleasure level on the vertical axis, going from pain up to pleasure. There are four ways to combine these.

So let's look at these. I want to say that there's a difficult emotion connected with each of these four quadrants.

Let me ask you: if something has been pleasant in the past—here's this quadrant, pleasant in the past, which means it's no longer here, no longer available—what emotion do we tend to have for that?

Okay, desire is something people often say, but I think desire is really about projecting into the future. Let's say it's not there at all anymore. What then?

Sadness. Grief. This is the source of sadness or grief—something that was pleasant in the past but is no longer available to us. An old relationship, an old friendship, an old house, death of a loved one. This is the terrain of sadness and grief.

Now, unpleasant in the past. And I want to make it a little more specific—unpleasant or painful related to another person. How do we react there?

Anger. Exactly. If someone has done something unpleasant to us in the past, we tend to hold it with anger or resentment. So that's the second big one.

Pleasant in the future. You've already said this. If you're looking forward to something that's really going to be delightful, this is desire—the whole field of desire, yearning, longing, wanting.

Unpleasant in the future. You're looking forward to something that you expect will be painful or difficult. What comes up?

Fear. Fear, anxiety, nervousness. Just a week ago, less than a week ago, I had to give a presentation in front of the Marin County Board of Supervisors. Spirit Rock was applying for a kind of big change in our overall building plans, and Jack Kornfield was out of town, so I gave the presentation. I had a sense of dread about it for about two weeks before I had to do it, from a combination of the sense of responsibility and not knowing the people and the crowd and all of that. Fortunately, it went really well, and we got approved. It was so irrational, right? We don't need to dread these things, but it's just the way the mind works. I dreaded it.

So I want to suggest that these are the four kind of primal emotions that human beings have dealt with for a long, long time: sadness, anger, desire, and fear.

One subset of the anger is if it gets directed toward ourselves. If we feel that we've messed up and either hurt ourselves or somebody else, then what comes up is guilt or self-judgment. So it's kind of a powerful variation on the anger piece.

These are the five I want to talk about tonight: sadness, anger, self-judgment, desire, and fear.

Let's start with desire or wanting. This can come up often in retreat, maybe particularly because this atmosphere is fairly devoid of sense pleasures. The meals are great, the nature is beautiful, but there are long stretches in between those meals where the body may be aching and the mind is running and meditation is kind of boring. So desire often comes in at those times to provide us a little bit of a pleasant fantasy realm.

We may find ourselves wanting our home, our comfortable couch, dinner with a friend, a TV show, something that we've really enjoyed from our home life. This happens a lot.

But one of the things that we see if we start to explore this movement of desire is there's a little bit of a bittersweet quality in it. Because thinking about that person or place or thing is kind of pleasurable, right? You bring in that memory, that wanting, brings in an element of pleasure that's comforting. But at the same time, we don't have it. And that not having it is suffering, subtle or big. There's that missing that's there.

So desire always has these two things.

There's like a beautiful thing and there's this longing, which has always a current of frustration or unfulfillment, lack of satisfaction in it. Because for some reason, we never seem to want what we already have. Ever wanted a hand at the end of your arm? No, but if we didn't have it, we would really miss it. But we don't want what we've got.

This desire force came through really clearly a number of years ago. I was teaching a retreat in Italy, which is a lot of fun because I just found the Italian yogis so kind of honest about their emotions and fluent. They had a fluency with their emotions that I didn't have until I started practicing. They were able to be in touch with how they felt and to talk about it.

Of course, there were a few cultural changes we had to modify. We held the retreat at a rented Catholic nunnery, and they were used to renting it out to other people. When they set up for lunch the first day, they wanted to bring out carafes of red wine on the lunch table. So we had to adjust that part of the meal serving. And then there was an espresso machine right outside the meditation hall. As soon as people left, ding, ding, ding, ding—wake themselves up.

Early in the retreat, this young man came in. We were talking through an interpreter, and he explained to me that he was really having a hard time settling in because he didn't think he really wanted to be here. So I said, "Well, what's going on? What are you thinking about?"

He said, "Well, I'm not sure I wanted to come on this meditation retreat."

I said, "What were your options?"

He said, "Well, some friends invited me to go on a ten-day trip to the Caribbean with them." This was August, so this was the holiday season. "And I could have gone to the Caribbean."

"Why didn't you?"

"All the plane tickets were sold out. So I came here."

So I can understand why that would create a little rub. We were the consolation prize and he really wasn't so into being there.

But then what we did is we just worked with this factor of desire. "When you think about the Caribbean and the beautiful beaches and being with your friends and swimming and everything, there's an element of desire there that you would like. And that makes this situation look not so great. But maybe the problem is not that this situation is bad, but it's the thinking about the other that has you stirred up. So see what it's like if you don't think about the Caribbean."

He came back in a couple more days, and that advice had totally worked for him. He said, "Okay, I let go of the vacation idea. I just planned on being here. I really settled. I've arrived, and now everything's fine."

Take out the force of desire—the present moment is often not so bad. The storyline underneath his unhappiness was: "If I had been in the Caribbean, I would be happy. And not having it, I can't be happy." But in fact, that was just a belief. When he let it go and could just be here, it was fine. It was the wanting that had made for the discontent.

In meditation, once we settle in, the desire force tends to go not so much to homesickness, wanting to be back in our comfortable homes. It starts to find itself within the field of meditation itself. One remembers a sitting that one had in an earlier retreat, or one remembers a particular insight that came when one was doing walking meditation on another retreat, and often that's what we want back—the peace of the sitting or the uplift and inspiration of that insight.

Or as we go through the days here, the concentration will come together. We'll have a sitting where the body's very relaxed and the attention is naturally present moment to moment to moment. We'll go out and walk. We'll come back very excitedly for the next sit. Not there anymore. And often there's a strong desire...

how can I get that back? How can I make that happen again?

In sitting meditation, I look for this quality of desire through tuning into the body. When it feels like the body is tensing and going forward, that's a sign to me of the desire force being there. Often I don't know what it is I'm wanting, but if I look into my thoughts to identify what I'm thinking about, sometimes that reveals the content of the desire, and then perhaps I can let it go. I look for that straining forward, that toppling into the next moment, and the counter is to settle back into this moment. There's a sense physically of moving backward, becoming more grounded in the body, dropping a little lower with a sense of relaxation.

There's a word for the general tone of negativity, which is aversion, and I want to talk about that. The general tone of negativity or disliking takes many different forms: hatred, anger, ill will, impatience, irritation, depression, despair, grief, judgment, blame, resentment. There are countless flavors of this state.

How does it feel when aversion is in the mind? Everything seems inadequate or incapable of satisfying us. There's a story from the time of the Buddha. He was standing in a grove with a group of monks when a jackal ran out of the forest. It stood in the clearing for a minute, then bolted into the hollow of a tree where it lay down, but didn't stay long. It popped up and ran into a cave where it lay down, then got up and ran back into the forest.

The Buddha pointed this out to the monks: "Did you see that jackal? It wasn't happy in the forest, wasn't happy in the clearing, wasn't comfortable in the tree hollow, wasn't comfortable in the cave. It wasn't comfortable walking, standing, lying down, or sitting." The jackal blamed its discomfort on the forest, the clearing, the tree hollow, the cave, on standing and walking and sitting and lying down. But the problem wasn't with any of these—the problem was that the jackal had mange, a very itchy skin disease that's very hard to bear.

When we're in a state of aversion, it's as if the mind has mange. Nothing feels good. Everything rubs us the wrong way.

There is a classical antidote for aversion: loving kindness. The meditation that Sally led this afternoon is the antidote the Buddha recommended for this general quality of aversion. Whether it's a state of despair, irritation, or grief, the practice of loving kindness helps to clear that.

Sadness is one form this disliking takes. It comes out of disappointment or loss—a very significant feeling that often makes us feel helpless. There's worry that if we open to it, we might become overwhelmed or drown in it. Even in meditation, we can tend to keep it at bay, not letting ourselves fully feel it.

But this is only a worry that it will be too much, that we can't accommodate it, that it will overwhelm us or cause us to get lost. We need to trust in the qualities of mindfulness, wisdom, and compassion to hold whatever sadness is in us. Most of us have had disappointments, losses, some degree of sadness or grief. It's a frequent visitor during meditation retreats.

I encourage you to let that sadness come, let it express itself if it's there, open to feeling it. It's only by feeling it that we can allow it to arise and then manifest its impermanence. All kinds of grief will pass through if we give them enough time and space. They have their own schedule, but if we open the channels and let them come, our wisdom is capable of holding them while they go through their process of release.

When anger arises—another form of aversion—it often comes when we sit and remember old events in our life, people who have hurt us, people who have caused us harm. So it's very important to learn to meditate with this emotion also.

With anger, the body gets tight. There's a kind of burning quality. And the thoughts that come tend to be thoughts of blame—that the other person is wrong and we ourselves are right. So it's very helpful to meditate with this.

It's really important to listen to these thoughts because we find that the blaming thoughts are the things that keep the anger going. Anger is kind of a fiery state, and what sustains the fire, the fuel for that fire, is the blaming thoughts. If we drop the blaming thoughts, the fire will die out. That's all that really needs to happen. But as long as we keep tossing on more logs, the fire will keep growing.

But it's difficult because it's like, if I don't think those blaming thoughts, it's like I'm condoning what that person did. And that wasn't right. And sometimes that's really true. You know, the problem is we're telling ourselves "I'm right and you're wrong," but sometimes that actually is true. So what do we do then?

This is a story from the Dalai Lama. He said that when he was still living in Tibet prior to 1959, when he escaped to India, he knew this monk—one of many monks in one of the monasteries there. And he judged this monk as just having kind of middling practice. Then the Dalai Lama escaped to India, living now in Dharamsala. And then something like twenty-five years later, this monk showed up in Dharamsala and asked for a meeting with the Dalai Lama because he likes to visit with people who've managed to escape.

So of course the Dalai Lama inquired after his welfare and said, "How was your time there? I understand you were in prison." And the monk said, "Yes, yes, I was in prison for twenty years and I often felt I was in danger." And the Dalai Lama said, "Did you feel you were in danger of being tortured?" And the monk said, "No, I was tortured, but that's not what I meant. I meant I was in danger of becoming angry, but I didn't." The Dalai Lama said he had to revise his opinion of this monk's practice.

So that demonstrates a possibility. I mean, it's an awesome possibility. It's way beyond what I feel myself capable of. But it's a possibility that we can apply to lesser situations. Maybe someone does harm us, and that's clear. And we see clearly that was unskillful conduct on their part. And our reaction may be of anger, but it is possible not to hold that. It is possible to let go of those blaming thoughts, even though we're right.

For me, there's only one thing that has persuaded me to let go of those blaming thoughts, and that has been the pain of anger itself. I would be in the middle of a meditation retreat, very open and sensitive. My body had been just dropping tension for weeks or months. I'd be in a very open and sensitive place. Some situation would come up and I'd get angry in my thoughts about it and my body would go into this strong contraction. And I wouldn't be able to release it. I'd feel like I was just in the grip of a big pair of pliers. And I'd still keep thinking the blaming thoughts.

And finally, you know, after enough times, it got so unpleasant. The suffering of anger itself was so strong that I became deeply motivated to let go. And I was able to learn to do it better and better. I still get caught from time to time, but I know the way out. If I can just get to the point of letting go of the blaming thoughts, then the anger will decline.

And I began doing it out of concern for my own welfare. But of course, I see how it also benefits the world. If I can release my own anger, then I don't spill it on others. So in Buddhism, it's often the case that we come to this understanding: what benefits us also benefits others, and what benefits others also benefits us. The two aren't really opposed.

This quality of burning ourselves in holding anger before it goes to another is pointed to by the classical texts in a couple of different ways. One thing they say is that becoming angry at somebody is like picking up a hot coal to throw it at them, but it burns us first. And the other way that it's described is that becoming angry is like drinking poison and hoping the other person will get sick.

If we feel ourselves being angry, it's not to judge that experience.

We all will have anger from time to time. It's not to consider ourselves a bad meditator or to try to suppress it. Really, inwardly, you want to let anger just rip—to be able to rip within you without any censorship. Outwardly, you want to be really careful about how you express it. But inwardly, in meditation practice, you want to let it come on as fully as it is wanting to. And then investigate it, explore it, explore how it's created, how these thoughts build it and sustain it, and explore the impact in your own mind and body. That will give the encouragement and the direction to be freer in relation.

When this sense of anger or judgment gets directed toward ourselves, then it becomes a very heavy weight to bear. It affects our confidence in the world and our ability simply to feel good about ourselves. It seems in the West we have kind of an epidemic of this quality of self-judging now. Here it's so often seen in retreats—it's something people are working with.

Some years ago, a group of Western Buddhist teachers were meeting with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala and asked him how to work with this problem in the meditators that they met. The Dalai Lama couldn't understand what they were talking about. "Not liking oneself? What do you mean? Can you explain this to me? How does this come about?"

He had to go around through all the Western teachers in the room—there were about twenty of them—and ask, "Do you feel this?" Yes. "Do you feel this?" Yes. "Do you feel this?" Until all those teachers acknowledged that this had been a difficult part of their own practice. Then he started to understand. But he said in Tibet, children are so valued and so loved by their parents and extended family and community that they don't grow up with this sense of being inadequate or unlovable. It's just not part of their culture.

The storyline or underlying belief with self-judgment is something like—and all these storylines I'm suggesting are really for you to investigate for yourself to see what the truth is for you—but it's something like, "I'm not good enough, I'm not worthy enough, or I'm not lovable enough." But it's simply not true.

It's almost ironic—it's sad, but it's ironic—that meditators have this problem because you all have devoted a lot of your life to developing love and compassion and wisdom to benefit yourselves and the world. If there was a group of people that I would say are good people, this kind of group is it. You all have a commitment to integrity and developing positive qualities. From my point of view, as I've met with you, you are good people. But it's so hard for us to feel that ourselves, and it's so hard to have confidence in that.

This is one of the reasons why the practice of loving-kindness is such a powerful force in working with this. When we start to feel that loving-kindness is really alive in us—even if we're feeling it for other people, like friends, family members, benefactors, children, pets—we know that there's something really good inside that's alive and awake and manifesting in us. The presence of loving-kindness within us gives us a lot of self-confidence and a lot of trust in our own goodness. It's a very powerful practice in many dimensions, and this offsetting of self-judgment is a big one.

The last of these primal emotions I want to mention is fear. I love talking about fear because it was my teacher. For many years, this was the main hindrance that I worked with in meditation, and I learned so much from it. I can honestly say I don't have any regret about going through all the fear I went through because it woke me up in so many different ways.

I also feel that if you take any one of these hindrances, which is your primary one, and you really work it to reach a strong degree of freedom, you'll also know how to work with the others. It's not like you have to learn every one anew. Through working with fear, I felt like I came to terms with all the difficult emotions that I've experienced.

With fear, I had it a lot in the early years of my practice and I hated it. When it first started to come and it came on strong, I absolutely hated that state of being in fear. Finally, one of my teachers gave a talk that opened the door for me. What he said in the talk was, "See if you can bear the physical sensations that accompany fear."

So that's what I took as my challenge, because I could grapple with the physical experience of it. I just started to feel, anytime fear would come, I would feel how I felt in my body. I would feel that tightness in my abdomen, that kind of fluttery energy that starts to rise through the chest, maybe the sweating under the arms, a sense of lightness and lack of solidity that comes with fear. And I would ask myself, "Can I bear this?"

Because with fear, the curious thing is, we come from a place of feeling, "Yeah, well, maybe I can bear this moment," but the belief is the next moment is going to become unbearable. Something disastrous is going to happen in the next moment. But that's just another view. That's the storyline of fear.

Something terrible is about to happen. But if we come into the moment and ask ourselves, can I bear this moment? Then maybe the answer is yes.

So I learned to bear the physical expression of fear. Then I turned to the mind and I said, what's that flavor? What's that mood like? The closest I could get was it was a wanting to run away from, want to flee. And that was hard to get close to because the movement is, I want to flee. So it was really hard to bring mindfulness to touch that bare emotional quality of fear. But I learned to do it.

So I was able to bear it in the body. I was able to bear it in the mind. And I no longer quite believed something disastrous was going to happen. But I was still resisting it. So then my teacher said, okay, if you're going to really accept it, could you accept this fear being here for the rest of your life? That became the acid test.

So I asked myself that question the next time fear came: could I accept this for the rest of my life? And the answer was no. No way. Of course I couldn't. So then I said, why? And I said, well, I couldn't enjoy music the way I like to. I couldn't merge with the sunset the way I like. I couldn't fall in love. So I kept resisting it.

And then I realized that I was giving away my own peace. I had a choice. I could either find peace here and now through accepting my experience or I could continue to fight it. And finally, I didn't care what I was going to lose. I accepted it. And I said, okay, if this state is like this for the rest of my life, it's okay with me. And it truly was.

And when I did that, the power started to drain out of the fear. By that full acceptance of it, just the way it was, it lost some kind of grip over me. And ever since that time, it's come again many times, but it's never had that kind of grip again. So I felt that I now know how to work with this visitor. And over time, it's almost become a friend.

You know, when it came again around the supervisors this past week, it wasn't pleasant, but I didn't mind it being there because I knew that I could just practice through it and that it was going to pass.

This is why all these emotions are safe. They're all going to pass. So all we have to do is open, let them come, and by their own nature, they'll also go. So truly, we don't have to be afraid of any of them. We open to them with real acceptance. We let them express themselves. They're not fun, but by their own nature, they will also pass. So we don't have to make them go away.

So I'd like to just close with this poem from Rilke, the German poet. It's from a little book called The Book of Hours. And the scenario is that he's imagining the words that God says to us on the day that we're created, just as we're launched into this life.

"God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear: You, sent out beyond your memory. Go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you, beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final."

Don't let yourself lose me.

Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness.

Now, give me your hand.

So let's just sit for a minute together. Let everything happen to you—beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

In this moment of sitting together, we return to the fundamental truth that has woven through our entire exploration: the impermanent nature of all experience. Whether we encounter beauty or terror, joy or sorrow, each arising is temporary, each feeling will pass. This understanding becomes our refuge, our steady ground in the midst of life's constant change.

The invitation to "give me your hand" speaks to the intimacy possible when we truly embody the dharma. We're not alone in this journey of awakening. There's a companionship available—with the teachings, with the sangha, with the very fabric of existence itself. When we stop trying to control our experience and instead let everything happen to us, we discover this profound interconnectedness.

"Just keep going" becomes our practice mantra. Not the going of endless striving or pushing through, but the gentle persistence of staying present, of continuing to open, of meeting each moment with fresh awareness. This is the courage the dharma asks of us—to keep showing up, to keep practicing, even when the path feels uncertain.

As we conclude this exploration together, may we carry forward this reminder that no feeling is final. In our joy, we remember impermanence and stay humble. In our suffering, we remember impermanence and find hope. This wisdom becomes our constant companion, teaching us to hold all of life more lightly, with greater compassion and deeper understanding.

The country they call life awaits us, with all its seriousness and wonder. We meet it now with open hands and awakened hearts.

CHAPTER 100

Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this dharma talk, Guy Armstrong examines the journey from suffering to freedom through the lens of "unentangled knowing" - a quality of awareness that knows objects without getting caught in grasping. Drawing from the teachings of Thai laywoman Upāsikā Kee and the Buddha's analysis of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda), Armstrong explains how we become bound through the chain of contact, feeling tone (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging, leading to suffering (dukkha).
>
> The talk explores how freedom can be found in the present moment by resting in the gap between feeling and craving, where the mind remains balanced without falling into greed (lobha), aversion (dosa), or delusion (moha). Armstrong references the Satipaṭṭhāna practice and teachings from Thai Forest masters like Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Buddhadāsa, showing how this unentangled awareness touches the unconditioned realm and offers a taste of nibbāna.
>
> Three meditation approaches are presented: turning awareness back on itself rather than focusing on objects, developing sati-paññā (mindfulness-wisdom), and regularly checking the mind's relationship to experience for the presence of the three unwholesome roots. The talk concludes with the Buddha's teaching that "having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island" - pointing to complete freedom from aging and death through non-attachment.

As Steve described in his talk the other night on the Four Noble Truths, the journey of the Buddhist path goes from suffering to the end of suffering. There are many different words for this usual state of suffering that we find ourselves in, sometimes called bondage or clinging or grasping, or known by the term samsara, which points to the depth of habit that's involved in it. Similarly, there are many terms for the end of suffering. It can be called nibbana, freedom, release, liberation, enlightenment, awakening. All these terms describe the journey and the spectrum of the journey that we're on. We go from the state of bondage to the state of freedom.

In tonight's talk, I want to discuss this quality of freedom and how it relates to the path, how it's a part of the path itself. The subject of this talk is unentangled knowing.

For those who are not native English speakers, this term "unentangled" is an odd term. The word tangle refers to a twisted mass of usually yarn or string or hair that's gotten all mixed up, like when you've taken a ride in a convertible and then when you go to comb out your hair, it's all twisted together. Then we put the word "entangle" in front of it, and that's the verb—that's how things become knotted, twisted, and snarled up. The word "un" in front of "entangle" means we undo that tangle that has been formed.

This term "unentangled knowing" appears in a translation of a talk from a Thai lay-woman teacher. Lay teachers in Thailand are a little bit rare to begin with. Lay women teachers are rarer still. This woman's name was Upasika Kee. Upasika means a lay woman supporter, and Kee was her name. She taught from the 1950s through the 1970s, and she has a wonderful book that's a collection of her talks called Pure and Simple. She was relentless in pointing practitioners back to the very central question of dharma practice, this question of bondage and freedom. All her talks hit this point again and again. Her book is highly recommended—she's a very strong teacher.

This is the sentence that this phrase comes from. She was pointing people to develop, quote, "an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside." We'll come back to this quote and fill it in a little bit later. This is the gist of the talk.

This image of the tangle was used by the Buddha often. It appears frequently in the suttas in describing our usual condition. He commented at one point in the Anguttara Nikaya: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn"—craving creating the tangle of all our desires running in so many different directions that they get twisted up with one another and we get enmeshed in competing desires.

In the Samyutta Nikaya, there's this exchange where a questioner comes up and asks the Buddha a question. You should know in this exchange that Gautama is his family name, the Buddha's family name, and so some people called him Master Gautama or just Gautama. The questioner comes up and says: "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle." Things haven't changed very much, have they? "So I ask of Gautama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

Well, this is our project, isn't it? We're all here to disentangle this tangled knot of craving and suffering that we find ourselves in, in the habituated patterns of mind. The Buddha's reply is that one who develops virtue, meditation, and wisdom disentangles this tangle. That's what we're doing here: sila, samadhi, and paññā.

What Upasika Kee was pointing to is a quality of mindfulness or awareness that knows objects without getting caught in grabbing after them and holding on to them, so that the mind stays balanced in relationship to a changing field of experience. This is a pointer to the same quality that Kamala talked about last night in her talk on equanimity—finding that balance that lets us know all the arisings and passings, but keeping steady, keeping a balanced mind in relation to them.

It's the same pointing tonight. I want to draw out or emphasize the freedom quality that's intrinsic in that place of equanimity and that is one of the reasons we practice for unentangled knowing. We're fully aware—that's the knowing piece—and we're not entangled, meaning that we're not getting hooked into latching on to these objects out of greed or aversion. We're seeing clearly. Greed is not happening through hanging on, aversion is not happening through pushing away, and we're fully aware, so delusion isn't happening either. Unentangled knowing is a state that's relatively free from these three afflictions of greed, aversion, and delusion.

These moments happen for us. You could call them moments of equanimity or moments of unentangledness throughout the day, but they may be subtle and pass quickly. If we're not trying to tune into them, we miss them. This talk is also an encouragement not to do anything different in your practice, but to begin to notice when the mind is in this place of balance and non-reactivity. In that place, begin to feel for yourself the kind of freedom that you can feel in a moment here and now.

As part of the talk, I want to review a few approaches to meditation that head directly in this general direction. All of our practice heads toward this greater equanimity and freedom. There are three practices I'm going to talk about in the second half specifically oriented to bringing out this quality of unentangled knowing.

But before we venture into the realm of freedom, we must understand more clearly how we become bound, how we become caught. Let me describe in some detail how bondage unfolds on a moment-to-moment basis.

The Buddha's fundamental outline of bondage and freedom is the Four Noble Truths, as Steve described the other night. But in another teaching, he describes this process in greater detail through a moment-to-moment unfolding—what is usually called the chain of dependent origination. He traces twelve links that occur in a sequence where one gives rise to the next, leading us repeatedly to the place of suffering.

These twelve links are quite complex and could occupy an entire talk in themselves, but I'm going to focus on the central four, setting aside the first five and the last three. While those outer links become more philosophical and complicated, understanding these central four will give you the heart of how to practice with dependent origination as we can feel it moment by moment.

First, we must open to our basic situation as human beings. I want to suggest that all human beings—young and old, male and female, enlightened and unenlightened, of all genders and races—share the same fundamental experience: in any moment, six things can be happening.

The Buddha pointed to this in a sutta called the Sutta on Totality. With a group of monks gathered around him, he declared: "Listen monks, attend carefully and I will teach you the totality of life." That's quite brave, isn't it? Freud didn't say that. Marx didn't say that. Einstein didn't say that. Here was the Buddha, 2,500 years ago, announcing: "I'll teach you the totality of life."

He said: "It is just the eye and sights, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and sensations, the mind and mind-objects. Anyone who described a totality different than this would not be knowing what they were talking about."

When you think about it, this is our whole human experience, isn't it? This is what's happening for us in any moment, in every moment. There are sights, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, and mind objects—mind objects being primarily thoughts and emotions. We can receive these data because of what Buddhism calls the six senses: the five physical senses and the sense door of the mind. This is what makes this set of arisings possible.

In any moment, it's really quite simple—there are only ever six things happening at most. Sometimes none of those are happening. This makes meditation practice easy, doesn't it? You just have to be aware of these six things. Really simple.

Here's where we enter the chain of dependent origination. The first five links pass by, and the sixth link is called contact. Contact is the coming together of the sense organ—like the eye—the sense object—like the sight before you in the visual field—and the consciousness related to that sense organ.

If you're asleep, under anesthesia, or passed out, that consciousness is not so active. In those situations, you're not experiencing sight, sound, smell, taste, or touch in any obvious way. But when you're awake with your eyes open, you experience seeing. When you're awake with functioning ears, you experience hearing.

The coming together of consciousness, sense organ, and object is called contact—that's simply the Buddha's vocabulary. Contact basically means these data of the senses. When a sound arises, that's an item of sense contact for you—sound contact, or hearing contact.

Our basic situation is that contact is happening through these six senses constantly while we're awake. Can you stop this from happening? Can you simply say, "Ears don't hear, nose don't smell, mind don't feel"? Can you do that? No. These phenomena happen whether we want them to or not. Our situation as human beings is that we're constantly being contacted by different phenomena through the six sense doors.

This wouldn't be problematic if everything were pleasant all the time.

But they're not. They alternate. Sometimes pleasant, sometimes painful. So we're sitting here, we're sensitive beings, and these things are impacting us all the time. How do we respond?

This brings us to the next link in the chain of dependent origination, called feeling tone. The Pali word is vedana. Feeling tone means that every one of these moments of contact might be pleasant, or it might be painful, or it might be neither—what we'll call neutral. Pleasant, painful, or neutral.

This is important because it conditions the reactive formations. When something is pleasant, if we're not paying attention, what do we do in relation to it? We hang on to it, don't we? We want it to last, so we take hold of it and try to make it last. If something is painful, what do we do? We want to push it away. Notice that in order to push something away, you first have to take hold of it. You have to grab it and then push it. So if we want to hold on to it, we grab it and bring it closer. If we want to push it away, we grab it and then push. But in either case, the grabbing happens in order to do that.

If it's neutral, notice what your relation to neutral experience often is—it's boring. It doesn't grab us one way or another, so we just space out. We don't really pay attention to the neutral, just like neutral people in our lives. As the metta meditation reveals, we can just ignore them. They don't inflame our passion.

Delusion accompanies neutrality. Greed accompanies the pleasant. And aversion accompanies the unpleasant. These are manifestations of what's called craving. The second noble truth that Steve talked about, tanha, is the reactive mind—this quality of thirst that wants things to be different than they are.

Even though craving sounds like a desire force, it encompasses both the wanting to pull the good close and wanting to push the difficult away, because desire basically wants to keep things always pleasant. So it likes the pleasant and doesn't like the unpleasant. Craving encompasses both greed and aversion.

Because we don't notice we're doing it, there's usually delusion involved also. Most people in the world, when they push and pull, don't know that they're pushing and pulling. They don't know greed and aversion are operating, so they're not seeing clearly the reaction of their mind. Delusion is also present. Craving generally rests on greed, aversion, and delusion, and you can think of it as synonymous with these three.

Craving is provoked by the feeling tone, and then it leads into this grabbing hold of, which is called clinging. So altogether, the sequence goes: contact has a feeling tone of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. That feeling tone tends to condition a reaction of greed, aversion, and delusion, and that leads us to grab hold of the object. Once we've grabbed hold of something, the chain goes on to suffering. Basically, suffering—either gross or subtle—is unavoidable once the grasping has happened.

Let me give you some examples to make this more real. Let's say you're a yogi on the eight precepts, which a number of you are. Lovely to see you undertaking the practice of renunciation. You go into the dining hall at tea time to get your modest glass of juice, and you see this little sign: "Ice cream on back table." And you think, "Why did I take the eight precepts now? Ice cream is my favorite food, and I can't have it? Well, maybe I'll take some and put it in the yogi fridge overnight." But it's ice cream—it's going to melt if you put it in the refrigerated compartment. And you can't be an eight-precept person being seen hoarding ice cream. That wouldn't look good on the yogi resume.

So then, you know, you could get into a whole story about this. Maybe I should go off eight precepts just for tonight. I'll have a little bit of protein first and then I'll be ready and I'll go over and have the ice cream after. And I could just go back on eight precepts tomorrow night. But I wouldn't feel totally committed. I made this pledge. I'm just going to do it. I said I would just do it, but I'm really hungry tonight. I didn't really take enough lunch, and now I'm feeling hungry, and I love ice cream. Why did they have to put it out tonight? Why couldn't they have waited until the last lunch? And what am I going to do about this?

And so you could get caught up in this spinning for a while, and you could kind of feel disappointed for like the next hour about being hungry and not being able to have the ice cream. And then at some point, you know, this whole issue would just fade away and it'd be over and gone.

So in a way, by taking hold of the ice cream thing, you've kind of taken birth. You've become a new person, a new you. And this is the you who is the hungry yogi on eight precepts. And as long as you keep thinking about and missing the ice cream, you can sustain that you for like an hour through the having taken a hold. And this is an incarnation that has a little bit of dukkha in it because it's founded on missing and lacking and wanting.

So we say here that we've taken birth, that by grabbing hold of that and thinking about it—my habits, my desire, my like, my favorite food, my hunger—we create a new I in this time frame that is like a little birth. It's like we've given birth to a new person who is, let's call it, the hungry yogi. So the hungry yogi exists for like an hour. That lifespan is full of wanting and incompleteness and frustration. And at the end of the hour, the hungry yogi passes away. And then you're just back in walking meditation, appreciating the hills and the sunset light and all of that. It's fine again. But that birth, which is born from grasping, was not a happy one.

Okay? So there are also happy births. You come into a sitting, you sit down, really present. Oh, I feel great in my body. My attention stays where I put it. The mind isn't wandering. I'm starting to feel steady and stable. My body feels relaxed. My mind is still. This is the meditation I've always knew I could have.

So by becoming, let's say, aware of that and then grasping it, then we become someone—I'm a good yogi in a concentrated state. And now I'm a good meditator and I love it. I've struggled up to now, but now I love meditation. So we go out for a walking period. We go through our walking. We're pretty present and we sort of can't wait. I can't wait to get back and be in that concentrated state again. I just know it's going to be there for me.

So we go back in and we're really looking forward. I'm going to have that excellent sitting, my very best sitting all over again. It was so blissful and peaceful. And we sit down and it's all gone. The body's kind of cranky and the mind is all over the place. A lot of thoughts, a lot of energy, a lot of restlessness. We can hardly find the breath, much less stay with it. And then we're hugely aversive. How can this happen? I'm a concentrated yogi. How can this go away now? I'm really frustrated. I'll try really hard to get it back.

And so we get really close to the breath and think, "I'm not going to let one go by." And then we just get tighter and tighter and our concentration leaks away. In this case, by claiming the good concentration and the result, the fruit of the meditation, we've identified with it and given birth to the good yogi or the concentrated yogi. We think that will extend into the future. So we have this new identity. We take it out for a walk. We come back and it goes away. And then that going away is painful. The concentrated yogi dies at that point, and it's a painful death.

So either we grab hold of something painful and then we have an unhappy life but a pleasant death, or we grab hold of something wonderful and we have a happy life but a painful death. Either way, there's suffering that comes out of our having clung and formed this new identity.

In either case, eventually we come back to balance. We do return to this state of balance where we've let go of the holding. We've released it. And then we're again open to everything that's coming and going, more or less. This is the place in meditation we become more and more familiar with.

If we review our whole life, it's been like this all along. We've been aware and things have been coming and going. Things have come like mother, breast, food, father, school, middle school, romance, crushes, rejection, high school, college, career, taxes, Britney Spears, Paris Hilton, MTV—the whole thing unfolds from there. All these experiences coming through our consciousness, through contact. Some of them we really like and want to hold on to, and some of them are really scary and threatening, and we want to push them away or pull back. So finding this place of balance in relation to all these changing appearances is not so simple. But if we take hold, we end up suffering.

We start to see that when we hold on to something, we take birth as a new I, a new self. We get this understanding about grasping or clinging or holding on that Andrew Olendzki describes in one of his essays. Andrew Olendzki is the director of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, a study center right next to IMS in Massachusetts, and he's a Pali scholar. He says, "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds onto or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

This is a very perceptive comment. It's not that the I does the grasping. Grasping happens through an action of mind, but when it happens, the I comes into being. The I is formed out of our taking hold of something. This is the way the self gets created moment after moment.

Mostly for people untrained in meditation, life consists of what is called monkey mind. If you've ever seen a monkey swing through the forest, it'll hold on to one vine, but it'll only let go of the one vine when it sees another vine that it can hold on to. It lets go of one in order to hold on to the next. And then it'll let go of that one in order to hold on to the next. So the monkey is always holding on or about to hold on. And that's how it makes its way through the forest.

So mostly in our life, we go from holding on to one thing and taking birth and passing away and then holding on to the next immediately. In spiritual life, we start to see this. We start to see the grasping and we can feel the pain of it. It's not always easy to let go. Ajahn Chah said seventy to eighty percent of spiritual life is knowing you're clinging and not being able to let go. This seems fairly accurate in my experience. But we learn a lot from watching this unfold moment by moment, and maybe there's another choice. Maybe there's another way to respond.

If the chain of dependent origination just takes us over this same ground—contact, feeling, craving, clinging, and on to suffering—that's just bondage again and again and again. But there has to be a way out. There has to be freedom somewhere or the Buddha wouldn't have taught that we could become free. So where is the freedom? Is there any freedom now or is freedom only going to be something that's at the very end of the journey when we attain Arahantship or full liberation twenty lifetimes from now? Is there some freedom available here and now? Which is another way of saying, can this chain be broken from contact, feeling, craving, clinging?

Referring back to Kamala's talk on equanimity last night, do you ever have the experience of being with a pleasant experience and not have craving arise?

Does that happen? Yes. Do you ever have the experience of being with unpleasant experience, painful experience, and not have aversion arise? Yes.

This is possible. And this is what equanimity is all about. Through strengthening the mind and paying close attention, we can start to relate to pleasure and pain without falling into craving. This is the big insight of dependent origination. We can find freedom in relation to our experience on a moment-to-moment basis, and the freedom is based on feeling the pleasant, unpleasant, and neutral without sliding into craving.

Classically, this is where the chain of dependent origination gets broken. And when it's broken here, it doesn't have to lead to suffering. It doesn't lead to suffering. If we don't move from feeling to craving, the link does not progress to suffering. This means we're experiencing pleasant and unpleasant contact, but the mind doesn't go into greed, aversion, and delusion.

This is an area we want to investigate in our practice. At what moments is the mind free of greed, aversion, and delusion? We'll come back to this a little later and pinpoint it more precisely. But when we're there, we could say we're resting in a space or a gap or an openness between feeling and craving.

One Buddhist teacher said, "The whole of the path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving." This is all we have to do: notice clearly contact and the feeling tone—pleasant, unpleasant, neutral—and hold the mind in balance so we don't slide into craving. That short circuits the trip to suffering. It simply doesn't happen.

Begin to explore this in your meditation practice. What does that feel like? When feeling is present, but you don't slide into greed, aversion or delusion, what's the feeling there? Generally, I would say the feeling is of spaciousness and equanimity. And in that kind of equanimity, there's freedom.

In that moment, by not being embroiled in reactivity, we have a space that feels free. It feels open, can feel light, can feel peaceful, can feel wide. From that space, loving kindness and compassion and joy come more easily. This is a place, at least relatively, of freedom.

That kind of gap, that resting, is not being determined by the conditions at the six sense doors. Pleasure and pain are coming, but we're not falling sway to their conditioning. We're resting in a place not determined by them. In this, we're moving a little bit out of the conditioned realm and into the unconditioned realm.

This is from Ajahn Chah, Jack Kornfield's first teacher. It's a little long, but please be patient. It's a beautiful piece:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable, material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them up into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

"The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are—as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

When we rest in this gap, we're not taking birth. We're not taking on a new self, a new incarnation. And because we're not taking on a new incarnation, we're not subject to death at that point. Another word used for this coming into birth is "becoming."

Many people came to talk to the Buddha during his life and asked him countless questions. There's one particularly sweet passage in the Sutta Nipata where these Brahmin youths have all gotten together and come to visit the Buddha. Brahmins at the time were in a school not particularly appreciative of the Buddhist teachings or lineage. It was the established ecclesiastical order of the Buddha's time, connected with what later became Hinduism. So there's something very sweet about these Brahmin youths coming to seek counsel from a teacher outside their own lineage.

So one youth whose name is Todaya asks the Buddha, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you like to have asked the Buddha this? Wow, what's it like where you sit?

So the Buddha replied, "That sage is without desire. He has nothing. He is unentangled in becoming." No desire, having nothing—that is, owning nothing—unentangled in becoming. So that means not generating this new self through clinging over and over again.

Ajahn Chah had another pointer. You can imagine him teaching in Thailand in an outdoor hall. The temperature is very mild there even in the evenings, so most of the talks are given in halls outdoors. There's a floor and pillars going up on the sides that support the roof, but there are no walls. It's just open air.

You can imagine Ajahn Chah in one of these settings. He points and says, "The roof is a becoming. The floor is a becoming. But in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness." So you can imagine—you can stand on the floor. There's existence here. You can stand on the roof. But in the space between and the empty spaces going out, there's nowhere to stand. So that's emptiness.

To put it bluntly, he continues, "We say that nibbana is this emptiness."

So what he's saying is that when we rest in that gap and don't go into the formation of self, we are resting in a kind of peace that is related to the goal of the whole path—this supreme peace that is the goal of the whole path. The reason it's related is because this moment of peace is not so constructed. It's not something that we've put together through effort, but rather by non-activity, by non-clinging, that this kind of peace is disclosed in the mind.

So we're touching on something that Ajahn Chah said was somewhat fundamental. He said this is something that's unborn and uncreated and partakes, therefore, of not dying—partakes of the deathless. No self being born, no self dying. It's always available. It's always present. That has to be one of the qualities of something that's not subject to conditions, to coming and going—always available, this peace.

This is from Ajahn Jhumni, another Thai forest teacher: "Phenomena show their dharma of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

In the Thai forest tradition, this is a frequent pointing—that as we rest in this place that's free of greed, aversion, and delusion, we are touching a little bit or having a little taste of this unconditioned peace that is the goal of the whole path. We can start to feel in this when greed, aversion and delusion are absent or relatively absent—we can start to feel the freedom of that because the freedom we're tasting is a little taste of the freedom that's at the end of the path.

But this freedom is also the way to walk the path. As we rest with awareness, the path continues to unfold ever deeper and deeper in our practice. In a way, you could say that the freedom is the goal. Even this taste here and now is the goal, but it's also the path, because it keeps deepening in that direction. So it's a way of understanding that the path and the goal have come together for us. When you start to feel that, you can feel a lot of trust, a lot of confidence, because all you have to do is refrain from clinging, pay attention and don't cling. Simple. Simple but not easy.

One of my teachers in Thailand rested here a lot. This was Ajahn Buddhadasa, who there's also a photo of in the gratitude hut. There's a photo of Ajahn Chah as well. Ajahn Buddhadasa was one of the most inspiring monks and teachers in Thailand in the last half of the last century. He was an iconoclastic monk because he was not afraid to speak out on social issues. He would speak out against the government and even high officers if he felt they were not treating the people well. For some time he was frowned upon by some of the authorities, but he continued to speak his mind.

I went to practice with him at his monastery in southern Thailand. He was remarkably available, living in the forest his whole adult life in great simplicity. Every morning he would sit on a bench near his small cottage, surrounded by forest roosters that pecked the ground at his feet and large temple dogs that seemed to have an uncanny ability to detect Westerners, nipping at our heels while leaving the Thai monks completely alone. So approaching Ajahn Buddhadasa was always something of an adventure.

You could simply walk up to him as he sat on his bench. As a monk, I would offer my three bows before him, and then I was free to ask whatever I wished—I could discuss Dhamma with him. He was utterly available. Yet I found myself deeply unnerved and somewhat intimidated by his presence, for he possessed this profound equanimity where everything arose and passed without his reacting to it. He was simply meditating all the objects of his experience, and that included meditating me.

I would sit down, and he wouldn't really acknowledge my existence. If you visit a typical pastor or teacher, they welcome you warmly—offering you a chair, asking if you need tissues, expressing delight at seeing you. This was decidedly not Ajahn Buddhadasa's style. I would make my bows, and he would meditate me, resting in this place of great equanimity. I took this as rejection, thinking he didn't want me there. Only later did I realize that he was completely equanimous about my arising and passing—he simply didn't care whether I came to talk with him or got up and walked away. I was just another phenomenon in his field of experience, and he had truly settled there. I never witnessed anything disturb that fundamental equanimity.

Ajahn Buddhadasa spoke extensively about the lack of satisfaction in conditioned things. This becomes part of our experience as we begin to find this balance. We observe the changing experiences in the conditioned realm and recognize that they are all subject to coming and going—none can provide lasting satisfaction. We start to discover that this place where we can rest, free of greed, aversion, and delusion, is actually more satisfying than sense experiences. We begin to develop an attraction to this place, this resting in the gap, this refuge of freedom and equanimity. This is truly where we want to be, and we naturally start to lose interest in the objects themselves.

Something that can support this shift—and it happens quite naturally for many people, though not for everyone, so it's not necessary to force this transition—is moving our attention away from focusing on objects toward focusing on the quality of awareness itself. We become disenchanted with the objects that arise because they lack permanence, don't endure, and cannot deeply satisfy. But we grow fascinated by this quality of knowing—you could call it awareness or consciousness—that remains constantly present, holding these objects, receiving them, knowing them.

Ajahn Buddhadasa called this quality satipanya—an interesting conjunction not commonly found in Buddhist teachings, but present in the Thai forest lineage. The word sati, meaning mindfulness, combined with panya, meaning wisdom, suggests this quality of awareness that observes our experience with a blend, a union of mindfulness and wisdom. This is where we want to settle in our meditation practice. This is what we seek to discover—this combination of satipanya.

One way to cultivate this is by turning our attention from the objects toward the knowing itself. If you prefer to stay with the objects themselves, that's perfectly fine—the satipanya will grow there as well. Don't worry about changing anything you've been doing. But some people find this alternative approach helpful: turning the attention to awareness itself, moving away from looking outward toward looking back, examining what is looking. The language that points in this direction includes turning the attention back, turning the mind back on itself, turning awareness back on itself, becoming aware of awareness, looking back at awareness.

To get a taste of this, you might let your eyes roam around the room right now. If you wish, even indulge a little—let your gaze linger on things you find beautiful, people you enjoy, images of the Buddha and Prajnaparamita, the flowers, and allow yourself to delight in them.

Just let your eyes roam among the trees outside, the hills. See if in doing that, there is a little bit of energetic pull toward those beautiful objects—as though something is being drawn out through the eyes toward them.

Now take that outward-going energy and turn it back to what is looking. Take that awareness and direct it back on itself. Does it feel any different when you do that? What feels different? How does it feel? What shifts? More spacious? More peaceful? Not relating to the things? Not grasping?

I heard someone say, "I can't do it." That's perfectly fine. I'm just making suggestions to play with, and we'll make other suggestions you can explore too. Sometimes this will connect for people, sometimes it won't. Don't worry if it doesn't—it's just an alternative approach.

Some people report that instead of being drawn outward, which can lead to grasping, this approach settles us back a little more. It brings spaciousness, an element of peace, and non-attachment into the moment's experience. As you drew the awareness back, did you lose track of visual objects? You're still seeing, aren't you? You can still relate to the world, but you're in a more settled-back place, which has an aspect of non-grasping—which is freedom—and spaciousness, which is equanimity.

For some people, this meditation approach can lead rather directly into this place of unentangled knowing. We take the emphasis off the outer objects and place it back on awareness itself, and that movement can cut some of the entanglement, some of the tendency to focus and grasp at objects. This is a very interesting thing to explore, and what we end up exploring is the quality of awareness itself.

This is referred to in the Buddhist teachings as the fifth aggregate called consciousness. The Buddha described human experience through the aggregates, and one of them is consciousness—the knowing of a sound, a sight, a taste, a touch, a smell, a thought, an emotion. The knowing of that. Every time we're awake, we're knowing something.

When we hear a sound like this bell, we can look at two aspects of it. There's the sound itself—a fairly nice sound, pleasant, especially because it means the end of the sitting. It's a really nice sound for meditators, with pleasant overtones. But then we can also notice our knowing of it. You're aware of it, right? When you hear the sound of the bell, you're aware of it. So there's something in you that is conscious of it, that is knowing it. Those are all synonyms.

We can tune in directly to that knowing quality, which is present with every bit of sense experience. It's not that there are two separate things—the knowing and the bell. The way I understand it, they both arise together. When you hear this, there's just one experience.

That's just one thing. But in Buddhism, we like to look at human experience. So there's one thing, but we can know two aspects of this—the sound and the knowing of it. That may seem odd, that there are two aspects of one experience, but it happens all the time. Like I'm going to hold up this bell. Is it round or is it gold? It's just one thing, but it's both round and gold, right? So it's one thing that has two aspects we can tease out.

When I strike the bell, one experience arises. There's the sound and there's your knowing of it. What we're doing is placing our attention on consciousness itself, feeling that knowing taking place in us. When we do that, we take a step back from the world of objects.

Normally, especially in Western culture, we think the world is made up of objects. We just take that for granted. Oh, the world is made up of earth and roads and buildings and women and zafus and men and walls and lamps and ceilings, trees and flowers. We think that's what the world's made up of.

But in Buddhism, the world we want to look at is the world of human experience. That's where suffering happens. That's where freedom happens. That world is made up of consciousness knowing land and roads and buildings and floors and women and men and ceilings and lamps and so on. Everything that arises is known in human consciousness. When we start to see it that way, that gives us another refuge—one that's not immersed in, not stuck in the world of objects. It gives us another place to go.

Finding this quality of consciousness is not so easy. Ajahn Sumedho has this nice description. He said, it's just like the question, "Can you see your own eyes?" Not so easy, is it? Nobody can see their own eyes. I can see your eyes, but I can't see my eyes. I'm sitting right here. I've got two eyes and I can't see them. But you can see my eyes. But there's no need for me to see my eyes because I can see. It's ridiculous, isn't it? If I started saying, "Why can't I see my own eyes?" you'd think, "Ajahn Sumedho is really weird, isn't he?"

Looking in a mirror, you can see a reflection, but that's not your eyes. It's a reflection of your eyes. There's no way that I've been able to look and see my own eyes, but then it's not necessary to see your own eyes. It's not necessary to know what it is that knows because there's knowing.

Ajahn Chah put it similarly. He said, "Don't worry about not being able to grasp this awareness or find this awareness. You're riding on a horse and you're asking, 'Where's the horse?'" It's working for you. So just notice your awareness to the extent that you can notice it. This is one way, one meditation approach to step back from enmeshment with objects.

I want to mention one other briefly. In the last several years, some of us—I think all four of us teachers—have been relating to a Burmese teacher named Sayadaw U Tejaniya, who I think Steve originally met in Burma and has since brought over to the West. Sally and I had a chance to practice with him at IMS when Steve brought him over a few years ago, and Kamala has spent time with him also. We've really appreciated his teaching.

Steve mentioned something the other day—or maybe Kamala said it—about not being so concerned about the objects of mindfulness practice, but more concerned with the quality of your awareness. This is a pointer from U Tejaniya, who says, "Follow your usual meditation technique. You can be aware of sounds or breath or body, emotions or thoughts, but always notice how are you relating to them." He had three simple questions to check your relationship, and he said, "Check this often."

Are you relating to them with greed? You'll know this if you want something else to be happening. So you're experiencing a moment, but you look and you see you want something else to be happening—then there's greed in the mind. Or are you wanting something to stop happening? The pain in the knee, the ache in the back, the mood of restlessness. Then there's aversion at play. Or are you not in touch with what's happening? Are you spacing out? Then there's delusion. So he says, check: What's the attitude of the mind to your experience? Is there greed? Is there aversion? Is there delusion? And you can feel into these just in the moment.

So the way I began to practice with these, I was using many of the same objects that we've talked about here—breath, body, sounds, thoughts, emotions. And then regularly I would start to check: is there greed, aversion, or delusion? If there is, you don't judge that; you just become aware of the greed, the aversion, or the delusion. As I got more familiar with it, I could check more often. So I started checking maybe five times every sitting. I'd ask these three questions. If there was greed or aversion or delusion, I'd know it. Then as I got more familiar, I would check like ten times a sitting. And as it got more familiar, I would never stop checking. My main meditation was checking my mind to see if it was tilting into greed, aversion, and delusion. So in that way, the meditation becomes: am I falling into craving, greed, aversion, delusion, or am I free of it? And that's all in a way that one needs to do.

This again is from Upasika Kee: "So your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on."

When you practice in this way, you release the fixation on the passing objects and you put the attention where it's really most important, and that is: what's my heart doing? Am I falling into greed, aversion, or delusion? So in a way, it's the same movement back from the world of objects and into the world of our own awareness.

And Upasika Kee puts it in this way: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way." In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside. So we keep our attention directed inwardly at the very state of our own heart, looking for its reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion. And if they don't come, then we simply rest in that unentangled knowing which has the quality of freedom, contentment, spaciousness, equanimity, and vitality—because it's a very awake place. We're in touch with everything that's happening, but we're not caught.

So this inward turning doesn't mean we cut off from the world. As you saw with placing awareness on awareness, we still see, we still hear, we can speak and relate and so forth. But it means part of our attention, the most important part, stays with the movements of our own heart and mind. That's our first priority.

This is freedom here and now. This is also the path. Practicing in this way opens us up to more and more freedom as the path unfolds. So it is full and rich and contented here and now, and it's also onward leading, develops all the factors of the path.

So I'll just close with this quotation again from the Sutta Nipata, when the Brahmin youths were coming up to question the Buddha. This was a later Brahmin youth named Kappa. He said to the Buddha: "For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir." The Buddha replied: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island. There is no other. That is nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

Let's just sit for a minute together.

Having nothing, clinging to nothing, that is the island.

That is nibbana, the total ending of aging and death.

So thank you for your attention. We have about thirty minutes for walking and the last sitting.

CHAPTER 101

Week 1, Part 2: Introduction to the Suttas

Guy Armstrong · 1h01

> In this second part of the introductory sutta study class, Guy Armstrong offers a comprehensive exploration of the Pali Canon's organization and content. He examines the three baskets (Tipiṭaka) - Vinaya, Sutta, and Abhidhamma - with particular focus on the five Nikāyas within the Sutta Piṭaka: the Dīgha, Majjhima, Saṃyutta, Aṅguttara, and Khuddaka collections. Armstrong discusses which texts represent authentic Buddha-vacana (word of the Buddha) and provides practical guidance on approaching these ancient teachings.
>
> The talk addresses several challenges Western practitioners face when studying the suttas, including teachings directed specifically to monastics, cultural elements from 2,500 years ago, and complex philosophical concepts. Armstrong explains the relationship between renunciation practices for monastics versus lay practitioners, emphasizing that the Buddha spoke differently to different audiences. He also tackles difficult issues around gender in the texts while maintaining confidence in the core dhamma teachings.
>
> Throughout, Armstrong emphasizes how sutta study develops sammā-diṭṭhi (right view), the first and final factor of the Noble Eightfold Path. He presents the texts as reliable tools for understanding how an awakened mind perceives reality, offering practitioners a way to check their own understanding against the Buddha's profound insights into the nature of existence, suffering, and liberation.

So what I'd like to do now is examine in more detail this outline of the Pali Canon on your second page of the handout, to look at what's here.

We talked about the three baskets of the Vinaya, the Suttas, and the Abhidhamma. The Vinaya is of not much concern to us as laypeople. If you're going to become a monk or a nun, you want to read the Vinaya. If you're not, you don't need to. The Abhidhamma is a very detailed and I would say difficult field of study that not many of us have the kind of inclination to dive deeply into. So for the most part, we don't worry about the Abhidhamma. Where we focus our study is on this central basket, the Sutta Pitaka.

So let's look at that in a little more detail. It's a combination of actual discourses from the Buddha, what are purported to be discourses from the Buddha, and later additions. My study has mostly been the actual words of the Buddha, and that's what I recommend for you also. So let's talk about which pieces of the Sutta Pitaka are actual discourses of the Buddha.

This Sutta Pitaka is broken into five Nikayas or collections. Looking down the list, it's the Digha, the Majjhima, the Samyutta, the Anguttara, and the Khuddaka. Of these, the Digha, the Majjhima, the Samyutta, and the Anguttara are all considered the word of the Buddha. There's this Pali term, Buddhavacana, which means Buddha voice. All these four are considered the word of the Buddha—either spoken by the Buddha or spoken by a disciple with the approval of the Buddha. So sometimes you might hear Sariputta speaking it, but the Buddha approves it. There's a really nice discourse in the Majjhima number 44 that's spoken by a nun, Dhammadinna, who I think was the foremost woman proficient in expounding the Dhamma in the Buddha's day. But generally, they all carry the authentic imprint of the Buddha, Buddhavacana, word of the Buddha.

Then the Khuddaka Nikaya is considered a minor collection or lesser collection, and it's got a mixture of word of the Buddha and other material. So in this one, the words of the Buddha are Dhammapada, Udana, Itivuttaka, and Sutta Nipata. The others are more commentarial.

I want to show you what this adds up to in modern translations. This is the Udana and Itivuttaka. The Dhammapada in a very good translation by our own Gil Fronsdal—highly recommended. Sutta Nipata, which is a really engaging and interesting text, though there's not a great translation out. This is the Anguttara Nikaya in five volumes from the Pali Text Society, but Bhikkhu Bodhi's next effort is going to be a whole new translation of this. Don't bother with this translation; wait for Bhikkhu Bodhi's, which should be out in about a year. Or if you can't wait, there's a selection from the Anguttara in this book called Numerical Discourses of the Buddha—also very good. The Samyutta Nikaya, my version was in two volumes originally, the blue book, but this has now been reprinted as just one. The Majjhima Nikaya. They're always spoken of in the order that they're listed here. And then finally, the long discourses, the Digha Nikaya, translated by Maurice Walshe.

So this is the stack of Buddhavacana. In the original Pali, the Digha was three volumes, the Majjhima was three volumes, the Samyutta was five, the Anguttara is five, and each of these little ones are one each. So we have close to twenty volumes here of the Buddha's words from 500 years before the birth of Jesus. What do we have of Jesus? Perhaps a hundred pages? All the Gospels? A hundred pages of teaching, most of which are overlapping? How did this survive? How did we get this much?

So there's a lot here. Study could last you for the rest of your life if you want to take it up.

Let me say a little bit about each of the five main Nikayas. The Digha Nikaya is considered kind of an introduction for outsiders. It has a lot of stories and a lot of myths. The meaning of digha is long, so these are long discourses.

The Digha Nikaya contains profound dhamma, yet it presents challenges for beginning students. It appeals to the consciousness of ancient Indians because it connects with their mythology, weaving familiar stories into the teachings.

The Majjhima Nikaya offers a collection of middle-length discourses that strikes a perfect balance between narrative and profound instruction. You'll discover all the central points of the Buddha's teaching here, accompanied by enough stories, conversations, dialogues, and debates to keep the reading engaging. This harmonious blend of entertainment and enlightenment makes the Majjhima the ideal starting point for anyone wanting to read the suttas comprehensively. Our sutta today comes from this collection.

The Samyutta Nikaya serves as the professional meditator's handbook. It contains the most detailed instructions and discriminating analysis of Buddhist doctrines, offering the most in-depth exploration available. If you were sent to a desert island to meditate in solitude, this would be the essential text to accompany you.

The Anguttara Nikaya became the repository for all the remaining discourses that didn't fit neatly elsewhere. They're arranged by numbers, reflecting the Buddha's fondness for lists—the five hindrances, three characteristics, seven factors of enlightenment, and so forth. Anguttara means "many-factored," and the collection is organized numerically from the Book of Ones through the Book of Elevens.

In the Book of Ones, the Buddha declares: "There is one thing, O bhikkhus, which more than anything contributes to the growth of wisdom, and that is association with the wise." The Book of Twos continues: "There are two things, O monks, which one should never forget in one's practice," and so forth.

The Anguttara contains the finest advice for lay practitioners. Though not organized by topic, it holds remarkable suttas about household life and relationships. Here's one intriguing teaching: the Buddha said that if a couple wishes to remain together in their next lifetime, it is possible. If they are similarly matched in faith, wisdom, generosity, and ethics, and they resolve to stay together, they can indeed be reunited in future lives.

The Anguttara also contains a wonderful discourse on wealth. Sometimes the monastic teachings give the impression that we should feel embarrassed about having money, but this wasn't the Buddha's view. He saw lay people as important, necessary, vital sources of support for monastic communities. He spoke in praise of lay people who gained wealth lawfully and used it wisely—for their own enjoyment, supporting their families, and performing good works by helping others. This kind of practical guidance fills the Anguttara.

The Khuddaka Nikaya contains miscellaneous sections, some extraordinarily beautiful. The Udana and Itivuttaka offer particularly moving passages, while the Sutta Nipata represents one of the oldest texts, least altered over time, making it deeply engaging.

Before we explore why we might want to study these texts, let me pause for questions about this historical overview and the contents of the Pali Canon.

A student asked about the origins of the Mahayana tradition and whether it was one of the original eighteen schools or evolved separately.

The origins of Mahayana remain unclear to scholars. Some suggest it emerged from a group called the Mahasangikas, who split off around the area of Calcutta and developed a different Vinaya. However, no one has definitively pinpointed the Mahayana's source.

Around four hundred years after the Buddha's death, new scriptures began appearing. The first were the Prajnaparamita Sutras—Perfection of Wisdom teachings—which emphasized understanding emptiness and the Bodhisattva path. These texts seemed to appear without clear historical roots, at least as far as current scholarship can determine.

Regarding language, the Mahayana Sutras were composed in Sanskrit, as were the canons of some earlier schools like the Sarvastivadins and possibly the Sautrantikas, though only fragments of these survive today. The Pali Canon remains the only complete early Buddhist collection that has survived intact.

Other schools grew up in China that flowered and developed in different directions. The Huayan school emerged from a later philosophical movement in India called the Chittamatra. They evolved along their own trajectory. Tiantai was another school that originated in China, and the Pure Land School also began there. When Pure Land reached Japan, it became the foundation from which the Nichiren schools developed.

There are numerous other schools, but the predominant ones we encounter in the West are Theravada, Mahayana—mainly Zen—and Vajrayana, the Tibetan tradition. I tend to discuss these three because they all use meditation as their primary vehicle.

The Mahayana has a distinctly different emphasis because it places emptiness at the philosophical center. As far as I know, it was the Mahayana that developed the description of the paramis or paramitas as the path. Because their emphasis is on the bodhisattva path, the goal itself differs. In Mahayana, the aim is not to become an arahant or simply awakened—the goal is to become a Buddha. This is a much loftier aspiration.

Some scholars suggest that this goal changed when fewer arahants were being produced. It was as if the thinking became: "Well, if we can't reach that attainment, let's create an even more elevated goal that we know we won't achieve in this lifetime. That will explain why we didn't get there, and we can continue over many lives."

The Mahayana tradition has more association with lay practice than Theravada, which has maintained a very monastic focus. Mahayana developed more of a lay flavor, so you'll find greater openness to engaging with sense pleasures.

There was a particularly interesting movement that emerged from Mahayana—the Chittamatra school, also called Yogacara. They presented the goal, the unconditioned, in a way that wasn't so removed from the six senses. In the Theravadan description of the unconditioned, one gets the sense that you must disconnect from material reality to access nirvana. You'll hear this clearly in some schools' descriptions—that the six senses must fall away before one can connect with the unconditioned.

The Yogacara Chittamatra school said no—you can access the unconditioned with all six senses functioning because it's here now anyway. If it's unconditioned, it doesn't arise and pass, so it must be present. Therefore, the six senses can't block it.

This opens up the possibility of ultimate reality and conventional reality coming together. It provides a philosophical avenue where there isn't such separation between the ultimate and the day-to-day. Another way to express this is that it allows for daily experience to be infused with the divine. This understanding emerged from the Yogacara tradition.

You make an excellent point about the Mahayana's open canon. This openness continues even today—someone might discover a hidden treasure text purportedly from a deva or Buddha. This represents another major characteristic of the Mahayana tradition.

Regarding pronunciation, yes—when you see those diacritical marks, they indicate specific sounds. We'll discuss pronunciation more as we delve into the sutta.

So it's a good question. When you have an N with a tilde, it's an NY sound. And if Vinaya had been spelled with a long accent over the A, it would be Vinaya. But it's not, so the A is more of an "uh" sound—Vi-nuh-ya.

Someone asked about how tantra came in—what was the influence on Mahayana and where did it come from? In northern India, around the 7th and 8th centuries, Hindu practitioners had been working with energy currents in the body for many years. They found that a powerful way to activate those energy currents was through sexual union, so they developed spiritual practices that use the energy of sexual intercourse to activate bodily energies that could be devoted to awakening or purification.

Tantra really has several levels of meaning. First, there is simply knowing the bodily energy independent of sexuality. Second, there's figuring out how sexual energies can be integrated and used within that. Then these were furthered by devotional relationships to different deities. The deity brings out a certain quality of energy in the heart and mind, and this is reflected in the body.

These three elements together—the control and manipulation of physical energy, sexual energy, and deity devotionals—came from Hinduism and were appropriated by Buddhist groups around the 7th to 8th centuries in India. In Tibetan Buddhism today, Vajrayana is more or less synonymous with Tantra.

Some schools use Tantra to understand the working of physical energy through pure meditative approaches, using visualization of deities. Some schools practice this and also include sexual union as part of their spiritual practice. So it's a different approach than Theravadan monasticism.

There are many books on Tantra in the West now, most of which focus on the sexual aspect. But underlying it is a rigorous system of understanding bodily energy and how to work with it.

Regarding Dzogchen and Mahamudra—these grew out of the Yogacara Chittamatrin school. Philosophically, they maintain that permeability between the conventional and ultimate. The meditation practices were brought to Tibet by Padmasambhava around the 8th century. Padmasambhava came from the Swat Valley of Pakistan. These tantric practices evolved into highly refined meditative practices that focus on the nature of mind and came into Tibet through India.

Bon was a native Tibetan religion that influenced Tibetan Buddhism, though I don't know many details beyond that. I think it's a shamanistic religion, so it probably fit well with the energy work that Tantra introduced. The idea of tulkus—reincarnated masters who can choose their rebirth and be recognized—was a Tibetan creation, not found in any Indian system.

Yogacara developed around the 4th century in northern India. Vasubandhu is associated with the philosophical foundation of that school.

I wanted to discuss why we bother studying this material. First, very simply, the suttas contain valuable information about how to live, practice, and understand. When you consider the aspects of the Eightfold Path—sila, samadhi, paññā—they cover all of these exhaustively and in detail, sometimes in ways we may not have heard before.

Secondly, as we discussed with the three kinds of wisdom, reading is a powerful way to develop insight. When you hear about the Buddha's insights, it plants a seed. Through meditation and investigation, the care you bring to those questions waters that seed and makes it flower into insight.

It's like when you first heard the concept of not-self in a dharma talk. Wasn't it perplexing? You might have wondered, "How can that be?" Yet if you got curious—"What do they mean the body isn't the self? What do they mean my thoughts aren't me?"—and began investigating, that inquiry opens up to moments of insight that can be truly freeing. "Oh, this fear—it's not me, I don't own it."

In the same way, the Buddha recorded very deep insights and understanding in his discourses, and all of these offer new ground for us to reflect upon and investigate, fertilizing our own practice. One of the key ways I see the suttas is as incomparable tools for developing the factor of right view.

Right view is the start of the Eightfold Path. It's also the end of the Eightfold Path. Everything starts from there and everything culminates there. Essentially, the whole path is to transform the way we see the world and the way we understand the world. The suttas are telling us again and again how the Buddha saw the world—which is simply a way of saying how a free, awakened, unattached, unhindered mind sees this world of experience. We can use that to check our own understanding.

The Buddha will say things that startle us. That's good, because it leads us to reflect: "What would it be like if I looked at things that way? Where am I blind? Where is there a corner of attachment or delusion that I haven't looked into so fully?" It can really shake us up a little bit and get us to examine our own take on the world, keeping us going straight on the track.

Ajahn Chah used to tell a story in response to students who questioned his seemingly contradictory advice. One meditator would come in and receive one piece of guidance, then the next meditator would receive completely opposite advice. When asked about this apparent inconsistency, he said, "Look, I see people going down a path I know really well. Some people I see wandering off to the right, so I shout, 'Go left, go left!' Other people I see wandering off to the left, so I shout, 'Go right, go right!' It's just to get them back on that center track."

The suttas serve as an excellent way for us to know if we're on that center track. If we start diverging from the Buddha's understanding too greatly, it's good cause for questioning. Of course, we have to have faith in these words before we can use them that way—we don't take it blindly. But once we start to study and acquire some faith, it becomes very useful for refining our take on the path, on life, on right view.

This brings up the whole question of concepts and learning about concepts. Our meditation practice has been kind of anti-conceptual from the beginning, which is great—it's what we've needed. We needed to get back to direct experience. We had that as children, then sort of lost it in all the years of schooling. Meditation gave us a way to get back: breath in, breath out, body sensation arising and passing, thought coming and going. This is anger, this is joy, this is fear, this is contentment. We learned what it was to be with our own experience without too many concepts.

But now, having done that, we can start to bring in some concepts again. One of my teachers explained how concepts work using this analogy: If you go out in the garden and dig for a morning, your hands get dirty. You can brush off the dirt, but when you come in, they're still a little muddy. So you run a little water and put soap on your hands and wipe them. Then what you've got is a big soapy dirty mess that you have to run under clear water to get rid of. Only then are your hands really clean.

Dharma concepts are like soap. Worldly concepts are the dirt. We come in with all kinds of mistaken worldly concepts like "this is me," "this is my body," "these are my emotions." Those are not correct, so we have to take up dharma concepts to clean those off. But then we get stuck with the dharma concepts: "Oh, I'm all about not-self. I know you're not quite there yet, but I'm about not-self."

We don't want to attach to dharma concepts either, and that's why we need meditation to wash off the dharma concepts so the mind is just clean and bright and not fixated anywhere. But we have to really get in and apply those concepts first. Concepts like the five aggregates, dependent origination, becoming—this word bhava, what it means to take birth. We need to grapple with those until we can track them in our moment-to-moment experience. Once we've understood, then we can let go. Because all the concepts are really just encouraging us: let go, let go, let go.

But we have to apply them in every little corner where holding comes before we can let go.

Inspiration is another reason to read the suttas. There are some very moving, inspiring, dramatic passages, and we'll come to one today that I hope you'll enjoy and find inspiring.

Not so often will Western teachers say to their students, "Go all the way for liberation. Go for full enlightenment. Make that your goal." But the Buddha does it all the time. He's always saying that. It's good for us to hear that. It kind of picks up our idea of what's possible.

One of my students just got into reading the Majjhima and we were talking about this. I said, "Do you find it a little daunting that the Buddha says things like this?" She said, "No. It's great. It's great the Buddha was telling people to go for it. What else would you want the Buddha to do?"

So it's like that. You meet this voice that's talking from the depths and pointing to the depths again and again. I find that reading these texts really strengthens the quality of faith. You just get a sense of how reliable this voice is.

Now the question always comes up: how reliable is this voice? These things are 2,500 years old. They've been passed on through who knows who, through talking, through writing down in foreign languages, coming over here. How reliable is any of this? Do we know that any of this is the word of the Buddha? No, we don't.

But if you start to hang out with that voice, you get a sense of where that voice is coming from. Because one of the things I find—I think the thing I find most amazing in these texts—I've probably read close to 3,500 pages of the translations plus footnotes from these books. There's almost no internal disagreement. There are one or two statements I kind of disagree with. One or two in 3,500 pages. There are a lot I simply don't know about. There are a lot I kind of write off because they're cultural and don't seem relevant today. But when this voice, the Buddha of the Pali suttas, talks about the way things are, the way the mind is, the way we get caught, and the way we get free, I haven't seen any disagreement, any discrepancy, anything I thought was off through all those pages.

So I think it's unlikely that many different voices contributed to this. I think there are places—and the scholars can tell you more about where, Bhikkhu Bodhi, Venerable Analayo can tell you about where things have been inserted. I think it's very clear that there were editors to this work who inserted stock passages, inserted some other stories, inserted some cultural references that aren't so meaningful today. But if you listen to the sections that talk about the Dhamma—that is, the way things are—I find it completely reliable.

And that's astounding because that voice of the Buddha is talking about topics of great philosophical and doctrinal subtlety. This is not simple stuff that's being covered here. There are very small distinctions between existence and non-existence, being and non-being, that are being pointed to without any sense of two different points of view going on.

I was talking with Wes Nisker about this. After 2,500 years, it must have gotten turned around a little here and there. And he said, "Probably, but it works." That's the other thing. Even if there are some discrepancies, the gist of it works.

And so reading these texts and starting to get some trust in the fact that this works and that the voice is consistent, you start to feel that you can really have some faith in the Dhamma, some faith in the Buddha as he's portrayed in these pages.

And then something that has always interested me is, what did the Buddha really say? We hear so many things. If you sit in the hall at Spirit Rock, you will hear many different quotes. And I've listened to a lot that are not accurate—"the Buddha said this"—and I know that he didn't. So this is the way to find out what the Buddha really said about many different topics. I find it really trustworthy in that way also.

So there have been changes, there have been additions, there have probably been some deletions. I consider them relatively minor. The core of the teachings I think is very reliable here.

But I want to talk now a little bit about what's tough about reading these because there are some areas of the suttas that are really grating on modern Western sensibilities.

So the first thing that you'll see is many discourses are directed to monks and nuns. Those teachings don't work so well for lay people. And we might feel, you know, I should be taking up the practices that monks and nuns are, but we're not monks and nuns. It doesn't make sense for us to try to take up all the practices of monks and nuns when we're living as lay people.

So, simple question. What's the big dividing line between a monastic life and a lay life? Dinner. The evening meal. That's a big one. What else? Children. Sex. Money. Possessions. Movies. CDs. Fiction books. All these things are part of our lives as lay people, and they're fine. The Buddha didn't say anything against these for lay people, but they're not allowed in the monastic code.

So if we listen to a teaching that explains to monks and nuns why they shouldn't be engaging in these things, it's easy for the mind's tendency to think, oh, I shouldn't be either. But the Buddha never meant that and never said that. So we have to keep our ears up when the theme is renunciation.

Renunciation is a really powerful practice. That's what Sally taught on this morning. It's the central piece of the monastic life. Very helpful because you could say it's the lifestyle of letting go of cravings. It is an approach to spiritual life that says, anytime craving comes along for anything in the sense realm, I'm not going to follow it because I've given it up to start with. I'm not going to have an evening meal. I'm not going to have sex. I'm not going to have money. I'm not going to have children. I'm not going to have possessions. I'm not going to enjoy shows, singing, jewelry, makeup, costumes. I give up all of that.

Just reflect for a minute, what would your life be like if you gave up all those things? Let's say you could be supported, right? But you didn't have any spare money to spend. You'd have the requisites of food, lodging, shelter, and healthcare, but you didn't have any other money to spend. What would your life be like? Or without your partner, without an intimate partner, without listening to music or going to movies? You'd just about be a monk or a nun, wouldn't you? So you might as well ordain and get supported.

So all of us are in lay life essentially to have access to these sense pleasures. When you think of it, that's essentially what it comes down to. There's nothing wrong with it. Other people will choose a totally renunciate life and follow that guideline, and it works very well for them. But for various reasons, it's not so appealing for us. That's fine.

So when the Buddha gets on a rant against sense pleasures, which he does, against sexuality, which he does, you have to realize that's for monastics to support their level of renunciation. It's not directed to us as lay people. He spoke differently to different audiences.

The comment is we're somewhere in between, and I fully agree with you. This is also a really interesting place to explore. Where are you in between? To what extent do you resonate with the teachings on renunciation?

Because we have all benefited from retreats, from silent retreats, we have all tasted some of the power of the renunciate lifestyle. When you're doing a retreat up the hill here, you're slipping into a renunciate lifestyle. If you take the five precepts, you're giving up some things. If you take the eight precepts, you're giving up most everything else.

So I find this a really interesting seam to keep investigating. We make these choices day by day. Where on this spectrum from overindulgence in sense pleasures to complete renunciation of sense pleasures do we want to be? This is both a general question about lifestyle and a day-to-day question. A friend calls up and wants to go out to a concert. Do we do that, or do we stay home and meditate? Any of you could have been home watching the Packers this afternoon. Instead, you're here talking about suttas. This question about where I want to renounce and what it will benefit me is such a fascinating ongoing place to inquire, given the place that we're in.

I'll tell you the way that I think about it. I approach it in two different ways. I think of my practice when I'm at a facility like up the hill as my renunciate practice, and I plan to spend a certain amount of every year in a situation like that so that I'm carrying out a renunciate lifestyle for part of my year. When I'm at home, I play with different schedules where I renounce to different degrees.

I've actually just finished a four-week home retreat where I sit for about five hours a day, but I keep up a little bit with email. I go to the gym or exercise virtually every day, listen to a dharma talk in the evening, but I chat with my wife over meals. That's it. I don't go out for social things. I don't watch movies. I don't go out listening to music. For me, it's a lovely way to live. I could just keep going like that for a long time.

So playing with this spectrum is really fun. I encourage you to do it not out of a sense of guilt or shame or "I ought to be," but with the understanding that the idea behind renunciation is that one renounces a lesser pleasure or a lesser happiness in order to gain a happiness which is greater. The idea of renunciation is to find a deeper, truer, more reliable source of happiness. So play with that. See what things contribute to it.

The other thing that will rub—and it will probably always rub—is that the suttas are not very friendly to women. Simple example: the Buddha resisted, according to one sutta, accepting women into ordained life, even though the person asking was his stepmother, Mahapajapati, who had nursed him after his mother died, to whom he owed a great deal. It's recorded that when the Buddha agreed to accept women into ordination, he said, "Oh, but if I do this, the life of these teachings will only be half of what they would have otherwise."

Now, I have good news on this score. Venerable Analayo, who is a wonderful scholar of the text, who's reading Chinese now as well as Pali, says that he doesn't believe this part of the sutta is authentic. Through his investigations, both of the internal facts and inconsistencies in the historical record of that sutta and by comparison to Chinese sources where some fragments of the canon have survived, he doesn't believe that account is authentic—either the Buddha refusing three times to ordain women or the statement that the length of the sasana will be cut in half. So that's nice to know.

Nonetheless, there are other insults to women all along the way. In the monastic discipline, a nun who's been ordained for fifty years is supposed to bow down to a monk who's been ordained for one day. That's how the seniority goes. The most junior monk is senior to the most senior nun. These things can really upset one. Many of these traditions continue to the present day because this is dictated by the Vinaya. The Vinaya has not changed essentially since twenty-five hundred years ago. These are the rules of conduct that govern monks and nuns in the world today. They won't be changed overnight. So this is really not so suitable for our Western sensibilities.

But a few things. First, it's really clear this comes out of Indian culture of twenty-five hundred years ago. This is the way the whole society was structured. Whatever you may feel about the Buddha's creation of his own culture in the sangha, he did not go about trying to change the outer culture. He pretty much took the outer culture as it was. He talked about ways that people needed to relate to one another in partnerships and raising families, ways that kings should relate to subjects, but he did not actively go out and try to overthrow a monarchy or establish a different social order. His own sangha was very different. He threw out all the caste rules.

and he didn't go out and try to abolish the caste rules in the wider society.

What I see is that he left the outer society largely as he found it, and his own views were probably conditioned by it to some extent. He did take a significant step in admitting women at all, because generally women were not admitted to holy life at that time, so that in itself was quite radical. But he placed them in a lower status within the hierarchy.

Now, was that simply so the rest of society wouldn't react negatively and withdraw their support from the entire monastic community? Or was it because he genuinely viewed it that way? I don't know. We may never know.

Sometimes when people encounter this cultural element in how the Buddha delivered his teachings, they ask, "Well then, was he really enlightened? Could he truly be enlightened and still have those cultural blind spots?" My only response is that I believe he was free of greed, hatred, and delusion, and I also think his worldview was shaped by the society around him. Personally, I think both of those things can coexist.

This situation from the Buddha's time has continued down to the present day. I know people who choose not to support current modern Theravadan monastics because women aren't supported equally. I understand that perspective and wouldn't try to dissuade anyone from it.

My personal view is that this situation cannot and will not continue in the West, though it may take fifty, seventy-five, or even a hundred years to change because there's tremendous momentum behind the Buddhist tradition in the Vinaya. Many Western monks are deeply committed to this change—they welcome it and want to see it happen. But they can't break away entirely on their own or they'll lose their connections to their Asian roots. Many monastics find themselves in this middle ground of disagreeing with the current state while lacking the power to change it overnight.

Personally, I feel empathy for their struggle and hope that progress will come sooner rather than later. But I believe it must move forward. It has to evolve in the West, or Buddhism in that form won't survive here. That's simply my personal perspective, but it's one of the tensions you'll encounter in these teachings.

The third challenge is that intellectually, this material is quite dense. Some texts are very concise, complicated, and broad, requiring time to digest. Just be patient with yourself. Once you learn the basic vocabulary, you'll find your way in.

Here's the essential vocabulary—and I'll run through it quickly since you probably already know most of it: Four foundations of mindfulness, five aggregates, six sense bases, five hindrances, three kilesas, ten fetters, five spiritual faculties, seven factors of awakening, four brahma-viharas, twelve links of dependent origination. Once you grasp this basic vocabulary, it will carry you through most of the suttas, because the Buddha essentially taught the same core principles repeatedly for forty-five years, adding layers of subtlety.

"Can I ask a question?"

"Yes."

"The discord this creates in me is about the relationship between having a monastic system and how it exists today. You could argue that 2,500 years ago there was a necessity. But the fact that Buddhist teachings were directed so heavily toward monastic life—not to say they weren't also directed to laypeople—seems to create a pathway suggesting that this really is the way to enlightenment, as opposed to the other way. Why have a monastic system at all? I'm grappling with that. It reminds me of being raised Jewish and having Catholic friends say that if you didn't embrace Christ, you could never go to heaven. It's like, 'Oh really? If I didn't do it that way, I couldn't?' That same feeling is coming up around this, and I'd like your insight."

So the question is about why the Buddha created a monastic system. Are you asking whether he's saying it's a superior way to live, or that it's the only way?

"Is he saying it is the way?"

He is absolutely not saying it's the only way. There are records in the suttas of laypeople attaining enlightenment at all four stages, including full enlightenment.

The question is about distinguishing cultural elements from core teachings when reading the suttas, particularly regarding karma.

The way I approach this distinction is to look for fairly clear Indian cultural references—specific devas dwelling in particular heavenly realms, detailed cosmological hierarchies, and other elements that seem tied to the cultural context of ancient India. These often appear cultural to me.

However, the broader framework underlying these specifics—that there are realms of existence beyond the human realm, that rebirth occurs, and that karma determines where one lands in this cycle—these seem integral to the Buddha's description of how things actually are. Whether we can verify this from our own experience is another matter, but it's clear the Buddha presented this as fundamental truth, not cultural accommodation.

Take the Buddha's repeated assertion that "there is no discoverable beginning to this samsara—beings have been wandering in this cycle of birth and death, hindered by ignorance and fettered by craving, since beginningless time." He emphasizes this consistently throughout the texts. I don't think it's merely a figure of speech.

The teachings on karma and rebirth are so thoroughly woven throughout the suttas—book after book, story after story—that I believe they represent core elements of what the Buddha taught. Sometimes I hear suggestions that the Buddha didn't really mean these teachings, that they were just skillful means to draw in Hindu practitioners. But given how extensively these concepts appear, I think one would be misleading oneself to dismiss them as mere cultural artifacts.

This doesn't mean we have to believe these teachings. You can focus entirely on what's immediately experienceable here and now—mindfulness, ethical conduct, mental cultivation—and work with that for years, perhaps your entire life. That approach will serve you well.

When you encounter teachings in the suttas that don't resonate or feel comfortable, don't worry about resolving them immediately. Leave them as open questions. You don't need to figure everything out now, and you certainly don't need to believe everything to benefit from the path. The beauty of the dharma is that much of it can be verified through direct experience, and that experiential understanding can develop gradually over time.

The distinction between cultural and essential isn't always clear-cut, and sometimes you may need to discuss these questions with teachers or study commentaries to develop better discernment. Context matters enormously in these determinations.

You don't have to believe anything that you don't want to believe in this teaching.

In talking with Gil about this question, he offered a beautiful perspective: "If I were certain that there is no reincarnation, would you change your practice?" I thought about that and said no. I find that quite meaningful.

There's actually a sutta in the Majjhima Nikaya, number 60, where the Buddha presents this same inquiry. He asks: if you don't believe in rebirth, how would you live your life? The response comes: "Well, I'd want to be kind to people, I'd want to take care of my family, and I'd try to purify my mind so I didn't harm others." The Buddha responds, "Great."

He then asks: "And if you did believe in rebirth, how would you live your life?" The answer: "Well, I'd try to be kind to others, take care of my family, and purify my mind." The Buddha's response: "Good." So it comes out to the same.

You mentioned his teachings spanned 45 years—is that how long Ananda was connected with him to preserve all of this for us?

That's an excellent question. The Buddha taught for 45 years, from age 35 to age 80. However, Ananda was only his attendant for the last 25 years of his life. So there was indeed a period when Ananda wasn't present to record the discourses directly. Yet some of the recorded discourses seem to have occurred fairly early in the Buddha's teaching career.

I have a sense that the Buddha repeated many of these earlier teachings for Ananda's benefit at some point later on. There's a compelling example of this dynamic: In the Satipatthana Sutta, there's an encouragement to practice mindfulness on the unbeautiful aspects of the body—the asubha meditation on the thirty-two parts, contemplating what's not beautiful within us. The Buddha taught this practice and then went off on retreat.

When he returned, there were significantly fewer bhikkhus than before. Why? A number of monks had committed suicide because they were so disturbed by the unbeautiful aspects they were contemplating. Recognizing this harmful outcome, the Buddha said, "Let's not emphasize that practice so strongly. Instead, let's teach mindfulness of breathing."

This is how the Anapanasati Sutta came to be promoted—to counterbalance the emphasis on asubha meditation, which was not producing beneficial results in the monastic community. I believe this shift occurred fairly early in his teaching career.

Why don't we take one more brief break, and then we'll return to complete our exploration of the sutta.

CHAPTER 102

Week 1, Part 1: Introduction to the Suttas

Guy Armstrong · 43 min

> In this opening class of a four-part series, Guy Armstrong provides essential background for studying the Pali suttas. He addresses the cultural and intellectual challenges Western practitioners face when approaching these ancient texts, which represent a "foreign country" spanning 2,500 years of history. Armstrong explains the Buddha's teaching on three types of wisdom: suttamaya paññā (wisdom from hearing/reading), cintamaya paññā (wisdom from reflection), and bhāvanamaya paññā (wisdom from meditation), emphasizing how study complements rather than replaces direct practice.
>
> The talk traces the remarkable preservation of the suttas, from their oral transmission beginning at the First Council in Rājagaha through Ānanda's prodigious memory, to their first written recording in Sri Lanka around 100 BCE. Armstrong outlines the structure of the Tipiṭaka (Three Baskets): the Vinaya Piṭaka (monastic rules), Sutta Piṭaka (discourses), and Abhidhamma Piṭaka (detailed psychological analysis). He discusses the historical development of the 18 early Buddhist schools and the survival of only the Theravāda tradition with its complete Pali canon.
>
> This introduction prepares students for deeper sutta study by establishing historical context and encouraging an approach that combines scholarly understanding with meditative wisdom, following the example of teachers like the Dalai Lama who integrate both intellectual rigor and heart-centered compassion.

This is the first class in a series of four on the suttas, and it will be really helpful if you have a copy of the handout. There was a question earlier about whether you needed to buy a book for the class. You don't need to, because in each class we'll photocopy the text that we'll be studying. But if you want to pursue it further, I really recommend starting with the blue book called In the Buddha's Words. We'll talk about that more as we get into the study specifically.

Today's class is going to be in two parts. In the first half I want to talk about a general approach to this material because this is not the easiest material to read or study. So I want to give a little background and talk about how to approach it and why we would want to approach it, and some of the obstacles we encounter as we do.

There's an enormous distance between 21st century Westerners and the India of 500 years before the birth of Jesus. Making this transition involves questions of philosophy, history, culture, social norms, ways of seeing the world, and ways of understanding. Really, when you enter the world of the Pali suttas, you're entering a foreign country. And it's more foreign than going to India today, which God knows is unsettling enough. So you'll meet a lot of unusual people and unusual ideas, unusual practices in the pages of these texts. I want to give some perspective on how to relate to all that first, and we'll talk a little about why we bother.

In the second part of the class, I want to focus on one text in particular. That text is found in the middle-length discourses, what's called the Majjhima Nikāya. It's Sutta number 26, where the Buddha relates his own search and journey to enlightenment.

I want to talk culturally about where we are in the West today, having grown up in the 20th century and now finding ourselves in the 21st. We find ourselves with certain attitudes of mind that make it difficult to make the shift into this kind of study. For one thing, we're starting to use our conceptual apparatus—you could say our intellect, our thinking mind—when we get into the suttas. And this is something that many of us are in recovery from having overdone.

When you think about the main institutions that have formed us—schools and churches, synagogues, organized religion—neither of those have been entirely satisfactory for most of us. In the educational system, from my point of view, we've been way too intellectualized and there's not been enough attention, if any, given to the inner life, to happiness, and the possibility of development. On the other hand, in the religious sphere, Western religions have tended to focus on dogma a lot and also neglected ways to increase the sense of well-being and happiness, not given such skillful tools for inner life.

So many of us have been in kind of rebellion from our intellectual history through colleges or whatever, and we've been in rebellion from the religion that we grew up under because it wasn't speaking to us personally so effectively. As we connect with the Pali discourses, we are connecting with our intellect and we're connecting with the religious tradition. And both of those things can be off-putting. You're going to get, as we get into these suttas, a clear dose of traditional Buddhism. And it will at times seem quite religious. There will be things that resonate and things that don't resonate.

When I reflect on where we've come—Jack Kornfield and Joseph Goldstein started teaching Vipassana retreats in California almost 40 years ago, I think the first one was in 1974. So 40 years on, we still don't have an organized study program at Spirit Rock specifically for the suttas. There's DPP, which is experience and study, but we still don't have an established study program. It's kind of interesting. I think it's taken us this long to recover from the beating our intellects took growing up. And we need to combine this love of learning with a delight in the outcome.

These texts can offer exactly this combination of learning and delight. While there are some cultural adjustments we need to make, I hope you will discover genuine joy in reading these teachings and find that they truly enrich both your practice and your understanding of what you're undertaking.

From my perspective, it's not my job to convince you that everything the Buddha says in these texts is correct. My role is simply to introduce you to them and allow you to reach your own conclusions. You don't need to believe everything in these texts to be an effective practicing Buddhist. I encourage you to approach the readings with an open mind, taking what resonates with you and not worrying too much about the rest.

I will discuss some of the challenging aspects that can be off-putting, but I want to prepare you for these beforehand. Consider this a kind of inoculation—understanding what might be difficult in the Pali suttas so that when you encounter these elements, you'll have some resistance to being put off by them.

When I contemplate how I want to grow in Dharma personally, I often think of His Holiness the Dalai Lama as an aspiration. How many of you have attended his multi-day teachings? Not just a public talk, but extended teachings lasting four or five days?

Those who have know that in public talks and at the beginning of his extended teachings, he embodies the warm, outgoing bodhisattva of compassion. He can put an entire room into joyful uproar, touching people's hearts and making immediate connection on that fundamental level. He possesses this remarkable ability whether he's addressing the United Nations or speaking to 200,000 people in Central Park—he makes that direct heart-to-heart contact.

But if you stay for several days of his teachings, he transitions out of that mode into the role of pedantic Buddhist philosopher. He will explore the subtleties of the Heart Sutra, Madhyamaka teachings, or Dzogchen texts and practices with tremendous precision and scholarly rigor. So he possesses this deeply scholarly and intellectual dimension that emerges during formal teaching, alongside that beautiful heart quality that can connect with anyone when he chooses to engage it.

In my view, this is how our practice should develop. We should cultivate that engaging heart quality while simultaneously developing our understanding of these texts, because I believe it's our comprehension of the texts' depth that can point us toward corresponding depth in our meditation practice.

Until we begin to read about what's possible through Vipassana practice, we won't aspire to it. But as the texts reveal the possibilities and depth that the Buddha uncovered, we can find inspiration to go deeper, to venture further than what we've experienced ourselves. I believe that study serves as an excellent guide for our meditation practice.

At a recent teaching I attended with the Dalai Lama, he quoted an old Tibetan master—I can't recall if he even mentioned the name—who described three aspects of Dharma practice. I think this applies to us as well. This master said: "When I meditate, I bring to bear my study and my critical reflection on my meditation experience. When I study, I bring to bear my meditation and my critical reflection. When I critically reflect, I bring to bear my meditation and my study."

These three facets should engage us all in furthering our path: meditation, study, and critical reflection.

Remarkably, these were identified by the Buddha himself 2,500 years ago in a passage from the Dīgha Nikāya, where he described three kinds of wisdom.

He called the first sutamaya paññā. You probably know that paññā is the word for wisdom. Suta means hearing, and maya means "made from." So this is wisdom that comes from hearing. When you listen to a Dharma talk and begin to see things differently, when you have insights or understanding from a teaching—this represents sutamaya paññā. This was the only form available in the Buddha's time, since there were no written scriptures then. Everything was transmitted through hearing, though reading fulfills the same function today. We could say reading or hearing—sutamaya paññā.

The second level is cintāmaya paññā. Cintā means thinking. This is the wisdom that comes from reflecting upon what we've heard in light of our experience. We all need to engage in this process. We hear a teaching about the cause of suffering, about right speech, about the Eightfold Path. We must reflect: is this true in my life? As we move through different actions, times, and circumstances, we need to examine whether these teachings accurately describe what happens to us. Through this process of mentally chewing over the teachings with our thoughts and concepts, we come to verify what we've heard.

The final level the Buddha described is called bhāvanāmaya paññā. Bhāvanā means mental development and is sometimes synonymous with meditation. This represents the insights or wisdom that arises from our direct meditation practice.

When the mind has been stilled through the cultivation of samadhi and we are able to see more clearly the way things are, then insight and knowledge arises based on that clear seeing. This is the meaning of the term yata-bhuta-nyana-dasana, knowledge and vision into things as they are.

So this is the third type of insight, and this is the most liberating. Sometimes you'll get a deep flash from just hearing. Sometimes you'll get a deep flash from a reflection. But most often the liberating insights come when the mind has been stilled through meditation, and then that still mind is turned to contact with reality—that's bhavana-mayapanya.

So a complete program of Dharma practice involves all three of these aspects. In the forty years roughly that Vipassana has been available in the West, we focus so strongly on the bhavana part because frankly I think we were all in a state of emergency. I know I was. When I came into meditation practice, I had some burning suffering that I needed to have some cold relief water put on. And meditation was the direct vehicle to that.

As we continue and gain more ease in our personal lives, then I think that's a very good time to bring in the study element. We have some meditation experience, some degree of harmony. Then we can look for where the greatest depth can come. And then study plays a wonderful role here.

Tibetans have another analogy that our Dharma practice is like climbing a tall mountain. It's tall. We know there's a long way to go. But they say that meditating without studying is trying to climb the mountain without a map. But studying without meditating is like trying to climb the mountain with your feet tied together. So we really need both.

I was reminded of this map, the importance of the map piece recently. Sally and I were going on a hike with some friends. Sally's my wife and she taught here this morning, so we're doing a whole day between us. We were going on a hike with some friends and we got to the trailhead. There was a hiker already walking down the trail, so I just popped out of the car and dashed off after the hiker I saw going down the trail. But what I didn't notice—and then a few people started following me—what I didn't notice is that he was going to a dead end. But Sally didn't follow me because she'd found the map. So she figured out where the trail actually was and started going that way, and so we all had to turn around and follow her because she had the map.

So studying can let us avoid some of those dead ends. You might go a long way down a certain track before realizing it's kind of a dead end, and the study can put us back on track.

I want to talk a little bit about the background to these texts. This is one of the books that has come to us, the Middle Length Sayings or the translation of the Majjhima Nikaya. The fact that we can hold a book like this in our hands today is very improbable. These words were spoken purportedly 2,500 years ago, more than that. And the fact that they have come down in such seemingly complete—I won't say completely complete, but seemingly complete and useful form—is miraculous.

When we start to hear the story about how this book comes to be, it sounds to me like something out of Raiders of the Lost Ark. I mean there are all these mysterious things happening. There are secret texts that are filed away in hidden chambers and guarded by celibate acolytes in caves and forests for centuries and centuries while wars and kings and different struggles go on in the background, and it's amazing that it survived at all.

So I want to tell a little bit of the history of how these texts have come to us. It'll give you some sense of the rarity of what we have here.

After the Buddha died, a group of senior monks—they were all considered to be fully awakened—came together in Rajagaha in northern India in a gathering called the First Council. And they spent the rains retreat, which is three months long, in a group of caves just in the hills above Rajagaha.

There were three main players at this gathering. There were many, many enlightened beings, it said, but there were three main players. Maha Kasipa was the remaining senior disciple of the Buddha's—went back a long time, because both the Buddha's main disciples, Sariputta and Moggallana, died before him, so they were no longer available. So Maha Kasipa was kind of the senior monk remaining. He was a very strict and tough guy. He was an ascetic monk and held people to very tough standards.

The second person who was very key was a monk called Upali. And Upali had in his memory all the rules of the monastic discipline and was able to recite them at that council and so gathered up all the codes that governed the monks and nuns.

And the third person was Ananda. Ananda had been the Buddha's attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life. So he had been personally around him nearly every day. He listened to many, many discourses. And if he had missed a discourse, if the Buddha was giving it to someone else, Ananda would ask him at the end of the day, "What did you say? Please relate it to me because I want to remember it."

It was Ananda's recollection that provided the material for the suttas. Sutta, the literal meaning is thread, but the translation we use is discourse. So when we talk about the Pali discourses, these are the suttas—the actual words that the Buddha spoke during his lifetime, primarily as recollected by Ananda at that first council.

The timing of this council places it around 483 BCE, according to Bhikkhu Bodhi's estimation. While scholars debate the exact dates of the Buddha's birth and death, this translator of our text suggests that the Buddha died 483 years before the birth of Christ. The first council occurred in the six months following that time.

Now, it may seem really unlikely that one person could remember all the discourses of the Buddha. That's quite a feat of memory. But Ananda was known for having a prodigious memory. And just as a counterpoint to that, there are monks in Burma today who can recite all the suttas at will. They hold contests where senior monks will start reading a sutta anywhere—they'll pick open a book and start reading in Pali, then ask another monk to continue. The monk simply picks up and continues from that exact point. Then they'll choose a different volume and pose the same challenge to another monk. These monastics can do this flawlessly. There are monks in Burma today who have memorized the entire canon in Pali, which isn't even their native language. So I think it's entirely possible that Ananda could have remembered all of that. He had a very clear mind and exceptional memory.

Now let's examine the structure of what has come down to us. If you look at the second page of your handout, titled "An Outline of the Pali Canon," you'll see that the teachings are organized into what are called three baskets, or Tipitaka.

The first basket is the Vinaya Pitaka—the monastic rules that were recited by Upali at that first council. There are six volumes in English translation of the Vinaya. I don't know anybody who's read them all. But if you want a kind of Cliff's Notes guide to the Vinaya, Thanissaro Bhikkhu has written a wonderful book called The Buddhist Monastic Code, which explains these rules in accessible terms. It's an excellent place to explore if you want to understand what these regulations are about.

There are approximately 227 rules for monks and 254 rules for nuns. This disparity exists not because nuns are intrinsically more prone to transgression, but because their lives required more protection given the social conditions for women in ancient India. The Vinaya contains all these written guidelines and their corresponding offenses. It's essentially a complete legal system that the Buddha developed as circumstances arose, complete with penalties, judicial procedures, standards of evidence, and so forth.

The second basket is called the Sutta Pitaka—the basket of discourses where all of Ananda's recitations are collected. This is broken down into smaller collections, which we'll examine shortly.

The third basket is the Abhidhamma Pitaka, which translates as the basket of higher dhamma. It's concerned with extremely detailed analysis of moment-to-moment experience. You could say it describes human experience told completely from the perspective of no concept of self—just moment-to-moment unfolding of sensory contact, factors of consciousness, mental factors, and so on. This comprises seven volumes in the Pali Text Society edition. I also don't know anyone who's read all of these.

However, there are accessible guides. As noted on your handout, if you're interested in the Abhidhamma, an excellent introduction is A Comprehensive Manual of Abhidhamma by Bhikkhu Bodhi, which offers a readable summary of this complex material.

There is one teacher in our group who knows the Abhidhamma quite well—Steve Armstrong. He completed an Abhidhamma retreat here in October of this year, which I hear was very well received. If you're interested, I think he'll probably offer it again if we invite him back. Marianne, are we going to invite him back? You said five years? Well, we'll work on Steve to return sooner than that.

These are the three baskets. In terms of the historical background, let me share the legend behind the Abhidhamma. According to tradition, the Buddha spent one rains retreat in a heaven realm, and it's said that the Abhidhamma material had to be delivered in one sitting.

And that's why he went to the heaven realm—because it was hard to sit for three months uninterruptedly in an earthly body. In the heaven realm, his mother had taken her rebirth, and so he gave the teachings to his mother in her next incarnation. His mother died shortly after he was born. So it's said that he gave the teachings to her in one straight sitting in a heaven realm. And then daily he would manifest in his earthly body and deliver the summary of the day's teachings to Sariputta, who was considered the foremost in wisdom of all the disciples. And Sariputta collected it and that became the basis for the Abhidhamma.

Now, if you believe that, I have a bridge toward San Francisco I'd like to sell you. Scholars don't think it happened that way. Western scholars believe that the material in the Abhidhamma was collected over about 250 years after the Buddha's death and assembled by later monks. They seem in universal agreement on this process, and they can sort of track the aging of the assembly of the Abhidhamma. So if you talk to a committed Buddhist in a traditional country like Burma, they will believe that the Abhidhamma came from the Buddha himself. But if you talk to a Western scholar, they'll say, no, it was collected by later practitioners, and so actually resembles more of a commentary than a direct transmission from the Buddha.

So in these things, I tend to side with Western scholars. I have faith in their scientific approach, and I view it as a later collection, but one that has a lot of valuable insight and incredible minute understanding of the processes of mind and body. So very worth study, but not necessarily the words of the Buddha.

Whatever was around, certainly the monastic basket and the discourse basket was transmitted for 400 years only orally. There was writing at this time—500 years BCE, there was writing—but it was only used basically for record keeping with things like finances and imperial accounts. So emperors would use it to note down who had paid taxes and where they had made donations and how many bushels of grain they'd received in the recent tax year. But writing wasn't considered suitable for putting down the highest spiritual teachings because it was felt that writing could get corrupted too easily. Somebody could miswrite a word, it would be copied wrongly by someone else and the essence would be lost. They felt it was more faithful to reproduce these teachings by memorizing them and transmitting them orally from one person to another.

So what happened over these 400 years is that different groups of monks and nuns picked different sections of the text to memorize. So one group would be in charge of the first section of the Majjhima Nikaya. Another group would be in charge of the first section of the Samyutta Nikaya, and so forth. And it would be their responsibility to chant these regularly, to teach new people how to memorize them and chant them and what they meant, and to pass that on over the years.

So this went on this way for about 400 years. And in that time, these texts migrated to Sri Lanka because one of the great emperors of India, a fellow named Ashoka, became a convert to Buddhism, I think around 250 BCE, and then sent his son, I believe, as a missionary to Sri Lanka to establish Buddhism there. His son established Buddhism there. The transmission of the text was taking place. But a king came up in Sri Lanka who persecuted Buddhism. It was a threat to what he believed. So he began persecuting the Buddhist monks and the nuns and trying to destroy their religion. And as he was doing that, it's said that some of the texts were in danger of getting lost—that one section of the text, almost all the monks and nuns had died out who were responsible for that, and there was only one person left in Sri Lanka who knew those texts.

So when it got to that point, the elders said, oh wait, this is too risky. We could lose everything under this king. And so they decreed that the text should at that point be written down. So this happened about 400 years after the death of the Buddha, about 100 BCE—the first time that these texts were first written down. And they were written down in this language called Pali, which was an ancient language, alive at the time of the Buddha most likely, but it's dead today, so we don't know exactly. We believe the Buddha probably spoke Magadhan, not Pali, but Pali may have been closely related to Magadhan. That area that the Buddha grew up in was called Magadha in ancient India.

Pali is similar to Sanskrit, but it's less refined. Sanskrit has always been the high language of Indian literature, especially scriptural literature. And it's said that if you know Sanskrit, hearing someone speak Pali is like trying to speak Sanskrit with pebbles in your mouth. So it's a little cruder form than Sanskrit. But it's complete. It's philosophically refined and complex and very workable.

So the Pali suttas were alive in India. They were written down in Sri Lanka by 100 BCE. Over the few hundred years after the death of the Buddha, what happens to a big group of people after the founder dies? Do you observe this? They start arguing, don't they?

When there's not that central figure to hold it together, the arguments break out. That's exactly what happened after the Buddha's death. Arguments broke out and people started interpreting the doctrine differently. They started interpreting the monastic discipline differently. This led to a splintering into eighteen different schools in about the four hundred years following the Buddha's death.

That figure is an approximation because there are some schools that can be considered one school, or if you look at it differently, they could be divided into even more schools. But eighteen is the general number.

To give you a sense of some of the disagreements: one of the influential schools that arose to the east, the Mahasanghikas, said that monks and nuns could have money. The Buddhist discipline was always based on a vow of poverty, not handling gold and silver or money. This group said no, monks and nuns should be able to handle money. Neither side would relent, so that caused a split.

One school I really like the name of—the Pugalavadans. Isn't that great? The Pugalavadans. Their doctrine was that the self existed. They said it was somewhere between a concept and an ultimate reality, but that there was something called a self which had some real existence. Doctrinally, that's at odds with most of the other schools which say everything that you can recognize is not-self. So the Pugalavadans had a different stance.

It was only at about this point—100 BCE, four hundred years after the death of the Buddha—that the Mahayana showed up at all. Nobody knows the exact origins of the Mahayana. Their teaching is similar to the early schools, but they emphasize the path of the bodhisattva, the active role of compassion, and the central role of emptiness in understanding the philosophy. None of them are so different, but it's a different emphasis. This has formed the major divide over the centuries since—Mahayana and our school.

Now our school, the Theravada, was one of those eighteen. The curious thing is all the other schools died out. The Theravada is the only one of the early schools that has survived in practice to the current day. Fragments of other canons are around. Every school had its own canon. They would rewrite some of the scriptures. They would rewrite especially the Abhidhamma, maybe the Vinaya. No complete canon has survived except for the Pali canon, which is connected with the Theravada school.

As I read the descent and the splintering of these schools, it does seem to me that the Theravada has come down in a very straight line from the original Sangha of the time of the Buddha. Some other schools were clearly splitting off—the Mahasanghikas with their different Vinaya, the Pugalavadans with a different doctrine of self. But as I read the evolution of these eighteen schools, I believe the Theravada is a straight lineal descendant of the early Sangha. So I feel it's pretty well in line with the original teachings as far as we can know them.

When the Mahayana came along, you may have the impression—because Mahayana is almost exclusively the school in Tibet, China, Korea, Japan, Taiwan—that once the Mahayana arose, it took over. That by its intrinsic philosophical superiority and elegance of its compassionate heart, it won over all the believers it touched. It's not true.

The two schools coexisted side by side in India for about a thousand years. Some early Chinese visitors recorded their visits to India and kept journals that can still be read today. They recorded that there was actually a majority of early Buddhist practitioners as opposed to Mahayana practitioners in the monasteries they visited in India at the time.

We don't have a convenient term for all these early eighteen different schools. They're often referred to as carriers of Nikaya Buddhism. So this is the Majjhima Nikaya. Nikaya just means these collections—collection. These collections of early discourses is what the followers based their teachings on, so they were often known as Nikaya Buddhists. Sometimes it's just called early Buddhism, Nikaya Buddhism. We can't really call it Theravadan Buddhism back then, because that was just one school. But there were seventeen others at the same time that all had basically the same philosophical approach. The Mahayana took it off in a different direction.

Over the years, what has come down to us is the Theravada and the Mahayana. Later in Indian history, about the seventh century, Buddhism became very influenced by the tantric practices of Hinduism. Those tantric practices as they came into Mahayana formed, as it went to Tibet, Vajrayana Buddhism. So those are the three main schools that we have today of meditative practice.

Then, in India, around the eighth to the twelfth centuries, there were successive waves of invasion from Turkey. This is when Islam entered India. In those waves of invasion, the Muslim invaders destroyed most of the monasteries. Scriptures were burned and lost.

You can still see the scorch marks on the wood if you visit Nalanda today, not far from Bodh Gaya, where the university was destroyed by fire. In the excavations, archaeologists have found bowls that appear to have been abandoned mid-meal—people immediately putting down their food to flee the scene of invasion and destruction.

Buddhism in India essentially ended around the twelfth century. While Hinduism couldn't be wiped out because it lived in every home, on every street corner, woven into every family's practice, Buddhism could be eliminated because it was concentrated in monasteries. It was predominantly a monastic tradition, making it vulnerable to systematic destruction.

But by the time Buddhism ended in India, it had already been successfully transplanted. The Theravada school and the Pali suttas were established in Sri Lanka. Through the Silk Route, the Mahayana version traveled north through Kashmir into Tibet and China. From Sri Lanka, Buddhism extended sometime around the eighth to tenth centuries to Burma, Thailand, and Southeast Asia. Later, it could repopulate into India from these neighboring countries.

The unfolding of Buddhism across Asia tells a remarkable story. At various points, virtually all of Asia was Buddhist or largely Buddhist. Starting in India, where it coexisted alongside Hinduism for centuries, Buddhism spread west to what is now Pakistan and Afghanistan. You may remember when the Taliban destroyed those large Buddha statues in Bamiyan—those dated from the third century CE, evidence of Afghanistan's once-strong Buddhist presence.

To the east, Buddhism migrated throughout Southeast Asia and Indonesia. The magnificent monument of Borobudur in Java, built around the eighth century, stands as testament to this expansion. To the north, Buddhism became predominant in Tibet and central to Chinese culture, spreading from there to Korea, Japan, and Taiwan. Across this vast swath of Asia—from Afghanistan to Japan, including Mongolia—Buddhism flourished for many centuries, coexisting harmoniously with local traditions like Shinto in Japan, Confucianism and Taoism in China.

Today, Buddhism finds itself somewhat in retreat across Asia, challenged by the twin forces of capitalism and communism. Communism has had devastating effects in China and Tibet, while capitalism's advance in places like Thailand has diminished the energy among youth for traditional practice. Communist influence also affected Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. Yet beautifully, Buddhism is returning to India, completing a circle that began twenty-five centuries ago.

Visiting these ancient sites in India proves deeply inspiring. The Indian government now preserves and maintains the places the Buddha frequented during his lifetime, opening them to pilgrims and practitioners. Standing in these locations, you realize the incredible lineage we're part of—a tradition spanning 2,500 years that has inspired magnificent architecture, art, and sculpture, fostered large communities of dedicated practitioners, and attracted people willing to devote their entire lives to carrying forward these teachings.

We join with all of this vast heritage. It's extraordinary to realize our roots reach back so far into history, connecting us with countless generations of seekers and sages who have walked this path before us.

CHAPTER 103

Patterns of Becoming 1: Introduction

Guy Armstrong · 1h02

In this opening talk of a series on the construction of self, Guy Armstrong explores how we generate a sense of 'I' through predictable patterns of thinking, feeling, and acting. Drawing from the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta (MN 18), he examines the progression from sense contact to mental proliferation (papañca), showing how perception leads to thoughts that create our experience of becoming. Armstrong discusses the three root patterns of greed, aversion, and delusion as strategies the mind uses to cope with impermanence and insecurity. Through personal examples and contemplation of karmic patterns, he illustrates how repeated mental actions solidify into character and self-view. The talk emphasizes mindfulness of the body as essential for understanding our emotional inheritance and points toward the peace that emerges when we stop the endless cycle of becoming. This foundational teaching sets the stage for a deeper exploration of dependent origination and the path to freedom from the construction of self.

Thank you.

I want to explore with you over the next few weeks the patterns around the creation of the self in the teachings of the Buddha. I'm sure you know that the Buddha said this sense of self is not intrinsic to the experience of being a human in a body, but is something that we generate out of our views and beliefs and concepts. And at the same time, this sense of self is what limits us so strongly.

When you look at the basic human potential, we have this limitless awareness with a capacity to fill it with a boundless sense of loving kindness. That's the reality of our nature. And yet, how often do we open to that immensity? Or how often is our attention contracted and constricted and made small by this sense of self and self-concern?

You can track it moment by moment. How many moments during the day were you in that vast space of openness and boundless loving-kindness? How many moments of the day was there concern about how am I doing? So we generate this concern about the I over and over and over again out of certain predictable ways of thinking and feeling and acting. And it's this regeneration again and again in the belief in something solid being pointed to with the sense of I that creates a lot of the sense of bondage.

So I want to explore in these talks over the next three weeks how this sense of self gets put together, and then how the tools of the Dharma allow us to understand it, not be taken in by it, and return the mind to that original sense of vastness, openness, and boundlessness.

In one way the description of the limitation is really simple. Pascal talked last night about clinging and the four types of clinging. The Buddha said at one point, "Don't cling to anything whatsoever. One who has heard this has heard all the dharmas. One who has practiced this has practiced all the dharmas." That's really simple, right?

Or consider the second and third noble truths. The cause of suffering is craving. The third noble truth, the end of suffering, is the end of craving. Oh, it's so simple. So it's just craving or clinging. But each of those has lots of layers and operates in so many subtle ways in our minds and in our experience that the mechanics of suffering actually get pretty complex.

So what we want to look at is all the mechanics that go into the creation, the generation, the continuing regeneration of this sense of self because it's our fundamental human activity, reasserting the I and the mind and how that involves us with suffering and then how we can get free from it.

The concepts that I'll bring in tonight and over these talks are drawn from the very central teachings of the Buddha. So we'll touch on the Four Noble Truths, dependent origination, karma, not-self, conceptual proliferation, becoming, the end of karma, nibbana, and freedom. All these central teachings are pointing to the same thing: where we get caught and limited and small and how we release that to return to our basic openness and vastness. All the teachings are pointing to the same movement. So that's what we want to explore in some detail.

And I also have to warn you, this is the first time I've tried to put this stuff together. So it's still a little chaotic in my own mind. The risk is that you're going to get bored and I'm going to feel stupid. So just to set expectations accordingly.

The thing that I notice at the beginning of a retreat is we come into this quiet place, we don't have very much to do, we've dropped all our outer activity which was so busy and kept the mind in such a momentum of thinking and feeling and doing and planning and creating. We come into this really simple environment.

Does that mental activity stop? Not right away, does it? I mean, the first few days, that's what we hear from you a lot in interviews. "Wow, the mind is still so busy or so restless." In between, it falls asleep, but when it wakes up, it gets really busy again.

So why is that? You know, why can't we just look at the situation and say, "Oh, I don't need to be so busy now. I'm in a meditation retreat. I can just stop thinking." Why is it so difficult to stop?

I think the thing is that that level of doing has a lot of momentum. And it's driven partly out of habit and it's driven partly out of deep emotional tendencies. So we'll look at that a little bit.

But this process of stopping is very valuable in meditation. And a lot of you are mentioning how it's slowing down and sometimes coming to real peace already in these first few days. And of course this is really important. This quality of non-doing is a very high value in Buddhism. Of course we need to do in our worldly life. We need to do in our meditation. But in meditation it's all leading to this ability to not do.

Non-doing is indeed a very high value and profoundly freeing. Carol and I were on staff at IMS in the late 70s together with another good friend, Steve Armstrong, who remains close to us today. We did a staff retreat early on when we were there, and at the end of the retreat, we discovered that Steve had spent his time drawing up an advertising brochure for IMS. That's what Yogi Mind does—it gets really creative.

Steve had a set of colored pencils and created a three-page fold-out brochure advertising Insight Meditation Society. It featured things like "the vacation of your dreams: no talking, no swimming, no eating after noon, no tennis, no golf," and on and on. The motto for the center, positioned prominently at the center of the opening page, was: "It's better to do nothing than to waste time."

We can take that as a pointer. It's better to do nothing than to do lots of things, in fact. But this isn't so easy, even for people at fairly advanced levels of practice.

One of the teachers who has inspired me in recent years, and whom some of my friends follow quite closely, is a young Tibetan Lama named Mingyur Rinpoche. He has an organization that spans the world, with monasteries in Nepal and India, headquarters in Minneapolis, and thousands of students around the globe. I would say he has thousands of monks and nuns, and another set of thousands of lay students. He's a very impressive being, probably about 35 now, possessing this combination—much like the Dalai Lama—of very deep meditation practice and broad outer vision. He has many projects in the world, but he's someone who has completed extensive retreat practice and study, with a profound meditation background and philosophical understanding.

So here he was, 35 years old, with all this responsibility—monasteries, nunneries, monastic followers, lay followers. About a year and a half ago, Mingyur Rinpoche announced he was going to drop it all and go into three-year retreat. This past May, he was in Bodh Gaya preparing to leave. Everyone thought there would be time to say goodbye, wish him well, make sure he got on the right bus, and pack his toothbrush for him. Then one day he simply wasn't there anymore. People went to bring him his lunch and found his room empty. He had left without his toothbrush, his passport, or any money. He had simply walked away into the middle of India because this call toward realization through non-doing was so strong. He had felt a deep call since he was a teenager to return to three-year retreat, and he left his entire worldly organization, commitments, and responsibilities in the hands of others.

I can't tell you how inspired I was by this. This is what the old masters used to do—they would say that the realization of the Buddha's teaching is more important than trying to take care of things in the world. I really admired his example and look forward to doing something similar at some point. Not three years—Mingyur Rinpoche isn't married.

So where does all this energy behind doing come from? I want to suggest a kind of source. If we look closely, I think on some level we all know that the world isn't really a secure place. We've noticed the changing nature of things. We've tried to construct happiness over 20, 30, 40 or more years, and it hasn't really come to a lasting, solid place yet. We're aware of the impermanent and insecure underpinning of the whole enterprise.

I think it's as a defense against seeing that total amount of change, impermanence, and lack of security that the psyche wants to try to construct something lasting—and that's why it embarks on the enterprise of the self. We can't find consistency out there, so let's see if we can find it in here, in this concept around "I."

One of the ways we go about this—the "I," as you've noticed, likes pleasure and doesn't like pain—is to try to feed it. How can we keep the pleasant coming and the unpleasant not coming? And let's not look too closely at what we do while we do that.

I would say these are the three fundamental strategies of mind that let us cope with the truth of insecurity, the truth of impermanence. The first is the force of desire. Because I know things are always going to be changing, let me try to keep the pleasant coming all the time. This is the mind movement of greed or lobha.

The second basic strategy is to try to be secure by always pushing away the unpleasant. This has two modes. One is the aggressive mode, which really pushes against what's unpleasant or threatening—the mode of anger. The other is the fear mode, which instead of pushing, tries to pull back and move away from anything threatening.

Both of these are the motive force of aversion. Then the third strategy is simply not wanting to look too closely at what we're doing, because if we did, we'd see it wouldn't work. This clouding over is the work of delusion.

So these are the three poisons: greed, aversion, and delusion. Greed and aversion are always accompanied by delusion, or they wouldn't be able to sustain themselves. Delusion also keeps us out of touch with what's happening, providing another way of insulating ourselves or taking a step back from the impingement of that contact Pascal spoke about last night.

These are the three basic forces of mind, and it's important to see that these are strategies. They're not accidents that happen to have been planted in the psyche by some alien force. These grow out of the human heart. This is how we all try to cope with the uncertainty of existence, with our situation. When Carol mentioned in her talk that the essence of samsara is trying to correct, these are the mechanisms we use to carry out that correction.

You can see this in the days you've been here already. Why are the sittings not completely peaceful? Because we're trying to make the body a little more comfortable, or do away with that pain and tension that's cropped up in our shoulder blade. Or we're trying to return to that concentrated, peaceful sitting we had earlier in the day. Or trying to feel again the great loving-kindness we had for our benefactor. Or trying to push away the fear, anxiety, anger, or resentment that's arising in the moment. We keep trying to make it just a little bit better. A little bit better. And this is the action of greed and aversion supported by delusion. It keeps us from peace, from rest, from ease, and from non-doing.

This is basically the activity of the self. Now, there's another word for this kind of activity because it has motivation: this is karma. Karma in the Buddhist language is simply action with an intention or motive. So another way to describe this is that we're constantly acting, trying to get something from the situation. And it's all about myself—all these little adjustments.

Did you spend a lot of time today worrying about the global economy? Do you spend much time worrying about the unemployment rate being at 8.3 percent? I mean, maybe we should be spending more time worrying about climate change, for example. But most of our worries tend to be about me.

Ajahn Amaro, who's now the abbot of Amaravati in England, has this great talk title. He has a talk on becoming—which is also about the formation of self—and the subtitle is "Why Public Speaking is More Terrifying Than Worldwide Nuclear Destruction." It kind of is, isn't it?

Because we sense this underlying uncertainty, openness, and impermanence, we want to build a sense of I that can bring in some degree of solidity. We need to keep fortifying that sense of I because it's not inherently there. So every time a new experience comes along, we need to sweep it into this creation of self. As we go throughout our day, we take the events of the day and use them to recreate the sense of I. We generally create some kind of self-image or self-view that lasts over time, which we can bolster through this process.

We form a self-image that should extend over time so we can have the sense that the I is something. Interestingly enough, karmic patterns tend to reinforce that image. It's like the patterns and the image start to reinforce each other, so things that begin as just a single passing thought solidify over time.

This is one way it's been expressed: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit, and habit hardens into character. Therefore, watch closely the thought and let it spring from love for all beings." This quote has been attributed to the Buddha, but I haven't been able to find it in the texts and I don't know the source of it.

But I want to read it again because it's quite important: "The thought becomes an intention. The intention manifests as an action. The action develops into habit, and habit hardens into character."

You know, especially at my age, having observed a lot of the passing years and seeing the formation of character, I really feel the reality of this. And once character is formed, it's not so easy to undo. I wish I had known this when I was twenty, because character is really so much more malleable when we're young. So I really just want to welcome all the young people in the audience and express how happy I am that you are receiving this wisdom while you're growing up, when you still have so much openness available.

It's interesting that neuroscience is confirming a lot of this. The formation of character out of habit that's repeated many times is captured in what neuroscientists say: neurons that fire together wire together. As they repeat and repeat and repeat a similar associated action, they get wired together in a way that makes it likely that pattern will happen again and again. I was curious about the source of this quote and thought perhaps it had come out of recent research in the last ten years. Actually, this came from a neuropsychologist in 1949, so this understanding has been around for quite a while.

Our own actions—of mind, of speech, and of body—really shape the mind and its patterns, its habits, the character that gets formed from them, even when it's not appropriate to the setting. Just like coming in from a busy life, the momentum of our thinking actions carry over into here.

There are many different patterns that happen for people. The one that I brought into meditation was a habit of fear. I can sort of trace the origin of this in my early twenties. I had some very confusing episodes as I was getting into early adulthood that left me with a lot of fear in my body, which then came out as I got quiet and meditated.

One year in England in the early eighties, I'd gone over to do a period of retreat with Christopher Titmuss and Christina Feldman. This was the forerunner of Gaia House, called East Farmhouse—a beautiful little rented house out in the country in Wiltshire, not far from Salisbury. It was rented from a retired colonel from the British military who didn't have a clue what we were doing there.

One of the people in the organizing group was an honorable—that means he's the son of a lord, and he can put "honorable" on his checking account. When the colonel saw that there was an honorable involved in the organization, he said, "He must be a good guy. Son of a lord—I'll rent the house to him." So the honorable's name was on the lease, but the colonel didn't know what was going on in the house. He would periodically drop in to visit.

So he came at one time during a meditation period, and they showed him around the house—he wanted to make sure things were being taken care of. They took him into the conservatory and the kitchen and the front room. But the meditation hall in this little house was in a small back room that looked out onto the back garden—you might call it a drawing room or a parlor.

They felt they had to show him that room too. Well, that's where the meditation was going on. They opened the door for the colonel, who of course had no idea what was happening. It happened to be a period of standing meditation—twenty-five people standing stock still and silent in the middle of the colonel's drawing room. They opened the door and he looked upon this sight. Then they closed the door, and all he could say was, "Well, you certainly have them well trained, don't you?"

So that was our summer at East Farmhouse. It was really a beautiful location. We were there in July, and one evening—the colonel was not there—I was doing standing meditation in the back garden. My eyes were closed and I was standing out on the grass. This fear was coming, as it came often in those days in my practice. I was just trying to be grounded and feel it in the body and open to it in the mind. It just kept coming.

For some reason, in the middle of that standing meditation, I just decided to open my eyes.

And I was standing next to a tree that was in bloom. The petals were scattered all around me. The sun was going down and the garden was bathed in that golden light of evening's last rays. The birds were beginning their twilight calls, preparing to settle for the night. The whole scene was held in this soft British air, with just enough humidity to make it feel like something out of a storybook—like something from Jane Austen. It was so beautiful, so soft, so utterly reassuring.

I just thought to myself, "Wow, it's really a scary world, isn't it?" Here I was in this state of fear in a beautiful and completely safe environment. The fear had no relation to where I was or what I was doing. It was so out of place. But that's what happens with these patterns, these karmic patterns. I was simply continuing to frighten myself for no reason whatsoever.

These habits, these patterns that we find ourselves in, come into the mind and naturally they come into the body as well. So often as we come to practice, we see the movements of mind and feel those directly in our body. This is why it's so important that we begin retreat—and I really trust everyone who's practicing this way—by learning to bring mindfulness throughout the body, so that we can truly feel the life of the body, make space for all the emotions that live there, and get to know our emotional life through meeting it in the body.

Sometimes there's a lot of old information stored there that we need to really fill with our awareness, pervade with our awareness, so that it can be felt and then released. This mindfulness of the body, which is the first foundation the Buddha taught, is so essential for coming to know ourselves and connecting with this heritage of our own karma, our own actions—mental actions and outer actions.

All these past actions create patterns that express themselves in our feelings, in our thoughts, and then in our actions in life. I'm sure you can see in your own personality what some of these patterns are. Everybody has patterns of strength that come from wholesome qualities: kindness or generosity, understanding, happiness, contentment. Those patterns fill one's life. And we all work with patterns of difficulty.

As meditators, you've probably become quite familiar with what those patterns are for you. For many of us in meditation, these patterns of our mental actions become the single biggest challenge in life as we come to understand our makeup and conditioning—the patterns that live within us, within our mind and within our body.

The one I had to work with for a long time was fear, and I received a great deal—I really appreciate its presence because I learned so much from it. For others, it could be self-judgment or shame. It could be various kinds of addiction or dependencies. We all work with different aspects of these legacies.

When people have been abused early in life, sometimes the patterns they're left with are not so much from their own generation, their own creation, as what has been imposed on them through that mistreatment. But nonetheless, they continue to live until they're understood and can be released. There's not as much of a sense of ownership with them.

We start to understand ourselves in this way, and these patterns and our self-view begin to reinforce each other. I understood myself as someone who was fearful. Then the fear would continue, and that would confirm this understanding, this view, which would hold it in place. The self-view supports the pattern. The pattern supports the self-view. How do we work beyond it?

There's an interesting sutta that describes how some of this gets rolling. It's called the Honeyball—number 18 in the Majjhima Nikaya. There's a story with many of these suttas, so I want to tell the story as well, because you get a glimpse of the life of the Buddha and the culture of that time in India. This was about 500 BCE.

The Buddha was living at this time in Kapilavatthu, which is where he had grown up. After much wandering, he returned periodically to the place of his childhood. Many of his monks and close disciples came from there, including his attendant, Ananda. Ananda is with him in this story, so we assume this is in the Buddha's later years, because Ananda became his attendant for the last twenty-five years of his life—from the time he was fifty-five onward. So let's say the Buddha was in his late middle age, probably somewhere between fifty-five and sixty years old. He was quite established as a teacher by this time and never betrayed much self-doubt. He had developed great confidence by this point.

So he was in meditation when someone approached him whose name was Dandapani. From the name and the commentary, the name refers to a stick, and we understand that he was walking with a stick—a golden stick, according to the commentary. Even though Dandapani was a young man, he carried this golden stick, giving the impression that he was something of a dandy, as the name suggests.

At this time in India, spiritual seekers delighted in debating one another. It was like ultimate cage fighting, but on a verbal level. If you could knock the other person out of the ring, you established yourself as the best teacher in that area.

Dandapani probably came from that background when he approached the Buddha. After what the text calls "courteous greetings"—though one wonders how courteous they actually were—he stood to one side, leaned on his stick, and asked the Blessed One: "What does the recluse assert? What does he proclaim?"

This was not a very respectful greeting for the time, so you get the feeling Dandapani was just waiting for the Buddha to say something so he could launch an attack.

The Buddha, who was no fool, replied: "Friend, I assert and proclaim such a teaching that one does not quarrel with anyone in the world."

That response cut the ground right out from under Dandapani. When this was said, Dandapani shook his head, wagged his tongue, and raised his eyebrows until his forehead was puckered in three lines. Then he departed, leaning on his stick.

We can see that Dandapani was frustrated by the Buddha's refusal to engage in contention with him. The Buddha then related this story to the monks and went off for a rest. The monks, talking among themselves, wondered: "What exactly did the Blessed One mean by a doctrine whereby one doesn't dispute with anyone?"

A senior monk named Mahakaccana was present. Mahakaccana was said to be the monk who was foremost in explaining in detail what the Buddha had explained in brief. So they asked him what the Buddha meant, and Mahakaccana delivered the bulk of this sutta.

He explained it like this: "Dependent on the eye and forms, eye consciousness arises. The meeting of the three is contact."

As Pascal mentioned last night, when the eye is working and there are sights to be seen, these come together in eye consciousness—the experience of seeing. This is what we're doing all the time when our eyes are open. Eye consciousness is arising with different content as different forms and sights meet us.

"With contact as condition, there is feeling." Again, as Pascal explained, this feeling can be either pleasant, unpleasant, or neither. This is how we get impinged upon all the time with this changing array of pleasure and displeasure in life.

"What one feels, that one perceives." Now we're getting close to the heart of the sutta, which is this quality of perception. Perception means something a little different in Buddhist terminology than in Western philosophy or psychology. In Western thought, perception typically refers to the sense data itself—I perceive means I have a sight.

In the Buddhist teaching, that's called contact or seeing consciousness. Perception is a higher-level function of the mind, more cognitive, that recognizes what has been seen and puts it in a category. In looking around this room, what we really see is patches of form and color—that's all the eye actually sees. But then there's this organizing principle in the brain that puts everything into categories, and we see men and women and cushions and chairs, walls, lamps, doors, paintings, and so on.

That recognition piece is the act of perception. We're classifying the world into categories that we know based on memory. Perception is a fascinating thing to investigate because the world kind of springs up from perception, and that's what this sutta is pointing to.

"What one perceives, that one thinks about." This is true, isn't it? When we recognize something, we'll often start to think about that thing we've just seen.

"What one thinks about, that one mentally proliferates." And here's the catch—we don't just think about things in a simple way.

"That's a thangka of the Buddha. It's painted in the Tibetan style. It represents Shakyamuni Buddha, who is Gautama Buddha in our tradition," and let it go like that. But we start going, "Wow, that is such a cool thangka. I'd like to have one like that in my living room. Now, Marianne has some art down in the bookstore. I know I shouldn't go down during the retreat, but if I don't, somebody else might get there first. And I do have my checkbook. It's up in my room, but I could go now, right after the sitting, and get the checkbook and go down and look for that thangka. And if they don't have a thangka like that, I think a metal Tibetan Buddha would be just as good. I saw last time I was in there, there were some bronze ones, there were some gold ones. One was a little more expensive, but oh, my checking account is so low. Uh-oh. I don't know if I have enough money to write a check. What? Could I call my partner who's at home and get them to deposit a check into my account? If they write my bank number on the back, the bank will accept the deposit. Now, what is my bank number? But I'm not sure my partner has enough money for the Buddha either, so I better call a friend."

This is where the proliferation starts from just the thinking. And this is described by the Pali word papañca. It's much nicer than proliferation. Papañca.

So this is where the trouble begins. Because as we start to mentally proliferate, we don't always stay in neutral territory. It's only a few steps from the thangka to our checkbook to the absence of money in our checking account. How are we going to get it there? And so on. And that creates anxiety and worry. So because the "I" is so central, our thoughts tend to run around the "I," and that creates disturbance.

And so this is what the Buddha points to—actually Mahākaccāna, but essentially the Buddha—points to in the next line: "With what one has mentally proliferated as the source, perceptions and notions tinged by mental proliferation beset a person with respect to past, future, and present forms cognizable through the eye."

Perceptions and notions beset a person. So listen to how this is unfolded. At first, it's just kind of a passive process. Eye consciousness arises. With contact as a condition, feeling arises. That's just passive. It's just happening, impersonal.

Now we turn to action. What one feels, that one perceives. So now there's kind of an active mental component, which is the recognizing and classifying of the thing. What one perceives, one thinks about. So once we've identified the thangka, then we think about it a little bit. Tibetan thangka, Buddha image, Gautama Buddha. So this is active, but it's not really yet problematic because it's staying close to the source. We're still in charge, as it were.

But notice what happens in the next line: "With what one has mentally proliferated, perceptions and notions beset one with regard to past, present, and future." All of a sudden, we're not in charge anymore, but stuff is starting to assault us. Based on past associations, based on our patterns, based on our karma, based on our clinging and cravings, we become the victim of our own thoughts and feelings.

So these thoughts and feelings come together. Sometimes a thought triggers a feeling. Sometimes a feeling triggers a thought. They run together. And papañca brings it all back to us. So we expose ourselves to kind of the craziness of the mind just running on at that point. And that's the activity of papañca.

And it starts from perception. That's what the sutta is pointing to—this first recognition of a thing. So if we just say man, woman, chair, wall, door, light, there's nothing too charged, right? That's pretty easy.

But what if the perception is of something that we care about? Let's start with something simple. If I say "car," you can perceive that, right? It brings up an image. Fairly neutral. Car—pretty generic. It's a tool we all use.

What if I say "Prius"? How do you feel? We like Prius. Environmentally friendly. My friends drive them. Fifty miles to the gallon. Not so expensive. Uses electricity. Good feeling, right?

Now what if I say "Hummer"? How does that feel? Oh, too big. Gas guzzler. Uses too much petroleum. Pollutes the atmosphere. Not so happy about Hummer.

So we have different perceptions based on our values. Or you could say that perception carries a felt meaning. There's some kind of mood with this action of perception. And it's the felt meaning which we've acquired through association, through our own investment, that triggers a lot of the feelings with perception.

Simple example. I did a six-week retreat one year doing loving-kindness practice at IMS on the East Coast, and my difficult person was on the retreat. So I would go along and I was having a lot of metta—self, benefactor, friend. It was rolling really well. Then my difficult person would walk across my field of vision. Perception of difficult person, and I'd spin out into anger. I'd remember all the difficult things that had happened in the past year. And I could be lost for ten minutes, twenty minutes, thirty minutes.

I'd been in a state of a lot of metta. My body was soft and open and relaxed. And then I moved into this anger, and it was like everything turned into a steel trap. It was so painful to go into that. So it took me quite a while to learn how to work with that situation again. And it came out of all the past associations that I had with that person and then all the papañca that came in relating to the past, what I might say in the future—that whole range of relationship stuff based on the papañca, based on the perception.

Here's another one: empty chair. Pretty neutral, right? What's the big deal about an empty chair?

But depending on the setting, empty chair can have really different perception qualities. So if I'm in a social setting—could be a meeting, could be a conference, could even be a retreat—and I get to the dining room early, and I sit at a table where nobody else is sitting, but I have two empty chairs beside me, that feels fine. As the dining hall starts to fill up and all the other chairs are filled in, if my chairs are still empty, oh, that starts to feel a little weird. I start to feel isolated, unlikable. "Oh, nobody wants to sit next to me. What's wrong with me?"

Nobody likes me.

So the empty chairs start to take on a threatening quality—I begin to perceive them as something menacing. And then somebody comes along and sits in one and I feel so grateful. Oh, I've been rescued. Rescued from my loneliness. Thank you.

So that's one empty chair experience. This relates to how papañca, according to the teachings, comes in three flavors. It can be generated out of craving, out of views, or out of the comparing mind. This particular scenario was generated out of some view—oh, maybe people don't like me, maybe there's something wrong with me. Some view about myself, about not being self-worthy.

Here's another papañca example with an empty chair. I'm on an airplane with the aisle seat, having gotten on early. People are boarding, and I'm watching everybody come down the aisle. I feel genuine compassion for people because traveling is so stressful these days. Here comes a mother down the aisle with two children, carrying all their gear as well as her carry-on. I feel tremendous compassion and friendliness toward them.

The airplane is filling up, getting nearly full, and the seat next to me is still empty. Wow. Now I really like the empty chair. I might have a whole flight from San Francisco to Boston with an empty seat next to me. Suddenly everybody coming down the aisle becomes a threat. I hope they don't take my empty seat. I don't want them to sit there. And if they look like they're about to, I become genuinely aversive.

This time, the perception is that the empty chair protects my space—this is the craving aspect. I like my space on a long flight. Same empty chair, but a completely different perception based on that particular assumption or papañca. The first example was the view component; this one is the craving component.

Let me share another example of perception. When I was sitting that retreat over Thanksgiving, we spent quite a few hours in the hall during the day—about eight hours total with everything combined. Some periods were quite long, and my legs would get sore. I'd adjust my posture in the middle of a sit or during a talk, trying to sit through but getting better as the days progressed.

There was a monk on the retreat, sitting up front, who would come in for the afternoon sit. He'd settle down on his cushion at about two o'clock. We'd break for walking period—I'd get up and walk, come back in, sit. He was still sitting. We'd sit through the next period or talk, then get up again. He'd still be sitting there. He would start at two and continue until about five without moving.

Meanwhile, here I would be, squirming after an hour or so. I'd tough it out, then get up for walking meditation, thinking to myself, "Oh my God, I'm such a crummy sitter."

After all these years I'm supposed to be a meditation teacher and I can't sit like that. Here he was, younger than me, though admittedly with many years of monastic training and countless hours of sitting. I thought, I'm such a crummy meditator.

Then at the end of the retreat, one of the other women who had been sitting approached me. "Wow," she said, "you really sat well this retreat. You sat like a rock." I couldn't believe it. I was squirming all the time, but apparently when she looked at me, she saw someone sitting absolutely still. In her mind, I was a good sitter because she was comparing herself to me. But when I compared myself to the monk, I was not a good sitter.

The same experience, yet entirely different depending on whether you're comparing up or down. It's all relative. There's no intrinsic worth to my sitting on that retreat, but I could feel either inferior or superior, depending on where I chose to place my attention, how I chose to perceive.

These are really simple things—empty chairs, length of time sitting. But what if the perception involves your partner, your child, your parent, your body?

A couple of weeks ago, Sally and James and I had the opportunity to visit an anatomy lab at a college in Santa Cruz. We spent time sitting and standing next to bodies that students had dissected. These were cadavers from a hospital, and the students had dissected them quite thoroughly.

I found myself standing with half a skull in my hand that still had the brain in it. At first, when we stood next to the bodies, the faces were wrapped in cloth. We could see the opened bodies and examine the organs. Partway through, the professor removed the wrappings from the faces, and it became deeply moving.

The particular body we stood beside first was an elderly man. He was quite small—not that tall to begin with, and as we age, we shrink. As we approach death, we tend to shrink even more. His face held an expression that wasn't passive. It didn't look like he had died in complete peace. His mouth was open, and there was a suggestion of anguish at his death. It was profoundly moving because you could sense the end of his life in his facial expression. And it wasn't going to change.

The purpose of these reflections and experiences is to imagine: what if that was me? What if I'm looking at my own face as a little shrunken old man? This could happen next year, or in ten or twenty years, but it's going to happen. What if I was looking at myself?

This is a perception with the power to trigger papañca—a perception that can grab us based on our clinging to this body, our investment in loving and caring for this form we've tended for so long. While many perceptions we encounter throughout the day are fairly light, some come along that are quite striking.

We want to start noticing when a perception forms that we begin to proliferate around. What are the moods and emotions that arise in that proliferation? Because of both our self-image and the patterns of mind we've developed over countless actions, we have predictable responses to things. As meditators, we begin to know our own patterns: I'm a fearful person, or greedy, or aversive, or shameful, or self-critical, or addictive.

We start to see how when we meet new incidents and perceive something, the proliferation spun off from that perception—the way the mind spins out around it—recreates our sense of self. The sense of self is not intrinsic to that experience. Like the empty chair, there's nothing inherent there. But my perception of it can fill it with content from my patterns, my karma, my mental habits, my emotional inclinations.

So we want to be alert to this. When we spin out, how are we spinning? What is the response showing us about the "I," about the self? And is it possible at times that we have a perception—even around something meaningful and charged—and we don't spin out? What's the quality of that experience? What's the quality of that kind of moment when we have a perception that may be meaningful, yet we don't proliferate around it?

It may be deeply felt, but we don't spin out through over-proliferation about it. What happens then? We're holding that experience in the silence. We're receiving that experience. We can feel it—we can feel the pathos of it, we can feel the compassion in it, we can feel the loving kindness in it—but we're not spinning out with it. We hold it in this silence which has a kind of intrinsic peace.

And so there's not the creation of the self again. There's not the regeneration of the self-image. There's not the reconnecting to that old pattern, which is our way of becoming and finding a self-identity to establish ourselves in.

Likes and dislikes, which we do constantly, are largely about establishing "me" again. We meet someone, and we have to decide whether we like them or not. Why? Because that recreates the self with its tastes. Instead, we can just see—there's that person. We can feel their essence, but we don't have to take a stand for or against. Then we're not recreating the self with its wanting and not wanting, its likes and dislikes. Things are just held in this great spaciousness.

This is what we're developing here: the ability to hold experience in this great kind of non-reactive spaciousness that sees things as they are. When the old patterns come in, they tend to blind us to a degree. They narrow the sense of possibility in our universe to the predictability of self, and so we're just recreating this limited world again and again.

When we start to discover this place of quiet and peace, we begin to open up to a much greater range of possibilities. Things can touch us more deeply, and we start to experience that there's a greater choice in how we respond to that situation, how we respond to life in that moment. This is the dawning of freedom. It has to do with this quality of openness that's not covered over with all the conceptual activity.

This is the pointer to the end of karma going on and on in its predictable patterns. As we find these openings through our meditation of peace, we start to see this unending flow of karma, which is wrapped up with self and the patterns and the self-view and the reinforcing of limits again and again. We can step out of that—or better to say, we don't step out of it. It is halted. That flow of becoming is halted. Then we are at peace with that original openness and vastness that is our nature, that is our birthright.

So this is the discovery. This is the unfolding. This is the release. That peace is not a constructed thing. That silence is not a constructed thing. It's what happens when we stop doing. When we stop doing, that peace is revealed.

We have come out of—I don't know if you remember from the opening night when I talked about the Buddha's quest—searching for something beyond birth and death, something beyond the constant law of change. This peace is beyond birth and death. This silence is beyond birth and death. This stopping is beyond birth and death. As we start to touch that in our meditation practice, we're beginning to get the glimmer of something that lets us step outside the endless cycles of birth and death. We step outside the round of becoming and find our place of ease in the deathless, in the unborn.

I mention this so that you can start to look for those periods of quiet. Now, I don't want to say that's the end of the journey. This peace is onward leading. It unfolds more and more, ultimately—the Buddha says—up to the fullness of liberation. But this is the entry point. Once we have this, we have the taste of the goal. Then we just need to keep walking until we reach it.

Thank you for your attention. We'll continue to develop this theme in further talks.

Let's just sit for a minute in quiet together.

A final word from the Buddha: "In my enlightenment, I discovered the unborn, unaging, unailing, undying, supreme security from bondage, nibbana."

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 104

Patterns of Becoming 2: The Five Aggregates

Guy Armstrong · 1h00

> In this illuminating dharma talk, Guy Armstrong continues his series on patterns of becoming by examining the five aggregates (pañca-khandha) as described in the Mahāpuṇṇama Sutta (MN 109). He explores how we construct the sense of self through identification with material form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). Armstrong demonstrates the Buddha's analysis of twenty ways we create self-view through these aggregates, showing how we regard each aggregate as self, as possessing self, as containing self, or as contained in self.
>
> The talk includes the powerful teaching given to Bāhiya, where the Buddha instructs: 'In the seen, let there be just the seen' - pointing to experience without the added sense of 'I' or 'mine.' Armstrong emphasizes the practical application of recognizing 'this is not mine, this I am not, this is not myself' (netaṁ mama, nesohamasmi, na meso attā) as a way to cease the constant creation of selfhood. Through understanding the aggregates as impermanent, unsatisfactory, and not-self, practitioners can develop disenchantment, dispassion, and ultimately liberation from the cycles of becoming.

The talk tonight is on patterns of becoming two, the five aggregates. This is the second in a series of talks on this theme of how we generate the sense of self based on changing impermanent aspects of our experience and how that happens in familiar and continuing patterns of becoming.

Last time we talked about this process based on the factor of perception and the proliferation based on what we perceive or papañca. Tonight we're going to talk about it from the point of view of the five aggregates. And next week I'll talk about it based on dependent origination and also put more emphasis on the release factor, how we get free from these cycles.

But in all three of the talks, the basic theme is the concept that the self is not a steady, intrinsic, ongoing part of our experience, but is rather something that we generate over and over again by our own volitional actions. So tonight we're going to look at another way that that generation happens.

And this formation of self isn't a trivial thing. It's the root of our bondage. It's the root of the misunderstanding, the root of ignorance with which we approach existence. I want to take a kind of big view for a moment and say that it is based on our coming into existence as an individual embodied being in life. And it's this individual embodiment that is partly responsible for the sense of separation that we mistakenly take to be ultimate or absolute in some way, but isn't truly an ultimate or absolute separation from other beings or from nature. But we mistakenly take this individuality to be confirmation of a separate ongoing self.

Now in modern Western culture, this taking birth is supposed to be a thing of great celebration. Oh, you're so lucky to have been born and life is so wonderful and it's all to be celebrated. But from a Buddhist perspective, this taking birth is a little bit problematic because taking birth also involves us in aging, illness, and death. Not only that, but this individual separateness, seeming separateness, also leads us to a sense of isolation, loneliness, and then fear. We feel cut off from the root of our being, which is nature in its many aspects, both physical and mental.

So again, the biggest picture we might reflect on is how this came to be. Rumi has a nice little poem that points to this when he says, "Where did I come from? And what am I supposed to be doing here? I have no idea." I really like his honesty. This is our situation when we wander into the spiritual path. We don't really know what this life is supposed to be for or about. We may still not.

So I love this pointing because there's this deep mystery at the root of our individual existence. How did this come to be? How do we find ourselves in this world of so much beauty and so much suffering, with a quality of intelligence and compassion and capacity for wisdom with all these other beings? It's extraordinary.

When I was sitting my first three-month course, a friend of mine, somebody I got to know on the retreat, came up to Joseph Goldstein, who was teaching the course, in quite a state of urgency. She grabbed Joseph in the hallway and took him by the arm and said, "Joseph, why are we here?" And Joseph said, "Do you mean here on this retreat or here at all?" And she said, "Here at all. Why are we here at all?" And Joseph said, "Because you wanted to see and smell and taste and touch and hear."

That's an interesting comment, isn't it? The Buddhist understanding is basically that we were drawn back into birth by sense desire, by wanting to experience what could be experienced through the five senses. But then that's what gets us in all this situation involving birth, aging, illness, death, and all the complications of living.

Nisargadatta Maharaj was a great teacher in India. He lived in Bombay and died in the early 90s, who wrote a book about his teachings called I Am That, which for my taste is second only to the Buddha's teachings for depth and power and beauty. And Maharaj put it this way: "The desire for embodied existence is the root cause of trouble."

So this wanting to experience the things of the senses is what involves us in all the difficulty of life. And this is the cycle of samsara, wanting again and again and again to have this kind of sense contact.

And again from Maharaj, "All yogas have only one aim, and that is to save you from the calamity of separate existence." So that's also the purpose of the Buddhist teachings. So maybe the way to be saved is to question this sense of separation, this sense that we are actually an isolated self going through this journey.

So we can take a closer look at the creation of this sense of I. Really, for all of us, before we encounter the Dharma, the I is the center of the universe. Even after we encounter the Dharma, for a long time, the I is the center of the universe. Everything revolves around this me, and it seems so self-evident, but have you ever been able to locate it? Have you ever been able to locate this self, this thing called I? Where is its hiding place? Where is it found?

The philosopher William James put it this way: "When I search for myself, all I can find is a tickle at the back of my throat."

The Dalai Lama offers us profound guidance here: when we are certain that something exists but cannot actually find it, this is a sure sign of delusion—evidence that we aren't understanding correctly. The classical analogy illustrates this perfectly: imagine walking along a path in the woods, seeing something lying on the ground and being absolutely certain it's a snake. You jump back in fright, but when you look more closely, you discover it's merely a piece of colored rope twisted together.

This is exactly our usual habit with the self—we see it and think it's a snake. But the purpose of yoga and dharma practice is to investigate carefully. When we finally see things as they truly are, there's no more fear. This is the understanding the Buddha spoke about.

Part of this confusion around "I" is created by our very language, and we can easily observe this confusion through some of our habitual ways of talking and thinking. Let me ask you a few questions to illustrate this.

First: How tall are you?

This isn't a difficult question. I would say I'm 5'10". When I say "I'm 5'10"," I say it without thinking twice—it's automatic. Whether you're 6 feet or 5'4", whatever it may be. Here we are equating the "I" with the body. The body is 5'10", so we're saying "I am the body, and I am 5 feet 10 inches tall."

Now let me ask another question: What color are your eyes?

Easy question. I'd say my eyes are brown. But here you are suddenly not the body—you're not the eyes. You're the owner of the eyes. "These are my eyes." So are you the body, or are you the owner of it, somehow separate from it? You can't really be both, can you? Not logically.

What if we look at the mind in the same way? Sometimes we say "I'm happy" or "I'm sad," equating ourselves with the feeling—"I am happy, I am sad." Other times we talk about "my joys and my sorrows." So again, are we the emotion, or are we the owner of the emotion?

These are contradictory ways we use "I." But perhaps the most persistent way we feel the "I" is imagining it's somehow located right behind the eyes in the center of the head, always looking out on the world. We imagine it's what receives all the impressions of sight and sound and smell and taste and touch—some kind of observer back there that's really receiving everything and pulling all the levers, like a command and control center.

Not there either.

All these ways of thinking are incorrect. The Buddha put it quite straightforwardly: there is no self to be found. One of my teachers put it even more bluntly: "You are not there."

These ways we imagine the self to be cannot be verified empirically. They're simply not true. You cannot find such a self within the mind-body system.

But let's go a little further. Let's examine this formation of self more closely.

When we look around this room and see all the people here, as we look, we normally think: "that's a person, that's a person, that's a person." In the Visuddhimagga, one of the ancient commentarial texts from the 6th century, they say that someone who looks and sees "a person" hasn't studied the situation very closely.

They offer this analogy: if you're a skilled butcher carving up cattle to sell pieces of meat, as you're cutting, you don't think "cow, cow, cow." You think "rump, sirloin, tenderloin, ribs," and so forth.

In the same way, someone who has closely examined human experience doesn't simply say "person." They've looked much more precisely than that and have developed more accurate categories.

So when the Buddha looked, I don't think he saw "person." I think he saw in a much more refined way—examining the whole field of human experience and asking: What actually constitutes a human being?

So it's mind and body and all the experience. One way is the six senses: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and the objects of mind. That's one way that he often used to describe human experiences. He used it again and again and again. It maps very nicely onto our meditation practice. A lot of the instructions follow this schema of the six senses, and it's a complete description of human experience. Everything that happens fits within it.

The Buddha employed this device mainly to cut through cravings. He talked about how pleasant experience arises at the six sense doors and how we want it to be a certain way and don't want it to be another way. So the six sense model is used to cut through craving.

But the other way that he described again and again our human experience was the five aggregates. And this model he used to cut through wrong view. The formation of self, the belief in self, is wrong view. The best way in the Buddhist description to undo that is the five aggregates. So that's what we're going to explore tonight—how self gets generated around the five aggregates and how to loosen that identification.

Just as we learn to see ourselves and others through this map of the five aggregates, we learn to see the way the Buddha saw. And we learn to see without the false sense of I or self. And that's the power of it. We align ourselves with right view and that uproots wrong view in the mind.

Some people have told me they find this theme kind of intellectual and not very interesting. For that reason, it seems a little too abstract. And I just want to say that the time that this schema came alive for me was after the death of one of my older sisters. It was about fifteen years ago now. She was five years older than me, and she died when she was reasonably young in her early fifties. And she died quite suddenly. She'd been relatively healthy. She had a long-term illness, but she was quite healthy up until actually the day of her death. So it came as a shock to all of us, and I'd been on the phone with her just a week before, and she was very alive and vital.

My sister was a strong personality. I loved her. I was close to her. Very energetic presence in her family and our family, and a delightful person. And when she died, I really had a hard time understanding how someone who had been so solid a week before could just not be there anymore. And I went through a period of grief that lasted a couple of months and darkness and depression and so on.

And then as I was in that and starting to come out of it, I really had an urgency to understand what death meant or what is dying. What happens when a human being dies? And the way that I came to understand it that made the most sense was through the five aggregates. And so it helped me really come to terms with what is living here and in death, what goes? And how do they get—how does what leaves get separated from what remains? It's so mysterious.

The five aggregates will be the topic. The word in Pali is khandha, the five khandha. In Pali, it just means heap or bundle. The Sanskrit word is skandha. You might hear it referred to by either of those terms. And it's just a common, ordinary term in the day. So it could be thought of as the five heaps that make us up, the five bundles that make us up. Aggregate sounds a little too technical to me, like we're on some road-building exercise and there's asphalt and gravel and all that. I'm not so fond of it, but it's the common usage.

The translation, though, that I like best is kinds of stuff. So these are just the five kinds of stuff that make up you and me. And I don't think any of it is too hard to come to terms with.

So the five kinds of stuff that make us up are material form, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. Some of these we've talked quite a lot about already, so I'll touch on them briefly, but I want to go into each of these five.

So the first one is material form, or usually tonight I'll just say form, but it means matter. So the Pali word is rūpa.

But most drug dealers, it turned out, did not like Montovani. They found it deeply unpleasant. So when the Montovani music came on, they would scatter just as effectively as when the police showed up. The store manager never had to call the police again—he just turned on the Montovani.

This illustrates perfectly how feeling tone is not inherent in the object itself, but arises from the interaction between consciousness and form. The same music that might evoke pleasant feelings in some people creates strong aversion in others. This is why feeling tone, or vedanā, is classified as a mental aggregate rather than part of the material form.

The third aggregate is perception, or saññā in Pali. This is the mind's capacity to recognize and identify what it encounters. When you hear that bell, perception recognizes it as a bell sound rather than, say, a car horn or someone's voice. When you see the Buddha statue behind me, perception identifies it as a Buddha image rather than a tree or a person.

Perception involves pattern recognition. It takes the raw data coming through our sense doors and organizes it into recognizable categories. This happens almost instantaneously and usually below the threshold of conscious awareness. We don't usually notice the moment of recognition; we simply experience already knowing what something is.

But perception can be quite conditioned and variable. What one person perceives as beautiful art, another might perceive as ugly decoration. What one culture perceives as food, another culture might perceive as inedible. Our past experiences, cultural conditioning, and personal associations all shape how we perceive and categorize our experience.

The fourth aggregate is mental formations, or saṅkhāra in Pali. This is perhaps the most complex of the aggregates because it includes all the mental factors that arise along with consciousness—things like attention, concentration, mindfulness, compassion, anger, joy, doubt, and countless others.

These formations are the various ways our minds respond to and shape our experience. They include both wholesome mental factors like loving-kindness and generosity, and unwholesome ones like greed and hatred. They also include neutral factors like attention and memory that can serve either wholesome or unwholesome purposes.

You might think of mental formations as the mind's toolkit—all the different ways consciousness can configure itself to meet whatever arises in experience. Some of these formations arise habitually and automatically, while others require cultivation and training.

The slightly sentimental and swelling orchestral sound drove the dealers away. They would clear out of the parking lot and go somewhere else because it apparently drove them crazy. So I experienced Mantovani as pleasant, but they experienced it as very annoying and interfering. We have different responses based on our conditioning—it depends on how we feel into the experience.

Sayadaw Tejaniya talks about this in a helpful way. He says feeling is like a verb, an active engagement of our mind with sense experience that gives it a certain quality of pleasant, unpleasant, or neutral. But this quality isn't intrinsic to the thing itself, which is why feeling tone, or vedanā, is a mental quality rather than physical.

The third aggregate, the second aspect of mental activity, is perception. The Pali word is saññā. We discussed this in the first talk as the basis from which proliferation happens, and perception operates continuously. As we look around this room, we categorize the sights into recognizable things—people, chairs, cushions, walls, lamps.

Some of these categorizations carry rich associations, like when we see a friend or partner or someone we know, while others remain fairly neutral without much emotional charge.

What's fascinating is that perception is a learned activity. The raw data of sight consists simply of patches of color—form, color, and movement. You can glimpse this more clearly if you cover one eye. When you remove depth perception, you can see more distinctly that there are just patches without intrinsic organization, but we learn to organize them into meaningful wholes.

This became vividly clear in a story Oliver Sacks tells about a patient who had been blind since very early childhood—he had some sight as a very young child but then lost it until midlife. An eye surgeon believed they could perform an operation to restore this man's sight, and Sacks was consulting as a neurosurgeon throughout the process.

The momentous day arrived. The surgery had gone well. The patient was still in his hospital bed with eyes wrapped in white bandages, about to have them removed. The surgeon, family members, and Sacks were all present. Everyone expected that with this unveiling there would be a miraculous moment of "Wow, I can see!"

They removed the bandage. There was just silence and a somewhat confused, puzzled expression on the patient's face. The doctor asked, "Can you see?"

Later, the patient described his experience. He said, "When the bandages were taken off, the whole world was just a jumble of form and color and movements and blur. I didn't know what anything was. But when I heard the voice asking 'Can you see?' I recognized it as my surgeon's voice. So I assumed that blob drifting toward my eyes was his face. But other than that, I didn't know what anything was."

He had to completely relearn the process of perception. Those neural pathways hadn't developed properly or had been lost because his sight loss had occurred so long ago. He never became very skilled at perceiving. He achieved some basic functionality in the world, but it never became second nature. He was never able to quickly reestablish that faculty of perception.

Carol mentioned last night how perception can mislead us when we don't see accurately. The Buddha identified ways we perceive permanence when the truth is impermanence, or happiness where the reality is suffering.

Perception can also limit our seeing to mere concepts when there's richer reality beneath. For example, you're sitting in meditation and feel some discomfort in your knee, which you label as "pain." This may be an accurate perception of the feeling around that sensation—it can indeed be experienced as painful. But sometimes when we use the word "pain," we stop at the label and forget to investigate the actual experience. These conceptual labels can block us from seeing more deeply and intimately into the true nature of our experience.

Much of Zen practice revolves around how we perceive. Consider this bell: if you encountered it somewhere in the world without context, would you know it was a bell? Might you think it could be a planter? A very large monk's begging bowl? If you turned it upside down, could you put it on a statue as a hat?

All those things could happen, couldn't they?

In Zen, the koan is often something like, "What is this?" If you say it is a striker, I will hit you. If you tell me it's not a striker, I will also hit you. Quick, what is this?

What I got from those stories was that if I sat Zen, I was going to get hit a lot. And that's one reason I ended up in Vipassana.

So in Zen, they like to do these duels about perception and can you see the thing in itself and not label it. There's a story about this.

Back in the 70s, we were all coming out of the hippie era and discovering the wonders of Eastern religions and mysticism. Great masters were starting to come to this country for the first time in a long time.

Some meditation students in Boston discovered that two great masters from different traditions were in town at the same time. They got them together at the house of some friends who told us this story later. I wasn't there, but I heard the story.

One of the masters was the Korean monk Sansanim, a Korean Zen teacher. The other master was Kalu Rinpoche, a very warm, beautiful, wise old monk in the Tibetan tradition.

So they brought them together in a living room, offered them tea, and hoped that they'd recognize each other's enlightenment and there would be these great sparks of wisdom from their meeting and recognition.

It didn't quite go like that.

First there was the language problem. So they had translators. They both had good translators. But then it turns out there's this thing about spiritual traditions—they see things a certain way or expect things to be a certain way.

So they sat down and had a little chit-chat. Then Sansanim went into his Zen thing, which is he picked up an orange and held it out toward Kalu Rinpoche and very intently said, "What is this?"

Kalu Rinpoche just sat there doing his beads, doing some mantra, very peaceful, totally undisturbed, just reflecting.

Sansanim thought, "He's not quick enough." He held out the orange again: "What is this?" Waiting for the answer of the koan.

Finally, Kalu Rinpoche turned to his translator and said, "Don't they have oranges in Korea?"

This perception can be a lot of fun to play with, to see when we get it right and when we miss it.

So when we hear that rupa has pleasant feeling tone, we recognize it as, oh, that's the bell. That sound is the bell. And we know, moreover, that's the bell that ends the sitting. So we're free to get up and walk.

The fourth aggregate is called mental formations. The Pali word is sankhara. This is really a very broad and very important category because it includes all our emotions, thoughts, meditative states of mind, wholesome factors that develop in practice—like the factors of enlightenment, the five spiritual faculties, the Brahmaviharas—as well as the difficult afflictive emotions of fear and anger and greed and jealousy and so on. All of these are in the category of mental formations.

We talked last time about how these basic movements of greed and aversion stem from an attempt—we're trying to accomplish some kind of security for ourselves through these movements of greed and aversion and the covering over with delusion.

These are also sometimes called volitional formations, which means that there's some motivated energy behind them. We'll talk more about this when we get to karma, but volition forms the essence of karma. Karma is action with a volition, and this category has a strong volitional component. These mind states are expressing some kind of intention or volition.

When we first tune into how often greed, aversion, and delusion color our motivations, we often get this question: is there anything that's not coming out of greed, aversion, and delusion? Because they seem so central.

But there are. There are beautiful motivations of kindness and generosity and non-harming and restraint.

Now, a lot of these ways that we feel are repetitive and conditioned and form patterns in our life and in our mind. I want to come back and pick that up after we've explored the selfing a little bit. But I'll just make a note of it now and we'll come back.

So... some minutes into a sit, we hear the sound of the bell. Feeling tone is pleasant. Perception is "bell" and "sitting." Then some formations come. Often we think at this time, "Oh, now I could sit forever."

I feel so good. I could sit forever. And there's often a real wave of relief at that point. So these are the formations that attend the bell.

The last aggregate is consciousness. The Pali word is vijñāna. We've talked about this a little bit and we'll explore it more in other talks. Consciousness is just that capacity of mind that you could say receives all the sense data. When we're seeing, we're conscious of a sight. When we're hearing, we're conscious of a sound. When we're smelling, we're conscious of a smell, and so on. When we feel an emotion, we're conscious of that feeling. It doesn't add anything to it. It's just the factor of mind that is revealing experience to us—you could say receiving it or holding it, however you like to think of it.

Every moment that we're awake, we're having conscious experience of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, thoughts, and feelings. This is just the very bare knowing of the thing before feeling happens, before perception happens. Just the datum, like "white square," which we interpret as walls. It's the consciousness in us that gives that experience anytime we're awake.

As we watch the bell ripple through all these other aggregates, it's consciousness that knows it at every step. Consciousness knows the form, consciousness knows the feeling, consciousness knows the perception, and consciousness knows those formations of relaxation and relief and thought.

So these are the five aggregates. An interesting thing about this list is that they're all present in every moment of experience. The six sense doors may be there or may not be there. You can't always analyze smell, for instance, because sometimes we're not smelling anything. Sometimes we're not really tasting anything. But the aggregates are there in every experience, so we can investigate them and relate to them at any point. We can start to investigate our experience through this map.

An interesting question to ask is: is it an exhaustive map? That is, can every part of our experience fit into one of these five categories or groupings? I'll leave that with you to explore, but I want to suggest that it can. The five aggregates cover our whole range of experience as human beings in the realm of the senses. Every sense experience can be included in here.

But there's a fairly central concept that isn't here. And that is the I. There is no mention of an I or a self anywhere in this list. And yet we're saying maybe it includes all the aspects of human experience. So this is the reason that it can be so helpful to look in this way. We start to understand our experience independent of this notion of I.

There's no center where all these things are landing. There's no being behind the eyes that's receiving all these. In any moment, there's just form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness happening. All of these are fairly independent processes. They don't have a controller. They don't have an actor. They're just aspects of nature that are unrolling according to their own causes and conditions. And this is what human beings are made up of.

So one has to ask: Is there an I in this, or does this constitute a self? One way to ask that question is to say, maybe if taken apart, the self is nothing more than a bunch of aggregates, sort of put together in a certain way.

Here's an analogy. Assume everybody can recognize what this is. It's a pen, right? Everybody would agree to that. It's very easy to identify.

But if we examine this more closely, like the butcher carefully separating the cuts of meat in a cow, we see that it's actually composed of only five smaller parts: an ink cartridge, a barrel, a tip, a cap, and an end. That's all there is.

So now, is this a pen? We could debate that, but we wouldn't all agree so easily, would we? This individual part isn't really a pen. It becomes a pen when we assemble it properly, when the parts work together to support each other, when it fits in our hand in a certain way and allows us to write—when it carries out the function for which it was designed.

Now it's back to being a pen. But the pen doesn't really exist as a separate thing. It's simply a conglomeration of parts arranged in a particular way.

This is how the Buddha taught us to understand the human being. There is a being here—we recognize that. This recognition is helpful. It's useful that when Scott goes to bed tonight, he goes to his room, and when I go to bed tonight, I go to my room, and we don't mix that up. This conventional understanding serves us well in social discourse—"my room" and "Scott's room."

But this doesn't mean there's actually something called "I" within this conglomeration of pieces. When we look closely, like that skilled butcher, there are only form, feeling, perceptions, formations, and consciousness. There's no "I" that glues it all together.

Yet we don't see this. We've been entranced by the word "I" since we were young enough to understand language, and we've invested it with a sense of self, a sense of identity.

So how do we create this sense of self? The Buddha was asked this question directly. In the Majjhima Nikaya, sutta number 109, "The Greater Discourse on the Full Moon Night," someone asked him how this view of self comes about—sometimes translated as "personality view." The Pali word is sakkāyadiṭṭhi. How do we create this view that there is a self, and what constitutes it?

This is who we think we are. We create this identity and extend it over time because we don't want to face the impermanent, unsolid nature of reality.

Here's the Buddha's answer: "An untaught, ordinary person"—meaning someone who hasn't encountered the Buddha's teachings—"regards form as self, or self as possessing form, or form as in self, or self as in form."

We create the "I" based on form in one of these four ways. The Buddha then repeats these same four formulations for feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. He identifies twenty ways that human beings construct their sense of self based on the aggregates—four ways for each of the five aggregates.

This reflection could carry you through the rest of the month, or two months for those staying that long. But let's examine just a piece of it. Let's look at how this relates to form.

The Buddha says a person "regards form as self." The simple statement of this is: "I am the body." We explored this early on. When asked, "How tall are you?" we answer "5'10"." We think, "I am the body." This is one way we create self around form.

Or we regard "self as possessing form"—that is, "This body is mine" or "This is my body." "My eyes are brown." This is a second way we create a sense of self based on this aggregate of form.

Or form as in self. We might say something like, "This body is part of me. I'm bigger than this body, but this body is a part of who I am." That can be felt sometimes too. That's form as in the self.

Or self as in form. That's "I dwell within this body." That's the observer behind the eyes piece.

In this very compact way—and some of the suttas are like this, really dense—the Buddha has outlined twenty ways that we create a sense of self based on the five aggregates where there really isn't an intrinsic self there. So this is what we can start to see happening in our own experience. This is what we call identification. Identification is where we take an aspect of our experience and say, "That's I or mine."

When we talk about experience to each other, it's fine to use the word I or mine. "I had a sitting where my concentration was really steady for the whole hour." That's a fine thing to say in an interview. You don't need to say it to yourself. When you describe your experience to yourself, you don't need to use the word I or my. So you can notice when the thought of I arises and notice that maybe it's something extra.

Here's an interesting way to consider it. All the different experiences—we load them up with a sense of I, but do they need it? For instance, we might say to ourselves, "I have a pain in my knee." Do we really need to say "my knee"? Or could we just say, "There's a pain in the knee"? Or, "I'm feeling afraid right now." Do we need to say "I," or can we just say, "Fear is arising"? Or, "I'm feeling really happy right now." Oh, happiness is arising.

So an interesting question is: does the I ever arise or exist by itself? Or does it only get generated when we lay claim to some other part of our experience? Do you ever discover the naked I? Or is it only I related to form, feeling, perception, formations, consciousness? This would be interesting to know, because maybe the I is only dependently arisen, always based on something else that's happening to us. And what if we don't label it as we're feeling? Don't label it "I" as we're feeling it. How does that feel?

Part of the view of self—personality view—that we create is to extend over time. We think the self extends over time. If we didn't, we wouldn't be afraid of dying, right? If it was somebody else that was going to die, whether it's a year from now or ten years or fifty, it wouldn't bother us. But we think it's I that's going to die. So therefore, there's anxiety about that. We create this sense of self which we want to endure over time, and we pin it on these aspects of our experience.

But then in the sutta, the Buddha continues, saying: If we identify with form, he asks the bhikkhus he's talking to, "Is form permanent or impermanent?" After Carol's talk, we all know, right? Form is impermanent. "Is what is impermanent totally satisfactory or eventually unsatisfactory?" We have to say eventually unsatisfactory, because it's going to change. "Is what is impermanent, unsatisfactory, and subject to change fit to be regarded thus: 'This is mine, this I am, this is myself'?"

So we take things that we know are going to change and we say, "This is who I am." And we want to extend that I over time, but those two don't go together. All the things that we're claiming as I or mine eventually pass, and then the I is kind of stranded, disappointed, hit by that unsatisfactoriness.

The Buddha goes through these questions after form, also for feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. So he was then asked, "How does one see so that in regard to this body there is no I-making and my-making?"

When Bahiya finally reached the Buddha, the Buddha was walking on alms round in the town. Bahiya approached him and said, "Blessed One, please teach me the Dhamma. Please teach me the Dhamma for my welfare and happiness."

The Buddha said, "This is not the right time, Bahiya. I am on alms round."

But Bahiya was persistent. He said, "Venerable sir, it's hard to know what dangers there might be for the Blessed One's life or for my life. Please teach me the Dhamma for my welfare and happiness."

Again the Buddha said, "This is not the time, Bahiya. I am on alms round."

But Bahiya asked a third time with the same urgency.

Then the Buddha gave him this teaching: "When, for you, Bahiya, in the seen there will be merely the seen; in the heard, merely the heard; in the sensed, merely the sensed; in the cognized, merely the cognized—then, Bahiya, you will not be 'by that.' When you are not 'by that,' you will not be 'in that.' When you are not 'in that,' you will not be 'here' or 'beyond' or 'between the two.' This itself is the end of suffering."

This is such a beautiful, condensed teaching. In the seen, merely the seen. When we see something, we don't need to add "I am seeing" or "I like what I see" or "This is mine." Just the seeing, without the one who sees. In the heard, merely the heard—just sound arising and passing away, without a listener. In the sensed and cognized, the same—just bare experience without the elaboration of self.

When you are not "by that"—when you don't identify with or position yourself in relationship to experience. When you are not "in that"—when you don't locate yourself inside the experience. Then you are not "here" or "there" or anywhere in between. The whole construction of self in relationship to a world collapses, and what remains is the end of suffering.

It is said that upon hearing this brief teaching, Bahiya immediately became fully awakened. Shortly afterward, he was gored by a cow and died, but he died as an arahant, completely free.

This story illustrates the power of this simple practice of not making I or mine. When we can meet experience directly, without the overlay of self-construction, liberation is possible. In each moment, with each sensation, feeling, or thought, we can practice this same instruction: merely what is, without the one to whom it belongs.

So he arrived in Savatthi and went to the dwelling place of the Buddha, asking for an audience, but the Buddha was on alms round in the town. Bahiya immediately went to the town and noticed this very noble being with a great deal of calm, poised bearing—a kind of regal countenance—walking up and down the street collecting his alms.

Bahiya immediately approached the Buddha, bowed down at his feet, touched his head to the Buddha's feet, and said, "Blessed One, I have come a long way. Please teach me your Dhamma. I want to understand."

The Buddha said, "Bahiya, this is not the time for it. I'm collecting my alms food."

Bahiya replied, "Oh, Blessed One, I have come a long way. Who knows how long you will live or I will live? Please teach me the Dhamma in brief so that I can understand."

The second time he asked, the second time he was turned down. The Buddha said, "No, this is not the time for it. I'm collecting alms food."

So he asked again the same thing: "Who knows how long I will live or you will live? Please teach me."

The Buddha said, "All right, let me give you this teaching in brief. Bahiya, this is how you should train. In the seen, let there be just the seen. In the heard, let there be just the heard. In the sensed, let there be just the sensed. In the cognized, let there be just the cognized. Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Bahiya, who was already ripe and developed, heard that and fully awakened on the spot. The Buddha could then continue his alms round, which he did. An hour later, Bahiya was walking across a field where a cow was guarding a young calf and evidently felt threatened, charged Bahiya, gored him, and he died.

Think back to his question: "Who knows how long you will live or I will live? Please teach me the Dhamma." The Buddha taught, he awakened, and an hour later he had died. But this teaching that he received is one of the pithiest pointings in all of the suttas to this truth.

"In the seen, let there be just the seen" means there's no "I" added to that experience. "Then there will be no you in terms of that. When there is no you in terms of that, there is no you there. When there is no you there, then you will be neither here nor there nor in between. This, just this, is the end of suffering."

Let's sit together for a minute in quiet.

Therefore, all five aggregates should be seen as they really are with proper wisdom thus: "This is not mine. This I am not. This is not myself."

CHAPTER 105

Patterns of Becoming 3: Unentangled Knowing

Guy Armstrong · 1h03

In this third talk of the 'Patterns of Becoming' series, Guy Armstrong examines how dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) describes the moment-by-moment creation of suffering through contact, feeling (vedanā), craving (taṇhā), and clinging (upādāna). Drawing from the Thai Forest tradition and teachings of Upāsikā Kee, he introduces the concept of 'unentangled knowing' - a way of relating to experience that doesn't get caught in reactive patterns. The talk focuses on the crucial gap between feeling and craving, where freedom becomes possible. Armstrong explores how breaking this chain prevents the construction of self and offers a taste of the 'deathless' (amata). He presents practical approaches including checking for the presence of greed, aversion, and delusion, and turning awareness back on itself. The discussion includes references to the Sabba Sutta and teachings from Ajahn Chah on conditioned versus unconditioned phenomena, offering both theoretical understanding and practical meditation guidance for finding freedom within the cycles of becoming.

So this will be the third talk in this series called Patterns of Becoming. The title of this evening's talk is Unentangled Knowing.

We've been exploring for a few evenings how the construction of self happens again and again and how that puts us into a vulnerability to suffering. We've looked at it through the perspective of perception leading to proliferation, as was described in the Honeyball Sutta. We've looked at it through the view of the five aggregates and how clinging to any of the five aggregates exposes us to personality view.

Tonight we're going to look at it through the map of dependent origination, which is the most detailed description that the Buddha gave of how suffering gets created again and again and again.

In all these talks, we've been exploring primarily the process of the creation of self, which is some kind of bondage, some kind of grasping that leads to suffering. But tonight, I want to put a little more emphasis on something I touched on the first night but didn't go into deeply, which is the factor of release—how we get released from these cycles and how we find freedom in relationship to all our experience.

I think it's a very deep question for all of us as practitioners how we understand freedom. There is obviously a great freedom that comes at the end of the path. The path does have an end. As it's said, it's good in the beginning, it's good in the middle, and it's good in the end, and it does have an end. That end is when the mind is completely free of the forces of greed, aversion, and delusion. This is what full awakening is about.

That might be a long time from now. It might not happen this retreat. For those of us who are on the slow path—and I definitely include myself—it might not happen this retreat. So do we have to wait until that happens to have a real taste of freedom in our life in a very practical and felt way? Or is some measure of freedom available earlier? Is it available now to us? And what would that look like? What would that feel like? And how does that come about?

That's the topic I want to explore more this evening. I'm going to do it through this concept called unentangled knowing. This was a term that was used by a laywoman teacher in Thailand named Upasika Kee. She describes it in a wonderful book called Pure and Simple, which I highly recommend.

First of all, it's unusual to find women teachers in Thailand because the Dharma world there is very dominated by monks. Secondly, she was a laywoman. She wasn't even a nun, so she called herself Upasika, which just means a laywoman supporter of the Dhamma. So she's known as Upasika Kee. She taught from the 1950s into the 1970s and died sometime in the 1970s. Pure and Simple is a recording of a collection of her talks with a great translation by Thanissaro Bhikkhu. It's highly recommended—one of the most inspiring books of teachings I know of from a woman in our tradition. She was a very powerful and clear teacher.

So this is her term, unentangled knowing. If you're not a native English speaker, this is an odd word. Unentangled doesn't come up very often. So just a word on the derivation. Tangle, of course, is a twisting or knotting of different strands or threads. They get all jumbled up together and it's hard to pull them apart—like your hair if you ride in a convertible, or a kitten playing with a ball of yarn that quickly gets tangled.

Entangled is the verb about how that comes about. And "un" means the undoing of the entanglement. So it is about how we get disentangled from the tangle that we are in.

The Buddha used the word tangle often to describe our situation. It's a nice metaphor because it points to the way that different desires sort of conflict with each other. When we try to follow them all, they weave a knot, and we don't know how to release it because desires pull us in all these different directions.

Upasika Kee had this very nice pointing: "An inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward turning cast aside." That will be the theme we'll explore—what this inward staying, unentangled knowing is about and how it releases this tangle, which the Buddha described in a number of passages. Here's one: "The world is smothered and enveloped by craving like a tangled ball of yarn."

And you can see this tangle manifested vividly in our political landscape, in the grasping for power and money that unfolds in every country across the earth—a world truly enveloped by craving.

There's another beautiful quotation that opens the Visuddhimagga, though it originates from the suttas themselves. A questioner approaches the Buddha and asks: "A tangle inside and a tangle outside. This generation is entangled in a tangle. So I ask of Gautama this question: who succeeds in disentangling this tangle?"

The answer forms the foundation of what the Visuddhimagga attempts to explain. It's essentially one who develops ethics, meditation, and wisdom. This is precisely what we're engaged in here—disentangling this tangle of conflicting forces within the heart that inevitably lead to suffering.

So this "unentangled" points directly to the tangle itself—the way we become caught up with the objects of our experience. But the phrase "unentangled knowing" points to something remarkable: the possibility of a relationship with our experience that remains free, uncaught.

We want to explore both dimensions this evening. I'd like to suggest that this unentangled knowing is actually arising for all of us in many moments throughout each day during a retreat like this, but we may not be noticing when it's happening. We might be missing an appreciation of this very state of mind.

James spoke extensively last night about recognizing and appreciating the wholesome states of mind that arise naturally. This unentangled knowing represents another central wholesome state that we can learn to feel in our daily experience, feel in our formal meditation, and begin to appreciate. As we start to know it and value it, returning to this state becomes much more accessible—as James also emphasized last night.

So we'll explore this opening, this way of relating to experience, and discuss several different meditation approaches that make it accessible, that point directly toward this understanding.

Just one word of caution: much of the vocabulary I'll use tonight comes from one particular tradition within Theravada—the Thai Forest tradition. Those familiar with the teachings of Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Man, Ajahn Mahabua, or Ajahn Sumedho will feel a natural affinity with this description. Those more oriented toward classical Burmese or Sri Lankan approaches might find it somewhat unorthodox.

We have both these lineages represented at Spirit Rock—the lineage of Mahasi Sayadaw from Burma and Ajahn Chah from Thailand. I actually believe this blending constitutes one of our center's greatest strengths. From the Burmese tradition, we inherit excellent tools for developing precision in mindfulness. From the Thai Forest tradition, we receive a quality of openness and emphasis on heart qualities. I think we achieve a beautiful integration here.

Much of tonight's teaching will flow from the Thai Forest perspective, of which Upasaka Ki was a representative.

Now, we want to explore through the framework of dependent origination first how we become caught—how the tangle forms—and then how it can be released.

The chain of dependent origination stands as one of the Buddha's central teachings, perhaps his most profound insight. In it, he described a sequence of twelve causal conditions that begin with ignorance, unfold through a series of sequential developments, and culminate in suffering. The understanding is that upon reaching suffering, we begin the cycle anew, reinforcing ignorance and circling the wheel again to arrive once more at suffering.

So dependent origination offers a moment-by-moment analysis of how we create and recreate the experience of suffering. In its progression from ignorance to suffering, it reveals the cycle of bondage. But the Buddha always taught how this cycle can be undone, and we'll examine that closely as well.

There are twelve links altogether. I won't address most of them tonight—that would constitute another entire talk, very interesting but not our focus this evening. I'm going to bypass the first five links, which become somewhat philosophical, and also set aside the last three links, which are similarly philosophical. Instead, we'll concentrate on the central four links that directly relate to our meditation experience.

To introduce this, I want to share one of the Buddha's teachings called the Sutta on Totality, one of the discourses in the Sutta Pitaka. We've discussed many times that as human beings, we constantly experience phenomena through the six sense doors—this forms one of the Buddha's primary descriptions of our condition.

In this particular discourse, he addressed this directly: "Bhikkhus, what is the totality of life?" This is one translation. "What is the totality of life? Listen, attend carefully, and I will teach you the totality of life."

That certainly captures our attention, doesn't it? Who else has made such a declaration—"Listen, I'm going to tell you the totality of life"? Marx didn't make such a claim. Freud didn't do that. Einstein didn't do that. Yet here's the Buddha, 2,500 years ago, saying: "I'm going to describe the totality of life."

So what is it?

Anyone who would try to describe a totality beyond this would not know of what they were speaking. So this is kind of remarkable, isn't it? Whatever human life is about, there are only ever six things happening: sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind objects—which is basically thoughts and emotions. This gives a beautiful simplicity that maps to our meditation practice and provides us with what I feel is a very sound perspective on what we need to do.

All we need to do is learn how to relate skillfully to these six types of phenomena. Easy, right? That's all we need to do. Simple perhaps, but not always so easy.

These six types of phenomena are constantly arising. They're known by the different six sense consciousnesses, and the coming together of the sense object, the sense organ, and the sense consciousness is what is called contact. We talked about this with the honey ball discourse. As beings, our world consists of constantly experiencing contact at the six sense doors from the impingement of sense objects known through the sense organs.

And why is this problematic? Because these contacts aren't always pleasant. We keep getting bombarded by this ever-changing mix of pleasant and unpleasant experiences that we ultimately have no control over. That's why the life of sentient beings is so uncertain and insecure and unpredictable. That's what we're exposed to—we're sensitive, and we keep getting exposed to that bombardment.

This is the first of the links of dependent origination that we'll focus on tonight: contact. It simply describes how we keep getting bombarded by sense impressions at the six sense doors.

We've talked before about what the next step in the chain is. When there's contact, some of it's pleasant, some of it's painful, some of it's neither pleasant nor painful—neutral. This is the quality called feeling tone, vedanā, or sometimes simply abbreviated as feeling. It's on the basis of vedanā that we experience this mix of pleasure and pain and that we then react. I think we've explored this quite extensively.

So in the chain of dependent origination, contact leads to feeling. Now, if we're not being mindful, based on feeling tone, we're likely to slide into a reactive formation of mind. With the pleasant, what's the reactive formation? It's greed, isn't it? Desire, wanting. With the painful, the reactive formation is aversion. And with the neutral, delusion—we lose touch, we space out, we don't pay attention.

The feeling tone is what gives rise to these reactive formations of greed, aversion, and delusion, which are the kilesas—the fundamental forces that cause suffering in ourselves and in the world. Taken together, the Buddha gave a name to these three kilesas: craving, or taṇhā.

Even though craving is a word that points to the desire aspect, craving actually encompasses all of these. Of course, there's the desire force for the pleasant. Aversion is also an expression of a different kind of desire—it's a desire not to experience the painful. So both greed and aversion are movements of craving. Delusion is there to cover over the activity of greed and aversion, because if we saw it clearly, we couldn't do it.

Part of the great discovery of a retreat like this is that you start shining the light of mindfulness on these activities of greed and aversion, and you dispel the delusion. When we start to see the constant movement cycling through wanting and not wanting, liking and not liking, we start to get tired of it. We start to get fed up with the way it keeps the mind in turmoil. And that force of clear seeing, of wisdom and discernment, starts to slow down the momentum of the greed and aversion—it slows down the momentum of craving.

But if mindfulness isn't there, these forces will just carry on as they've been doing, the Buddha said, since beginningless time.

Let's examine this a little more closely. A contact happens—let's say it's pleasant. A pleasant feeling tone arises, the force of liking or wanting comes in, and then, if you look closely, the mind starts inclining toward that object. It could be a sense of relaxation in the body. It could be a pleasant taste at a meal. It could be a beautiful mind state of loving-kindness or compassion.

As soon as there's that inclining of the mind toward the object, out of desire for it, the next thing that happens is we take hold of it. There is some grasping there—some clinging, taking hold of that pleasant object. And then we might start to make a story about it.

Now that we've taken a hold of it, we have something to build up a story around. But first we have to take a hold of it. If it just passed through our experience, no story would arise. This is the part of the honey ball where perception leads to proliferation. So this grasping is the taking a hold of that creates the basis for all the stories. We'll go through a couple of examples, but the key thing is once we've taken a hold, suffering becomes inevitable.

So grasping or clinging—the word in Pali is the same: upadana. Sometimes we translate it as grasping, which is like the first act of taking a hold. Sometimes we translate it as clinging when we more notice we've been holding on for a while and that's continuing. It's the same word. It's this locking into or fixating upon some aspect of our experience based on its pleasant or unpleasant nature. And then the chain of dependent origination just goes on from the clinging to end up in suffering. Once clinging has happened, there is suffering. It may be mild, it may be great, but it's inevitable.

So the central four links—contact, feeling, craving, and clinging—are the ones that we can examine in our practice and look at on a moment-to-moment basis. And we start to see that this is what confronts us from the time we're infants. From the time we're infants, all these varied objects of the world come into our experience. And we start developing relationships with them.

Mother. Breast. Food. Father. School. High school. Attractive people, college, sex, work, job, career, taxes, income taxes, Britney Spears, MTV, Barack Obama, global economic crisis, blah, blah, blah, blah, blah. All these different things come into our experience, some beautiful, some scary, and so we hang on to them. We fixate on all these parts of our experience.

When we grasp, we create an I. We make a self around that—the self that likes or dislikes, that wants or doesn't want, in relation to that thing. We talked about this last week with the five aggregates.

Simple example. You're on the eight precepts. You go down to the dining hall at tea for your little glass of juice, which the cooks have very kindly put out. But you notice something really good on the main table. There's this soup that smells better than anything you've had since the Thai restaurant two months ago. And you get a waft of this, and maybe there's some cheese out with the crackers—a nice brie.

And you start thinking, "Oh, I wish I weren't on eight precepts tonight. I didn't eat enough at lunch and I'm starting to feel really hungry, and all I've got is this miserable glass of juice and these people are having soup and brie. Maybe I could just go off eight precepts for one night. Because I was so good at lunch, I ate moderately, but I didn't realize there was going to be such a good tea. And gosh, that smells so good, and I'm really hungry now. And look at all of them—they're enjoying their food so much. I've been such a good yogi. I should do it. I should just drop my eight precepts. I didn't write the kitchen, though. I might be causing to run out of food. Maybe I better not do that. Oh, I'll just have my glass of juice and walk out."

So we walk out and maybe we regret our decision. We kind of chew on that for a while. And we go up the hill and maybe we do our yoga or we do a sit or a walk. But inwardly, we're kind of stirred up and blaming ourselves: "Why did I take eight precepts in the first place? I don't think it's really so good for my digestion."

So at this point, we've really fully taken birth as, let's say, the hungry yogi. The hungry yogi walks up the hill, still stirring and thinking about the food down there. But after a while, we let go of it. We always let go of it, don't we?

It doesn't matter how significant an experience feels on retreat—we always let go of it. Perhaps we're doing yoga, perhaps settling into meditation. We let go and the mind comes back into balance. This always happens. We've taken birth, but the mind returns to balance.

This coming back into balance is crucial to notice. This is a return to what Upasaka Ki calls the normal mind—a touchstone for her teachings. I would actually say it's not so normal; it's rather unusual in the world at large. I prefer to call it the natural mind. So we return to this natural mind, and we're balanced again. Things have cooled out and we're not suffering. What's happened is we've taken birth, then that hungry yogi birth passes away, and we're back in the natural mind, a balanced place.

But here's another example. Let's say we're sitting in meditation a few weeks into retreat, and the concentration has developed. In this sitting, we find the body really relaxed. The mind is very present, effortlessly. We notice thoughts coming and going, but they don't actually take us out of the present moment. If we want, we could stay with breath after breath—quite easy and comfortable. It doesn't take strong effort. We're relaxed and just present. It's so delightful.

And then we think—or I thought when I started, because I had a linear idea of practice—the rest of the retreat's going to be like this now. Wow. It went all through the sitting. Let's take this out for a walk. Then walking, pretty present, still concentrated, really feeling the sensations of the feet. This is great. My whole life could be like this.

Imagine if I could do my job like this. I would be so impressive. I'd get a great salary because I could deal with the clients nobody else could deal with. And in my relationship, I could be really supportive of my partner even when they do those crazy things. I wouldn't get upset at all—just have a wonderful, loving relationship. This is fantastic. I can't wait to go back and sit again and get a taste of the rest of my life.

We go back in and sit again—and the concentration's over. The mind is all over the place. We've been stirred up by the fantasies. We can't connect with the breath. We don't feel relaxed in the body. There's tremendous energy. We've lost that beautiful sitting and that concentrated mind and that ideal life. All gone.

This is painful too. This takes a while to let go of, but eventually we do, don't we? That passes—more water under the bridge—we come back into balance, the natural mind returns, and we carry on. So we recover.

In the first example with the hungry yogi, we took birth by clinging to an unpleasant experience—a sensation of hunger and desire for food. It was a difficult birth. We were stirred up, agitated, an unhappy self. But when we died, it was something of a relief.

When that hungry yogi died, oh, return to peace. So in that case, it was an unhappy birth but a pleasant death.

But when you're a concentrated yogi, the good yogi takes birth. It's a very pleasant birth. "Wow, super yogi. Just what we've been waiting for and working toward all this time. It's finally here. I've got it." So we attach to that. It's really a kind of heaven realm birth, to tell you the truth. The hungry yogi is a bit of a hungry ghost realm birth. The good yogi, heaven realm birth—really easy, everything's delightful, but then it doesn't last. We pass out of that heaven realm, and the birth was pleasant, but the death is painful.

So either way, if we hang on to pain, it's a painful birth, pleasant death. If we hang on to pleasure, it's a happy birth and a painful passing away. But either way, we construct a self out of the pleasant and painful events of our experience, and it leads to suffering. Either way, this construction of a self brings us into suffering.

Things like a good meditation or a pleasant meal are relatively minor in the overall scheme of things. The bigger things are these patterns of becoming that we've talked about—the patterns of becoming that are based on the creation of who we take ourselves to be. We all carry some kind of self-image. As long as we're not free, we have some view about who we are. This points to sakkāya-diṭṭhi that we talked about with the five aggregates.

We form an identity in order to create something solid and lasting in a world that's only characterized by change. That's what the construction of self is basically about—something enduring in this world of change. And then we use the events of our perceptions and proliferations to reinforce that self-view or sakkāya-diṭṭhi.

If we have a view that has a lot of self-judgment, that we're not adequate, then we'll take the things that happen as confirmation of that view. Like when I talked about having an empty chair next to me in a conference dining hall—the empty chair meant, "Oh, nobody liked me. Nobody wanted to sit near me." It's just an empty chair, for God's sake. But if it's coupled with self-judging, it means something. It means I'm not worthy or adequate.

So a lot of the content of retreat gets taken up, and a lot of the proliferations are about these patterns of becoming some kind of self-view in some way or another. If it's not about inadequacy, it may be about achievement. You're sitting and you have a great idea related to your work at home. And it's brilliant. So you want to go back to your room and write, maybe write the first chapter of that novel that's going to make you the first great American Dharma author. We're still waiting for that book—the great American Dharma book. You're going to be the first one to write it and you'd better get it down now. And it will lead to all kinds of fame and fortune because there are a lot of Buddhists in the world today. And the Dalai Lama will probably invite you to teach with him because you're such a great representative.

So this is another form of becoming that comes up. Some of the most difficult kinds of patterns to deal with are when the emotions that are coming are the difficult part of our self-view. Like when I worked with fear for so many years, every time the fear came up, it reminded me, "This is the biggest problem in my life. I don't know how to liberate it. It seems like it's always been here. It's here now," and that leads to a projection: "It's always going to be here in the future."

So we construct this self-view based upon this ongoing pattern related to a painful emotional experience, which could be fear or self-judgment or a sense of being betrayed or abandonment—many different forms of this. The difficult emotions feed into the self-image and reinforce it, offering more proof that that's actually what's happening, that that's the way we're put together and that's going to continue.

So these are all different forms of becoming, tied into who we take ourselves to be or who we'd like to be. And these patterns become quite burdensome, some of the most burdensome things we experience in retreat. Whether it's patterns of aggrandizement and becoming something in the world, or whether it's patterns of the opposite side of conceit—the negative, inferior kind of conceit and self-judgment—either way, we tend to hold these tightly and believe in them. This is part of the workings of karma.

Andy Olendzki, who's the head of the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies, put it very beautifully about this process of self and grasping. He said, "What becomes clear through this analysis of moment-to-moment experience is that grasping is not something done by the self, but rather self is something done by grasping. The self is constructed each moment for the simple purpose of providing the one who likes or doesn't like, holds on to or pushes away what is unfolding in experience."

So you ask, well, what does the grasping? There's no answer to that. This is a faculty of mind that inclines toward an object and then fixates on it out of some emotional drive of desire or aversion. So the grasping takes place and it's the grasping that constructs the sense of self. And once grasping has happened, the self is created. That means birth has happened and that means death will happen. And there's suffering in that whole chain, which typically gets repeated again and again.

There's this image in Asia that's spoken about that's quite similar to this process. If you've ever watched a monkey swing through the trees of a jungle, they'll be hanging on to one vine and they'll swing and they won't let go of that vine until there's another one very close that they see they can grab hold of. So they'll let go of one only to take up the next in a split second. And then they'll swing on that and only let go to take up the next in a split second. This is the way the undeveloped mind relates to experience—grasping at one moment after another to keep reconstructing the sense of self, the experience of "I," because the untrained mind believes that's where security is.

So the great thing is, meditators have another choice. And it's so wonderful when you start to see this, and all of you are able to see this at times. The question is, can this chain be broken? It seems so inevitable: contact, feeling, craving, clinging. Can it be broken?

What the Buddha said is that the most logical place for the break is between feeling and craving. And that's what we've spent a lot of time talking about—that it's possible to have a pleasant feeling without going into greed. It's possible to have an unpleasant feeling without going into aversion. And you all have been talking about this in interviews day after day, so I know this is happening in your experience.

So what happens? A pleasant thing is there, but the mind isn't driven into greed. An unpleasant experience is there and the mind isn't driven into aversion. This is the way out.

Start to look at the experience when there's that space between feeling and craving. Basically, when craving doesn't arise based on feeling, then clinging doesn't happen and it doesn't lead to suffering. So by not taking hold, you've stepped out of the whole cycle. This is basically the cycle of samsara. And by not taking hold, you have stepped out. So this is what gets us off the wheel.

And it basically means pleasant experiences there, unpleasant experiences there, neutral experiences there, but we're not taking hold of it. So we're not falling into greed, aversion, and delusion. So it basically means the mind is equanimous or balanced, and we're out of that cycle.

This place where the mind is not in greed, aversion, or delusion is what we sometimes call the sweet spot of meditation. This is a kind of special place when it happens, and it happens a lot during the day. If we start to look for it, it happens in formal times and it happens in informal times. It happens when we're intending it with strong mindfulness, and there are lots of moments where it just happens on its own, but we may not notice it.

So this is the central pointing of dependent origination—not to let feeling drive us into craving, which means greed, aversion, delusion. So we start to get a sense of some space opening up between a moment of feeling and a moment of craving. And just letting that space happen is the place we want to allow the meditation to develop.

So one teacher put it this way: the whole of the Buddhist path is resting in the gap between feeling and craving. The whole of the path.

So start to explore what this feels like. You're not taking birth, yet you're authentically present and aware. It can be profoundly alive. You're not grasping hold. Different practitioners use various words to describe this state—restful, easeful, peaceful, balanced, equanimous, non-conflicted, free from struggle and agenda.

The word I want to emphasize for your exploration is freedom. This is a place of genuine freedom because the mind isn't being controlled by the conditioned events that unfold. The conditioned experience of the pleasant tends to drive the mind toward greed. The conditioned experience of the unpleasant tends to drive the mind toward aversion. The conditioned experience of neutrality tends to drive the mind toward delusion. But these reactive formations aren't arising. You're not being determined by conditions. The mind is not being determined by the changing circumstances of experience.

Because of this freedom from the conditionality of experience, there's a subtle taste of what is not conditioned—what is unconditioned. Another way to express this is that we can see conditioned phenomena as they truly are, and we can perceive the Dhamma in its authentic nature.

Let me share a passage from Ajahn Chah that illuminates this understanding:

"The Buddha talked about conditioned and unconditioned things. Conditioned things are innumerable—material or immaterial, big or small. If our mind is under the influence of delusion, it will proliferate about these things, dividing them into good and bad, pleasant and painful, likes and dislikes. Why does the mind proliferate like this? Because there is still the belief that all these things are oneself or belong to oneself. The tendency to conceive things as oneself is the source of suffering, birth, old age, sickness, and death. This is the worldly mind, spinning around and changing at the directives of worldly conditions. This is the conditioned mind.

"The unconditioned refers to the mind that has seen the Dhamma, the truth of conditioned things as they are—as transient, imperfect, and ownerless. When we know conditions as neither ourselves nor belonging to us, we let go of conditions and attain the Dhamma. We enter into and realize the Dhamma. When we attain the Dhamma, we know clearly."

Resting in that gap means we're not grasping and we're not subject to birth. We're not generating a new identity through clinging. Not being subject to birth, we're not subject to death. In this gap, there's a subtle taste of what's called the deathless—a synonym for nirvana.

In the Thai forest tradition, they describe this experience as a preview of nibbana, like a coming attraction. It's not the complete realization but rather what Ajahn Buddhadasa called "temporary nibbana." It's not the full experience of the uncondi-tioned, but it offers a genuine taste. The peace we feel there is a partial expression of the absolute peace of the unconditioned. It's as if the obscurations have lifted enough for us to sense how that peace naturally emanates.

Imagine walking and suddenly catching the aroma of bread baking somewhere. You can follow that fragrance to its source, to the bakery itself. When we first experience this peace in meditation, it's like catching that initial whiff of the unconditioned. Following it leads us to the very source of that peace.

There's a beautiful series of suttas in the Sutta Nipata where a group of Brahmin youths approach the Buddha with sincere questions. In ancient India, the Brahmins represented the religious elite—wealthy, holding a monopoly on sanctioned spirituality, masters of countless complex rules and privileged knowledge systems that were difficult to access.

Then appeared these wandering ascetics like the Buddha—penniless, clothed in rags, surviving on alms, dwelling in wilderness and forests. They were spiritual revolutionaries, challenging the established Brahminical order. Many Brahmins resisted, dismissively calling them "those bald-pated recluses coming to town."

But in this particular encounter, these Brahmin youths approached the Buddha with genuine curiosity, truly interested in exploring and understanding the depths of spiritual life.

So there's a series of dialogues, and this is one of them. This Brahmin youth named Todaya says to the Buddha, "For one who is freed, what is that liberation like?" Wouldn't you have liked to be able to ask the Buddha that? What is that liberation like?

And the Buddha replied, "That sage is without desire. He has nothing. He is unentangled in becoming." By not holding on, we don't get entangled in this manufacturing of self again and again and again. So this word becoming appears a lot in the literature.

This is from Ajahn Chah. And just imagine that this talk is being given by Ajahn Chah in a Thai Dharma hall. So a lot of the Thai Dharma halls are basically open-air pavilions. They have a floor. They have a roof and pillars around the outside supporting the roof, but no walls because the climate is so mild. So a lot of Dharma talks in Thailand are given in these open-air halls.

This is from Ajahn Chah: "The roof is a becoming, the floor is a becoming, but in the empty space between the roof and the floor, there's nowhere to stand. Where there is no becoming, that's where there's emptiness. And to put it bluntly, we say that nibbana is this emptiness." When we're not standing on anything through clinging, that is our emptiness. That is our temporary nibbana. That is our freedom. We're not taking birth. We're not creating something. And we're not dying.

So our meditation starts to reveal this kind of deathless place. It's not so much that we've fabricated it, that we've constructed it by a lot of doing. It's by refraining from doing. It's when feeling is there, but we don't grasp at it. It's when we restrain the craving and clinging that this place opens up. So it's not particularly created through activity. It's created through non-doing.

I don't know if you remember from the first session—I talked about what an important place non-doing has in the Dharma. This is where that really becomes clear. It's through not taking hold, not getting stirred up, and not forming reactions that this place of the deathless opens up to us.

Because it's based on non-doing, not something constructed, it's always available. It's available when we stop the doings.

This is from Ajahn Jumnien, another teacher in the Thai forest lineage: "The best way to develop a great awareness is to rest your attention within that knowing space of consciousness, in the pure space of knowing. If you understand and can rest in this pure knowing, that is the place of the deathless. From this pure consciousness that's unmoved by what arises, then you see the phenomena of the world, which all have the nature to arise and pass away. Phenomena show their dharmas of impermanence, and this other is the dharma of the deathless."

So it's kind of nice because everything's still coming and going. It's not that we've cut off experience. And because there's full awareness—you have to be pretty aware not to crave—because there's full awareness, we know them all. So there's this clear knowing of everything that's coming and going, and it's still mixed, pleasant and unpleasant. But because of this balance, we're not reacting. And that's what opens the door to this Dhamma, to this deathless.

As we start to feel the freedom that's in this place, we can start to see that maybe this is at least partly what we're practicing for. Because it's free, it opens up a lot of other beautiful qualities. When we're not constricted, you could describe it as peace or ease or balance or equanimity. It's also kind of the open door for love and compassion and joy and insight for wisdom to arise. So when there's that experience of freedom, there's a lot of potential there. So I like to think of it as something of a goal in practice.

You know, it would be interesting to reflect on what you described as your intention for this retreat when you talked about it in the group on the first day or what you reflected about later. But look and see if in your intention and aspiration there isn't something like this that's a real part of it.

As we start to get a taste of this kind of freedom, we start to realize: maybe this is what I've been looking for. This deathless place that's out of the cycle of suffering and creates the open door for all the beautiful qualities to come through. So it's kind of a goal, but we aren't stable in it yet. So we don't want to stop the path.

Now, what's the most effective way to move along the path? Maybe it's through this goal. Maybe this resting in the deathless is the most effective way to weaken the kilesas, to weaken the force of craving, because it's kind of retraining the mind. And the door is open for wisdom and insight to come through this. So maybe this is not only the goal, but it's also our best understanding of what the path is.

In this way, the path and the goal kind of come together. And the goal has that sense of fruition and some satisfaction, some arriving. So it really lets us appreciate the journey that we've gone through in meditation to reach this point. We can just appreciate the journey and appreciate ourselves for taking it and realize that we're manifesting, to some degree, some of our aspiration.

And then also because it's not stable yet—this place, we come into it and we lose it—it can renew our dedication to keep walking until it's stable. We want to be able to abide in this through any situation. So we need to keep walking the path, but we kind of understand this now becomes the path for us also.

When we hit this point, sometimes there's a little bit of a shift in the way we want to practice. And Carol has alluded to this a number of times when she's talked about how it doesn't matter what we're paying attention to and that the awareness itself can get more interesting than the objects that we're aware of.

What's being suggested there is a kind of move from a focus on the objects to a focus on the quality of the mind that's knowing. And that's what this shift to the understanding of this resting in the gap between feeling and craving is also pointing to. Let's look at the mind itself and see if we can abide in that place of balance, that place of unborn and undying.

So a couple of ways in. I'll talk about two tonight and then we'll do a guided meditation in the morning that will offer another one.

One way in—we've talked around this, but I don't know if we've said it so clearly—comes from some teachings from a Burmese teacher named Sayadaw U Tejaniya. He points to a way to work with attitude that leads in this direction.

One of his teachings is about looking at the attitude of mind or how we're relating to our experience, moment by moment, to see if reactive formations are coming in. So he says, one of his teachings says, ask the question: In this moment, is there greed, aversion, or delusion in your mind? And you can ask this question fairly often.

Well, sometimes it's not that easy to know the answer when you look. So he's got some other questions to clear this up. He said, okay, are you wanting something else to happen that's not happening? That occasionally happens, doesn't it? That's the presence of greed. Are you wanting something to stop happening? That sometimes happens too, right? Knee pain, mental state, wandering mind. That's aversion. Are you not in touch with what's happening? Are you spaced out, lost in thought? He said, that's delusion.

Now usually by the time you've asked the question, you're not deluded anymore. So usually the answer when you ask, "Am I out of touch?" is no—we're back in touch. But often, very often, we'll see one of the first two: greed or aversion.

If that happens, then pay attention to that attitude of mind. Take that as a subject for the mindfulness. You don't have to judge it. You don't have to try to make it go away. Just become mindful of that. Greed feels like this. Aversion feels like this. Let that be your meditation subject.

When I first started doing this practice of checking the attitude, I was doing kind of an open, choiceless attention using light noting. And then about five times a sitting, I would just turn back and look at the attitude in mind. I would ask these three questions, and if there was a formation, I would stay with it for a while.

Then after asking the questions enough times, I got really familiar with the practice and I could just turn and see if there was greed, aversion, or delusion. I didn't have to go through much thinking about it.

Once I could do that—just turn and see the attitude—it became quite comfortable to do it more often. So I would do it maybe ten times in a sitting. Just check. Then I found that if my attention was stable in the present moment, I never had to go back to the objects. I could just stay with that quality of attitude as my main focus.

So I would just hang out in this place of balance and look for when the mind left it. It takes some stability to do that, but if you've got some stability, it's quite a nice practice to do.

Upasika Kee says the same thing: "Your awareness has to take a firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. When mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out latching onto things, troubles will arise. So you have to keep checking on this in every moment. There's nothing else that's so worth checking on."

So she's saying the same thing. Stay with the balance of heart and mind, and notice if it's moving out to some form of grasping. If not, just stay there in that balance. This is one meditation that works very nicely that way.

The other meditation is to take a look at the quality of consciousness itself. You can play with this one just in the last minutes of the talk. Let your eyes be open and send your interest around the room and fall on the different objects. Some of them may be pleasant—looking at the Buddha images or the flowers on the altar, some of the nice shawls people are wearing, quality of light and wood in the hall. Some of them may be unpleasant or striking you in an unpleasant way—a little bit of chaos up here on the platform that I often wish we could clean up, some disorganization in the hall, some color that doesn't strike you as particularly appealing today.

So let your eyes just roam around—different people, pleasant, unpleasant, different focuses. Feel yourself being drawn into likes and dislikes. Let that all happen.

And now, turn that consciousness, turn that awareness to look at itself. Turn it back inwards to what is doing the looking. Who's looking? Who's looking? There's looking, looking, looking, going out, out, out, liking, disliking. Who's looking? Look back inside at the center. Where is that coming from? This is turning consciousness back to look at itself.

And you may feel, when you do that, that some little shift happens inwardly. Anybody feel a little shift from that? Okay, maybe subtle. We'll do one tomorrow morning that will probably be a little easier to find.

This is also a way to practice that cuts down the fascination with objects and lets the mind rest in its own capacity more. Again from Upasika Kee: "The mind that's aware of awareness doesn't send its knowing outside this awareness. Nothing can be concocted in the mind when it knows in this way. In other words, an inward staying, unentangled knowing, all outward going knowing cast aside."

So we're turning inward. We stay with the awareness or the consciousness or the heart. And that cuts the fascination with the other objects of the senses. It makes life simpler, makes practice simpler. And it can feel like a kind of home.

This inward turning that she describes doesn't mean we cut ourselves off from the world. When you turn to awareness itself, do you lose touch with the room, with the people, with the sights? No. We're still fully aware of everything, but we're simply not as entangled or enmeshed with it all.

This can be another skillful way to practice. Both of these directions—checking on attitude and turning awareness back on itself—share this quality of disentangling us from complications with the phenomena of the senses. They allow us to find an approach to meditation where we can rest in this quality that's free from birth and death, this gap between feeling and craving.

Let me close with a quotation from another of these dialogues with the Brahmin youths that the Buddha was having. This youth was named Kappa, and this is the question he put to the Buddha:

"For one stranded in the middle of the lake, in the flood of great danger, overwhelmed with aging and death, tell me the island, dear sir."

And the Buddha replied: "Having nothing, clinging to nothing—that is the island. There is no other. That is Nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death."

So let's just sit for a minute together.

Having nothing, clinging to nothing—that is the island. That is Nibbana, I tell you, the total ending of aging and death.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 106

Patterns of Becoming 4: Kamma and Rebirth

Guy Armstrong · 1h04

> In this fourth talk of the Patterns of Becoming series, Guy Armstrong examines kamma (action) as the foundation for understanding how we create repetitive patterns of selfing and suffering. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that kamma means intentional action (cetanā), he explores how wholesome intentions rooted in generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom lead to happiness, while unwholesome actions rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion lead to suffering.
>
> Armstrong discusses the ten unwholesome actions detailed in the suttas and explains how understanding kamma provides "the science of happiness" - reliable steps toward any form of wellbeing. He addresses Western resistance to teachings on kamma and rebirth, clarifying common misunderstandings while emphasizing that the teaching doesn't imply beings "deserve" their suffering. The talk explores six ways karmic consequences manifest, from immediate feelings to future results.
>
> The discussion of rebirth examines how consciousness continues from one existence to the next, carrying karmic patterns that shape new births. Armstrong references the Aṅgulimāla story and scientific research by Dr. Ian Stevenson to illustrate these teachings. He concludes by pointing toward the Noble Eightfold Path as "the action that leads to the end of action," setting up the next talk on liberation from compulsive patterns.

The talk tonight is the fourth in this series called Patterns of Becoming, describing how we create the self over and over again in these repetitive patterns that trap us in unhappiness or suffering, and how we release from these patterns.

The patterns I've been describing are basically karmic patterns. They're patterns that fit within the understanding of karma, the activity of karma, and the way out is also in the field of karma. So this evening, I want to explore this topic of karma as the foundation for understanding the next talk, which is how we come to the ending of these patterns.

Tonight I want to explore three aspects of action: karma itself, its results, and this question of rebirth.

The Dalai Lama was once asked if he had to choose between teaching Westerners about emptiness or about karma, which did he think was more important? He said it would be more important to teach about karma. We've talked quite a bit about emptiness in different ways on this retreat, but tonight I want to talk about this teaching on karma.

Bhikkhu Bodhi was giving an address to a group of Western teachers of Vipassana a few years ago at the study center in Barré, Massachusetts. He made the statement that if you don't teach karma and rebirth, you're not really teaching Buddha Dharma. So I want to be sure to fulfill Bhikkhu Bodhi's prerequisites tonight and make sure that at some point in this retreat we touch on these two themes, which are quite central in the teachings.

This word karma has entered our vocabulary in the West. You see it a lot, but it's not very well understood in the culture generally. I think the reason it's so important for us as human beings and as practitioners is that it's the science of happiness. If you want to become happy, there are very predictable and consistent steps that can be taken to lead to any kind of happiness you want to achieve. You can find human happiness, you can find heavenly happiness, and you can find the happiness of liberation through the different steps of the path once you understand how karma works. In this way, karma becomes our best friend along the path. In order for it to really serve us well, we need to understand its workings. Then it can take us anywhere we want to go on any of these destinations.

Much of what I'll talk about tonight is something I can't verify. A lot of our dharma talks discuss things that you can experience and we can experience and maybe we have experienced. This is not true for much of this topic. It takes extraordinary vision to be able to understand and see with insight the workings of karma. The Buddha said that he had this kind of vision. When he talked about karma and its law, he wasn't talking from a speculative view—it would be nice if maybe the universe worked this way. He was talking about what he could actually see with his concentrated, clear mind.

This is not something that most of us can verify. Maybe never in our life will we be totally able to verify it. But I feel it's important to consider it. The Buddha thought it was very important. He talked about it quite a lot. As a teacher, I don't think it's my job to tell you what to believe when it's something you can't verify. But I do think it is my job to tell you what the Buddha said about it, and then to leave it in your hands to figure out your own relationship to it.

Please understand that in what I share tonight, I'm not saying that you have to believe this, but I'm saying it might be worth considering and having an open mind that it could possibly be true. The Buddha had a pretty good track record on the things we can verify. Maybe there's just a chance he was right about this too. If we just open ourselves to that possibility, that's enough.

The word karma is a Sanskrit word and it simply means action. The Pali equivalent is kamma, K-A-M-M-A, and it also just means action. It's another one of these words that was common in the language at the time that the Buddha took and put a special meaning to. But basically it just means action. I might use the words karma and action interchangeably through this talk.

In the time of the Buddha, every philosophical school had some kind of opinion about action. They'd get together, and this is one of the main things they'd argue about. Some of the schools said action mattered. Others said it didn't matter. Some schools said action had no consequences. Other schools said action had consequences. Some schools said that all action is predetermined—you can't affect the action in your life because it's all set already. Other schools said, no, there's absolutely free choice and you can choose any action that you want.

But from the Buddha's point of view, all these were speculative views because the teachers didn't have direct experience to know what they were talking about. Whereas the Buddha said that he did.

The Buddha gave the word karma a new interpretation, a new definition, and this is the central piece of the meaning. He said, karma is action with volition, or you could use the word intention.

The Pali word is cetanā, and it's the word that we've been using in the meditation instructions as intention. It is the driving force in the mind that causes our actions of speech and of body to come through.

Now one slight refinement: the Buddha also considered thoughts and emotions to be volitional actions. So we say that this field of karma encompasses actions of body, of speech, and of mind, and they are karmic because they're intentional. They're volitional. Other synonyms for volition could be urge, impulse, motive, or motivation. So it's saying that they're actions that come out of some inner direction, some impulse to achieve some aim. And that's what puts them in the field of karma.

Moreover, the Buddha said actions are either wholesome or unwholesome depending on the quality of that volition or intention. If the volition is wholesome, the action is wholesome. If the volition is unwholesome, the action is unwholesome.

So, what do you think unwholesome actions come out of? Our three old friends: greed, aversion, and delusion are considered the roots of the unwholesome. Their opposites are considered the roots of the wholesome. The opposite of greed, the Buddha defined as renunciation—basically letting go, giving up. But you could also think of it as generosity, because in generosity we renounce something that we have. The opposite of aversion is loving-kindness, and the opposite of delusion is wisdom. So you can think of the wholesome roots as generosity, loving-kindness, and wisdom.

Then actions get influenced by either unwholesome or wholesome conditions in the mind. That's what gives them their karmic weight, their moral weight. So it's not the act per se; it's where it comes out of in our hearts and minds.

A simple example: an infant is lying on her bed, sleeping, rolls over and in her sleep knocks over a lamp that shorts a wire, causes an electrical fire, and the house starts to burn. Fortunately, because I don't want this to be a bummer, her parents come in and rescue her. She's fine. But the house might burn down. There's no karmic weight in her action because it was simply accidental, even though it led to a fire. No karmic weight.

Or consider a karmic action. Someone takes a sharp knife and slices open the belly of someone else and blood comes spewing out. Is that karmically wholesome or unwholesome? Could be either, couldn't it? If it's a surgeon who's healing out of compassion for the patient, it's wholesome. If it's a robber who's trying to steal the person's money or property, it's unwholesome. So it's not the action but the intention behind it that determines this kind of force.

And of course, as we look at our lives realistically, a lot of actions have mixed motives. If we look at our daily activities, we might give somebody a gift, which is very generous, but then we crave some recognition or appreciation or gratitude. So there can be a mixture of intentions in our actions.

Just looking, as an example with desire and aversion, at understanding how they become intentions or motivations, we see the basic thrust of desire is to gain something pleasant. The basic thrust or impulse of aversion is to push away what's unpleasant. The basic thrust of fear is to withdraw or back up from something that's unpleasant or threatening. So we see how a lot of these moods that we feel have hidden agendas or unspoken intentions in them.

The Buddha was quite clear about what kinds of actions particularly carry on this unwholesome activity. And he taught a list of what he called the ten unwholesome actions. I'm just going to go through them quickly so that we know the ground. They're very familiar from our practice of the precepts. Three of them are actions of body, four of them are actions of speech, and three of them are actions of mind.

So the three unwholesome bodily actions are killing living beings, taking what is not given, and engaging in sexual misconduct—sexual conduct that harms. And if you look at these, of course these form the basis, refraining from these is the basis of the first three lay precepts: non-killing, non-stealing, refraining from sexual misconduct.

The four unwholesome actions of speech are lying—and that relates to the fourth precept, which is to refrain from speaking what is untrue. The other three unwholesome actions of speech are using harsh or abusive speech towards someone, speaking maliciously of someone else to undermine their reputation, or engaging in idle chatter and gossip. This one's fairly light. But you can see how, number one, it's not a good use of time. Number two, it uses the events of other people's lives for entertainment or judgment. That's the motive behind gossip. It's not very supportive, generally.

