So the bodhisattva is not afraid to love—both in the vast way, in politics, in the environment, in social justice, in Black Lives Matter, in care for global warming, and all the things that are on our collective conscience and weigh on our heart. And in the most personal way as well.

A man was talking to Nisargadatta, my teacher in Bombay, complaining about his mother who was abusive, not a very good mother, not caring. He goes on and on, and finally Nisargadatta just stops him and says, "Love your mother. Love her anyway."

The man looks at Nisargadatta and says, "She wouldn't let me."

And Nisargadatta just rests for a moment and says, "She couldn't stop you. No one can stop you. No one can stop your love."

And it's never too late. That's the beautiful thing. It's never too late to be a bodhisattva. It's never too late to love. You can start today—and right on the money. Perfect timing.

So in the face of racism and war and violence and fundamentalism, the bodhisattva has one direction, like Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan—a kind of dignity and compassion and presence that will not harm yourself and will not harm another. And not only unafraid to love, but unafraid to be happy.

That's harder for some of you, I know that. Oh my God, is it okay to be happy? But I see in each one of you the child of the spirit. And if you do mudita, joy practice, one of the best ways to open the heart of joy is to vision people and see their happiest moment as a child, their best adventure. I mean, look around for a moment. Just take a peek at your fellow yogis. And when you look at somebody, imagine their best adventure as a girl or a boy—laughing, running, playing tag, doing whatever, some great adventure. That child of the spirit is there in every single one, just like the Dalai Lama and Tutu. They still have it.

I'm about to leave this retreat and go back to Boston to be with my twin brother who is back in the hospital with very difficult cancer treatment. And he's been really an inspiration for me. When we were eight years old and lived in Buffalo, where there's lots of snow, it was one winter day, freezing cold. We went out with our mittens and hats and coats. And I'm shivering—I was skinny as a rail and really shivering. He's much stockier and stronger and played football. I was in the orchestra and he played football. That just tells you how it was.

He watches me shake and shiver. And then he says, "It's not cold." And he takes his hat off. "It's not cold." He takes his scarf off. "It's not cold." He starts dancing. He takes his jacket off. Then he takes his shirt off. He strips to the waist. And he's dancing around in the snow with the wind blowing, saying, "Cold? It's just in your mind. It's not cold."

That's his spirit.

So a couple of years ago when my mom was ninety-one and she was dying, she was kind of drifting in and out of coma, in bed here in San Francisco, and my twin brother and my other two brothers were all there. And sometimes when she'd come back, we'd say, "Mom, what do you think about this? It looks like you're dying or you're letting go."

She said, "I wish I could be around more. I know people are going to go to Mars. They're going to go to other planets."

I wish I could see it. She had that little sense of adventure. So there she is, close to dying in the next day or two, and she's making little noises. Herb goes over and says, "Mom! You're going to go to the planets! You're on a rocket ship!" And he starts shaking her bed. "Come on, we're taking off! You're going to go!" Our mouths are hanging open—what are you doing? "Come on, Mom, you're going to go for a big ride!" He just has this irrepressible spirit. And there's something so compelling about carrying this as a bodhisattva.

This is a story of a woman who took her husband to the Mayo Clinic for an evaluation after he was diagnosed with ALS, Lou Gehrig's disease, which usually means just a couple of years until you die. "We heard a pianist playing in the crowded atrium and realized as we walked in that it was the first song we had ever danced to, and the song we chose to dance to at our wedding years and years before. Randall put down his briefcase filled with the doctor's reports and test results and took me in his arms and danced me all over that floor. And when it was over and folks were applauding, we became aware of how many people gathered around were in wheelchairs and walkers. We suddenly realized that in that spontaneous moment of celebration, we'd been dancing on behalf of the life and love that lived in each person gathered together in that place. We looked around the room, lined with those waiting in wheelchairs, and we found ourselves thinking of the pool of Bethesda. We imagined Jesus asking, 'Do you want to be healed?' We thought we heard him say, 'Then pick up your feet and dance.'"

So there's something that the bodhisattva also brings to the world—a kind of joy. "Now and then," writes Guillermo Pollaner, "it's good to pause in our pursuit of happiness and just be happy."

And Laurie Chapman gives this meditation instruction for when you go home. She says, "I like nothing more in the world than sitting on my ass doing nothing. And it's not my fault that I have this attitude because I happen to have an amazingly comfortable ass. It may not look like much, but if you could sit on this baby for two minutes, you'd realize that getting up off this ass would be a crime against nature."

So close your eyes for a little bit and do a reflection. If you were to create your own bodhisattva vow to guide your life, to set the direction of your heart through all the many seasons and changes that human incarnation brings, make it simple. If you were to set your heart and make a vow, it could be as simple as, "I vow to be kind." What would it be on this beautiful rainy evening at the end of a silent retreat? Listen to your heart.

Let your eyes open. And if you are inclined—not at this moment, but this evening—write it down. And if you want to take it a step further, show it to someone else that you love. It's a very shy, tender thing to do, but you can say, "Oh, Jack told me I should do it." That gives you a little excuse. It's a beautiful thing because when you show it to someone, it's almost like you're saying out loud this, the heart of your bodhisattva intention.

From Mary Oliver, a poem called "The Buddha's Last Instruction." I think of this every morning. I think of the Buddha every morning as the east begins to tear off its many clouds of darkness, to send up the first signal—a white fan streaked with pink and violet, even green. An old man, he lay down between two sal trees, and he might have said anything knowing it was his final hour. Around him the villagers gathered and stretched forward to listen. No doubt he thought of everything that had happened in his difficult life. Slowly, beneath the branches, he raised his head. He looked into the faces of that frightened crowd. "Make of yourself a light," he said. "Make of yourself a light."

That's it.

CHAPTER 63

Liberation and Mindfulness

Jack Kornfield · 1h02

> In this opening talk from a fall insight meditation retreat, Jack Kornfield offers a comprehensive exploration of mindfulness as the path to liberation. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that mindfulness is "the gateway to liberation and freedom," he contrasts two fundamental ways of living: the saṃsāric mode of unconscious reactivity driven by fear, greed, and delusion, and the awakened mode of loving awareness that brings inner peace and graciousness.
> Kornfield presents three progressive levels of mindfulness practice. The first involves becoming present with the content of experience—learning to be with bodily sensations, emotions, and thoughts without reactivity, thereby expanding what neuroscience calls our "window of tolerance." The second level shifts attention to the process itself, seeing all phenomena as impermanent (anicca), selfless (anattā), and arising and passing away. The third and deepest level turns attention to consciousness itself, discovering that while the body exists in time, awareness does not. He references the Ādittapariyāya Sutta (the Fire Sermon) and teachings from Ajahn Chah and Ajahn Mun to illuminate how this shift in identity—becoming "the one who knows"—offers the greatest freedom.
> The teaching emphasizes that liberation is available here and now, not requiring years of practice or distant pilgrimages. Kornfield weaves together stories from hospice work, neuroscience research on telomeres, and teachings from Mahāghosānanda's peace walks in Cambodia to demonstrate how mindfulness practice naturally leads to both inner freedom and compassionate engagement with the world. The talk concludes with the invitation to perfect not ourselves, but our love—recognizing that all beings are part of our family.

Ringing the bell before a talk makes it sound momentous, but actually I just like ringing the bell. We got it on the opening day of this retreat hall. We were thinking we needed a bell and then magically San Francisco Zen Center sent us a gift, said, "We think you need a bell." And we did. So thank you, Zen Center.

You've completed one day of the retreat practice. A few of you are on your first retreat, and many of you have done quite a few retreats, but it still is a process of settling down. Tonight I'd like to talk about the core of our practice together. I'd like to talk about mindfulness, or what I also will be using as a synonym: loving awareness.

If you read in the Buddhist texts, they begin in the most wonderful way: that for living beings to realize well-being and liberation and overcome sorrow and grief and lamentation and despair—I think Spring talked about that—it's the practice of mindfulness. And in other texts, it says mindfulness is all-helpful, that mindfulness is the gateway to liberation and freedom. So I want us to think together, those of you who've been practicing for a long time and those who are newer, about what this means and what it means for us. How does this operate?

There are two ways to function in the world. One is without mindfulness. This is sometimes called samsaric, or cyclic—the cyclic way of living. Because without mindfulness, without some sense of awareness, when experiences arise, what arises with them is habit, reactivity. We get fearful, we get caught, we're blind. We like it, we don't like it. Without mindfulness, we live in a somewhat unconscious set of patterns that simply enact the conditioning around us—the cultural conditioning, the educational conditioning, and so forth. And as we do, not only is there not much sense of awareness and freedom, but unfortunately, those patterns build because they're based in delusion, in fear, in a sense that we can't trust the world, that we have to protect ourselves. It's called the body of fear. And it grows.

Just coming back from teaching with Trudy in China, being in Asia, talking to people in Singapore and Korea and so forth, I saw that as those societies have modernized, there's a tremendous amount of stress. There's all the kind of great prosperity that's happened, but there's also extremely high suicide rates for their children in Korea and Singapore and parts of China—children who are being driven to be ambitious and fulfill the goals of their parents or of the society. And then there's the grief that comes and the struggle. All of this is a kind of samsaric way of being where things continue to operate, but there's not a sense of inner freedom, of mindfulness, of being able to step back and really listen in a wise way.

If you read what is called the Fire Sermon, one of the first major talks of the Buddha, he begins: "This world is burning. This world is on fire"—which is something that I think you can taste in the air here. So it's not just metaphorical. But then he goes on: in what way is this world burning? It's burning with the fires of greed. It's burning with the fires of hatred and ignorance. It's burning with the fires of delusion. And these fires cause immense suffering. We can see those forces as they operate in the world and, to a certain extent, in our own lives when we're caught in greed and grasping and hatred and fear and ignorance and confusion. That's the samsaric nature, the repetitive nature of unconsciousness.

After his enlightenment, as the myth tells it, the Buddha surveyed the world with the eye of compassion in all four quarters and saw that there were beings suffering everywhere in different ways from delusion and greed and fear. And he saw that it would be possible to teach them a way that brought inner peace, liberation, wakefulness, ease, a sense of trust, graciousness. The way that he taught was to offer what we're doing here: the training and practice of mindfulness.

Now, whether you're a long-term practitioner or whether you're somewhat new, you don't have to wait for more years to find freedom, and you don't have to go to a long retreat in Thailand or Burma or go to the Himalayas. Freedom and well-being is available exactly where you are. I mean, where else would it be? This very body and this very mind is the place of liberation. It's the place we can get entangled and lost and habitual and repetitive and reactive and fearful. And it's also the place where trust, graciousness, wakefulness, and compassion can be born. As we find these qualities, or as we mature into them over the years of practice, we also then bring them to the world that so much needs them.

You're all familiar with the passage from Thich Nhat Hanh where he says: when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive. And so as you train and practice in this great art of mindfulness and loving awareness, you become that person on the boat of the world that so much needs it.

The invitation, however many years of practice you have done, has two sides to it. One side, which Spring spoke about this morning, is an invitation to ease.

This is from Zen Master Ryokan, the most beloved poet in Japanese history. He writes:

If someone asks what is the mark of enlightenment or illusion, I cannot say. Praise and blame, wealth and honor are nothing but dust. As the evening falls, I sit in my hermitage and stretch out both feet as an answer.

And so there he is in his mountain hermitage. Praise and blame, gain and loss, wealth and honor—what is the mark of enlightenment? I stretch out my feet in answer. There's something so gracious and lovely about this. He's not in conflict with the world.

So one of the invitations for your practice is to find ease in your heart, in your body, in your mind. And the other, which is a complement to that, is the invitation of fearlessness. Fearlessness doesn't mean you won't have fear. Anybody in this room not have fear? Raise your hand. You can have your money back. It doesn't work that way.

Fearlessness is something else. It is the steadiness, the courage, and the discipline to be present for this world with graciousness and ease on one side, but also with your full being. This is the invitation of practice—both ease and a kind of fearlessness that grows as we sit and walk.

When you think about where we're going on the spiritual path, the goal is not so much to get somewhere, but rather to open to the mystery of life. As it's said, the mystery of life is not a problem to solve but a reality to experience.

I think about sitting with one of the teachers from Spirit Rock, Marlene Jones. A couple of years ago, she had heart failure. Unfortunately, where she was in the circumstances, it took a long time for the paramedics to get to her—fifteen or twenty minutes. So she had no oxygen to her brain for a long time. They got her to the hospital, iced her down, put her in a coma, and brought her back out. For a week they tried everything they could to get any response from her. Nothing. They did all kinds of tests—brain dead, zero.

Sitting with her family, together we decided it was time to take her off all the life support machines. I was holding her hand and looking at her, saying, "Marlene, you've been so important and such a great colleague. You're dying too soon. I'm going to miss you, and there were so many things you could have done with us. But the least you could do is give us a sign." Sort of teasing her a little bit, trying to make people who were sitting with her—her daughter and so forth—smile a little bit as well.

As soon as I said that, two tears rolled down her cheeks. A week of nothing. The doctors prodding her, different electrical brain monitoring and so forth—nothing. "The least you could do is give us a sign," and then the tears.

Who are we? Who are you? What is that spirit that was born into your body and that will also leave your body when you die? I could tell lots more stories, but you get the idea—we actually live in mystery. To be a human being is the most remarkable, mysterious thing you can imagine.

I was at the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering a couple of years ago. I don't think that will be happening again soon—I'm going to leave that aside. I was able to give one of the key talks there on the Buddhist teachings of wise society: treating all members of society with respect, coming together in harmony and leaving in harmony. You know the things we've seen so recently—taking care of the vulnerable, the young, the elderly, those who are sick, the women. This is a way, said the Buddha, that a society prospers and does not decline. And care for the environment. There's a whole text about wise society.

But it's also not all that different from what you'd find in the great spiritual traditions around the world—from the Native Americans, from the wisest teachings in Jewish and Christian traditions, in Native traditions in Africa, and all kinds of places like that.

But the difference, and what made this conference so compelling, was that while these are beautiful visions of wise society, there's actually a way to do it. With the five thousand neuroscience studies and papers in the last few decades on mindfulness and compassion, it's now—as you know—in school systems, tens of thousands of them, in clinics, being employed in business, in the arts, and so forth. I have a big packet that was sent to me called "Mindful Nation," signed by the eighty-five members of the British Parliament Mindfulness Group.

We can only hope that it's transmitted across the pond to our side sometime soon.

With mindfulness comes an invitation to freedom here and now, where we are. It's the only place we can find it. And it manifests at three different levels—call it mindfulness or loving awareness.

The first level of freedom is our ability to know and be present for the content of experience. We sit with our breath and our body, and we encounter tension and pain, pleasure and ease, tingling, heat, and fire. We learn how to sit with it. We can name it gently: this is tingling, this is tension. These are the different experiences we have. As we sit and the body starts to open, we become aware of the content of our body experience—all the sensations and feelings that make up our embodied life.

What grows with this, in neuroscience terms, is called the window of tolerance. We live in a society that is pretty much terrified of pain, a culture of comfort. Too cold? Turn up the heat. Too hot? Turn on the air conditioning. Do whatever you can to make yourself comfortable. If you're uncomfortable, the problem is out there.

But here's the thing: Is there anybody in the room who doesn't have discomfort or pain in their life, in spite of all those attempts to keep it at bay? You don't have to bother raising your hand. This is simply the way it is—praise and blame, pleasure and pain. We have it all.

If we can actually be with the content of our experience, we start to find a freedom already. Freedom with pain, freedom with tingling and tension, with hot and cold. Instead of being so reactive, mindfulness allows us to be present for that experience.

Of course, it can get more extreme. Trudy and I had dinner in Hawaii while visiting some friends, and this world-famous magician named David Blaine was there doing card tricks that I couldn't imagine how he accomplished. He said he loved performing them especially in front of scientists. He showed us videos he'd done with Stephen Hawking and Bill Gates, and they were going crazy wondering, "How could you do that? What's the physics of this?" I just said, "This is really good magic."

He was talking about how he pushes his body to extremes—he's the one who hung in a glass box over the Thames River for forty-three days, only drinking liquids without eating. He's an extreme kind of guy. I talked about living in a monastery where our training was to master the postures by sitting for twenty-four hours without moving, or standing for twenty-four hours without moving. He said, "Oh yeah, I once did twelve days standing without moving." I said, "Okay, you've got me." But it felt like there was some kind of brotherhood between us.

What happens when we learn to be mindful is that we can actually tolerate this world rather than be frightened of it. And it's not just a personal freedom that comes. As James Baldwin writes, "I imagine one of the reasons people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

When we can't bear our pain or our fear or our insecurity, we project it out onto others—on the communists, or the black people, or the yellow people, or the native people, or the Muslims, or the immigrants. It was Russia for a while. I think Russia is coming back as an enemy du jour; it's going to have a recurrence now. But we project it out because we live in a way that can't bear the reality of insecurity. And yet, it's the truth of the world.

So we learn more and more what it's like to be present for our body. And in the same way, we learn how to be present for our feelings—the tears and joy and grief and all the things that will come up on retreat.

Here is a story from Frank Ostaseski, who started the Zen Center Hospice and is a good friend I've been teaching with recently. He writes about a woman named Jillian. She worked in publishing, and when her mother developed Alzheimer's, she decided to bring her mother with dementia to live with her and hired a caregiver. One day she came home and walked into the living room to find all her beloved books—including her favorite Buddhist texts—scattered across the floor. Her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty books. I'm going to give them to my dentist."

You can hear the mind state.

And she became immediately angry and trapped and caught up, and started to scold the caregiver. "How could you let this happen? How could you let her do this?" And the caregiver, who wasn't caught in that drama, replied, "Madam, today I pack the books up. Tomorrow I will unpack them. If this gives a sense of control to a woman who has lost so much, well then, that's okay with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

And you can feel the graciousness of heart and the ability to be with uncertainty and change that's in that story. This is why we call it loving awareness. We start to learn a graciousness with the body experience, with the feelings that we have, with the mind states that come. Because we'll have all kinds of views come here. You're doing well, your mind tells you. You're not doing well. The world is a mess, but it's so beautiful. And everything in between, because the mind has no pride and it just keeps spitting out stories and plans and wise things and fearful ones and beliefs and so forth.

When I was eight or nine years old, probably around nine, we lived in Buffalo, New York—lots of snow. There was this huge snowstorm, icy winds. My twin brother and I, and my other brother a year younger, we decided we went out to play and got all wrapped up. The wind was blowing wildly. My twin brother was a lot bigger than I. He played football and I was not a football player, we'll just say that. Much more robust. I was really skinny then, and I was shaking and shivering. It was freezing cold and I'm shaking out there. He looked at me and said, "It's not cold." I said, "What do you mean?" He took off his hat, he unwrapped his scarf. "It's not cold." The wind is blowing, freezing. He took off his jacket. Pretty soon he stripped himself down to the waist and started dancing around saying, "You just think it's cold. You just think it's cold."

I remember this for my whole life. There was something about him, even as a young boy, knowing that mind states determine how we live in this world. And I didn't have to be caught in, "Oh, it's terrifying and it's cold and I'm frightened and I'm shivering and I have to go inside."

So as we become aware of the content of experience and can see the stories we tell and the beliefs, we say, "Oh, that's a belief. That's a story. How interesting." But we don't have to get caught in it.

Now the next level of mindfulness is mindfulness of the process. And for those of you who've been practicing for some time over these months and years, as you quiet your mind and open your heart, the sense of freedom of being able to be with experience begins to shift, because you start to look at the process of body and mind and senses in the world. What you see is that it's all impermanent. It's all arising and changing and passing away, and selfless in the sense that you don't choose your thoughts—I hope not. Anyway, most of them in there you wouldn't choose. You don't choose your feelings very much. You certainly don't choose your body sensations. And you see that it's ephemeral, insecure, subject to change, subject to pain. This is the way it is. Everything you pay attention to arises for a time and vanishes. All of it.

In the time you listen to this one sentence, fifty thousand cells will have been born in your body and fifty thousand will have died. That's a billion in a day. Your body's always dying and being reborn and remaking itself, as is your whole idea of yourself.

As you start to see the process of experience, then a different kind of freedom comes, because you realize it's all changing and you don't want to hold on to it. Otherwise you get rope burn.

I remember walking with Ajahn Chah one day out on an alms round, and there was a big boulder in the field nearby.

And he said to us, is that boulder heavy? And of course we said to the master, yes, it is. And he said, not if you don't pick it up.

That was a kind of pith teaching about seeing the process of life and realizing that we can tend to it. We can respond, we can care for our family, our community, and the world, but we don't have to grasp it—because it's ungraspable. And there grows an ease with birth and death, with joy and sorrow.

So the second level of freedom comes when we start to see the nature of things and we get easy with it.

Frank Ostaseski tells a story about a woman who died at Zen Hospice, and one of her sons was twelve years old with Down syndrome. They were afraid to bring him, Tommy, because they didn't know how he would understand his mother's death. But Frank said, let's try it out. The father said, well, maybe we should talk to his therapist. Frank said, bring the therapist along—we'll work it out.

So Tommy went in to see his mother and stood there for a bit. Everybody was frightened that he'd freak out. And he looked at her and he said, "What is gone?" Just kind of in wonder. "What is gone?" Then he looked at his mother for a while and Frank said, what do you think, Tommy? And he started to talk about the Transformers movies where one thing would transform to another. She died—maybe she'll turn into something else. Very wise.

Frank said he stood there with him, realizing that Tommy was trying to understand in his own way. And then Tommy did a kind of remarkable thing. Frank asked, is there anything else you want to say to your mother or do with your mother? Tommy went over, and first he touched her very gently on her cheek. Then he began to smell her. He sniffed her whole body from head all the way down to her feet.

Frank said he remembered one time he was driving in New England, and a car ahead of him had hit a deer and killed it. There was a fawn with its mother, the deer that had died on the side of the road, and the fawn was coming and sniffing its mother, trying to understand what had happened. He said he stood there and it was so tender and so mysterious to have Tommy just go and be there and smell his mother. And then Tommy said, "Yes, okay." And he walked out.

This is us. We're in this mystery of birth and death. And to know the process of things gives a profound sense of freedom—that it is natural to be born, natural to die. It's natural to have birth and death, joy and sorrow, praise and blame, gain and loss. And there grows a graciousness and an understanding.

Then the third level of mindfulness that happens is the mindfulness of consciousness itself. Content, process, consciousness.

My teacher Ajahn Chah had practiced as a monk in the forest for about ten years, very ardently. In those days the forest had tigers, and everybody got malaria pretty much. He did all these austere practices and lots of deep meditation and had visions and profound insights and so forth. He finally went to see the greatest master of that time, another ajahn named Ajahn Mun. He told him all about his practices and said, do you have any guidance for me?

Ajahn Mun looked back at him and said, yes, Chah—you've missed the point. Those are just experiences. Dissolve your body into light, have a great vision, have some deep insight, overcome pain and pleasure and so forth—those are like movies. You get a war movie and a documentary and a romantic comedy and a love story. They all come and go. The only question for you to ask for your freedom is: to whom do these happen?

Turn your attention from the content or even the process of the experience back to the knowing, and become the one who knows. This invites a shift of identity.

"You live in illusion in the appearance of things," says Kalu Rinpoche, a great old Tibetan lama. "There is a reality, but you do not know this. When you remember, you will discover that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. That is all."

So there's something for you to reflect on for the next nine days.

What it's pointing to is this—let me see if I can say it much more simply, because this is really a key to liberation. When you look in the mirror, you notice you've aged, right? We all have that experience. The body is losing its fur and sagging and doing the things that aging does, wrinkling and all those changes. But the curious thing that's very common is you don't necessarily feel older. You know how common that experience is? That's because it's only your body that has aged. Your body exists in time. It grows—a little child, then an older child, a teen, a young adult, and it goes on. Then it gets older, and it dies.

But the awareness that's looking at that body in the mirror doesn't exist in time. It simply observes: "Oh, well, how are we doing at this stage of life? Hmm, lost some more fur," or whatever your commentary might be. "I wonder how much longer this one will last." Because, you know, you get it from Avis and then you have to turn it back in, right? It's just how it works.

So you start to look into the mystery of who you are. You turn your attention back to become the awareness itself, to look into who you are and to become the knowing, the one who knows. And you know this already in yourselves, in your being.

Alice Walker writes, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was, and it came to me—that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and I run all around the house." When it happens, you just can't miss it.

Walking in the high mountains, listening to a piece of sacred music, making love, sitting with someone who's dying, or being there at the birth of a new human being—it's a wild thing. Here's another person coming out of someone's body. It's extraordinary. And you go, "Okay, all right, I don't really have the kind of intellectual answer, but I'm present for this mystery of life itself coming out of nothing."

You start to become the witness. You start to trust that you can rest in awareness itself. And this level of mindfulness gives you, as Ajahn Mun said, the greatest freedom of all—the freedom to sit with birth and to sit with death.

When you have this freedom, I think of my good friend and colleague and teacher, Maha Ghosananda, who was the Gandhi of Cambodia, nominated for the Nobel Prize many times. He went back after the Cambodian genocide and the Khmer Rouge and spent fifteen years leading people back to their villages on foot. He told them, "You can't go in a bus or a car. You have to reclaim your land step by step with chants of loving-kindness." Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. And they walked through the jungles and the killing fields, ringing a bell and chanting all the way back.

He was someone who had had this very deep training. He knew all nineteen members of his family had been killed. Yet there was a way in which he understood how to return to the world. Because the end of this process of mindfulness—from content to process to consciousness itself—doesn't end in some kind of spaced-out realm. Rather, when you enter and discover that who you are is nothing, and being nothing you are everything, as Kalu Rinpoche said, then the world becomes your family. You return and enter the world with a wiser heart and a freer spirit, no matter what happens.

Now as you continue to practice on this retreat, you will sense these levels as you go through the foundations of mindfulness. As your body opens up more—and Christiana will talk more about it tomorrow evening—you can learn how to be present for your body, not by striving, but as Spring talked about, with a graciousness or an ease. You let your body settle. Or if you can't be with your breath, you can pay attention to your hands or to the sounds around you. But you keep gently coming back and steadying your attention.

And as you do, of course, at the content level, you become able to be aware of the different pains and tensions and the things that are carried in your body. But at the same time, you also will start to find moments of ease and pleasure. Joy is one of the factors of enlightenment. Peace and equanimity are other factors of enlightenment.

For those who are experienced practitioners, one of the best instructions you can have is to look for the moments of ease, the moments of joy, the moments of presence—and invite them to expand. Let the sense of well-being that starts to come periodically as you sit or walk, invite it to open. Dwell in it. Rest in it. You start to shift the figure and ground from the struggle with the body, even though sometimes you have to sit with things that are quite difficult and painful. Instead, you also invite a sense of ease and peace and well-being. This shift becomes really helpful.

Then as your mind gets quieter and you shift from content to process, the experiences of the body and the senses begin to break up and pixelate. Every sensation that's tight in the body, the sounds you hear—they all become like many little vibrations. Whatever seems solid starts more and more to become visible to your mindfulness or your loving awareness as a kind of vibrating energy field, full of life and not solid at all.

Trudy and I were at a conference together with Elissa Epel, who works with Liz Blackburn at UC Medical Center here. Liz received the Nobel Prize for discovering telomeres. Part of their research, which completely shocked them, was that after eight weeks of meditation practice, the telomeres—which are the caps on the end of chromosomes that protect them and keep them alive longer—actually grew and extended. They couldn't believe it. They replicated it a few times. They were afraid to publish it because people would think they were kind of kooky. But that wasn't what she talked about. We already knew that.

She talked about some new research, and I really want to read this study to figure out how they did it. They studied the telomeres in a community that had a big disparity between rich and poor. Those who were poor, as you would expect, had frayed telomeres—the stress and the poverty and the racism and all the kinds of suffering affect the body very deeply. But the thing that was interesting is that those who were wealthy in that community, even if they were in a gated community, their telomeres had also diminished. It's as if the cells of your body are tuned in to the environment. You are not separate from your environment. It's really wild.

So as you get deeper and quieter, you start to see the body as an energy field. Yes, you can be with the content, but you see the process of life itself. And then there comes this mysterious thing that happens where you both love the body and tend it and care for it because it's really precious—and yet you discover something more.

I think of this quadriplegic who came to some dharma teachings. I can still hear his voice at one point where he said, "I've discovered I am not the body." He'd been unable to move for a number of years. He said, "I've discovered I am not this body. Hallelujah!" He shouted it out. And so there's both the care for the body, but in this paradoxical way, there's also an understanding that you rent it, you use it, you love it, you care for it—but it's not who you really are.

In the same way, these levels work with feelings. You notice the content of your feelings. As C.S. Lewis wrote, you will discover inside "a zoo of lusts, a bedlam of ambitions, a nursery of fears, and a harem of fondled hatreds"—and every other feeling in between. I won't read it, but I have a list of five hundred different feelings. So you start to see the content of the feelings and you're able to be present for them and to name them, to acknowledge, "This is sadness. Sad, sad." "This is excitement. Excitement, excitement." By naming the experiences, like naming the dragon, there comes a kind of freedom in relationship to them.

As that goes on, there comes a kind of maturing, because people often don't even know what they're feeling. I have a friend named Arturo Behar, who was the vice president of Facebook for a while. His job, among other things—he was an engineer—but then he was in charge of problem-solving for Facebook. He said, "So I was also the complaints department. And because we have nine hundred and eighty million users, it didn't take very long to get a million complaints." Talk about a complaints department!

He said about a third of them were engineering problems. "I gave them to the engineers and they fixed them. That's what engineers do, mostly, if they're good. But two-thirds of them were the problems between people."

You posted a picture of me that I don't like, I don't look good in it. You posted a picture of my children, how dare you. You said that about me. It was conflict between people.

At first, Arturo sent the boilerplate policy: if it's lewd or lascivious or hateful, then we'll take it down. This is our policy. Nobody was happy.

So he realized they had to do something about these complaints. He thought maybe it would be good if people contacted each other. He started sending out a message: Why don't you talk to the person that upset you? Or message them, whatever. But then he realized people weren't very skillful at that. So he said: Why don't you tell them what upset you and how you felt about it?

After a little while, he found that people didn't know what they felt. So he sent out those little emoticons—angry, sad, whatever. You can show them how you felt about it. And then he suggested: Why don't you get curious and ask them why they posted it?

The people who answered would say, "Well, I thought you looked good in that picture," or "I love your children. I thought it was a great thing. I'm so sorry." It turned out that in ninety-five percent of cases where people actually talked to each other, the conflict was resolved. As Arturo said, "I get to teach social and emotional learning and conflict resolution skills to 980 million people."

This is something we're learning in a much deeper way in ourselves—to recognize what we're feeling. Often that means recognizing the trauma, the deep hurts that are carried in our body, the stories that come with it, the emotions. It means being willing and able to be present for it all, the full content of it.

And then something very interesting happens. Because you feel both the suffering you've been through and the beauty of your life, you kind of open yourself to that. You become able to bear your measure of tears and your measure of sorrows. As the heart becomes more tender through practice—and many of you have practiced for a long time—you actually become more sensitive. But you also become more courageous and wiser. You're able to tolerate both the tears and the joy of the world, to bear witness to them, to bear them.

Then you receive something called the tears of the way, which are tears that are poignant. You feel the sufferings of the world and you see its unbearable beauty, and you let your heart be touched by them all.

The fact that we don't know this in our culture... As someone said, I'd like to take every legislator by the hand and walk them next to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and have them read out loud the names of everyone who was lost before anybody votes for war. Do not send anyone to war who does not know how to weep. When we talk about in our body politic the kind of conflicts that are happening and have happened, if that person isn't weeping, they're not paying attention.

We become more sensitive, but we also increase our capacity for love, for presence. As we do, we start to see the river of feelings that make up human life—fear and longing and love and grief and loss and delight and the feelings of connection and creativity. We can bow and name them: fear is like this, longing is like this, love is like this, sadness is like this, connection is like this. We start to inhabit and feel that this is the nature of human incarnation. We see the process of life itself rather than taking it so personally.

Then we look at the mind, the third foundation of mindfulness—the thoughts. This becomes really important as those who've practiced for a long time have matured, because we're really talking about how we live and embody this, not just on retreat but in life.

The Buddhist texts say: Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you worse than your own mind untrained. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than a trained and tame mind—not even the most loving parents or loving members of your family.

You start to see the stories and the attitudes, the content of thought. The whole inner dialogue that you build your sense of self and world out of. It's sometimes rather alarming for those who come on their first retreat. It's like you're stuck in a motel late at night and the shopping channel's on and you can't turn it off. You start to realize that ninety-five percent of what's in there is reruns—the same show as yesterday, whether good or bad.

They keep repeating themselves. The mind secretes thoughts like the salivary gland secretes saliva. It just does. But you also begin to notice the attitudes that you glom onto or that you get attached to. This is right and this is wrong and so forth. You start to see those different thoughts and attitudes.

And then, because you've been practicing for a while, you get to do what my beloved Trudy has taught me about, which she calls an attitude adjustment—where you see, okay, this is an attitude, but it actually doesn't have my best interest in mind. And you actually begin to realize that you can shift from one particular view or attitude to another. So you start to know the content and the stories and you don't believe them so much. You don't take them so seriously—the stories of unworthiness or the stories of grandiosity, the stories of success or failure, you know what your mind does, all of those kinds of things. And there comes a shift of identity where you're not so much identified with your thoughts. It becomes more about the process.

There's that wonderful story I'd like to tell of Ram Dass coming back from India with his beard and beads as Baba Ram Dass, teaching, and a woman in the front row waving her hand and saying, "Ram Dass, you're teaching all these Hindu things, Hindu guru, but aren't you Jewish?" And Ram Dass said, "Yeah, I am actually. I was bar mitzvahed." And he said, "There's a lot I love about Judaism. The Hasidic masters are like the Zen masters. If you read Buber's Tales of the Hasidim, they're fantastic. And the Kabbalah has all these maps of the levels of consciousness that are a great match to the Hindu teachings I love." Then he said, "But remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side." And he was, of course, very witty as well as deep.

Because your identity is not your parents. And it's not even your gender or your race or your class. Those are things to honor and pay attention to. Without honoring them, we can have a lot of suffering. But that's not fundamentally who you are. As you become quieter, you start to see, oh, that's only the personality, when you look at the thoughts in the mind. Like your pet—okay, you've got it. Unfortunately, you've got a mutt in some cases, one of those adopted from the shelter. But you start to realize that the thought structures and the beliefs and the things you've been told about yourself—not only can you adjust your attitude, but you can also step back from them and see that those are just thoughts coming and going. They're like bubbles in a stream, and they don't last.

And it doesn't take that much. Here's a letter I received:

"Dear Jack, I really don't know how to talk to you directly, but I wanted to express how grateful I am just to be aware of your teachings. I found out about you through Duncan Trussell's podcast last year"—Duncan is a kind of dharma comedian with a big following among millennials, and I did some things with him—"and little by little, your ideas of loving yourself and having compassion kept inching their way toward what I guess is my heart. You soothed me in darker days and given me a glimpse into a more loving reality for myself. Tonight, I finally gave in and tried meditating. I decided after hearing you speak through my phone for months and months, I'd finally give in and just sit with myself for a while. I'm not sure I've ever cried tears of joy like that in the twenty-one years I've lived so far. For the first time, I stopped and really held my anger that I latched onto, my anxiety, my hatred, and everything else I criticized myself about, with softness and compassion, without judgment. And all of a sudden, I felt like I really could be loving to myself in the same way that I want to love others. I finally got some relief with what I felt inside and want you to know that I love you for it. Thank you so much."

It doesn't take that long. You don't have to go to the Himalayas. Maybe you have to come to Spirit Rock, but that's another story.

So you start to see these layers of mindfulness that acknowledges the content, that sees the process, and then steps back. And the shift of identity—as Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic, says: "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fount of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from unseen roots of all creation, welcoming me tenderly, saluting me with humility and humanity." He's talking about his meditation, that all these things come unbidden, the joys and sorrows, but underneath, as we shift our identity and become the one who knows, there comes a spaciousness and a freedom and a beauty.

And that's the fourth foundation of mindfulness, which is mindfulness of the dharma, of the laws that are operating—for example, the law of cause and effect.

That if you practice anger, guess what becomes more your habit? Anger. And not only that, if you plant seeds of anger by getting angry at lots of other people, guess what you will get back? Anger. If you plant seeds of love and practice love in yourself, that's what will grow. And you plant it in the world, that's what will return. If you plant greed in yourself, that's what will grow in you. And so you start to see this is actually very impersonal. This is simply how consciousness works.

And then you begin to see the emptiness of it, as it says in the Dhammapada and the Diamond Sutra: like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream. Things arise—thoughts, feelings, experiences, whole years. I mean, what happened to 2016? It's back there with Y2K. Remember that one in the year 2000? And also back there with the Great Depression and the Egyptian empires and dynasties, all in the past. It went back to emptiness. There's this, and then it disappears.

And as you get quiet, you start to see: whoa, wait a second, it seems very solid, but all there is, is now. All there is, is this present. And the more you become able to rest in the awareness of this, you become the one who knows. There's a shift in reality for you. The experiences of the world still arise, but there's a sense of spaciousness, openness, graciousness, and of deep love.

As my teacher Nisargadatta in Bombay, the old guru, said, "Wisdom sees that I am nothing and love sees that I am everything, and between these two my life flows." Because as you get more empty, and if you look to see who am I—am I the little awareness inside here, like that's yourself—you look and you can't find anything except it's aware. There's no self, nothing separate. And you start to realize that awareness is what the world is made of, consciousness itself. All things born out of consciousness. And from this place, you realize that it's your family then. This is who you are. Wisdom says, I am nothing. Love says, I'm everything. Between these two, my life flows.

Mother Teresa puts it one way. She says, "The trouble with you is you draw your family circle too small." Life is your family. You come out of life. You are life. And you are what life is born from.

I think of Sharon Salzberg, our dear friend and colleague, who was walking down the street one day in Seattle when a somewhat toothless homeless man came up to her and said, "Don't you know me? Don't you know me?" And first she had to stop, because we've had a lot of students on retreats—it could have been somebody from her 1978 three-month retreat or whatever. But it turned out it wasn't somebody she literally knew. She said the moment was so affecting to her when he said, "Don't you know me?" Because he's one of us. He is one of us. He's one of our family members.

And as you get emptier, or as you learn to rest as awareness itself, you discover that this is what's real. This, and love. Because in the end, the point isn't to perfect yourself. It's to perfect your love. To be able to open the heart and mind and realize that, as the texts say, "Oh nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember your true nature." Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. Everything is waiting for you.

The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and seen the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you.

I feel so grateful to have had the years of practice and training where I've learned some of these things I speak about in myself. Sometimes I don't really know how people even can get through great difficulties without having some inner practices. It's so much harder. And I also just feel grateful that we have a community together to remind one another. It's welcoming and revolutionary—who you really are.

There's a freedom and an invitation. And the beautiful thing that the Buddha says when he speaks about freedom is this: If it were not possible to free the heart and mind amidst all the changing circumstances of the world, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible—and possible for you—I offer these teachings.

You are sitting at the bedside of the world, the world of birth and death and joy and sorrow, and you're learning how to do it beautifully.

The Bodhisattva Path of Joy (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Jack Kornfield · 1h01

> In this profound retreat talk, Jack Kornfield weaves together the inner journey of stillness with the outer path of compassionate engagement. Drawing from his own teachers—Ajahn Chah, Mahā Ghosānanda, and the Dalai Lama—he explores how deep meditative practice naturally opens into bodhisattva action. The talk illuminates the compound meaning of bodhisattva (bodhi meaning awakened, sattva meaning being) as one committed to the awakening of all beings.
> Kornfield shares moving stories that demonstrate presence in the face of life's greatest mysteries: Frank Ostaseski's account of parents washing their deceased child's body, the remarkable 500-year peace plan of Sri Lankan community organizer A.T. Ariyaratne, and the courage of ordinary people standing for justice. He emphasizes that the key to bodhisattva action lies in intention—both short-term (asking 'what is my best intention?' before acting) and long-term (setting the compass of the heart through vows).
> The teaching challenges the notion that spiritual practice means withdrawal from the world. Citing Gandhi's weekly day of contemplation even while dismantling the British Empire, Kornfield offers the Zen saying: 'There are only two things—you sit and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is.' He reminds practitioners that awakening brings not grim duty but profound joy, quoting the Buddha's instruction: 'Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate.' The talk concludes with an invitation to deepen practice while recognizing that the stillness cultivated serves not just oneself but the healing of the world.

What becomes apparent today, as I've had a chance to speak with various people in meetings and with the other teachers as well, is how much greater stillness and settledness there is in the retreat and in people's hearts and minds. It doesn't mean there isn't stuff of all different kinds, but it's a very different experience to allow this deepening of stillness to happen in the room, in your own body, in your own heart.

Crowfoot, a Blackfoot native elder, says: What is life? It is the flash of a firefly in the night. It is the breath of a buffalo in winter. It is as the little shadow that runs across the grass and loses itself in the sunset.

As you become still, there also comes a kind of opening in which the trees and the sky, the salad and the mops and all of it—they teach you things because you're present for it. There are lessons learned in each turn of the path and each moment because your stillness allows you to be in a very different, receptive, open relationship to life itself.

This part is really important. It's important in some way for the next days that you stay with it and invite the stillness to deepen, invite the layers that want to open to open. Sometimes you get very still and new experiences of mind opening and well-being and joy come. And sometimes you get still and new layers that need to be released come. You just did that forgiveness practice with Spring, and you notice, "Oh yes, there's this whole part that needs to be forgiven, and then that part, and oh yes, myself as well."

You can trust this process. You don't have to do it—you have to be present for it. You don't have to pull the petals of the flower open, but your presence allows the natural opening to happen.

With the teachings on equanimity from Gina last night, you're invited to reflect on what it means to live with a peaceful heart. Even to think about the difficult situations in your life, which you have, because everyone does. What does it mean to enter those difficult situations? What could it mean to enter them with a peaceful heart?

We did that practice of big sky meditation this morning. What we're learning in some way is both how to be more alive and also how to be present not just for life but for death—because it will happen, in case you hadn't noticed.

It's one of the great mysteries talked about by the ancients. They say one of the most mysterious things in life is that people can see other people die all around them and still think it's not going to happen to them. I remember being with Stephen Levine when he asked, "How many of you think you're going to die?" Only about a quarter of the hands went up.

What you're doing here with the forgiveness and the unfolding—the joys and the sorrows that come, the trees and the breath, the salad, the yogi meditations, the work practice—you're bearing witness to your human incarnation in a way that certainly wasn't part of the curriculum in my Ivy League education, I assure you. We did philosophy and science. But this is the education of the heart.

That practice this morning of the big sky, big mind meditation—if it connected for you, which it did for some people—it gives you a sense that you can sit with someone who's in great difficulty and know that they are not their body. You are not your body.

You're not your feelings. You're certainly not your thoughts, I hope, given what most of you think. You become trusting of this capacity to witness, to rest in awareness, even with the things our society turns away from.

A story from my dear friend Frank Ostaseski, the founder of Zen Center Hospice, from his book: He writes about having gotten a call from some parents asking, "What do we do? Can you help us? We have a seven-year-old boy who's been very sick with cancer." Frank thought he would go and give them some ways to be with him. The conversation went on a little. It turned out the child had just died at home half an hour ago. "What do we do now? Can you come over?"

Frank went there, and he said, "I'd sat with a lot of people dying, including children over these many years, but I didn't know what would be needed." Part of what's true when we are in the face of the great mystery of life—which is really what we're sitting in the middle of here—is that we can't know ahead of time.

He said, "I went into the house and into this little boy's room, Jamie's room. His parents were sitting there in shock. I went over and leaned down to little Jamie and kissed him on the forehead." They began to weep, because while they had cared for him as he was dying with great love and attention, they hadn't touched their boy since he died. It wasn't fear of his body that kept them. It was the fear of the grief that it would unleash if they touched their son.

Frank told them about the ritual in every ancient culture of washing the body. They prepared this potion with rosemary and sage and lavender and sweet rose petals, warmed it up, and got towels and washcloths. After a few moments, the mother and father began to wash their boy. They started at the back of his head and moved down his back. Sometimes they'd stop and tell a story about their son—"Remember when he fell? Remember this?" At other times it became too much and they would stop and stare out the window and weep. The grief felt enormous. The mother examined and lovingly cared for each little scratch or bruise on her son's body.

When she got to Jamie's toes, she counted them as she had done the day he was born. It was both gut-wrenching and extraordinarily beautiful to watch.

As I sat with them quietly, a beseeching question filled his mother's eyes. Will I be able to survive? Can I do this? Can any mother live with this grief? And I would nod in encouragement for her to continue.

It took a long time for them to wash their son. And what she saved for last, with incredible tenderness, was to turn toward his face and wash his face for the final time. Somehow it was as if she had turned toward the very thing she didn't believe she could bear. And by turning toward it with love, by entering into it, the fierce fire of her heart began to melt the contraction of fear that had taken over her.

He goes on in this story. And of course, I read it and it's so tender and painful—we could weep at the story. And yet it's also our story, because we're human beings. We're born and we're mortal. We have a certain arc of incarnation, and we will die. And within this, with the practice that we have, comes the possibility of opening with courage and tenderness and compassion and mystery.

You sit, and we hear your stories—with your own longing and great love, the beautiful states that come, and also the divorce, the family pain, the loneliness, and the vastness of your own heart and mind. The praise and blame that come to you have come to all people, as have the joy and sorrow.

What you learn is that you can trust awareness itself—that you can trust the heart to hold all that arises. A profound kind of trust grows, a trust in awareness: that it's vast enough and great enough.

When I was in China with Trudy recently, we were teaching at this twelve-hundred-year-old temple. The abbot, who was in his forties—the Shifu—was like a brother. He was a really wonderful man, very interested in how we blend Buddhist psychology and Western psychology, bringing in an understanding of trauma and healing together with the deep practices of compassion and mindfulness. He was open-minded; he wanted to learn.

Part of the difficulty is that the abbots of many of the great temples there—we met several others—are in their forties because the generation before them, all those teachers, were killed in the Cultural Revolution. So they didn't receive the kind of training that generations had had before.

One evening at dusk, we were walking and holding hands, just talking to each other about our teachers. He'd had a wonderful master who is now ninety-one and very old. And his teacher's teacher, Xu Yun, was the most famous Zen master in China in the last hundred years. He died in 1959 at age one hundred and twenty. There are records of his teaching at a retreat like this for a thousand people in Shanghai in 1958 that you can read. Really remarkable.

Then he told me, "I have a little concern."

I said, "What's that?"

He said, "Well, the great master was so extraordinary, and my teacher was, and now it's me."

I held his hand and said, "Yo, I had Ajahn Chah, the wisest person I ever met, and his teacher Ajahn Mun was amazing, and now it's me. And not only that—it's not just me, but it's Spring and Khonda and Celeste. Is it getting watered down each generation?"

We laughed about it. But we also knew that what was happening, what was being taught, is ever-renewing—that the Dharma itself doesn't get watered down because it's born into us. And when I look at Spring and Khonda and Christiana and others in the new generation, I actually have a great deal of love and trust that it will be carried. And not only that—when they get to be one hundred and twenty years old like Xu Yun, they're really going to be wise. They're on their way.

But it was a very tender moment.

Then he said to me, "So do you still get angry?"

I said, "Yo, dude, I get angry. Frustrated. Afraid. And it's not just me. I've seen some of the great masters get upset. I've watched the Dalai Lama chew people out and Thich Nhat Hanh get really upset. And I went to India and I pissed off Mother Teresa—but that's another story. I'll tell you another time."

And here's the thing. There was this contractor working to redo the house I'd lived in for a long time, and we had to go to Europe, and he was slow. He'd promised to get it done, and I had to be there to finish all these things, and he wouldn't finish. I kept asking—nice guy—but nothing happened.

Finally, only a few weeks before we had to leave, I went over to him and I yelled. I said, "Listen, dude, we have a contract. I'm going to sue your ass, get you in court. You better finish—" blah, blah, blah, swearing at him.

And he looks at me and says, "Oh, you want it done, don't you?"

I realized I had to speak a different language—contractorese. He understood that.

And if I didn't speak that language, it was like, "Oh, nice Buddhist guy. Yeah, I'll get it done whenever." No, no—you get the damn thing done, and soon. And the next day, all of a sudden, all these people showed up working on the house.

I remember after I'd come back from the monastery and I was driving again. I was driving down the freeway in Massachusetts, crowded, and a big semi in front of me lost part of a tire. It smashed into another car, was about to smash into more cars, and I hit the brakes. There was a pileup happening, some pretty high-speed accidents. And I thought, "Okay, I'm going to die." It was really scary. My mind was so calm, because I'd been on retreat like this for months and years, very, very still. I thought, "Oh well, I guess this is the day I'm going to die."

But my hands grabbed the steering wheel, my body filled with adrenaline, wrenched it over to the side, through the grass and so forth. My body did not want to die, and it was not taking it peacefully or lying down. It was really interesting to see that, as Whitman says, "I am large, I contain multitudes."

So he asked me, do I ever get angry? Of course. But here's the thing: that's not who you are. It's not who I am. Yes, we can release it. Yes, we can learn to work with these energies.

There's a poem from Juan Ramón Jiménez, "Yo no soy yo"—I Am Not I:

I am not I. I am this one walking beside me whom I do not see, whom at times I manage to visit and at other times I forget. The one who remains silent when I talk, the one who forgives sweet when I hate, the one who takes a walk when I'm indoors, the one who will remain standing when I die.

It's a really remarkable poem. It's a poem about soul, or spirit, or something that's greater than all the things we get caught up in during our lives.

And so yes, fear can still arise. I think I'm all chill with everything, and then fear comes anyway. Talking with Ram Dass, he said, "Oh yeah, I flunked the course lots of times." You get to practice with these things. But what you start to recognize is that that's just part of human incarnation—the emotions and the thoughts.

As Khenpo Rinpoche, the great Tibetan elder, writes: "Mind creates both samsara and nirvana, yet there's nothing much to it. It's simply thoughts. Once we recognize that thoughts are empty, the mind will no longer have the power to deceive us."

And so we see it in all these stories that come: you're doing well, you're not doing well, you should be improving, you shouldn't, you're unworthy, you're worthy, you're glorious, you're noble, you're a failure—all those, and everything in between. You start to see that's just the mind doing its thing. And it does it on the pettiest level as you walk around. It has no pride, you know.

Julia Child writes, "In department stores, so much unnecessary kitchen equipment is bought indiscriminately by people who had just come in for men's underwear." You walk by something and it just captures you. You see them and you like it and you hate it—the mind does all this stuff.

But as Trudy talked about in the Four Noble Truths: the principle that there is suffering and loss in life and death, and it's part of the game of being incarnate; that there are causes to human suffering—greed, hatred, ignorance, and the things that come from them: fear, violence, racism, and so forth. And it's not just in us, but in the world. The sufferings of the world are caused by greed. There are millions of hungry children and grain elevators full of food. It's not that we don't have enough food. We have too much greed and not enough love. The world is full of ignorance. The world is full of hatred, along with other kinds of blessings.

But what we're doing here is learning to deal with these primary forces, with the roots of them. This from Karlfried Graf Dürckheim:

"The person who, being really on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not, as a consequence, turn to those friends who offer them refuge and comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themself over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them."

In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening.

So on the days that you have beautiful, glorious, spacious, delightful meditation—hallelujah, that's great. And on the days that you feel like you're falling apart, or you're facing the primary forces of anger or fear or rage—hallelujah to those as well. These too are part of the opening to that which is indestructible in you, and the trust in the body of awareness that can hold it all.

Now some people here—activists, people who have big lives in the world, many people, all of us individually—can be concerned that coming on retreat is somehow a withdrawal from the world, or even that it becomes self-centered. There's the ecological crisis. There's the crisis with immigrants. There's the rising tide of hate and divisiveness. There is world hunger, and there's racism, and there's a spreading tide of weaponry across the world that our country sells a lot of. We sell more weapons than any other country on earth, and then we don't feel safe. There's something a little wrong in that equation. Or even nuclear war.

So how does this relate to that?

In Zen, they say there are only two things: you sit, and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is. The garden is the garden of the world. You quiet your mind. You open your heart. You open beyond the body of fear, the small sense of self. And then when you get up, you return to the world in a different way, with a kind of wisdom and courage.

Gandhi did it, as we know, one day a week. It didn't matter that he was dismantling the entire British Empire—hundreds of thousands of people demonstrating or rioting or being killed or being activated. They'd say, "Gandhiji, you must come and help." And he'd say, "I'm sorry, this is Thursday. It's my day off. It's my day of contemplation. I have to stop and quiet myself and listen to what is the best and deepest and most loving and honest response I can make." It was out of that stillness that the depth of his work and transformation happened.

So when you get up from your seat, you become—chosen or not—a bodhisattva. Bodhisattva is a compound word. Bodhi means awakened. Sattva means being. A being who is committed to the awakening of the world. Because you sit, you quiet the mind, you remember something vast and true. And you also see—as you could feel in the big sky meditation or in the various forms of metta we've done—that it's all your family.

As Thich Nhat Hanh wrote in that famous poem "Call Me By My True Names": "I am the frog swimming happily in the clear water of a pond, and I am the grass snake that silently feeds on the frog. I am the twelve-year-old girl, refugee in a small boat, who throws herself into the ocean after being raped by the sea pirates. And I am the pirate, my heart not yet capable of seeing and loving."

Everybody's heard this poem. But it's not simply poetry on a page. It's a reality. The walls of who we are start to dissolve, and we discover very directly and immediately that we are woven in a single garment of destiny, as Martin Luther King said—that we are part of this network of mutuality.

And then when we understand this, how do we act? The key is intention. If you're committed to your own well-being and the well-being of the world—because it's your world and your family—the key is intention. That intention comes from the heart, as Spring talked about listening to the heart.

There's short-term intention, and you'll notice it even as you sit or walk, that before you move or before you do things, there's always some intention. You can begin to tune into it with mindfulness. But it's especially good when you're in conflict or in difficulty. There you are, about to send a text to somebody who is very upsetting, who is upset with you. And you take that mindful pause and breathe and ask yourself, "What's my best intention?" Then you discover that you want to rewrite it, because your best intention is really to connect, or be loving, or work things out—not just to be right or defend yourself. In your conversations with people, to take that pause and ask, "What's my best intention?" becomes the step-by-step life of a bodhisattva.

Because the heart will answer if you ask. And because you have done the kind of training that we've all shared in here, something in you knows, and you can't lose it. You may think you can lose it, but you actually can't. It's in you.

I think about meeting this guy at the Miami airport when I was on the way to a retreat. He was walking around, and he said, "Jack, is that you?" I said, "Yeah."

He said, "Do you remember me? I sat at that retreat with you in 1978." I sort of remembered him. And he said, "You know, I think I practiced for a while after that, but then my practice kind of fell away, and I thought it was kind of a failure."

"But last year I had a major heart attack and needed surgery. I wasn't sure I was going to survive. There I was getting tested and then rolled on the gurney through the halls of the hospital." He said, "And it all came back. I could be with my breath. I could be with my body. I could be with that space of awareness." He said, "Thank you. It was all in there."

So you're learning something that changes your life. It changes your DNA and the cells of your body—or at least the expression of your genes. It does.

So there is short-term intention, where you can ask your heart and it will answer. And then there is long-term intention.

The most famous example of long-term intention in Buddhist teaching is the bodhisattva vows. In Zen, you sit before every sitting and recite: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all." And there are several other vows like that—"Desires are inexhaustible. I vow to end them all"—things like that.

Now, it's a beautiful vow to save all sentient beings. But it's also problematic, as I like to talk about, because you'll notice that the sentient beings you live with and around you don't want to be saved by you. Right? So then you have to think, well, what could this mean if those people around me don't want to be saved by me?

And what it means, if you listen more deeply, is that it is a setting of the compass of the heart, a setting of direction, so that your life and this vow becomes: I vow to bring compassion alive, to bring care to life itself in every moment, in every form I find it, as best I can.

Later on, perhaps on our closing morning, we might do a little bit with these vows, because it's a beautiful thing to do. The Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning and recites this vow from Shantideva: "May I be a bridge, a raft, a boat for those to cross the flood. May I be a resting place for the weary and food for the hungry. May I be medicine for all those who are ill. May I be a lamp in the darkness to illuminate the path for all beings. And may I do so as long as stars and galaxies exist, until all of us are awakened together."

Some little vow like that, right? And what you hear is that it really sets the direction of the heart.

That's the traditional vow. There's also a beautiful contemporary one from my friend, the poet Diane Ackerman, that I love to read or recite. She writes: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs—I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

And because she's a fine poet, she has the language to express something that actually resonates in many, many people's hearts in their own form.

So this is long-term intention. When I was at that White House Buddhist leadership gathering, there were a hundred or so Buddhist leaders. Most of the communities had prison projects, projects with the homeless, disaster relief. They weren't just sitting on their cushions. They sat, and they also swept the garden of the world—like the abbots who wrap the old growth trees in the forests of Thailand and Burma with their fanciest robes and perform an ordination, so that the loggers are afraid to cut down any of the trees in that part of the forest because it's now sacred.

But here's something important about long-term intention—really a secret that you need to know. The secret is that what you get to do is listen deeply for a beautiful intention and then follow that. But you don't get to choose the outcome. The secret is to act beautifully without attachment to the fruits of your action. And that's the place of freedom.

Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic, wrote this passage I've read so many times, to an activist: "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all—if not, perhaps bring about results opposite to what you expected. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

This is what's given to you as a bodhisattva: to plant seeds in the world, beautiful seeds, that you may not see blossom.

There's a story that I love of a man named A.T. Ariyaratne. Ari, as he's called, is the most celebrated and successful community organizer in Asia. He's been nominated for the Nobel Prize and has received many other honors as well. As a young man, he was a high school teacher at the fanciest prep school in Colombo, the capital, and also a very devoted practitioner.

And he saw the great disparity between wealth and poverty in their country, as we might be noticing in many places.

And so he took his high school class out to one of the poorest villages, the lowest caste, to the extent there is in Sri Lanka—not to go help them, but to go be with them and learn from them. To learn how they lived. To have the villagers tell the kids about their lives, but also to learn how the villagers planted and dug and got their water and did all these things.

He arranged in advance that the villagers would give these kids a big banquet, so that they didn't go in order to give something to the villagers. They went to meet them and learn from them, and they were honored by this banquet. It's a really beautiful kind of reversal of "Oh, we're going to go and help these people." And of course they all fell in love. The kids made a project to help them dig a new well and things like that. But they did it together. They didn't do it because these poor people needed them to help.

And this was the beginning of the Sarvodaya movement, which then spread from village to village until it has now encompassed more than half of the population of the entire nation—building schools, building roads, digging wells. And as Ari says, "We're actually not that interested in building schools and digging wells. What we're interested in is teaching people to love each other. And the schools and the roads are the vehicle to that."

There was a terrible civil war in Sri Lanka until about five years ago. The Norwegians were trying to broker a peace treaty, and in the middle of those negotiations, Ari called all his followers together at the ancient temple of Anuradhapura. And 650,000 people came. This is in a country of 18 million people.

He stood up. And I remember this because I was teaching at an event with the Dalai Lama, and I got to tell this story while teaching with the Dalai Lama sitting there, which made me very happy—because, well, you'll hear.

So Ari got up there and he said, "We're in a time of conflict and war, but if we're wise we have to look for its causes. The foolish look at the results, and those who are wise look at the causes of things. And if we look deeply, the causes of greed and ignorance and hatred go back hundreds of years. They go back 500 years—conflict between Muslims and Hindus and Buddhists. Four hundred years of colonial oppression from various colonial powers, empires that had taken over Sri Lanka. And 200 years of economic disparity between the rich wet parts and the poor dry parts."

"So it took 500 years to get into this predicament. I would like to offer you the Sarvodaya 500-year peace plan to get us out of it. Five years of ceasefire. Ten years of rebuilding roads and schools. Twenty-five years of learning each other's language and religion. Fifty years of economic development to share the wealth from different parts of the island. And each 100 years we'll get a grand council together and see how we're doing and how to turn it in another way. And I think in 500 years we will be the island of peace that we want to be."

When I heard that story I could almost have wept, because it was the voice of an elder. It was the voice of somebody who says, "It doesn't matter what happens now, and I'm not going to live to see it. And I'm not worried about the latest poll numbers and the focus groups and who's going to get elected and what's happening. I have a vision that we all can follow that is true and wise, and however long it takes, this is the direction we're going to go."

And the Dalai Lama loved it, of course, because of the struggle with Tibet for 50 more years, not being able to go back. It resonated in the way that only can resonate when you understand that you may not be able to fix certain things, but you know what direction you're going.

So this is the work of the bodhisattva. And Thomas Jefferson put it this way: "One person with courage is a majority."

And Ari Ratana was amazing. He's a beautiful gentleman and a sage, but also, he was harboring Muslim activists in his house during the civil war—the Tamil who were part of the group that the central Sri Lankans were at war with. At one point some military came to his door, having heard this, and knocked. His fifteen-year-old daughter answered. They said, "We know you're harboring these people. You must let us in. We're going to take them away."

And she said, "My father has said that if anyone comes to harm them, they have to kill him first. But he's not here. And my mother said if my father cannot do that, then you will have to kill her first. But she's also not here. And I'm here alone with these people. So you will have to kill me before you can come in."

Of course they didn't. And it's one of twenty stories I could tell about Ari. One person with courage is a majority.

I think about that Chinese man with his shopping bags standing in front of the line of tanks—that image we've all seen. Or I think about Wangari Maathai, who won the Nobel Prize in Kenya, who started planting trees but got on the wrong side of the government, which isn't hard to do in this life, and spent some time in prison—which I think is part of the necessary resume to get a Nobel Prize these days. But she ended up with her group planting fifty-one million trees, because she had a vision of what was possible.

But it doesn't have to be huge. Those are magnificent stories. Listen to this one:

"During my first year of teaching, a girl named Shay was assigned to my seventh grade class. She was a desperately unhappy child and rebelled against the most basic rules—stay in your seat, raise your hand to speak. Shay and I battled for control of the classroom. I tried every technique I knew: behavioral contracts, praise, reprimands. None of them worked. I even called Shay's home every week but no one answered. She lived with an older sister. I went to the school counselor who said I'd done my duty and offered to transfer Shay to another classroom. I declined. Shay was my student and I wasn't going to pass her on to someone else. In the faculty lounge, the older teachers patted me on the back, thankful they didn't have Shay in their classroom.

June finally came. On the last day of school, Shay was quick to head out the door. As I sat contemplating my failure with her, she walked back in. 'Oh great,' I thought, 'one last act of terrorism.' In Shay's hand was a small bowl, the kind that students made in ceramics class. She thrust it into my grasp. 'Here,' she said. 'It's the only thing I could think up to give you.' I turned the bowl over and saw Shay's initials etched on the bottom. 'Thanks for trying to like me,' she said. And before I could speak, she turned and left.

After several more years of teaching, I went on to become a school principal and now a district superintendent. Shay's bowl has never left my desk."

So sometimes it's the big grand things. Maybe it's a tree at a time that becomes fifty-one million. But sometimes it's just your presence with another being going through something painful or beautiful that simply needs another person with them to say, "Yes, this is us. This is human beings together."

And so you start to trust. You trust your awareness to hold it all. You trust the spirit of compassion in your heart, that the heart has the capacity to hold it. The great Zen ancestors say that enlightenment or awakening is one with the trusting heart. It's actually the same thing.

The moral arc of the universe may be long, as we've heard, but it bends toward justice. Sometimes it seems way too long. And then here is Gandhi: "Do not be discouraged. When I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there can be tyrants and murderers, and for a time they seem invincible, but in the end they always fall. Think of it—always."

And it's true both outwardly in that way, and it's also true of the earth itself. A little poem: "When the governments tried to suppress the truth of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster, the wind told the story. It carried the truth across the nations. The wind became a poet, a scientist, and a prophet."

So there is a trust that things will awaken eventually and in their own time, that seeds planted will grow, and that your task isn't to shoulder the whole of the world but to take what you're able—to stretch your arm out to mend or to plant as the bodhisattva. And not to be too loyal to your suffering or the suffering of the world. Consider being loyal to love. I think you'll find it a much more salutary way of living.

When I think about my teachers—Ajahn Chah, Maha Ghosananda, the Dalai Lama, Dipa Ma, this wonderful woman in Calcutta who was a teacher of mine—they knew how to laugh. I think it's called the laughter of the wise. Yes, they could weep, and would easily, for the sorrows of the world. They had great compassion.

But they also had tremendous joy in life and its magnificence, its unbearable beauty.

And the instructions from the Buddha, where he writes: "Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate. Live in joy and health even among the afflicted. Live in joy and peace even among the troubled. Look within, be still. Free from fears and attachments, know the sweet joy of the way."

These are instructions. This isn't some nice poem. It says you can choose this, and it is possible for you.

There's a wonderful book published this last year which records a week-long meeting between Archbishop Tutu and the Dalai Lama. I think it's called The Book of Joy. The central question explored was how these two men, who both suffered incalculable difficulties—the Dalai Lama with what has happened to Tibetan culture and people, the destruction, and apartheid in South Africa, the killings and suffering that Tutu lived through—how can they be happy? And they both laugh a lot. They're very joyful.

They talk about it and try to answer the question. As the Dalai Lama says, "So much has been taken from us—my ability to go home, the sacred texts burned, many of our monasteries closed, our culture oppressed in so many ways. So much has been taken. Why should I let them take my happiness?"

Because your depression doesn't actually help the world. It doesn't serve to be depressed.

In a long poem that I won't read but is quite remarkable, called "A Brief for the Defense," I often read these lines: "If we deny our happiness, resist our satisfaction, we lessen the importance of the deprivation of others." To make injustice the only measure of our attention is to praise the devil.

When I've been in refugee camps, the children make these little toys out of old cans from tinned milk with a little bamboo stick in them and roll them around and play games like any child anywhere. It is born in us, that child of the spirit. And to serve the world is not to serve it out of duty, as a grim duty, but to really see its beauty and to be loyal to love.

We didn't do the mudita, loving joy practice. But part of the way it begins—you can even close your eyes for a moment and reflect, you don't have to change your posture, it will just be a minute or two—is to remember that there's a child of the spirit born into every single being.

As you sit quietly, we could work with images of people you care about, but for yourself, let yourself remember your best adventure as a young child. No matter how bad it was in your home or your life, like any child, you had moments of tickling and laughing, rolling in the grass, having an adventure. Let yourself remember one.

May I be joyful. May this child of the spirit born in me be joyful. May my joy and happiness increase. May the causes for joy and happiness grow.

As you do this practice, remember that this is still in you. Picture others—people you know, loved ones, friends—and think of their best adventure as a child, their happiest day. Know that it's still in there. May they too be joyful, and may their joy and happiness increase.

I heard recently of a study—the usual studies—done on little rats, rat pups, at the University of Chicago. I think they were attending the university. It was a study about play, because it turns out that most mammals play. We know this. There's a certain stage where whether it's otters or chimps or bonobos—and the famous ones aside—mice and rats and little creatures play.

What they did in this study was divide a population during a certain period in the aging of these young rats where they like to play and wrestle and squeak and grab one another and roll over. Half of them they let play, and half of them they would interrupt so they couldn't play during that critical period. Afterward, they brought into the cage the collar of a cat that smelled as cats do, and needless to say it freaked out these little rats. They all went into hiding.

The ones who had not played didn't come out. They were too traumatized in some way and never really recovered from even smelling that to come back out. But the rats who had played, who had that in their nervous system, after a while poked their nose out—hmm, I don't see the cat—went back in, came out again, and began to explore and experiment. Because play is really the way that we learn.

So the idea that spiritual practice is a grim duty and you have to kind of fix yourself—good luck. You've tried that. Suffering is the beginning of the story. It's not the end of the story. The end of the story is actually to bring a joyful and beautiful heart to the world.

to stretch out your hand and mend what you can, to touch what is before you.

I remember last year when the first edict came down banning immigrants from those seven predominantly Muslim countries and people were stuck in airports. There was so much confusion and quite a bit of suffering. I went down to the airport with my daughter. She happens to be an asylum attorney. Her work, after she was at Berkeley and became interested first in human rights law and then in this work—her work is basically to help people whose lives are in danger from all around the world to get asylum. She'll have people like a gay man from Uganda who would be stoned to death if he went back. She had a transgender woman from Saudi Arabia who came to Mecca in her mind, which was San Francisco. A different Mecca.

So she went down with a lot of her peeps, these young lawyers. There were more lawyers than there were people in detention. They put up a sign offering free legal advice. And there were fifteen hundred, two thousand people in the international terminal. Part of it was the usual demonstration—chanting and signs and all of that. We were there for a while. And then we went over to one of the immigration doors where three or four hundred people were chanting, "No ban, no fear, refugees are welcome here."

In the middle of it was a New Orleans jazz band. The people would start chanting and then the drummer would kick in a little background rhythm and the sax player would play a little riff and the trombone would come in. The chant was going and the music was going. The cops were smiling. The airport security was smiling. For a long time it was like this musical celebration. It wasn't a demonstration. It was somehow a celebration of love.

And so you get somebody like Molly Ivins, the great correspondent for the New York Times, Texas political street fighter, liberal, whatever. She wrote, "Keep on fighting for freedom and justice, beloveds, but don't forget to have fun doing it. Be outrageous, rejoice in all the oddities that freedom can produce, and when you get through celebrating the sheer joy of a good fight, be sure to tell those who come after how much fun it was."

There's something artful about it. I think if we're going to change the world, we can't do it as a grim duty. We have to do it out of the power of love. And it's the same in your practice. It can't be a grim duty. As Guillaume Apollinaire wrote, "Now and then it's good to pause in your pursuit of happiness and just be happy."

And then this beautiful instruction for meditation from Laurie Chapman, who writes, "I like nothing more in the world than sitting on my ass doing nothing. And it's not my fault that I have this attitude because I happen to have an amazingly comfortable ass. It may not look like much, but if you could sit on this baby for two minutes, you'd realize that getting up off this ass would be a crime against nature." This is another form of meditation instruction that I think you would do well to take to heart.

And so, whether when you get up from the retreat you plant a garden, or whether you run a conscious business with integrity, whether you raise a healthy child, whether you're a healer or a teacher, an artisan or a business person or a parent—you sit and quiet the mind and know that this is your world that you can hold in your heart. And then when it's time, you get up and you plant these seeds.

I have a little reluctance in giving this talk tonight. I switched with Trudy, who will give a talk probably tomorrow night or so. She's still kind of recovering a little bit, although she'll be here for interviews tomorrow. And the reluctance is that I don't want to give you a talk that turns you too far toward the end of the retreat, because you're still really in the middle of it.

So instead, what I want to say to end is that this is really important, difficult, fruitful, and at times magnificent work that you're doing—to be able to sit at the bedside of the world and the bedside of your own heart and mind and learn how to really be present and open and find a kind of freedom and well-being that will serve you as you take your intentions out to serve the world. It's really valuable and precious, very rare to have this kind of time in your life. You know that well.

So I want to urge you first of all to stay deep in the silence. And the beautiful thing with intention is that as you sit, in the sitting, you can invite with your attention in these next two days that the meditation deepen. As you sit and start to get quiet, you may say to yourself, "May this stillness deepen." Or as well-being comes in short or longer moments, "May this well-being fill my whole body and the whole sky." Or if moments of happiness or joy come, "May this joy expand. May it open and fill all of this being." You can use the stillness and the steadiness now to invite a deeper level of practice.

What's important is that you remain silent. There are a few people who said, "Oh, we're getting along in the retreat. Maybe I should talk to my friends." Please don't do it. It's not good for you. But more than that, it's not good for the others.

This is precious time. You don't know when you'll be able to come on retreat again. And the world needs you to do this—now here's the guilt trip part, right? It's not just for you. It's for the people you love and the work that you do. To be able to stay with us and truly receive the fruits of practice, because this is the fruitful time now, is critical.

You can invite well-being. It's a beautiful thing—as you get quiet, when you invite well-being or joy, often it will come. Try it.

I'll end with this from Laurie Anderson. She writes:

In the Tibetan map of the world, the world is a circle. And at the center, there's an enormous mountain guarded by four gates. When they draw a map of the world, they draw the map in sand, and it takes them months. And then when the map is finished, they make some prayers and then erase it and throw the sand into the nearest river.

Last fall, the Dalai Lama came to New York to do a two-week ceremony called the Kalachakra, which is a prayer to heal the earth. Woven into these prayers were a series of vows that he asked us to take. And before I knew it, I had taken a vow to be kind for the rest of my life. I walked out of there and thought, for the rest of my life? What have I done? This is a disaster. I was really worried. Had I promised too much? Not enough? I was in a panic.

They had come from Tibet for the ceremony and were walking around Midtown in their new brown shoes. I went up to one of the monks and said, can you come with me to have a cappuccino right now and talk? So we went to this little Italian place. He had never had coffee before, so he kept talking faster and faster. And I kept saying, look, I don't know whether I promised too much or too little. Can you help me please?

He was being really practical. He said, look, don't limit yourself. Don't be so strict. Open it up. He said, the mind is a wild white horse. And when you make a corral for it, make sure it's not too small. And another thing—when your house burns down, just walk away. And another thing—keep your eyes open. And one more thing—keep going, because it's time to find your true home.

So let's sit for a moment.

Remember as well the invitation to sit longer now that you're quiet. Come back after half an hour of walking and sit. If you're awake, sit for more than half an hour. Sit for an hour. Sit up, take a walk, and sit again. Come earlier in the morning and sit. Or if you want it really quiet, go sit in the council house for a time and then come in. Extend your sittings during the day, or do a long walking and then a long sitting.

You're still really in the middle of it, and inviting it to deepen will happen as you stay with it.

Buddhist Psychology

Jack Kornfield · 6h39

> In this daylong retreat at Spirit Rock Meditation Center, Jack Kornfield offers foundational teachings on the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) while weaving together practical meditation instruction with profound insights on inner freedom. He introduces breath meditation as a universal practice for steadying attention, walking meditation for embodied awareness, and the systematic expansion of mindfulness to include body sensations, emotions, and states of mind.
> Drawing on Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching that consciousness contains seeds of both joy and suffering, Kornfield emphasizes that the quality of our lives depends on which seeds we water. He explores how our habitual reactivity—operating from the 'reptilian brain' of fear and separation—can be transformed through loving awareness into genuine presence and compassion. The talk references stories of the Buddha's early teachings on 'plowing the field' of consciousness, and the radical inclusivity of the Dhamma that welcomed all people regardless of caste or background.
> The retreat includes a powerful dialogue where experienced practitioners share their moments of awakening and freedom—from recognizing limiting stories about self-worth, to finding compassion during custody battles, to discovering the pause before reactive speech in intimate relationships. Kornfield connects these personal revelations to the broader understanding that consciousness itself is inherently free, and that through practice we can choose to meet life's inevitable difficulties and joys from a place of wisdom rather than reactivity. He concludes with reflections on the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu as exemplars of maintaining joy and freedom despite profound suffering.

Good morning. Welcome to this day-long retreat at Spirit Rock Meditation Center. If we've not met before, my name is Jack Kornfield, and it's a pleasure to welcome you here.

Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful valley, which came from the Nature Conservancy, by the way. Our agreement was that we would steward more than 400 acres and keep our profile kind of low and down in the valley, letting the rest of it be for the bobcat and the deer and other wandering species. It's grown through the collective support and care of a whole community of people dedicated to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness—or inner freedom of heart—that are core teachings in the Buddhist world, but they're really part of all wise spiritual life. Whatever brings you here, it's a great pleasure to welcome you.

The day is going to be divided in a certain way. For the smaller subset, perhaps twenty percent of you who are more experienced practitioners and somehow decided to come back—which I'm very welcoming of and happy about—we will go through during the course of the day the teachings of the four foundations of mindfulness: mindfulness of body and feelings and thoughts and movement and walking and loving-kindness. This is a systematic way of going through the teachings that can profoundly change your life. Those who are more experienced students, I will invite you to go out and begin to walk while I do some of the teachings for newer practitioners, and then in the afternoon I'll try to address and work with you particularly, so that you'll have a quieter day. You'll get to sit and walk without hearing all the same teachings again.

This is also being live-streamed, so hello out there, whoever you are on your flat screen. We welcome you. And in fact, we welcome everybody. One of the beautiful things about the teachings of what's sometimes called the Dharma, or the teachings of awakening, is that whoever you are, whatever your background, whatever your race, whatever your culture, whatever your sexual orientation, whatever your ability, whatever your humanity—this enormous variety of beauty that makes up our human family—you are welcome. The Dharma gates open and say: this is your place and you are one of us. And "us" meaning humanity connected together through the heart and the mind.

There is another event here upstairs, a smaller one for twenty-five or thirty people, happening at the same time. There's also our winter-spring two-month silent retreat. Past the wooden circle gate, which we ask you not to go past, is the residential retreat area. There are about a hundred people here in silence for two months. If we're lucky, their vibrations will come down the hill a little bit. We can sort of draft behind them like on a big truck on the highway. But please leave them in silence. The rest of the campus and trails are open for you.

I'm really happy to be here with you today and to have your company in this retreat. Also know that there's a whole coterie of high school students joining us today and other next-gen folks.

It's a tough time in our culture and in our world. Perhaps one could say that often, over many cycles in the last centuries. But here we sit, coming to meditate in the middle of these fraught and very divisive conversations—about DACA and DREAMers, about school shootings and guns, about what happened in Parkland and the tragedies we carry, about immigration, about who we are as a culture and a society and as human beings. Whatever your political persuasion—and I'm not going to assume anything about that here—we gather together in practice.

These things weigh on our hearts, and the divisiveness is so difficult. The solutions are also hard to find, particularly when we look outwardly.

It's quite obvious that no amount of technological development—and I just came this morning from a conference called Wisdom 2.0 in San Francisco, which was a meeting of Silicon Valley people and technologists with a group of people trying to infuse technology with both human and spiritual values, with compassion, sort of open source compassion as part of the project—no amount of computers, no artificial intelligence, no smartphone that has the great library of Alexandria in your pocket along with every cat video ever made, no amount of biotechnology, nanotechnology, space technology, all this extraordinary stuff, is going to stop continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing tribalism, environmental destruction.

The outer developments of humanity, which are now remarkable, have to be met with an inner development of our consciousness and our conscience and our sense of interconnection. Otherwise, the politics of the world plays on the amygdala and the reptilian primitive brain. That's where you get people's attention. There's a snake, there's a tiger. Oh my God, the terrorists are going to come get you in your home. And we let the terror come inside, instead of actually seeing the world with its unbearable beauty and magnificence, with a good heart.

As Nelson Mandela said after twenty-seven years in Robben Island prison, it never hurts to think the better of someone or think the good in someone. They often act the better because of it. Because he was able to see the potential and the beauty in humanity, he was able to walk out of all those years of prison. They can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit. He changed not just South Africa but the imagination of the world of what's possible.

And the beautiful thing is that it's not Nelson Mandela—it's you and me and all of us. We each have that potential, no matter the circumstances. The measure of suffering that you have, which we all do because it's part of human incarnation—anybody not have that? Raise your hand, you can have your money back—and the measure of beauty and joy that you have.

So we come with this mysterious human incarnation to take our seat in stillness, in the midst of it all, and begin to listen and tend with loving awareness this body and heart and mind that we have. And it's a beautiful thing. Every wise culture knows that there are times to walk in the mountains or walk by the ocean or go out into the desert or go to the cathedral or someplace and just listen for a time—and not check things off your to-do list. As Albert Einstein reportedly said in Scientific American, if you can drive safely while kissing someone, you're simply not giving the kiss the attention it deserves. We live in this wired world, but we have to step out of it, whether it's for the kiss or for the fruiting and flowering of the plum blossoms that have come in this springtime.

Let me share a little story. In the early 1980s, I started a rigorous six-year academic medical program in Boston that required me to work during the day in part and take extra classes at night, with more work on the weekends. The first summer off, I wanted to get away from the studies and work with my hands, be close to the earth. So I went to live with an Amish family in Pennsylvania. The experience renewed me, and I decided to do it again the next summer.

That year I drove from Boston to western Pennsylvania on a holiday weekend—terrible traffic, hours and hours of driving, and I was already exhausted. My Amish host had delayed their dinner for me. During the meal I tried to act calm and natural, but I felt full of nerves. My Amish host could clearly tell something was amiss, because at the end of dinner he said, "Come with me."

I followed him to the backyard, which bordered an alfalfa field. Although his faith discouraged smoking, the farmer lit a cigarette. Three of his children gamboled around while two others clung to him. The farmer stood without saying a word, looking out over the alfalfa. I did the same. The dark green field was becoming harder to see in the fading light. And then out of the alfalfa rose fireflies—a few at first, but soon there were hundreds. Their pinpricks of light mingled with the stars. Heaven and earth meeting in this humble man's backyard. I felt my nervousness leave me. The farmer turned and said, "That's for you."

And being here together in some way is for you—to come to this beautiful valley. What we'll do is sit in meditation for periods, twenty minutes at a time or so with some instruction, then do some walking practice, twenty minutes or more, thirty minutes, then come back and sit again alternately, so that you can integrate this in your body.

One more thing to say, and this is actually a passage from Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh. He says: Your mind is like a piece of land planted with many different kinds of seeds—and this connects to that lovely Amish image that was almost a poem. Seeds of joy and peace, of mindfulness, understanding, love. And seeds of craving, of anger, fear, hate, and forgetfulness. These healthy and unhealthy seeds are always there, sleeping in the soil of your mind or your heart. And the quality of your life depends on the seeds that you water. If you plant beautiful seeds, they will grow.

If you water a seed of peace in your mind, peace will develop. When the seeds of happiness in you are watered, you become happy. When the seeds of anger or fear or hatred are watered, you become angry or fearful or hateful. The seeds that are watered frequently are those that will grow.

This starts to describe both our human condition and the possibilities for us in this human incarnation. We can all hear that truth. And the beautiful news is that we can water different seeds. We can choose where to direct our attention. We can quiet the mind, steady our attention, tend and open the heart. This is really the game. This is really the offering and the practice that we'll work with.

Now, it's not always a pretty picture. I do have to say that. My dear friend Annie Lamott, the great writer and humorist, says, "My mind is like a bad neighborhood. I try not to go there alone"—which is why we've got you all here together, right?

So as you sit, you will also feel the tensions you carry in your body. You'll feel the unfinished business of your heart. If there's grief or tears or longing, love that isn't expressed, fears—all of that is there. What you will find is your own life presenting itself to you without distraction. And then you think, "Oh my God, but I'm getting distracted in here."

Meditation becomes like a mirror, and the synonym we use for mindfulness is loving awareness. The point isn't to have a particular experience today, not even a quiet one where you're just with your breath and everything goes away. May that happen for you for a little bit. But that's not going to be your main experience. Your main experience is going to be sitting with a loving awareness and finding a wise relationship to the measure of pleasure and the measure of suffering, to the beauty that you carry and the fears that are in your heart—to allow them actually to be met and held with respect and understanding.

And then there comes a kind of shift, a shift of identity where you're not lost in each one of those experiences, because they all tell a story. As you may have noticed, those stories are, if not completely untrue, usually rather partial. And some of them don't have your best interest in mind.

To be able to step back doesn't mean you're not present. To actually be more present, not on automatic. This isn't self-hypnosis. This is called de-hypnosis. Because we're sort of hypnotized by our habits. To step back and say, "Oh, this is the doubting mind. This is the fearful mind. These are the tensions in the body." Let me find a relationship with these emotions where I'm not lost in them, and let me water the seeds of presence, of calm, of steadiness, of loving-kindness or compassion.

Does that all make sense to you? That's really the charge, the direction, the value of what we'll do today.

We're going to start quite simply. In the first couple of sittings, we'll primarily be working with mindfulness of the breath and the steadying of attention. This is a little bit like cleaning the lens on your glasses so you can see more clearly. It's hard to pay attention when our awareness and our focus is scattered. So one of the first steps in the art of meditation, or even in watering seeds—you've got to be able to direct the water—is to steady the attention a little bit.

We use the breath because it's the most universal of all practices and meditations across traditions. Every tradition—in Africa, in Latin America, in shamanic cultures, in all kinds of Eastern practices from the martial arts in Japan to the yogis in India—uses breath. In the Jewish and Christian mystical traditions and the Sufi tradition, the breath becomes a vehicle to tune ourselves, to bring body and mind together. And it's always with us, at least while we're in the body, and available.

The spirit in beginning meditation is not one of grim duty or struggle, but much more one of tending and discovery, of openness. I have a birthday card that was given to me from the drugstore. It's called "The Dalai Lama's Birthday Party." It shows him opening a giant box, looking inside, with ribbons on the ground and these little smiling monks around him.

You don't see anything in there, and he's exclaiming, "Wow, nothing! Just what I always wanted!"

So this actually isn't the place to get something. This is more like the dump, really. This is the place to let go of stuff. Or in another way, it's the place to bring a kind of openness to what you discover. And that is really much more fruitful in learning the art of mindful presence or loving awareness—with everything in your life—and also in learning the deep transformative art of compassion: to let this openness be with you.

So let's begin with a formal meditation. If you've been sitting for half an hour or more, do you want to stand up for a second? Just let your body stretch for a moment. See which way it wants to bend or move. Take a few deeper breaths without knocking into the people around you. Let it wiggle a little bit. If you're shy, you can close your eyes so nobody can see you.

And then when you're stretched, let yourself sit back down in a chair. Let your feet be flat on the floor and sit upright so there's some sense of dignity. You take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this human form. If you're on a cushion up front here, whatever posture is comfortable. You don't have to sit in some weird posture. You're weird enough as it is without adding to it from your spiritual practice, right? It's so fun for me with all these new students—I get to use all my old jokes.

All right, so you settle yourself on the earth here. And when you feel settled and both present, upright with some sense of dignity but also graciousness, a kind of ease, let your eyes close gently. And notice if there's any obvious tightness or tension in your body that you can easily release, and do so. Let the eyes and the face soften, and loosen the jaw. Allow the shoulders to relax and the arms and hands to rest easily. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness, compassion.

And as you sit and begin to bring a loving awareness and attention to this life, this moment now, there are these sounds of words and soft sounds around you. There are the sensations of your body, ever present. And there's, of course, a stream of thoughts and feelings, ideas, memories, plans, commentary. Emotions—feeling calm or nervous or excited or happy or sad. Let all of these things be as they are. Let them just be present.

And underneath all the waves of thoughts and sounds, feelings, sensations, become aware of the wave of the breath. How the body is breathing itself in the midst of it all. And bring your attention to wherever you can sense the breath most easily. Coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. And if it's hard to feel the breath, take one hand and put it on your belly and feel the rise and fall in the palm of your hand. You can leave it there for the whole meditation if you like.

And this is your life breath. And the first subject of the training of steadying attention. So as each breath comes in and out, or each rise and fall, let yourself feel it, sense it. If it's helpful to you, you can make a little acknowledgement, a whisper—oh, in, and rising, or out, or falling. But mostly just sense it: the beginning and the middle and the end, and then that little gap between the breaths and the next breath.

And with each breath, rest your attention in it gently for three or four or five breaths until the attention wanders away. And then as soon as you notice, without any judgment—oh yes, here we are—come back to the next breath. And the attention will wander over and over again. And as soon as you notice, whether it's a few seconds or a few minutes later, it doesn't matter, gently return back to the breath. It's the very coming back, each time you notice and come back, that starts to establish and train a steadiness of presence that connects body and mind together.

Be gentle and patient and come back again and again to this breath, this moment. This breath, just now, arising, passing away.

And with each breath, invite a sense of calm or ease. Breathing in and breathing out, invite the sense of calm with this breath, a sense of ease, deepening and growing breath by breath. Let the thoughts and feelings and sensations be as they are. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. And feel this breath in the middle of it all. How the breath breathes itself in its own natural rhythm. Relax with this breath. Ease. Calm. Invite the sense of presence.

There can be a mistaken sense, just out of habit—because basically we are control freaks in some fashion or other, almost all of us—that the idea is to have the right kind of breath, to calm it down, to steady it, to do something, make it longer, slower, whatever your idea is. Let it do what it wants. Your task is simply to notice: this is a long breath or a short breath, a deep breath or a shallow breath. You're actually in the presence of your life breath.

And what's also true is that this breath you're breathing was breathed by her and him just a minute before. You're actually exchanging breaths with one another and with the badger that I saw that lives on the land here, and the voles and the field mice. This breath dusted the tops of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it came over the Pacific and went through the lungs of the dolphins and came to you. It also dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor. Your breath actually is this universal movement that connects you with life itself.

Now as you do this practice, the attention will wander all the time, and you bring it back. We're trained to have a fifteen-second attention span—basically the length of an advertisement is our training for attention here in this culture. So it takes a little while, and you come back again and again without judgment. You don't have to do anything about it a minute later, five seconds later, three minutes later. You just come back gently, and the point is gently—without some idea of how much improvement you have.

Florida Scott Maxwell, the novelist, writes: "No matter how old a mother is, she looks to her middle-aged children for signs of improvement." We've internalized that mother and father in some way, but that's not the art or the game of meditation. Instead, it's an invitation to presence where you are, to live more fully present.

Now as you feel the breath, sometimes it makes you tight. Try to soften with it. Sometimes it will be tight anyway. Then just let it be tight and notice that. Sometimes it pauses, sometimes it's deep or shallow. It can help to pay attention to the space between breaths, because that's often when the attention drifts off. Or again, you might put your hand on your belly as you're practicing.

I have a friend who some years ago gave birth at home out in the country, and her son died. He was born with the cord wrapped around him and quite blue. They breathed a little into him and then held him and waited to see if he was going to start breathing or not. She said, "That's when I really learned what it meant to pay attention to the breath." And it wasn't even her own. There's something mysterious about being with your own life breath that connects the body and mind together.

It's a little bit like a mirror. As you sit with the breath, you begin to see yourself more clearly. Mullah Nasruddin, the Sufi holy fool, went to the bank one day and tried to cash a check. They said, "Could you please identify yourself?" So he reached in his pocket and pulled out a small mirror and said, "Yep, that's me, all right."

This is what the mindfulness of breathing does. It actually becomes a mirror, because you're there with your breath and then all the stuff of your life starts to show itself. But the breath helps you actually become present where you are.

So, a question or two, or a comment—how was it? Anyone?

"I just thought it was really hard."

That's excellent. What made it hard? I'm interested.

"Trying to keep returning to the breath and trying to stay patient when I just want to—I don't know, it was hard to get back."

When you just wanted—can you finish that sentence?

"Oh, to get up and move. Run away."

Yes. This is beautiful, thank you, because what you're describing is mindfulness. You're actually starting to see. We sit down to try to quiet ourselves, and then, like a flywheel, all the thoughts and all the restlessness and all those things—they're all in us. Now, if you can't stay with it, and you did, which is beautiful, then it will never quiet down, because every time you get a little bit restless or something, you're going to move or go somewhere or start a new adventure or buy something or whatever—all the things.

So by sitting and feeling that, which you did, and it's not that easy—we're going to work later on with how to really examine and be present for restlessness and sleepiness and all those energies that arise. Right now I'm just going to name that they're there. It's not that they're not supposed to happen. The fact that you felt it and it was so strong means that this training is actually starting to work. It's like, okay, can I sit in the middle of this and still do it? And you did. So you're actually learning, even though it's hard. I salute you. Thank you for that.

"It was very hard for me as well, and I was wondering if there's ever been a time for you where you couldn't sit with it, where you yourself had to get up, or where you would even recommend getting up and moving."

Yes, there have been times. After the death of a friend I was really close to—there was just a lot of grief. To sit with it was too hard. I got up and I walked. But for the most part, I've learned what we just talked about, how to sit in the midst of it. And sometimes there's really deep trauma that comes and it's better to go walk or do something. So I'm not saying it's always the right time to do it.

But I also have a trust that you all came here wanting something, wanting to learn something. And you are not the first restless meditator. You're not the first—to use Sanskrit, uddhacca. You're not the first bored meditator. This is par for the course. You're not the first meditator to weep, or to feel the kind of pain or trauma you carry. And those are actually part of the game. It's actually what lets you become both more compassionate, but also somehow a more courageous presence for yourself and others.

In the next sitting, another tool you could use as you work with the breath—something some people find helpful—is to count your breaths. You can count one to ten, or ten backward to one. But the main thing is to let the numbers be a whisper, perhaps 5%. The other 95% is feeling the breath. It goes: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten. I know you know how to count—that's not going to help you a lot. But sometimes it just helps the thinking mind to also notice, "Oh, number three." And then when you lose it, you start again.

Now I want to talk about walking meditation, because you're going to go out and join the other folks. In every spiritual tradition—pretty much in every great spiritual tradition—there are both practices of sitting quietly, tending and deepening, but then also practices of movement that help you engage in the world. Because mindfulness is not a passive thing. It's not, "Oh, I can sit quietly and I'm just quiet and a passive person." In fact, just as there's an in-breath and an out-breath, you quiet the mind and tend the heart, and then you get up and tend the garden of the world. That's called a mindful response. But if you don't have some mindful presence, then your response is just out of reactivity or habit. When you actually center yourself, you can really respond to the things that need your care, or the injustices of the world, or the people around you that need your attention—you can do it from a much deeper place.

So walking meditation is this. If you were to go to a temple in China, you might learn qigong or tai chi. If you were to go to Japan, there would be meditative martial arts. If you went to India, there would be yogic, physical, hatha yoga practices. In the Sufi tradition, in the Christian mystical tradition, in the Jewish tradition—they all have movements, or traditional shamanic training.

This is the very simple practice. It's simply the practice, instead of being aware of your breath, of letting your steps become the place of attention, to develop presence while your eyes are open and you're moving around.

What you'll do is go out and find some place where you can walk back and forth, twenty steps or so—longer or shorter as you like. First, just stand there and open your senses. Feel the sunlight on your skin, the morning breeze—because it's a bit cool right now. Notice the scent of the bay trees. Notice what it's like to feel your feet standing on the earth. Notice the people around you. And when you feel quite present in the environment, drop your attention down to your legs and your feet. Put your hands wherever they're comfortable, and begin to walk, being aware of lifting your foot up and putting it back down. Not in a particular way, but just lifting and placing, feeling each step. Lifting and placing. Lifting and placing mindfully, until you've walked maybe twenty steps or so. And then you stop. Pause. Center yourself. Turn around. Lifting and placing. Lifting and placing. Mindfully. Then you stop and center yourself, and you walk the other way.

Now, the good thing about this—why you're not doing a nature walk—is because even the most ambitious meditator gets it after a little while: you're not going anywhere. You're just going back and forth. So the point isn't to get to the end. The point is actually to be with the step that you're taking and be present. You leave your eyes open. And if you're walking along and something happens—a deer runs out of the woods or something—just pause. Give that your attention. The pleasure of seeing the deer, the fawn, whatever it is. When that's done, feel yourself here, begin to walk again.

Now in the background, there will be lots of thoughts. Let them come and go, and you mostly keep your attention on your feet. But once in a while—or more often than that—you may be walking, and all of a sudden you think, "You know, I like this walking better than sitting. Sitting is really hard. Maybe I should do more walking, or take up tai chi or qigong. It's going to take me a while to settle down. I think, gosh, maybe I need one of those ten-day retreats. A day is not enough. But for the same price, I could get a ticket to Bangkok..." And pretty soon you've divorced your spouse and you're living on a sailboat in Koh Samui in Thailand. And then you wake up and you go, "Oh yeah, right, right."

Spirit Rock, yeah, here I am, right? Pause, stop. Let the whole fantasy go, thank you. Okay, here we are. Lifting and placing.

Now, one more thing to say that's important. As you go out, there'll be other people walking around. And it is a little weird, okay? My daughter used to call it the night of the living dead—the zombies or something like that. Don't worry about it. They come back to life later. It's all right.

In one contemplative Christian monastery, a young novice went to the novice master and said, "Master, when I go out in the garden to meditate, would it be all right to have a smoke?" And the master said, "Absolutely not. When you go out to meditate, just meditate. None of that smoking stuff."

The novice goes out in the garden a couple of days later and there's another novice out there puffing away. Our young man walks up to him and says, "Listen, master said we're not to do that." And the second one said, "Oh no, he told me it was fine."

"What do you mean he said it was fine? I asked him, 'When I go out to meditate, would it be all right to have a smoke?' He said absolutely not."

And the second one said, "Oh, I went to master and I said, 'Master, when I go out for a smoke, would it be all right to meditate?'"

Meditate when you sit, when you walk, when you eat, you know. So the idea is that this formal practice isn't meditation itself—this is like training wheels. This is the beginning of practice. But to be aware as your body stands up, as you get your shoes, as you go out—you take it as an experiment. Let me try walking back and forth and feel my steps.

As you come back in, let yourself get settled. Even though others are going to be moving around you, you can begin to settle yourself and come back to the quality of mindful presence. If you like, you can close your eyes and begin your attention back to the breathing even as others are coming around you.

So again, let yourself get settled. Find a way to sit that is stable and comfortable. Through the day, we're really going to be weaving together the qualities of mindfulness or loving awareness, loving kindness as we practice. Sitting, walking, moving—they're all an opportunity to pay attention and to be present in this retreat.

Find your posture. Let yourself sit upright in a way that's stable and comfortable, with some sense of dignity. Maybe take a couple of deeper breaths just as a way to release any tension and collect your presence with the breath. Let your eyes close again gently.

Reestablish now the attention, the awareness of breath breathing itself, carrying from the walking practice back the same steadying, careful attention to this breath. Naturally, you can notice the state of your body having done the walking, moving about—how it feels to sit back down. And then feel this breath in the middle of it all. This breath, a sense of calming with the breath in the midst of all the energies of life. This breath, just now.

I'd like to invite the more experienced practitioners to go out and do some walking while the rest of you stay and we talk about mindfulness of the body and how to include that in the meditation.

For the rest of you, what we will now begin to do is to expand the field of mindfulness, having started with awareness of breath, mindful presence with this breath, and mindfulness of steps.

Now we'll open the field of mindfulness to include all the energies and sensations of the body.

What this means is that as you sit, sensing your own breath and minding your own business more or less, your body will call to you. Often with pleasant sensations—you might feel lighter, or some delicious sense of pleasure, or even bliss. More often with tension or pain.

People say, "Well, why should it hurt when I sit and meditate?" It's not the meditation that's making that happen. It's the fact that you've stopped and you're paying attention to your body and being present. Over the last weeks and months, every time you got into a conflict or a tight situation, there was a kind of bodily response if you weren't mindful. The jaws clench, or the shoulders tighten, or the stomach does. And now you close your eyes, and that tension that's gotten held in your body starts to release. Sometimes it's from literal physical problems that you have, but even more often, it's from the patterns of holding that we carry.

So the question is, how do we work with these in meditation?

Just as you brought mindfulness or loving awareness to feel each breath, now as you pay attention to the breath, let the sensations of the body and the sounds be in the background. But periodically, one of the waves of sensation—or maybe a loud sound at your ear, which is a different sensation—will become really strong and pull your attention away to that strong experience.

At that point, let go of your awareness of the breath and turn your full attention to receive this tingling, throbbing, heat, cold, hearing, pleasure, whatever it is that's getting quite strong in your body. Turn your attention to it as if to bow to it. You can name it gently. The acknowledgment helps to deepen the sense of mindfulness—"Oh, throbbing... tingling... pain... fire... hearing"—whatever that particular thing is that's strong. As you name it, make space for it to be present and held in loving awareness.

Now, one of three things will happen, especially if it's painful. It might, if you give space for it, move, disperse, and go away. Great. Pleasant sensations the same. It might stay the same. And it might get worse.

That's not your job. Your job isn't to start doing body work and loosen your shoulder and fix the cramp over here and work your way around your body. Your job is to be the field of loving awareness that can allow the body to heal and regulate itself. That means sometimes really deep energies need to come and be felt, and they move around, and you can name them—"Oh, throbbing, throbbing... painful, pain, pain, pain." And once you've allowed it some attention and you're either more at ease with it or it does diminish, then you go back to the breath for a while.

So for now, your meditation is awareness of breath or awareness of the sensations or sounds at the ear, naming them gently and letting them open.

The question for us is, how do we touch these experiences? Do you do it with "I've got to fix it," with aversion, judgment? Or can you let it be received with some tenderness and some compassion? Because the essence of healing in the body is first to get here. There's that line from James Joyce where he wrote, "Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body." The first step is to get here, and then to actually receive the energy and experience of your body with a kind attention. Very often, just that kind attention alone begins to allow a deep healing to take place.

But something more happens with it. This is from Tamara Engel, who was part of the New York Insight Meditation Society. She wrote as she was dying of cancer: "My days are short, and as I grow weaker, I experience so much gratitude for my meditation. Not only the joy and ease it brought, but the hard parts—for every bored and restless sitting, and every fearful fantasy, and every pain and ache I sat through, and every itch I didn't scratch. It was a training for kindness, a training for the muscle of bearing witness, for the trusting spirit that carries me now even as I face my death."

There's a way that your ability to become present for your own body and all that wants to open in it gives you a kind of steadiness and courage, and also allows for a deep kind of release and healing that takes place deeper than any massage or body work could do—although those are very good things. It's the body itself knowing how to open and regulate itself in some beautiful and deep way.

When you approach painful or throbbing or difficult tension in the body, an image to use is as if you were holding a crying child. The child has been diapered and fed, so there's nothing more you can do. And still children cry. So what do you do? You hold them. And as you hold them with kindness, they begin to settle down, and things soften and open in their own way. Maybe you first pick them up and they cry louder. Okay, they want you to know something and they're not giving up yet. Your body may want that from you too.

But if you use the image of holding the pains or the throbbing with kindness, and then curiosity—what's going to happen when I do? Will it move? Will it soften?

Does it deepen? What is it that wants to open in this body? And how can I find the place of loving awareness and an inner freedom of mind that says, "Yes, I can be with all of this and keep my heart tender and open."

So that's the next instruction. Now it's time for you to go and walk.

How was the walking? Did that work for you? Some people are saying yes, some are nodding.

A couple of things to keep in mind. It too can get boring. It can feel weird. Did anybody feel like they were losing their balance? If that was so, walk a little faster. It's true. If you walk slowly—and you don't have to do this slow zombie walk—you can walk faster if you want as well. Find the speed that keeps you most present.

Some people find it very distracting to be walking. So then stand there and close your eyes and take three steps with your eyes closed, or four if you're brave, and that will help you drop in—it really gets your attention to feel your feet. Then open your eyes for a few steps, then close them again. This is an experiment of learning how to be present for your body as you walk. So play with it.

Go out and walk for a bit. We'll ring the bell in fifteen or twenty minutes, and then come back promptly again. And if you have questions about walking, you can come up. Standing up, stretching, noticing even now the movement of your body mindfully. Turning, getting ready to walk out. And please stay in silence. This day really is supported and helped by your being in what's called affectionate silence. So stay as quiet and silent as you would be in a temple or cathedral. Let yourself be present, but without words.

Sometimes as the day retreat goes on, you can begin to feel yourself settling a bit—sitting and then walking again, sitting and walking again. The breath gets a little easier, or the mind starts to come more into the present, not quite so much in its stories. Sometimes it doesn't. Sometimes instead you get a little quieter, and then in that quiet there's an upwelling of anxiety or worry about your life or someone you care about or the world. Black Lives Matter, or immigrants that you know, or the economy, or the polar bears and the creatures of the world that we share this beautiful planet with. So it can be outer, and none of those is wrong.

One of my favorite books over the last decade or so is called Tattoos on the Heart by Father Greg Boyle, who started Homeboy Industries in Los Angeles thirty years ago to work with kids coming out of gangs. I know him, and I've actually worked with some of the guys in his program, doing retreats for young men coming from street gangs. Astonishing stories in here—very moving and beautiful.

Anyway, he's also the priest for some of the Catholic churches in the barrios in Los Angeles. And he said one day he was going to do a mass at one of the churches—I forget the name of the church—and he got there and he saw that overnight some person or people had spray painted across the front of the church in big letters: "Wetback Church." A kind of slur, because the church had also been a sanctuary for people who were coming from Central America and other places. It was really an attack on the church.

He went in, and he said his heart sank. He felt really bad that that had happened. He got the congregation that was there together before Mass, and he said, "You know, I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry for the ignorance and pain of our separation in this world, and the blame that people give to those who are vulnerable." And he said, "One of the things Homeboy Industries does—we got a contract with the city to remove graffiti. I'll get the homeboys over here, the homegirls—we'll get rid of that right away."

And then a woman, Rosa Saldana I think her name was, stood up and waved her hands. He said he'd never heard from this woman. She was a very faithful churchgoer. She waved her hands, and he said, "Yes, Rosa, what is it?"

She said, "You will not remove that."

And he said, "I beg your pardon. Excuse me." And she said, "If there are people who are cast out, who are judged, who are despised, who are rejected because they are mojados—wetbacks—" and she paused, then said, "then we should be proud to call ourselves the wetback church. And our doors are open for everyone."

There's something in this story that really speaks to what it means to learn the art of meditation, which is more about the doors of your own heart getting open. Whatever is happening for you right now—sleepy, bored, restless, happy, joyful, excited, critical—a few of you are critical of yourselves. I noticed that. I could see it.

The outer forms of religion are what the great mythologist Joseph Campbell described as an inoculation against the mystery. We'll cover it—we're the church or the temple or the mosque. We've got the mystery covered. Now you can relax and go back to business. But the truth is that when you sit, you are face to face with the mystery of your own life, your own incarnation. And how do you deal with it? With all the energies of joy and sorrow, as Thich Nhat Hanh said, all the seeds that are in our consciousness. Can you find the spaciousness of true consciousness, of loving awareness—which is what you are—to hold all of this with graciousness and an open heart?

So that's really the game. Yes, we've started with the breath and now we're including body sensations. We'll move on to working with emotions and thoughts. You take your seat in the middle of the mystery, and it's not a problem to solve but a presence. Somebody said the question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity—the presence of that which is timeless and sacred, which is our life itself.

So again, let yourself sit back up in whatever way brings you this sense of stability. It's a funny thing because here I talk about mystery and all these grand poetic things, and then your back hurts. And you're worried about paying that bill or that person who insulted you at work. That's also your human incarnation. You have to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number. You have to kind of put it all together in some mysterious way. And the way you do it is through your heart and through your presence.

Let your eyes close gently when you're ready. Come back to be just here—exactly where you are. To be here now. Because there actually isn't any other place but where you are. Compassion is found here. You've got the perfect ingredients to learn compassion. Wakefulness is found here.

Come back to your breath at the center of it all, just as a way to steady and come into the present. This breath breathing itself in the midst of your human experience—whatever is present, the breath breathes itself in the midst of it all. You can let them both be present: the waves of experience and the breath in the middle.

If there are strong sensations in the body, let go of the focus of attention on breath and receive the strong sensations with the same loving awareness. Name them gently: tingling, tingling; throbbing, throbbing; fire, fire; pleasure; lightness, lightness. Let them open, let them move as they will, and you become the field of loving awareness. Let the body open in whatever way it chooses. And after you're at ease with it, made your peace with it, or it dissolves, come back again to the breath.

Just here and now. This breath, this moment's experience. Receive with loving awareness, just as it is. You are the awareness itself, noticing the movement of sensation and life.

But before that, a few minutes—any questions, things coming up?

"So my question is, I can sit where it doesn't hurt, and I can sit a little straighter where it's really intense and it kind of hurts. Which one's better, and does it matter?"

So you can sit where it doesn't hurt, you said, or you can sit really straight and it hurts. I think sitting where you're comfortable is mostly better, but there's something deeper in your question, which somebody will say: well, why should I sit with pain at all? You know, it hurts a little. I move, then it doesn't hurt. Now it hurts there, if I move, it doesn't.

So there are two different tasks. One is somehow to become comfortable in your body enough so that you can do this with some ease. And therefore you can change your posture in the middle if you need to, if it starts to hurt a lot, so that you can be present. Just do it mindfully.

But the other task is also not to be afraid of the range of your human experience. So sometimes—you don't have to make it stiff—but sometimes there'll be pain or hurt that just comes. And yes, you could move away by getting up and getting tea or something like that. But as that poem I read from Tamara Engel says, there's also a power in learning how to sit and be present for what's joyful and what's painful.

And we live in a comfort culture. It's a little cold, you turn up the heat. It's a little hot, you turn on the AC. Your car seat is heated for the cold morning, right? It massages you, and now it asks you, "What else do you want? Can I order your latte?" It'll be driving you shortly, you know? And so we get afraid in some way culturally of how to open to experience.

So mostly sit comfortably, and don't worry—pain will find you in its time. And then it's also valuable to sit with it some of the time. Don't make it your devotion. And for those who have chronic pain, you really need to find ways to move away from it because it wearies consciousness. But some of the time, if it comes, it's also important to sit with it. You don't have to make it, I promise. It'll come on its own.

"Presence when I start to fall asleep."

Yes, you're in the presence of sleep. And I'm going to talk more about sleep at the beginning of the afternoon and how to work with it. But just know that it's really common that you sit and you're quiet, and then your body in some way also reflects what's going on. Sometimes it's like, "Gosh, it's so quiet, it must be bedtime," right? Because we're not used to the lack of stimulation, or other things which I'll talk about.

Because it's completely natural, the main thing is just to notice the sleepiness. And then if you want, you can sit with your eyes open rather than have them closed. Or you can even stand up and meditate. It's harder to fall asleep standing up, although it's been done. And just learn that it's possible sometimes to bring a little more energy, but other times you just go through sleepiness and it's fine. It won't hurt you.

"Sometimes I come up with an image, like I'm on a magic carpet or I'm in a boat, and it's easier for me to not get lost or distracted because I just remind myself."

So there you are in your image. You're floating on your magic carpet. Where's your breath then?

"Well, it's easier to breathe because I'm..."

Because then you're aware of your breath, but there's also a sense of floating. You can use that. That's fine. I mean, people get very creative in meditation. Sometimes when I was first learning walking meditation, I would imagine I was walking on the edge of the Grand Canyon, you know, and I didn't want to fall off or something. And it was playful and it just kept me more present.

If it helps you to stay present, it's okay. But the thing about images is they can then often drift off and—okay, now I've got a magic carpet, where should I go? If it helps you actually to be more present, you can use it some. But the idea is really to feel your own breath in your body. So if it helps a bit, that's fine. Just make sure that you're actually present for your bodily experience. Enjoy it.

One more question, maybe.

My apologies, as I know you said you're going to talk about sleep later, but my question was actually the complete opposite—tips for falling asleep at night when your mind is restless.

For falling asleep at night? Besides counting sheep? Yes, that's its own whole conversation. It's actually hard for us to wind down very often, if we pay attention, because we live at such a fast pace and our screen habits interfere. There are a lot of really good basic sleep hygiene things that you may well know—dim your lights, don't go on your devices for an hour or two before bed, have a regular time.

And then when you finally do lie down, if you can't sleep, then you can meditate. Follow your breath as we do. It's boring. And the fact that it's boring is actually good—it can lead you to sleep. I might talk about this a little more later. We're a bit of a sleep-deprived culture, of course, as people have read about.

So your question points to something more important and beautiful: How do we attend to our lives? Because the speed, the advertising, the capturing of your attention—this is now what's out there with all the screens and devices and news. They want you. They want your attention. And so to meditate is actually a radical act, first for yourself, and then as you participate as a citizen in voting, as a teacher, as a member of society, as a business person—to step out of that unconscious state of grasping that capitalism has, in part, turned into.

So it's not just your problem. You're experiencing something that's really culture-wide. Therefore, you don't want to blame yourself. You just say, "All right, how can I manage and do this?" And you become more the steward of your own life that way, which is both a big responsibility but also tremendously liberating. A little bit scary, but tremendously liberating.

So, a story that those who've come more often will have heard from my friend Fran Peavey. She was a great activist in her day, before she died.

One day she writes: "I was walking through the Stanford University campus with a friend when I saw a crowd of people with cameras and video equipment on a little hillside. They were clustered around a pair of chimpanzees—a male running loose and a female on a light chain. It turned out the male was from Marine World Africa, one of the local zoo parks, and the female was being studied for something or other at Stanford. Who I thought were spectators were mostly scientists and some publicity people trying to get them to mate.

"The male was eager—you know how they can be. He grunted and grabbed the female's chain and tugged. She whimpered, backed away. He pulled again. She pulled back." This is like the modern Me Too movement, right?

"Watching the chimp's faces, I began to feel sympathy for the female. Suddenly the female chimp yanked her chain out of the male's grasp and, to my amazement, she walked through the crowd straight over to me and took my hand. Then she led me across the circle to the only other two women in the crowd, and we all joined hands together. The four of us stood in a circle. I remember the feeling of that rough palm against mine. The little chimp had recognized us and reached out across all the years of evolution to form her own women's support group."

There is something about our culture—magnificent things and also some really terrible things, the kind of unconsciousness and fears and racism and divisiveness and clinging and greed. And so it becomes important to understand that the things that happen to us are not just personal. They are personal, but they're also conditioned in some way by the sea of culture in which we live.

Therefore, to step out of culture a bit, to take your seat as the Buddha that you are and say, "Let me see all the energies, the beautiful ones and the painful ones. Let me step back and not just be reactive, not just be caught by it, but start to be the steward of my own wellbeing"—and therefore being able to be the steward of the wellbeing of others—this becomes not just a personal act but in some deep way also a political act. Because it allows you to attend to the world from a place of consciousness and openness and freedom, which is really where the change has to come from.

So you've been sitting and walking for the morning now. There's sleepiness, there's restlessness, there's this mind telling its stories, there's achiness in the body, breath. There's also coming back over and over. There's a kind of calming that often begins to take place, although not always. Sometimes, as I said, the tears will come or the unfinished business of the heart will arise. But you, in a way, get a chance to be present for it —present, allowing it, and at the same time, more spacious than your experience, which is what loving awareness invites you to do. And that becomes healing. It actually becomes an act of love.

A student asked about sticky forms of thoughts, the insistent visitors, as she put it. The to-do list and the psychotherapy chair—things that keep coming back and are really persistent.

These will come. And it's really interesting. You're also describing paying attention to our attachments. I don't want to make any judgment about it because we get attached and it's part of being human.

But I remember going out on alms round with my teacher Ajahn Chah as a monk, early morning with our alms bowl. We were walking through the rice paddies, along the little dikes in the fields. And there was a big rock, like Spirit Rock, a boulder in the middle of the field that you could see. The master turned and said, "Is that boulder heavy?" And being a bright young monk as I was, I said, "Yes it is, Master," because boulders are heavy, right? He smiled and said, "Not if you don't pick it up."

So that's a little bit at the root of your question. And there's a kind of art to this, because when you get things that are insistent, they come for a reason. You don't want to just push them aside. Whether it's your to-do list or the psychotherapy chair, when something keeps coming back, it's actually driven by some feeling.

So drop below the to-do list into your body and notice what's the primary emotion with it. What do you think it is? Fear, anxiety, right? Usually that's future planning. And so then you can shift your attention from the list and note the fear, which we'll start to do with emotions this afternoon, and note "fear" or "anxious" or "worried," and hold that with kindness. And as you do, the thoughts start to quiet down because that's really what's driving it.

Similarly, psychotherapy can be really valuable, and it's a great complement with meditation. But you're not doing therapy as you sit here. And it's cheaper this way, right? So when the therapist comes in, you can say, "Thank you, I have an appointment next week," basically. And imagine taking the therapy chair and putting it up here next to the Buddha or Quan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion. "You hold this for a while, I'm meditating, thank you." Yes, there will be psychological insights and they're valuable. But if you go down that road a lot, as you know, the stickiness, then it just takes you over. So in some way you're learning how to navigate your inner experience and noticing what needs to be tended to. If it keeps coming back, it wants to be felt in the body, in the emotions. And then you also can learn how to say, "All right, I felt you. Let me put you on the altar for now. Let me just go back to my breath and not get completely caught in it." So there's a few little hints for a very helpful question.

One more.

"Hi."

Hi.

"It's good to be here and to see you in person because I've read a lot of your books and have gotten a lot of wisdom from them, sir. My question relates back to what you were talking about earlier, before you answered this last question, about the beauty of the world on the one hand and the ugliness of it."

Hmm.

"And I work in a social justice field where I see a lot of ugliness. That's kind of like the point of the work. We're trying to help heal. We're trying to help make people whole. And I was wondering if you had any guidelines or wisdom to share about when to accept reality as it is, the ugliness, and when to fight, because I think I really constantly struggle with trying to make things better, trying to help people, but not having good boundaries about it."

I may talk about this a little bit more later, but let me begin to answer your question. Do you know who Somerset Maugham is, the author? He's quite a famous writer. He says there are three rules for writing the great English novel. Unfortunately, no one knows what they are, right? And I'm telling you that in some way because you're asking the kind of question that someone might ask: How do I know what job to take? Or how do I know who to marry? Things like that. And no one outside you can answer that question.

What you learn in meditation—and are you part of the Palo Alto group? No, okay. You could be, but you're not—what you learn in meditation more than anything is how to pay attention. And one of the great markers for how to live a wise life is the state of your body. Now it's true there will be certain circumstances. You're a parent and your child's in trouble and you say, "Forget my body. I'm going into the flames. I'm just going to do what I have to do." And there are moments like that where we have to do it. But it's not a good way to live. And we get lots of burned out activists here who are functioning on fear and adrenaline and anger and rage and so forth. And it's neither sustainable nor actually a good place to come from. Because you're trying to put out fire and you're carrying the fire.

So the main thing that I would say is, in due season, to take some time to tend your body and ask. Your heart will answer you if you listen to it.

Your body will answer and say, "How much should I take on?"

I remember Thich Nhat Hanh, who talked about this question. He started in Vietnam during the war with the School for Social Activists, and half the young people he brought together were killed. It was really tragic. But he still had such a passion for justice, as it sounds like you do. And he said, "Every spiritual community should take in people who are in trouble—mental illness or homeless. You should take in people who need help." And then he looked up and said, "But not too many, or they'll sink the ship."

And it's really the ship of your own body and your well-being. So I can't answer you, but what you're learning here is actually the way, the invitation to listen to yourself. Does that make sense? Your body will tell you. And don't let it get sick to tell you. Take a little time before that.

Now I want to do an eating meditation practice. While the raisins are being passed around, I'll talk about eating meditation and then we'll break for lunch.

Here's the instruction and the reason for it. When you're in the temple, here in the meditation hall, everything becomes part of your practice. Life is no longer divided. We live in a very divided culture—the gym for you to work out, business to make money, entertainment over here, and the sacred is relegated to the church or the temple or the mosque.

We live in a society where everything is divided, and the invitation of mindfulness is to bring things back to the center, which is here and now, where you are, to not exclude things. So there is walking meditation and sitting practice, there's breath, there's body. We're going to start to work with emotions. There's mindfulness of relationship and there's mindfulness of eating.

Now, how to do it? What does it mean? Because we spend a lot of time on food, especially with all the foodies nowadays. You go to the market, you buy it, you shop, you bring it home, you put it in the cabinet or refrigerator, you take it out, you chop it, you cook it, you season it, you eat it, then you clean the dishes, you put stuff back away—two, three times a day or more. Or you go to restaurants and sit with people. It's a big part of life, and it's very mysterious.

Here you are in this human body with a hole in one end in which you stuff dead plants and animals regularly to glug them through the tube and make it work. I don't know how you got in there. It's weird. Then you move bipedally by falling one direction, catching yourself, then falling the other way. And the little vestigial claws and tail you have—this is a weird thing, to get a body! But you have to feed it.

Usually we do it on automatic pilot. As Geneen Roth, one of our friends and colleagues, wrote in her book Feeding the Hungry Heart—half the time we're eating and it's not really about the food, it's something else.

So eating meditation is an invitation to actually pay attention to this mysterious act of feeding yourself. Here's how to do it: When you go out for your lunch, sit down somewhere, take out your food, and the first step is to sit in the presence of your food and not eat for thirty seconds—or if you're a killer yogi, for sixty seconds. There it is, and you're just in its presence, and you notice what happens. Maybe you're hungry. Where is the hunger? Is it your tongue that's hungry? Your eyes that are hungry?

Is it your belly that's hungry? Is it your mind that's hungry? The world works on hunger and desire, but we don't stop to pay attention to it.

So you sit and you notice what it feels like to be in the presence of food, of hunger, if it's there. You can name it: hunger. And you begin to notice with loving awareness—can I be present without being quite so caught in it?

Or maybe you're sitting there and you're looking at your food, and instead of hunger, there's gratitude. Gratitude for the woman in the bandana in the hot field who picked the strawberries. For the person who drove that truck and brought it to Safeway or wherever it was—or Whole Foods, where they doubled the price for you. And all those people, not to speak of the rain clouds and the earthworms and the farmers and everyone who's made it possible for you to eat that food from all over the world. You feel gratitude. Or maybe, you know, whatever it is—you start to notice what's present there.

And then when you feel really quite present, you also ask: what's right for your body right now? Because your body will answer. Is this the right food? Is this the right amount? You kind of start to listen.

And now you have your food. And then you begin to eat mindfully—reaching your arm, taking a bite of it, raising your arm, lifting, tasting, chewing, swallowing. You make the process of eating as mindful as your breath or your steps.

So let's practice with the raisins. Put a couple of raisins in your palm. And first, just pay attention, knowing you're about to eat. Notice what happens. Here are these poor little raisins about to be devoured. And what's there? Is there hunger? Saliva? What's happening? Is there liking, disliking? Maybe there's anticipation and pleasure. I don't know—maybe you hate raisins and there's hatred arising. You just be mindful of your experience. The dried grapes, the grapes of the vine.

And then when you're ready, maybe take a couple of raisins in your fingertips and bring them up to your nose. You can even smell them. Ah, what's that like? Amazing. You're about to eat these things that came out of the earth and someone picked them.

And then in slow motion, for one bite, let your eyes close gently and place them on your tongue. Chew and taste and swallow them, all mindfully. Notice all that happens, all the way till they go down your esophagus to your belly. See what you notice. Take your time. Whenever you're done, you can let your eyes open again.

What did you notice as you ate the raisin?

One person shared: "I think for the first time—and I've done this exercise many times—I kind of equated the flavor to yet another sensation. And I really enjoyed that sensation of the raisin flavor filling my mouth, kind of being present with what that felt like."

What was the flavor like? Was it sweet?

"Yeah, it was a sweetness that I kind of brought my attention to."

So lovely. These particular raisins, these meditative raisins, are very sweet because you're there to taste them. We can have all these meals—we go out to Italian, Thai, Vietnamese, Ethiopian, fabulous cuisine. And we're talking to each other and so forth. At the end, you're still a little bit hungry because you didn't actually taste it. But this was tasting that raisin.

And in that raisin, there's a whole world. Your teeth bite into it, and then all the wine that was ever made kind of floods across your tongue. There's something mysterious in it.

What else did people notice?

Someone shared: "Surprisingly, I noticed an instant burst of regression to my childhood. The raisins."

Yes, unexpected. That's like Marcel Proust's seven-volume series Remembrance of Things Past with the madeleine. Our senses—our smell, our taste—are really avenues to memory. And this again shows us that when we pay attention, all of time is actually here with us. So beautiful. Thank you.

Someone else shared: "I just noticed a curiosity. One raisin was small and very, very dark, and one was large and plump and a lighter color. I was turning them over and just noticing a desire to get to know these raisins that I was getting ready to eat."

That's actually a beautiful comment, because again, we take it all for granted, and it is so mysterious. The amazing thing is that nothing can ever be repeated—those two raisins are different. If you do this exercise a hundred other times, you'll have a different experience, because life is always showing you something new. And that curiosity you spoke of is really beginner's mind, opening to it.

So now you put your raisins in your mouth, you start to chew, there's a burst of flavor, you notice that. Then I could almost hear—you get the elements, the saliva sloshing across the room. Did you notice that? You're chewing, and then the salivary glands start to work. You get all the earth element: the hardness gets softer as you chew it. And the temperature element, the fire element—it's cool, and as you chew it, it warms up. And then the water element sloshes in. You get the primary experience of life in one bite of raisins.

And then you swallow it. But what I noticed—I always notice this—is that people are chewing and then sometimes they stick more raisins in their mouth even before they've swallowed. I saw you. And that's a really instructive moment—Buddhist psychology written right in that moment. There's sense experience. It's pleasant. There's grasping for more. It's like the kid with a cookie in their mouth, one in each hand, wanting more, wanting to keep the pleasure going rather than just being with the actual experience. There's that grasping for more.

And without any judgment—the point isn't that you're supposed to do it a certain way, or that you're supposed to eat in some magnificent Zen way. What's beautiful is the curiosity that was mentioned. You can learn all these things. You watch your tongue. The tongue is amazing—it's moving around and shifting things. Everything we take for granted. And then life becomes more alive. It's not a grim duty.

You know who Maurice Sendak is—the author of Where the Wild Things Are and In the Night Kitchen and all those great children's books. He wrote that the children used to send him lots of letters. He said, "I try to answer them all, usually hastily. But I got a card from a little boy named Jim, and I just loved the drawing that he sent to me."

So I wrote him back and said, "Dear Jim, I loved your card," and I drew on it a wild thing holding my message. Two weeks later I got a note from his mother, and she wrote, "Dear Mr. Sendak, my son loved your card. In fact, he loved it so much he ate it."

And Sendak went on to say, "This is the highest tribute an artist has ever received." The boy didn't care that it was an original Maurice Sendak drawing worth thousands of dollars. He saw it, he loved it, and he ate it.

So the point isn't to turn you into a zombie or something. It's rather to invite the same quality of care and attention we talk about bringing to the breath, to the body, to emotions—to bring all of that to this mysterious process of feeding ourselves. And with it comes a kind of communion with your own life, and all kinds of things that we can learn from it.

I hope you had a good lunch, in or out. One of the things that's interesting to pay attention to in eating meditation is at what point you stop eating. Because your belly will say, "Oh, nice and full," and your tongue will say, "Oh, that was really great, let's have a little more of that." And then your eyes will say, "Yeah, and I saw cookies over there, let's go for it." And then your mind will say, "No, no, no, you'll be sleepy this afternoon." And then your mother will say, "Yeah, but you should finish everything on your plate."

You get the entire committee. And basically, what mindfulness helps you with is to hear all the different voices and then to quiet yourself and say, "Well, what's actually good? What would serve this body? What would serve this moment well?"

Before we go on to the next step of mindfulness instructions—which will come at the end of this next period of sitting, how to include feelings and thoughts and so forth—I'd like us to shift the practice for a time to the practice of loving-kindness and compassion.

Because in the most fundamental way, it's not possible to pay attention to this life that we have honorably, spaciously, without being entangled in it, without getting lost—it's not possible to pay attention without kindness, without love. Otherwise, there sneaks in right away ambition, judgment, "I wish it were a little bit different," "Could this be bigger or smaller?" "Could I change it?" When we pay attention, even just as a mirror looking at things, there will come in—because we're conditioned to do so—ways that we want to fix it, ourselves or the experience, or change it or make it different, rather than just receiving it with understanding.

And of course, in a deeper way, there's this famous dialogue that I've written about, and others have too. We had with the Dalai Lama years ago, a group of us teachers meeting, asking about how to help with the degree of self-judgment, self-criticism, and self-hatred that's endemic in our culture. When you close your eyes and you sit there and that judging voice comes—you know that voice.

And he said, "Self-hatred?"

I said, "Yeah."

He was really confused, because there's no word for self-hatred in Tibetan. He went back and forth with his translator: What could this mean? It took a while. Finally, he looked up and said, "But this is a mistake. Why would anyone do this?" And then he said, "All right, how many of you in this room"—it was the teachers—"have experienced this yourself?" All the hands went up. He said, "Okay, I see we have a new problem here to solve."

So it becomes really important to pay attention to the quality of love, because otherwise the meditation can get amplified with judging. Not only am I not really a great person, or I'm worse than that, I'm a horrible person—I'm also a horrible meditator. You know, I failed, F minus or whatever. We can do all of that.

But to heal your body, to heal the relationships you have between people, to heal your heart and all the things that are unfinished in you—the only way to do it is through love. Yes, sometimes there needs to be truth-telling and deep listening.

It's not that those things aren't important too. But if they're not done with love, they don't work, really. You're not really deeply listening to another person or to your own body or your own heart.

Now, the complementary practice to this formal establishment of mindfulness—we're calling it loving awareness of breath and body, of walking and eating, and as we'll see, of feelings and thoughts and the relationships we go along—is the formal practices of loving kindness and of compassion.

How many have not done a practice like that before? Raise your hand. Good. I'm glad you're here. So that means also that a lot of you have, and there are many, many styles of it. You can find my recordings online and in my books, but also Sharon Salzberg and Pema Chödrön and the offerings from Stephen Levine and Joseph Goldstein and many, many other versions—Trudy Goodman, Tara Brach, and so forth.

But even though many of you have a practice, a few things to say before we start. First of all, it's called a practice as opposed to a perfect, right? Because you're actually practicing it. And what we practice, the seeds we water, said Thich Nhat Hanh, is that which grows in consciousness.

Second, it can bring up its opposite. You sit and do a little bit of these intentions of being well and safe and loving and compassionate, and then that person arises and you're like, "I'll never forgive them, I hate them." Or it can just feel numb and mechanical. "Oh God, this is like one more meditation I have to do and I feel nothing. I'm a real failure." It can bring up everything.

So what do you do when that other stuff comes up as you do it? You bow and you say, "Oh, you too. I will hold you with love." "I hate this person." I'll hold that with love too. "I can't do this. I'm no good." I'll hold that thought, that belief that I'm no good, with kindness and compassion. You shift.

Actually, it's interesting because the four most principal states of the awakened heart in Buddhist psychology are love—but when love meets pain and suffering, it turns into a different state, which is the state of compassion. The tenderness of the heart. "Oh, this hurts," and it holds that. It's not "may I be happy and joyful" but rather it turns into a compassionate care. And then when love meets well-being and happiness, it turns into what's called shared joy, a really beautiful quality. And then when not a lot is going on, or when love has been present and you're now just awake to the world, there also comes a very deep quality of peace or equanimity of balance. "Oh, I know how to be here and hold this world in my heart," and things become peaceful, which is the fourth of these qualities. There are other ones like forgiveness and gratitude and so forth, but these are the central ones.

So you can feel as we do this, even though we invite loving kindness and I'll invite a little compassion as well, that with the difficulties, the heart turns a bit toward compassion.

Now, normally when these practices are done, they're done over and over again. And sometimes they feel mechanical, sometimes they help a little, and you do it and do it. It's like the guy who wrote to the IRS and said, "I haven't been able to sleep because I cheated on my taxes last year. So I've enclosed an anonymous cashier's check for $3,000. If I still can't sleep, I'll send the rest." This is how we are, basically, as people. You do a little at a head. So you don't skip over it somehow. You just do it as best as you can and see what grows.

Now, it's also true that in the beginning of the practice or training of loving kindness and compassion, which involves expressing inwardly some intentions of kindness as you hold yourself or the image of another person and inviting those feelings—they may or may not come, feelings come in their own way—before doing it, it's often recommended that one recite or reflect on the benefits of a peaceful and loving heart. I mean, how do you want to live in the world with its joys and sorrows, with its troubles and its beauty? What would it be like to live with a peaceful heart? What would it be like to live with a really loving heart? And how is it to be with people that you know who express and offer and have a lot of love?

You know, it's sort of like we're drawn to them, like bees to honey.

And so there's a list. The Buddha was a list maker. The three characteristics, the four noble truths, the five spiritual faculties, the six paramitas, the seven factors of enlightenment, the twelve links of the nidana chain, fifty-two mental factors, and so forth. There's a different list of the benefits of loving kindness—a short list and a long list. This is the list of forty. I won't read them all.

But as you grow in loving kindness, your dreams become sweeter and you fall asleep more easily. There was a question about sleep before, someone asked. And you waken contented. Your body becomes stronger and your health grows. Angels and devas will love and protect you, whether you believe in them or not. And men and women will love you, should you be interested. As you grow in loving kindness and compassion, weapons won't harm you, poisons won't work, and things like that. If you lose things, they'll be returned to you, it says. People will welcome you everywhere. Your thoughts become more pleasant. Animals will sense this and love you. And elephants will bow as you go by, slightly. You can try it in the zoo, see if it works. Your voice becomes sweeter and your babies are happy in the womb and growing up. And if you fall off a cliff, a tree will always be there to catch you. That's right. The world becomes full of beautiful beings around you because you see through the heart. You see with the awakened heart of love. And so on. There's a lot more in the list, but you get the gist of it.

So you reflect: What is it like to be with people who are connected with one another in love? Because that's really what we are in essence. And what is it like to plant the seeds to nourish the qualities of love?

We'll do a little bit of loving kindness practice, and you can sense the pedagogy here, because for a lot of people, wishing themselves well—"May I be well or safe, may I be happy"—they go, "Ew, how could I do that?" It feels very dystonic to the way we hold ourselves. So we're going to start with someone that you love, which opens the doorway a little bit. The point in the practice is to start where it's easiest. When you start where it's easiest and you allow that, then little by little you bring in other people—dear friends, then neighbors. And finally, after you've learned to do it for a while, you can bring in difficult people, if you should know any, or difficult figures beyond the ones you know personally. That stretches the heart.

What happens is you start to get open, and then you bring in that difficult person or figure and your heart goes, "I'm never going to love them. They're just not worthy of it." But then you feel the pain of having a closed heart. It doesn't feel very good, and you say, "Okay, all right, I guess I even have to love them just because it hurts too much to not be open to the world."

And then you can wish well in a really wise way. "May you be free from hatred." Who don't you want to say that to? I think of the dictators in the world—Bashar al-Assad in Syria, or you name them. May you be free from hatred. May you be free from fear. May you know some sense of love. I wish that for everybody. Period.

Anyway, all right. So let's start with a little loving kindness practice and then we'll shift to the mindfulness vipassana, paying attention to our experience. Let your eyes close gently. You want to sit comfortably to do metta practice. It's very hard to establish that sense of love when your back is killing you.

So you want to be somewhat at ease. Let your eyes close gently. I know it's the afternoon and you've just eaten, so there's that little sleepiness that comes in. But pay attention as best you can. Come back, with your eyes closed, to feel your own body and heart and mind—with kindness, with loving awareness.

Now let yourself, as you sit quietly, think of, remember, picture, reflect on somebody that you love a lot, somebody that you care about. As you remember them, see them in your mind's eye, picture them, envision them. Feel that loving connection you have, how much you care for this person. And if there isn't any individual that comes, maybe it's your dog who loves you when you walk in the door and wags the tail no matter what's happened. This being, this one that you love—as you picture them and feel the deep care and affection, then like a soft whisper in the mind, add in the phrases of well-being, these traditional phrases. You can change them in whatever way expresses your own care.

May you be filled with loving-kindness. This dear friend. May you be held in loving-kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be strong and healed. And may you be happy—wishing for them happiness.

And again, with these words or similar ones, as you visualize them: May you be held in great loving-kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well, healed, strong. And may you be happy. Truly happy.

Now picture a second person that you care about. Bring them to mind, thinking, imagining, remembering them. And offer the same well-wishing. May you too hold yourself with great loving-kindness. May you too be safe and protected. May you too be well, be healed, strong.

And to bring in the element of compassion, let yourself become aware of the measure of sorrows in this person's life—their struggles, as in all human lives, their difficulties. Feel that tenderness that comes when you open to their struggles. May you be held in great compassion, in all your difficulties. Safe and protected. And may you be happy.

Now imagine these two people that you care about gazing back at you. Picture, envision their eyes looking at you with the same kindness. They wish this loving-kindness and compassion that you've offered back to you. They look at you with the same love. And as they look at you, they say, May you too hold yourself with great kindness, be filled with love. They gaze at you so kindly. May you too be safe and protected. May you too be well and strong. They wish this for you very genuinely.

They gaze at you and see your struggles, your fears, your physical problems, your difficulties or sufferings or losses. With so much compassion: May you hold yourself with compassion, they say. May you hold yourself with tender compassion. May you be safe and protected. And then they wish you, May you be happy. They gaze at you: May you be happy.

Take it in, their wishes. And as you do, if you're comfortable, put your hand on your heart. Receiving their care for you—they want this for you—you can also offer it to yourself. Just as these loved ones want it for you: May I hold myself with great kindness and love. They wish for you to do it, and you can take this in and learn to do it for yourself. May I be safe and protected. May I be strong and healed.

Become aware of your own measure of sorrows, your struggles and fears and losses, as we all have. Your measure of tears or sufferings. May I hold myself with mercy and compassion. This human life. May I be safe and protected. And may I be happy. The loved ones want this for you, and you can accept this. May I be happy.

As you invite tenderness, compassion, mercy, and loving kindness to grow in you—as you've offered it to these other loved ones—now breathing gently, imagine that your heart could open. If we had time, we could bring in other friends and family and community and people. Imagine your heart could open to this whole room around you, all these people seated around you, come for a day of loving awareness and mindfulness. Wish them well. May you all be held in great loving kindness.

Let it spread out from you across the room. Let it go out from the room, out across the land, across the trees and the gullies and the streams, to the mountain lions and the gophers, to all the children in the Bay Area, to the fish and the whales in the seas and the Bay, to humans and non-humans, so that this radiates from your heart out to surround this room with kindness and compassion. Like a beacon, a lighthouse shining out in every direction, you are sending the good wishes of loving kindness. May all those in this room together, and all that we touch, and all beyond, be filled with love and loving kindness. May all those around us in this room and far beyond—those we love and know, and those we don't know, and beings everywhere—be safe and protected. May they be well and healed and strong, all of you around. And may you be happy. A true happiness. May you be happy.

In whatever way this invitation of kindness and compassion has grown in you—even if it's difficult and you hold the difficulty with compassion—now weaving this together with your mindfulness, come back to feel the movement of your breath, your life breath. Feel a kindness toward yourself as each breath comes in and goes out. A loving awareness of this breath, this moment. Feeling the breath with a loving awareness, letting the sensations of body, when they're strong, be met with the same loving awareness and kindness. Noticing the other waves of experience with the same kindness. This too, the play of our human life. And you sit in the middle with a great heart of kindness and compassion. Sense each breath, the experiences of the body sensations—these sensations, this moment—receive with loving awareness. This breath, this moment's experience, just now.

For some people, the loving kindness or compassion practice is natural and easy, and it just opens the heart. For others, it feels like an unfamiliar landscape—more frustrating or mental or something. Be very kind with it. Find your own language, your own way. For some, it may not be the words at all. For yourself at night, you might just be sitting and putting your hand on your body or your heart, without any words, just realizing that you can offer yourself some respect and care or tenderness. Or it might be that you stay with someone that you're worried about and love, and that's the place that opens the gate. Be really patient with it. But it's quite transformative.

I love the story of Sharon Salzberg, my dear colleague and friend. She was teaching over in Oakland when Jerry Brown had that center near Jack London Square called We the People, before he became governor. She did a day of loving kindness, and there was a woman who raised her hand and said, "This stuff just feels so mechanical and dry." Sharon said, "Well, why don't you just go out and walk, and as you walk and you see people going by, offer them a little loving kindness"—which is the instruction for walking now as you go out in a minute. The woman said, "Okay, I'll go try."

So she went across the street to Jack London Station where the trains come in, and she was just walking back and forth doing her metta, feeling like it's dry, nothing's coming, no good feeling. And a train pulls in, and a guy toward the end of the train in a business suit with a briefcase walks down the long platform. He walks right up to her and says, "Excuse me, ma'am. I've never done this before, but I'm facing a really tough situation in my life, and you look so kind and peaceful. Would you offer a prayer for me?" She said, "Maybe this stuff works, you know."

perspective of what to do with the different energies that arise as you're sitting here minding your own business, and all of a sudden the whole storm of thought or anxiety or some unfinished memory or guilt or grief or longing or love—all the things that make you human—all that stuff comes up.

So some years ago, I hate to say how many years ago, at the early stages of the American-Iraq war, a small unit of American soldiers, Army and Marines, were walking along a street in the holy city of Najaf when hundreds of Iraqis poured out of the buildings on either side. Fists waving, throats taut, they pressed in on the twenty-four Americans, who glanced at one another in terror. The journalist was afraid a shot would ring out and some great massacre would take place. This was written in the New Yorker magazine, by the way.

And at that moment, an American officer stepped through the crowd, now nearly a thousand, shouting at them. He held his rifle high over his head with the barrel pointed to the ground. Against the backdrop of the seething crowd, it was a striking gesture, almost biblical.

"Take a knee," the officer said. Behind his sunglasses, the soldiers looked at him as if he were crazy. And then one after another, swaying in their bulky body armor and gear, they knelt before the boiling crowd and pointed their guns at the ground. The Iraqis fell silent. Their anger subsided. And the officer ordered his men to withdraw.

It took me two months to track down Lieutenant Colonel Chris Hughes. And when I found him, I asked him who had taught him to tame an angry crowd in a distant country in this way. He assured me that it wasn't part of the Army Manual of Instruction. "But warning shots," he said, "couldn't work. Problem is, the next thing you know, you actually have to start shooting people." And then he paused for a moment. "The Iraqis who were there in their holy city in Najaf felt that our presence was already disrespecting their mosque and their culture. The obvious solution," he went on, "was a gesture of respect."

And so when I talk about sitting with the sensations and bowing to them, or when the different emotions and experiences come, offering a gesture of respect—to say, "Oh yes, you too are part of this human life, this human incarnation, and I can include you in my loving awareness, in my understanding."

So what will come, as you've already noticed, sometimes it's sleepiness, and you think, "Oh God, I'm no good at this." If you were to go to Kyoto, to the great Zen monasteries, or to India to these wonderful ashrams, or to Burma, in the afternoon after lunch, you'd look at these great Zen students and these great yogis, and they're nodding like this. One will nod and the other will straighten up and then somebody else will start nodding. It's because you're human. And you're particularly tired. You know why? Because you've been running around, and you get quiet, and your body says, "Hey, remember me? How about a little rest, please?"

So you don't want to judge it. It's just an energy, and sometimes you're sleepy, and that's fine. You notice it with mindfulness. You can open your eyes. You can even stand up and meditate if you're really sleepy, or keep your eyes open while you stand. And that might help, might not, but you can try it. Or you can go out and walk a little more briskly. But mostly you just see: this is what's happening. Sleep is like this. And you don't judge it.

Then the opposite comes. You're sitting here and you are restless. You're bored. "Oh my God, I'm so restless. I've got to get out of here. Got to get out of here." What to do when that comes? Just as you can acknowledge sleepiness—you can name it, "sleepy, sleepy"—you can acknowledge restlessness or boredom. You sit here and you feel restless. And what's it like in your body? "Oh, I've got to get up. Restless, restless, restless, restless." And often just by acknowledging it, things start to settle down, because that's what happens.

They come in waves. But the thing is, if you don't pay attention to these states and you get restless or bored or lonely, and you're worried or afraid about it somehow, then it kind of takes you over. You're home and you get a little restless or bored, and what do you do? You open the refrigerator. You go online. You do all that stuff. You know what I'm talking about, right? Because you can't be with yourself.

If you're lonely, be lonely. Do it right. The poet Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness so quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few ingredients can."

If you're bored, be bored. Okay, I'm bored. I feel like I'm going to die of boredom. I'm restless. I'm dying of restlessness. When it gets really bad, here's what you do. You say, "All right, I'll be the first person in 2018 to die of boredom and restlessness at Spirit Rock. Take me." Let me see what happens. And the minute you say, "Okay, take me, I'll die of boredom or restlessness"—you know what happens? It gets easier, because most of the problem is your resistance to the experience. "Oh, bored, but dying, dying, dying... Restless, dying, dying, dying... Dying, okay... Gee, I wonder where I should go for dinner." Because the mind has no pride. You die and then it's making plans, right?

Or you notice that there's fear that comes. And as Hafez, the great poet, says, "Fear is the cheapest room in the house. I'd like to see you in better living conditions." So what you do is name it: fear. You feel those sweaty palms, the tightness. Fear, fear. You just acknowledge it. If you do it twenty, thirty, fifty, a hundred times, at some point it comes to, "Oh, fear. I know you. Yeah, this is just fear. Thank you. Fear is like this." And you become bigger than the fear.

Or maybe it's wanting and desire. You think, "Oh, I read those spiritual books. You're supposed to get rid of desire, right?" How weird. How could you live without some healthy desire? There's healthy and unhealthy desire. It's kind of like, as my poet friend Alison Luterman writes, you're on a diet and you hide the chocolate chip cookies. Meanwhile, you're the only person in the whole galaxy who knows where those chocolate chip cookies are hidden, right? Desire is part of human incarnation.

So instead you sit and you say, "Desire, desire, desire... Oh God, I hate feeling desire. Hating, hating. I wish it would go away. Wishing, wishing. More desire, desire. Longing, longing. I'm going to die of this. Dying, dying. But I'm doing pretty good. Oh, pride, pride." And you just see the states as they come and as they go.

Or the judging mind.

I don't want to judge. I hate myself for judging. I judge myself so much. I should stop judging. It's no good to judge. I'm a terrible person. And I judge all those other people. But what's that? It's more judgment, right? I've got to get rid of this judgment.

So what can you do? You bow and you say, "Oh, judging mind. That's what it is. Thank you for your opinion. Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm good for now." And you know whose voice is in there—we won't talk about them—but somebody taught you that and recorded that judging in there. "Thank you for your opinion. I'm good for now. Thank you." And then you go back to your breath.

Or the doubting mind: I can't do it. It's too hard. Everybody else—all 398 other people—are sitting like they're awakened masters. And I'm sitting here restless and tired and sleepy. I can't do it. Maybe I should do Sufi dancing. It's more fun. All those thoughts, that's the doubting mind. "Oh, doubting mind is like this." Because if you don't know how to deal with your own doubt, you can't actually marshal your energy and direct it, can't plant the seeds and water the seeds that Thich Nhat Hanh talked about.

So you gradually learn that all these are energies of life.

The same with thoughts. You're sitting there and planning comes. Planning mind. If you name it—"planning, planning"—it dissolves like fog under sunlight. Remembering. You name it "remembering," and you don't have to go into the memory. You don't have to go to Chicago and relive that bad family reunion. You just note "remembering," thank you, and let it dissolve for now. Later you can work that out in therapy, but for now you just let it go.

As Hafiz writes, "The mind is ever a tourist wanting to touch and buy new things and toss them into an already filled closet."

So you let these come. You acknowledge them, you let them dissolve as they do. And you become the space of loving awareness that's there with your breath. Then when a strong sensation arises, or a mood of sadness or excitement or love or longing comes, or it's the planning mind or the doubting mind, you name it. Let go of the breath. "Oh, doubting mind, doubting, doubting." It dissolves and you feel your breath for a while. And then, "Oh, but I'm so sad about it." And you notice, "Sad, sad, sad." But then the sadness turns into tenderness maybe. "Oh, tenderness now. I like this."

Oh, liking, liking. Thank you. Bow to it. Then back to your breath for a time.

And you become the space of loving awareness. You become the Buddha, or the Bodhisattva of infinite compassion, that can sit with the energies of your life. And because you learn to do this, you can then sit with the energies of others' lives. You can tend the world differently.

As you walk, these energies will come. When they do, you can just stop and name them—sad, or excitement, or longing, or love, whatever it is—and let that be part of it, then walk again. Or if you wish, as you walk, you can do a little metta, loving-kindness, and wish well for those bipedal beings walking around you, or other beings that you see, for a little bit, and then back to your steps. You get to play with your attention—being present to your body, acknowledging the waves of experience as the loving awareness, and then offering little blessings of metta and kindness to people.

Alan Watts says, "The art of living is neither careless drifting on the one hand nor fearful clinging on the other. It consists of being sensitive to each moment and regarding it as utterly new and unique, in having the mind open and the heart wholly receptive."

This art of living is supported by, held in the field of mindfulness, of loving awareness that we're practicing—to be present for our own breath and body, for our thoughts and feelings. In that way, we can sit, walk, do our loving-kindness, and then bring that same caring attention to our relationships with others and to our relationship with the whole vast world around us.

But this step that we're doing today especially—of quieting the mind, tending the body, listening to the heart—boy, the world needs this. I just hope it goes up the chain of command somehow.

So let's continue sitting with this spirit of mindfulness, including the strong feelings or states of mind as they arise, with the same care and attention you've given to the breath or sensations of the body.

While in some ways you may be getting a little weary—okay, it's a long day of meditation—let yourself notice the moments where there's some peacefulness or some well-being. Notice the moments where you feel like, oh, there's some balance coming. Even if it's just for a breath or two or three, they will come. Dwell in them a little bit. Let them buoy you up. Rest in them. Start to feel that you can inhabit the sense of well-being as you sit here, when it comes.

This breath, this moment's experience, just now.

Make sure the mindfulness has the spirit of loving-kindness with it, in it. Bring in the practice and quality of loving-kindness and compassion, tenderness for the last part of this sitting—especially to yourself, and those you care about.

There is something about the stillness that grows that is worth tending to, and in some cases preserving or staying with.

For those who are more experienced practitioners, I'd like to start with a two-line chant that's part of the morning and evening chanting in the monasteries and temples where I practiced. The line goes: Svakato bhagavata dhammo sanditiko akaliko ehipasiko opanayiko pachatangve titapu vinyuhiti.

The translation is: "Honoring of the teachings of the Dharma, of the truth, which is open-handed, immediate, visible to the wise, bringing benefit here and now, offering liberation to all who turn their hearts to it—with nothing kept back, nothing hidden."

It's a kind of celebration of the possibility of freedom for us.

I love reading poems when we get quiet, because there's a way in which poetry is the music of language. William Carlos Williams wrote, "You can't get the news from poems, but men and women die every day for lack of what is found there." It's not like turning on the news—it's hearing something much deeper and wilder.

From Carl Sandburg, "Wilderness":

There's a wolf in me—if you haven't noticed in yourself—fangs pointed for tearing gashes, a red tongue for raw meat, the hot lapping of blood. I keep the wolf because the wilderness gave it to me, and the wilderness will not let it go.

There's a fox in me, a silver gray fox. I sniff and guess and pick things out of the wind and air, and nose in the dark night, and circle and loop and double cross.

There's a hog in me, a snout and belly, machinery for eating and grunting, machinery for sleeping satisfied in the sun. I got this too from the wilderness, and the wilderness will not let it go.

There's a fish in me from salt blue water gates. I scurried with shoals of herring and water spouts with porpoises. There's a baboon in me, clambering, clawed, dog-faced, yapping a jealous hunger, harrowing under the armpit.

There's an eagle in me and a mockingbird. And the eagle flies among the rocky mountains of my dreams and fights among the Sierra crags, the cut crags of what I want. And the mockingbird warbles in the underbrush of my Chattanoogas of hope. And I got an eagle and the mockingbird from the wilderness.

Oh, I got a zoo, a menagerie inside my ribs, under my bony head, under my red valve heart. And I got something else. It's a man heart, a woman child heart. It's a father and mother and lover, came from God knows where, going to God knows where. For I am the keeper of the zoo, and I say yes and no, and I sing and touch and love, and I am a pal of the world. For I came from the wilderness, and the wilderness will not let me go.

If we could put a little speaker on the side of your head for what went on while you were looking so calm and peaceful over the course of this day, people sitting near you would at first turn their heads and say, "Really?" And then they'd start to move their chairs over to one side. Because the zoo is in there. We contain it all. And as Thich Nhat

Hanh said, from where we started: What are the seeds that we will water? Where do we get lost, confused, caught in hatred and ignorance? And what are the seeds that we will water?

One of the earliest descriptions of the Buddha's teachings, from the first years of his wandering: In the morning on alms round, he took his bowl and came by a field that was being plowed by a very wealthy Brahmin. At the end of the plowing, they gathered everyone to offer them food. The wealthy Brahmin looked at him and said, "Hey monk, I plow the land, I sow the seeds, and having worked in this way, I eat. Why don't you do a little plowing and sowing, and then you would eat too?" Like, "Stop being a beggar and get a life."

And the Buddha replied, "I too, oh Brahman, plow and sow, and having done so, I eat."

Now the Brahmin landowner got interested. He said, "You claim to be a plowman, but I see no plow. Tell me, what kind of plowing is it you do?"

And the Buddha replied: "Trust or faith is the seed, compassion the rain. Wakefulness, my plow and yoke. Conscience, my guide. My own mind is the harness. Clarity is the plow blade and goad. Well guarded in action and speech, I use truth to weed and cultivate release. Wise effort is the oxen drawing the plow toward freedom without regret. This is how I plow. And it bears the fruit of the deathless—a freedom that can be touched by nothing. Whoever plows in this way becomes free of entanglement in all sorrow and distress."

Well, he was convincing. The Brahmin said, "Let me offer some milk rice to you," and poured it into the bowl. But as the myth goes—you can think of this mythologically—the rice wouldn't stay in the bowl. The bowl hissed and it all splattered out. And one wonders, why did that happen? Why was the bowl hot like that, so that the milk rice would splatter out?

Have any of you ever plowed a field? So interesting—we're so far from our roots. A few people have. Tell me, what's the plow like at the end of a long furrow? Just one word.

It's hot. That steel of the plow cutting through the earth—by the end of opening the earth in that furrow to plant the seeds, it gets really hot. And so this image is that the bowl was hot because the Buddha had been doing his plowing. It's a really lovely, poetic play with language. "I too have done my work, and you don't even have to bother to feed me."

I'm beyond all of that, you know, beyond judgment of what you have. But there's something really beautiful in it.

Like that verse I read from Thich Nhat Hanh at the beginning of the day—that we have all these potential seeds in our fields. And which ones will we water?

Another little text for you, just to follow this thread:

Others will be cruel. We will not be cruel. Thus we should incline and direct the heart.

Others will kill. We will not kill. Thus we should incline and direct the heart.

Others will take what's not given. We shall abstain from this. Thus we shall direct and incline the heart.

Others will speak falsehoods. We shall speak truth. Thus we should incline and direct the heart.

Others will be fraudulent. We shall be honest. Thus we should incline and direct the heart.

Others will be hateful. We shall be compassionate. Thus shall we incline and direct the heart.

Others will lack wisdom. We will cultivate wisdom. Thus we should direct the heart.

This is another language for the sowing of seeds, for the watering, for the directing of consciousness itself. Because we have a choice as human beings. We can get caught by the reptilian brain—you know it very well. The fight, flight, or freeze. Fear and separateness, what's called the small sense of self, blocked off from the world. Or we can say: This is us. This is our family. This is our planet. This is life. We are part of it, and we're all in it together.

We can blame others. It's their fault. But I remember, again, being in the monastery. There was some big wedding in a village, the closest village to the temple, and loudspeakers with music were blaring while we were trying to be peaceful. Mostly we were in this remote forest, but there were a couple of little villages nearby. And somebody complained to the teacher, Ajahn Chah, about all the noise.

He said, "I have a question. Who's bothering whom? Is the noise bothering you, or are you bothering the noise? Where does the difficulty come from?"

Or if somebody was angry, he said, "Hmm, you're angry. Who's bothering whom in that?"

Because the one thing we have the great capacity to do is to tend our own heart. And you will have praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, birth and death, sweet and sorrow. There will be tragedies and there will be suffering, and there will be beauty and love. That's what makes up your incarnation, your human life.

Now there's something deeply political again about all of this. James Baldwin writes: "I imagine one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

And because we can't bear the insecurity of being human—is anybody really secure? Raise your hand, come on, fess up. You're not. Life in its nature is uncertain, isn't it? What's going to happen tomorrow? No one knows.

How long will you live? No one knows. What is consciousness? Life is really uncertain. The only thing you know for sure is that you're going to die. But the big question is when. A long time away, a short time, and then all of a sudden—oh, surprise—it's your time.

What Baldwin says is that if we can't bear uncertainty, if we can't bear our measure of the grief or the tears that's given to every human being, then we project it onto others. And so it's the enemy du jour. It's the immigrants. It's the Mexicans. It's the Muslims. It used to be the communists when I was a kid—now they're coming back around again. It's a new popular meme. Let's hate the communists, or whatever. It's the black people. It's the brown people. It's the yellow people. It's somebody else who's different than us. And so we project our insecurity because we can't bear our human condition, our human incarnation.

Your ability to sit as you have in practice over the time that you have in this way gives you a great strength or power, a capacity, which is a kind of freedom and an ability to love in this life. Because who are you really? Your consciousness. Your spirit that was born into this body. You're not your body. I hope you know that. You're not made of brown rice and Big Macs. It's just not who you are. And you're certainly not your feelings, because they're always changing, right? You're happy and sad and angry and loving. Maybe you're your thoughts. Come on. You know the cartoon in the New Yorker that shows a driver going across the vast Utah desert, with a roadside billboard that says, "Your own tedious thoughts next 200 miles." It's like meditation, right? The mind just streams thoughts, secretes thoughts like the salivary glands secrete saliva. So you're not these. Who are you really? You are spirit, you are consciousness. And consciousness contains all things. It's connected with all things. When you remember this, then those prejudices and fears and confusions—all those things—they drop away.

One of the stories that I love—I'm reading some very classical Buddhist texts for this more experienced group—is about Ananda, who was the cousin and attendant to the Buddha, at least as all these stories are told. Ananda, having been sent by the Blessed One on a mission, was returning past a well near a village. Seeing Bhakti, a young untouchable woman, an outcast, he asked her for a drink of water.

Now, if you think about prejudice, which we have plenty of in our own culture, it takes the form—or did, and still does—of Indian caste. If you're born into a lower caste, it used to be that even if your shadow passed over the food of a high caste person, it would pollute it. Imagine a child being told your shadow will pollute something.

So Bhakti says, "Oh, venerable monk, I am too lowly born to give you water to drink. Do not ask anything of me, lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am an untouchable."

And Ananda replied, "I ask not for caste, but for water, please."

The woman's heart leapt joyfully, and she gave Ananda water to drink. He thanked her and went away. But she followed him, and hearing that he was a disciple of the Buddha, she went to the Blessed One and said, "Help me please live and dwell near where your disciple Ananda is, that I may see him and tend to him, for I have fallen in love with Ananda." It happens, you know.

The Blessed One understood the emotions of her heart and said, "Bhakti, your heart is full of love, but you do not understand your own sentiments. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice toward you, and practice it toward others."

Follow this path of justice and righteousness, and your good heart will outshine the royal glory of kings and queens.

This story really goes back to the original founding of Buddhist teachings, which welcomed everyone from every caste and race. All were called nobly born. You who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are.

So then, what is freedom in this? Freedom is not to be trapped by the emotions and perspectives and prejudices, not to water the seeds of judgment and hatred. But to encounter each person and see somehow their secret beauty—to see, "Born in this person, wow, I wonder who's behind those eyes." And that one, and that one, and that one, living this mysterious life. Then it allows for a kind of deep kinship to arise.

And of course, it's not going to be how you want. Some people will like you, some won't, some will leave you. Human beings are an unpredictable lot. But you get to tend your heart.

There's a story I heard recently from Frank Ostaseski, a good friend who started Zen Center Hospice. His book, Five Invitations, is in our bookstore—it's a great book. It was about a woman whose work was in the publishing industry in New York. Her mother had lost more and more of her memory through Alzheimer's and become unable to care for herself well. So she moved her mother in with her in her apartment and got a caregiver.

She came home from work one day and all her precious books—she had a great library of precious books—were spilled out on the floor, tumbling out of different boxes. She walked in and her mother looked at her and said, "I'm tired of all these old dusty books. I'm going to give them to my dentist." That was the state of mind she was dealing with.

Jillian, the woman, got really upset at the caregiver and said, "How could you do this? My precious books, and my mother's taking them away!" Really angry. But the caregiver was not in that state at all. She said, "Madam, today I pack the books up, tomorrow I unpack the books. If this gives a woman who has so little sense of control even a moment of some satisfaction—that she can direct something—well, I will go along with her. Because this too is important, and I just like being with her. It's fine, thank you."

And you can hear how much love there is in that response.

Oh, we think the world has to be the way that we want it to be. And I don't mean that you don't stand up for justice or protect those who are vulnerable. But there are different ways to do it. You can do it out of your anger or out of your fear. Or you can do it out of love. And that love comes from this inner sense of freedom that you always have, because consciousness in its nature is free. You can get identified with things and get caught in them, but freedom remains available.

Consider this story of a woman named Sarah, a single mom with two kids. Her eight-year-old daughter Alicia had leukemia. Of course, Sarah got incredibly anxious and terrified and worried, already grieving what might be the loss of her child's health, scared that she would lose her. For the first whole year, Alicia went through the long rounds of chemotherapy and hospital stays and doctors, and her mother and the whole house were filled with sadness and fear and anxiety coloring the days.

Then one afternoon when they were out on a walk, Alicia said, "Mama, I don't know how long I'm going to live, but I want them to be happy days."

It was like a splash of cold water on the mother's face. She realized she had to step out of the drama of leukemia, the melodrama and all her fear, and meet her young daughter where she was. She grabbed her and they started to dance outside, and she said, "Yes, we will do this."

And of course, Alicia is now twenty-three years old. She graduated from college. She made it. She's okay. But even if she didn't, what kind of days would you have wanted for her? And what kind of days would you have wanted for her mom?

When I was eight or nine years old, just around that time, my twin brother—whom I loved very much, who died last spring, also from blood cancer—he was much bigger and much more robust than I was. I was kind of very skinny. Here's the comparison.

He played football quite successfully, and I played oboe in the orchestra. But at that time we were eight years old, and we were living in Buffalo, which has a lot of snow coming in off the lakes. We had this big, wild winter storm. It was very cold. We all wrapped up like boys do and went out to play in the snow. I was shivering—I was so skinny and just shivering and shivering. He looked at me and said, "You're cold." I said, "Yeah." He said, "It's not cold." And he took off his hat. "It's not cold." He took off his scarf. Then he took off his jacket. "It's not cold, it's just in your mind."

Pretty soon he was stripped to the waist in the middle of this blowing windstorm, dancing around and saying, "It's not cold, it's just in your mind!"

That's who he was as a person. He was a great adventurer, a world explorer. He was a member of the Explorers Club—those people who walk to the South Pole and climb different mountains. He actually explored the underwater lakes of the world: Lake Baikal, Lake Titicaca in the Andes, Lake Malawi in Africa. He spent a year there doing the underwater genetics of that lake. He was a geneticist and environmental biologist.

And it was so beautiful because it was the teaching of what kind of spirit do you meet your life with. What does it mean to have a free heart? To love another person? As Ananda's story showed, to be able to meet and see the beauty in every person you encounter, or to at least meet them respectfully, even if they're lost in themselves or operating in some other way. As Nelson Mandela said, when you imagine something better about people and treat them with respect and dignity, often they act the better because of it. Not always—you don't get to choose that. But you get to choose your spirit.

So yes, we sit and meditate with breath and body and emotions, all the things that you've been practicing for some years, things you've learned in your life and in your years of retreats and meditation training. But what interests me is: What is your experience of freedom like? What moments have you learned where you thought, "Oh yes, I really have the choice, the possibility of living freely"—whether it's in your meditation or in your relationships or in the things that you tend in this world?

With this opening reflection, I'd like to ask those of you who are experienced practitioners to answer the question: Can you describe moments of freedom, of awakening, of that understanding that came to you? And what's that like?

"Wow, I get to start answering this question. Very nice. So my practice has led to the saying: 'This is all there is, and this is a miracle, and I'm a miracle connected to all these miracles.' I really deeply connect to that by feeling the life force in my system and being very present with this miracle that's unfolding in front of me right now."

Thank you. I'm very grateful to you. Beautiful. Can you think about a time when that was particularly clear to you or helpful, when you were in the middle of something?

"Well, that's my daily practice. I regularly come back to that. I thought you were going to ask about a time when it was very difficult to practice. I try real hard—like if I'm sick—to find that connection still to something inside of me that can bring forward a connection to the life force."

Lovely. So there you are sick and you say, "Yeah, but that's not the whole story. There's some life force or something greater than that." There's also a beautiful move that one can make, which is to realize that you're not the only one that's sick. As you're sick, there are lots of other people in the world who are being tended and cared for by so many others. And this is also part, as you say, of—what was your phrase?

This is life. This is a miracle too—health and sickness both. Just being alive.

Thank you, thank you.

Somebody else—moments of freedom, what you've discovered.

"First, I want to thank you for everything that you've shared, not just here today, but all over everything. I'm deeply, deeply grateful for everything that you've done and shared. I had a really interesting moment at the beginning of this most recent meditation. All the books that you wrote are at home, so all I had was a paperback Tara Brach with me. I was waiting in line to have you sign it because I saw you do that for someone else. And when it came to be my turn, you turned away. You may not have seen me, or maybe it was time to start—whatever the reason. And I immediately went to this place where I was telling myself the story: Oh, look, you're invisible now. You don't matter. You're subhuman. You're not worthy. You were born lower caste. So I sat down and I really felt that sense of being despicable. And then I sat with it, and I realized that this is a story I tell myself sometimes. And the freedom for me came with the realization that I was able to recognize this as a story—that I was able to understand I could sit with it and just be with it and not have to fix it or change it or run away. And that was beautiful."

Thank you. Thank you for all of that. Sorry I didn't see you. But you know what? I see you now. And it's really a pleasure.

Thank you. That's great.

"Hi. I had a moment yesterday that took me through the whole gamut of emotions. I have an elderly mother and father, and they live quite far away. We had a little health scare yesterday. My father sounded panicked. He said Mom wouldn't come out of bed. I started having all these stories of her demise, all kinds of terrible things that could be happening—how powerless I was, how I wasn't going to get there, and even if I got there, I wouldn't be useful because I've been so far away. And then I felt shame and terrible and sad, all these things. I sat with that for most of the day.

Finally I called my mom at, I guess, four-thirty her time, and she'd finally gotten out of bed. She was very cheerful. She said, 'Oh, hello! How are you?' I said, 'Oh, I'm really, really good.' We're planning to go to this wedding in two weeks. And she goes, 'Are you going to the wedding?' I've told her like a hundred and fifty times that I'm going to the wedding. 'Yes, yes, Mom, I'm going to the wedding.' 'And your children, are they going to the wedding?' 'Yes, Mom, they're going to the wedding.' 'Oh, that's so great!' She goes, 'I'm sorry, I forget.' And I said, 'You know what's wonderful, Mom? I am so envious of you. You get to be delighted over and over again with the same news. And I'm just happy to tell it to you, because every time, you get to have the same amount of delight.'"

And then I thought, she's the Buddha.

Anyway, that was my story. Thank you.

Thank you. Yeah, so much in that. All the ways in these last two stories that we tell ourselves stories about things as if they're real, and they're just thoughts. And to be able to step out of that as you describe—oh yeah, that was an interesting story, wasn't it? Beautiful.

Next, please.

Sure. Over the years, I've struggled with becoming really agitated and aggravated in the workplace with my coworkers. Sometimes it's gossiping, saying mean-hearted things, saying harsh, negative, critical things. In the past, I used to say something that would qualify as gossip, mean-spirited, and afterwards I would kind of have a rush of pride. But then I would feel ugly.

More recently, that's really changed. Now, before I say something, I have that sensation. And for me, that's given me a lot of freedom.

Beautiful. Yeah. I mean, there's a way in which we do talk about one another and there's something meaningful in it. But to be able to sense your best intention, to sense what you're doing and ask yourself, "Is this healthy? Is this helpful or not?" That freedom you just described. Wonderful. Thank you.

Next.

Hi there. I've had a mindfulness practice for several years, thanks to Spirit Rock. And I'm very grateful to you, so thank you. It's been particularly—and very, I should say extremely—helpful to me as a mother of three. Something you shared that I want to share with the rest of you who are parents, something you shared with me that I use from time to time. There are several antidotes that I use as a parent. In moments of chaos with my kids, I say to them, "This is a moment of suffering, and this too shall pass." And it diffuses whatever chaos is happening, and they look at me like I'm crazy. But it really helps. There are many things that you've shared with me over the years. I just thank you, Jack. Thank you.

How old are your kids now?

Now they're fifteen, eleven, and nine.

Good luck. Teenagers are supposed to be a little bit chaotic—that's their job, you know. They're trying to learn all these things, and their brains are just sort of opening to enormous creativity and vision and things like that. We kind of want to organize them, and they're saying, "No, no, look at what's possible!" Some of it's messy, but it's also natural. Great.

Please, who's next?

So before I thought about the question, "What gives me moments of freedom?" I first started thinking, "What are the moments where I feel like a prisoner? What are the things that take me away from my freedom?" And I believe fear is the major one that gets to me.

So I believe the moments of freedom come when I have faith that there is something more powerful than myself, and I'm not running the show. Whenever I'm meditating, instead of sometimes saying "not now," I put it in someone else's hands, not mine—in my higher power's hands. And if the fear comes twenty times, I twenty times just put it in someone else's hands. Exactly. Until all of a sudden it quiets down, and that's when I have the freedom—knowing that I'm here just learning, someone is running the show, and I'm just doing my best. When I feel that I'm in control, that I'm in charge, fear is with me.

But when I let go of that control is when I feel the freedom.

Thank you. Beautiful. Thank you so much.

Hi, I'm really happy to be here. First of all, Jack, I've been listening to your recordings on Dharma Seed for a while and I practice with some of your students, so it's just really wonderful to be here.

Thank you.

I don't know about anybody else, but I find that intimate partnership is a space of great beauty and great challenge.

Even the Buddha and Jesus had trouble when they went home to their families, right? So you've got to understand that this closeness brings certain challenges, yes.

Well, and even despite knowing that, being a practitioner for a few years now, I've put immense pressure on myself in my practice. Like you said earlier, it's called practice, it's not called perfect. But I can understand that intellectually, and then still that's kind of the go-to.

I've found that when I'm in really tense moments with my partner, my go-to is—like one of my teachers said—I'm like a warrior. I've got weapons hidden everywhere. In a sleeve I've got a knife, then I've got a gun. I'm really sharp with my words, so when I'm in an unconscious place, they can really hurt somebody. And afterwards, historically, I've felt really painful after I've said things and been hard on myself.

But I had a moment recently where my partner and I were in a very tense argument situation, and I just had this moment where I felt the knife ready to come out. I was quiet for a second and I just breathed and said, "You know what, I'm feeling a lot of anger in my body right now, and I want to say something but I don't want to say it, so I'm just going to take a second and breathe." Right after I said that, my thought was, "Wow, good job." That was such a moment of freedom—instead of the inner dictator or the inner scoundrel, as Matt Kahn calls it, there was this loving presence. That felt like the fruition of everything. That was worth everything, basically.

Thank you. Beautiful.

Thank you so much. I've really enjoyed coming here. It's only taken me twelve years to get here—I was in Berkeley with the Zen Center for a long time.

I'm sort of riding on the coattails of the other mom, and something I've found that has been very liberating with my teenage daughters has been when they expect me to do something that I kind of can't believe they're asking me to do, or can't believe they're upset about something after I've done so much. I just say, "Oh my queen, all I want to do is please thee." And it diffuses the situation. They're like, "Oh, really, Mom?" and they don't know what to say. Because it is true in one sense, rather than "I can't believe you're asking me to do that" or "I can't believe you're unhappy with this." I just say, "I'm here to please you." And it seems to diffuse the situation.

Great. Thank you.

A couple more.

"Some of the pieces that have really helped me over the past maybe two years since I really started my practice—one was initially the mind-like-sky meditation, being able to realize that I didn't have to be a prisoner to the thoughts that would stream in and stream out. That just opened a space for me to start going deeper in meditation.

One of the other pieces that's helped me is in my daily devotional—just the reminders of how much joy is important to bring into your life in the midst of darkness. The example it gave was that fire is a reminder of how much it can bring pain, and joy is also a good reminder that this is what is meant to be in your life.

These pieces have been really helpful for me as I've gone through a dark valley in the last year and a half—custody struggles, not being able to see my children. And through some guidance from you, being able to have compassion and forgiveness toward an ex-partner where there was anger, lots of anger, that was blinding me. Joy was not even present in my life. Being able to get to the point of having compassion and realizing there's a story going on, probably for generations on that side—to open my heart and forgive allowed me the space to bring other parts of joy into my life. That's been through music and song. So I'm really thankful."

Thank you. So difficult, and yet you've learned so much in it.

One more.

"Thank you so much again. Thank you, Sangha, all these beautiful beings. I have a sense that what we all aspire to is less glimpses of freedom and more abiding liberation. And I've noticed that through loving-kindness practice and my practice of ahimsa as extreme sport—"

Can you say that again?

"Ahimsa as extreme sport."

Beautiful. It almost appears that way in our current world—even to take a vow of non-harming puts you a little bit out of the mainstream, we'll say.

"But through these practices, particularly loving-kindness, often poetically referred to as 'the kiss from within,' there reaches a point where discriminatory mind itself loses its hold and relaxes its grip. There's a sort of Laughing Buddha element to this. I think it was Papaji—someone said, 'What about liberation? How do we get liberation?' And he said, 'Who told you you were bound?' So excavating the story of what we believe has made us feel unfree—interestingly enough, the experience of being able to just drop discriminatory mindset, to not believe that my purpose or any of our purposes here is to continuously evaluate creation, each other, our fellow beings, in terms of 'this is good, this is bad, I like this, I don't like that'—was incredibly liberating."

So it's not your job to continuously evaluate and judge, huh?

"It's rather exhausting, quite frankly. Although I hear you have to become exhausted by samsara."

Beautiful, beautiful again. And I love hearing these because some of them are so practical—"Good job" to yourself, "I did that, I was able to not get so caught in that." Or "Oh, my queen," you know—just being playful about it and not getting so identified.

And some of them carry such depth. "I'm going through a custody battle. I can't even see my children. How do I do this? Do I let myself get sick? Do I carry that anger and fear? Or is there some way I can still have my own life?" Or whether it's with work, or with my mom who's lost her memory—but then she gets to have the delight over and over and over again. So that's a whole other way to hold it.

This capacity to be free lives within us. And as we begin in our meditation to learn to be present for the whole zoo that Carl Sandburg described, for the whole of our humanity, that sense of freedom grows. You become the loving awareness itself, and you then have the ability to be with difficult things and joyful things alike—to both enjoy what's beautiful, to water those seeds, and not be captured by that which otherwise would habitually take you and cause tremendous suffering.

There is a book some of you may know called The Book of Joy, written as a week-long dialogue between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu, both of whom have amazing laughs. The Dalai Lama has a sort of deeper laugh, and Tutu giggles a lot. They're old buddies, both in their eighties, teasing each other. The Dalai Lama was trying to take Tutu's hat off, and Tutu says, "What, you're a thief? We're supposed to be holy men. You're stealing things!" They're just delighting in each other.

The premise of the book is to explore how these two people, who have both been in the fire of so much suffering, can carry such joy. For Tutu, it was the years of apartheid when people around him were being burned and killed and shot. For the Dalai Lama, the loss of his country of Tibet—unable to go home for more than fifty years, temples burned, sacred texts destroyed, monks and nuns thrown into prison.

Someone once asked the Dalai Lama, "How can you be happy?" And he said, "They've taken so much from me. They've taken my freedom to walk my own land. They've burned our temples. They've tried to take our sacred places and texts away. Why should I let them take my happiness?"

That sense of freedom they each carry is truly remarkable. I think that's why people go to see the Dalai Lama. Yes, they go because of those great Tibetan teachings, half of which we don't understand. Or they go because he's the Nobel laureate, this amazing political figure. But I really think people go to hear him laugh. Someone who can carry the weight that he does and still have such a joyful heart and a beautiful smile says, as so many of these stories we've just heard from people say, that your spirit is given to you. It is free. And that is really the great choice. From that freedom, then you can do all kinds of things in the world.

Dāna Talk

Jack Kornfield · 7 min

> In this heartfelt reflection on generosity, Jack Kornfield draws from his years as a forest monk in Thailand to illuminate the deep significance of dāna in Buddhist practice. He recounts the moving experience of walking barefoot on alms rounds through impoverished villages on the Laos-Thailand border, where villagers with very little would offer food with profound reverence—not for the individual monks, but for what the Saṅgha represented: the precious teachings of Dhamma, virtue, wisdom, and compassion that formed the heart of their culture.
> Kornfield reflects on the weight of receiving such offerings in silence, understanding that the only appropriate response was genuine dedication to practice. He connects this traditional Asian devotional quality to Western practice centers like IMS, noting how the same spirit of generosity has allowed the Dhamma to flourish for 2,600 years and continues to sustain teachers and students today.
> Beyond supporting temples and teachers, Kornfield expands the teaching to encompass living with a generous spirit as an essential aspect of awakening. He suggests adding forgiveness, gratitude, and generosity to the traditional brahmavihāras of mettā, karuṇā, muditā, and upekkhā—recognizing these qualities as what make the heart truly joyful. This talk serves as an invitation to feel generosity not as an obligation but as a beautiful expression of practice that connects us to an unbroken lineage of giving.

Now being around two o'clock, the schedule asked that everyone come for closing announcements. It's a bit of a mistake, my fault really—I should have checked the schedule more carefully because it would seem better to have done this at the end of the afternoon. But it had already been arranged, and then I thought, well, coming and going. A weekend is a weekend. We know we have to leave tomorrow anyway, so it's not like a surprise to you. Let this be very much part of our practice. We'll go back in again to continue silence and dialogue and so forth. This is just one of the events arising.

Also, maybe you can feel in the course of this retreat the change of form, where it's a bit more flexible in some ways and interactive. And even with Tija's beautiful songs last night, a little of that devotional quality. If you go to Buddhist Asia—back to Burma and Thailand and places like that—and maybe I mentioned this—it's very much a devotional practice there for people. People go with such reverence to the temples, and generosity is enormous in those cultures. Later this afternoon, we'll talk some about the Pāramitās and Bodhisattva and that kind of expression into the world.

I remember one of the most moving experiences of being a forest monk, a monastic for the years that I was, would be to go out on alms round in the morning, sometimes with a few other monks, to walk barefoot five or ten miles to some village and come back with our bowls. The areas where I lived mostly were quite poor, on the border of Laos and Thailand. In the dry season, very poor—not a lot to eat. People would wait there in the morning for the monks to come through the village. We'd be silent, and then they would offer some of the food they'd made for the day. As I said, they had enough rice, but in the dry season there wasn't a lot else—a few vegetables, some of it like tree leaves chopped up with chili peppers and old broken fish sauce with a lot of pepper so that it would last for months.

They would place the food in the bowl with so much reverence, even though they didn't have much. And I think, okay, I grew up in the U.S., and even though my family didn't have a lot of money, if I was in trouble I could wire home and my mom would send me five hundred or a thousand dollars to get me out of trouble. That's more than the average annual wage of a lot of the people in these villages—double, triple it. What was I doing taking their food?

But they saw us as carrying something that was so important for their culture. There was so much reverence—not just for the particular monks, but for what we stood for in the temple. They so valued that the culture had the teachings of Dharma, of virtue and generosity and wisdom and understanding and compassion. The monastics really represented that which they loved about their culture, among one of the most precious things. And so they were saying, here, we'll give of the little that we have.

You can't say thank you—you can't say, "Wow, I got a mango, fantastic, thank you!" You do it all in silence. All I could do is receive it and say, all right, I have to practice now. I have to take their generosity, which is so enormous.

You feel it if you go now to the great temples too. You go to the Shwedagon in the center of Rangoon and people stream in. Yes, there are offerings, but more than that, there's just so much love and compassion and devotion to Dharma that's woven into the cultures.

So IMS has become that place for a lot of people, for our lives—many of us as old students who come back here. And it's through the generosity of the whole community of people that it has blossomed in the way it has, together with the Forest Refuge and the Study Center. It's in beautiful shape.

Often we wait to the end of retreats and do the dāna talk—please help support the teachers and things—which is a lovely thing. But it doesn't at all communicate the magnificence of the generosity that's kept the Dharma going for 2,600 years, and how you feel it both in those home cultures and, in some way, here in the food and the walls and all the new things that have been done here.

Your support for us as teachers makes it possible for us to teach. It's really fantastic, and then we can teach other people. So it's really meaningful and very beautiful and accepted with a great deal of gratitude.

These things—whether it's generosity, not just supporting the temple but living a life of a generous spirit, not so self-centered, living a life that has gratitude in it—these are what make our heart joyful, along with the Brahmavihāras of mettā, karuṇā, compassion, joy, and equanimity. I would add the Brahmavihāras of forgiveness, of gratitude, and of generosity in some way. These are the awakened heart.

So this is the pre-dāna, dāna talk. But it's also an invitation to feel all this as part of our practice in some really beautiful way.

So with that, I turn it over to Daphne and Roberta to add things about IMS and everything else.

CHAPTER 67

The Buddha's Last Teachings | Monday Night Talk

> In this profound exploration of the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, Jack Kornfield presents the Buddha's final year not as dry history but as transformative myth—a story that speaks from an ancient heart to our own. Beginning with "thus I have heard" and ending with "this is how it was in the old days," these teachings address how we create wise communities, how we face our own mortality, and how we discover the awakened nature within ourselves.
> Kornfield weaves through the sutta's essential episodes: the Buddha's counsel on what makes societies prosper (harmony, caring for the vulnerable, tending the environment), Sāriputta's teaching on mindfulness as the gateway to liberation, the recurring visits of Māra reminding us that enlightenment is not a final destination but an ongoing dance, and the Buddha's radical inclusivity shown through his acceptance of the courtesan Ambapālī. The teaching emphasizes that liberation is available to all—"not by caste or creed, not by race or birth does one become noble, but by the state of one's heart."
> The talk culminates in the Buddha's final instructions: be a lamp unto yourself, let the Dhamma be your guide, and remember that all created things are impermanent. Kornfield illuminates how every place can be sacred, how the teacher-student relationship requires mutual responsibility, and how the golden robes symbolize that which never tarnishes—our own true nature as loving awareness. This teaching invites us to ask: what part of this ancient story touches our own lives most deeply?

So this evening I want to give a talk following one of the great Buddhist texts, the Mahaparinibbana Sutta, which is a teaching on the last year of the Buddha's life.

When you look at the Buddhist texts, they're full of stories—encounters with people who come to see the Buddha seeking understanding or relief from suffering or healing, philosophers and yogis trying to understand the mind. He meets them all and gives each one an individual instruction: sometimes mindfulness training, sometimes compassion, sometimes wisdom, sometimes the training in virtue and ethics, sometimes the training in how to tend one's body and heart.

This particular text is one of my favorite teachings. I've returned to it every three or four years for quite a while because I find it inspiring. These teachings are meant to be examined as a kind of experiment for yourself, reflecting on how they affect you or point to something important in your own life.

I want to speak of these teachings not as history—because while it's a historical account of his last year, that approach can feel dry, like recounting what I did last summer. Instead, I want to present it as myth, as part of one of the greatest myths of humankind: the myth of the Buddha leaving the princely life and becoming an ascetic, sitting under the tree of enlightenment, discovering awakening, teaching people, returning to his own family, and traveling on foot throughout India for forty-five years. The myth of the Buddha is a story of what's possible for us.

The reason I want to teach it in mythological terms is that you'll hear it sounds that way. It begins with the phrase "Thus I have heard," which is a little bit like "once upon a time." And it ends with "This is how it was in the old days." So you can settle back and listen to this story that speaks from an ancient heart, timeless, to your own.

This teaching has two main themes. One is how the Buddha wants to leave his teachings as guidance to practice, to empower the community and people who are following him. The second is to foster wiser relationships to one another in the spiritual community and to the world.

The setting for this teaching is Vulture's Peak—already a kind of mythological word—a mountain in northern India that rises from the plains near the modern province of Bihar. In those days, the region was covered with great forests and huge trees and wild animals. Now it has become deforested, more desert land with poorer soils. But then it was verdant and fecund and filled with life. That's where the monks and nuns and followers of the Buddha heard these teachings along the plain of the Ganges.

The text offers empowerment by setting up the image of a kingdom of justice and compassion and respect. How should we continue to practice when you, the Buddha, have gone? He's preparing people for the end of his life.

It begins with a dialogue where the minister from the King of Magadha, one of the local kingdoms, comes to see the Buddha and asks, "Should we make war on the Vajjians? There is a possibility of conflict building up. Should we engage in war? Should we back off? What should we do?"

Instead of giving advice about whether they should engage in war, the Buddha in his usual way invites them to inquire deeply. He says, "Tell me, do the Vajjians meet together in harmony, listen to one another respectfully, and depart in harmony?"

The minister says, "Yes, they do."

The Buddha replies, "Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. Tell me, do the Vajjians protect those who are vulnerable among them—the children, the women, the elderly, the sick?"

"Yes, they do."

"Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. Tell me, do the Vajjians stay true to the ancient teachings of living with virtue and understanding and cultivating the heart?"

"Yes, they do."

"Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. Tell me, do the Vajjians take care of the nature shrines and of the environment in which they live as a sacred place?"

"Yes, they do."

"Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline."

The minister left and returned to his king, saying, "The Buddha said these Vajjians are doing all the things that make them strong and help them prosper and make a beautiful society." Listening to each other in harmony—I wish we were doing that more in our current time—respecting the vulnerable, taking care of the natural environment, following the deep teachings of wisdom.

Then the Buddha turns to his own community. "So to you monks, so to you nuns, so to you lay followers: you should follow in their footsteps. You should cultivate listening to each other with respect and harmony, taking care of the vulnerable among you, sustaining the natural world around you, preserving your own personal mindfulness. Thus you too will prosper and not decline. As long as the monks and nuns, both in public and in private, show loving-kindness to their companions through acts of body, speech, and thought, and share their virtuous actions with one another, so long will they prosper and not decline. For this is the basis for the freedom of heart, for liberation."

This is how the teaching begins—by setting up what a wise kingdom looks like, both among the Vajjians and for us at this time. What would a wise society look like? To listen deeply, to care for the vulnerable and the environment.

But here's my question for you: if we take this as a myth and not just history, why didn't the Buddha say, "You shouldn't go to war against the Vajjians—they might defeat you, they cannot be defeated"? Reflect for a moment: why didn't he do that?

One of the things that's important to hear in this is that instead of saying "do this" or "do that," the Buddha is pointing to the underlying causes, not just the effects of things —to see that if we live in a certain way, what will be the outcome? He wants those who are listening to him, those who are seeking wisdom, to inquire in themselves: What is it that makes a wise society? What gives strength and courage? To see the causes rather than receive a simple answer.

The rest of this long text of many pages, this sutra, is the gist of his travels, the announcement of his death, the last disciples, the last teachings, what he wants people to keep in mind and follow, his last meal, and what happens at his death.

Here are some of the stories.

At this point, the Buddha wanders with a company of renunciates and lay followers from Vulture's Peak to Pavarika's mango grove near Nalanda. There, as he sits quietly, his chief disciple, the wisest of them, Sariputra, comes up to him and looks at him with great admiration. "There will never be a better, never be a more enlightened teacher than you, oh master," he says, speaking to the Buddha.

The Buddha raises his eyebrows and looks back at Sariputra, wise though he's supposed to be. "Do you know the other Buddhas from the other eras?"

"No," says Sariputra.

"Do you know the ones from the past?"

"No."

"Do you know the ones in the future?"

"No."

"Do you know the extent of the Buddha's mind sitting in front of you?"

"No, sir."

"Then how can you say such a thing?"

Sariputra responds to the Blessed One: "Just as if there were a great city surrounded by a mighty wall, and there was one entrance gate into the city. At the entrance gate stood someone who was watchful and caring, compassionate and strong, courageous, who noticed what wanted to come into the city or who was leaving, and could discern: this is for the benefit of those living in this place, and this is not for the benefit. In the same way," said Sariputra, "the awakened ones of all the eras and all the times rest at the gateway of mindfulness and notice as thoughts come and go, as experiences rise and pass, as people and interactions happen. They quiet themselves and, as if standing at the gate, they receive all of this with discernment and loving awareness, with mindfulness. In so doing, they allow that which is healthy into themselves, and that which is not, they do not."

Rumi writes this poem: "What use is it to make such a fuss when we will soon enough all go through that same gate?" And of course, he's speaking of the gate at the end of life.

But this is a beautiful teaching. Here, Sariputra answers: all right, I don't know the Buddhas of the past and present, but I know the nature of liberation itself. When we rest in the present and can notice what arises, with discernment seeing this is healthy and this is unhealthy, and with that discernment follow—that is the gateway to our freedom and to our liberation.

As they wander further along the banks of the Ganges River, the Buddha and those following take a seat at some point. The Buddha says, "Tell me, those of you who are practicing to cross the flood of sorrow—when you get to the other side, what will you do with the raft of your teachings?" He explains: "These teachings are a raft to cross over, to make a bridge, to help you across the flood of confusion and difficulty. By establishing mindfulness, by establishing concentration and stillness and steadiness, by establishing integrity—these become your raft. But when you cross the flooded Ganges, then what do you do with the raft? Do you carry it around with you?"

Of course, the disciples, being wise, say, "No, we don't, sir. No, we don't."

And the Buddha says, "Just so. These are teachings to use. These are teachings to guide you, but they're not teachings to carry. They're simply used to cross over the moments and days of confusion or fear, to have these teachings to cross over into the peace of liberation, which you can do in a moment. And then you leave the teachings aside."

As the story goes along, the Blessed One continued and sat to rest under a great tree in the forest, asking to be alone to meditate. As he did, Mara came—who in this language, in that time, is the incarnation of ignorance, greed, and hatred, sometimes translated as "the evil one," although I don't think evil is quite the right language for Mara. Certainly the opposite of enlightenment.

As you all know, in the great story of the Buddha's awakening under the Bodhi tree, Mara came and tried to tempt him with his beautiful daughters and every possible desire. The Buddha just sat there and said, "I see you, Mara." Then Mara threw flaming arrows and spears at the Buddha, and he touched them with his fingers and heart of compassion, and they turned to flower petals at his feet. Then Mara tried doubts: "Who do you think you are to sit in this way? You don't even know what's possible." And then the goddess of the earth rose up and swept away Mara, saying, "This human being has sat and established the basis of liberation in his own heart for so long. He does understand it."

Well, it turns out Mara keeps coming back. You may have noticed this in your own life. You go to retreat, you do your own meditation, things seem hunky-dory, everything's fine, you're in a great place—and then who comes knocking? Mara re-appears.

And the thing is, if you read in these texts, Mara comes back forty times during the Buddha's life. When he has a backache, or when things are difficult in his community, or during various struggles, Mara appears. This is because, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, no Mara, no Buddha. The Buddha and Mara actually inter-are. Without Mara, the Buddha wouldn't have something to awaken from.

We all carry this within ourselves. Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian writer and peace activist, said: "If only there were evil people out there insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were simply necessary to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who among us is willing to destroy a piece of our own heart?"

So Mara will appear for you, as he does for the Buddha, over and over in this story. And each time Mara appears, the Buddha says, "Is that you, Mara?"

In this case, Mara says, "I've come to see you many times and said it's time for you to quit your teaching. You should retire. You should end your life. You've done what you wanted. And you always said, 'I need to have a great community of people. I need to benefit people and have them benefit one another. Only then can I take final nirvana.'" And Mara said, "Now you've done this. It's time for you to let go."

The Buddha reflects and says, "Yes, Mara. Later this year, I will take my final nirvana."

Now, why does Mara keep coming? You'd think there's happily ever after enlightenment, wouldn't you? But it's not like that. The line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. Mara is part of the myth and part of the human incarnation of our dance.

Mara has been visiting you, and every time you meditate, you might get quiet for a little bit and then Mara comes. It doesn't matter if you're in Des Moines or Florida or Belfast, Ireland—Mara will find you. And then you can say, "Oh yes, doubt, fear, confusion. Is that you, Mara?" The minute you can acknowledge it and say, "Oh Mara, I know you," then Mara loses his power.

So as soon as the Buddha said to Mara, "Yes, finally I will end my dispensation, I will end my teaching—this year I will pass into final nirvana," there was a great earthquake, a terrible hair-raising earthquake and thunder. Ananda, his attendant, came running and said, "What is the cause of this great earthquake?"

The Buddha explained there are great earthquakes because of the movement of the earth, but there are also earthquakes when a Buddha is conceived, when he's born or she's born, when he's enlightened, when he first turns the wheel of the Dharma, and when he renounces his teaching.

But why the image of an earthquake? Because it's the shaking of the foundation of all the ground we stand on. The enlightenment, the teachings of birth and death—the earthquake says this is what awakens us from the dream of separateness and solidity. There's something greater here in our human incarnation. Who are you really? Remember, you are consciousness itself born into this body. You're the witness to it all. And the earthquake reminds you of this.

Then Ananda weeps and begs, "Please stay! Many times you've told me that you could live a long, long time. Please don't die."

The Buddha replies, "I gave you hints that I could stay a long time, but you never asked me until this moment. I gave you hints that if you told me three times I must stay for a long time, I could do so. These hints I told you at the Black Snake Pool and at Jivika's mango grove and at the deer park in Rajgir and the cool wood in Tipota. Each time you could have said, 'Please stay and live long and long,' but you did not. So yours is the fault, Ananda."

How about your teacher saying that at the end of his life or her life? "Yours is the fault." Talk about a serious guilt trip. "Yours is the failure for not asking, Ananda."

And then he went on: "Now my body is old, like an old cart held together by straps and thongs, and you have not asked me to stay."

So this year I will take my final Nirvana.

How can we understand this? Why would the Buddha say this to his most beloved attendant, his cousin, the person that everybody respected? He says, "It's your fault, Ananda." Reflect for a moment. What could this mean?

Yes, his body is like an old cart, and that's what happens to our bodies. But there's something deeper in this. He's trying to say that the teacher-student relationship is not one way—that everyone you relate to, those who are your teachers, and everyone becomes your teacher in some way, but especially where you receive important teachings—is a two-way responsibility. You have to listen and tend and be caring as they do. It is an interdependent relationship. And thus it is your responsibility to be in that relationship and offer yourself, as that other person—the wise one, the teacher, the person you're learning from—does too.

Now it's also true that later, just before the Buddha dies, he praises Ananda as he'd done often in these texts—for his care and beauty, how pleasant he is for everyone who's come to see the Buddha, how he tends them well, the qualities of his timing and sensitivity. He loves Ananda, and it's a very clear relationship. But this is a moment where he's saying, "This is a two-way deal, Ananda, and you and I have to take care of each other." If you want to awaken, this is what you too need to remember.

Then it goes along in another scene. The Buddha and the gathering of renunciates and lay followers leave and travel along the Ganges River, and he offers teachings to the large company of followers. Each time he completes these teachings, when he's done, he sits quietly. Those who receive these teachings hear the last phrase he offers: "Now is time for you to go and do as you see fit."

Why would he say this? Each time someone comes with questions, he gives a response. Somebody asks for a teaching on mindfulness, compassion, forgiveness—he gives the teachings. And then he says, "Now it is time for you to go and do as you see fit."

What does this mean? What it points to is that the teacher cannot do it for you. No one can get enlightened for you. No one can love for you. No one can forgive for you. No one can awaken for you. No one can let go for you. So the Buddha offers his pointings, his teachings, his skillful means, his medicine. And then he says, "It's in your good hands. Now it is time for you to do as you see fit."

There's a beautiful empowerment in this that we can take into our lives, into all of our interactions with those we care about—because often it is the people you really care about. "It's now in your good hands." And that allows you to be peaceful and steady and caring, but not attached or grasping to the outcome.

Then Ananda and the senior monks and nuns ask the Buddha, "So once you are gone, who will be our guide?" A great question, when you don't have the great teacher with you.

The Buddha put no one in charge of the Sangha. He didn't say, "All right, now I deputize Sariputta or Ananda"—whoever it might be—"They will be the next Buddha to take over the community." He said, "The truth will be your guide. Be an island unto yourself. Let the Dharma teachings and the teachings of ethics and virtue—let them be your guide."

And they said, "How shall these be our guide? How can we know?" They responded, "What are the real teachings of the Buddha?"

He said there are four ways to know, because he liked to make lists. You heard it from the lips of the Blessed One. You heard it from the circle of elders. You learned it as respected teachings some masters had repeated. Should you follow these? Should you approve or not approve?

He said only—only if you consider in your own heart. Does this conform to the gist of the Dharma teachings that you have heard? Does it have a basis in virtue and ethics, not harming oneself and others? Then it is the path of liberation.

Does it have a basis in samādhi and quieting the mind, in looking deeply and listening? Then it is a path to liberation. Does it have a basis in wisdom, in seeing clearly? Then it is the teaching of the Blessed One. Does it follow the Four Noble Truths—that there is suffering, that it acknowledges suffering, that it sees the causes of greed, hatred, and ignorance, that it offers the path of mindfulness, compassion, and wisdom to the end of suffering? If it does, then it is the teachings of the Blessed One.

And he went from place to place offering these fundamental teachings: the Four Noble Truths, the foundations of mindfulness, of loving awareness of the body, of feelings, of the play of the mind, and of our relations with one another. Establishing ourselves in mindful loving awareness, we begin to partake in the consciousness, in the mind, in the heart of liberation. We share that with the Blessed One.

Now the Buddha continues to wander. This is again an account of that whole last year. He comes to rest and practice in a large and beautiful forest grove. The texts describe the travel becoming difficult for him. His body is getting sicker now. Yet his heart is at peace.

In this forest grove, he becomes surrounded by followers—the word goes out that this may be the Buddha's last year of teaching. Five hundred or a thousand, they use these numbers, sometimes a thousand or ten thousand, renunciates and monastics and devoted lay people come. And there they are in the forest. Visiting dignitaries and yogis and people who hear about the Buddha arrive for teachings.

Here you see the Buddha in this part of the story, seated in the midst of this great following. In the distance, a retinue of the finest carriages arrives. The courtesan Ambapālī comes dressed in her finest silks with a whole coterie of young and beautiful women and their attendants, all in their finest silks and perfumes. They seat themselves near the Blessed One and bow and pay their respects, walking into the grove step by step with gestures of reverence.

When they do, it says the Buddha instructed and inspired and roused and awakened them. He taught them the four foundations of mindfulness, the gateways of liberation. He taught them about the dignity of virtue and living with integrity. As they sat to the side of the Buddha and listened deeply, there awakened in them a sense of freedom—the shift of identity from confusion and misunderstanding to realize that they could step back and be the loving witness of it all, not caught in their reactivity, not caught in separateness. And great delight arose in them.

Then Ambapālī, in response, invited the Buddha and a company of five hundred of his followers in a formal invitation to come and take a meal at her palace. The Buddha accepted.

And then an interesting thing happened. While they were still seated there, a whole new group of carriages came. You can tell how mythological this is—it's kind of wonderful. These were the nobles, the Licchavis of the local kingdom, of the great city nearby. They came and heard the last of the Buddha's teachings. He also roused them when they sat and paid their attention. They arrived dressed in blue and yellow and white, the text says, with great silks and adornment, royal carts and horses and elephants. It was their turn. Then they invited the Buddha to take a meal, which was the great way of making merit—saying, if we can offer something to you, you give us these amazing teachings, and now we want to have this relationship where we support you and your followers. They wished to make the deepest of all merit by caring for the Blessed One.

The Buddha said, "I'm sorry, I cannot accept your invitation. I've already received an invitation from the courtesan Ambapālī, who is sitting over there with her retinue."

They became quite upset. "You accepted the invitation from that mango woman?" This was a kind of slang, a slur for being a courtesan. The Buddha said, "I accepted her invitation."

They grew so upset that they went over to her and said, "We want to make an offering and a meal for the Blessed One while he is here." She shook her head. They said, "We will give you one hundred thousand gold pieces."

And Ambapālī, whose heart had just awakened in the presence of the Buddha, said, "Not for a whole kingdom would I give up the chance to make an offering to the Blessed One"—because that was the source of her own awakening.

They went back and asked the Buddha again. He said, "I have accepted. Dear friends, she was first."

So why does the courtesan appear here in the myth, in the story? Reflect for a moment. It is a really beautiful teaching about who can practice and who is worthy of liberation. What are the deepest values of the Dharma?

These values say that not by caste or creed, not by race or birth, said the Buddha, does one become noble. One becomes noble by the state of one's heart. A truly radical teaching in a society where the Brahmin and Hindu structure was all about caste—who is above whom, the Brahmins and the Kshatriyas and the different levels of the castes, the Shudras, the untouchables.

And he said, no, nobly born you, who have the great heart that is capable of awakening. Each of you, oh nobly born, remember who you really are.

And he turned no one away. He saw the nobility of every human being. And so Ambapali really stands in for all the rest of us—for those who are wounded, those who have been cast aside in the culture, those who are insecure, all the ways we think we're not worthy. And the Buddha says, yes, you are worthy. You, human being, you come, and if you come with your sincerity, the dharma gates will open for you and will bless you.

And then as the story goes on, the last meal is offered to the Buddha at Pava Mango Forest. As the meal is offered, the Buddha says, "This portion is for me. No one else eat." And Kunda offered the best hard and soft foods. But it turns out that this last meal—depending on what story you read of it—contained something that had gone bad in the food, in the part that the Buddha took. And he knew it. He was already sick a lot that year. And he took this meal anyway, for whatever reason, perhaps because he knew finally it was his time. And it was offered with so much sincerity.

He ate it, and shortly thereafter described having pains like a knife cutting into his abdomen. That's how sick the dysentery became, and the difficulty. But even as he started to feel sick, he looked at Kunda the Smith and he said, "Thank you for offering this last meal. It is one of the most important offerings that a Buddha receives in his life. And you will make great blessings from this."

Now, why would he say this? Here you're giving the meal and the Buddha dies not long after. Doesn't seem like a very good thing. But what happened when you reflect on this is that the Buddha pointed to the purity of Kunda the Smith's intention. The key to karma is your motivation. And this was offered with such a pure heart and so much goodness that the Buddha said, it is your pure heart and your goodness that in the end will bear fruit.

And you can feel this in your own life. Even though it doesn't bear fruit right away, when you act out of truth, out of your deepest values, out of what you care about the most, and there's a purity and integrity in it—it not only feels right to you, but it makes the karma, sows the seeds of liberation and wellbeing and flowering.

And then, after this, he is taken to a nearby forest glade and sits by a stream and closes his eyes and goes into a deep meditation. When he wakes up, a man named Pukkusa walks by, and the Buddha says, "I am thirsty." And Pukkusa says, "I will get you water from the river, but some carts have crossed this river while you were meditating. Did you not see them?" And the Buddha said, "I did not." The blessed one was in another place, which was the state of deep samadhi. He said, "Even if five hundred carts had passed, in that state, timeless and transcendent, I would not have heard them."

And this is the state that is never born and never dies. The Buddha was seated there in the timeless realm of awareness itself, consciousness that creates all things. And then he returned to the incarnation of being the blessed one, the Buddha Gautama.

And Pukkusa said, "I cannot get you water from the river. It's all stirred up." And the Buddha said, "Please bring me some." And he brought the water in a container, and the Buddha held it in his hand. And it all became clear and purified, like you would put alum into a glass or a container with mud and it would all settle to the bottom. And again, this is a beautiful image of the Buddha's own mind and heart saying, you can bring me that which is muddy, and when I hold it in loving awareness and in the awakened consciousness that we are, it all settles and becomes clear.

And then Pukkusa said, "Let me offer the blessed one some robes for this last part of your journey." And he gave him these robes of burnished gold cloth. As the Buddha put the robes on, the gold cloth faded into the background and his own skin began to glow golden, brighter than the robes themselves.

What is this? The Buddha glowing in gold, the gold robes. Why is this in the story? Gold is a symbol of that which does not tarnish. No matter what happens, gold will not tarnish.

It holds its royal beauty. And so these robes and the glow of the Buddha represented that which is untarnished by the arising and passing of all things.

And here, says Pakusa, the Blessed One who began to speak has roused and inspired us all, has set up that which has been knocked down, has pointed the way to one who is lost, who has carried a lamp into the dark places of the world so that those with eyes to see can see, and those with a heart to open can know that which is unborn, the timeless—the reality beyond our individual separateness, the freedom that we were born to. This is the Dharma body of the Buddha.

There was a very wonderful text at one point earlier. A man who was deeply devoted and inspired by the Buddha used to follow him around and gaze at him, because the Buddha was said to have been a handsome man with a handsome presence, a beacon of compassion and love and wisdom. This disciple would just stare at him.

After some weeks or months, some long time, the Buddha looked at this disciple and asked, "Why do you keep staring at me?"—knowing exactly the answer.

The man said, "Oh, I love to look at the Blessed One, to hear your words. I see you. You're so magnificent. You're so inspiring."

And the Buddha replied, "You do not see me. You only see this outer form, this body, these robes. That's not who I am."

The man paused and said, "Then how might I see you?"

The Buddha replied, "One who sees the depth of the Dharma—that is one who sees the Awakened One."

In any moment when you step out of the separate sense, the small sense of self, the separate body—sometimes called the body of fear—and feel first the interdependence with all that lives, and then beyond that recognize that consciousness is what you really are: timeless, unborn, awakened, free—then you see the Buddha, you know the Buddha.

After this, with Pakusa's golden robes, the Buddha could barely move, but he went along with great pains and severe bloody sickness. This is saying something about human nature. This is what happens in a human incarnation, in a human form. It is not something to be avoided by us. Birth, growing up, aging, sickness, death—part of the First Noble Truth. This is the nature of incarnation. It is not bad. It is simply the way things are. Trees, especially deciduous trees, have their leaves in the summer. Then fall comes and they drop their leaves and there is snow in the winter. Everything has its cycle. This is the nature of incarnate life.

And so here is the magnificent Blessed One, the Buddha, with great pains and severe bloody sickness. He laid down in the lion's pose on his right side—if you want to sleep like the Buddha, lie on your right side—between two sal trees. As he lay there, it says the trees immediately bloomed full of blossoms.

Then, for those who had the eyes to see, the great yogis who could look beyond this dimension to others, the atmosphere became filled with angels and devas: the devas of great purity and the radiant ones, the devas of great peace and the devas of magnificent beauty, the devas of boundless compassion. They all appeared surrounding the Buddha.

The Buddha said to those standing near him, "Move aside a little bit so that the angels and the unseen beings can also have their place to see the Blessed One."

Resting there quite sick, still with the trees blooming and Ananda tending him, Ananda said, "Do not die here. Do not die. Why don't you go from here into Kosala, or Banaras, Varanasi—to one of the great cities, to a palace where you can be honored, or the banks of the Ganges? Don't die in this miserable backwater"—in what the texts call a daub and wattle village, an old anthropological term for huts made of little staves of bamboo and mud. "Don't die here. Go to some magnificent place where we can celebrate your passing."

The Buddha paused and said, "Do not call this a miserable backwater." And here we are again in the myth of this story as we come toward the end. He said, "Once upon a time long ago, on this very spot an eon ago, there was a king named Mahasudassana who was a wheel-turning monarch, and his palace on this place was the center of a worldwide kingdom—prosperous, well populated, a kingdom of justice. The streets of Mahasudassana's kingdom were full of the sounds of elephants and carriages, of gongs and commerce, of cattle and cymbals and joy and prosperity. From here in every direction stretched great roads north and south and east and west. And so I will die in this place that has been the center of Mahasudassana's kingdom."

Why is this in the story? Reflect for a moment.

What could this mean?

I love this because what it says is that any place and every place can be the center of justice, can be the same kingdom of righteousness. Every place is the still point of the turning world, the place where Dharma can be awakened. It may have been a muddy crossroad, a primitive and undeveloped area with simple huts. But the Buddha said, if you could see as I do, every place is sacred. And this is a holy place that in its time has been magnificent, but every place in its time is magnificent—even now, if you only have eyes to see.

And finally, one last visitor comes, and Ananda says, "No, no, no, the Blessed One is sick." But the Buddha lifts his head and says, "No, he may ask the last question. Let him in. The teachings of the Blessed One are open-handed to all."

The last visitor asked his question, and the Buddha points him to the noble path of wise understanding, wise thought, wise action, not harming, right livelihood, right speech, right action, and the development of mindfulness, compassion, wisdom. And then he looks to everyone around and says, "I have shown you the way. Does anyone have doubts?" And everyone is silent.

"I've taught you the way that leads to liberation, the way of virtue, of living with integrity and causing no harm to yourself and to other beings. I've taught you the way to quiet the mind and open the heart. I've taught you the great wisdom that releases you from the separate sense of self and opens you to timeless liberation—to what is called the sure heart's release."

As people listened quietly, he went on: "Then be of good resolve. All of you are nobly born. Remember who you really are—your own true nature." And he said, "If you practice wisely and rightly, the earth will never be free of enlightened beings." A beautiful teaching: if you practice wisely, this earth will never be free of awakened beings.

And finally he said, "Remember, all things that are created are impermanent. All that arises passes away. You must be a lamp unto yourself." Or as Mary Oliver says in her poem of the Buddha's last days: make of yourself a light, become the illumined one, become the awakened one yourself, and see with the eyes of freedom and wisdom.

In this passage from another poem of the Buddha:

I consider the position of kings and rulers as that of dust motes in a sunbeam. I see the treasures of gold and gems as broken tiles. I look upon the finest silken robes as tattered rags. I see the myriad worlds of the universe as small seeds, the great Indian ocean as drops of mud that soil one's feet. I perceive the teachings of the world to be the illusions of magicians—all the worldly teachings are but illusions. I look upon the judgment of right and wrong as the serpentine dance of dragons, and the rise and fall of beliefs but traces left by the four seasons. I rest in the timeless and awakened heart that has seen them all. I rest in peace.

And with that, the Buddha—there is a whole description of him entering the deep states of samadhi and inner well-being beyond the sick body that he was in—was released from this life.

Make of yourself a light. All things change. All things are impermanent. This is the truth. This is the reality. And you have within you this capacity to awaken, this gift, your own true nature. Trust it, practice with it, awaken in it, live in it—the great heart of compassion, the freedom that is who you really are.

And this is the end of the story. Once upon a time, as it began—this great myth—and then it ends with these words: that's how it was in the old days, and how it still is with us now.

I kind of feel like I do when I'm putting my grandson Desmond to sleep. He's three and a half years old, and I've told him a long fairy tale. And he says, "Baba, tell me some more." And I tell a little more of the fairy tale. And then he's smiling and he starts to get ready to go to sleep.

This is a beautiful story that's been told for 2,600 years. And part of what makes these myths and stories so important is that they speak to a part of our own heart and understanding—that reminds us of something outside of the events of politics and confusion and all the things that are happening in the world, which we need to care for and tend to, just as this text started: to treat each other well, to listen and come together in harmony, to listen with respect and care for the vulnerable. We need to do all those things.

But then the Buddha says, here's a deeper invitation for you. Here's the mystery, because remember, it's not just the Buddha who's going to die, my dear friends. As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi?" Me too. All of us.

So then in the end, what really matters? Yes, you tend, you love, you care. And you look deeply and see that you are the awakened one, that you are consciousness itself, you are loving awareness. And from this place of freedom and wellbeing and peace and compassion, you tend the world beautifully.

Oh, and by the way, Mara will visit you regularly. So as Thich Nhat Hanh said, you might as well invite him in for tea and say, "Oh, is that you, Mara, again?" "Oh my God, you see me! You know who I am." "Here's a little tea," says Thich Nhat Hanh. But he also says, let Mara have tea. Respect him. Say thank you for doing your job. But don't let him stay too long.

What part of this story caught your attention most? What place in the story do you feel like, "Oh yes, this reminded me, this was important, this touched me"? Because it is alive in you. And you can sense and know that.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 68

Seeing Anew

Jack Kornfield · 56 min

> In this New Year reflection, Jack Kornfield invites us to cultivate beginner's mind—the capacity to see ourselves, others, and the world with fresh eyes. Drawing on Suzuki Roshi's teaching that the goal of meditation is to maintain beginner's mind, Kornfield explores how we can step out of habitual patterns of thought and the contracted sense of self to experience genuine renewal.
> Through memorable stories—including the monastery transformed by treating each person as if they might be the Messiah, and a young girl with leukemia teaching her mother about choosing happy days—Kornfield illuminates the practical dimensions of inner freedom. He discusses the Buddha's encounter with Māra on the night of awakening, showing how we can recognize and befriend our own visitations of shame, fear, and doubt by becoming loving awareness that witnesses experience without being overwhelmed by it.
> The talk weaves together essential practices for renewal: forgiveness as a path beyond resentment and guilt, the art of letting go that Ajahn Chah taught, and the courage to love anyway despite life's inevitable difficulties. Kornfield emphasizes that meditation reveals we are not our changing thoughts and emotions, but rather the timeless awareness witnessing them. This shift in identity—from being caught in experience to resting as the one who knows—opens access to profound trust, compassion, and the freedom to bring blessings wherever we go.

Let yourself settle and sit in a way that is comfortable to listen. You don't have to remember any of this. There's no quiz at the end. Rather, listen in a way that if something reminds you of a truth or what's important to your own heart, let that resonate in you—and the rest of it you can just let pass by.

First, again, Happy New Year to you. I'd like to talk tonight about renewal, about seeing with a renewed heart, seeing things in a fresh way.

I got a call some years ago from the editor of one of the women's magazines that you see on newsstands. I think it was Cosmo, but I'm not sure. She asked if I could write a little piece on New Year's resolutions, in particular on lasting change—how to make change last. I said, "Wait a second, you've called a Buddhist. We believe in change, not the lasting part. I'm sorry, you've dialed the wrong number."

When Zen Master Suzuki Roshi first came to San Francisco and began to teach, he famously talked about beginner's mind. Those of us who were interested in Buddhism back in those days—I think Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind came out maybe in 1969 or 1970—we were captivated by this teaching. I remember talking to my colleague and dear friend Sharon Salzberg. She was already practicing and meditating, training in a very wonderful way in India. Someone gave her the book Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind, and she looked at it and said, "Oh, this is for beginners," and sort of tossed it aside. She didn't realize until sometime later when she read it that beautiful statement where Suzuki Roshi says the goal of meditation, the end point, the culmination, the fruition of practice, is to keep a beginner's mind.

So we begin with beginner's mind, and then if we're lucky, we deepen it or return to it in some wonderful way. Or as Marcel Proust says in Remembrance of Things Past, the real voyage of discovery is seeing where you are with new eyes.

That's the possibility for us: to step out of the habitual patterns of thought and perception, to step out of what's called the small sense of self—the body of fear, it's sometimes called—and to begin to see things in a fresh and new way.

There's a story about an old monastery, a Christian monastery that had fallen on hard times. It was one of those orders that used to have monasteries all over, but gradually it began to die out as people became more modern and less interested in the contemplative life. This was the father house, the main place. The other ones had closed. All that was left were five or six old monks, and they were afraid that with their passing, their whole contemplative order would die out.

They were sitting around one day with the abbot, talking about what they could do. The abbot said, "You know, in the other part of the woods from where we are, there's a wise man, an old rabbi who lives there. Maybe I'll go over and ask for his advice."

So the abbot walked through the woods and paid his respects to the rabbi, whom he'd known for many years. They sat down and talked about how tough it was in the spiritual industry these days—how the world had become so much more materialistic, especially for contemplatives. Then the abbot asked, "Do you have any advice for us, to help us?"

The rabbi just wept. Some tears rolled down his cheeks. He said, "There's really nothing I can tell you, but I had this funny dream that the Messiah is there in your monastery. I don't know what it means, but I wish you well." And he sent him back.

So the abbot came back and they said, "What did the wise rabbi say?"

He said, "Well, we wept together. He had nothing really of value to say, except he had this funny dream that the Messiah was somehow in our monastery."

And they all began to ponder: What could this mean? They thought, could it mean the abbot? He's been their leader, and perhaps that's who it is. But on the other hand, it might have meant Brother Thomas, who was certainly a holy man, a man of light. It couldn't have meant Brother Elred—he gets crotchety at times. But come to think of it, even though he's a thorn in people's sides, when you look back, he's virtually always right. Maybe it's him. Maybe the rabbi meant he's the Messiah.

But surely not Brother Philip. He's so passive, a nobody. Of course, mysteriously, he does have a gift for somehow magically appearing by your side just when you need him. Maybe he's the Messiah.

Of course, the rabbi couldn't have meant me.

He couldn't possibly mean me. I'm just an ordinary person. Yet suppose he did. Suppose... suppose I am. Could I? Whatever.

And so they began to contemplate in this manner, and the old monks began to treat each other with extraordinary respect on the off chance that one of them might be the Messiah. And on the off-off chance that each monk himself might be the Messiah, they began to treat themselves with extraordinary respect.

Now, the forest in which this monastery was situated was quite beautiful, and people occasionally came to visit and picnic on its little lawn and wander the paths. And as they did so in the year that followed, without being aware of it, they sensed this new aura of extraordinary respect that began to surround the five old monks and radiate out across the place. There was something strangely attractive about the way they were treating one another, something compelling. Hardly knowing why, people came back to play and picnic and show this place to others, to bring their friends. And then it happened that some of the younger men began to talk to the older monks, and after a while one asked if he could join, and then another. In a few years, the monastery had once again become a thriving order, thanks to the gift of the rabbi.

So what does it mean to see the people that you live with, or the trees surrounding your home or your apartment, or the community that you live in, afresh and anew? And what does it mean to see those that you live with and treat them with this kind of dignity and respect? And to treat yourself as well with that kind of dignity and respect?

One of the beautiful things in both the Buddhist teachings and in all these neuroscience studies that have been done in the last decades is that it turns out to be possible to step out of the blinders of our ordinary perception and see in a fresh way, to see anew. To step out of the fear and anxiety and prejudice and all of the things that blind us, and instead to see with eyes of understanding and with a beginner's mind.

There is a kind of shift of identity that begins to happen as you sit in meditation. Instead of being the thoughts and the worries and the plans and the tingles and itches and pain in your body and the various emotions of sad and happy and so forth, you become the witnessing of it. You become the loving awareness that says, "Oh yes, here are these thoughts, and here are these views and opinions, and here are the ways that I experience this body and mind." And when you look, you start to see that who you are isn't so rigid or fixed, that you can actually look anew at your very own mind and your very own life. And to live in a wise way, you really have to do that.

I've got a few passages from this new book that I'm just finishing on inner freedom.

Sarah, a single mom with two kids, found out that her eight-year-old daughter Alicia had a serious form of leukemia. She was terrified, anxious, grieving. For the first year, they went through long rounds of chemotherapy, hospital stays, doctors. A fearful sadness filled the house, and anxiety colored Sarah's days. And then one afternoon, out on a walk, Alicia said, "I don't know how long I'm going to live, but I want them to be happy days."

It was a splash of cold water on her mother's face. Sarah had to step out of the fearful melodrama and meet her daughter's freedom with her own, to return to a trusting spirit. Sarah grabbed her daughter and did a little waltz, holding her tight, and she felt herself let go. And in time, Alicia healed. She's now twenty-two, just graduated college. But even if she hadn't, what kind of days would you have her choose? You can't do that much with your life if you're miserable, after all. You might as well be happy.

So it's possible to renew and to start again. And as we sit, we begin to learn this in a kind of visceral and immediate way. We learn, for example, the ability to forgive—to see the resentments and the sufferings and the betrayals. Anybody in this room been betrayed? Don't bother to raise your hand. It's like human incarnation. We've been betrayed and we've been hurt by others. And not only that—anybody in this room hurt anybody else, ever? Never mind, don't raise your hand.

And instead of living in shame and guilt, and instead of living in anger and hatred and resentment, you begin to realize that that's not the way you want to tend your heart. It's not what you want to hold on to. And you begin to let things go and start anew. There are all these beautiful practices of forgiveness that we teach here, and you're welcome to listen to the various online teachings or read books on those practices. You do them over and over, and gradually they change you.

So you start again with forgiveness. Everybody needs to learn it. We all have things to forgive and to ask forgiveness for.

And then you have to learn how to let go. My teacher Ajahn Chah said if you let go a little, you'll be a little happy. If you let go a lot, you'll be a lot happy. If you let go completely, things will be easy for you. And I don't think he meant in letting go that you didn't have courage or dignity or care about things. But he meant the letting go of your views about how the world should be. Because it's just not that way. Sorry.

If in the last few years you haven't discarded a major opinion or acquired a new one, please check your pulse. You may have died. We are needing to renew ourselves.

And both with forgiveness and letting go, what you also learn in meditation is how to be present with your particular measure of suffering. Anybody not have a measure of suffering? Again, you can raise your hands and you can have your eight dollars back. We have this kind of irrational belief that pain can be avoided, that suffering can be avoided. Praise and blame, gain and loss.

One of the things that happens as we learn to meditate, and there grows this deepening sense of inner freedom, is that you grow in your capacity to bear witness to the suffering of life as well as to its beauty. When Martin Luther King said we will match your physical force with soul force, he spoke about a spirit in human beings that can see and allow ourselves to be touched by the sufferings of life and not drown in it, not have it take us over, because our spirit becomes strong in our capacity of compassion and presence.

So letting go doesn't mean that you don't have difficulties. In fact, I think in some way you actually become more aware of them as your spiritual practice deepens. And they teach you in a different way because you don't turn your gaze from the world. You see its tainted glory, its unbearable beauty, and its ocean of tears. And you become someone who's engaged and connected with the world because you have this capacity.

I remember when I was eight or nine years old. We were living in Buffalo, New York, and it was midwinter, so the snow was forty feet high or whatever it is. Buffalo gets a lot of snow. It was a blizzard with icy cold wind, and we all bundled up—my twin brother and I and my other brothers—to go out and play. I was skinny as a rail and shivering out there. And my twin brother looked at me and said, "It's not that cold." Wind chill was probably fifteen below or something. He said, "It's not that cold." He took off his hat and started laughing. He took off his scarf and started laughing. He said, "It's not that cold." Then he took off his jacket and started laughing. He took off his sweater. He took off his shirt, and there he is half naked, just dancing around saying, "You just think it's cold."

It was a great moment. I've remembered it my whole life. I told him about it years later—he didn't even remember it. But it touched me in some really important way. He's somebody who has a very free spirit, and I learned something in that moment from him: that you can be present for the way things are and your spirit can be free. Or to put it another way, even in the midst of the sufferings of life, you can love anyway. You can forgive, you can let go of how it's supposed to be, and you sit and you practice and you love anyway.

So another story, and this is of Alvaro, whose father died. He had six siblings, and they fought. Some of them lied, greedy to get control of the family construction company. In two years, they nearly robbed Alvaro of his inheritance. But they were his family.

Parents of his beloved nieces and nephews, he'd been with them at every family gathering—weddings, holidays. Family was his life. And he realized he had to learn to live through broken trust, to find some deeper trust. After a year, he realized he could only trust them to be themselves. But he didn't want them to colonize his heart. He told his lawyer to use every legal means to protect his inheritance, but he would not give up loving them. By seeing them clearly, he regained a trust in himself, and through sometimes legally painful battles, he learned he could care for himself and trust in a new and wiser way.

There's something in sitting about learning how to trust yourself—your experience, and more than that, your capacity to be present for this human life that you've been given.

What helps? Here we are, living in a time in which we're fed the images and difficulties of the world—the continuing warfare, the racism, the environmental destruction. And yet, and yet, that's not the whole game. Because the world is also marvelous and beautiful and renewing itself. And people—there are a thousand acts of goodness probably for every act of cruelty. But they don't get measured, and they certainly don't get reported in the news.

So one of the things that helps is to set your intentions. Last month when we sat together in December, we did New Year's vows, Bodhisattva vows. Those of you who were here, we took time to reflect on what vows or intention we would want to use to set the direction of our heart. And I read some traditional vows. In Zen you sit and recite: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all." It's a very formal kind of vow-taking. And as I mentioned, sentient beings often don't want to be saved by you—but that's a whole other thing, especially the ones in your family. But it has a much deeper meaning. The meaning is that you vow to bring your goodness and your wisdom and your dignity and your blessings and your creativity to this world. That you vow to meet each experience or each person with compassion. And then it doesn't matter how many beings there are—all of them get met in that way.

People made their vows, and sometimes they were very simple ones. "My vow is to be kind to myself and others." Or, "My vow is to carry peace in a world where they're trying to get me to be afraid." Or, "My vow is to see beauty in every being that I meet, every person I encounter, every place I go." Those are pretty cool vows.

What was interesting in the years I lived in the Buddhist monastery is that we had to renew our vows every two weeks. We didn't wait for the calendar year to come around and say, "Oh yeah, made those New Year's resolutions, got about midway through January, and that was it." After two weeks you would meet and recite your vows again, acknowledge that you had broken them or hadn't fulfilled them so well, and then take them anew with someone as witness. It was a really beautiful ritual. It was the renewing that said we can start again. It is never too late to begin again.

So forgiveness, letting go, loving anyway—and with the vow, we start to set an intention to see the world in a different way. It's as if we carry an image: I could live with peace in my heart no matter where I go, or I could live with kindness toward myself and whomever I meet, or see beauty wherever I am.

As most of you know, in the fourteenth and fifteenth century, the master poet Dante wrote this amazing work called The Divine Comedy. The entire Divine Comedy was inspired by Beatrice, by a single moment of love. It began when Dante was in Florence, standing near the Ponte Vecchio, this amazing medieval bridge that crosses the Arno River. It was just before 1300, and Dante saw this young woman, Beatrice, standing on the bridge. He was a young man, she a little younger, and she touched his heart. She ignited in him a vision that contained all of eternity. He didn't speak to her, and he saw her very little; then he spoke to her a bit, and then she died in the plague. Dante was stricken with loss, and she'd become somehow the carrier of some spirit, the bridge from his heart to something eternal. His whole work of the Divine Comedy was inspired by that moment of seeing her on the bridge.

Now, 650 years later, during World War II, the American army was moving up the Italian peninsula and the German army was retreating. The Germans were blowing up everything, including the bridges across the various rivers, to stop the Americans' progress. But no one wanted to blow up Ponte Vecchio because Beatrice had stood on it, and Dante had written about her. So the leaders of the German army made radio contact with the Americans, and in plain language they said they would leave Ponte Vecchio intact if the Americans would promise not to use it for their troops. And the promise held. The bridge was not blown up, and not one American soldier or piece of equipment crossed it. The bridge was spared in a modern, ruthless war because Beatrice had stood on it and Dante had fallen in love.

There's some way in each of us—you can remember the day you fell in love, on a spring day with the crocuses and the plum blossoms, or on an autumn day with that crisp smell of burning leaves, and you met your Beatrice or your Brent, whoever he or she was. And if you never fell in love because of the sufferings of your life, as Rumi says, today is a good day to start.

But there's something about remembering that your heart has been that open and that touched. And again, it inspires, it becomes part of the vow or the vision. I vow to live in this way in this world, to move through the world in this way. And it gives you a bigger picture of things.

Another story from this new book. This is about a woman. I started to collect these stories because I asked people about freedom, and I received all these letters and accounts.

Whitney went back to St. Louis because her mom was scheduled for hip surgery and her father was in the early stages of Alzheimer's. She wanted her parents to stay at home, but with each stage of their disability, it got harder and harder. Her brother, who lived nearby, was not involved at all. He wanted his sisters to help take care of it. You know how that happens in families.

So she took a leave from work. The house was in shambles, her father couldn't care for himself well, and her mom's fracture obviously was going to take a long time to heal. She knew they couldn't stay there. So she walked up the hillside she'd known growing up, and she wept. She didn't want to lose her childhood home. She wanted her parents to have their wish of staying there till the end. And she didn't want to lose her parents.

When she reached the top of the hill and opened her eyes, she sat as she had in meditation. And then she looked and saw the vast Midwestern fields stretched to the horizon, the sky filled with cumulus clouds, and the many small houses clustered at the edge of the town. Instinctively, she felt less alone. She could sense how everything had its seasons—arriving and departing, flourishing and struggling, coming into being, fading away. How many people, she wondered, are in the same predicament even this day in America, in Canada, in Europe, across the world?

As she breathed with more ease, her mind opened further. I'm not the only one with aging parents. And as the space opened, her heart settled. She felt more trust. And she realized: we can do this.

So meditation isn't really about having a goal of a particular state, although calm comes, well-being can come, joy and light can come at times. Sometimes it doesn't. Sometimes it's restless or lonely or anxious—all the kinds of emotions that we might struggle with arise. And that's all good. It's not that you're supposed to have a particular experience.

But what happens as you sit is that things begin to settle, and you realize that you're actually not in control. Who's in control of their mind here? Tell it not to think. All right, no more thought. I want you to stop thinking. Does it listen? It has a mind of its own. Or how about your emotions? I only want to have happy, positive emotions. Does your heart listen to that? Come on.

And you start to see that who you are is a river—a river of thoughts and perceptions and feelings, some of them healthier, some of them more destructive or unhealthy. But they're all changing, unstable, insecure. You sit and you also notice that no matter what you do, you can't have all pleasure and no pain. You can't have all gain and no loss. You can't have all praise and no blame. The world is woven with these opposites. Praise and blame come. Pleasure and pain. Gain and loss come. And you start to realize it is the way that it is.

And then there comes the realization that all the feelings and thoughts is not exactly who you are. I talk about this often because I like the image. When you look in the mirror, you notice you've aged. Face it. Wrinkles, drooping, turning gray, no fur left at all. All the kind of stuff. As Wes Nisker, my dear colleague and friend, says, the hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard. But the weird thing is that you don't feel older.

There you are looking in the mirror. You know that experience? And that's because it's only your body that's aged. Your body exists in time as an infant and a young child and a teenager and a young person, and it grows up middle-aged and older and so forth. But the one who knows, the witness of it, is awareness itself, is consciousness. And that doesn't exist in time.

And so as you sit, you begin to rest not in the manipulation of experience—although you can use your breath to quiet things—but you become more and more the witness of experience. You become what my teacher Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows." You become loving awareness that says, "Oh, here's a happy thought, and there's a frightened thought, and here's this emotion that's delicious, and here's one that's deliciously awful." And you begin to sense all these things not as something you have to react to, but with a greater sense of spaciousness—like Whitney found on the hillside. There's a greater sense of presence and an ability to know that life is renewing itself in every breath, in every moment, and who you are is the witness to this game and this dance.

And so you can choose and guide yourself through it in skillful ways, but you don't get so lost and reactive and caught in it, because you say, "Ah, it's always going to renew itself in some new form." There grows a very deep trust—a trust not in the experience itself, but in the capacity of your heart to bear witness to it all with love and presence.

And when you meet somebody who's wise, that's kind of how they are. They say, "Yeah, this is how it is, the human incarnation. How's it going in there?" And you go, "Yeah, that's right. It's got its measure of sorrows and its measure of beauty."

A friend of mine who had practiced yoga and then done some kundalini yoga when she was in her late teens—eighteen, nineteen, twenty, twenty-one—very avidly, got pregnant pretty young. She went into the hospital to have her first child, and she ended up being left alone part of the time, just the way it was back in those days—the late fifties or sixties, probably. Yoga was just becoming fashionable.

She was in long labor, and there was a lot of pain, as there often is in labor. She was somewhat frightened and didn't know what to do. She tried to do her yoga practice, did more breathing and so forth, which helped a little bit, but mostly it was just overwhelming. And then she said, all of a sudden something else happened. She said, "I felt this force like the kundalini or something just take over my body. And my body began to move with the contractions. And all of a sudden it wasn't my body."

She said this wild thing happened. "I became all the mothers of the world. I was there all by myself, and I realized it wasn't me, this person, giving birth to someone else. I became the world giving birth to itself, and I was all the women who'd ever had children, all the beings who'd birthed new beings out of their body." She said, "I realized that it wasn't personal to me at all, that I was part of some enormous life force that moved and lived through me."

And then she said, "I gave birth to this beautiful son, and then the kundalini kind of filled my body, and I was filled with light and I was trembling." And the doctor said, "What's the matter with you?" And they gave her a bunch of valium to kind of get rid of it. Because that's what they did in those days. Sorry about your kundalini, lady.

But the truth is that we know this. We know that there is a bigger game than your checkbook or your to-do list or the things that you have to manage. And you have to pay attention to them and take care with them with some impeccability and dignity. But that's not really what life is about. Yes, you have to serve and work in different ways. But you're also invited to have a free spirit.

And that's really the invitation of the Buddha. He said that all of these teachings are to offer what he called the sure heart's release—this capacity to be free in your being and in your spirit with praise and blame and gain and loss and pleasure and pain, all the things that make up human incarnation. To say, "Yes, this is so, and here we are. Isn't this amazing and beautiful?" And then you bring blessings where you are.

I had a friend who just came back from doing the three-month retreat that we have held annually for the last forty years at our center on the East Coast, Insight Meditation Society—just like we have an annual two-month retreat here for the last fifteen or sixteen years or more. People will come. For those of you who've never done a daylong or a week, it may sound crazy—and it is a little bit—but...

People will come, a whole group of them this winter. They'll be starting in a few weeks. There will be close to a hundred people who come in silence for two months to sit and meditate and be present.

One practitioner wrote about his experience. He said, "In the beginning I sat, and for the first few weeks there was a lot of pain. All the stored tension I carried in my body and the conflicts of the year—they all played out. And I just sat with them." Then eventually they released, and his mind became clear, like Ajahn Chah's description of a clear forest pool. And many rare and wonderful animals came and went, but he was still. He was the vast stillness of the pool.

He said that after a time, while resting in this state of presence, a deep compassion arose, as if Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion, came—not as a person, but as a kind of inner strength, like an enormous cosmic tree. And he realized that compassion doesn't alleviate or take away pain. Rather, it gives us the strength to endure it. Kuan Yin is an energy provided out of compassion to help us make the long, difficult, painful journey of return to our own true nature. And the bodhisattvas and beings who serve the world are Kuan Yin's foot soldiers—beings who are little towers of strength and lend their care to others who are suffering.

He stayed in compassion as a practice for some two weeks, and then somehow it died away and he touched the place of stillness that the Buddha speaks of—profound calm and contentment and wisdom, a kind of peace in the midst of all things. He saw all the difficulties and trials and tribulations and afflictions of his own life and others, not as mistakes, but as opportunities for the heart to learn how to be truly free. That was really what his life was about. And he began to rest and trust more and more the stream of pure awareness outside of time, no beginning and no end.

Now, you listen to that and say, "Okay, well, that's nice. He had a good retreat." But I have to go to work tomorrow, and I've never done a day, or maybe I did a week, but it lasted for a while. I had that nice Vipassana facelift afterward—I felt just glorious for about three weeks, and then I got a call from my ex-husband and it all went away, or whatever.

But it's not really about retreat. It's about reminding us of something we know that's so true—that no matter what happens to you, no matter the circumstances of your life, you can return to this place of knowing, to become the one who knows. And we need it in these times, because things conspire in the culture around us to make us forget who we really are—to become consumers, or to become politicized, or to lose connection with our own deepest values.

This is from the poet Robert Frost. It was written a while ago, but it seems rather au courant. He says, "There's absolutely no reason for being rushed along with the rush." Isn't that a great line? There's absolutely no reason for being rushed along with the rush. Everyone should be free to go very slow. What you're hanging around in the world for is for something mysterious to occur for you.

He's inviting intuition, mystery, not to go along with the rush even though the rush is there. "Everyone should be free to go very slow." What a line. Of course, he was a poet—he'd sit around and write poetry lines. But when you come to meditation, or when you sit at home and you start to quiet the mind and soften the heart, this gives you the ability, the practice, to begin to see things in a new way.

And you need a practice, for most of us anyway, because the speed and intensity of our own thoughts and the world—driving and traveling and tending and being online nineteen hours a day and all the rest of it—can take you over. So a practice of just being with your breath, or a practice of the body scan, of moving your attention through your body and relaxing each part as you do. Or the practices we did of becoming the loving awareness and naming what arises: "There is worry. There is planning mind. There is doubt. Oh, and there's creativity. And there's a little bit of sadness or regret—thank you for noticing me. There's judgment—thank you for your opinion."

You start to notice the experiences, and as you do, you can also notice your reactions to them—your judgments, your fears, all of that. And more and more you become able to become the loving awareness itself, the witnessing of it that says, "Yes, this is part of being human. This is part of being human."

Going back to the story of the Buddha's awakening: on the night of his enlightenment, as most everybody knows from this famous story, the Buddha was sitting under the Bodhi tree and was attacked by Mara. Mara is the name for the Indian god who represents greed, hatred, ignorance, death, and delusion. Each time that Mara came to the Buddha on the night of his enlightenment, the Buddha remained unmoved and simply said, "I see you, Mara." At which point Mara threw up his hands at being recognized, skulked away, and then came in a new form—sometimes as temptation, sometimes as aggression, sometimes as doubt or worry.

In some later accounts, the Buddha even invited his old friend Mara to come back for tea once they'd kind of gotten through their relationship difficulties.

Mara appeared to Emily in the form of shame and confusion. Whenever money was tight or work was difficult, whenever she gained a couple of pounds or her ex-boyfriend called, Mara would attack her. It was a familiar pattern. From childhood, Emily held a sense that something was wrong with her. I'm not charming enough, not good-looking, not smart or creative or fast enough. The list went on and on.

Gradually, through her practice of mindfulness and loving awareness, Emily gained a more spacious perspective and was able to see Mara clearly. To do this, she first learned to feel her ever-changing breath, to witness her body's aches and pains with some equanimity and kindness. Then she learned to sit and be curious about the different states that visited her mind and heart. She learned to name them as the Buddha had: Oh Mara, oh despair, oh shame. Is that you again? I see you. What an amazing thing to be able to say. And then she learned to compassionately decline their grasp. Even if you want to have tea, I can't let you stay too long because I have another engagement. Sorry.

You begin to get a sense from that very simple account of your own freedom of heart—that you can be the witness to your fears or confusions, or in her case the shame or anxiety, and say, "Oh, yes, is that you again, Mara? Thank you for your opinion, your dance. Here's a little tea. Now I've got better things to do. Thank you." You don't want to struggle against it, because that's Mara itself. Instead, you become bigger. You become the loving awareness. And you become part of the whole.

Because as you get quiet, as the mind quiets and the heart softens, you start to feel that you're not separate from the world anymore. Your family and your community, the environment that we know so well, the air we breathe, the water that we drink—it's all a part of our body, a part of us. It turns out the earth is your body. This is just a little piece of your body that you tend to claim as your own. And Mother Teresa said, "The trouble with you is you draw your family circle too small." This whole world is your family. In most traditional cultures, they know that. They use all those honorifics of uncle and auntie and grandmother—it would be Uncle Barack and Auntie Hillary, Grandfather Bernie. And I don't know what you would say about Donald. We all have one in our family. We just say that. But they're respected as part of our extended human family. It's the way that it works.

Now, the way that politics is going, they want to sell you on terror and anxiety. That's how politics has pretty much always worked—make people afraid and then they'll support the dictator or the politician or whoever is going to keep them safe. But of course, life is more mysterious and uncertain than that. When you become comfortable with change and uncertainty, when you become comfortable taking your seat in the middle of your human incarnation just as you are—with the joys and sorrows, with your blessings and capacities, with your struggles—and you become the witness of it, you become the loving awareness, then whole different capacities open in you. You feel fulfilled. You're not always looking to be loved or admired, because you admire yourself and you love yourself. You value yourself and you value others.

I remember reading Krishnamurti years ago. He had all these highfalutin things about the nature of consciousness and mind. It was kind of cool, but sometimes a little hard to understand. He was sometimes a bit of a scold—"You should understand, but you don't." Come on, Krishnamurti, give me a break. But the passage that really stuck out for me, when he talked about awakening, he said: if you're going along the road and there's a big stone in the road, even if you can avoid it, you move it over to the side. Because it's not your road—it's our road.

I took that to heart. I read that when I was maybe nineteen. In fact, even when I'm driving, if there's something dangerous in the road, I pull over if I possibly can and get it out of the road—partly in honor of what I read, but also partly as a symbol of what I'm learning, which is to care for us, to care for our family.

And so you get quiet, and then what else is there to do? Some of these people are hungry—you feed them. There's injustice—you do what you can to alleviate it.

I remember last month I was talking about all the migrants and refugees, which we may well be seeing more of, and the fears that people are trying to put into your mind about immigrants and refugees. I asked how many people would be willing to consider, if you could, taking a Syrian refugee—a child or a woman—into your own home. And half the hands went up. Thank you, everybody whose hands went up, those of you who are here tonight. Because that's what happens. You get quiet, and there comes to you a sense of belonging that's different than the desire and the struggle. There comes in the sitting a sense of connection with your own inner dignity and well-being, and with that sense of vastness of time, stepping out of time. And then you tend the world. And you don't do it just because you're supposed to, or it's a good bodhisattva thing to do, or you feel worried.

I've told this story quite a few times in the last couple of years. Wes Nisker, colleague and friend who teaches here, went to interview Gary Snyder—the great poet, Pulitzer Prize–winning environmentalist, author of Earth House Hold, a truly great icon of the American environmental movement, who's now eighty-four. Wes said, "Gary, you now see the environmental destruction, the loss of species, the problems with the rising ocean, climate change. What advice do you have for us at this time?" And Gary looked back and said, "Don't feel guilty. If you're going to save it, don't save it out of guilt or anger. Those are the things that actually made the problem. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it."

And love is really the only force that's big enough to counter the forces of greed and hatred and ignorance in the world. It's the force that allows mothers to lift cars off their children. It's that great capacity of the heart.

Friends of mine were recently in Dharamsala this past fall, and there was a special gathering—they helped to arrange it—with Archbishop Tutu from South Africa and the Dalai Lama. They were spending a week together doing a dialogue to create a book on joy. If you've ever seen Tutu, he laughs a lot. He has this kind of giggle, and he's totally wonderful. And of course, I think people go to see the Dalai Lama mostly to hear him laugh. Yes, those nice Tibetan teachings and so forth, but really—the laughter. Annie Lamott, our local wonderful writer and humorist, says laughter is carbonated holiness.

And the people who were there in Dharamsala said these two were like kids. They set each other off and they giggled and laughed through a good part of that whole week of teachings on happiness.

This is the invitation: that you become the steward of your own heart in a wise way, that you train and practice what it means to stay present. So that when Mara visits—and Mara is kind of amazing, he gets around, ancient India no problem, modern San Francisco, wherever you live, here he is—when Mara comes, you can say, "Oh, I see you, Mara," and not get lost in the fear and the confusion and the suffering.

This is not to say that there doesn't need to be tenderness and healing for us, that we have traumas that need care, that there are pains that really need to be tended to. But that's not the end of the story. The First Noble Truth of the Buddha's teaching is that life has suffering in it, so you can't make it perfect, without pain or suffering. But that's the beginning of the story. The Second Noble Truth is that there's a cause to it, and the Third Noble Truth is that there's an end to it. And the end to it is really the freedom of spirit and freedom of heart—your own joy. Carbonated holiness.

And you have this in you. You have seeds of beauty. You have undeniable dignity, dignity that you were born with, that cannot be taken from you. You have a fundamental goodness that was born in you, and an innocence that can't be taken, that's inviolable in the human spirit.

And so we meditate not to become good meditators or to have experiences, although those come and they're wonderful, but really to learn this deeper trust, this capacity to be present with a loving heart and with wisdom.

So let's do a little meditation together, just for a few minutes, a little reflection. As you sit quietly, I'll ask you a few simple questions: What in your life wants to, or needs to, be held in compassion? What in your life wants forgiveness? What in your life is it time to let go of?

What in your life asks for your courage? And what in your life brings beauty and joy?

It's beautiful just to stop and reflect. Because when you listen, the heart actually will answer. And it's never too late. The heart is always waiting for you to ask and listen. Never too late to start again.

I'd like us to end with a very simple chant before we go out into the delicious rainy evening.

I do want to thank the volunteers. We have a really beautiful crew of volunteers, some of whom have been doing this for years and years with a lot of care and love. Some are newer. I'm very, very grateful to you all.

So here is the chant we'll do. In India, when you meet someone, the most common greeting is to put your hands together and say namaste, which means "I honor the divine within you. I see who you really are." Not the cloak of your body and garments and roles and all of that, but the spirit behind those eyes. I see who you really are.

The root of that word namaste in Sanskrit is the word namo, which means to pay respects or bow to. And so I'd like us to chant namo nine times. As you do, you can feel in yourself what it is that needs to be bowed to with respect. It might be beautiful things. It might be Mara coming, and you saying, "Oh yeah, I see you." It might be something in the world that you want to offer your loving respect to. We'll chant it nine times and then go out into the damp evening, the blessed rain.

Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo. Namo.

And may you carry the stillness of the temple and the remembrance of the heart—anything that was of value and touched you tonight. Carry this and bring it back to bring blessings wherever you go.

Thank you so much for coming. Good night.

CHAPTER 69

Monday Night Class Dharma Talk - Nobility and Love

Jack Kornfield · 1h08

> In this President's Day talk, Jack Kornfield reflects on the noble leadership exemplified by Washington and Lincoln, connecting their integrity and vision to the Buddha's teachings on wise leadership. Drawing from the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, he explores how qualities like generosity, uprightness, patience, and inclusiveness can be trained through meditation practice, transforming ideals into lived experience.
> The talk seamlessly transitions into Valentine's Day themes, examining the many dimensions of love—from erotic to agape—through the lens of Buddhist practice. Kornfield shares Thich Nhat Hanh's personal love story and his own experience of falling in love at 70, illustrating how loving awareness deepens with practice and maturity. He discusses how mindfulness cultivates radical intimacy, citing Zen Master Dōgen's teaching that enlightenment is becoming intimate with the world.
> Through the Buddha's teachings on the brahmavihāras and a poignant African folktale about a sky maiden, Kornfield illuminates how true love requires respect rather than possession, and how emptiness is pregnant with possibility. The teaching concludes with a guided mettā meditation, inviting practitioners to remember their innate nobility and extend loving-kindness to all beings. As Stephen Levine asked: if you had only one phone call to make, who would you call and what would you say—and why are you waiting?

So please let yourself come back in and get settled.

It's a pleasure to be back. I'm now teaching Monday nights once a month after sabbatical. I was partly turning seventy and thinking, I want time to do other things as well, but it's still always a treat to come back here. This last month has been about putting finishing touches on a new book, which of course takes about a year for the publishers to get out, but for me it was very good to deliver it and have it finished. There have been weddings, funerals, and things in between. That's how it is in this human incarnation, isn't it?

For those of you who haven't come before, the teachings are not so much something you are called on to remember—no quiz at the end or anything like that. More importantly, they're a reminder at best of something that you already know and already carry in your own heart. When it touches you in that way and reminds you, beautiful. And if it doesn't seem helpful, then let it go.

In the same way, you could feel in the sitting we just did, especially those of you who are newer to mindfulness practice, that the focus isn't on having a particular experience or being able to concentrate on your breath or achieving some particular goal. The focus is actually to become present, to quiet yourself a little bit, to open your heart, and to listen to what's happening in your own body and your own mind and all of the stories and relationships and things that make up your life. They reveal themselves in that loving awareness.

Today is President's Day. Back in the hoary times when I was young, we had Washington's birthday and Lincoln's birthday as separate holidays. Now, for efficiency, they've combined them somehow. But it was actually much more charming to have them separate because you got to reflect on those particular presidents and leaders.

One of the stories I most love about George Washington is that after his time in the presidency, there were many people who wanted him to become king. I don't know if you know that history, but there was a lot of pressure. Basically, it was part of everybody's psyche at the time—democracy was quite new and unfamiliar. The thinking was: we got freedom from the King of England, now we need a new king. You're a magnificent guy, you've been president, why don't you just finish it and become king? One of George Washington's greatest acts as president was refusing to become king and instead saying, no, this is a new experiment here in this particular form—a lot of it actually came from the Iroquois Nation, the Iroquois Confederacy. He retired to Mount Vernon and said, elect the next president. So thank you, George Washington.

And then Lincoln's birthday. When I go to Washington, D.C. periodically, I try to visit the memorials there. They move me deeply—to go to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and touch that long black wall and the names on it. And to go into the Lincoln Memorial, which always brings me to tears.

There, above that huge statue of Lincoln seated, it says: "In this temple, as in the hearts of the people for whom he saved the Union, the memory of Abraham Lincoln is enshrined forever." It's built as a mirror of a Greek temple. You feel that you're entering a sacred place, a holy place. On one side, engraved, is the Gettysburg Address that you all had to learn—at least in my generation—by heart. On the other side is text inscribed in marble from portions of his second inaugural address, which he gave not many months before he was assassinated, when the Civil War was still raging.

It has these words: "Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away." I think about Syria and Lebanon and Libya and Yemen and the various places where there's war. Fondly do we hope and fervently do we pray that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away.

"Yet if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled up by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn by the sword, as was said 3,000 years ago, so still it must be said: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

And then finally, the words end in this closing of reconciliation: "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Really extraordinary words and extraordinary leadership.

I think about the national conversation that's happening now—Black Lives Matter, racism, diversity—and then go back to this, 150 years ago, saying: if we suffer, if the war continues until every drop of blood drawn with the lash is paid by another drawn by the sword, so we will do it. What an amazing thing to say. There's a sense of justice in his words and a kind of integrity in the midst of unbearable suffering. That is real leadership.

When we celebrate President's Day—as it is now, with President's Day sales in the stores—there really is a reason for it if we let ourselves go back to this part of who we are as a people on this particular part of the earth.

It resonates like the teachings of the Buddha, because of course the dilemma of racism and the suffering that Lincoln spoke of is not over. The Buddha said that the Dharma, the teachings of awakening and compassion, welcome all who are interested in awakening. The Dharma gates are open for you. Whatever your race, whatever your sexual orientation, whatever your ability, whatever you look like, whatever your birth—as the Buddha says, not by birth, nor caste, nor race, nor creed, none of those things makes a human being noble, but solely the nobility of heart. For those who wish to join this path of awakening and nobility, please come and be part of this. Let us change the way human beings live. Let's change the world.

So many Buddhist texts begin with the words "O nobly born," which is a reminder of who you really are. There's a beautiful poem by William Stafford with a line that says maybe if you were exchanged in the cradle and no one told you what your parentage is, you sit quietly and wonder—maybe you're a queen, maybe you're a king.

This quality of nobility that Lincoln carried, and Washington did in refusing to be the king, is really the quality of wise leadership. I'm talking about it because it's President's Day, but also because you're all leaders. You might be a leader in your family or in your community or with your friends, but we all have at times the role of leadership. It's part of what's given to us in the human incarnation. And what's possible in leadership is the ability to bring what we train in meditation practice—loving awareness, compassion, the balance of mindfulness, generosity of spirit—to those around you.

Last spring when I went to the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering and was able to give the summary talk to White House staff and folks from the State Department, I noted that the Buddha in his time was actually quite conversant with and spent time with the leadership around him. There are all these texts and stories of his teachings to ministers and kings and princes, wealthy courtesans, movers and shakers of his time.

One of the most beautiful texts is the Mahaparinibbana Sutta, where the Buddha says: if a nation or society comes together in harmony, listens to one another in harmony and departs in harmony; if they treat all members of society with respect; if they protect those who are vulnerable—children, women, those who are older, those who are sick; if they tend the teachings of their ancestors and elders that carry wisdom; and if they tend the natural environment around them—then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. All these teachings on wise leadership.

There's a whole text in which the Buddha speaks about the nobility of our human capacity to lead those around us in a wise way. And because he was a list maker—he liked to make lists, so there are a zillion Buddhist lists: the Eightfold Path, the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, the twelve nidanas, the fifty-two mental factors, the Four Noble Truths, the five spiritual faculties, the three characteristics—he talks about leadership in times of change. Anybody notice what times we're living in?

It was the great chemist Lavoisier who said: nothing is lost, nothing is created, everything is transformed. This is the essence of chemical equations—you take things and they get combined, moved, changed around. Everything is transformed. This is the reality of our human incarnation: everything is being transformed, including our own thoughts and feelings, body and mind, the culture and the global environment we live in.

So how do we navigate in this change? Wise leadership, in this particular list, the Buddha says, starts with generosity—a generous heart. A generous leader, imagine that. Then it includes uprightness, which is an older, more Victorian word for integrity. Wise leadership, your work as a leader wherever you are, asks for generosity and integrity. It also asks for non-harming—that part of integrity is to not cause harm to yourself or others. Steadiness. Sacrifice—isn't that interesting? There's something noble about being able to put your own needs and desires in a greater context, to say what really matters is that I offer this to the whole. Flexibility—the Buddha says being flexible and not rigid. Patience. Inclusiveness—the wise leader doesn't lead alone but gathers others around them, like Lincoln did. You know that beautiful book, Team of Rivals, in which Lincoln took the people who were his political adversaries and put them all into his cabinet. He said, "I need you to help me figure out what to do in this Civil War time, and we can't be fighting one another." An inclusive kind of leadership. And then the vision and trust that goes with that vision.

The beautiful thing—which I said at the White House as well—is not that these are good ideals or good ideas. They are. So what? The Greeks had them, the African kings had them, the Maya had them. Whoever it is around the world, we can find them. The important thing is that they can be trained, that they can be awakened in us, which is really why we do these remarkable practices of compassion and mindfulness and equanimity.

Each one of these qualities actually leads to a practice. Generosity can be a practice. One of my practices with generosity, which I've done for twenty-five, thirty years, is that if I have a generous thought to give something or to serve or to do something for someone, I do it. Because you have that nice thought—"Oh yeah, I should do this," or "Wouldn't that be great to give that"—and then immediately comes all those little people that live inside that say, "Oh, you know, that's going to be a lot of trouble," or "You might need that," or "That's too much," or "You've got other things to do." Do you know those voices? Do you have them? Yes, you do. I know you do. I know you. Because we're human.

But the practice—it's a really beautiful one—is when that generous impulse arises, I just say, okay, I'll do it. There might be a few exceptions, and I don't judge myself, but mostly for the last thirty years when that impulse has come, I've done it, and I never regret it. The beautiful thing is not just that this nobility and dignity is some ideal thing, but that it's something you can practice and deepen and learn.

Now it turns out, since we're not only talking about President's Day but Valentine's Day, that love too can be practiced and awakened. The modern neuroscience research on social and emotional learning for young children, empathy training, the work done at Yale and the CASEL Consortium—all kinds of studies show that kids three, four, five, six years old have naturally generous impulses as well as naturally violent impulses. "Don't hit her with a block. Use your words," right? Except that we really want to tell that to Bashar al-Assad and Putin. The kindergartners get it. Can't we get those older people to figure this out?

It turns out there is a natural empathy in kids. The Yale studies show that infants who are pre-verbal, less than a year old—by watching their eyes tracking and their responses—they get upset if there's a crying child, if something is missing or taken away. If someone drops something, they want to help that person pick it up. There is an innate connection between us as human beings. I mean, there you were in somebody's belly, after all. Let's get real about this. Isn't that weird? You lived in somebody's belly. "Oh, I'm independent." Yeah, right. Give me a break. You lived in someone else's body. It's really wild.

So these things—empathy, love, compassion—can also be trained and awakened. They're not ideals. They are really the wedding of something magnificent, like Lincoln's words, to something that's really personal and intimate.

Thich Nhat Hanh wrote this beautiful book on love. You read his books, and he's managed somehow to take, in some cases, very complicated and rather profound Dharma teachings and simplify them so that you can't deny them. They're just so beautiful.

So I get this new Thich Nhat Hanh book. I want to read it partly because I love his teaching, partly because I want to steal stories or whatever I can from it—a little professional grab there. I'm reading, and it's going to be about love and compassion and sympathetic joy and so forth, the Brahma Viharas, the Buddhist teachings on the awakened heart. It's fine, it's beautiful. And then I turn the page to chapter two, and it begins: "She was just nineteen years old when I saw her first walk down the stairs in that temple in Chu Lai"—in Vietnam.

This book of teachings on love, it turns out, were teachings that Thich Nhat Hanh gave to his community in Plum Village some years ago. I can picture everybody sitting there hearing Thich Nhat Hanh speak about the Brahma Viharas and the awakened heart and the Buddha's teachings on love. And then he pauses and says, "She was just nineteen when I saw her walk down the stairs." All of a sudden—it was in France too—everybody sits up. "Ooh, now this is something I really want to hear."

The book has a love story in every other chapter. Not love that was consummated, because he was a monk and she was a nun, and in this case they behaved. Not always true, but in their case they were. But it talks about his own personal love for this young woman—he was young too—and what that meant to him. There's something so beautiful because it weds what we really long for: that wedding of the personal, to really love another or others, and at the same time to have that love open us to something greater.

And again, I'm somehow, even as I say these words, still back with those words of Abraham Lincoln. I can't help it, because they're so compelling. And there's some way in his leadership that it was really a leadership of love. There was a nobility and a dignity to it. He was somehow tuned into a kind of love that in the midst of the fire of the Civil War still carried some deeper capacity for human beings to live in a different way.

And so here's Thich Nhat Hanh writing about it, and you can't help but want to turn the page. The scent of love—Rumi talks about love dogs, their tails start wagging as soon as a little love is in the room.

And I'm so happy because at age seventy, in these last years since I was divorced, I am in a relationship with Trudy Goodman, who's a colleague and teacher I've known for years and years. And I got to fall in love again in my late sixties. And it's been totally wonderful.

We realized that at seventy—we're five weeks apart in age, so we had our seventieth birthday—and we said, we don't know how much time we have. Of course, nobody does, actually. But as you get into your seventies, it becomes, how do you say, more real and apparent. And so, you know, let's really do it. Let's live it up. And it's beautiful to see that at this age, I've actually learned some things about love. There's a great affection and so much more accepting and appreciating of one another.

And it's not that there can't be some moments of—you know, those moments of a little irritation or something. For example, she likes me to drive, which I'm happy to do. I like driving. I was a cab driver in Boston for a few years when I was in graduate school. I have bad driving habits, but I can get through the traffic, whatever. And if I drive, she's supposed to navigate. She's not a very good navigator. It's just, you know. And then she tries to use Siri, but her Siri app, because she speaks fluent French, is in French. It's a Frenchman's voice, a very charming voice. "Go in this direction, go there." I can't even understand what the poor guy is saying, but she finds it charming, right? So we're kind of lost periodically. And I could get annoyed. In fact, I do.

And then I look over and I say, what is the hurry? You're in this car with this beautiful woman that you love. I mean, what better thing to do than be together and have a good time?

And so there's something about having lived through these years of learning to be in relationship, that the love is so much bigger than the stuff that happens. We don't actually have very much stuff between us, Trudy and I. But there's something so sweet. Even the stuff becomes interesting in that way. It's like, oh yeah, look at that. That's very human, and there we are.

Loving awareness, which is what you train when you sit with your own pains and pleasures of your body, or with the emotions of sadness or grief or trauma or loss or longing or love and joy and bliss—loving awareness is a kind of radical intimacy. The Zen master Dogen said, to be enlightened is to become intimate with the world. And you become so close to your experience that you can somehow see into the heart of things, your own or the heart of another being. And what you start to see is that you're not separate, that as Thich Nhat Hanh would say, we inter-are.

I was just part of a wedding ceremony that was led by a Hawaiian kahuna, a Hawaiian native healer and wise man. And part of the wedding ceremony, he had the bride and the groom put their noses just next to each other and breathe together, breathe in and out. Prana, it is in Sanskrit, but I don't remember the Hawaiian word he used—but it was just to let us know that we are really breathing together on this earth, and that we link our breath in this way to remind us that we are really united and connected. It was a really beautiful moment, having them put their noses next to each other and breathe for a while.

And of course, all the modern interpersonal neurobiology, all the science and so forth, and the mirror neurons and all that.

Yeah, the scientists have found out that we're connected. Thank you. Of course we are. We're wildly connected.

When I was in India, you know, more than thirty years ago, traveling, the person I was traveling with had this terrible dream about somebody dying in her family. And I said, no, no, no, that's just part of meditation. You go through birth and death and all the things in you show themselves. That's natural.

I was wrong. Turned out, ten days later, she got a telegram. Her brother had died. And when we looked at the day, it was the same day that she had that vision. And he died in the way that she'd seen.

You've all heard those stories. How many people have had some experience like that? You look around—many, many. Do you know why you know these things? Because we really are connected. And we lose those channels some, because our consciousness becomes much more tuned to the everyday, if you will. But it is a reality. We are connected in consciousness.

Just as we're connected in breath—you who are breathing here, breathing the air of her and him. Oh no, all the cooties and germs and whatever. Too late, baby. We're in it together. We are inter-breathing and we're inter-living. And we also inter-live with the plants and, of course, with the earth around us that needs a little more attention in this way.

So if mindfulness and loving awareness is really a practice of intimacy, it means to be present for yourself or another without trying to fix what's there, but to listen deeply, as Thich Nhat Hanh says. To connect, to feel that connection, to keep your heart open with that other person or yourself or those people, and then from that place to respond.

Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche, who's the son of Chogyam Trungpa, taught here one Monday night, and I've gotten to know him a little bit. He wrote a book. He's a great horseman—that's sort of his passion in this life. He writes a story about taking his horse, Rocky, way up in the high mountains in Colorado on a trail at like eleven thousand feet. Rocky's a trail horse, one that's used to galloping and so forth through the woods and kind of more in the lowlands, so he's not really used to mountain trails. But he took his horse, Rocky, with a couple of other people.

They were going on this very narrow trail with a steep drop-off. It was steep above and then a thousand feet of scree down below, and this narrow trail. He said, we were just about to go on the narrow part of the trail, and I got afraid. This Tibetan Lama got afraid. Thank you. That's just human, right? Let's not glorify all this.

And then he said, I thought, well, if the horse stumbles—because Rocky was a little nervous about it—maybe I should sit a little bit over on this side of the saddle so that if he falls, I can sort of bail and save myself. So we were about to go there, and I shifted myself in the saddle. And then Rocky turned his head and looked at me like saying, "Dude, I thought we were in this together."

And he said, oh, I got it. And I shifted back in the center of the saddle. I said, all right, we can do this. And Rocky took it a little slow and I was there with him and we made it.

So there's something about loving awareness and mindfulness that we're training that is both an intimacy with our experience or with others—not fixing, but seeing the way things are. And then, with an open heart, when you see it clearly, as he did, you can respond. Say, oh yeah, let me shift back to the center of the saddle. Let's do this together.

It allows us to tune to ourselves and tune to another in a wise way.

Now, there's all this science research on mindfulness that everybody knows about—it's become the big thing. There was yoga and now there's mindfulness. And now there's starting to be a lot of research on compassion, which I'm very happy about. I'm actually glad they're researching compassion rather than metta and loving-kindness, because love is such a confusing word in our culture. Everybody kind of gets compassion. You have to be at least somewhat caring, responding to others' concerns, or having compassion for yourself. But love is really rather complex in our minds.

I mean, it's such a big thing. It's the birds and the bees and the glorious awakening of spring that we're about to live through, that we are living through here. It's the prime mover. Maybe love is like gravity—we're pulled to one another because we remember our time in the womb when we were in another person's body, or we remember being back in the Big Bang when we were all living together in that singularity. Then we sort of turned into starlight and congealed, and who knew the earth turned into you.

It's so mysterious. Your spirit and starlight somehow congealed on this particular planet. The green leaves that you see all around you do a magic thing of turning light into sugar. I mean, what an amazing thing. Let's turn light into sugar so that everybody can eat. Is that ever cool? So that's you. You live on sunlight, basically, through the plants and animals, or whatever your diet is.

Anyway, there are all these different kinds of love. I love chocolate. I love the Warriors—I hope they win all these games. So there's that kind of love. There's businessman's love: I'll love you if you give me this, and you can love me and I'll give you that back. That's a fine kind of love. There's familial love for people in your family, when it works. There's brotherly and sisterly love. Philadelphia is the city of brotherly love, of compadres, of caring for one another.

There is—how shall I call it?—infatuation love. Oh baby, I need you, I need you. A million songs on the radio. Teenage love, if you will, which is magnificent. It's really an amazing thing. There's platonic love. There's erotic love.

And erotic love is really an interesting thing, because in many Buddhist texts—which were descriptions of the Buddha teaching monks and nuns—there is a very strong teaching about the dangers or the problems with sexuality and sensuality for renunciates. Sexual desire and the body are seen as something to get over, something not right. But it turns out there are these other texts and teachings, not as many of them but some, in which the Buddha says that for householders—you, me, lay people—this is one of the pleasures of household life. And if there were not pleasure of this sort, people would not choose to be householders.

He goes on to say that happiness exists in household life. What is that happiness? It's a satisfaction gained through the senses: beautiful sights and sounds and tastes and smells and touches and connections with one another. These experiences are attractive, desirable, pleasant, appealing, and worthy experiences. Experiences through the senses are the advantage of household life, so you get to enjoy them. The happiness one derives from these benefits is indeed a happiness that one can learn to enjoy.

So there are these rather mixed messages you get in Buddhist teachings. One great meditation master we brought from Burma, Mahasi Sayadaw—somebody asked him about sex. And he said, "Gross, base, and disgusting." That was his response. We were in our twenties and thirties then, and we thought, okay, that's what he has to say. And then at the end of this long retreat, he came and he left.

It was one of our three-month silent retreats. Afterward, we had Dharma Follies, which was a time for people who'd been silent for three months to express other parts of themselves—to sing and dance and whatever else they wished. I remember a comic routine that Anita Sanders did. She got up and robed herself like she was Mahasi Sayadaw, and she said, "And now I would like to speak about something that is engrossing, basic, and worth discussing"—which was her mirror of "gross, base, and disgusting." No, she insisted, it's engrossing, basic, and worth discussing.

But part of Eros—the thing about Eros as one of the Greek gods, or in India where there are all these fantastic erotic deities and stories—is that it brings us closer to the gods. When we make love, there's pleasure and ecstasy, there's surrender from yourself. There's the petit mort, a dying in some way, an orgasm, and then you have an experience beyond yourself, a union. All of those things, plus the mystery of getting back to where you came from. It's physical and basic in some way, but also so mysterious that it's woven into us. We have these bodies that are built around Eros, among other things. And so there are all these different kinds of love.

And then there's agape. There is metta in its deepest sense, which is love for no reason, which is just love. I've seen it in the teachers and people I admire—both the nobility and the love in Aung San Suu Kyi after seventeen years of prison, carrying so much love for her people. Or Maha Ghosananda, my friend and teacher who was the Gandhi of Cambodia, leading love walks back for people who'd lost everything and doing loving-kindness as a practice through the killing fields to reclaim their land and their hearts.

I've spent a lot of time in these last years with Ram Dass. He has this big altar in his house in Hawaii because he doesn't travel anymore. He's been in a wheelchair for sixteen years now, and he's eighty-four. On the altar are the different Hindu gods—Krishna and Ram and Sita and Ganesh. And then, of course, there's Mother Mary, a beautiful picture of Jesus, Solomon, a page from the Koran on the mercy of Allah. There are pictures of saints like Neem Karoli Baba and Anandamayi Ma, Indian saints, and Mother Teresa. It's this magnificent, huge altar full of all these great beings.

And then on this altar he always has a few political pictures. He had Dick Cheney for a while, John Boehner. I'm sure he's going to put Scalia on there. And he says, "If I'm to love, why should I make boundaries about my love? And why would I not want Dick Cheney, of all people, to remember love? Why wouldn't I want him to remember that? So he's part of my love practice."

Ram Dass will sit there and say, "I love everything. I love Dick Cheney and Boehner and Anandamayi Ma and Mother Mary and Kuan Yin and that chair over there and you and you and the wallpaper and even the tree outside." He did that for a while. A filmmaker friend of ours was there and said, "Really, you love this dirty carpet?" He said, "Oh, I do. I love everything." Some weeks later, that friend sent him, in a beautiful gold frame, a little square of dirty carpet and said, "I put this on your altar next to all those holy people." Ram Dass said, "Certainly I will."

There's something in these times of such political rancor and estrangement about being able to rest in the noble heart, in the heart of love anyway. It doesn't mean you don't act politically or do what you think is best—but you do it from that place of love.

When Richard Nixon was invited back to the White House during the Carter administration, there was a gathering where they brought the ex-presidents together. This was the first time Nixon had returned after he'd been deposed—the only president, I think, who was essentially kicked out of office for misconduct in U.S. history. Imagine the level of humiliation and shame that must have been, no matter what he did. He came in, and there were some of the other ex-presidents, and he stood alone by himself. Then Jimmy Carter went over to him, shook his hand, kind of pulled him in, and said, "Mr. President, welcome home."

It was apparently a turning point in Nixon's life—feeling like he wasn't a complete failure, that some healing was possible. And of course, Jimmy Carter is someone who has used his ex-presidency as a Nobel laureate now in the most magnificent ways.

This is really what's possible. The invitation of the Dharma is to remember that this is in you as well. And you can practice it—loving-kindness, mindfulness.

My dear friend and colleague Sharon Salzberg was practicing in Burma, doing her metta: "May I be safe, may I be well, may I be happy"—all the phrases of loving-kindness. She said it felt very dry and mechanical, but she kept doing it because the teacher said it would work sometime. She's physically kind of awkward, she said. One afternoon she was doing her metta practice and picked up a tray with a plate and a glass. She dropped it and they all smashed on the floor. She heard her voice inside say, "You're such a klutz." And then: "I love you." She said, "Oh, it's working."

What you practice, what seeds you plant, transforms your heart. And then you can use it to move from estrangement or violence or difficulties to begin to build bridges of love—while you stay in your own dignity, your own nobility.

I like that St. Valentine's Day has this very complicated history, but in the simplest way, here's the saint part that represents the spiritual, and then the erotic part, which is actually very human. And those two are wedded together.

I guess I'll tell you this story. Let's see if I have time.

And for months they were happy together. But one day, while the new wife was out, his curiosity became so intense that he crept over to the box and opened it. To his surprise, it had nothing inside.

When she got home, she looked at his face and she knew. She said, "You opened the box, didn't you?"

"Yes," said the young man, "but it was empty. So what's so secret about an empty box?"

The sky woman was devastated, and a tear trickled down her cheeks. She said, "I'm sorry, but I can't live with you any longer."

"Why? What's so terrible about peeking into an empty box?"

"I'm not leaving you because you opened the box," said the young woman. "We all do that at times, right? I'm leaving because you said it was empty. It wasn't empty. It was full of sky—full of the light and air and smells of my parents' home. When I went back to the sky village where I lived that last time, I filled the box with everything that was precious to me. And how can I be your wife when what is most precious to me is emptiness to you?"

Some of these stories don't work out quite the way you'd like them to, the happily-ever-after part. But there's something really profound here. I could take a whole evening just to unpack the images of that story.

Part of it is that our love really requires that we respect one another—that true love is not possessive love. "I'm going to have what you have, or look into what you have." There has to be a respect for what we agree to, for who we are with one another. So that's a piece of it. Love is not possessive.

If it's possessive, then it's possessiveness, but it's different than love. And you'll notice your children don't like to be clung to, don't like you deciding how they should be. Your partners don't like it. Love is very different than that kind of attachment.

The Buddha says, "This land is mine, these children are mine"—these are the words of folly of a man who doesn't realize that even he isn't his. You don't even control your own thoughts very well, do you? What are you going to possess? So love isn't about possession, but it is about making the space of love that can acknowledge and respect with a kind of caring connection.

And then it's mysterious. The emptiness of that box—because emptiness is so central to Buddhist teaching—speaks to how things are ephemeral, how they arise and pass away. Nothing can be possessed, including your own life, which eventually will end. That's the big mystery. In Zen, they use poetic images of the blackbird singing in the dead of night, or the white crane standing in the snow. Those are poems that speak about something ineffable, the pregnancy of emptiness. That box wasn't empty. It was full of possibility. It was full of sky and space and beauty, if we can see it. And Eros and presence and loving awareness has as much as anything a kind of wonder in it, mystery and intimacy. Instead of possession, it sees the secret beauty of every being, the nobility of every being, and holds their pain with mercy and tenderness.

Most of you who knew him know that Stephen Levine died some weeks ago. We'll do a big memorial here that people will be welcome to come to in May. His teaching was really about this kind of tenderness and mercy. He would say, "Simply touching a difficult memory with the slightest willingness to heal begins to soften the holding and tension around it. If there's a single definition of healing, it's to enter with mercy and awareness those pains, mental and physical, from which we have withdrawn in judgment or fear or dismay." His whole work was really inviting this kind of intimacy—both with what's painful and with what's beautiful—getting people to learn forgiveness, getting people to learn to love in a deeper way. And more than anything, since he wrote and worked so often with people at the end of their lives, he would say—not to those who were dying but to those around them—"If you were going to die soon and had only one phone call you could make, who would you call and what would you say? And why are you waiting?"

We are both timeless beings of spirit and tender, vulnerable humans. We have survival in us. Every one of you is courageous. Every one of you has nobility. Courage beyond measure you have, because you're still here. You've gone through so many things. And somehow when we sit in meditation, the invitation of nobility and dignity—like the leadership we started with—is to come back to this place of fertile emptiness, of spaciousness, of the pregnant silence that can tend our own bodies and hearts and minds, that can sense that we live in both the immediacy of our life and in eternity.

Then things start to take a different cast. You pick up the cobbled skin of an orange and smell it and think, how mysterious that there's this globe of sweet sugar water with an orange flavor shipped to you from some orchard in Southern California or Florida. Or you pick up the tender golden skin of an apricot that's so fuzzy and soft with its golden glow. What an amazing planet we live on that has things like this. Or the plum blossoms that have come out—they're so delicate, and the scent, and here they are. "Hi, for your enjoyment, we're going to put plum blossoms on your planet." It's amazing.

The question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity. As you train yourself in love, as you remember that you can carry dignity and integrity and generosity, that the nobility the Buddha invites you to remember—O nobly born—is there within you, you discover that wherever you are in life, no matter how terrible the circumstances on certain days or how beautiful, they're workable. Because your heart has in it more freedom and compassion than you could imagine. O nobly born, this is your true nature. And the invitation of the meditation and the practices and trainings is to come back to this, to feel it and strengthen it and know it.

So let's do a few minutes of metta, loving-kindness practice, as a way to end the evening.

The instructions from the Buddha for those who seek love: May you be able and upright, straightforward, of gentle speech, content and unburdened. May you do nothing mean or that the wise would reprove. And may you live with these intentions: May beings everywhere be happy. May they live in safety and joy.

As a mother watches over her child, willing to risk her own life to protect her only child, so with a boundless heart, cherish all living beings as your children. Suffuse the whole world with unobstructed loving-kindness.

So with your eyes closed, the beautiful instructions in metta are to look toward whatever most naturally awakens your heart. Think of someone that you love and care about, someone who is not too complicated or conflicted, where there is just an easy, natural outpouring of love. Remember them or picture them. It can be a person you care about. It could even be your dog—"Oh, you're home! How great!"

Picture this being who looks at you with the eyes of love. It's like what we said about Ram Dass, looking at everyone, loving everyone. And because that love is naturally there for you as you remember them, you can offer a kind of well-wishing: May you be filled with loving-kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well in body and mind, strong, healed. And may you be happy.

While it can feel mechanical at first, feel how these intentions can gradually soften the heart and open the channel of love. You picture this person. May you be filled with loving-kindness—how you care for them. May you be safe and protected. May you be well and strong, body and mind. And may you be happy, wishing their happiness.

Feeling the love that you have for them now, imagine that they could gaze back at you with the same care you offer them. They look at you with loving eyes and they say: May you too be filled with loving-kindness. May you too be safe and protected. May you too be well, healed, strong. They gaze at you so kindly: And may you too be happy.

We can be so loyal to our suffering. They say, "No, no—may you be happy." And you take it in. If you like, you can even put your hand on your heart. May I, as they wish for me, may I be filled with loving-kindness. May I be safe and protected. May I be well and healed. And may I be happy. Allow yourself to be happy. "Live in joy," says the Buddha, "in this world."

And finally, let the spirit of loving-kindness spread across this room in your imagination, touching all those you have been breathing together with for this last hour, wishing them loving-kindness and safety and well-being. Let it stretch from this room like a lighthouse beacon across the bay area and out across the continents and the oceans and the whole of the earth. Your noble heart, your heart of loving-kindness and care that you inhabit just now, offers your intentions, your wishes of well-being to beings everywhere, in all forms.

May beings everywhere be held in this great loving-kindness. May beings everywhere be safe and protected. May beings everywhere be well and healed. And may beings everywhere be free.

Know that you can practice and carry this spirit of loving-kindness like a lighthouse or a beacon. You can be the leader in your own family or community, with those you share life with—generosity and integrity and love. This is given to you. It is what is possible for you, O nobly born. Remember this. Carry it with you.

It's dark and crowded out there, so be kind with that. And those who can, please help put the chairs away.

So much appreciation.

CHAPTER 70

Attachment, Commitment and Love

Jack Kornfield · 53 min

> In this springtime reflection, Jack Kornfield illuminates one of Buddhism's most misunderstood teachings: non-attachment. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that suffering arises from clinging, he carefully distinguishes between unhealthy attachment—the grasping, controlling quality we feel viscerally in our bodies—and healthy dedication, commitment, and care. While Western psychology values secure attachment in relationships, the Buddhist understanding of non-attachment points to something different: being fully present without needing to control outcomes.
> Kornfield weaves together stories and teachings to illustrate how we can engage wholeheartedly with life while releasing our grip on results. He shares a powerful account of peacemaking work at the Israeli-Palestinian border, where a moment of genuine human connection transformed a rigid situation. He recounts Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche's trail ride with his horse Rocky, demonstrating that non-attachment doesn't mean withdrawing—it means showing up fully while trusting the process. The Buddha's teaching of the five rivers (sensation, feeling, perception, thought, and consciousness) reveals that liberation isn't about stopping these streams, but simply not identifying with them or taking them personally.
> The practical wisdom here is profound: we are invited to act beautifully without attachment to outcomes, to plant seeds of goodness knowing the fruit will come in its own time. Quoting Thomas Merton's advice to activists and Rilke's contemplation on attention, Kornfield shows how loving awareness allows us to tend the garden of life with care rather than control. This teaching offers a path through difficult times—whether personal grief or collective challenges—by helping us find the inner balance and spaciousness that the world most needs from us.

Let yourself sit and be comfortable. The teachings tonight are really a kind of contemplation or reflection for you to listen to. You don't have to remember anything. There's no quiz at the end, no grades. You can listen to see if it reminds you of something important, or in what way it might, and that's beautiful. And if some of it doesn't seem useful, just let it go. It's probably wrong. Who knows? My daughter thinks so. But you can listen as a meditation in that way.

I want to start by acknowledging that it's the Monday after Easter, and it's insanely wild spring out there from all that thankful March rain. Easter and Passover and all the various spring holidays with the eggs and the bunnies are really the ancient archetypal celebration of the renewal of life, of the fertility of life and the rebirth after a long winter. One of the questions is: how do you navigate death and rebirth? Because there's a way in which we're all dying and being reborn all the time.

I had the opportunity after a retreat recently to drive back into Woodacre—I now live in Fairfax—to the house which I had helped create and where I lived for thirty years. It was kind of wild looking at it. It's lovely; a young couple are there who are about to have kids, and it's the perfect place for that. We raised our daughter there. And I thought, wow, that was a life, wasn't it? And it's all gone. Actually, only a few people even remember what happened there and how it was created. And then that will be gone too. Things appear, we experience them, and they're gone. Like your childhood, for example. Or Tutankhamen, or the dinosaurs. Or Y2K, if you remember that. Or cassette tapes. Stuff happens and then it disappears. And what do we do with that?

It seems that although we thought ourselves permanent, says the Buddha, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not. So that's some medicine there, isn't it? But this is our human incarnation—it is designed this way. This is our human lot. So how do we deal with this?

In Colorado, there is a woman who made a kind of ritual work of art that I talk about sometimes called the Salt Monument. She made a temple for it, and in the middle is a giant glass or lucite crystal that turns every twenty-four hours. It's filled with seven and a half billion crystals of salt, one for each human being on the earth. As the priestess of the Salt Monument, every evening she goes in and takes a beautiful ritual container and from the bottom of it pours out two hundred thousand grains of salt for the two hundred thousand people that died that day. Think about that—this day on earth. She says some prayers over it and does a kind of ritual return to the earth. Then every morning she comes in and pours in another ritual container of two hundred fifty thousand grains of salt for the two hundred fifty thousand babies that will be born that day.

That's us. We're coming and going, baby. That's just how it works.

Our practice of mindfulness and loving awareness gives us the capacity to be with birth and death and change—the inevitability of it—from the place of a witnessing loving awareness, a place of balance or wisdom. Now, it ain't that easy. We live in a time of toxic politics where there's a lot of fear and racism and terrorism. You look and you think, oh my gosh, what is happening? Worldwide terrorism, what's happening to the climate, what's happening in our politics, what's going to happen? That's on one side.

And then on the other side, there's a million acts of goodness every single day—gestures of care, the blooming trees of spring, the unbearable beauty of the earth—along with the suffering and the greed and the idiocy.

We could have a small vision about it. There was a guy, I think he was a Texas oilman—not to say anything about Texas, but maybe a little bit about the brashness of it—who was wealthy, and he went to Picasso's studio to buy a Picasso, because he could. While being shown around, he said to Picasso, "Why don't you paint things more like they are?" Imagine saying that to Picasso. And Picasso said, "What do you mean, the way they are?" The man said, "Well, like here," and he pulled out his wallet and showed a photograph of his wife. Picasso held it up and said, "Hmm, she's rather flat and small, isn't she?"

There's a way in which we can have a very rigid view of things and how they're supposed to be. That small sense of self—that we think we know what's real and how things are supposed to be—is very limited. But there's something bigger going on than our ideas about it. As I say so often, the question is not the future of humanity but the presence of eternity.

So there is an invitation in the meditation practice. The Buddha's texts begin, "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas, of the awakened ones, remember who you are, remember your inherent dignity, your capacity for compassion. This is your birthright." Make room for this possibility.

Because here we are in this beautiful springtime, and there's something mysterious that's also true. There are some questions that can't be answered by Google: Who are we? How do we navigate this? What is this for?

There's a Zen story from third grade. Ruth remembers being a girl, daughter of a sharecropper in South Carolina, one of ten kids living in a little cabin. One day in spring, her third grade teacher said there would be a talent show. Little Ruth went home troubled, thinking, "What talent do I have?" She couldn't sleep that night and paced the porch before the field. Then the clouds parted and the moon, almost full, filled her face and turned the boards of the porch into blue and illuminated everything with its glorious moonlight. Her little mouth dropped open and she felt like there was something magic, and she was a part of it. When asked the next day, she said her talent was seeing the moon.

There's something that we're being asked to do: to see in a more timeless way, to live from that wisdom and that reality. And then as we open that space of seeing in a new way, with a kind of willingness and courage, we get what Zorba called the whole catastrophe. We get the magnificence of it and we get the ocean of tears. We get the beauty and we get the tragedy of it. This is human incarnation. Anybody not have that, by the way? Just checking.

So what do we do then? What we want is to wait for a kind of opening in it. Like that little girl on the porch, not knowing, and then she waited and—ah—now the moonlight comes in to show me something new. We allow ourselves to turn our attention and our hearts and our goodwill to this mystery of who am I. How do I navigate birth and death, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow? Am I always grasping at this and afraid of that? Or is there some more noble and wise way to move through all of this change?

But if you open, as Zorba says, to the catastrophe, not only is there the beauty of the moon in the spring, but you also open to the ocean of tears—your worries for the earth and what we're doing to it, your own personal grief and sadness for the losses you've had, the anger, the doubt about how to live in this world. Those too are vast. And it's not so easy.

Here's James Baldwin, such a magnificent writer and visionary. He says, "Love takes off the masks that we fear we cannot live without and know we cannot live within. I use the word love here, not in a merely personal sense, but as a state of being or a state of grace, not in the infantile American sense of being made happy by stuff or someone"—that's quite a phrase, isn't it? Thank you, James—"but in the tough and universal sense of quest and daring and courage and growth."

It's a different meaning of love than the love of gratification.

It's the love of willingness to show up for this life fully. And that takes awareness and attention and courage and love.

And periodically you will die. I mean, yes, you're going to die anyway—that's right, we know that. We've got the statistics, and the mortuary is waiting for you, I promise you. They've got it all figured out. But you're going to have other deaths as you go along.

And the person who is really being on the way, writes the Zen teacher Karlfried Dürckheim, who falls upon hard times in the world, will not as a consequence turn to those friends who offer refuge and comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening.

So spring comes, but it also comes after winter. And rebirth comes after death. That's the way it seems to work in this life. You have to let go of this to move into that. Or you have to go through the dark night to come to some other dimension of being. And it requires a deep trust.

Again, Pablo Neruda, that line I love, where he writes: "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." There's something so large that we are a part of—life, we are life—that no matter what we do as human beings, there's some bigger force, because we're a part of that, that's going to push the weeds and the grass through the cracks in the stone on the sidewalk. Tennessee Williams wrote, "The violets in the mountains have broken the rocks." There's something about life that will renew itself—with you in some way, or without you. It just does. And you begin to trust it.

And then you see, all right, here's the toxic politics. You may have noticed that. H.L. Mencken, the great political commentator from the 1920s, wrote: "The whole aim of politics is to frighten and menace the populace with an endless series of hobgoblins, almost all exaggerated and unreal, as a way to gain power." Thank you for your analysis. Be afraid, be really afraid, and I am going to make it all better for you. The world won't be dangerous again because I'll take care of it all.

So what to do with it? Yes, vote. Yes, act in some way. But also turn off the damn news for a while. Gandhi took a day a week—in the middle of bringing down the British Empire—in silence, just to walk outside and listen to his heart and try to hear something more eternal than the battle he was in.

This is from Veronica Patterson, a poet. She writes:

"Say over and over again the names of things, the clean nouns: weeping birch, tanager, damask rose. Read field guides, atlases, gravestones. At the store, bless each apple by kind: Macintosh, Winesap, Delicious, Jonathan. Enunciate the vegetables and herbs: okra, cilantro, calendula. After a speech compromising the environment, recite the tough, silky structure of spider webs—ladder web, mesh web, funnel. Chant the spiders: comb-footed, round-headed, garden cross, feather-legged, ogre-faced. Remember that most short verbs are ethical: hatch, grow, spin, trap, eat. Dig deep, pronounce clearly, pull the words in over your head, and hole up until it's time to hatch."

Something like that. Her advice is not to get too engaged in it. I'm not saying whether you should or not, because there is also a responsibility, and I'm not trying to say there isn't something that really needs our attention. But there's a way in which you can get wound up in that and forget the vastness of it, forget what really matters. And it is scary, because sometimes it's a train wreck, and there's a lot of collateral damage to thousands and millions of human lives. So it is something we have to pay attention to.

But we also have to listen in a new way for an opening—listen without so much being in the middle of it, without attachment to it—and say, "Well, wow, yes, I could read Machiavelli and Sun Tzu as well, because they're sort of describing what's happening strategically. This is interesting. This is how human beings are trying to solve problems, and some of it is really messed up, but it's not a new thing. We're actually part of this. This is how humanity does it." Step back a bit and say, "What can I do? What can make a difference?"

I received a story that was sent to me today. I'd spent some time in Israel and Palestine, visiting and giving some teachings, and also meeting with various peacemaking groups. One of the things that's most both heartbreaking and important about what I saw there is that what you get in the news is all the conflict—the suicide bombings, the shootings of Palestinian youth, all of those kind of things. That's what makes the news. But there are two hundred groups doing amazing cross-border peace connection work. The people who were replanting olive groves. I met with the Former Combatants for Peace, and the grieving, bereaved mothers from both sides, and the teenage Palestinian and Israeli groups that are coming together. There are hundreds of those as well, groups of goodwill that never make the news.

So this is a story of a group that was doing peacemaking work on both sides. It was a group of Israelis and Americans who went over to do some peacemaking work, first in Israel and then into Palestine. They were coming back and bringing a Palestinian man with them for another group meeting in Israel. They came up to the gate, and he had been lucky—somehow the computer missed that he was an activist in some way, so he got a permit to cross the border. They all went up in their little bus, and they had a special meeting coming up.

The soldier who was there, a young woman with a machine gun, said to the Palestinian, "Your permit—you have to go through that other gate. This is not for Palestinians. It's an hour away. You've got to get there, and maybe they'll let you through." She was very curt, just doing the soldier thing. "You're not allowed," and so forth.

The woman telling this story said, "I looked at this young woman in her uniform with her machine gun, and she was very stern. But every time she spoke, she also had her hair pulled back—this long black hair, tied up a little bit. And she'd flop her head, and her voice was saying no, no, no, but her hair was saying something different."

"I didn't judge her. I just saw she was in a difficult situation, and she was a human being. I just looked at her, this older woman, and I said, 'I know it's complicated. Is there any way you can find a way to help us? We have to join our friends in the South. We have to do it fast. This is a group, and this man is really part of it. We can't leave without him. Is there some way?'"

She paused for a minute and put her gun to the side. She moved toward a bunch of keys and said, "You see that gate? If he crosses it quickly and calmly, he can walk five minutes and take a taxi to this other place—five minutes, you can meet him, and it'll be all right."

"I saw the opening, and I honored her, and we responded. She got a little bit calmer. We talked a little bit about how hard it was. I asked her, 'How is it to be a soldier?' She said, 'It's terrible. I go home and I don't smile all week. And now I'm supposed to be happy when I go home to see my mother?'"

"I looked at this dark, slender young girl in front of me, young enough to be my daughter, and I became so curious. I wanted to ask her about her hair. What's the story? I was convinced that this hair had its own language, so I did."

"She said, 'It's a reminder that I am a woman. That I'm born into life to love. I tend to forget this in the uniform, and I've forgotten how to smile with so much suffering around. But then my hair slaps my face, it blows, and reminds me I'm a woman. No one can bury this fact under any kind of uniform. When I'm out of here, I will work for peace like you.'"

Now she was speaking the same language as her hair, and her hair was soft and calm.

So there's something in these troubled times in which you're asked not to take the conflict into yourself, but to step back and sense the play of life, and then look for your opening. Because it will be there—with another person, or in a political way, or just in the human-to-human way.

Kindness is the language which the deaf can hear and the blind can see. This is from Mark Twain.

You can feel the power in his very simple words.

So then the question is, all right, how do we do this? We wait for these moments, these openings. We keep a bigger perspective. And the way to do it is without attachment.

This is really important. Let me talk about attachment for a bit, because all those spiritual books you read say you shouldn't be attached. And you think, what the hell does that mean? Really? Does it mean you have to throw away your family and your clothes and your car and your music and become a monk or a nun, not attached to your bowl and your robes and whatever happens? There doesn't seem to be any monk or nun material out here—maybe a few—but it's got to mean something more than that. And there were tens of thousands of awakened disciples of the Buddha who weren't monks and nuns. So what does it mean?

Well, one thing about the word that's important is that it has very different meanings in Western psychology and in Eastern psychology. In Western psychology, attachment is healthy. You want secure attachment between a mother or primary caregiver and their child, their baby especially. If there's a kind of attention and care and attunement—good enough, good enough—then that child realizes they belong here. They internalize this sense of being seen and loved, and they feel like they're part of the human race. But if there's not that secure attachment, then you get different things called insecure attachment or avoidant attachment, where they can't really make healthy relationships because they're not even connected to themselves. There's all kinds of trauma in that. We all know that in Western psychology, all the healing necessary.

So for the West, a psychologist talks about the health of attachment. It gets confusing because when you talk about non-attachment in the East, does it mean a mother shouldn't be attached to her baby? Does it mean a partner shouldn't be attached to their lover? That you shouldn't care about things?

You need to start paying attention to what it means when I say how to do this, to do it without attachment. What could that mean? And the way you get to know about it is you feel it in your body. This is not some philosophical thing I'm talking about.

There you are in a little conflict with your kids, which could happen, or a little conflict with your parents, or a little conflict with someone you love. Families are the best petri dish for all this stuff, but there are also people you work with and things like that. And your kids don't like it when you try to control them. Control and attachment are a little bit close together, you'll probably notice. It's one thing to foster them, but when you try to control them, when you're attached to how they're supposed to be, how do they feel? They hate it and they let you know it, or else they get really pouty or go inward or neurotic, whatever they do with it. But it doesn't work very well. Neither does it work with your lovers, quite honestly. "I want you to be this way for me," and "You should..."—how does that fly? Or your colleagues, and so forth.

You actually can start to feel it in your body, the difference between love, when you love somebody, and attachment, when you need them to be a certain way. They feel very different. One is clinging and holding on, and you can feel it viscerally in your gut, in your muscles, in your nervous system. You know what I'm talking about. And so non-attachment doesn't mean not relating, but it means to be present without the grasping, without the controlling. It's not in your control anyway—we'll get to that.

My teacher Ajahn Chah used to wander around the monastery. He also had a good sense of humor, and he would kind of tootle up to people, especially if it looked like they were having a hard time, and he'd say, "Are you suffering?" If they said no, he'd say, "Great! Have a beautiful day, lovely spring day, nice to see you." And if they said yes, he'd just look and say, "Ah, must be attached." Then smile and tootle off again.

It was like that—directly related. You're suffering. Not your pain, because you'll have pain. Not your loss, that's part of joy and sorrow. All that stuff comes with being human, with incarnation.

But your suffering is directly related to how attached you are. That's worth a pause.

Then he would say, all right. He used to talk about letting go. He said, if you let go a little, you'll be a little happy. If you let go a lot, you'll be a lot happy. If you really let go, you'll be truly happy.

But there's something else to say about that, which is that sometimes we translate letting go as getting rid of. "Oh, I'm afraid. I want to let go of that fear and not have it come anymore." That's not letting go. That's aversion. "I don't want that." So sometimes the translation for letting go is better rendered as letting be—just letting it be the way it is without trying to control it. Sometimes you can let stuff go, but sometimes it's there and it's with you, and you say, okay, let it be. But you don't identify with it. You don't take it personally. You don't hold on to it.

Even this wonderful guru I spent time with in India, Nisargadatta—somebody asked him, "Here you are, you talk about mind vast like space and not being identified with the body and mind. You're this great saint, this sage. Do you ever get angry? Do you ever get upset?" He said, "Oh, sometimes, you know, if I'm really hungry and my food doesn't come on time and it's not there, I can get irritated, I can get annoyed." He said, "But it has nothing to do with me. It's just my body doing its thing." He said, "It's like it's there, but who I am is so much bigger than that. It just plays through." I didn't talk to his wife, so we don't know.

But then you say, all right, if I'm not attached, then what about marriage? What about relationship? What about family? What about social justice? What about care for the things in the world that matter if you're not attached? Isn't that sort of that Buddhist navel-gazing—everything is impermanent and I just let it come and go?

How do you operate then without attachment? There's a different frequency, a different capacity than control and attachment. And here are some words that describe it: dedication, commitment, direction, care. So instead of attachment in a love relationship—instead of "I need you to be a certain way" and controlling—it's "I'm dedicated to this. I tend and care, and I want you to flower as best you can. I want the best for you, as best I can, and for myself." It's not clinging but dedication. You're dedicated to your children. You're dedicated to the work that you do to change the world, or to bring something beautiful as an artist or a parent or in conscious business. It takes dedication, it takes commitment, and it takes direction. It can even take a kind of ambition—but a wise ambition. And what does that mean? It means that you're there, but you're not in that controlling place with it.

It also means that even though you're not attached, you show up. Because a lot of spiritual practice is really about whether you're avoiding relationship, whether you're avoiding actually being present for life with its pain and its beauty. And to become noble, dignified—all those lovely qualities that come from meditation where you practice this with all that comes up in your life—it requires somehow that you're willing to be present for it, not to turn your gaze away.

I told this story last month, the month before, but I've been telling it just because it's fun. The son of Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche, who's a lama teaching a lot in America, is also a great horseman. Their family is. He'd lived for a while in Boulder, Colorado, and his favorite horse, Rocky, was a horse he used for dressage and in the ring, and sometimes would just gallop out on the plains. But he decided to take Rocky on a trail ride with some other people, way up high—eleven thousand feet in the mountains. Rocky wasn't a trail horse.

Trail horses know how to turn around and back up, but Rocky hadn't done that. And they went along this trail that got very narrow, with a thousand-foot drop-off on one side, a big cliff on the other, and some scree. It was not an easy trail.

When they got to the hard part, they paused. Rinpoche, the young lama, looked down and thought, "Man, if Rocky slips even a little bit, I'm a goner." And then he thought, "Maybe I should just shift over a little to the upside, so if he slips I can sort of jump off the saddle and maybe I won't go down with him."

So he moved his weight a little bit to that side before going on the trail—and Rocky stopped at that second, turned his head around, and looked at him like, "Dude, I thought we were in this together."

And then the lama, the young lama, centered himself back on the saddle. "Okay, we're in it. We're in it together." He relaxed, and Rocky relaxed, and then step by step they went across that trail.

So to not be attached doesn't mean that you're not present. You're present—but in a different way. And the secret is to act well without attachment to the outcome. Because that part is not given to you. How your child is going to turn out, whether your business will succeed or not, your art project, the social justice thing that you do—whatever it happens to be.

I read probably every few talks this passage from Thomas Merton, writing to a young activist who was discouraged: "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all, if not perhaps bring about its opposite. As you understand this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results but on the value, the rightness, the truth of the work itself."

And in that way, what you're doing is beginning to trust that you face the right direction, you plant the seeds of something that really matters to you, and eventually somehow that will bear fruit. That's not up to you—when the plant grows. You water it and you tend it, but what's given to you in this human incarnation is to act beautifully. And then the world will receive that, and it will bear fruit in its own time.

There's a sense, as you do this in non-attachment, of the emptiness of it, if you will. Like going to my house of thirty years and realizing there are only a handful of people who have any memory of how it was built and what we did. And then that will be gone too. It's just like a whole life—that part of thirty years of life disappeared. Things are that way. They're empty because they exist for a time and then they're gone. So what you get to do is tend them and make beautiful things that add to the long term. Now it's a beautiful home for somebody else to raise their children in. But it's mysterious. It's not yours to possess. It just isn't.

It's a little bit like the serenity prayer: "Grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference." Somehow there's something very similar in this. And there's a kind of trust that you listen for that opening—like the swish of that Palestinian young woman's hair—and realize, "Okay, she's saying no, but her hair is indicating there's somebody else under that machine gun in that soldier's uniform." And you wait, and you see. And you feel it in your body. You can tell when you're possessed and clinging. The people around you know it very well. And you suffer.

Ajahn Chah would say, "Oh, must be attached!" And then you realize, "Oh, maybe I could let it go a little bit."

Now, I just had the pleasure of doing a retreat myself for part of this March month-long retreat.

I sat for almost three weeks. Part of the time it was very quiet—I got concentrated and dissolved my body into light, samadhi experiences and such. But part of the time my mind was really busy, much more than I would have liked.

Right before I went on my retreat, in the week and days before, I got a whole bunch of emails from places where I often teach saying, "We're making our 2017 calendar." Here we are talking about living in the moment, and I am scheduled into 2018. It's insane. But they need to know because they'll save a space or they won't, and you've got to respond right away—from Kripalu and Omega and Esalen and wherever it happens to be. Then I'm planning things in China, and they want to do something in India. So I've got all this material swirling around.

And I'm sitting there trying to be quiet, knowing all those things have to be answered. I'm also worried because a few days before I sat, one of my best friends fell and broke her hip and is in the hospital. And another person I was tending to, whose teenage daughter is really going through a hard time. My mind is just going: "You have to take care of this. You have to fit it all together. You have to do it right away when you get out, because otherwise 2017 will be a mess. And you've got to do it in a sane way. Not do too much." And so on.

I keep saying, "Later, later," but my mind doesn't listen. Then I go, "Okay, samadhi," and I enter this deep, quiet place. But the minute I stop concentrating, it all rushes back in. I find that unpleasant because I just want to be quiet.

But after a while of this, I thought, well, maybe what I have to do is write down all these things I'm worried about or thinking I have to tend to. In five minutes, I wrote down forty-five things. Who I have to call, this email, that arrangement with China, those people in India, this thing with the Dalai Lama if I'm lucky, this person in the hospital I need to tend to. If I'd taken ten minutes, I'm sure I could have written down forty-five more.

But I wrote them down, and then I looked at the list and thought: Thank you. Thank you to my mind. I said, "You're trying to take care of all this business. I'm having a retreat and you're trying to take care of all this stuff and take care of me." I just kind of bowed to it instead of judging it. I said, "Thank you for doing all that. My God, you're taking care of a lot of business." And it just relaxed me a little bit. There wasn't quite that little controlling thing happening anymore.

Where's that poem from Kabir? I love it. The Indian mystic. He says: "Friends, please tell me what I can do about this world that I hold on to and it keeps spinning me out. I gave up my sewn clothes and wore a robe, but I noticed one day how well woven was the cloth. So I bought some burlap, but I still throw it elegantly over my left shoulder. I pull back my sexual longings, and now I discover that I'm angry a lot. I gave up rage, and now I notice that I'm greedy all day. I worked hard at dissolving the greed, and now I'm proud of myself. When the mind wants to break its links with the world, it still holds on to something, doesn't it?"

And so it's just its nature.

The Buddha described our human incarnation, our human lot, as being a river. He actually said it's five rivers: a river of sense experience, a river of feelings—all these feelings. I have a list of five hundred feelings that I compiled in the days before Google. You can look it up. It starts with the A's: angry and antsy and ambivalent and affectionate and amorous and apoplectic. And it just goes on and on.

Then you go to the B's: bored, bonkers, brokenhearted, blissed out. So there's a river of feelings—you know that river. There's a river of sensations. There's a river of perceptions: this is a man, this is a woman, this is a room. There's a way that we've been entrained to perceive the world and organize it, and so we have moment-to-moment perception of things. There is a river of thoughts. And anybody who has sat in meditation for, let's say, thirty seconds—oh my gosh, the first insight is the waterfall of thoughts. And the point isn't to stop it. The mind secretes thoughts like the endocrine gland secretes hormones. It just does.

And then there's the river of consciousness. The difference between someone who is liberated or awake, says the Buddha, and an ordinary person, is that an ordinary person has these five rivers—the river of sense experience, the river of all the changing feelings, the river of changing perceptions, the river of changing thoughts, the river of changing consciousness. And the one who is liberated has the same five rivers, only they don't cling to them. That's all. They're not identified. They don't take it personally. That's all. That's the definition of freedom.

So freedom comes through this training that we're doing of loving awareness, where you notice the feelings, you notice the thoughts, and you say, "Oh yeah, thank you for helping me," whatever—and you don't take them so personally. This is sadness, and this is grief, and this is joy, and it's part of our human lot, and you don't identify as much, particularly with the thoughts. As one great Lama said, "The mind creates both samsara and nirvana, yet there's nothing much to it. It's just made of thoughts. When we realize that thoughts are empty, the mind will no longer have the power to deceive us."

And so you start to see that thoughts are ephemeral, they're like clouds. And not only that—you can have an opinion about a person, or about politics, or about whatever it is, and then you can have the opposite thought three days or three years later. "Oh yeah, but my thoughts are really important, real." Well, good luck with that.

So the difference is to not grasp and to not identify and to not take it so personally, which is part of what you learn as you sit. It doesn't really matter what happens when you sit here. Your body hurts, your body is pleasant and at ease, your mind quiets, your mind is full of plans or storms, your emotions come, your emotions go. Someone says one sitting is better than another. Not really. The question is: can you find the place of balance and loving awareness that can allow your humanity to rise and fall like waves of the ocean? Can you become the space of balance and understanding and compassion for all of it?

And the point isn't that it's supposed to be a grim duty. As I say, the point isn't to perfect yourself. You've tried that for a long time—see how far you got? "Okay, I did my therapy, I went to the gym, I did a diet." How much did that work? I mean, those things are all fine, but the point isn't to perfect yourself. It's really to perfect this capacity to love, to perfect your love for this human life that each one has been given.

And then when you do, you can go back into the world, so to speak, from the sitting or from the temple. And you tend it with care, not with grasping. "Like a garland of beautiful flowers," says the Buddha, "make of your life a garland of beautiful deeds." This is the garden of the world, and you weed it and you fertilize it and you give it water and you tend it as best you can and you plant seeds moment to moment. And those seeds, even if they're not bearing fruit when you're there—the beautiful thing about a seed is it's miraculous. Sometime or other, it's going to make a difference.

And do you know why that is? Because it's all interconnected. Not just the butterfly wing in South America that changes all the weather patterns—in fact, it is interconnected. And so the seeds that you plant ripple out to the people around you, the things that you touch, the ones that they touch, and the ones that the others touch, and the environment that everyone moves through. It can't not affect the world. That's the beautiful thing. You get a chance to do something to the world with the way you drive or eat or speak or create or build or whatever it is that you do, or parent.

And so you plant these beautiful seeds, but you do it from a place of openness. There was a cartoon in the New Yorker—a big church, you know, and the billboard in front said, "Follow God on Twitter."

So that's about where we are in this age. You remember your Buddha nature and mystery, and you also remember that April 15th you owe your taxes. You have your Buddha nature and your social security number, and both are to be tended to with the same care.

This is from the poet Rilke: "In order for a thing to speak to you, you must regard it for a certain time as the only one that exists." Georgia O'Keeffe, who did those extraordinary paintings of desert flowers, was very straightforward about it. She said the reason she painted that way was so that people would actually see the flower, because it's so small in the desert. She wanted them to get it, to really look at it.

In order for a thing to speak to you, says Rilke, you must regard it for a certain time as the only one that exists. And through your laborious and exclusive love, the one and only phenomenon is now placed at the center of the universe. And in that incomparable place on that day, it is attended by angels.

There's something so important about being able to give attention fully to your own breath, your feelings, the body—the unique body that is one and only in the whole galaxy. There's never been someone like you over all of infinite time. Isn't that wild? And so you look: wow, look at this one, and look at that flower, and that one. You're there with it, tending and caring with respect. And that's a wild one, and that's a kind of mean one—they're out there, I assure you. And that's a loving one. You see all the flowers, and then you see which ones you want to water.

There is something about being able to be in this world with a sense of spaciousness and mystery, an inner balance of loving awareness that's really who you are. Then you can allow the changes and the cycles that make up every human life. Winter and spring, birth and death happen all the time. With a gracious heart, you become wise.

And that is really what the world needs. If it needs anything from you, it needs your wisdom and your compassion, your love. I think that's really why doing the practices that we do is important—because they teach us how to do that.

O nobly born, say the Buddhist texts, remember what is possible for you. Remember that within you is the great heart of compassion. Within you is the wisdom, and who you really are is awareness itself—this timeless loving awareness. Trust it. Rest in it. It is your own true nature. It is home.

Monday Night Meditation Class with Jack Kornfield and Mark Coleman

Jack Kornfield · 1h10

> In this heartfelt dharma talk, Jack Kornfield and Mark Coleman reflect on the nature of impermanence as Spirit Rock prepares to leave its meditation hall of 25 years. The evening weaves together themes of birth, death, and transformation, honoring both the Buddhist celebration of Vesākha and a recent memorial for beloved teacher Stephen Levine.
> Jack shares moving stories about sitting with the dying and the mystery of consciousness, drawing on Stephen Levine's teaching that the bodhisattva's work is to go to the most painful places while keeping the heart open. The teachers explore the traditional Pāli chant on impermanence—'All things are impermanent, they arise and they pass away. To live in harmony with this truth brings great happiness'—and discuss how grief and letting go are both essential parts of practice. Jack reflects on Ajahn Chah's teaching that death and birth happen every moment, offering a gateway to freedom right here and now.
> Mark Coleman invites practitioners to examine their relationship with endings and beginnings, reading from John O'Donohue's Celtic wisdom on how 'beneath time there is eternal depth.' The talk addresses the shift of identity that meditation cultivates—from being caught in the body, thoughts, and personality to resting in what Jack calls 'the one who knows' or loving awareness itself. This timeless awareness, they suggest, is our true home, allowing us to hold life intimately while also letting go when the time comes.

So for this evening, our theme, partly because it's appropriate to the ending of the era in this building, in the holy trailers as we call it, and for other reasons including the memorial that we had yesterday for Stephen Levine here for some hundreds of people. As Mark has said, we want to talk about beginnings and endings, birth and death. Little things like that. We're going to do a bit of tag team. I'll teach for a bit and then Mark will, then come back to me and we'll see where we go.

One of the things that's so important about taking time to sit in meditation or walk in a mindful way, to have some form of practice that brings us back to where we are, is that we can get so lost in the speed and the complexity, the rush of our lives and all the things that we have to check off to get done, to get through the day—survival things and other things like that—that we lose a sense of connection to ourself and somehow to the beauty and the mystery of life on earth. We get small, if you understand what I mean.

This is a letter that was written to the Sun Magazine, one of my favorite journals. Some decades ago, this person writes:

"I started a rigorous six-year academic program in Boston that required me to work during the day, take classes every night, and do homework on the weekends. On my first summer off, I wanted to get far away from my studies and work with my hands and be close to the earth. So I went to live with an Amish family in Pennsylvania. The experience renewed me and I decided to do it again the next summer.

That year, a good friend had recently died. I drove from Boston to Pennsylvania on a holiday weekend, and what was normally a six-hour trip took more than ten hours. By the time I arrived just before dusk, I was full of feelings—anxious and exhausted and maybe tearful.

My Amish hosts had delayed their dinner for me. During the meal, I tried to act natural, but I felt full of nerves and feelings, and my Amish host could clearly tell something was amiss, because at the end of dinner, he said, 'Come with me.'

I followed him to their backyard, which bordered an alfalfa field. Although his faith discouraged smoking, the farmer lit a cigarette. Three of his children gamboled about while two others clung to him. The farmer stood without saying a word, looking out over the alfalfa. I did the same.

The dark green field was becoming harder to see in the fading light. The sky was peach at the horizon and deep blue higher up. Stars had begun to appear. Then out of the alfalfa rose fireflies, a few at first, but soon there were hundreds. Their pinpricks of light mingled with the stars, heaven and earth meeting in this humble man's backyard. I felt my anxiety leave me. The farmer turned and said, 'That's for you.'"

It's both touching, as you can hear, and it's also a reminder somehow of what it means to live in the mystery of things. We all know that old Ojibwe saying: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

To come and sit in meditation or to sit at home and have a practice—yes, there is release of stress, and yes, there's an inner regulation and all the great things that modern neuroscience says. But there's something else about letting the heart be tender and the senses open and somehow feeling your place on the earth again and how important that is. Your place in the turning cosmos of birth and death and all that we live with.

This past weekend, yesterday, we had a memorial service for Stephen Levine, who was a close friend and meditation teacher and author of many books, a hospice worker. Many books: Who Dies? and Healing into Life and Death and Gradual Awakening. I've known him for probably forty years, and he published my first book and Joseph Goldstein's first book with his press. He had a press in Haight-Ashbury. He was part of the founding of the Oracle magazine in those days, in the old hippie days. In fact, Wavy Gravy, who was supposed to come yesterday, couldn't because he had his own big 80th birthday celebration, so he sent a little red nose and a haiku and said, "Stephen was my oldest friend. We went to elementary school in Albany, New York. I remember him from second grade." It was very sweet.

For those of you who knew Stephen and Andrea, who also came—his widow, I guess you would say, his partner—and Noah Levine, his son, who started the Dharma Punks and Against the Stream, spoke, and Ram Dass Skyped in. It was very moving, because people stood up and talked about how Stephen's presence and his invitation to people was to be compassionate and loving no matter what.

He worked, and Andrea too did, at the bedside of a thousand people who died, children who were dying, worked in children's hospitals. He worked with people who'd gone through severe abuse. And he would talk about it. He'd say the work of the bodhisattva, the being committed to compassion, is to go to the most painful places and keep their heart open.

I read a passage from just one conversation with Stephen, where he wrote as an example: A woman they worked with, her mother became very ill. She'd never really gotten along with her mother. Her mother had been judgmental, unkind, and actually severely abusive. When her mother became ill, she was the only one of the sisters who could even go and sit at her bedside because she'd been training in meditation. She would just sit next to her mother and wish her well. Not "why did you do this" or "why didn't you do that" or a total accounting, but just try to let her mother be and feel love for her.

Now, her mother had not only been nasty in her lifetime—it wasn't ending just because she was dying.

This woman, day after day, sat there sending loving kindness to her mother. And on the day her mother died, her mother looked at her and said, "I hope you roast in hell. I hope you have the worst possible life." This is really abusive and terrible—what you're not supposed to hear from your mother, seriously.

But obviously her mother... this doesn't happen by accident. Somebody taught her to do that, and it happened to her too. So the daughter was sitting with compassion for all that her mother had lived through. And her mother died cursing her, and she died with her daughter sitting next to her, looking at her with soft eyes, with an open heart and full of compassion, saying, "Mom, I hope everything's okay for you."

For her mom, it was terrible. Stephen goes on: but for her, it was wonderful. She was just another human being who was having a hard time as her mother was dying, and she was healing into love.

So that gives a little bit of the flavor of Stephen's presence and his teaching, and really what we're practicing for here. Yes, we're practicing to reduce stress and cultivate calm and focus and all kinds of beautiful things like that. But more than that, we too are going to be confronted in our lives with unexpected changes and with difficulty. As the Buddha said, there is suffering in union and incarnation. Anybody not have that? You can have your eight dollars back, right?

So there we were, Jai Uttal was singing some chants—kirtan chants, chants of transformation. It also happens that a couple of days ago was Vesak, which is in the Theravada Buddhist tradition that our insight meditation and mindfulness come from. It's the holiday that celebrates the enlightenment of the Buddha, his birth and his death. They rolled it all into one. Remember, there used to be a day for George Washington's birthday and Lincoln's birthday, and then they made President's Day? This is kind of like that—the Buddhist equivalent.

I got sent this little letter from the press secretary, a statement by Barack Obama: "Michelle and I extend our warmest wishes to Buddhists in the US and around the world in their celebration of Vesak, honoring the birth, enlightenment and passing of Buddha. During this season we reflect on the Buddha's universal teachings of peace, service and recognition of common humanity—shared values that also bind us all as Americans. This occasion gives us an opportunity to commemorate the many contributions of Buddhists to our progress globally and to recommit ourselves to building a bright future for all communities, cultures, and religions. Our family sends the best wishes during this season. Barack and Michelle Obama."

So there you go—a little greeting from them. But it's wild that it's birth, death, and enlightenment all on the same day. But it's true, because everything actually happens now. I think you may have noticed that. There's only now. And there's always birth and death.

And here we are in this hall. There were two other buildings—those who come regularly know—on this meadow that held some of our offices. And the day came when the offices were moved to the admin building. A giant truck crushing machine came in, picked them up, squashed them, and then carted them off to whatever landfill. If we were in some other part of the world, this would be a school for fifty more years, right? And all the rodents would be welcome. But it's kind of wild that it exists for a time and then it disappears. They were there and then crushed, gone, like they never existed.

I drove back past the house where I'd lived for thirty years in Woodacre. It was sold last year after the end of my marriage. My ex-wife lived there for some years and then we sold it. There's a new family there starting to have kids, and they repainted. But we built it and developed it and made the gardens and all of that. And I looked and I said, you know, only a few people even remember what happened in there. There were all these momentous things—beautiful things and visitors and arguments and child rearing. It's gone. And no one will even remember it when I don't remember it anymore. Maybe my daughter for a little bit, but that's it.

Things are like that. They come out of the world. They appear for a time. We get to engage in a way, and then they vanish.

which has had the Dalai Lama and 600 Tibetans crowded knee to knee to be with him, who came streaming from all over the West Coast to be with His Holiness. Or Thich Nhat Hanh, or the San Quentin Gospel Choir singing in here. So many baby blessings and an amazing number of teachings in this room.

My favorite night, I think, was twenty years ago or so—full moon, Halloween, and we had the Gyuto monks, those guys who do the chanting, you know, multivocal chanting. They came, and the abbot put his forehead against mine. I thought, "Oh God, I'm going to see light or something." It was very cool. And then we explained it was Halloween. And they said, "Oh, great!" And they went back to their van and pulled out these skeleton costumes. They said, "Come out in the meadow," and under the full moonlight with the cymbals and all the Tibetan chanting, they did this skeleton dance on Halloween for us. Just—you know, why not, right?

The phrase from James Joyce is "the ineluctable modality of the world of the senses," which is to say, as Mark was saying in the sitting, that the senses of sight and sound and smell and taste and thought and feeling—what makes up our human experience—ever in change, is arising and passing moment to moment. And we rest in the present while these waves of experience play in our senses.

Now, this from the Buddha: It seems that although we thought ourselves permanent, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not.

And so really the big question is: how do you handle change? And I'm not asking it theoretically—how does one handle change? I'm asking you, and me, and Mark. What do we do with beginnings and ends of things? And how do we handle death? Because that's the strange thing. You can look at the few people around you, and in a few years, one of them won't be here. One of them will have died. Might be you. But it might be one of them. It's really wild.

We had somebody die on a retreat in Yucca Valley a few years ago. There we all were, sitting and meditating and talking about death and life and birth. And then that person died and they weren't there anymore. And it made it much more real.

But here's an interesting question. I'll say just a couple more things and then let Mark piggyback on this.

When the Buddha died, as the myth or the story handed down goes, on the Buddha's passing, flowers rained down from the trees and there was a great gathering and celebration of his life. There were two groups of his disciples. One group was weeping and grieving because they loved him and they would miss his presence—he must have had rather a remarkable presence. And another group was complaining about that former group, saying, "Didn't they get the teachings that all things are impermanent? This is what the guy had to say. What are they weeping about? This is the way things go." And those were supposed to be the more enlightened ones.

I'm not certain myself, because it's actually very human. It's this human incarnation that requires us to hold both—that in some way we're part of an ever-changing mystery, and to understand that and relax with change.

There's a beautiful Sufi dance that I've done in the Sufi tradition. The English version, where you meet partners and move in a circle, is: "I love it when it comes and I love it when it goes." And you do that over and over as people pass by—"I love you when you come and I love you when you go." And you start to feel what it's like to open your heart to both coming and going.

So in one way there's a very deep equanimity or peace to realize that all things arise and they pass away. And that is what it means to have a human incarnation. Nothing is fixed. And can you relax and become the loving awareness that knows this without being so frightened or clinging? Because if you're able to let go, your heart's much more at peace. You're freer.

But the other side is all that spiritual bypass where, "Okay, things come and go, doesn't matter."

And my friend Malidoma Somé, who came here—West African shaman and medicine man—said, "Your streets are full of the ungrieved dead in your culture. We in the Dagara people grieve every person consciously." And you have people who've died in the ICUs tended by staff, but not by their families or people who knew them. You have homeless people dying in the streets, people in old age homes. And I can feel it in a culture that doesn't know how to grieve.

And so there's something really honorable and beautiful about those who are weeping. Because we need our tears as well. Our grief and our tears are also our way of saying, "I have cared about this. This is part of my way of honoring it and letting it go." And to take your seat in the midst of birth and death and joy and sorrow—Ajahn Chah, my teacher, said, "If you haven't wept deeply, you haven't really meditated yet." Those tears are called the tears of the way. Those tears will come to you, as well as a sense of a kind of timelessness that says, yes, this is our human lot.

So there you have it. Thus have I heard.

So while you were all meditating, I was busy doing a little bit of calculus. I had the thought, "I wonder how many hours of meditation have happened within these four walls." I did my rough guesstimate—I know the program and the flow of numbers—and I figured somewhere between eight and ten million hours of meditation have been put in here by you all, and many others like you. That's a lot of hours. That's a lot of practice.

And many of you have probably spent—I'm actually curious, how many people have been coming here since 1990 or thereabouts? In the nineties? How many people have made it? And in the 2000s, early 2000s? The aughts? In the last five years?

So we've spent a lot of time within these walls. I'm a big nature lover, so for me to be in a low-ceilinged trailer in this beautiful land that's just gorgeous and dripping with exquisiteness—at times it has been challenging. But I also am aware that, as I was saying coming in here, it does feel like this place has arms. It's like sitting here, and there's a sense of being held, just as the Dharma holds us, community holds us, practice holds us, others hold us—but also a certain place holds us.

And as Jack was recalling different things that happened, I've also been reflecting on different memories—first coming here from England in the early nineties to practice, first teaching here around 2000, running many, many courses and classes and trainings and daylongs, being in long tedious board meetings and other kinds of meetings. Actually, the memory that stood out was that I did the first days of meditation and dance, where we wove in silence and stillness and movement—quite wild, passionate movement at times. The first time I did that daylong, I felt like the whole 2,500-year Theravada tradition kind of croaking, like, "No! What is happening to Buddhism in the West? It's really going downhill." Anyway, we didn't have a sprung floor, but because we have a trailer, it sort of bounced anyway, so it all worked out.

But as Jack was saying, these twenty-five years—or however many years you've been meditating, however many times you've practiced here, whatever's happened in the last twenty-five years—where is it all gone? Where is it now? I'm aware of the many, many hours, probably thousands of hours I've spent in here. And where is it? It's a complete dream. It's fondness, it's memories, it's a sense of place, but it's also gone. That ephemerality of life. And yet it also has some substance to it, and it does endure in our hearts and in our memories.

So I want to read something from John O'Donohue, who talks about how the Celts used to view time, and how place touches us. He says:

The nature of calendar time is linear. It is made up of durations that begin and end. The Celtic imagination always sensed that beneath time there was eternal depth. This offers us a completely different way of relating to time. It relieves time of the finality of ending. While something may come to an ending on the surface of time, its presence, meaning, and effect continues to be held into the eternal. This is how spirit unfolds and deepens. In this sense, eternal time is intimate. It is where the unfolding narrative of individual life is gathered and woven.

So although this place will come to dust and ashes, there's also a sense of enduring in some way—in some mysterious presence, quality, felt sense. I know when I come to the meadow, and the trailers have already gone, how many memories from the staff linger. There's a sense of something still present.

As we know, the Buddha spoke much to this teaching.

It was like the cornerstone of his teaching—to understand, to live with this felt, intuitive sense of transience, of holding life intimately and lightly.

And the poet Mary Oliver put it beautifully in a poem when she said:

In this life, there is one thing I have come to learn, that leads back to this: the fires and the black river of loss, whose other side is salvation, whose meaning we will never know. To live in this world you must be able to do three things: to love what is mortal, to hold it against your bones as if your own life depended on it, and when the time comes to let it go, to let it go.

So unlike the spiritual bypass—"Oh, things are impermanent, let's not get too connected and attached"—no, we connect intimately, viscerally with life. Because why? Because that's what life asks of us. To be here, to be present for the performance. It's beautiful and difficult and perplexing. To hold it against your bones as if your own life depended on it. And when the time comes to let it go, to let it go.

That's the hard part. That's why we're here. That's why it's practice. Not easy to let go. There's a lot of talk about letting go. "Just let go of that grief, you know. Just let go of that person. Just let go of that difficult emotion." Well, good luck. You would if you could.

So I thought we could chant an age-old Buddhist chant. I'll chant it in Pali and then we'll chant it in English. It means: All things are impermanent. They arise and they pass away. To live in harmony with this truth brings great happiness.

That's an interesting punchline. To live in harmony with the fact that things are arising and ceasing brings great happiness. We might think, "Oh, that's a little depressing. It's all going to go. We're going to lose everything." It is if we want to cling to it, but if we can actually flow with that movement, there's relief, there's spaciousness, there's freedom.

The Buddha on this theme said it's better to spend one day contemplating beginnings and endings than to spend a whole hundred years living without contemplating that.

What does it mean to contemplate beginnings and endings? What is your relationship to the beginnings of things? We generally prefer the beginning, unless we have an anticipatory anxiety about what's going to happen. But it's the endings—the parting, the ceasing, the letting go, the dissolution—that we often find challenging. But as one friend, Roger Housden, said in his book Ten Poems to Say Goodbye: to say hello, we have to say goodbye. To say goodbye, we welcome the new. We can't say hello without saying goodbye.

So before we transition to this beautiful purpose-built, magnificent dharma hall that we'll be residing in hopefully for the next twenty-five years and many more after that—although many of us won't be around to see that—we might explore our relationship to endings. Like our relationship to this place. What do you notice comes up in relationship to this dharma hall, which has a certain sacredness to it because of the intentionality and the dedication and the practice and the insights and the heart openings and the connections and the community that's been developed here? This is a home. I feel like having been a transplant from England and feeling a little homeless wherever I am, this is about as home as it gets for me in terms of regularity of place.

But at the same time, we honor what is and we honor what's passing, but not to also get stuck and not to build a shrine to it, as Hafiz says.

It's that line he says: "What do sad people have in common? It seems they've built a shrine to the past and often go there to do a strange wail in worship. What's the beginning of happiness? To stop being so religious like that."

So we're not carrying it around on our back, but we're just acknowledging, bowing, appreciating it, and also letting it go—like breeze through the fingers.

Marilyn Monroe, who I don't usually quote in my dharma talks, once said, "Sometimes things fall apart so that better things can fall together." Don't think she was talking about dharma centers, but...

Or as T.S. Eliot put it in a rather more astute way: "The end is where we start from."

So in beginnings there are endings; when there are endings, there are beginnings. Out of dissolution comes the arising of something else. The dissolution of the roof here—and you notice a very nice rain catchment structure trying to recycle water—it is truly the beginning of the end of this building, which can no longer hold out the water.

So take a moment: How are you with beginnings? What arises for you in that possibility, that openness, that space? And how does your heart hold and tend to the endings of things, the passing of things? Do we run? Do we flee? Do we pass over? Do we shut down? Do we put a nice spiritual wrapper around it?

Endings, beginnings, job changes, kids going off, illness—you enter what is it, the continent of illness when it happens, a different world—divorce, aging, moving from one place to another.

In a way, to sit in meditation is to step out of the movement of time. And the question is not the future of humanity but the presence of eternity. Is there some way that we can sit in this mystery of our life and find that which is timeless amidst all of these changes? Then we become that kind of freedom that the Buddha spoke of. Then we really find a place of freedom in ourselves.

And it's not so easy. We miss the things that go. We do need to grieve.

Another poem, called "The Dog Misses You":

The dog goes out to look for you.
She circumnavigates the yard.
She's been practicing saying "I love you" in every language—
the dog practices saying in Javanese, the dog practices saying in Romanian.
The dog digs a hole along the fence.
She's so funny when she digs, all that dirt flying.
The fence could be time.
There's surely a different world on the other side of it.
Are you over there?
In the afternoon, the dog pulls the leash so hard she almost lifts off the ground, but you aren't to be found.
Later at night, the dog puts her blocky head upon the kitchen floor and sleeps, one soft and floppy ear pressed to the linoleum, listening.
The dog has been practicing saying "I'm lost" in every language—
the dog practices saying in Hmong, the dog practices saying in Esperanto.
The dog has three wishes.
She wishes she knew where to find you.
She wishes you would come home with a treat.
She wishes you and I were together on the bed, and up she would jump.

It's beautiful and so tender, and it's also so mysterious—because the mystery is that this person was here and then they're not. And that is also the mystery that will happen to all of us. We can be committed and dedicated; we can love and hold this world against our bones, as Mary Oliver says, and then let it go.

It takes both. You have to remember the value of this human life and use it beautifully. And at the same time, remember something that's more eternal. Or you won't be at ease. You have to remember your Buddha nature and your zip code, basically, and live afoot in each world.

our practice and teaching also offers—as you said, with your breath changing and with a million thoughts coming and going, your emotions of loving and hating—you have everything in there. You've got the zoo in there, right? And there comes a place where you begin to find a respite in awareness itself, in loving awareness that's not caught by each of these different seductive, judgmental plots and plans and ideas. You can choose the ones that are valuable, but somehow you find the spaciousness of loving awareness, which is your home.

Karlfried Dürckheim, Zen teacher, writes: "The person who, really being on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not, as a consequence, turn to that friend who offers them refuge and comfort and encourages their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themself over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found in them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

And so there is something about going through loss or letting go or going through hard times that actually calls for you to turn yourself somewhere—to that which is not changing, which is timeless or indestructible.

Now, sitting as Stephen and Andrea have done with thousands of people, sitting at the bedside of people as I've done, people come and ask, "Okay, you're in the spiritual industry, basically. What happens when you die? What do you really know?" And of course, it is a mystery. I've watched people ask the Dalai Lama, and he smiles and says, "I will be very excited to find out."

I didn't used to believe in anything when I went to be with my teacher Ajahn Chah. I came from a family of scientists. And I said, "I don't know about past and future lives and rebirth and all this other stuff. Do I have to believe that?" He said, "No, no. Death and birth happen every day, every moment. And you can learn all the Dharma that you need, all the teachings of both how we make ourselves lost and unhappy in this world with greed and hatred and fear, the forces that create human suffering. And in every birth and death you can also find letting go, ease, mindfulness, compassion. You can find the gateway to freedom there, here."

So I started not believing in anything. As it's gone along, I've come to more or less the other side, and I pretty much believe in everything now. Sitting at the bedside of people who are dying, that mysterious moment when they're there as a person, and then absolutely silently, like a falling star at night, spirit leaves the body. And it's just meat then—it's not them. What is that consciousness? What is that spirit? Or sitting with someone who leaves partly and then comes back and says, "I was in this realm of light." Or "I was talking to someone." And you say, "Oh, you know, the materialists say that was just delusion, right?"

A hospice director, a friend of mine, had a group of people come to see him. Their father was dying. He was in his eighties, an old Italian guy. And they came and said, "We don't know what to do." They were in their fifties. "Our father's really close to death, as you know. And his younger brother was killed in a car accident yesterday. And we don't know whether we should tell him—and that would disturb his dying process—or not tell him." And the hospice director said, "Well, I don't know. Let's just go and see how he is."

So they all walked in the room and stood with him. "How are you doing, Dad?" "Okay." And pretty far gone. And then he raised his head and said, "Don't you have something to tell me?" They said, "What do you mean?" He said, "My brother who died." "How do you know?" "Oh, I've been talking to him all night."

So there is another possibility. I remember sitting and holding my father's hand. And he's saying, "I'm just going to turn into dirt. I'm a scientist. I know dirt when I see it." Whatever. And I said, "Maybe, but you might find yourself leaving your body and the spirit going into light or love or having experiences."

You're not your body. He said, I'm not? I said, listen, most everybody in the world actually, if you look around, believes that there's something more than this. So I don't know, but you're a scientist, so you have to be open-minded, right? And when you die, as even the light comes and you leave, you remember—I told you so.

I've done past life regressions with people around the world at different times. I'll play with this stuff. And the remarkable thing is, if I have a room of people, it doesn't matter whether I'm in Palestine or Israel or Burma or Japan—half of them don't believe in this stuff, which is totally fine. But when we do a past life regression, the majority of people have some memory if you do it well. And the interesting thing is it has no connection with whether they believe or not. Somebody who doesn't believe at all, they look and they say, oh my God, I have sandals on my feet and they're a little muddy and I'm this woman or man. And it's not Queen Cleopatra, I assure you. It was like a farmer in the Middle East or Africa or something like that. And then if we progress it forward—how did you die, and what was the space like after you died—people have all these memories of that. Wherever I do this, people have similar experiences to report: I left my body, there was light, there was some sense of not being physical but still having consciousness. You can believe what you want, it's up to you. Unless—you'll see. Remember, I told you.

But the big thing about this is that there is a possibility, and it's part of what meditation really teaches us—a shift of identity. You take your seat with some dignity. The Buddhist texts begin, "O nobly born." They see the nobility and the dignity in every single human being. That's kind of the invitation: come and be reminded of your fundamental dignity and nobility. Be reminded of your Buddha nature, of who you really are, which is not this body. It's not your personality, I hope. Really, I do.

I mean, you have this weird animal body. Do you think that's who you are? Little wiggly things and fur in certain places. Come on. You're inhabited. And all the fantastic suffering and horrible confusion because of racism and tribalism—we see people as if that's who they are, their color or their shape or something like that. You're a blue person. I don't like blue people. Only purple people or whatever it is. It's crazy.

So we identify with our life, the people we love—it's quite natural. Our tribe, our community. We identify with our body. You need to take care of it. You need to love it. But it just isn't who you are. You rent it. Avis, right? And then you have to turn it back. Mileage is up, okay, time to turn it in.

And the beautiful thing that starts to happen as you learn the art of meditation is you shift from being identified with the body or the thoughts or the personality to becoming the witness of it, becoming the loving awareness itself, or what my teacher called the one who knows. You shift your identity to be that timeless awareness that is who you really are, that got born into this body and that will leave and say, wow, that was an amazing ride, that incarnation, wasn't it? Fantastic. You'll see.

But the beautiful thing—as Lavoisier, who is the founder of modern chemistry, discovered, and for all of those who remember those chemical equations where you had to balance everything, this had to equal that—he said, nothing is lost, all is transformed. He discovered that in the physical world, that when you had carbon and hydrogen and oxygen and sulfur in certain compounds, you could change those compounds and molecules in chemical reaction, but you still ended up with the carbon and hydrogen and sulfur. Nothing is lost. All is transformed.

And it turns out, from some who have done this a long time, that as they say, death is perfectly safe. Because you shift your identity from that which you love—the people you care about, this beautiful Earth, this gift of incarnation—and you know that who you are is a timeless spirit. And then it allows you to live with greater freedom, because that's who you really are. And you see that secret beauty in everybody that you meet. Oh, here we are having a human incarnation experience. Isn't this wild? Instead of judging them—even that woman that Stephen talked about, sitting beside her abusive mother saying, "Well, that was a painful incarnation, wasn't it?" And it's an amazing kind of liberating perspective.

And then you plant beautiful seeds. You say, I'm here for a little while. What else to do but to plant seeds of love, of tenderness, of something of value, of creativity? Not that complicated.

This is from Emerson, Ralph Waldo Emerson: "To appreciate beauty and find the best in others, to leave the world a bit better whether by a healthy child, a garden patch, a redeemed social condition, to know that even one life has breathed easier because you have lived—this is enough. This is to have succeeded."

And so you get to be here in this passing world. And by meditating, by quieting the mind and opening the heart, you actually get to plant beautiful things in your family and community, in the world. And as Thoreau said beautifully, "I have faith in a seed. I don't believe a plant will spring up where no seed exists, but I have tremendous faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I'm prepared to expect wonders."

And so you are in this marriage that Hafez talks about—the marriage of space and time and beauty and eternity in your human life.

And I guess the last thing that I'll say is that things always want to start anew when you let go. There's just something fresh that will come. And sometimes it's terrible. And sometimes, as Dürckheim says, you have to be annihilated in some way and live through that loss to find something that is indestructible in you.

And here I am, seventy years old, almost seventy-one, and I have a girlfriend who's the same age, Trudy Goodman. We've known each other for forty years. We met at a retreat in 1974, the first retreat I taught on the East Coast with Joseph Goldstein. She came with her good friend Jon Kabat-Zinn. Around us came a bunch of the early ones.

Anyway, a couple of weeks ago, I took her for a ride on the Ferris wheel at Santa Monica Pier, and I whispered at the bottom something to them, so they stopped it at the top for me, and then I asked if she would marry me. And she said—happily, she said, "Oh yes, I will, as a matter of fact." I had a few rings. I said, pick one of these, you can choose what you like—knowing that she had her own taste. I thought that was a good beginning, actually.

So things can start anew. And that's true for all of us. There's something that wants to—as long as you're breathing, as long as you're sitting with somebody who's dying, it doesn't matter what's happening. You have the possibility of awakening and opening.

As the Buddha said, "If it were not possible to live with a free heart, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible for you, I offer these teachings. I offer these practices."

So it's your birthright. It's your possibility as a human being, as a spirit that you are, to learn how to live with this kind of wisdom and compassion amidst the changes.

The reason this trailer is here, you can blame this guy. And the reason that the community has grown and endured is partly Jack's teaching and also his training of many teachers and growing a beautiful community—a community with deep roots and a broad vision, both in Dharma and also in terms of really integrating into every aspect of life, into the complexity and the messiness of life.

So I can't help thinking about this building and ending and beginning without thinking about Jack and his beautiful work, his wisdom and heart. It's been a great ride. We'll see where it goes. So far, so good.

I have a couple of questions for you—that gets me off the hook of having to say anything. Two questions. First, what have you seen over these twenty-five years? Taking a big, wide arc of the purview of this whole endeavor, what's happening here as a microcosm of Dharma and societal change? What comes to you looking back over these twenty-five years? Does anything stand out?

Two things. The first is the good-heartedness of people. This is a little bit like a tide pool. Spirit Rock has five hundred or a thousand people come through every week for daylongs and classes, and the level of fundamental good-heartedness and sincerity is remarkable. Yes, people come in part for healing—that's part of spiritual life. People are drawn here sometimes because they're in crisis. But not just for that. People come for love, they come for community. The basic goodness of people over years and years is really a beautiful thing to see. And admittedly, I get to see you on your good behavior—I'm not living with you. But nevertheless, that goodness is in you, and it shines, and it's gorgeous. We talk about the Vipassana facelift at the end of retreats, where people finish and they look... we could sell it in Hollywood. Their eyes are bright, and they just look so beautiful and young. So that's one.

Something else that has surprised me is that this was weird in the beginning. I mean, we're still weird, it's true. But it was unusual—Eastern, Buddhist, whatever that meant to people. There was a much smaller group of people. And now there's a yoga studio and Starbucks and mindfulness on every corner. Mindfulness in business, mindfulness in athletics, mindfulness in schools. It became a whole industry. I wish I'd gotten stock options. Never too late.

People worry, is it going to get watered down? And I say, of course—we're Americans. We know how to use and misuse anything. But actually it's always been watered down. If you go to Asia and to the beautiful Buddhist cultures, there is tremendous generosity and devotion, and you feel it. You go to the pagodas and the stupas and there's so much love of Dharma. And then half the people go into the temple to make an offering so that they have a little better business that morning, or that their kid gets into the right school. If I give a little bit to the Buddha, will I get something nice back? It's sort of an exchange there. That's mostly their practice—giving a little bit to see if they get some good luck, basically. Or they go in to see if there's a fortune teller in the temple who can give them a good number for the lottery next week. It's watered down everywhere.

But when it moves out through society as it has, when you live in a place like Burma or Sri Lanka or parts of Japan where Buddhism is still so much alive, it also gets into the cells of the culture. There's an understanding that compassion is a value—as there has been in some ways in America, although we've lost a bit of it. There used to be barn raising and community, and now it's every individual for themself, that kind of hyper-individualistic, capitalistic misuse of it, really.

But what I see is that the Dharma is spreading, and it's spreading beautifully, actually. I completely trust the Dharma. It knows how to take care of itself. People use it in all kinds of ways, and always it has this perfume of liberation, this perfume of stillness and possibility. As it touches people, even if they don't know it, they begin to realize there's another way to live or be in this heart and mind. So I'm thrilled that it's all happened in this kind of wild way.

How about for you, Mark? Anything surprise you in the last twenty-five years?

What do I see? I started practicing Dharma in the early eighties in East London, and it was considered a cult, and I was considered weird. I'm surprised how quickly society—American culture has a way of gobbling up things and spitting them out—but I'm still surprised globally how much Dharma principles of awareness, presence, compassion, and letting go are seeping into mainstream fabrics. Whether it's the UK Parliament, where twenty percent of the sitting members have done an eight-week mindfulness course. Twenty percent. Can you imagine twenty percent of the Senate doing an eight-week mindfulness course? And then they did a white paper—Mindful UK. They did an extensive study and advocated that mindfulness be rolled out extensively in education, healthcare, and the justice system, with significant resources towards that. So to me, that's been the biggest shift, and surprise how quickly it happened. People were slowly growing more interested in practice, but the way research helped validate mindfulness meditation and made it go viral—that's been a big surprise.

Second question for you. One of the things I appreciated about the way you've guided Spirit Rock, which I see through the board and teacher meetings and the way you frame things, is that you really had the intention that this be a center lasting for hundreds of years, not just the next twenty—albeit now we have a center that the structure will actually last for more than twenty years. What are your hopes as part of that vision? What do you wish for as Spirit Rock and the Dharma unfold? What's your aspiration?

It's not so much for Spirit Rock. It will do what it does, and it's not given to us. We get to plant our seeds of teachings or structures or things that are beneficial, and then other people will take it and do something with it. Who knows what? It may take other forms.

It's a much bigger thing for me. As I say very often here, it's really evident in the world now. We see the different kinds of suffering—global warming, environmental degradation, continuing warfare, racism—all of these things that are not being solved by the outer developments of human technology. We have the great library of Alexandria in our pocket. It also happens to be our memory right now, but anyway. We can connect from one part of the world to another. We have nanotechnology and space technology and all these things, and they haven't stopped racism, and they haven't stopped war, and they haven't stopped the destruction of the environment.

So the outer developments of our humanity, which are right now quite extraordinary, have to be matched with an inner level of human development that sees the interdependence of life—that what we breathe is also breathed by the Chinese and the Amish and the people in Mexico and Canada, that we inter-be and inter-are. We have to develop a kind of emotional maturity as a species that we have not yet really done.

And to the extent that, whether it's Spirit Rock or underneath it really, the teachings that the mind and heart can be trained and can be awakened—it's not just that we learn reading and writing and arithmetic. Those are all good things. But our children and generations ahead also need to learn the trainings of compassion and forgiveness and loving-kindness and interdependence.

That those are possible for us as human beings. And that we can change the way we live with one another. Now there's a dream worth having.

It seems like Spirit Rock has planted some seeds for that. In this big revolution of mindfulness going everywhere, Spirit Rock has certainly played a very important role in training teachers and people who are out there carrying these teachings forward.

I have a little story. I went to visit Thich Nhat Hanh, who had been here in San Francisco for six months. He was brought here by the head of Salesforce, Mark Benioff, who was also a disciple of his—a very wonderful man. Mark brought not only Thich Nhat Hanh but a whole group of his monks and nuns to stay in the city. Thich Nhat Hanh, who is now 89, had had a major stroke, as most people know, and was getting good medical care in France, but there were things you could get in California. You know how it is—it's California. All kinds of alternative and interesting and good things. So Thich Nhat Hanh indicated, even though he couldn't speak much, that he wanted to come here. He did get good medical treatment and got better a little bit. He had a wonderful speech therapist, so he now has a few words. He can move one hand but not the other part of his body. But he came back a little bit, and he seems to want to hang in here because so many people love him and want to come and hold his hand and thank him for transforming their lives. He wants to be here to really receive that, to feel the honoring that people need to offer him. It's a kind of beautiful thing to watch.

One of the times we went over to sit, Trudy and I went over early in the morning at 6:30. They had a little zendo—a meditation circle—in the living room of this place where he and twenty monks and nuns were living. Afterward, we were taking tea with some of the senior monks and nuns, not with Thich Nhat Hanh himself. They said, "Oh, this week there's a big retreat down at Deer Park Monastery," which is his place near San Diego. They said, "We've got 600 or 700 people there." And I said, "That's lovely for a week. Are they there honoring the fact that their teacher is sick and here? Do they want to do prayers for him?" And she said, "No, that's the usual number that comes regularly there." I said, "Well, do they come when he's there?" She said, "Oh, even when he was well, he was only there every couple of years for two weeks."

Then she went on, and it was really beautiful. She said, "But it's not that they're there for his teachings. He said to the community, 'You are me. Not that you have my teachings. But I am in you and you are in me. You are me. So I don't have to be present physically. I don't have to be with you. You are Thich Nhat Hanh. You are carrying and embodying whatever I am. That is you. And we get to do this as one being, somehow together.'"

I was so touched when she said it. It wasn't like, "Okay, here, I've given this to you." It was a deeper level of interdependence, his wisdom understanding to say: You are me. And so they gather. Maybe it's like whenever two or more are gathered in his name, in that Christian tradition. There are so many other meanings—Sangha and minyan and holy community and satsang. But this had a very deep meaning, and it was beautiful to see.

Somehow I feel like even as we talk tonight and as we come and sit together, it's not this teacher or that master who's come through—which is a beautiful thing—but it's really reminding us who we really are. Each of us.

We've mostly talked about endings, which feels appropriate since we are, in a way, putting this beautiful hall to bed, to rest. But I also want to invite in the spirit of beginnings.

I spend a lot of time outdoors. I was just up north in Lake County, where they've had tremendous fires the last few years, and there's no better place to understand change and beginnings and endings than being out in nature. Especially being in a devastated forest and seeing the new life that springs up, the seeds that get released, the wildflowers that burst through, the light that's available that was concealed by the canopy—it makes room for a whole plethora of life forms that weren't available before.

And so I wanted to close with a leaning forward, as we migrate across the creek, across the road to the new center. I wanted to offer a blessing from John O'Donohue, who writes so beautifully from the Celtic tradition of blessing. We'll take the goodness of our practice here as we move into our new dwellings.

In out-of-the-way places of the heart, where your thoughts never think to wander, the beginning has been quietly forming, waiting until you were ready to emerge.

For a long time it has watched your desire, feeling the emptiness grow inside you, noticing how you have willed yourself on, still unable to leave what you had outgrown.

It watched you play with the seduction of safety and the gray promises that sameness whispered. Heard the waves of turmoil rise and relent. Wondered would you always live like this?

Then the delight when your courage kindled and out you stepped onto new ground, your eyes young again with energy and dream. A path of plenitude opening before you.

Though your destination is not clear, you can trust the promise of this opening. Unfurl yourself into the grace of beginning that is one with your life's desire.

Awaken your spirit to adventure. Hold nothing back. Learn to find ease in risk. Soon you will be home in a new rhythm, for your soul senses the world that awaits you.

These outer beginnings and endings, of course, speak to our own inner path of endings and beginnings.

Blessings. Take care out there.

CHAPTER 72

Monday Night Meditation Class with Jack Kornfield

Jack Kornfield · 2h18

> This deeply moving talk was delivered in the days following the 2016 Orlando Pulse nightclub shooting, opening with a candlelit vigil honoring the 49 lives lost. Jack Kornfield guides practitioners through the raw territory of collective grief while pointing toward the Buddhist understanding that tears and healing are inseparable aspects of awakening. Drawing from the Ānāpānasati Sutta on mindfulness of breathing, he shares the remarkable story of a prisoner who transformed from violence to becoming 'the Monk of Trenton' through dedicated meditation practice.
> Kornfield explores how stillness becomes the foundation for wise action, referencing the Tao Te Ching's teaching on waiting until the mud settles and the water clears. He recites the Buddha's teachings on directing the heart away from hatred and cruelty, emphasizing the ancient law that hatred never ceases by hatred but by love alone. The talk weaves together stories of the Amish farmer's wordless teaching through fireflies, the Afghan peace army of Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, and the recent transmission ceremony for new dharma teachers.
> The practical relevance for daily life centers on becoming 'the one who knows'—cultivating loving awareness that can hold the ten thousand joys and sorrows without being overwhelmed. Kornfield invites practitioners to find their own vow of compassion, patience, or deep listening, reminding us that it is possible to make the heart a place of peace even in uncertain times. The evening closes with an invitation to be 'citizens of the world of interdependence' and to develop what he calls 'the technology of the heart.'

So, please let yourself come back in and get settled. Sit at ease, and let yourself listen—not so much to remember what's said, no quiz at the end, but more to listen in a way that if there's something that resonates as true, that's a reminder of what you know in a deep way, let that nourish you and let the rest go by.

As you will understand, I want to start the evening by reading a list of names. These include Amanda Alvier, Martin Torres, Luis Daniel Wilson, Daryl Roman Burt II, Deirdre Drayton, Alejandro Barrios Martinez, Anthony Luis Loren de Loza, John Carlos Mendez, Kimberly Morris, Stanley Almodovar, Luis Omar Capo, Juan Ramon Gutierro, Eric Ivan, Peter O. Gonzalez, Luis Villalma. Average age, twenty-three, twenty-four. There are fifty-three candles here for those whose lives were taken.

And then a little story, a letter in their honor. Some of you will have heard this in the past.

"Am I gorgeous?" my child asks, drawing the word out like pulled taffy. Gorgeous.

"Yes," I say, "you are."

The pink and teal dress is probably made of some highly flammable material, some chemist's approximation of satin. Pudgy fingers decorated with pink polish trace the sequins on the bodice. "I love this." A giant pair of bubblegum pink wings flap slowly. Little feet dance in sparkly red slippers. "I'm just like a real princess."

"Yes," I say, "you are."

Curly hair, joyful smile, flawless skin. This child is the epitome of beauty. This child, my son. He's four years old and prefers to wear dresses. Maybe it's a phase, maybe not. Even as I wonder how I produced such an angelic looking creature, I wish he would put on some pants and go back to playing with toy tractors. Not because it matters to me—it doesn't—but because I'm already hearing in my head the name-calling he'll face in kindergarten. Many adults already seem a bit disturbed by the dresses. Strangers utter awkward apologies when they realize he's not female. This culture wants little boys to dream only of baseball, trucks, and trains. This culture has no room for little boys who want to be gorgeous.

He picks up a parasol a neighbor gave him and opens it jauntily over his shoulder. "Am I beautiful?" he asks. And I sweep him into my arms and plant a kiss on his cheek. "Always," I say. "Always."

There is something full of tears and holy about being torn open, about remembering those who are young who are killed. The Lakota Sioux say that those who weep and grieve, their tears bring them closer to the gods. And so we start tonight with a vigil. You sat with these candles and with your own breath and your own humanity. We remember and we hold them. Wherever they are, may they find peace. May they rest in an ocean of love. And may those who love them find peace. So difficult.

In building this new community center, we knew it would be used for all kinds of things. I didn't expect the first Monday night I would teach here would be in part a vigil. But it is, because we're human beings and there's birth and there's death and there's joy and sorrow.

In our previous community hall—many of you had been there—the trailers that were all hooked together twenty years ago were falling apart, and the county wouldn't let us use them anymore. They were also inhabited by many other four-footed creatures. We calculated that there had been 2.6 million meditation hours in that building, so it had a very cool vibe, even though it was kind of funky.

I came into this hall last Saturday to teach a first daylong, one of the first events in this beautiful space. And I thought, okay, I'm supposed to say something really special. But actually, I was a little disoriented and uncertain. What's special to say? I don't know. And so I welcomed people and talked some about the core principles of Buddhist teachings—of transformation of the heart and awakening.

And then we sat together. The minute we got quiet and still, like tonight, I thought, "Oh, that's what this is for." And I felt wonderful. It wasn't blah, blah, blah. It was, "Ah, thank you."

What we've created—and it's really collectively from many, many people in our community—is a place of peace. A place of stillness amidst the tragedy of Orlando, amidst the weekly political tornadoes depending which direction you turn, amidst the mystery of birth and death, and the Warriors playoff games.

The Buddhist texts begin: "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are. Return to loving awareness. Return to the spirit of awareness that is free no matter the circumstances. Learn to quiet your mind. Learn to open your heart. Let the heart be still amidst all the turnings of the world."

St. John of the Cross says, "Disquietude is always vanity." Kind of interesting—it's sort of that old Victorian language. But there's something in it to reflect on. Disquietude is always vanity. You're upset, it's an ego trip. Somehow you're caught. I'm not sure how you would translate it in modern jargon.

But there's something as we sit together and quiet ourselves amidst healing and tears—our own healing, not just the healing of the rents in the fabric of the world. Almost everyone who sits quietly has something that needs to be healed in their bodies, in their history, in their psyche, in their hearts—and if none of the above, in their families. We can be sure of that.

And tears—they're called the tears of the way. They're the tears that come because you're paying attention. If we don't have a nation that can weep, then we're really in trouble. If we don't have politicians who can go on television and say, at the same time they're going to start a war or send our military or do something like that—if they're not weeping when they say it, they're not really paying attention.

So you sit among the tears and the healing and the beauty and the sacredness. All of this. And as you quiet yourself, the laws of human life become obvious to us. They're very central to the Buddha's teachings: that as long as greed and hatred and ignorance operate in us and in others, the result will be suffering. As long as dishonesty operates, as long as there is a lack of standing up for what's true and speaking what's true, we'll continue to suffer.

The people you have to lie to own you. The things you have to lie about own you. When your children see you owned, then they are not your children anymore. They are the children of what owns you. If money owns you, they're the children of money. If your need for pretense and illusion owns you, they're the children of pretense and illusion. If your fear of loneliness owns you, they're the children of loneliness. If your fear of truth owns you, they're children of the fear of truth. This is Michael Ventura. We pass these on to one another.

And yet that's not the only way to live, and we also know that as deeply as we know our own name. So we sit quiet and we see the contractions and the fear and the confusion in the heart, but we also see another possibility—that it's possible even in this uncertain world to make the heart a place of peace, to bring our mind to a greater steadiness, to practice forgiveness and compassion in our lives and with one another.

And it doesn't mean everything's going to be okay. It will be okay. Absolutely. It is okay. It just depends on your reference point for it. And it won't be okay. And that's okay.

As Helen Keller says, "Security is mostly a superstition. It does not exist in nature, nor do children as a whole experience it. Avoiding danger is no safer in the long run than outright exposure. Life is either a daring adventure or nothing."

And so we sit in our vulnerability and in not knowing and in the mystery of our life. And in the times that are really beautiful.

I'm about to get married in ten days. My fiancée, Trudy Goodman, with whom I've been together now for the last four or five years—she's just my age. We're both about seventy-one. We've known each other for forty years. We have a great time together.

And we look at each other... We're going to go to Hawaii in about ten days and Ram Dass is going to do a little private ceremony and sprinkle some fairy dust, and we'll be married. That is, as long as neither of us changes our mind and gets talked out of it.

But what's true is that we look at each other and say, here we are, seventy-one. We love each other. We have a beautiful life in many ways. And dot, dot, dot. And dot, dot, dot. Things can change in a moment. Our lives can change, says the Buddha, as quickly as the swish of a horse's tail. Our lives, the people we love—and they will. Our lives and their lives will change.

So how do we steady our heart in the midst of this? And it turns out that it's possible to do so. The first step is simply to stop, to listen deeply, to remember what matters.

I'm going to read again a piece that I shared this last Monday night, just because I'm enamored of it right now, and it reflects something about stillness that I love.

A letter: "Years ago, I started a rigorous six-year academic program in Boston," this man writes, "that required me to work all day during the day, take my classes at night, and do homework on the weekends. On my first summer off, I wanted to get far away from these studies and work with my hands and be close to the earth. So I went to live with an Amish family in Pennsylvania. The experience renewed me, and I decided to do it again next summer.

"That year, a good friend had died, and I drove from Boston to Pennsylvania on a holiday weekend. It was crowded, and what was normally a six-hour trip took more than ten hours. By the time I arrived, just before dusk, I was tearful, anxious, and exhausted. My Amish hosts had delayed their dinner for me. During the meal I tried to act natural but felt full of nerves. My Amish host could tell clearly something was amiss because at the end of dinner he said, 'Come with me.'

"I followed him to their backyard, which bordered an alfalfa field. Although his faith discouraged smoking, the farmer lit a cigarette. Three of his children gamboled about while two others clung to him. The farmer stood without saying a word, looking out over the alfalfa. I did the same. The dark green field was becoming harder to see in the fading light. The sky was peach at the horizon and deep blue higher up. Stars had begun to appear. And then out of the alfalfa rose fireflies. At first a few, but soon there were hundreds. Their pinpricks of light mingled with the stars, heaven and earth meeting in this humble man's backyard. I felt my tears and anxiety leave me. The farmer turned and said, 'That's for you.'"

And here we are sitting with these golden hills and the last bit of light. And it's for you. It's for all of us.

Now when we still ourselves, when we sit quietly at ease or at peace, quiet the mind, it doesn't mean that we can't act. As it says in the Tao Te Ching: "Patient with both friends and enemies, you accord with the way things are. Compassionate in action and thought, you reconcile with all beings. Do you have the patience to wait till your mud settles and the water is clear? Can you remain unmoving till the right action arises by itself?"

And so in some way meditation is healing and attending of ourselves and a return to a sense of presence. And in some way it's also like the in-breath that comes before we breathe out. It is a stillness between the waves of the sea, as the poet says. And then we rise up, but somehow with a a quieter mind and a clearer vision, and more than anything, a listening or a connection to what matters in our own heart. We can respond to the world rather than react. We can tend our world from a place of tenderness and wisdom rather than the body of fear.

Here's a text from the Buddha that I also put online for people in response to Orlando as part of it. Twenty-five hundred, twenty-six hundred years of repetition of these words in the temples:

Others will be cruel. We shall not be cruel. Thus we should direct the heart.
Others will kill. We shall not kill living beings. Thus we should direct the heart.
Others will speak falsehoods. We shall speak the truth. Thus we should direct the heart.
Others will be hateful. We shall be compassionate. Thus we should direct the heart.
Others will be fraudulent. We shall be honest. Thus we should direct the heart.
Others will lack wisdom. We shall cultivate wisdom. Thus we shall direct the heart.

And what it says is this: in this world with its homophobia and racism and environmental crisis, with the kind of troubles of humanity and continuing warfare that are so great, there is a deeper truth. Hatred never ceases by hatred, it goes on, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. And we hear those words and they ring in the heart as something that we know, that we've known for our whole life.

I'm so pleased because on a Monday a few weeks ago, and again a couple months ago, out of concern for all those images of the Syrian refugees—of women and children on the boats arriving on the shores of Lesbos—and our kind of fearful political climate, I asked how many people on this Monday night would be open to taking Syrian refugees, women or children, into their home for a year to help them get settled here. There were three hundred or more people present, and a third of the hands went up.

I took pictures of it. And I sent it to John Kerry and Nancy Pelosi and President Obama, to Dianne Feinstein and a bunch of others, even Paul Ryan—just to float his boat. I haven't yet sent it to Donald Trump. I wrote a few things, but mostly I said: please know that many Americans want to offer their hearts and homes to refugees. Do not let a climate of fear speak for the goodness of the people of this country.

That's really what we also come together for, whether it's in vigil or whether it's in support of one another—to remember what's possible for us as human beings. And now, when things are difficult, is the precise and exact place to do our meditation practices of compassion, loving kindness, steadiness of heart, awareness.

I remember after 9/11, I was getting gas at one of my favorite local gas stations where I know the folks, and they were freaked out because one of the owners was Persian, from Iran, and the other was from Sicily. People were driving through the gas station and shouting racist, anti-Arab, anti-Middle Eastern things, even though they didn't happen to be Middle Easterners. But they looked like them to somebody—some kind of crazy parody of what people were frightened of.

And I went in my attic and I found the one big American flag that I've owned for many years, which had been on my father's coffin because he was a vet—all folded in that triangle that they do. I unfolded it and brought it down and said, "Hang this in your station," which they did. People stopped driving through and shouting things at them. I didn't know why I'd kept that flag exactly, but I was really happy to have it.

So this is the time for us, as much as any time, to quiet ourselves first and then to stand up for our values, to stand up for what really matters.

Gandhi says, "I believe in the unity of all things and therefore I believe that if one person gains, the whole world gains, and that if one person falls, the whole world falls to that extent." He said, "I believe in the power of each person to affect this world."

So don't think that how you live and how you tend your heart doesn't matter. It matters a lot.

I have this handwritten letter that came to me some years ago as part of a whole series of prison projects that I've been connected with—San Quentin and elsewhere. And it says:

"Today I started my 28th year in here. I laughed very hard when I read that you wrote, 'I might as well be a monk.' One of the nicknames they call me is the Monk of Trenton. I wasn't always this way. For the first ten years, I was mean and dangerous. In 1985, I was in ad seg"—which means I was in solitary.

for stabbing a man, and my mentor appeared in the form of a hitman for the Irish mob who was also a yogi. You know, you want your hitman to have some yogic powers, right?

He gave me a copy of the Anapanasati Sutta, which is the mindfulness of breathing text of the Buddha, and convinced me that I could not live my life out of anger and rage. He put me on a hatha yoga routine in place of my martial arts and had me do pranayama and sitting meditation.

My journal records: "When I was young, I wanted to be accepted. After I was accepted, I wanted power. After I had power, I realized that power without wisdom leads to sorrow. After acquiring a small amount of wisdom, I no longer desired to be accepted. I desired solitude. All life is change from within."

And then I had a dream, my journal records. I had a dream of violence so bad I woke up. Upon remembering the dream, I asked, "Is this me? Where did this violence come from?" I'm creating my own suffering. That night I closed the page of that journal with the words, "So ends this part of my life."

Except for the next two years, I didn't come out of my cell except to mop the whole block and all the tiers once a day. I gave away all my property except my law books and my yoga books. I gave myself to pranayama, yoga, and meditation. I followed the breath for a long time and practiced mindfulness. Nothing seemed to be happening.

And then I realized that the objects of my mindfulness began to have texture. By this I mean depth. This texture is deceptive because it arises from memory or imagination at first. And soon the texture reveals clarity. This is a movement to present awareness without the distorting effects of memory or imagination. I don't know if you understand that this is what's supposed to happen, but it's what happened with me.

It was during this period that people started calling me the Monk of Trenton. And for the last fifteen years, he's been a mentor to lots of young men in his prison in New Jersey.

So no matter how bad off you are, don't think that you can't make a difference.

I think of what happened in Orlando. Terrorism is a lack of imagination. And war is a lack of imagination—as if violence is the answer to solve our global problems or our problems with one another. I mean, we know it. I say it often. If you work in preschool or kindergarten, you say, "Use your words," right? "Don't hit that kid with a block." Don't we think maybe some of our world leaders could try the "use your words" thing, that it might work somehow?

But there are cycles of trauma. There are acts of depression and desperation and mental illness. And there's also a kind of despair that people have in areas of depression, or they feel like there's nothing really noble to do with their life. And we all have some calling to do something beautiful.

The greatest peace army that ever existed on earth was in the 1930s in what was then known as the Northwest Frontier of India, but actually is what's now called Afghanistan. It was organized by Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan. Over one hundred thousand men, all devout warriors, all devout Muslims, many from warrior families, vowed to resist British rule without weapons in their hands or violence in their hearts. And they kept their vows despite many being killed, many imprisoned, in great provocation.

Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan was this great big tall Afghani leader who became a really close partner of Gandhi in making peace. And he said, "We have all the warriors in our culture." And Gandhi said, "Good, let's use them. But let's use them in a different way and with a different imagination."

For us too, we have to set our hearts on what really matters in this life. It's so short. Unless you're young, and then it seems forever. But you'll see.

And actually, I'm hopeful. Even though there are many terrible things in the world, there are also, every day, hundreds of millions of acts of goodness—in families and communities, people caring for one another in extraordinary ways. But the bad stuff hits the news, right?

When I was visiting and doing a bit of teaching in Israel and Palestine for peace groups in different places, the thing that was most striking was how many wonderful acts of goodness and groups there were that I met with. The bereaved mothers and the former combatants for peace and the teenage sulha gatherings of Palestinian teenagers and Israeli teenagers meeting together. All kinds of groups doing things that never make the news. One bombing or rock throwing or act of violence and the newspapers are filled. But there are hundreds of groups of people with good hearts working quietly, persistently.

I'm also hopeful because just a few days ago we had a transmission ceremony, a ceremony of empowerment, for twenty-six new teachers trained by Spirit Rock and our sister centers—Insight Meditation Society, Insight LA, New York Insight, and others. It marked the end of a four-year program. Many of them had been practicing for ten, twenty, thirty years. Beautiful, wise people, many from the younger generation as well.

We put up all these silk banners, and we spoke to them about carrying the banner of the Dharma, the banner of truth and compassion, into the world. In the ritual, each one came up one at a time and lit a candle—not candles of vigil and mourning, but candles lit from the Buddha or from Quan Yin, the goddess of compassion and wisdom. They held the candle in their hand and then recited whatever their vow was as they became a teacher.

And their vows were beautiful. "I vow most of all to do my own practice, to keep my virtue, my kindness, my heart tended and pure, so that whoever I encounter and whatever I do, it comes from the deepest place of understanding I can." Many of them included that in their vow. I was really relieved, because you can get kind of intoxicated —"Okay, now I'm a teacher." Yeah, right. Try that at home with your spouse. See how that works with your teenage kid.

So that was part of it. And then there was this quality of refreshment, where people would say, "I will do this with a beginner's mind. I'll remember that the freedom I found can be found by everyone." In Zen they write, "How refreshing, the whinny of a pack horse unloaded of everything." As a poetic image, it's really an image of meditation—of putting down the worries and the burdens. Not that we don't have to tend to them, but finding a spaciousness and an openness that's bigger than the small sense of self.

Some held their candles and said, "I will carry patience and generosity through this world." Others said, "I will teach that the mind is the source of difficulty and also the place of understanding—that the mind and the heart can be trained, that the heart can be awakened." And to have one after another stand up there, their families gathered around—it was a little graduation ceremony; they didn't have mortar boards, but they had other beautiful garments—it was very special.

As they spoke their words, "I will teach that the mind can be trained, the heart can be awakened," I remembered these words of the Buddha: "Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you more than your own mind untrained. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can benefit you and help you more than your own heart and mind well-trained—not even the most loving members of your family."

And so here we come and practice together. We sit, we walk, we begin to pay attention. And it's actually not that easy. You were sitting there and you looked good, I have to say. But I know that in there—sleepiness, restlessness, worries, plans, imaginings, distractions, judgments. A few little judgments of yourself and others. You know how it is; the mind has no pride.

My favorite YouTube videos, if you want to look them up, are the videos of Professor Walter Mischel's experiment with young children and marshmallows—that famous psychological experiment you may know. They take a little child, bring them into a room, sit them in front of a table, and place a small plate before them with one marshmallow on it. Then they say very sweetly to this three or four or five-year-old—let's say four—"This is a marshmallow for you. If you can wait for a little bit and don't eat it, then when I come back, I'll bring you a second marshmallow, and you'll have two of them. But if you eat it, you just get one." Then they say bye-bye and close the door. And of course, the camera is on.

You watch these children, and they're looking really closely at the marshmallow. One kid picks it up and smells it, licks it a little bit, puts it back down. Another child looks around, takes a tiny bite, and puts it down—oh no, no, no. They're hysterical to watch. And it's really meditation, you know. It's really what you're doing. You're sitting here, and part of the time you want to go screaming out of the room. But you sit with your desires and your fears, your longing and your love, your hopes for things and your difficulties.

The river of thoughts goes by with so many opinions and views. You remember that cartoon in the New Yorker I mentioned, with the car crossing the Utah desert, vast landscape, and the roadside sign that says, "Your own tedious thoughts next 200 miles." So you see it, and the river of thoughts goes by. And the river of feelings and emotions flows.

I have this list of 500 feelings that I read on retreat sometimes, starting with the A's: affectionate, ambitious, aggressive, anguished, ambivalent, angry, amused, amorous, aversive, antagonistic, antsy, apathetic, apoplectic, anxious, appreciative, argumentative, adamant, addled, amazed, blissful, brokenhearted, bonkers, bored, bad, belligerent, brave, bottled up, bouncy, buoyant, calm, cheerful, claustrophobic, compassionate, contracted, concerned, curious, crestfallen... it goes on and on and on. And you're sitting there, and that's what's going on—the river of thoughts, the play of feelings.

And you become the one who knows. You become the mindfulness itself, the loving awareness that sees the ten thousand joys and sorrows that make up your life and all human life. You take your seat amidst birth and death, sometimes violence and sometimes peace, sometimes what's beautiful and sometimes what's painful. Because we have it all. You reincarnate as a human being—this is it.

I actually do believe the world is getting better. One of my favorite books is The Better Angels of Our Nature, a wonderful recording of the last few centuries examining the levels of violence, the levels of oppression of women and children, the levels of slavery, and the amount of warfare. And even though it's bad, it's actually getting better. Steven Pinker is the author, a professor at Harvard. Slowly, slowly...

So what are we to do? Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian writer and humanist and visionary and sage, said, "If only it were so simple. If only we simply needed to round up the evil people and get rid of them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through every human heart, and who among us is willing to get rid of a piece of their own human heart?"

So instead we practice, and we become the witness to it with loving awareness, with compassion. We become gradually more fearless. And fearless doesn't mean you don't have fear—you will flunk the course periodically, as I do. It doesn't mean that. It means that when fear comes, you can bow to it and say, "Oh, this is the fearful mind. This is the doubting mind. This is the judging mind. Thank you for your opinion." But you don't have to follow it.

And you more and more trust—not getting rid of the evil in the world in that way, but trust that there is a deeper place of steadiness and peace and love that you can inhabit in your work, in your family, and in the family of the world.

Then you look around, and ask: what to do? This is from a dear friend, Naomi Newman. She wrote this at the end of a retreat she sat up the hill. We now have about 100 people on the LGBT retreat this week—I don't even know if they've been told yet what happened. But this is Naomi at the end of a retreat. She said, "A few days ago, late in the evening, I was sitting quietly in the back of the meditation hall,

And it was raining. And the room was dark except for candles on the altar. And it felt like we were all camped out around a sacred fire. And everyone sat so still, and my breath almost stopped. And I wondered what it was, the feeling. And then I realized, ah, this is contentment. There was nowhere else on earth I wanted to be, no one else I wanted to be with. I was peaceful and deeply silent, and all my struggles had dropped away, and I was content. I felt truly blessed.

And all of a sudden it felt like the blessings couldn't contain themselves, and I began blessing everyone in the room one by one. Their backs or the backs of their heads. And even the ones I couldn't see so well, I would shoot some blessings around a chair or into a leg or a hand until I got everyone in the room. And we sat in a sea of blessings until the bell rang, and I've been smiling since then.

And so you sit, and in the quieting of the mind and the opening of the heart, you come into community and connection with yourself and all those around. And then you get up. And as she said, I've been smiling since then.

It doesn't mean—she was on a long retreat, it may have taken her a while. It's just like when you read Nelson Mandela's autobiography and you see this magnificent human being coming out of 27 years of prison with such graciousness and forgiveness and compassion, changing the imagination of Africa and the world. But it wasn't so for all 27 years. Like the monk of Trenton, he had to work out some things too.

So it's not that all your sittings are going to be happy and blessed. You take what you get. It's your humanity that you work with. But it is possible for us. As the Buddha said, if it were not possible for you to awaken the heart and mind, I wouldn't teach you to do so. But just because it is possible for you, I offer these practices and trainings.

So you quiet yourself. You listen. And then you go back and find your way to express —those who held their candles up and said, I vow to practice patience, or compassion, or to listen deeply. That's my vow.

Here is Laurie Anderson, kind of a poem:

In the Tibetan map of the world, the world is a circle. And at the center, there's an enormous mountain guarded by four gates. And when they draw a map of the world, they draw the map in sand, and it takes months. And then when the map is finished, they say some prayers, erase it, and throw the sand into the nearest river.

Last fall, the Dalai Lama came to New York to do a two-week ceremony called the Kalachakra, which is a prayer to heal the earth. And woven into these prayers were a series of vows that he asked us to take. And before I knew it, I had taken a vow to be kind for the rest of my life. And I walked out of there and I thought, for the rest of my life? What have I done? This is a disaster.

And I was really worried. Had I promised too much? Not enough? I was really in a panic. They had come from Tibet for the ceremony, and they were walking around Midtown in their new brown shoes, and I went up to one of the monks and said, can you come with me to have a cappuccino right now and talk?

And so we went to this little Italian place. He had never had coffee before, so he kept talking faster and faster. And I kept saying, look, I don't know whether I promised too much or too little. Can you help me, please?

And he was being really practical. He said, look, don't limit yourself. Don't be so strict. Open it up. He said, the mind is a wild white horse, and when you make a corral for it, make sure it's not too small. And another thing: when your house burns down, just walk away.

When I read that sentence and I think of Tibet—when your house burns down, just walk away.

And another thing: keep your eyes open.

And one more thing: find the right road, because it's finally time to go home.

So I'm grateful for your attention, and that we got to sit together as we did tonight—to sit in vigil and to hold all those named and all those unnamed in our hearts. Yes, there are these fifty-three, but there are also the ones in Syria and Chicago, in Burma and New York, and in our own communities. The world really asks of us that we become citizens of this world in the deepest sense—citizens of the world of interdependence with the trees and the oceans and the animals, the other animals beside us that share it, and the peoples of this world.

It's time for humanity to develop inwardly, just as we've developed the great outer gifts of technology—to develop the technology of the heart. It's really come to be time. Nobody knows how old humanity is, but we know it's old enough to do better somehow.

And as we move through this blessed and beautiful and troubled world, may we each find our own vow to be a beacon of peace, a fearless carrier of respect and loving kindness for all that we meet, a teller of truth, a voice of justice, a protector of those who are vulnerable or targeted. And may the wisdom and integrity and compassion that is your true nature be your guide—be our guide—to how we live with one another.

I have one more little story for you before you go. We entered the Mayo Clinic for an evaluation of my husband's ALS—Lou Gehrig's disease, which often can happen pretty quickly, in the course of a couple of years: paralysis and death. As we did, we heard a pianist playing in the crowded atrium and realized it was the first song we had ever danced to, and the song we danced to at our wedding. My husband Randall put down his briefcase filled with doctors' reports and test results and took me in his arms and danced me all over that floor.

When it was over and folks were applauding, we became aware of how many people gathered there were in wheelchairs or walkers. We suddenly realized that in that spontaneous moment of celebration, we had been dancing on behalf of the life and love that lived in each person gathered together in that place. From the moment we looked around the room, lined with wheelchairs and walkers, we found ourselves thinking of the pool of Bethesda. We imagined Jesus asking us, "Do you want to be healed?" And we thought we then heard him say, "Then pick up your feet and dance."

It's beautiful to sit in this new space with you as it gets dark on the summer evening, and to share both the vigil and the practice of compassion and hope and loving awareness in the midst of it all.

Thank you for coming. I'm really grateful.

CHAPTER 73

Vastness and Love

Jack Kornfield · 1h01

> In this heartfelt dharma talk, Jack Kornfield reflects on the full spectrum of human experience—from his recent marriage to Trudy Goodman to helping with the cremation of a dear friend. He explores how we navigate life's inevitable cycles of birth and death, joy and sorrow, using the traditional framework of sīla-samādhi-paññā (virtue, concentration, and wisdom) as a rudder through uncertain waters.
> Kornfield illuminates how virtue is not about rigid morality but about shifting our identity from reactive patterns to loving awareness. He shares the remarkable story of Amish forgiveness following a tragic school shooting, demonstrating how living with integrity transforms our sense of self. Through the metaphor of the poison tree, he describes three levels of working with difficulty: cutting it down, fencing it off with compassion, or transforming it into medicine for awakening.
> The talk culminates in an exploration of our true nature as consciousness itself—vast, loving awareness that transcends the body and the small sense of self. Drawing on poetry from Jane Hirshfield, Mary Oliver, and Diane di Prima, along with the Buddha's final instruction to "make of yourself a light," Kornfield invites practitioners to rest in the spaciousness that holds all of life's changes. He reminds us that awakening is not about avoiding suffering but using it to open the heart, returning to the marketplace with "bliss-bestowing hands" to serve all beings.

Please let yourself get settled and quiet.

As a way to collect the energy in here—because it's interesting, it's kind of bright and bouncy, the sound—I want us to do a little chant as a way to settle after conversation. The chant is one syllable. It's a seed syllable in Sanskrit that's called the syllable of wisdom because it's described as the first sound in life and the last sound. But most importantly, it's the seed syllable of wisdom because it's the sound of opening or letting go, the seed sound ah.

Let us sing ah together for a little bit as a way to collect our energy present and see what happens.

Ah...

That was nice. You sing good. And I don't know what I like better—the harmony when people start to sing the chord, or the silence afterward. That's also quite beautiful.

I'm glad you got to say hello to somebody. That feels important. There's something special for me tonight coming back to teach on just the second Monday night I've done. I've done a couple of other teachings in here since this space opened, but it feels very special to be here. And I'm so grateful that you've come as well.

I'm also in this beautiful time of my life, because as I said, I've recently gotten married to Trudy Goodman, who is a colleague and friend—I've known her for forty-three years. She's someone I also teach with. I knew her when she was a feminist, and she called herself Trudy Goodwoman for a while. Then I said, "Goodwoman, isn't that limiting? Why not Trudy Goodbeing?" She did that for a year or two.

We've already had four weddings. We've got a couple more to go. We started with a little private ceremony with Ram Dass in Hawaii. He married us in his garden, and it was just a couple of people—Ram Dass and a couple of others. It was such a beautiful blessing. Then we had ceremonies for our families, people in our community, on the East Coast. And the nice thing about it is that we're really happy. Everybody who sees us is happy, and they kind of shower us with their joy and happiness, and we get happier. It's like some virtuous cycle of deliciousness. So that's been going on all summer.

And it's not, of course, the only thing going on in the world, as we know.

This morning I helped with the cremation of a very close friend, Gail Seneca, who was a big part of this community and who died last Monday unexpectedly at age sixty-two. We did a lot of prayers and blessings, wrapped her in prayer flags, did all these things, and then she was cremated and burned and turned into ash.

I walked out and—you know, death is so mysterious. Here's this person, including you, by the way, in case you think it only happens to other people. Here's this person that you know and love, and they're in that form, and then they're just not there anymore. It's so clear that she's not that body, that corpse.

I came out and there were those beautiful wispy clouds today. And then I looked, and there was this incredible bush with purple flowers. It was like the earth was saying, "You know, here we are in this mystery."

And you can't really name it or hold on to it, but appreciate every moment of it.

Actually, I met Michael Murphy, who's an old friend, the founder of Esalen. He's in his mid-eighties. I met him in the summer, some time ago, and I said, "You know, are you down at Esalen these days much?" He said no. I said, "So what are you doing these days?" He said, "Well, Warriors games and funerals." That was his answer. When you're eighty-five, that's kind of the territory of it.

And then my daughter, who's thirty-one, went this weekend to a wedding. It was the fifteenth wedding she's been to in three years because her whole cohort of people in their late twenties and early thirties are getting married, and now they're all starting to have babies. It's just like watching the seasons turn as we start to move toward fall. This is the cycle of our humanity. And here we are.

There's an old Chinese poet who wrote something like—I wish I'd brought it with me—he said, "When I was young, I used to talk about the sorrows of the world to pretend that I had some profound nature and something important to say. And now I'm old and I've passed through all those difficulties, and I just smile when I see a flower and love the people walking by." Very, very simple.

So we come together in a temple like this. We're in a meditation class, really. And there's a kind of question for us about human possibility. What do we do with this human life that's given to us? Because not only is there birth and death that I'm talking about, but there's also politics—we won't go any further, but it's there, right? And there's hunger and injustice and warfare. And there's also incredible creativity and millions of acts of generosity on the planet every single day. How do we guide our life as human beings in this human incarnation?

If we don't understand, it's easy to get lost. And there are certain questions that can't be answered by Google. How do we navigate? Because without some sense of wisdom, some sense of understanding of this human predicament, this human life, we can move through life like a boat without a rudder, getting thrown around by the blessings and the curses and the problems and the things. It's very easy to get reactive—in family, that's why they call it nuclear family; in politics; in all kinds of ways. We all know this. And we get lost in that.

And yet who we are—and part of the reason I started with that particular guided meditation—who we are... There I was, sitting this morning with Gail's body. You are not this physical body. You inhabit it, you were born into it, you got issued a body basically. Okay, try this incarnation, see how you like it, what there is to learn. But you are the spirit that came into that body and will leave that body. You are consciousness itself.

When you're caught and identified and reactive to the various things that happen, when you're in the smaller sense of self—it's called in Buddhist teachings the small sense of self—you know what that means intuitively, don't you? It's also called the body of fear: when you're frightened and worried and contracted and reactive. You get caught in things, and basically you suffer, and you also can create suffering for the people around you.

But there's also a way—when we talk about a boat with a rudder—there's also a way to navigate the joys and sorrows of life more wisely. In the Buddhist teachings, one of the summary descriptions of the teachings in Sanskrit or Pali is sila-samadhi-paññ̃a, which means virtue, steadiness, and wisdom. These are seen as the practices, the understandings, the ways to move through human life.

Let me describe them a little, because they also speak to this shift of identity. I'll see if I can weave these together in some way.

So virtue is the first practice that allows us to move through the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows, creating well-being and happiness for ourselves and others. And it's not about morality or the Ten Commandments and "thou shalt" whatever. Generally, when people say "thou shalt," there's some little voice saying, "You're not going to tell me what to do." So I don't think it works that way. It's much more about...

what brings us happiness and who we think we are. And in the simplest way, it's really very practical. It's hard to sit and meditate after a day of killing and stealing and lying. It doesn't work very well. You can't quiet your mind. You don't sleep well. First of all, it doesn't affect your body and mind in a good way to cause harm to yourself and cause harm to others.

But more than that, when you live with integrity, when you speak what's true, when you act in ways that don't cause harm to yourself or other people, it changes your sense of yourself. Because when you have that as a rudder, as a center—when you undertake the training or the practice to not cause harm through your speech or your actions to yourself or others—then when difficult things come and you remember that, instead of reacting, something shifts. Instead of being caught in "I'm angry" or "I need this" or "I'm addicted" or "I want this," it's as if who you are is bigger than those forces.

Your identity shifts from being caught in those things to being more like what we did in the meditation tonight—becoming the loving awareness that says, "Okay, I could get angry about this, or I could be upset, or I could hurt somebody because I feel so hurt, or I need this fix, whatever it is. But there's a recognition: this is not healthy for me or another. This would cause harm to me or another." And so you shift your sense of yourself from being the one who's reactive to becoming the loving awareness that says, "You know, I don't think so. I don't think this is the way to live."

When you sit and meditate, it's not to have some particular state, but to quiet yourself enough that your conscience and your wisdom and your understanding can show itself to you. And you know how great it is to talk to somebody who has integrity, who speaks the truth. How beautiful it is to be with somebody who has that kind of integrity.

And then of course it gets more wonderful. Remember a couple of years ago, there was one of the many terrible mass shootings in America—the man who went into an Amish schoolhouse in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and shot ten little schoolgirls, five of whom died. This was in the news; everybody heard this story. Within hours of the shooter entering that one-room school and shooting the ten girls, killing five, and then himself, the Amish community forgave the killer and his family. News of the instant forgiveness stunned the outside world almost as much as the incident itself did. Some worried that hasty forgiveness was emotionally unhealthy. But members of the Amish community began offering words and hugs of forgiveness when the blood was barely dry on the schoolhouse floor.

A grandmother laughed when the reporter asked if this forgiveness was orchestrated. "You mean that some people actually met and thought we had a meeting to plan this forgiveness?" As the father of a slain daughter explained, "Our forgiveness was not our words. It is simply what we do now." Members of the community visited the gunman's widow at her home with food and flowers and hugged members of his family. There were few words, but it was primarily the hugs, the gifts, and the mere presence—an act of grace that communicated Amish forgiveness. Of the seventy-five people at the killer's burial, about half were Amish, including parents who had buried their own children a day before. And Amish people contributed to a fund for the shooter's family.

You start to hear this and you realize: what does it mean to live with a core of integrity, with your values clear, to not cause harm even if others do? As Booker T. Washington said, "Never let them pull you down so low as to hate them"—to not let your own heart be poisoned. And in the Dhammapada, in the beautiful verses of the Buddha, it says: "The scent of jasmine, rose bay, and sandalwood travels only as far as the wind, but the perfume of virtue rises even to the heavens."

This is the first piece of how to live wisely. And you can't do it without quieting yourself and realizing that all the reactions are not who you are. Who you are is wiser and bigger and more loving than that.

Then the second—samādhi—really means quieting the mind so that you can listen, so that you can see clearly, so that you can understand. And you quiet yourself not so much through effort. "I'm going to quiet myself now. Let's see, how many minutes do I have to do this?" We used to do that actually in the monastery. You know how it is with young guys—competitive meditation. "I can sit longer than you and not move." You get very concentrated, but then it passes. It's not about that.

It's something much more tender. It's a willingness to step outside of our social identity and our busyness identity, which we all have—texting and our screens and all the things that we tend to, which is all fine. But also to walk in the mountains, to sit quietly, to fill the bird feeder or walk the dog or play with a child or just sit quietly, to listen to a piece of music, and mostly just to stop and listen to your own heart. To have a conversation with your heart in some way, and to find your way to quiet your mind.

Because when you do, then you can see clearly. Then your conscience speaks to you. Then your wisdom body, that loving awareness, is accessible to you. And without it, the mind gets stirred up—like mud in water. You can't see clearly.

And when you stop, the mud settles a little bit, and then you can see.

Here's a poem from Jane Hirshfield, a wonderful poet and friend in Mill Valley, about tenderness and inspiration, and how to quiet yourself:

Think of those Chinese monks' tales: years of struggling in the zendo, and then a clink while sweeping up of stone on stone, and poof—enlightenment.

Emily Dickinson's wisdom: "Truth in Circuit Lies." Or C. Grant's Common Birds and How to Know Them, New York, Scribner's, 1901:

The approach must be by detour, advantage taken of rock, tree, mound, and brush. But if without success this way, use artifice. Throw off all stealth's appearance, watchfulness. Look guileless, a loiterer, purposeless. Stroll on, not too directly gazing at the bird, avoiding any gaze too steadfast. Or failing still in this, give voice to sundry whistles—chirp. Your quarry may stay on to answer you.

It's lovely, from the birding book, to say you don't go grasp the bird. You wander about with a kind of sidelong glance. Oh, there's a little bird over there—but you don't really let them know that you're looking.

Or be briefly tried but stymied, give it up, do something else. Leave the untrappable thought, go walking. Ideas buzz the air like flies. Return to sit. A fox trots by with a cream-dipped tail and red fire legs doused watery brown. Enlightenment, wrote one master, is an accident—though certain efforts make you accident-prone.

There's something about us as human beings, especially in modern times, that needs to find ways to still ourselves, to quiet ourselves—for the sake of our children, for the sake of the earth that needs to be listened to, for the sake of one another and all the differences that make us up. Because no amount of outer technology—nanotechnology, space technology, biotechnology, computers, this whole vast amazing development we have—is going to stop continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing destruction of the environment, continuing tribalism. Those arise out of the human heart. And the outer developments that are so remarkable now have to be matched by inner human development.

To do that means we have to learn to listen, to hear our interdependence, to feel our connection with life, to see with clarity, to listen to conscience—because there's a lot of other... I think the technical Sanskrit word is BS that's out there. You know what I'm saying. And so that too becomes important to us.

To live a life that's wise requires a non-harming virtue. It requires a way of quieting ourselves. And when we do, what happens is that we get bigger—like we did in that meditation, at least for those of you for whom it was the right practice tonight. There are lots of other practices, so if it wasn't, do something else. But you step out of the small sense of self, the body of fear, all these thoughts and worries, and you realize there is a kind of vastness that, as the mind quiets, allows you to see—not just caught up in your own personal stuff, but something bigger. The turning of the seasons. The love that's big enough to hold it all.

And then, of course, it gets more difficult, because you go to wisdom, and wisdom is really the question of mystery. Things are impermanent. Standing there in Mill Valley by the crematorium oven with this body and the Buddha's words: it seems that although we thought ourselves permanent, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not.

This is one of the big mysteries. In fact, I think it's in the Mahabharata—there's a conversation, maybe between Krishna and Arjuna, and they ask, what are the great mysteries of the earth? And Krishna answers: one of the great mysteries is that people can see others die all around them and still think it won't happen to them.

Things are impermanent, and they're uncertain. My teachers loved uncertainty. My teacher Ajahn Chah, whatever questions we would ask—profound or mundane—regularly he would smile and say, "It's uncertain, isn't it?" Especially if you had a really pressing question. It was a beautiful thing. It just opened the gates to realize that we don't actually know. Some things we know.

I have this guest card, plastic, that I got at a hotel in a developing country. It says: "Dear Guests, It is our pleasure to provide you with a stamp postcard for sending out to your loved ones around the world. Please leave the postcard at the desk or to receptionist after filling up the address and your greetings. We will be glad to mail for you. Note: Due to a poor postage system, your postcard may take some time to reach, or even may not always reach your address. Hotel Management."

That's kind of human life, really. It's just how it is. There's ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, birth and death, sweet and sour. Duality is woven in this way, and this is what we get in human incarnation.

So how do we work with this? Here's a little more meditative and kind of wisdom strategy. It says, being rather practical, that there are different strategies for releasing ourselves when we're caught in the small self and the body of fear. The metaphor used is of a poison tree. There's a tree whose berries are poison. The first strategy is to cut the tree down so nobody gets poisoned—you don't eat the berries, you just get rid of it.

That's one level. Then the next strategy says, but trees are beautiful. We need them to exchange carbon dioxide and oxygen. Trees have all kinds of uses—let's not cut it down. Let's just put a little fence around it with a sign that says, "Don't eat the berries. They're poison for human beings." That way we're not harming the tree, and no one else is harmed. More gracious.

And then there's the person who wanders along and says, "Oh, I've been looking for a tree like this! These are the berries that, if you take them and grind them up and add a little sulfur and whatever the right ingredients are, become the medicine that cures some of the most difficult diseases of the world." This poison becomes something of value.

So that's the metaphor. How does mindfulness and shift of identity work with it?

At the first level—the cutting down part—you have things arise, as we all do: your fears, the repeated stories, the self-judgment, the anger, the addictive patterns, the kinds of delusion and confusion, the prejudices that are part of your life. And of course, the first step is simply to see them. Just like seeing the tree, you need to actually recognize, "Hmm, these things may not have my best interest in mind, these thoughts.

They're actually not on my side. They're old habits." You may know who put them there or where you got them, but they arise and they're painful. They cause you suffering; they cause others suffering.

So first, like the Buddha under the tree of enlightenment, when all the difficulties arose—personified as Mara, the Indian archetype of all the difficult energies of life—the Buddha would say, "Oh, is that you again, Mara? Mara in the form of fear, Mara in the form of anger, Mara in the form of greed and grasping, Mara in the form of self-judgment. Oh, I see you, Mara."

Sometimes all that's needed is to say, "I see you," and who you are becomes the loving awareness—you're not so caught anymore. Does that make sense? That's partly why we meditate, to free ourselves.

But then sometimes, at this level, you may actually need to cut the damn tree down.

I'm remembering this story. Some decades ago, I was teaching at Esalen, and one of my teachers and friends, Zen Master Seung Sahn—a Korean Zen Master who had a big center in Providence and centers all around the country—came to visit. Among his students was a couple I was close to. They both became his devoted students. Then they went through a really messy breakup and divorce.

The man was just brokenhearted because this woman had left him for some other young guy. The Zen master was very tender and compassionate, consoling him during that breakup when they were all there together.

Then the Zen master went away, traveled back to Korea and around the world, and didn't come back for almost a year—nine or ten months. When he returned, we all came to greet him. I was back there again, including this fellow whose wife had left him. The master looked at him and said, "How are you?" You could see his face was morose; he was still in the middle of grieving.

The master said, "Oh, I brought you a present." He reached in his bag and pulled out this beautiful mala with beads of Kuan Yin on it. "Here, give me your hands." He placed it in his hands, then hauled off and smacked him across the face and shouted, really loud, "Let her go!"

We were all stunned—our jaws dropped open. I'm not saying this is good therapy or anything like that. But you know what? It worked.

There was just a shift. It was like, "Okay already. Enough self-pity. Enough grieving—it's fine. It's time to just put it down." It was as if he said, "You're bigger than that. Who you are is not just that. It's not all that identification and all the tears."

Who you are is much bigger than that. And he could see it. It was kind of astonishing.

So that's the first level, where you recognize what's there, and in recognizing it, you let it go. Or at times, as in twelve-step work, you simply say, "I'm not going to drink anymore." You just don't do it.

Then the next level, where you put the fence around the tree, is the level of compassion—in which you see that everything deserves compassion. Every single thing.

I was visiting Ram Dass in June. Ram Dass is a very dear friend. He has this giant altar in his living room. He lives in this house in Maui, in his wheelchair, where he's been for seventeen years since his big stroke. He can still talk—with some aphasia, but he can speak pretty well. And he's just very, very loving.

On this altar are pictures of his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, and Ramana Maharshi, and Ananda Mayi Ma, who was one of the greatest saints of the last century in India. You know, this Baba and that Swami, and images of the Buddha and Ganesh and Saraswati—it's a polyamorous altar, basically. But also on this altar, with all these pictures of Meher Baba and all these great beings, is a picture of John Boehner and one of Dick Cheney. And Ram Dass says, "If you're going to practice love, you've got to stretch a little bit."

James Baldwin says, "Love takes off the masks." It really asks something much deeper than the superficial—to look with the eyes of compassion at every single being. And then the poison starts to get transformed into medicine, in some way, when you bring that kind of tenderness and care.

And if you want to turn it into an even deeper medicine: in Tibet, they pray for suffering. "May I be granted enough suffering that the great heart of compassion will awaken in me." Bring it on, baby, in some way. That's a tough prayer. It is.

The goal in spiritual life isn't to avoid suffering. Anybody succeed at that, by the way? Raise your hand. I'm just checking. The goal is to use suffering as medicine—to transform your heart and to remember who you really are.

There's a poem from Deena Metzger, a wonderful friend. Some of you may have seen the image—this was back in the seventies or eighties—of this woman who had a mastectomy and had this huge dragon tattoo across her body. And there she is standing with one breast and the dragon up her body. Quite wonderful, a beautiful being. She says, "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep. And we will have rain, and we will begin again."

There's something in her poem that says: show me the sufferings of the world, and I will transform them into freedom. And that's really the third turning of the medicine.

You do it through this shift of identity, where you realize that what you face and what you go through is not so personal. It's part of the human journey.

In this new book that I'm just finishing, I tell the story of this woman, Whitney Williams, who went back to the Midwest to take care of her parents in rural Illinois. Her dad was in the early middle stages of Alzheimer's, and her mother had broken her hip and was having trouble. Her only sibling was her brother, and all he wanted to do was not get involved—he'd just call his sister and say, "You take care of it." You know that kind of family dynamic.

So she took a month off from work. The house was in shambles. Her father couldn't care for himself very well. Her mother's fracture was still healing. She knew they couldn't stay there, but it was her childhood home. It was her parents. And she was facing the reality of their aging and their demise.

So she walked up on a hillside nearby that she'd known growing up, and she just started to weep—because she didn't want to lose her childhood home. She didn't want her parents to get sick and die, or have to leave their house either.

And then she looked out. There was this vast landscape—the little town, the farms, the cumulus clouds, the dotted clusters of other farms in the distance. And somehow she felt held more in the vastness than when she was inside the house. She could instinctively feel how everything had its seasons.

Arriving, departing, flourishing, struggling, coming into being, fading away. And she began to reflect: how many other people are in this same predicament?

As she breathed more with this kind of ease, her mind opened further. She realized, "I'm not the only one with aging parents. There are seven million others this very day in this country." The space opened, and she felt somehow more trust. We can do this. We know how to do this.

With this spacious heart, we remember a bigger picture. Even though illness strikes, even though parents are dying, even though some form of loss comes—and it will come—we can also recognize that it's part of the rhythms of life. Among the multitude of humans, many like us are experiencing loss or pain or change or needing renewal. And the world keeps turning. The farmers growing food, the markets trading, the musicians playing. We live amidst a great, ever-changing paradox. Breathe, relax, one day at a time.

Whitney realized all of these things and cried again, her heart tender—this time tears of relief. Somehow we move from our separateness to sense both the vastness and the love that propels life itself, and that we are a part of it.

I'll tell this story briefly, because I've got other miles to go here tonight, of my friend Salam, who was in a prison in the Middle East. He'd been a journalist and was imprisoned and tortured. He almost died from his torture at one point. He said, "I did die, actually."

I met him because he was doing hospice work. I said, "What are you doing here in the Bay Area doing hospice work?" He said, "Well, I like to sit with people and let them know that it's perfectly safe." I thought, well, that's interesting. Tell me.

He said, "I was in this prison on and off for a long time—beaten, tortured. And then one day, even my medical records say that I died. This guard, I'd done something that angered him, and he was kicking and beating me, blood coming out." He said, "And I floated out of my body, as people do in accidents." Even in meditation it's possible—you can train yourself to have out-of-body experiences. You know you're not just the body.

He said, "I was floating on the ceiling watching the boot kick the body and all this, but it was very peaceful." He said, "And then something really interesting happened." I sat up. "Oh?" He said, "Yeah, then it was as if a bubble popped. I was no longer located as a self witnessing, observing this. That sense of self burst open, and I became everything. I was the green paint flecking on the prison wall. I was the goat you could hear outside on the hillside. I was the boot kicking the body. I was that body lying there."

He said, "This immense joy came to me, because I knew that who I was, was everything. I was life, and I could never die." When he came back in a broken body at the bottom of the cell, he healed and eventually got out. He said, "I couldn't fight for one side or another anymore." He had been of one particular group. He said, "I married a woman from the opposite side. And that's the closest thing I could come to saying: this is what I understood."

You are loving awareness itself. It's born into you—spirit, consciousness, this mystery within. Oh, what's scientific about saying the brain makes consciousness? Well, that's a sort of small story. Joseph Campbell, the great mythologist, said you either need a big story or no story at all when you're facing the mystery.

You're loving awareness.

When the Buddha was walking down the road after his enlightenment—at least as this story is told, and we're just telling stories, right?—a man came up to him and said, "Wow, you seem like this amazing being." The Buddha was a handsome prince, and obviously he was in a good mood after his enlightenment. The man asked, "Are you some kind of wizard or magician?"

No. Are you a guru? No, not exactly. Well, you know... Are you enlightened? Buddha said, no. Interesting. Are you a god? No. Are you a man? No. What are you? And the Buddha looked back and said, "I am awake." And the word Buddha means awakened.

So he wasn't claiming anything—I'm this or I'm that. What I am is awareness itself, which is what you are. And you know this. You've walked in the mountains, or you know it from when you gave birth to a child, or you sat in that mystery with someone as they died. Or when you took peyote or some other substance—come on, let's fess up, right? Or when you heard that amazing piece of music, or were making love. You all know it because it's true. It's absolutely true. It's your nature.

And we become reduced. In fact, I think it was Alan Watts who said the mind is actually a reducing valve. The mystery is so extraordinary and around us all the time. I was looking at those flowers this morning after the cremation, and I could have just drowned in the purple of those flowers. What is a flower? Why does the earth—the Japanese poet says the earth laughs in flowers. How can it be that it makes all these colored flowers? Yes, there's evolution and I believe in that and all of that, but it didn't have to do that, you know. This is really extravagant. The earth deals in extravagance. It's so mysterious.

And we wake up to it. Little children have it, this sense of mystery. In Bali they say that the people closest to the gods are newborns and old people. The newborns because they've just come in and so they're, as Emerson said, trailing clouds of glory and seeing everything anew. And the old people because they know they're headed back to that mystery. The people farthest from the gods are middle-aged people with mortgages. But what's true is that that's not who you are. Who you are is something much vaster and much more beautiful than that.

So a couple of poems about death. This is again from Jane Hirshfield. She writes:

The dead do not want us dead. Such petty errors are left for us, the living. Nor do they want our mourning. No gift to them, not rage, not weeping. Return one of them, any one of them to the earth and look. Such foolish skipping, such telling of bad jokes, such feasting —even a cucumber, even a single aniseed, a feast.

There's something so blessed about every moment and every taste on this earth.

And this from Diane di Prima, old friend and Buddhist poet, for Zen Master Suzuki Roshi of San Francisco Zen Center:

After you died, I dreamed you were at my apartment and we ate soba together, you giggling and I slurped a lot. And you said, "Don't tell them I'm not dead," and pointed down the street toward the Zen center.

I don't want them to bother me. We laughed and drank the broth, and I kept that promise. I think they still don't know.

So we're here in this mystery. And it's not about knowledge—it's really about wonder. Emptiness and fullness. And love.

I was talking to a wise elder recently, and one of the things she does with her life—she's been a therapist and healer for a long time—is she's worked often over the years with people whose children have died. Which is both a tremendous and terrible loss, almost unspeakable in some way, and yet it also happens. In the old days it happened all the time. You had twelve children because you hoped that six survived.

We sort of adopted some families from Laos, my family, because I can speak Lao and Thai and some of those languages. And the first family that we adopted for many years had four kids—and these were the four that were left of their eight children. That's how it used to be. But now we can hardly imagine it.

But this elder works with them. And she said one of the most important things that we do, when we get to it in the work, is have them talk to their child. She said it's astonishing the kind of intelligence and understanding that they hear from the spirit of that child to guide them. "Mommy, Daddy, I don't want you to live your life just weeping. I want you to get..." very specific things.

I'm not saying you need to believe this. But I'm saying it because we're in a mystery and nobody can really tell you. But over thousands of years and millions of people and vastly different cultures, there is an understanding that who we are is not limited to this body. And something in you knows that it's true as well.

In the earliest teachings of the Buddha, he says, "I am awake. This is what I am. I am awareness itself. I am compassionate, loving awareness." And then he says, "You too, oh nobly born, you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember that this is your birthright." And when you remember it, it turns out that that awareness which is who you are is commensurate with—perhaps that's not the right language—is composed of love. They're really not different, because it's the same thing. It's what consciousness is itself.

I remember being in a long retreat where I was doing all these samādhi practices and jhānas, dissolving into love and light, my body disappearing, things like that. And then I was sitting and I went outside. It was a kind of clear night, and I could experience starlight almost like it was touching my body. And then I realized those photons from the stars—just a little scientific thing—they were an expression of love, and that the stars were actually making love with one another by sending out their light to the other stars. I mean, that's just a poem for you, but it was, you know, what do they call them, mystical experiences or something like that. It was very cool.

Test it in yourself. When your identity shifts from the small sense of self—me, my body, my things, my worries, my fears, my hopes, my grasping—and you sense the vastness, the turning of the seasons, the rhythm of birth and death, of joy and sorrow, of gain and loss. When you sense this and breathe into it and rest in that vastness as we started, see whether it's also true that the heart becomes lighter and as expansive as the mind. In Sanskrit, mind and heart are the same word: citta. They both open at the same time.

There's the story of a young monk who'd struggled and struggled to get enlightened, an old Zen story I haven't told for a decade or two. He struggles, but it didn't work very well. And then there was a rumor that there was this wise old master who lived in a hut or a cave way at the top of the mountains. So he says, "Enough of this hard training in the Zen monastery. I'm going to go find that old hermit who's supposed to be the real deal up there." You know, like the guru in the cave—maybe he will help me. And so he starts trudging up the mountains, walking in these very high mountains. He gets up and up and up and up. And then he sees an old man coming down.

Carrying a big bundle. And he stops the old man and says, "Do you know anything about this old man that lives in the cave?" The old man's face lights up, and the seeker realizes it could be him. The old man says, "Why do you ask?" And the young monk says, "Well, I've been struggling for ten years, meditating, trying to get enlightened. I've come to find an answer. Do you know anything about this enlightenment, old man?"

The old man looks him in the eyes and then just drops the bundle that he's carrying.

And you know how it works in these Zen stories—for some reason, it's very easy. Of course, he did ten years of heart training first. But the old man drops the bundle, and the young man climbing the mountain says, "That easy? You just let it go." And he has this beautiful, liberating moment. All that I sought is just about letting go—not trying to get enlightened, not trying to be something. Just be. Just be the awareness, the love itself.

So then he stands there and turns back to the old man and says, "So now what?" It's a question, isn't it?

And the old man reaches down, picks up the bundle, and walks off toward town.

The reason this story is told with this particular rhythm is that this is the story of the bodhisattva—of the being who remembers who they are and then enters the marketplace with bliss-bestowing hands. Comes down from the mountain or the temple, or out from your walk by the ocean, or whatever nourishes you and reminds you of the vastness, and then brings a gift to your workplace, to your family, to political life, to the environment. Because it's all part of you. And you have something beautiful to give because you know that who you are is that too. That you are loving awareness. You are connected with it all. It is your true nature. You have gold in you. You have light in you.

And you know, when you meet somebody who has a lot of light, you know what that's like. I don't mean some sort of woo-woo type light. I mean, because children have it—on a good day anyway, right? That's the way children are. There's just this beautiful light that shines out of people's eyes. That's what was born into you.

Here is another poem from Jane Hirschfield, called "Lighthouse." Just a few lines:

Most lights are made to see by, this one to be seen.
Its vision sweeps its one path like an aged monk raking a garden, his questions long ago answered.
Far off, night grazing horses, breath scented with oat grass and fennel, step through the light, disappear,
step through it, disappear again.

The sweep of the lighthouse.

And here's the complementary poem from Mary Oliver, called "The Buddha's Last Instructions":

Make of yourself a light, said the Buddha before he died.
I think of this every morning as the east begins to tear off its many clouds of darkness, to send up the first signal—a white fan streaked with pink and violet, even green.
An old man, he lay down between two sala trees, and he might have said anything, knowing it was his final hour.
Around him the villagers gathered and stretched forward to listen.
No doubt he thought of everything that had happened in his difficult life.
Slowly, beneath the branches, he raised his head.
He looked into the faces of that frightened crowd.
Make of yourself a light.

So the old man walks with his bundle back into town with bliss-bestowing hands. He brings a tenderness and a compassion for everybody who's forgotten who they really are. He teaches vastness. He rests in openness.

Refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all was lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive.

And so when you remember who you are, even in the midst of what life brings you—which it does, joy and sorrow—you bring love and wisdom and something that's undying, that can't be taken from you.

So a last little story. This is from a woman bringing her husband to the Mayo Clinic for evaluation. He had ALS, Lou Gehrig's disease, and his body was beginning to shut down. Usually you just have a couple of years.

"We entered the lobby of the Mayo Clinic, the main lobby, and there was a pianist playing. And we realized it was the first song we had ever danced to, a song we had danced to again at our wedding. And my husband Randall put down his briefcase filled with all the doctor's reports and test results, grabbed my waist, took me in his arms, and danced me across the floor all around that lobby.

"And when it was over and folks were applauding, we became aware of how many people had gathered around—were in wheelchairs and with walkers. And we suddenly realized in that spontaneous moment of celebration we had been dancing on behalf of the life and love that lived in each person gathered together in that room.

"I looked around that room lined with those waiting in wheelchairs. We found ourselves thinking of the pool of Bethesda. We imagined Jesus asking us, 'Do you want to be healed?' And we thought we heard him say, 'Then pick up your feet and dance.'"

So let's sit for a moment. Remember who you really are. Rest in loving awareness and the vastness. It is your home.

Thank you for coming. Take time to walk in nature and quiet yourself and to sit and meditate—more than anything, to listen. And come back again sometime.

Thank you. Good night.

CHAPTER 74

Monday Night Meditation Talk: The Perfection of Patience

Jack Kornfield · 1h42

> In this Monday night dharma talk, Jack Kornfield continues his series on the ten perfections (pāramī) by exploring khanti pāramī—the perfection of patience. Rather than understanding patience as merely waiting for results, Kornfield reframes it as constancy and presence, drawing on Suzuki Roshi's teachings. He examines how our hurried culture pushes against the natural rhythms of life, using the story of Zorba and the butterfly to illustrate the consequences of forcing things before their time.
> Kornfield weaves together wisdom from diverse sources—Thomas Merton, Rumi, T.S. Eliot, and the Tao—to illuminate how spiritual practice is not about perfecting oneself but about perfecting love through presence. He shares personal stories, including his daughter's Balinese dance recital and conversations with Silicon Valley executives, demonstrating that this teaching applies equally to meditation cushions and boardrooms. The talk addresses how patience relates to social action, citing Gandhi's practice of taking one day weekly in silence even during the most intense periods of activism.
> The teaching culminates with Arnold Lobel's beloved Frog and Toad story about planting seeds, offering a gentle reminder that our role is not to force growth but to provide conditions for natural unfolding. Kornfield invites practitioners to study their own impatience with curiosity and loving awareness, recognizing that the 100,000 mahākalpas of practice are really found in 100,000 breaths, steps, and moments of presence.

And again, after just a minute or two, you notice that you can sense the breath for a time, but after three breaths or ten breaths, the attention is pulled elsewhere—to planning or remembering or itching or imagining, feeling something.

When the waves are small, let them be in the background. But if a strong wave of experience pulls you from the breath, then let go of the attention to the breath and instead receive this new strong wave as if with a bow. Name it gently: "Oh, sadness, sadness," or "excitement," or "planning," or "remembering," or "itching, tingling." And as you name it, feel the energy of this wave move through your body and mind. After it passes, or you are at ease with it, sense the space of stillness, and then return back with loving awareness to the next breath.

So you rest here in the reality of the present—with this breath, this moment—or with the strong waves, receiving them with the same loving awareness, naming them. And then, after time, return back gently to the breath. This breath, or this moment's experience, receive with loving awareness, with mindfulness that says, "Yes, this too."

Presence. Loving awareness. As the body breathes itself, as the waves of experience rise and pass away in the space of loving awareness. And you're just here—mindful, spacious, acknowledging as it comes and goes. This breath. This wave. And as you do, let things get quieter and stiller around all the waves that rise and fall. This moment met with awareness and kindness.

Let yourself settle and listen in whatever way is comfortable for you. You don't have to remember anything from this. There's no quiz at the end, no exam. But more, listen in a kind of contemplative or meditative spirit, which is to say, let the words and stories come. And if something touches that which you know to be true in yourself, if it's really a reminder of something that you know and value, then that's something worthwhile for you. And if it doesn't seem right, just let it go.

Over the course of this year, in these Monday nights that I'm able to do, I've been working through a series of teachings which are called in the Buddhist tradition the ten perfections, the perfections of the heart. And I like to speak of them also as an expression of our own Buddha nature, of what is born into us, of the beautiful qualities and capacities that every human being is born with and that can be developed or brought forward, even though we might forget or lose them.

So we've talked about in these past months the quality of integrity or virtue, the quality of generosity of a generous heart, the quality of wisdom, the quality of wise effort—those kinds of qualities. And tonight we get to talk about what's traditionally called the perfection of patience.

Now, this is a tough one, and not just for you. The story that starts these perfections, which I didn't really tell on the first Monday night of this series, is that when one takes a vow to become fully enlightened as a Buddha, it's said that having taken such a vow, in general—and it took the last Buddha, Siddhartha Gautama Shakyamuni Buddha, more or less this amount of time—practicing patience and wisdom and loving-kindness and compassion and dedication and truthfulness and generosity and so forth, for 100,000 mahakalpas and four immensities.

And a mahakalpa is described as the length of time it takes if you have a mountain as high as Mount Everest—seven yojanas high, the distance an ox cart can go in a day—and every hundred years, a bird flies across the top of the mountain with a silk scarf in its beak, dragging it across the summit and wearing it down a little bit. When that mountain is worn down, that's one mahakalpa.

So you hear this and you think, all right, I can be patient a little bit, and maybe wise and virtuous once in a while, but 100,000 mahakalpas and then four immensities?

The beautiful thing about it is that it's a mythological number. It's not meant to be literal, because when you hear it, it's impossible. And what it actually means is that you have to understand this not within time, but as an invitation to see something outside of time—something more universal and grand, like the turning of the seasons and the turning of the galaxies themselves.

When you understand it this way, you start to see that these perfections are not something out there to be gained after 100,000 mahakalpas of the bird wearing the mountain down. Rather, they're a kind of flowering that can happen—not because you get better and better at something, but because you discover that this is actually who you are. This is your own true nature.

I was running a retreat and doing a ritual, a ceremony for the empowerment of some new teachers at our retreat hall, which is part of this campus beyond this building. Many of you have done retreats there. It was finished in 1999, so it's been open for seventeen or eighteen years. And I did a quick calculation for the fun of it: How many people come on retreat typically? How many retreat days a year? How many hours during the day? And I realized—oh, 3.4 million meditation hours in that room already. I thought that was very impressive.

So these numbers, mahakalpas and things like that, they actually happen. And they happen to you, because it's not 100,000 years of the bird, but 100,000 breaths. And how many do you pay attention to? And what does it mean in 100,000 steps? Ten thousand moments of looking in the eyes of the people that you love around you. The invitation from these qualities is to make these moments really alive for yourself, which is really, in part, why we practice.

Normally, one thinks, all right, I'm going to do meditation and I'll get better at it and I'll improve myself and I'll be a better person. And maybe I'll even get enlightened, whatever that is. But maybe I'll find out what it is, right? But then you notice when you're sitting that one of the great desires that arises is the desire to hear the bell. You know it's true.

So this guy goes to the Zen master—a really ardent young man, the most troublesome of all, but the most interesting. He says, "I'm here and I'm really going to do it. I want to practice. How long will it take to get enlightened?"

The Zen master says, "Ten years for you. Ten years."

The young man says, "Ten years? What if I practice really hard and throw myself into it?"

That's when the master says, "Okay, twenty years in your case."

"Twenty years? Isn't there any way I can do this faster?"

"Yeah, for you, thirty years. I can tell."

So we have this idea somehow that the way we're supposed to become something magnificent as a spiritual being or wise person is through some gain, some effort, some making something happen. But it doesn't really work that way. Tennessee Williams wrote, "The violets in the mountains have broken the rocks." There's something that wants to open in us, but it doesn't necessarily require the kind of gaining and effort as much as it does the willingness to be present.

Because we think in our practice, well, if I do it right, I'll fix my personality. We talk about this, right? You go to therapy, you have a coach, you go to the gym, you work out, you have a good diet, you meditate, and you're going to perfect yourself. How is that project going?

And then you start to realize, okay, I guess it's not really working that way. Or you set your goal: I'm going to meditate, and then I'll never be depressed or lonely or angry or needy or greedy. I'll just be holy and wise. Talk to your family members.

See how their perspective on that is.

So far, we just sit more retreats and so forth.

Now the thing is that we live in a culture that teaches us this. We live in a hurried culture. I remember when, for a time—I think it was partly to save energy—speed limits were lowered to 55 miles an hour everywhere. I don't know who it was, maybe it was under Carter or something like that. But then, you know, for us speed freaks—and myself included—gratefully it was raised again to 65 miles an hour. And now there are places out west in Wyoming and so forth where you can go 80 and 90 miles an hour. Fantastic, you know. This is our culture.

We live in this hurried culture where you're online all the time and people are getting to you and you have to respond right away. Hurry up, hurry up. And so you can do all that stuff so you can have leisure, right? You've got computers so you could get all your work done and have more leisure time. How many people, after you got your computers and your devices, have more leisure time? Raise your hand. Come on, let's be honest. It's not the way our culture works. It's just more, more, more, and quicker and sooner.

And then we have our hurried children. I think about Dr. Elkind, a psychiatrist from Tufts University, who wrote a book about seeing kids who are eight and nine and ten years old with ulcers from stress. I was teaching in China and in Singapore, working with some people from South Korea, and there's a high suicide rate among kids, especially high school and college age, because there is so much pressure. I was giving a talk at the largest psychology department in China, at Beijing Normal University. They asked, "What do we need to talk about?" I said, "Well, why don't we talk about what's happening to the kids?"

But it's not just there, you know. It's here. You've got to prepare for the interviews to get into the right preschool, so you can get your way to Stanford or Harvard. But you've got to start early. And then there are all those things like alphabet cards for your kids and reading programs for infants in the womb. Sing to the kids—don't read to them, please.

Peggy O'Mara, the editor of Mothering magazine, is very wise. She says, "We have a cultural bias against dependency, or against any emotion that indicates weakness. Nowhere is this more tragically evident than the way we push our children beyond their limits and timetables with outside standards." This is when you're supposed to be weaned. This is when you're supposed to be potty trained. This is when you're supposed to do this or that—instead of teaching them to trust themselves. Putting good healthy food on the table instead of saying, "Finish everything on your plate." Give them healthy food and let them learn to regulate themselves.

She says, "Begrudging dependency because it is not independence is like begrudging winter because it's not yet spring. Dependency blossoms into independence in its own sweet time." Our children grow from crawling to walking, babbling to talking, puberty into sexuality. This is the way that life unfolds, and we can trust it.

When you really take a moment to breathe and slow down, you start to feel that it's painful to not honor the natural cycle of things—in your own life, in the life of our children, in the life of the world in which we live.

This is Zorba the Greek: "I remember one morning I discovered a cocoon in the bark of a tree just as a butterfly was making a hole in its case and preparing to come out. I waited a while, but it was too long appearing and I was impatient. I bent over it and breathed on it to warm it, and warmed it as quickly as I could. And the miracle began to happen before my eyes, faster than life. The case opened, the butterfly started slowly crawling out, and I shall never forget my horror when I saw how its wings were folded back and crumpled. The wretched butterfly tried with its whole trembling body to unfold them. Bending over it, I tried to help it with my breath, in vain."

It needed to be hatched out patiently, and the unfolding of the wings needed to be a gradual process in the sun. Now it was too late. My breath had forced the butterfly to appear all crumpled before its time. It struggled desperately and a few minutes later died in the palm of my hand.

Of course, he's a brilliant writer, and he uses that scene from his life to remind us of something really important for us as human beings—the natural unfolding of our children, of our own bodies, of our aging, of our adolescence, of whatever it happens to be, of the work that we care about.

So it turns out that spiritual practice is not about the perfection of yourself. It's really the perfection of love. And in that, this quality of patience is more the quality of listening—the listening heart, of attending, of presence, of living in the mystery of being alive rather than looking for the goal, whether it's spiritual or some other goal you might have.

From T.S. Eliot again, where he writes: "I said to my soul, be still and wait without hope, for hope would be hope of the wrong thing. And wait without love, for love would be love of the wrong thing. There is yet faith, but the faith and love and hope are all in the waiting. So the darkness shall be the light and the stillness the dancing."

Extraordinary language—the stillness, the dancing.

"Oh nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember the rhythms of life that you were born into. Return to them. Live with that kind of dignity and presence that is your birthright.

So we talk about patience, but really patience is not a very good word. Because patience is like, well, if I wait long enough, something good will happen. People sit in meditation waiting and waiting for something to happen, like waiting for the bus. A better word for it, from Zen Master Suzuki Roshi at San Francisco Zen Center—he said a better word for it is constancy rather than patience or impatience, waiting for something.

It's simply a willingness to be present, as we just did in our meditation—to sit and feel this breath, these emotions, these thoughts and stories in the mind, the ones that are skillful and the ones that are unskillful, these experiences in our body that need to be tended to. To begin to trust the unfolding of this body and mind as we become present.

And sometimes, as you know very well, the times when you get impatient or bored or when things seem bad and you want something better to happen, or when they get really difficult—those are the times when you learn the things that the heart needs to know the most.

I was just in Los Angeles and I was in a conversation with a man who had built this very successful and huge real estate empire—half a billion dollars or something, zillions of dollars anyway. It seemed like a lot to me. And he'd quit after a while. He was really successful, on his way to being worth many billions. But he had an autistic child. And he had to stop. There was all the conflict in the family—how do we do this? And what it meant to raise this autistic child.

He looked at me—this child is now about ten years old—and he said, "You know, I have learned more from this child. It changed my life. I was driven. I was lost. And this child required me to quiet myself, to learn what it means to be present for someone in ways that I didn't even know how to do, which then meant I was present for my wife and my other children." And he said, "I can't express to you how important it is to have gone through what at first seemed just a tragedy. But the difficulty of being with this beautiful child—they've brought me my life back."

And we all know this in some way. Some of the hardest things that you've been through are the things that crack your heart open.

So it says in the Tao: "Those who are wise have no mind to fight the Tao. They do not, by their own contrivance, try to help the Tao along." They rest in the present, in the rhythms of life. And this is more the constancy—the willingness to show up with loving awareness, which is the synonym we're using for mindfulness. Where you are, rest in the rhythms of life. And then you drop into your own true nature. Here we are. Wow, what is this that's unfolding?

Now, I could almost tell this as a joke—Carl Jung and Rumi walk into a bar. It's kind of like that. But there's a passage from Carl Jung where he writes: if somebody's trying to get you to do a business deal quickly, and they say you have to sign now—this piece of property, this building, this stock option is going to disappear like that—or someone else is trying to get you to do something, you should be able to look behind that pressure and see who it is. Because you know who's there: the devil. That was Jung's word.

This is Mara tempting the Buddha and saying, "Hurry up, you've got to do it now."

And of course, this is Rumi: A friend remarks to the prophet, "Why is it I get screwed in business deals? It's like a spell. I become distracted and make wrong decisions." And Muhammad replies, "Stipulate with every transaction that you need three days to make sure. Deliberation is one of the divine and holy qualities. Throw a dog a bit of something, he sniffs it to see if he wants it. Be careful. Sniff with your wisdom nose, then decide."

So this is Carl Jung and Rumi in a bar. Anyway, there you are. But you can hear the truth of it—that sense of "hurry up, do it." And where are we going? Honestly, where are you going? If you step back into a little bit of the bigger picture, we're all going to the same place in a little while. So what's the hurry? Why don't we enjoy it while we're here?

Now, in teaching this, of course there is the slow food movement in France. Thank you to the French for this. And I really do want to love her with a slow hand too. There's always that.

The truth is that I'm a pretty impatient person by temperament. I think quickly. I do things quickly. I don't like being late—sometimes I hate being late if I've promised to be somewhere. I leap up the stairs two at a time, still pretty much. I'm just wired like that, kind of like a hummingbird.

I remember I was teaching at our retreat center in Massachusetts some years ago, leading one of our long three-month silent retreats. We have a two-month silent retreat every winter and spring for about a hundred people. There were a bunch of people who'd come from Europe, and this one guy came in to talk to me. We have these little meditation meetings with students to find out how they're doing and support their practice. He came in and said, "You know, I'm so disappointed." I said, "Oh?" He said, "I've listened to you on CD or cassette tapes or whatever it was back in the day. You just sound so peaceful and mellow. And then I'm watching you here go up and down the stairs, running around. You look like an Italian shoe salesman." Would you like to see our latest fashion?

So when I get mindful and pay attention and notice impatience—it's not just that I'm impatient for the result. There is that, you know, I want the ice cream, or I want the completion of this, I want that to happen. There's that part of it, the grasping. But there's also something else that I notice: it's hard to be present for certain other feelings, like boredom, or the thought that I'm wasting time. You know that thought? Like you're in traffic and you're wasting... I mean, it's really amazing. I'm here, driving down to the Golden Gate Bridge, and there's been an accident or a traffic jam. I can get impatient as we do. Does it help? Do you get there any faster? My body goes, "I don't want this happening." And I go, "Oh, well, look at that." It's hard to actually pay attention to the frustration or the boredom or the emptiness or the loss of time or all those kinds of things.

It really is a question: Who are we if we're not doing things, if we're not accomplishing something?

I'm a kind of serial doer, so I have that doing problem that many people in this culture have. And it's fine to be able to do stuff—it's actually very satisfying. But it's really hard if that's the only song you can play. Who are we if we're not doing things? Who am I if I'm not doing things?

So instead of patience, perhaps the better word is constancy. And maybe the opposite of impatience is not patience, but somehow presence, or trust, or contentment. These are some of the opposites—to be able to begin to trust where you are and say, here's where I am. I'm in a traffic jam. And all these people, all their cars are blocking my way. My car's blocking theirs. I'm part of the traffic jam. You're blaming all of them, but you forget to look at the car that you've added to it, right?

There's the image of the person riding the train who carries their bags the whole way, who won't put them down—as if you're going to get there faster or something.

"You can pick all the flowers," says Pablo Neruda, "but you can't stop the spring." There's something in that verse, especially in these times of genuine concern for the climate of the earth. But there's also some bigger season that's going on—the earth has its own life and seasons. You can pick all the flowers, but there's something that pushes new life through the cracks in the sidewalk, and that can't be stopped.

Rumi says, "By God, don't be an impatient bystander in this life." Be present for it.

And if you look at little kids, they know this. I was with a little kid who was in a high chair, dropping his spoon over the edge many times to make sure gravity really worked. He's an expert. He's a scientist. Okay, let me see if it works again. And also, he's a psychologist. Let me see if they'll pick it up again. All those things he's studying—a hundred thousand times dropping the spoon off and babbling and trying these things.

So in spiritual life, we might have the sense of progress, of getting better, like in electronics and technology—a smaller, smarter smartphone with more capacities. But the old Zen story describes it differently. A Zen master is there and a student is meditating, and the master says, "Well, what are you doing?" The student says, "I'm meditating so that I can get enlightened. I know that it's possible." And the master picks up a brick and takes out his handkerchief and starts rubbing the brick. The student says, "What are you doing?" The master says, "Well, I'm polishing this brick to turn it into a mirror." The student says, "No matter how you polish it, it's not going to turn into a mirror." And the master replies, "No matter how hard you try in that way, you're not going to turn into the kind of enlightenment that you think you should be. Maybe you should be yourself."

A brick is a brick. We have a certain measure of sorrow. Sorrow is our sorrow. Beauty is our beauty. And when we come into the present, we actually bow to our human incarnation and say, this is it. This is actually it. That's where enlightenment starts—where you are, here and now. And the real openings in spiritual life happen most frequently when we stop trying to make or do or be anything.

I know it for myself. On my own retreats, there gets to a certain point where I just let go and I'm just there. And that becomes in some ways the most beautiful and the most fruitful time. All kinds of things start to open up for me.

And then somebody says, yeah, but what about refugees? What about the war in Syria and South Sudan and the Philippines and Burma? What about continuing racism and injustice?

What about climate change?

The moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. But it's pretty hard to bend it these days. It's sort of like it's bending maybe a little bit the other way for a bit. How do we see patience in this? How do we see constancy?

I think there are a few things to say. One is a passage from Thomas Merton that I love to read because it's got so much wisdom in it. He's speaking to a young activist—a frustrated activist—and he says, "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and even achieve no result at all, if not perhaps at times result in the opposite of what you expected. As you get used to this idea, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

That somehow you get quiet enough to listen and say, what really matters to me? And this is the direction I'm headed in. It's not given to you to know how it's going to turn out. But what is given to you is to quiet your mind and tend your heart and sense what is the direction that I want to offer of my life to this world. And then whether it's injustice or climate change or racism or warfare, you can act—but you act in a different way.

You act the way Gandhi acted. And what he did, as we all know from the story, is he took one day a week in silence where he didn't do anything. And he's in the middle of taking apart the entire British empire. There are hundreds of thousands of people marching and people getting killed. "Gandhiji, Gandhiji, you must come! People are dying!" And he said, "I'm sorry, it's Thursday. This is my day off. I can't come. I sit in silence on Thursday." And he sat to quiet himself and to listen in some way to a different channel than the channel of doing—to listen: What matters to me? What do I care about in this life? And how can I align my actions and my words to the Tao, to what's really unfolding, and to the deepest values that I carry?

And you might say, well, that's Gandhi. But I was just also with some Silicon Valley people, including some who run these giant companies—Facebook, Google, that kind of thing. I was talking to the CEO of one of them who said, "I'm taking next week off because we really have to do some visioning about where our corporation and our thousands of employees are going. And I can't do that in my office. I just have to go and be quiet for a while. And then I get an intuition, I get a knowing."

We talked about it, and I spoke with him a few days later after he'd been quiet for some time. He said, "Oh yeah, it's all starting to come." And you know this. Sometimes when you're taking a walk is when all of a sudden you understand something. Or in your dreams, if you remember them.

So there's a shift. It's not that you don't care about the world and respond to it and act in an honorable way. But it's a shift from trying to make it happen with your will to instead opening to what your heart tells you is the wisest thing to do from a quiet place—like Gandhi—and letting your actions then follow something that's more timeless.

Ovid says, "Opportunities are everywhere, and so you must always let your hook be hanging. When you least expect it, a great fish will swim by." So it's not that you just do it, but you also open yourself to listen in a different way.

Now it's also useful to begin to study what keeps us from contentment, what keeps us from presence. How many people would be grateful for the day that you had? There are a lot of people in this world still without enough to eat, without shelter, whose lives are in danger in different ways, or who are sick. If your doctor calls and gives you a diagnosis, and then a few days later you get another call saying, "I'm sorry, it was a mistake"—you go, "Hallelujah, I have my life back!"

I thought I only had a few months to live. And what do you do? You hug your children, you watch the rain, you look at the light on the golden grasses here—the beautiful late evening summer light that happens for us in California. That outer gold shining to our inner gold.

What really matters in the end? There aren't that many things, you know. Did you love well? Maybe. Did you live fully instead of so much in the future and the past? Did you actually live your moments? And maybe did you learn to let go? Because if you don't learn it now, you're going to have a crash course at some point. It's going to come.

So maybe in this quality of constancy or patience, there's really a trust in the seasons of life. "Don't the leaves fall down just like that," a Chinese poet wrote. In the body opening, in the rhythms of being born and of dancing and singing and working and bringing justice and loving and gain and loss, joy and sorrow and tears and delight that make up our human incarnation. To rest in your Buddha nature and say, yes, this is what we were born into, and let me hold it with loving awareness. Let me be present for it. Let me be part of this unfolding.

When my daughter was six years old, my family went on sabbatical to Asia, as we did about every five years, to live for six months or more. I would work on a book or something like that. We lived in one village in Thailand and another in Bali. When she was six, we were living with a Balinese family, and she went to a Balinese dance school, because all the little girls in Bali were dancing as temple dancers—on Jalan Sugriva in Ubud, back in the late 80s.

We were there for some months, and she learned to do the pendet and some other dances. Before we were supposed to leave, she was going to have a recital with some people coming to watch. It was late afternoon when we arrived, and I brought a video camera. They started to prepare her. First they ritually bathed her and washed her, and they did some prayers over her. Then they put on this beautiful sarong, and they wrapped her body in gold silk about twenty times around. Then they put on amazing jewelry. Then they started applying makeup—more makeup than a six-year-old girl could die for having. She was just smiling like this.

And I'm noticing that the light is fading. I'm not going to get a good video of this. It's going to be dark. Then the dance teacher's wife comes over—she had been my daughter's main teacher—and sticks these gold flowers in her hair, adjusting everything. They're just taking their time. And I'm getting more and more impatient, thinking I need to record this thing.

The dance teacher just kind of looked over at me like any good Zen master and smiled, and they kept preparing her.

Finally, at some point, I remembered. I understood something. Because in Bali, when you dance or when you sing or when you make art—and there's so much art in Balinese culture—you don't do it for the approval of other people. You're not doing it for your audience. You do it for the gods.

And the beautiful thing is that it doesn't matter how old you are. If you're eighty years old—and I saw one of the greatest dance masters of Bali who was in her eighties doing extraordinary things—or if you're five or six years old, you are dancing for the gods. And therefore, you deserve the same care and the same gold and the same reverence. The teacher's wife took off her own jewelry and put it all on my daughter.

It was magnificent. I don't have the pictures.

But I have the lesson and the memory, and it's something that I'll treasure.

Who are we doing it for, in some way? We are acting and dancing, moving through our life either just to get it all done, to check the things off our list, to do what we're supposed to do, to accomplish all these things. And okay, I accomplished all this—now what? What is this for? Or are we doing it for the dance itself?

Thomas Merton, again, such a wonderful contemplative and writer, talked about his art as a writer. He said, if you write as a sacred act, or you write for the divine, you'll reach many men and women and bring them joy. If you write for men and women, you may make some money and you may give someone a little joy and you may make a noise in the world for a little while. If you write for your own self-promotion, you can read what you've written and after ten minutes you'll be so disgusted you'll wish you were dead. Now it may be a little bit of an exaggeration, but you can hear the difference, can't you? And you know it. You know it in the work you do, in the sandwich that you make for your family, in the tending of someone that you care about, in the way that you move through the world.

This is really what this quality of constancy, of presence, of patience is. It's not something out there, and it's not a hundred thousand mahakalpas away. It's this breath and the hundred thousand moments that make up something beautiful in your own life.

And here we are in this turning of the seasons, as we do in the turning of the spheres. We honor the mystery and the rhythms of life. Sometimes I go about pitying myself, as the Ojibwe saying goes that we all know, when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky.

So when you sit in meditation, it's not so much to gain something. Yes, you can learn to quiet the mind. You can have insights and visions—beautiful things, some of the time. But sometimes you sit and what you get is the tension in your body or the unfinished business of the heart. The tears that need to be wept but you've been too busy to feel them. Or the longing, or the love that hasn't been expressed, and you realize, "I have to tell that person I love them. I haven't done that."

And you take your seat in the rhythms of birth and death and gain and loss and joy and sorrow as the Buddha that you are. And you say, "Oh yes, this is the rounds of human incarnation." And now let me rest in the heart and live from a place of presence, live from a place of understanding.

The culture doesn't help, as we know. I remember when I was young in Massachusetts, where I lived part of the time, they had the blue laws. The blue laws meant that everything shut down mostly on weekends. Then it was just Sunday. Nothing was open. It was a commercial Sabbath. You couldn't order anything on Amazon on that day because Amazon didn't exist. But basically, the society had decided that Sabbath was actually a healthy thing. We used to have this, you know. And every culture has it—there's a Jewish Sabbath and a Muslim Sabbath.

And there's a Buddhist observance on the full moon, quarter moon, new moon—where everything would stop. Every wise culture knows you have to put down the plow, put down the pen, stop your coding or selling and buying, whatever it happens to be, and take the time to listen. Take the time to stop.

Since society doesn't offer this anymore, your own meditation practice becomes your Sabbath. It becomes your way—in the morning or the evening or whenever works for you—to stop. To tune in, to listen in a deeper way, to find your own rhythm and the rhythm of what is around you.

I'm looking for a story here. This is a story about something bigger, but it could be a story about your meditation too, because sometimes it feels like it's working and sometimes it doesn't—whatever your model or ideal about it might be. But if you're sitting there and you're bored or frustrated or doubting, thinking it's not working, you can either believe that, or you can say, "Oh, I get to be mindful of boredom, or doubt, or 'not working.'" Oh, doubting mind—that's interesting. Boredom. Because usually when we're bored, what do we do? Open the refrigerator, right? Or go online or something, because we can't tolerate our loneliness or boredom. But if you say, "Oh, it's not working. Hmm, how interesting. I wonder what's happening that it feels like it's not working"—that's just a thought.

The man was my age but looked many years older. He was an army veteran. He was also homeless, cold, and hungry. I could see that he'd tried to wash up before coming to the social service department to ask for help. His face and hands were clean, but his clothes were filthy. And although he claimed not to have had any alcohol that day, the smell of it seeped from his pores. I wanted to get him into rehab, and I asked if he was ready to come in off the streets.

"No, ma'am," he said. "All I'd like is a few dollars and some bus tickets. If I can get sober enough, they'll let me into the shelter across town."

The shelter had fifty beds—cots really. The homeless were admitted at night and forced out at dawn to eat breakfast at a nearby charity. Fifty beds and nearly a thousand homeless in our city. This is Santa Rosa, by the way. Winter here in Northern California means cold rain and mud, and even though this man and many like him slept under bridges to keep dry, the dampness penetrates everything. His clothes and the bedroll he'd placed on the floor smelled moldy. The pages of a book he carried were swollen.

I asked how many times he'd tried rehab.

"Two or three, a long time ago," he said.

"Maybe it's time to try again." I explained that I had a client who'd gone through the program seven times before it took. "Besides," I said, "we're months away from warm weather. What else have you got going on?"

I watched his face as he considered my offer. I thought I saw a flicker of hope in his eyes, followed by a shadow of doubt. He'd tried before. It had been hard—impossibly hard. But so was living on the streets. Finally, he lifted his head and looked at me. I reached for the phone.

"Shall I?" I asked.

He barely nodded yes.

An hour later, I handed him over to a recovering alcoholic, also a veteran, who would drive him to one of the best rehab facilities in the county. "Come visit me when you graduate," I said as they left.

I barely recognized the man when he came into my office six months later—so tall and handsome, smelling like the outdoors and holding a huge bouquet of flowers.

Sometimes you sit and it doesn't seem like it's working, and then you've got to sit again. You do it because where else are you going? If you can't be here for these moments—for the eyes of the people that you care about, for the colors at dawn if you get up early, for the smell of the bay trees as you walk out into the parking lot and the moon that starts to shine tonight, getting fuller—what is it for?

So this isn't speaking about becoming passive. It's really about your ability to be present so you can respond. So you can plant the seeds that matter to you in this beautiful world, no matter what else is happening.

And again, from Thoreau, he says, "Though I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed planted there, and I am prepared to expect wonders."

And so you plant your seeds in all the different ways that you do. It's not passive at all. It's about sensing the seasons. And then something beautiful and unstoppable, which is life itself, which is what you are, comes into you. It becomes part of who you are. And there's a dignity and a graciousness and an ease and a peacefulness in it because there's some great trust.

I've been training teachers now for almost forty years, and we've had a whole succession of teacher trainings here. We've just started the latest Spirit Rock teacher training for twenty new retreat teachers, and they're almost all teachers of color because it's been very clear that our community is not only not diverse, but also that somehow we've been collectively unconscious about the need to live in a diverse society and to make it who we are and not just some ideal out there or some other place. So one of the things that seems really important is to have the folks who sit up here and teach really represent everybody, not just some subset of the white community. It's a beautiful group. I'm very excited about it.

But the thing that I said to them, and to my colleagues who are new at training teachers, was this: we really don't train them much. I mean, we give them great lectures and teach them Buddhist history and tools that are helpful—when people are in meditation, how you can help them open their hearts and quiet their minds. But mostly, they learn it by doing it, like any apprenticeship. They get nervous and they practice and they learn.

And the beautiful thing is that it's completely trustworthy. I've had people come in who have a very deep meditation experience of realization and understanding and good hearts and all kinds of beautiful qualities, but they're shy and timid and they say, "I don't know if I can talk, I don't know what I have to offer." Those are the best kind, actually. They're kind of the real ones. And I watch them flower. And I don't actually have to do much. I just have to provide the support and say, "Yes, you have it."

The beautiful thing is that you have it. All the qualities necessary for awakening, the perfect emotions and the perfect body and the perfect experience—they are what you have. You have all that's needed to awaken. And you have these beautiful qualities in you. So to meditate isn't to have a particular experience, but to remember that you can be present for this life in an entirely different way—in a loving and compassionate and wise way.

Now I've got a lot more stories, but I'm not going to tell them. Maybe one poem from Ikkyu, the Zen poet. He says:

Every day I hear the priests chant the sutras.
They should learn to read the love letter sent by the wind and the rain, the blossoms and the moon.

So it's not the words in the text, but really the attention to the world that is, as my poet friend Alison Luderman says, "nibbling your ear like a neglected lover." Come back, be present for it.

And being present, by the way—the last thing before I read our final story—is that being present doesn't mean it's going to be pleasant. The idea of "Be Here Now," you know, that book. I just came from visiting Ram Dass, which was really wonderful, in Hawaii. Trudy and I went to spend time with him because he presided over our wedding a year ago. We decided to go back and visit him. He's eighty-five, in his wheelchair for the last eighteen years. Still aphasia—he can speak, but it's limited some, although his mind is very clear. But he's just all love.

He just looks at you and says, "I love you. I love this life. I love you too. And I love you, and you. And I love this day. And I love the ceiling. I love the exit sign." I mean, he's really funny about it. "I love the floor." He just can't stop loving everything. That part is really wonderful.

And there he says, he looks at you and he says, "You have it. You are it." It's not like you have to be somebody else. No one's ever been like you before in this whole vast galaxy. So you might as well dance.

Anyway, all right. So I have a story as the last one to read, which is from one of my favorite children's books. My daughter said to me, "Dad, you can't read that story." I said, "Why not?" She said, "You're too impatient. It's just not right." So with that caveat, I will read it to you anyway. Maybe my daughter will be patient with me, and maybe not. But that's not my practice.

This is from Arnold Lobel, who's written a series of children's books called Frog and Toad. Many of you will know this, and if you don't, they're wonderful children's books. So this is a chapter out of Frog and Toad, and you can picture the drawings that come with it.

Frog and Toad are good friends.

Frog was in his garden. Toad came walking by. "What a fine garden you have, Frog," he said.

"Yes," said Frog. "It is very nice, but it was hard work."

"I wish I had a garden," said Toad.

"Well, here are some flower seeds. Plant them in the ground," said Frog, "and soon you will have a garden."

"How soon?" asked Toad.

"Quite soon," said Frog.

Toad ran home. He planted the flower seeds. "Now seeds," said Toad, "start growing."

Toad walked up and down a few times. The seeds did not start to grow.

Toad put his head close to the ground and said loudly, "Now seeds, start growing."

Toad looked at the ground again. The seeds did not start to grow.

Toad put his head very close to the ground and shouted, "Seeds! Seeds! Listen! Start growing!"

Frog came running up the path. "What is all this noise?" he asked.

"My seeds will not grow," said Toad.

"You are shouting too much. These poor seeds are afraid to grow."

"My seeds are afraid to grow?" asked Toad.

I mean, you can hear what good medicine this is for parents, not to speak of the children.

"Of course," said Frog. "Leave them alone for a few days. Let the sun shine on them. Let the rain fall on them. Soon your seeds will start to grow."

That night, Toad looked out his window. "Drat," said Toad.

My seeds have not started to grow. They must be afraid of the dark.

Toad went out to his garden with some candles. "I will read the seeds a story," said Toad. "Then they will not be so afraid."

Toad read a long story to his seeds. All the next day, Toad sang songs to his seeds—in the rain, you can see it raining. And all the day after, Toad read poems to his seeds. And all the next day, Toad played music for his seeds. You can see him playing his violin.

Toad looked at the ground. The seeds still did not start to grow. "What shall I do?" cried Toad. "These must be the most frightened seeds in the whole world!"

Then Toad felt very tired and he fell asleep.

"Toad, Toad, wake up," said Frog. It was morning. "Look at your garden."

Toad looked at his garden. Little green plants were coming up out of the ground. "At last!" shouted Toad. "My seeds have stopped being afraid to grow!"

"And now you will have a nice garden too," said Frog.

"Yes," said Toad, "but you are right, Frog. It was very hard work."

This is your Buddhist sutra for the evening. That's right.

If you do anything with this talk, if you listen and it reminds you of something important to you, pay attention also to when you're impatient. Study impatience. It's actually a kind of interesting thing to get curious about. What is this? What keeps you from joy or contentment or being present just with the way things are? Notice the stories that come, or the feelings in the body.

And if you bring loving awareness to that—rather than looking for, or trying to become, patient—notice the other stuff and be patient with that, be present for it. Some very interesting things will happen in a few minutes. Well, how soon, actually? Soon enough, right?

So many other stories, but I think that's enough.

So my friends, says Wendell Berry: every day do something that won't compute and won't count. Love the world. Work out of love.

Work for nothing. Love someone who doesn't deserve it. Invest in the millennium. Plant sequoias. Put your faith in the two inches of humus that will build under the trees every thousand years. Go with your love to the fields. Lie down in the shade. Rest your head.

So thank you, Gary. Thank you all for your kind attention. It's really a pleasure.

CHAPTER 75

The Essence of Buddhist Psychology - Daylong, Part 2 Afternoon

Jack Kornfield · 3h30

> In this afternoon session of the daylong retreat, Jack Kornfield presents a comprehensive framework for understanding mental health through the lens of Buddhist psychology. Drawing from the Abhidhamma tradition, he explains how consciousness arises through the six sense doors and how mental states—either rooted in greed, hatred, and delusion or in wisdom, love, and generosity—shape our experience. This map offers a radical reorientation: mental health is the capacity to be present with experience through mindfulness and loving awareness, while mental suffering stems from our inability to tolerate experience without grasping or aversion.
> Kornfield addresses trauma with particular depth, explaining how good trauma work requires establishing resources of well-being before approaching difficult material, allowing emotions to release through the body, and creating safe containers for storytelling. He shares moving examples from his work with combat veterans, refugees, and at-risk youth, demonstrating how ritual acknowledgment and compassionate witnessing facilitate healing.
> The teaching culminates in exploring intention (cetanā) as the heart of karma—both the mindful pause that transforms moment-to-moment reactions and the long-term vows that set the compass of our lives. Through guided forgiveness practice and a blessing cord ritual, participants are invited to discover that awareness itself is timeless and free, and that our deepest nature is loving awareness capable of holding all of life's joys and sorrows with equanimity and grace.

I hope you had a good lunch break. And I'm also grateful that the air has cleared compared to earlier this morning, so you could go out.

How are you doing after all this morning's meditation and teachings? Any comments or questions before we start?

One in the back.

"Jack, I've always wondered—this is the second one of these that you've taught that I've been to—and it's not a great question, but I'm just curious. In my reading of the sutras, and by the way, I'm no scholar, I never saw anything about the Abhidhamma mentioned. And so I wonder where that comes from. Is that a result of the 500-year period after the Buddha's death of the flowering of Buddhism? Is that something that Nagarjuna was involved in? Is it something that's written about somewhere else? I never understood what that was exactly, except for the chain of dependent origination."

So for those who might not understand that question, because it comes from an understanding of Buddhist history and texts, sometimes the word "Buddhist psychology" has been used to describe one part of Buddhist teachings called the Abhidhamma or Abhidharma, which is the third of three sections of the ancient Buddhist texts.

One section concerns the lives of the monks and nuns and the way they should live—the whole thing about community. A second, which is the biggest section, the sutras, are either the teachings that were given by the Buddha or, in greater majority, are records of dialogues where the Buddha would be wandering and someone would come up and say, "I just lost my business," or "I met this yogi who said that if I practice in this way, I'll get enlightened," or "My child just died, help me." And in those dialogues—or "I'm a prince, the kingdom next door wants to make war on us, what should I do?"—a good part of those texts are his responses to people's concerns or sufferings or possibilities.

And then the third group called the Abhidhamma or Abhidharma is a very complex mapping of the different possible states of mind. Remember what I read from those 500 feelings? Well, the Abhidhamma has 108 different states of mind, 52 mental factors, and 28 different kinds of experiences of elements in the body and the senses. It maps all these out and then does quite complex maps of the relationship in one moment of how a moment of perception arises with feeling and intention and consciousness and history and response.

So my best understanding is that that third section was not written down until the third great council, or one of the great councils of the Buddhist following, that happened several hundred years after the death of the Buddha. And the story that's told is that those were teachings that the Buddha gave by going up to heaven when he was still alive and teaching his mother who had died, giving her all these special teachings. And then she later recited them to the monks who were in that third century after his death, and they wrote them down.

Could be. But it could also be that they combed through the teachings and said, "Let's make this more systematic." And they all liked to make lists—the three characteristics and the four noble truths and the five spiritual faculties and the six paramitas and the seven factors of enlightenment and the twelve links of dependent origination. They were list makers. And it was an oral tradition, so it made it easier to write down. So this was like list makers gone berserk, basically, with huge numbers of complex lists. Apparently it was written down several centuries later.

And in some places it's considered the highest teachings. In others it's not; in others it's considered derivative of the earlier teachings. But of course people always have opinions about things. And so when you go into the Buddhist temples and among the scholars, they are—shocking to say—sometimes rather opinionated. They have their views about when and where and what's more important. Not unlike the rest of us.

So that's the historical record as far as I know. What we're working with today is a very different meaning of the word "Buddhist psychology"—taking the compass of the teachings as a whole and looking at what are the essential principles as a science of mind or psychology, and how we might employ them and use them in human happiness and human suffering.

So thanks for that question.

And one of the things that's true in China, certainly on the coast, which is the wealthiest part—I was in Shanghai and Beijing and a couple of other places in Jiangxi province—is that now many parts of China have become much wealthier and quite prosperous. It's kind of extraordinary to see in one generation, from primarily bicycles and little low buildings to high-rises and skyscrapers, a road system that's really the equivalent of our superhighways around the country, people driving great big SUVs and their Mercedes and BMWs and fancy cars. It's become very modern in a very short time, with a tremendous amount of wealth in parts of China.

And people are recognizing that, all right, I have money—what else is there? I'm not so happy in some cases. There's a kind of stress, both in the society and especially among young people. I was in Singapore and then talking with people from Korea. There's a lot of suicide among young people, because with one child, parents are pushing them to succeed and do well. And the poor kids feel like they're being oppressed in some way by expectations.

So what I found in China was, just as we talked about at the very beginning, that the outer developments now aren't enough. And there are at least some seeds of growing interest in reclaiming these traditions. The little project I have is called Returning the Treasure, bringing things back to temples and places like that.

Your question points to the fact that we could use this here in this culture, and certainly in the online world from all those big companies. They're interested. I've done trainings for the top executives at Salesforce, for example. Google has Search Inside Yourself, and I've done work with Meng, who's one of the people that started a big program of mindfulness through Google. I've done training for the very highest level of people at Apple.

I think there are two things to say. One is that it's actually hard to bring these values and principles fully alive in an intense business environment. The way capitalism is currently constructed, the way the markets are—there's an enormous pressure to make money as fast as you can, bottom line. And if you don't, you're thrown out, basically. The shareholders or someone will throw you out. I've found, working with the CEOs of some of the top companies in America, that they're actually much more amenable to this when they retire. But when they're actually doing it, it's so intense.

It's not so for all of them. Some of them need it in the middle. There's a YouTube video if you're interested in this. I had a conference and a long conversation with Bill Ford, who runs Ford Motors. He called in 2008, when the economy was melting down for the Great Recession, and he said, "I can't sleep." He'd been doing Buddhist practice for quite a while. "I'm afraid that we're going to lose the whole industry, including my grandfather's company on my watch. Do you have anything that could help?"

So he began to do much deeper mindfulness training, and it helped him a lot. He describes this in that YouTube video. But that's kind of unusual—that he's really still in the saddle. So one thing is that people are so at the mercy of market forces in business that it's a little bit... yes, they put mindfulness in and it's a nice little gloss on things, but to have it really be incorporated is going to take longer.

And I think the big change is taking place because we now have social and emotional learning and mindfulness training in schools. As kids learn this from early on—yes, the business schools are doing it. I got a call from Stanford Business School some years ago from one dean and a senior professor, who said, "Could you come down and help us?" I said, "What do you want?" He said, "Well, we get the most accomplished students in the country, really fantastic students, but they're also very ambitious. They come here and immediately they're trying to figure out what company they'll work for and what their internship will be. They're envisioning how they're going to get paid, how it's going to grow, how they'll make a fortune in Silicon Valley—people's dreams. And by the time two years are over, they've kind of lost touch with themselves. They're so driven."

I listened and I said, "So what you're asking for is something like soul retrieval?" He said, "Yeah, yeah, that's right. That's what we need."

So I went down to Stanford Business School and did a training for a weekend with some CEO friends and others. They're beginning to put it in, but it would have to be really woven into the curriculum. And I think the place it really matters is with younger children.

The other thing I'm involved with is a group of neuroscientists, and we are looking at ways to actually develop technological products—virtual reality, augmented reality experiences—that train people in compassion. Looking at the research, this seems possible. So it's very early in the game, but what's true is that we have this technological world, and it's rewiring our children's brains. Two-year-olds don't read a book anymore; they swipe a regular book to see if the pictures will change, because they've had their iPad since the crib. In some ways this is very creative, and in other ways... well, when we have our teen retreats here—I'm going on about this because it's such an interesting question—one of the most important rituals, one of the most transformative things, happens as the retreat starts.

We have a big basket and a particular special chant that we do, a kind of ritual. Then the teens will each place their smartphone into the basket for a week. It's a little like surgery. Some anesthesia is needed because it's so wired into them. They sleep with it under their pillow. It's so much a part of their lives. And what does it mean to have a week's experience where you're not online all the time?

Your question points to many interesting things. I do think that with all the research, mindfulness is growing and will make a difference in our culture. And it's up against some very big forces. But these are interesting developments.

One last question. "I work with people with depression. Most have a sitting practice. What they describe to me is more of a resistance, like a dissociation practice—staying on the breath so they don't have to feel. When you were talking about the feeling foundation of mindfulness and tolerating, what do you suggest when they're so afraid of feeling?"

Well, there are a couple of things. First, which you probably know, it would be worth reading material from folks like Zindel Siegel, who has written extensively about using MBCT, mindfulness-based cognitive therapy, with depression. The stories people tell themselves are really critical, as you would know working with this.

For me, when somebody comes who can't tolerate their feelings—and this really connects to what we'll talk about shortly—in part what we're addressing is trauma. That's the origin of most of those feelings. Good trauma work requires considerable intelligence, because there's bad trauma work out there too. But good trauma work recognizes that trauma is carried in the body and in the nervous system, as well as in emotions and stories. Before you can approach it without re-traumatizing people, you need to help them find resources of well-being.

The very first thing, whether for depression or trauma, is helping them find whatever gives them even a little glimmer of well-being. It might be physical—your feet on the floor, what's the safest place in your body, what posture works for you, how can you calm yourself a little. Or if they can't do that, it might be asking: can you remember a time in your life when you felt safe and loved? Maybe at your grandmother's house, or at your uncle's farm, or somewhere. Let that image and that whole scene come to you. Feel what that's like in your body.

All right, now let's approach the anxiety that's there with the depression, or the grief—but only a little bit, so it doesn't overwhelm you. And then go back. Okay, you felt a little, a few tears came. It's scary. Let's do a little bit of it. Name it. All right, now come back. Feel your feet and ground yourself, or remember your grandmother, whatever it happens to be. Feel the well-being and go back and forth, so there's a basis for approaching what's difficult. You can do it a little step at a time. This is part of training to increase that window of tolerance.

I also think, you know, people are smart. We're also fools—Zen Master Ryokan, Japan's most beloved poet, wrote: "Last year a foolish monk, this year no change." So we're both. But people are smart in the sense that you can explain to them that part of what keeps their depression locked in is the inability to tolerate certain feelings—loneliness, anxiety, emptiness, unworthiness, whatever it happens to be. You can tell them it's possible not only to learn to tolerate these feelings, but that in holding them, they can transform. And then: here, let's do a little practice to learn to do it step by step.

So I'm very respectful of resistance, which relates to other questions we've had. It's there because it's trying to protect us.

And so you want to say, this has been a value, and it's helped you. And now you can say, "Thank you for trying to protect me. And let's see if we can expand who we are beyond the fears of it." I don't know if that's helpful.

Alright. So why don't we sit for five minutes. And just kind of let the words pass and reconnect with the stillness. Come back gently to your own breath and body, just here and now.

As you sense the breath, let the sounds and sensations and other experiences that are in the background rise and fall like waves of the ocean. And when one of the waves becomes strong, then turn your loving awareness toward that as if to bow to it, acknowledge and name it gently, and feel it move through the body and mind as a wave. And when it's passed or you're at ease with it, then again feel the breath.

So we will do some other practices this afternoon—an equanimity practice, perhaps a forgiveness practice, a couple of other practices. Just to start here.

In Western psychology, there's so much emphasis on psychopathology and the medical model—what's your diagnosis and so forth—certainly in clinical psychology. And you know where clinical psychology came from, perhaps worth saying. Before World War II, most of psychology was research psychology. But then when all the troops came back who were shell-shocked and with trauma, there weren't enough psychiatrists to go around, and the field of clinical psychology grew actually in response to the veterans coming back. And again, it's been mostly oriented toward pathology and diagnosing people and so forth.

One of the things that's noteworthy both in psychiatry and psychology is that while it's called the mental health field, there's almost no focus on mental health. It's all on mental disorder. You go in and you train and learn about all these disorders, and that's really the emphasis of it.

So you have handed out to you today a paper that has a map from Buddhist psychology of mental health. Here is how to understand it.

On the left hand side are all the things that make up our human experience: sights, sounds, tastes, smells, bodily perceptions, and mental perceptions—thoughts, feelings, and intuitions. There are six senses. The mind is considered a sixth sense door because it knows thoughts and feelings. Does anybody have anything other than this in their life? Raise your hand. You can have your money back.

This was actually taught in relationship to a kind of famous dialogue the Buddha had with somebody about the world. The Buddha said, "I'll teach you what the world is made of. What your world is made of." And it's made of these six things: sight, sound, taste, smell, bodily perception, and mental perception.

Then along with these six things, if you look on the right hand side, are the six flavors of consciousness that arise with them—eye and ear and nose, tongue, body consciousness, and so forth. Which is to say, for us to experience something, there's both the sense experience and the consciousness which knows it. Consciousness is called the knowing faculty.

So if you have somebody who just died and you're there with their body, it's still warm, their eyes are open, light hits the retina, probably neural firing going to the visual cortex in the brain—but there's something missing, which is consciousness. They're not seeing anything, even though all the physical things are happening. What's needed for us to have our human experience is sense experience and the consciousness which receives it. That's pretty clear?

Okay. Then it turns out that between the sense experience and the consciousness is a whole array of mental states. And if we take them from that question that was asked before about the Abhidharma, Abhidhamma, and so forth, this list comes from the fifty-two most common mental states.

And what the mental states are is that they determine the relationship of consciousness to experience. There are some common ones that are present in most every moment—feeling tone and so forth. But most of them, of the fifty-two, are divided into two halves: the healthy side and the unhealthy side.

The unhealthy side is described as the three roots of greed, hatred, and delusion—which is somewhat old-time Victorian language. What it means is that we have a sight or a sound, and with greed, we attach and we want more of it and we grasp it. With hatred, there's aversion, fear—we push it away, we don't want to experience it. And with delusion, we don't see it clearly. We space out or we're somewhere else.

When we're reacting to experience from these three roots, they give rise to worry, envy, rigidity, agitation, grasping, self-centeredness, fear, avarice, shamelessness, dullness, closed-mindedness, confusion, misperception—all these kinds of unhealthy states. And the stronger they are, the greater the mental distress.

You could read the whole DSM listing of mental problems, and they are when worry turns into paranoia and fear, or delusion turns into whether it's delusions of grandeur or seeing things that aren't there. Psychiatric problems of great delusion, where greed gives rise not only to avarice but then to addiction, shamelessness, sociopathy, confusion, and so forth. All the things that we consider mental problems grow out of our inability to be present with our experiences, and then we're either pushing them away or grasping them in some unhealthy fashion.

Now, these states are reciprocally inhibited by an opposite set of states, which is to say that there's a whole variety of healthy states. When the healthy states arise, the unhealthy ones disappear. The three roots of the healthy states are these: instead of delusion, there's wisdom or clarity. Instead of hatred and aversion and fear, there's love or a sense of connectedness. Instead of grasping, there's generosity or gratitude—instead of trying to hold on to things, there's a sense of appreciation.

This means that experience arises and we can appreciate it. We see it clearly. There's a sense of love and well-being. And from those roots, which get fostered through mindfulness, there grows graciousness, modesty, insight, flexibility, joy, equanimity, kindness, adaptability—a whole variety of other healthy mental states.

In a certain way, all of Buddhist psychology is to help us see what mental states are present, and if they're unhealthy ones, to see them clearly and release them by holding them with compassion or forgiveness, letting them go, and cultivating healthy states of mindfulness, generosity, gratitude, love, and clarity. Those then give what neuroscientists have shown is adaptability, emotional resilience, pliancy of mind—all kinds of good things come from this.

So this is really a map that says: if you want to know what mental health is, it is the ability to be present for life experience with mindfulness and graciousness and ease, neither resisting nor being caught up in fears nor lost in confusion, but with clarity and presence. If you want to know what mental illness and mental difficulties are, they are rooted in our inability to tolerate and be with experience without either grasping and getting addicted or pushing it away. And the most important thing is that there are a whole variety of trainings and ways to move us from unhealthy to healthy states.

Sometimes people will ask, "This is nice for meditation, but what about when there's much more severe pathology?" If you're interested, there's a book by Ed Podvoll called Recovering Sanity. He was a psychiatrist who used these principles with psychotic patients and developed what are now a few centers called the Windhorse Centers. The basic gist of his approach is that even when somebody is delusional or psychotic, there will be moments of clarity there. He said you have to wait for those moments when you can really connect with that person and let them know what's going on, and expand those moments until they start to begin to trust the sanity of their mind as well as the insanity.

Part of how his places were started—I had some folks come and visit me to talk about founding these centers—involved a few people whose names I won't use, but they're enormously wealthy. They had children in their family who were psychotic or had psychiatric problems. They said, "We gave them medication. In some cases the medication didn't help. The side effects of obesity, or drooling, or just losing their soul were too draconian. Can you help?" Ed was really a founder of this work, creating places—it took a lot of resources—to be with these people and help them find themselves again. That was pretty interesting.

Or, as I mentioned, there's DBT—Dialectical Behavior Therapy developed by Marsha Linehan—that works with mindfulness and builds the capacity to be with distress for borderline personality and other quite difficult conditions.

But even in the simplest way, when I teach with Dan Siegel, a colleague and neuroscientist from UCLA, people will come to him with depression. And he listens. Sometimes it's situational depression because someone died or circumstances changed. Sometimes it's a kind of ongoing depression that's been there for a while. He'll take out his prescription pad and write a prescription that says: "45 minutes to one hour of strong aerobic exercise, six times a week. Come see me in three months."

And more than half of the people who are depressed and come see him three months later are fine—because they've been sitting at their desks or their computers, moping or unable to work, unable to move in some way because of how their life has been organized. When they actually get their body moving—no meditation, just pay attention a little bit—for more than half of them, that changes everything.

This also says something about our culture and our mental health system, that we've forgotten some really basic things. And all of these approaches, like the RAIN practice we just did, are ways of recognizing and appreciating or understanding, then investigating and not identifying—moving us from what's unhealthy to what are healthy states.

Now this is especially important in trauma, which was brought up by the question just a little bit ago. Trauma is a very complex thing. It's held in the body. There are all these emotions. There are stories and social needs woven into it. All of these are present together.

So good trauma work begins—and you can look at the work of Peter Levine's Somatic Experiencing or EMDR—by tracking how trauma is held in the body. But even before that, by establishing some resource for that person so that they're stable enough to approach the trauma without getting re-traumatized. Then they can begin to tell their story, they can begin to activate those emotions. Because what happens in trauma, basically, is that something terrible happens, you go into fight, flight, or freeze, and you can't bear what's happening to you, so you dissociate from it to survive and get through it. But if it's not released, it remains in your body. It can stay there for years or decades.

We see this with veterans who come back when they haven't had good trauma work. That becomes their demons. I remember talking to a vet who'd come on a retreat. He sat and relived the firefights, the battles—while sitting on his cushion. The things that used to be in his nightmares and wake him up every night. But now he was reliving them consciously. And he said, "Because I did, I could come to terms with them in an entirely different way."

So there's the body part of unlayering. There's the tolerance of the emotions, little by little. And then there is often the storytelling.

I think of this woman who came here on a retreat, who'd been in the war in Kosovo. She'd been injured and she'd seen terrible things. And she said, "Nobody has really heard my story. People don't want to hear your war stories." I said, "Well, I'm interested, but we're on a silent retreat. Could you do this for me? Could you write some of your stories? I'll read them and then we'll talk."

Okay.

Three days later, she comes in and hands me eighty pages of handwritten material. I think to myself, "I hope she can write well, because I've got to read all this." It turns out that not only did she tell the stories of suffering and pain from that war zone, but she had fallen in love with someone, and half of it was a love story woven between the firefights and battles. I'm up at night turning the pages to see what's going to happen next.

Or when I've worked with vets coming back—done some of that work with my colleagues Michael Meade and Luis Rodriguez, retreats for returning vets, especially combat vets—one of the things that happens is that we create a safe enough place and do some rituals to make it feel really safe for them to tell their stories. They can't tell them to their families. Because here's the issue, as they would say in their language:

First, I can't tell you what I saw. It was so horrific. How can you talk about dismembered bodies and blown-up children? Nobody wants to hear that.

But then there's something worse. I can't tell you what I had to do.

And that is what the Irish call a geis on your soul—a weight that you carry because you were in a certain position as a warrior.

where you had to do things that are really inhuman. And you need somehow to find forgiveness for that.

The fact that these warriors coming back can be together is powerful. We start by telling myths of warriors returning—in Africa, in Tibet, the Mayan warriors—because every culture has stories about how to bring warriors back and reconnect them with their lives. This isn't just a modern problem. And then these men realize, "Oh, it's not just me. This is the archetypal dilemma of a warrior. How do you come home?"

I could tell you some very powerful stories. But here's how it works: they tell their stories. Often we have them write a little story or a poem. And in the end, we invite their families to come in after a week. The men stand up and read or tell some of their story. And we have a ritual. We say, "We have heard your story. We bear witness to your suffering. And now, as a warrior, we welcome you back—not into the life of a warrior, but into the life of the home and the life of the land." We do a whole ritual. "We welcome you home. We see who you are. We see what you've suffered."

To be able to do that is an extraordinary thing. It's a kind of redemption for them. When you think about Iraq and Afghanistan, there have been at least a couple million people who were in the "theater of war" there. And mostly they come back and are disgorged by a bus onto a street corner—"Okay, go home"—without any place to understand what they still carry in their lives.

So this is giving you a sense of how trauma work holds and works. You need the stability and grounding so they don't get overwhelmed. You need a sacred or safe container. You need to allow for the emotional release, the storytelling—but more than anything, what's there needs to come out of the body.

It's like this story I use of the man who wrote to the IRS and said, "I haven't been able to sleep since I cheated on my taxes last year. So I've enclosed an anonymous cashier's check for $3,000. If I still can't sleep, I'll send the rest."

And that's how we are. We do things a little at a time. For good trauma work, you have to understand that kind of gradual ability to release trauma. It grows as the capacity for presence comes—resilience and regulation, expanding the window of tolerance. All of those things.

But it's not just people coming back from battle. Here, let me read you something:

"Am I gorgeous?" my child asks, drawing the word out like pulled taffy. "Yes," I say, "you are." The pink and teal dress is probably made of some highly flammable material, an approximation of satin. Pudgy fingers decorated with pink polish trace the sequins on the bodice. "I love this." A giant pair of bubblegum pink wings flap slowly. Little feet dance in sparkly red slippers. "I'm just like a real princess." "Yes," I say, "you are." Curly hair, joyful smile, flawless skin. This child, as all children, is the epitome of childhood beauty. This child—my son.

He's four years old and prefers to wear dresses. Maybe it's a phase, maybe not. Even as I wonder how I produced such an angelic-looking creature, I wish he would put on some pants and go back to play with toy tractors—not because it matters to me, it doesn't—but because I'm already hearing in my head the name-calling he'll face in kindergarten. Many adults are already disturbed by the dresses and utter apologies when they realize he's not female. This culture wants little boys to dream only of baseball, trucks, and trains. This culture has no room for little boys who want to be gorgeous.

He picks up a parasol a neighbor gave him and opens it jauntily over his shoulder. "Am I beautiful?" he asks.

I sweep him into my arms and plant a kiss on his cheek. "Always," I say. "Always."

You can feel the tenderness when you hear that story. You know what it's like.

In the years of leading men's retreats, we'll do a council in the evenings where men listen to each other. Sometimes in the middle of the retreat, we'll make a theme of fathers and sons, and people will hold a talking piece and tell a story about that. The father wounds come out then. But usually we'll also take an evening and ask men to tell their sexual history. Just for those of you who aren't men in the room—men are really confused. There's quite a bit of suffering. It's not "Whoopee, let's talk about sex." It's more like, "Oh my God, here are the mistakes, here are the difficulties, here's my confusion about it." And then when the gay men talk, the level of suffering that has been in many people's lives is enormous.

So there's that story, just telling you what might happen to those human beings. They just come out as a baby and say, "Here's who I am." And the culture says, "I'm sorry. Your skin is the wrong color. Your orientation is wrong." And then you get mistreated, sometimes in really terrible ways. Yet we come with this original innocence.

So here we are, training ourselves in a deeper capacity to be present for the ten thousand joys and sorrows of the world. Acknowledging what's here, making the space of loving awareness so that our awareness is bigger than the experience itself. Noticing where it is in the body, being able to name it. If fear comes, you name it: "Oh, fear. Anxious. Fear. Fear." Maybe it takes you fifty or a hundred times, but at some point fear will come and you'll go, "Oh, fear—I know you. Yeah, okay, fear. Let's see what happens." And you lose your fear of it.

Or maybe, as I said, you're restless or you're bored or you're lonely. And so you want to tolerate your loneliness. "Don't abandon your loneliness," writes the poet Hafiz. "Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few ingredients can."

So you sit here and you're lonely or bored. What to do? Be bored. Be lonely. Let it cut more deeply, so to speak. Let yourself think, "Okay, I'll die of boredom. I'll die of restlessness." Because if you don't, you know what happens? You're home and you get a little bored or a little lonely. What do you do? You open the refrigerator. You go online. You do anything because you can't be with yourself.

To be able to tolerate your loneliness or boredom or your grief or your desire—and desire isn't a bad thing. There are healthy and unhealthy desires. It can be addictive, but it also can be healthy. The thing is, it's part of you, part of being a human being. It's like the poet Alison Luterman wrote—it's kind of like, "I hid the chocolate chip cookies because I'm on a diet. Meanwhile, I'm the only person in the entire galaxy who knows where those chocolate chip cookies are hidden." That's how desire is. You can't remove it from your body, but you can see it and you can understand it.

And grief is really important.

We talked about how Malidoma and the Lakota Native Americans see grief as a doorway to what's sacred or holy—that people who are grieving are said to have more powerful prayers because they're connected with the sacred in the world in some way.

I think about retreats I've done with kids coming out of street gangs, again with Luis Rodriguez, this wonderful Latino poet, Michael Meade, a mythologist, and Malidoma. We're going to teach them meditation, do poetry, mythology. And these guys come and they sit in the back with their hoods over their heads and their hats turned back, and they're like, "Man, you're giving me a poem? I'm out on the street. People have got nine millimeters. You got something better than that?" This is tough.

So we'll say, "You know, we can't even begin to have a conversation because there are too many people in this room who haven't been acknowledged, who are with us. So would you go out in the parking lot and pick up a stone for every young person you know who's been killed?" We light a candle and put it in the middle of a table—it's a very simple ritual. And when you put the stone by the candle, just say their name. "This is for Tito, and this is for RJ, and this is for Homegirl," and so forth.

Some of these kids come back and their hands have lots of stones. No young person should know that many dead people. And they'll put them down, and there's a reverence when they say the name of their homies who were killed. Then we sit back down and all of a sudden the hoods come off and their eyes are open. They say, "Okay, this is a place where we can talk about what happened. These people aren't afraid to talk about it."

In a way, this is what we're learning in meditation—a kind of equanimity and balance, an ability to be present for what is here, to make the space in heart and mind with loving awareness that says, "Yes, we can do this."

As we practice, the research from Alan Wallace and Cliff Saron shows a growing ability to be in balance with all things. Cliff is at UC Davis, Alan Wallace at Santa Barbara. There grows a kind of equanimity, an ability to be at ease with birth and death, joy and sorrow—maybe even with the mystery of things.

The image that's used is this: if you put a spoonful of salt in a cup of water, it will taste very salty. But if you put that same spoon of salt in a pond or a lake, the water still remains pure and clear. In the same way, you can make your mind more spacious like sky, like time and space. And when you do that, when your loving awareness expands, it gives you a kind of great freedom.

Here's a story from a woman named Maria who works as a nurse in the emergency room of a local hospital. She describes how she's learned to use the art of resting in spacious or loving awareness:

"Sometimes it's not too busy and I can work on automatic—check on a patient or do the paperwork while my mind drifts off to think about a million other things. Then we might get a whole crowd of incoming patients: accidents, heart attacks, asthma emergencies. I do my part, but I'm also tuned into the whole of what's going on. I've learned to open the awareness. It's as if my mind gets spacious and still, present, sensitive to what's needed, yet kind of detached at the same time. I guess it's like that flow state that athletes talk about. I'm in the middle doing all the right things, yet some part of me is just watching it all, silent.

"It happens more these days, not just at work. And when I do my meditation practice, it gets stronger. I had a big fight with my teenage son. In the middle of it, I could feel my body tightening, how right I thought my view was. Just feeling that, I relaxed, shifted to the space of awareness, and things opened up. I was saying no, but I could also feel all the love underneath, and how these were just our roles and we had to play them well. And behind it, it was all spacious and all okay."

When we learn to rest in awareness, there's both caring and silence. There's a big space to allow life, to respond in the dance of life. And yet there's all this freedom that starts to open up as well.

And so this is the growth of equanimity.

A few lines from Mary Oliver, where she writes, "For years and years, I tried just to love my life." That line alone is about half of spiritual practice. "And then the butterfly rose weightless in the wind. Don't love your life too much. And she vanished into the world."

And so this is kind of that balance. T.S. Eliot says, "Teach us to care and not to care." To both be present for life in an intimate and a caring way, but also to realize, like Issa wrote of his daughter, that it is like dew, that it vanishes. And that this is also the truth of our life.

Thich Nhat Hanh puts it this way. He said, "When the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive."

And so you know who that one person is. As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi." But you become that person as you train in this capacity. And it also allows you then to not just be caught in the current drama, but to have some vast perspective, the turning of the seasons.

You all know that phrase from the Ojibwe: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

And it is really so mysterious. A friend of mine who's a hospice director was also trained as a teacher in Buddhist meditation. He said one morning he had an old guy from an Italian family who was in his mid-eighties and close to dying from cancer. And the family came in and said, "We have a dilemma. We've got to go see our father." They were in their fifties. My friend said, "Well, what's the dilemma?" They said, "Well, his younger brother, who was seventy-nine, just died yesterday in a car accident. And our dad is so close to dying that we don't know whether we should tell him or not. Maybe it will disturb him. We want him to be peaceful. What should we do?"

And my friend said, "Well, let's go and visit your father and maybe we'll get a sense of what's right." This is a very good mindful move. Let's not make up our minds. Let's actually go and pay attention to what's happening.

So they went in the room. "How are you today, Dad?" Very weak, you know, close to the end. They're talking to him. "Nice to see you again," whatever. And then he says, "Don't you have something to tell me?" They said, "What do you mean?" He said, "Well, my brother—he died yesterday." They said, "Well, how do you know that?" And he said, "Oh, I've been talking to him all night."

What do you make of that, folks? This is our life. It's really mysterious. And the spaciousness of awareness says, "Oh, human incarnation. We're going to have some pain. We're going to have gorgeous beauty. We're going to have love."

We're going to have fear. This is what human incarnation is. And we can make something magnificent of it.

Equanimity is that capacity to be present for praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, fame and disrepute—and to know it's all part of the game in vastness. But it's not who you are. You are the space of awareness itself that witnesses it. And that connects you with everything when you get quiet.

As Alice Walker wrote, she said, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was. And it came to me—that feeling of being part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried. I ran all around the house." In fact, when it happens, you can't miss it. And we all know it—making love, or walking in the mountains, or listening to an amazing piece of music, or taking some sacred medicine, or sitting there with someone when they die or when they're getting born. And you go, "Whoa, this is pretty wild."

I was talking with my wife, Trudy, who had a huge mystical experience when her daughter was born. She was alone for hours in labor. It was back in the day when people were not all that careful—a while in medicine when babies were thought to not have any feelings, so you didn't have to anesthetize them. Animals don't have any feelings. Give me a break. You do meditation, you can go back and feel what it was like to be in the womb when you get very quiet. All the way back, those memories are in your body.

But there she was, all alone, 21 years old, long labor, tremendous pain, frightened some. And then she said, "Something remarkable happened. All of a sudden, my mind just exploded and it became vast like the sky. And I felt not myself giving birth, but that I was women. I was all the women on the earth that had given birth and that always had and always will, and that it wasn't personal at all." And then she said, "I was shocked. That means walking down the street, everybody I saw came out of a woman's body." They kind of forget that, right? I mean, it's wild. You were this little thing and you grew up in there. Okay, I'm here. It's pretty insane. And she said, "All of a sudden, I felt like I was part of something so enormous and vast, and it wasn't personal at all. It was the game of life which we are born into."

So this is the basis for a practice called equanimity practice.

The equanimity practice, which is like the compassion training or perhaps the loving-kindness practice many of you have done, is a combination of envisioning and using certain phrases that invite a quality of equanimity.

The phrases are: May I see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May I be spacious, balanced, and at ease. May I live with a peaceful heart.

And then there's one more. A tough one.

And this is when you're doing equanimity for other people as we expand the practice. Equanimity serves as a balance for compassion and loving kindness. When you do the practices of compassion and loving kindness, they can sometimes fall into attachment. "I love this person, and I really want them to get better, and I really want them to get their act together, and I'm really compassionate for them, but I want this or that." You feel not only love or care, but also some hope that there'll be some way or something for you. And it can go to the level of codependence, where you do everything for somebody that they need to learn to do for themselves.

So the last phrase of the equanimity practice, as you picture people who are close to you or others, is: "Your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions, and not my wishes for you."

Here you've been doing compassion—"May you be held in compassion"—and loving kindness—"May you be held in loving kindness"—and so forth. But then, to balance that so you don't get lost in it, you realize you can care for them, you can love them, but you can't be happy for them. You can't let go for them. You can't live for them. And so then you say, "Your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions and not my wishes for you." And you can feel the truth of it. It places the responsibility, the capacity to awaken, in the hands and heart of that person.

It's actually quite helpful in difficult relationships. I remember teaching this—I ran a group, or was invited to run a group, for women of color at Alice Walker's home for about a decade. Very accomplished women: a professor at Berkeley, the head of HIV services for the city of San Francisco, Alice as a Pulitzer Prize winner, and so forth. When I taught this, I was a little nervous, thinking they might feel it was cold and uncaring. But in fact, when we finished, it was really important because they said, "In our community, especially a community of people of color and target communities where there's been a lot of suffering, a lot of racism, a lot of difficulty, those of us who were accomplished in some way—many people will come and say, 'Help me. Help me publish my book. Give me money. Fix my family. Do something for me because you have power and money and I need it.'" They said it's very easy to get overwhelmed by the need. And so to hear this and be able to say, "I can love you, I can do what I'm able to do, but your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions and not my wishes for you," was actually important and liberating for them.

You understand? So, are you ready?

Let your eyes close. As always, we'll begin by just coming back to feel your breath and body as you sit here. Relax with each breath. As you sit quietly, you can reflect on the value of a peaceful heart—the value of moving through all the changes, praise and blame, gain and loss, and living with a sense of balance.

Let yourself acknowledge that all created things arise and pass away. Joys and sorrows. Pleasant and unpleasant events. People, animals, buildings, nations, whole civilizations rise and fall. Let yourself come to rest in the midst of it all.

May I see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May I be spacious, balanced, at ease.

Feel the vastness of the turning of the seasons, the changes of life.

May I move through the world with a peaceful heart.

Let your loving awareness open like the sky, as big as this room or as vast as the sky beyond. And within it arise feelings and thoughts and experiences.

May I see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May I be spacious and balanced and at ease. May I move through the world with a peaceful heart.

And now let yourself think of someone for whom you want to wish this same quality of peace and equanimity. Picture them, remember or envision them. And as if you could share the field of spaciousness and peace with them as you envision them:

May you be spacious and balanced and at ease. May you see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May you move through the world with a peaceful heart.

Your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions and not my wishes for you. You can love them and care for them, but you can't be happy for them. You can't live for them. Your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions and not my wishes for you. May you see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance.

Now think of another person for whom you want to wish a peaceful heart. Picture them too.

May you see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May you be spacious, balanced, and at ease. May you move through the world with a peaceful heart.

And in the end, your happiness and suffering depend on your thoughts and actions and not my wishes for you. I can love you or care for you, but it's in your own heart and mind, your happiness and suffering.

And feel that the circles of peacefulness can extend to everyone seated in this room around you. May all of us see the arising and passing of all things with equanimity and balance. May we live with a peaceful heart.

And imagine or sense or feel that you could extend the well-wishing of equanimity and peace out from this room, across the landscape—to the firefighters and the people who are losing their homes, to all the communities around them, to all the people of the Bay Area, to the animals, birds of the sky and beasts of the fields, fish in the waters.

And that the sense of peace could spread far and wide across the continents and the nations and the world.

May beings everywhere learn to see the arising and passing of all life with equanimity and balance. May beings everywhere be spacious, balanced, and at ease. May beings everywhere live with a peaceful heart.

So again, these are practices, and there are many of them, and some may work for you better than others. You might find compassion is good and equanimity feels too detached or dry, or you might find being with your breath and body is a great way to practice, but then this feels very mechanical. So don't judge yourself, but rather respect and listen without judgment to what serves you.

But what's also true about these kinds of practices is you don't just take one piano lesson, you know, or one tennis lesson or one lesson in coding. That's why it's called practice rather than perfect or something else, right? So you do it and you do it a number of times. And as you do, more and more of the states that you're inviting, or the perspective, start to become available to you.

A participant shares: "When I was seven years old, I watched my mother die in a car accident. I was in the accident. And it took me sixty-two years—I counted it up—before I could grieve. Thanks to this wonderful therapist who introduced me to mindfulness. And I guess my point is that it's never too late."

Hmm.

And now, ironically, we're having difficulty locating her. She lives in Santa Rosa, so we're hoping.

Thank you for that. It's really, really important what you say. First, the loss is great—for a seven-year-old, grievous. But to say it's never too late, and that these things can be held for so long and then released, it's really, really important. So thank you.

Yes, please.

Participant: So Jack, I want to acknowledge that you said this in your teaching, but a cautionary tale for me is that when I first came to Spirit Rock, I was told to practice like my hair was on fire.

You don't have a lot of hair, I noticed.

It burned off. It all burned off. And it was a club that I used to attack myself. Then over the years, Spirit Rock changed and there was a lot more about equanimity practices, wisdom practices, joy. And again, in my hardheadedness, they were all ways that I used to attack myself. I remember I went to a talk at the Zen Center by Ajahn Sumedho, and somebody asked him about these, and he said, "You know, I never did them. They didn't work for me." And it shocked me because I had never heard anybody say that before.

Never did what?

These kinds of practices—the equanimity and the loving-kindness. And I read a poem by a Japanese priest that said to trust your practice. It's like water flowing downhill; it will find the best way down. And I've come to understand that—I don't know how this happened—but I've learned complete faith in my practice. It'll take me where I need to go.

It will teach me the equanimity I need to learn. I don't do that. I can't do that. I've already learned that. But my practice is not me. It's something that happens to me. And I've learned to just really trust it. It knows. I don't have to.

Thank you. Really important and critical things that you say. The first, with a lot of respect to you, is that you do have to be steward of your own practice. And if you read the old Buddhist texts, there are actually a lot of practices in there. Some are fitting for a certain person and some are not, which is part of what you're pointing out.

And here's a little note about Ajahn Sumedho, who's an old friend that I've known for fifty years. I could show you something that he wrote back in the 1970s or '80s where loving-kindness meditation was really important for him. So I need to say that only because it's also true that some of these practices may be helpful for you at a particular time and may not be helpful at another time. You either outgrow them or they don't fit. And so that follows just what you're saying about respecting and paying attention to yourself.

And what I've seen now over these decades of both training teachers and being with people in our community, just as you say, is that the work of the heart and mind that's dedicated—each in your own way—to attention and kindness, however you practice it, changes us. And I really see it.

I have this passage from Tamara Engel, who wrote this in the last weeks of her life. She says, "My days are short, and as I grow weaker, I experience so much gratitude for my meditation. Not only the joy and ease that it brought, but the hard parts. For every bored and restless sitting, and every fearful fantasy about my illness, and every pain and ache I sat through, and every itch I didn't scratch—it was a training for kindness. A training for the muscle of bearing witness. For the trusting spirit that carries me now, even as I face my death."

And so that was her description, like yours, of trusting practice in the way that worked for her. Thank you for that beautiful comment.

One more in the back, please.

Participant: I'm glad you just said there are different practices for different times. I remember there have been times, especially when I was falling in love, when I was trying to have equanimity and I just couldn't do it. And I was just reflecting that you do need to have different practices at different times—but how do you know? How do you know when to do what?

It's a great question. And I would say, how do you know who to marry? How do you know which job to pick? Nobody can answer it for you. Sometimes it's some intuitive knowing. Sometimes it's based on trying things.

Trial marriage? Well, maybe. Done that. With this, you don't have to get a divorce from your meditation, fortunately. But I think you try stuff. Maybe you say, I'll try it for a bit because it feels like it might be helpful. And if you try it for a while and it doesn't feel helpful, maybe this isn't the right thing or the right time. So it really is a deep listening to yourself, more than anything else.

Let's take a few more questions or comments before the next section because we're covering a lot of different material and approaches today. Anything anyone would like to raise as a comment, question, experience?

A participant speaks

Earlier in one of the sessions, you mentioned the river of thoughts.

Yes, I mentioned the river of thoughts.

It comes through, and I noticed in one of the trainings you did earlier, naming the thoughts seems to make the river of thoughts slow down a little bit. And then I also seem to notice that there was a space between thoughts.

Beautiful. And what's in that space? What is that? What a great question. Or maybe—who's in that space? That's a fabulous question.

It's true that when you turn your attention to thoughts, there comes a kind of shift from being inside the thought—where you're in Chicago now doing a business deal, or dealing with your long-lost brother or sister and their family, you're right in the middle of it—to noticing, "Oh, there's a thought about Chicago," or "There's a thought about whatever it is." It's like you step outside of it. And if you name it—"planning" or "remembering" or "envisioning"—very often it will kind of dissolve, like fog under sunlight. Which is what you described: sometimes it will dissolve or disappear.

And then you notice, whether you do that or not, that there are spaces between thoughts. And the spaces between thoughts become very interesting, because we usually are so identified with our thoughts that the spaces between thoughts start to show us who we are—or what we are—when we're not thinking, when we're not taking that as an identity.

I'll say a few things about it because it gives an opportunity to talk about three levels of mindfulness. The first level of mindfulness is the level of being able to be present for the content of experience. As we're practicing and training, we're able more and more to acknowledge: this is fear, this is longing, this is the planning mind, this is anxiety, this is love.

This is the memory of conflict or the memory of great pleasure. This is sexual desire. This is some spiritual ideal or ideas that we have. This is physical pain in the body or pleasure. We become able to notice the content—this is sort of recognizing and accepting—and become able to be present for it. Already that gives us a great deal of freedom, because we're not afraid of that bigger range of experience.

The second level of mindfulness is mindfulness of the process. As we pay attention more and more, we notice that nothing lasts. Every thought and every sensation and every mood and every feeling, if we track it and name it, arises for a time and passes away. We start to see the river of thoughts, the stream of emotions. When we pay attention to the body, it too has all these changing sensations. Even something that feels stuck and solid and painful—when you pay really close attention, it has lots of little sensations that make it up. Some pain actually has fire and needle pinpricks, or vibrating, or something like that.

The more closely you pay attention, experience gets pixelated, the way those little pixels are on a screen. Nothing is solid. It's all created in solidity by the mind. The eye isn't a camera that just looks at you and you and you. If you look closely at the eye, you would see that it's actually vibrating a little bit, picking up experiences on the retina from different angles. Then it goes up through the optic nerve and it's your little brain that organizes it and says, "Oh, that's a man and that's a woman and that's a cow." But the eye isn't seeing it stably that way. Our brain creates—our mind creates—the solidity of the world.

As you become more closely attentive, that solidity starts to dissolve. You see that there are not only thoughts but spaces between thoughts. One feeling follows another. Sensations are really a field of vibrating sensations. You start to realize that you can't hold on to things in the way that you thought you could, because they're always changing. If you try to hold on, you get rope burn, basically, because they're not going to stay still.

Every experience starts to show itself as impermanent, as tentative, as insubstantial in some way, because whatever it is, it dissolves. The strongest feeling, the best thought, the worst thought—they come and they go. This is what happens. And there's a certain kind of unsatisfactoriness to it all, in that none of it can be a place to rest. None of it gives you lasting, stable happiness. Even with the great pleasures, which are wonderful to enjoy, they change. And when you're in the middle of them, you think, "How much longer? How can I hold on to this? How do I get more of this?" Even in the middle, there's that little worry, because you know that however cool and wonderful that experience is—oh my God, it's so great—it's not going to last forever.

And so there comes a kind of wisdom. The first level of wisdom is just that you can be with all of human experience. The second one is you realize, "Oh, it's a river. It's changing all the time." So you learn how to be with changing experience and ungraspable experience. That's from content to process.

Then, as we go further, the third level of mindfulness—which your question points to—is to begin to become aware of consciousness itself, of awareness, and to turn your attention back to the space between thoughts, to the knower and the knowing. Who is it that's noticing that everything's impermanent? Who is it that's noticing the arising and passing of things? I'm not going to go into that further for this moment, because in half an hour or so, that's going to be the next piece of what we talk about. So you're kind of leading us to that. That's a great question.

Question from audience: I have a question about equanimity. I've heard it described as the love that allows.

Yes.

When I'm by myself at home, I find that I often feel the need emotionally to...

It's almost to have permission or to be allowed to come through.

"Wait, so there you are, you're home alone, and you feel the need to... to allow myself to open."

Permission to open.

"Yeah. I mean, I feel the permission, say, when you were just talking about equanimity, and it's just lovely. It feels wonderful. And at home, I probably don't even realize how clenched I am. So to begin to unclench, to allow myself equanimity, you might say—what would you suggest?"

Sounds good. I mean, you know, part of what's true is that our organism always expands and contracts. And sometimes people get the idea that if I'm successful in meditation and spiritual life, I'm going to become spacious like the sky and allow all things. And that's how I'll move through life—just so expansive, open, everything always open.

But you have to breathe. Your body breathes, and your heart pumps, open and closed. The cerebrospinal fluid pumps. And it turns out the heart opens and closes too—the psychic level of the heart. And the mind opens and closes too.

So the point isn't to get to some state and say, "Now I have it," but to be respectful and compassionate with opening and closing. When you notice that things become tight or contracted or attached, with mindfulness you notice that. And sometimes just in the noticing, that's enough. Or sometimes you might say, "Let me bring in a little kindness or compassion or just an invitation to open."

I think that quality of invitation that you described is a lovely way to describe this practice—which is, when we've gotten lost in some way, to repeatedly invite mindfulness to be present. One of the translations of sati, sati sampajañña, the word for mindfulness, is "remembering." So that's what you're doing. You're remembering: "Oh yeah, I can breathe, I can make space." That's lovely.

Someone asked where to find the different meditations we're doing. There are written versions in many of the things I've done. A lot of them are in The Wise Heart. There's even more of them in The Art of Forgiveness, Loving-Kindness, and Peace—about fifteen meditations in there. And then there are many online—my own, and Sharon Salzberg, Tara Brach, Joseph Goldstein, and various teachers who offer versions of loving-kindness, compassion, or forgiveness. YouTube has lots of this.

Now I want to move on to a few more sections. The next has to do with forgiveness. In terms of self-care and care in the world, there are so many liberating tools. There are the tools of wise speech—sometimes translated as "right speech"—and how to pay attention to our words and have them connected with our best values.

With compassion, one of the things that's really central is understanding that it always has to include ourselves. If you feel like you're being compassionate for someone or some circumstance, which is lovely—caring, feeling their difficulty—the question to ask is: Is this action compassionate for them and for this one sitting here, for me? That's the completion of the circle. If it's only them, that falls into codependence or burnout. If it's only yourself, of course, it can fall into separation or self-absorption or narcissism. So compassion is really a circle that includes care for others and care for this one.

Now, one of the things that is both a practice and an understanding of Buddhist psychology is the power of forgiveness. Or as someone beautifully said, "It's never too late to start over again."

And I remember working with this mother whose teenage daughter was really angry at her. She felt as a mom she couldn't do anything right since her husband, the father of this child, had died. And of course, the anger was really part of the daughter's way of grieving—not letting go of her father, holding on. So there was all this struggle between them.

One day they were in the kitchen, and the daughter was complaining, saying she wasn't doing it right. And the mom said to her daughter, very simply, "You'll have to forgive me. I'm doing the best I can since dad died." And that's all. Really, really simple.

Here's a story from my friend Frank Ostaseski, from his book called The Five Invitations. He was the founder of Zen Center Hospice, which has been there for twenty-five years. He tells many different stories, and this is one about Jillian, whose mother was in the middle to late stages of Alzheimer's disease and had lost a lot of her memory and was pretty confused. Jillian had brought her mother home to live with her.

Jillian worked in the publishing industry as an editor, and she came home to her living room one day to find all her beloved books—she had a great library, including her Buddhist texts—scattered across the floor. Her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty old books. I'm going to give them to my dentist." So you can sort of hear a little of the delusion in that, right?

Jillian became really angry right away, scolded her mother's assistant who had come to tend to her and live with them, saying, "How could you let this happen? How could you let her do this?" And the attendant, who wasn't caught up in the whole drama, replied, "Madam, today I pack the books up and tomorrow I will unpack them. And if this gives a sense of control to a woman who has lost so much, well, then it's fine with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

And you can hear how forgiving and gracious that is. That that's just the way it is. The books are down and we can put them back on the shelves, and she won't even notice a little bit later whether she took them down or not. Our ideas about how the world should be and our reactions are very different than the way the world actually is.

So forgiveness, in large ways and small, is a really critical thing for human life. It's necessary, or we are chained to the past, both personally and collectively. As you know, if you have the Northern Irish Protestants and Catholics saying, "Your people marched through our neighborhood three hundred years ago, and did this to our people—we're never going to forget it," then they just keep it going from one generation to another. Am I right?

My dear Irish friend Michael Meade said where he grew up in Brooklyn, people were having a fight and you could walk over and say, "Is this a private fight or can anybody join?" It was like that was part of their sport. But this pattern has created a tremendous amount of suffering in Ireland. Or the Palestinians and the Israelis, or the Bosnians and the Croats and the Serbs, or the Hutus and the Tutsis in Rwanda. And we could go on and on. If there isn't forgiveness, then the next generation continues the cycle. It doesn't have an end to it. And somebody has to say, "It stops with me. It stops with me."

Again, there was a woman who came to see me who was in the middle of a divorce. She had married a very high-powered lawyer. He was the one who had the affair, but nevertheless, he was trying to take the children, turning them against her, and trying to keep all the money. He wasn't all that nice of a fellow. So we started to work together. I said, "Get yourself a killer lawyer. You need something good to protect you." And I told her she'd have to deal with all the suffering with good compassion and so forth.

She came in one day—because he was trying to turn the children against her to get custody, one of those very painful, messy divorces—and she said, "I've come to a realization. I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children."

No matter what my husband does, I will not speak badly of their father to my children. Whatever suffering there is, it stops with me. I will not pass it on.

There was so much courage and dignity and beauty to that state of consciousness, even though she was suffering terribly.

Forgiveness is necessary, or we get locked into the past. And the beautiful thing is that it can be taught. But you need to understand some things about it first as you practice it or teach it.

Many of you have heard this practice or done it before. But the first thing is that it doesn't condone what happened. It doesn't say it's okay—forgive and forget. In fact, the opposite. You can say, "I see it clearly, and I will never again allow this suffering to continue. I'll do everything I can to stop it." It doesn't mean you have to speak with the person you're doing forgiveness with. You can stand up and stop whatever is causing suffering. Forgiveness simply means that you're not going to carry the hatred in your heart. That's all. You do what you need to do to protect yourself and others. It doesn't condone it, but I simply am not going to carry hatred.

And who is it for in the end? You know, the people who betrayed you—I'm talking personally now—they could be on vacation in Maui right now, snorkeling. And you're sitting there thinking, "I hate them, I hate them." Who's suffering?

In the end, it's really for yourself. It's like the two ex-prisoners of war that I always mention, who've been in terrible situations—prisoner of war camp and tortured and all those things—and they meet twenty years later. One says to the other, "Well, have you forgiven your captors yet? Those guards?" And the second one says, "No, never." The first one says, "Well then, they still have you in prison, don't they?"

It's not really for anyone else. They may or may not accept it, and that's not the point. It's so that you don't carry the suffering into the future in your life and pass it on to others.

It also is not a papering over. "Okay, I've done a little forgiveness practice—ha ha, it's all done." You know, sweet, loving Buddhist nonsense. You might experience rage and grief and outrage and anger for a year or two, or however long it takes. But at some point, you realize, okay, it's too much to bear. It's too hard to carry this. And like that IRS check I talked about—that guy—maybe you do it a little step at a time. But finally you realize that you've got to give up all hope for a better past. It's done. It's over. You can't change it. And you don't really want to put anybody out of your heart.

So you realize that the forgiveness is not for them, but it's the quality that you live with. And it's not weak or naive. Like the woman who said, "I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children." It said in the Bhagavad Gita, if you want to see the brave, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the courageous, look to those who can return love for hatred.

And of course there's Martin Luther King, after his church was bombed and children killed, who said, "We will meet your physical force with soul force. We will not hate you, but we will bear the suffering that you offer us, and we will so bear it with so much love that not only will we change ourselves, but we will change your consciousness at the same time."

That's really powerful and tough. So it's not weak at all. It's actually tremendously courageous.

I think about a friend who was working in San Francisco, doing chaplaincy hospice work. There was a man there who was a prisoner who'd been brought to the hospital. He had HIV and Hep C and he was dying. She asked, "Do you want to talk to your family?"

He said, "No, no, no. Since I was put in prison fifteen years ago, I have not talked to my mother."

I think it would break her heart. I just couldn't do it.

"Do you have other brothers and sisters?"

"I have one sister. I haven't talked to her either."

"Well, maybe your mother would like to see you."

And they talked for a while. Eventually he agreed to let this chaplain call his mother. She came some days later—this little old, shaky, older woman who came around the door and just stood and looked at her son. He didn't want his mother to see him shackled to the bed, which he was, still a prisoner.

And my friend said it was like watching the Madonna. It was like watching Mother Mary walk around the corner of the door and look into the room—because she was still his mom. This is my baby. And she stood there and just looked at him with so much love and began to weep out of care for him.

Yes, he was dying. He was dying of HIV and Hep C. But instead of having pushed her away, by somehow inviting her to come in, she began to see him with a kind of forgiveness he couldn't give himself. And that transforms us.

So many stories of forgiveness I could tell you. One good friend of mine, a woman named Sujata Baliga—her story was written up in the New York Times Magazine—is one of the most important figures in the restorative justice movement in America, which brings together people who committed crimes of different kinds with their victims in a very delicate dance over a year or two, preparing them to meet each other and maybe to offer forgiveness.

She grew up abused, sexually abused in her family by her father in terrible ways—all kinds of grave suffering. She was very smart, went to Harvard, and was about to go to law school. She said, "I'm going to get those guys. I'm going to go to law school"—which she did eventually—"and I'm going to prosecute them and throw them all in prison."

But as she started her law practice, she got more and more sick because the anger inside was eating her up. Because her family had come from India and she had grandparents there, she went back to India. Somebody said, "Let's go visit the Dalai Lama and listen to his teaching." They went up to Dharamsala. She left a note at the gate of the Dalai Lama's home saying, "I don't know if it's possible to ask a question, but my anger is eating me up. I graduated Harvard. I'm now doing law. I've been abused, and I don't know what to do."

The next day, a little message came: "Please come Thursday morning. His Holiness will see you."

So she went in to see him. He listened to her story compassionately, as he does, and said, "Two things for you. You have to learn to meditate, including doing some forgiveness practice. And then you have to work with the perpetrators."

She said, "Okay, meditation I think I can handle, but I can't work with those people."

But eventually she did. She tells a story of being in a room with twelve men in a prison who had all been abusers of girls mostly, maybe boys too. She said she was shaking; it was so painful, so difficult. Then as she began to talk to them and listen to them over some weeks, she went in one day to the group and looked around. She didn't see twelve men. She saw twelve abused children—because every single one of them had been abused, mostly sexually abused too. All of a sudden, she said, "I could see the generations of suffering." It didn't justify what they did in any way whatsoever, but it made her able to see their humanity. That changed her heart. She became a real advocate for restorative justice and does all kinds of wonderful work. Sujata Baliga is her name.

I remember standing at the Lincoln Memorial and reading those last lines carved in the stone. It really is a temple, a great temple, where it says, "With malice toward none and charity toward all." That's a remarkable phrase after a civil war that killed literally millions of people. With malice toward none and charity toward all, let us bind up the wounds of this war.

This is also what's asked of us, and what's possible for you. Remember, we started the day talking about inner nobility and dignity for a human being. This is what's possible for us.

So there's a beautiful practice of forgiveness which we'll do now. It serves as a kind of warm-up for loving-kindness, though I'm not sure we'll get to loving-kindness today since we already practiced compassion, and we have a couple more things to do.

Let your eyes close gently. Sit quietly, and we'll practice three directions of forgiveness.

The first time I was taught this, the teacher said, "Do this a couple times a day for ten minutes. Try it out for six months and come back and let me know how it's working." And what that meant was—I thought about it and figured it out—"Oh gosh, he means do it three hundred times." Sometimes the practice brings up the opposite: "I hate them. I'm never going to forgive them." Sometimes it just feels numb or dead. All kinds of things arise.

And what do you do with that? You hold all of it with forgiveness and compassion. Wherever you are is exactly where you start. Maybe all you can say is, "I'm beginning to learn to incline my attention more toward forgiveness, that it might be possible." And that's the move you can make. That's totally fine. You don't want to use any of these practices to judge yourself. You're already too good at that.

So sit quietly and come back to your breath.

The first direction of forgiveness: There are many ways in which I have hurt and harmed others, knowingly or unknowingly. We've all betrayed people, caused them pain and suffering. Every one of us has. Abandoned them, betrayed them. I remember these now, and feel the pain I still carry. Choose one person in particular to ask forgiveness from. "In the ways that I've hurt or harmed you, betrayed you, abandoned you, caused you suffering—out of my own confusion and fear, out of my own pain or anger or hurt—in this moment, I ask your forgiveness. Please forgive me. May I be forgiven." Sense that you can be forgiven. May I be forgiven.

The second direction is forgiveness for yourself. Just as I've hurt or harmed others, there are many ways I have betrayed myself, abandoned myself, caused myself harm or pain, knowingly or unknowingly. I remember these now too, and feel the sorrows I carry. Let yourself choose a particular thing you want to forgive yourself for. "In the ways that I have betrayed myself, abandoned myself, caused myself pain or hurt—out of my own confusion and fear, out of my own ignorance or anger or hurt—I now offer myself forgiveness. I forgive myself." Hold yourself with mercy and tenderness. If you wish, you can put your hand on your heart, whatever allows you to feel that you can be forgiven. I forgive myself. I hold myself with tenderness and mercy. I offer myself forgiveness.

The third direction is to offer forgiveness to those who've hurt you. There are many ways that others have hurt and harmed me, abandoned me, betrayed me, caused me pain and suffering, knowingly or unknowingly. I remember these now too, and feel the sorrows I carry.

And now choose one that it's time to forgive. In the ways that you have hurt or harmed me, abandoned me, betrayed me, knowingly or unknowingly, that you caused me pain, suffering, out of your ignorance and confusion, out of your fear and anger and hurt and pain—I now forgive you. I offer you forgiveness to the extent that I'm ready. To the extent that I'm ready, I forgive you. Feel how liberating it is, how it's possible to let go and forgive. To live with a forgiving heart. To the extent that I'm ready, I offer you forgiveness.

Asking forgiveness of others, offering forgiveness to yourself, and extending forgiveness to those who harmed you. We've all been betrayed and harmed, and we all can forgive. As we do these practices, each one, again, might bring up its opposite, might feel mechanical, might or might not be easy. But they all point to a vast possibility of human freedom, no matter the circumstances of our life.

I saw it with my friend and teacher Maha Ghosananda, who was the Gandhi of Cambodia. Nineteen members of his family were killed. He went around teaching: "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient eternal law." In spite of all that happened, that was what he did. Nominated for the Nobel Prize a number of times, he led people back to their villages and towns, singing, chanting the chants of loving-kindness and forgiveness. This is the way you reclaim your life.

So the question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity—the sense that we're part of some vast mystery. Human incarnation is a really wild thing, you know. I don't know how you got in there. One hole at the end of the body into which you stuff dead plants and animals and grind them up with these bones that hang down. These weird orbs that you look out of. And you ambulate by falling one direction, catching yourself, then falling the other direction. These bipedal things—it's weird. Wiggly things at the end with little bits of claws and a vestigial tail. I mean, come on.

And if you want to really look at it, pay attention the next time you're making love. It's a great thing to do. It's quite wonderful. But it's weird. It is. I mean, come on—no matter what kind of love you make, it's a strange thing. And then the fact that sometimes a little squirt here and a little egg somewhere there, and a new person. This is completely wild. How did that happen?

My teacher Ajahn Chah practiced as a monk in the jungles and forests for about ten years, doing deep meditation trainings—concentration and samādhi and lights. He had all the difficulties that one would have. In those days there were tigers, certainly still lots of snakes and things like that. The inner difficulties of his own fears. But he was very determined, and he had all these wonderful insights and great meditations. He went to another ajahn, the most famous teacher of the time, bowed, and said, "I want to tell you about my meditation. I want some advice." He bowed, paid his respects.

The master listened to him and said, "Chah, you missed the point. Yes, you dissolved your body in light and you had some bodily experiences and you had grief and you had all these experiences." He said, "Those are just experiences. It's like being in the movies. There's a war movie and a romantic comedy and a documentary and a children's movie and so forth." He said, "You've seen a lot of good movies, but the only real question is: to whom do they happen? Otherwise, you're just lost in the movies. Turn back and look at the projector, look at the light."

And his words were, "Become the one who knows." Instead of identifying with all the content or even the changing process, this is that third step of mindfulness, which looks back at awareness itself. Become the knowing itself. Become the awareness. Who you are is loving awareness itself.

Spirit was born into this body; it will die. When you die, it will leave. Anybody who's sat with a number of people dying knows—it's very clear because they'll drift out. They'll describe it: floating, coming back, ocean of light, or whatever. You're not your body.

I was sitting with one of our teachers, Marlene Jones. She had heart failure. A long time passed before the paramedics got there, and she was brought to the hospital, iced, put into a deliberate coma for a while, then brought back. Flatline—fifteen, twenty minutes of no oxygen. No response. Touch her, speak to her, put the monitors on her—nothing.

After about a week, sitting with her daughter and family, it became clear: it was time to unplug her. I held her hand, did a little chanting, and I said, "Marlene, I'm really going to miss you. You're a wonderful woman and a wonderful teacher. I'd hoped we'd have a lot more years together, but you died too quickly. Come on. The least you could do is give a sign—now or later—something, so we know you're all right."

The minute I said that, two tears rolled down her cheeks. They'd gotten nothing for a week, every possible way of trying to stimulate her brain, her body. But I said that and two tears rolled down her cheeks, and then she died, not many minutes after.

This is one of many stories I could tell. You're not your body. You rent it—from Avis or something like that—and you have to turn it back in. Mileage is over, okay, time enough.

You're certainly not your thoughts—I hope not, given the way most people's minds go. You're not your feelings because they're always changing. So who are you?

Well, maybe I'm the awareness. Maybe I'm the witness. But then the interesting thing is you look and you discover there's awareness, but it's not attached to a self. You can't find yourself in there.

Who am I? Neuroscience. There was a Time Magazine neuroscience issue that said, after more than a century of looking for it, brain researchers have long since concluded that there's no conceivable place for a self to be located in the physical brain, and that it simply does not exist. That's the neuroscientist version of it, which means that the idea of self is an idea. It's constructed by our thoughts and our identification.

When you look into the mirror—and you can try this; for some people, it's interesting—you notice you've aged, right? Your body doesn't look like it used to. In my case, it loses its fur. It wrinkles. Our teacher Wes Nisker, who's sort of a humorist, says the hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard. The body does all these weird things. But the thing that's very common is you don't necessarily feel older. You know that experience? Okay, I've aged, but I don't feel that.

That's because it's only your body that's aging. The awareness that's looking says, "Hmm, how are we doing in this incarnation? Well, it looks older. I don't feel any older." The awareness itself exists outside of time. It's not in time. The body is temporal—it goes from little to medium to big, and then it shrinks again. That's what plants and trees and mammals do. But the awareness is timeless.

We are creatures of paradox. We have these bodies, but they're not who we are—and yet you have to honor them. There's a Serbian proverb: "Be grateful, for you are made of stars. Be humble, for you're made of mud."

Ram Dass puts it this way.

He says, "Remember your Buddha nature and your zip code." That you need both. Or your social security number. You have to live in these two worlds—the world of eternity, which is true, from which you come, and also this human incarnation. You need to honor both in this paradox.

And we all know this again. When you're walking in the mountains or listening to an amazing piece of music or sitting with someone who dies or making love, you remember that you're not this small sense of self. As this sense of self, which is fluid, starts to open in meditation, and you become more and more able to become the awareness that witnesses things, then you turn back and realize there isn't even someone there. There's just awareness. This is what you are. You are loving awareness.

Joy comes, luminosity. In Buddhist psychology there are—because they're list makers—twenty kinds of joy. Thrilling joy and tingling joy and dissolving into light joy, all these great kinds. And eighteen kinds of silence.

Instead of that loyalty to your suffering, identity begins to shift. You rest more in the timeless. You see the play of life. And you're comfortable with mystery. Because it is mysterious—no matter what any scientist might say. The best scientists, like Einstein, they say it's all mystery. And you become what's called "the wisdom of insecurity." You become wise enough to see that you don't have to hold on to things.

It's like Somerset Maugham, who wrote all these celebrated novels. Somebody asked him about it and he said, "There are three rules for writing the great English novel. Unfortunately, no one knows what they are." And that's pretty much our predicament.

From this, there comes an ease and a graciousness and a joy, like Gary Snyder saying, don't feel guilty. Being angry or guilty is not what the world needs. It needs a sense that you love it, that it's part of you, that you're connected. That's the power that will save it.

And so there starts to grow a sense of joy.

Here are instructions from the Buddha: "Live in joy and love even among those who hate. Live in joy and health even among the afflicted. Live in joy and peace even among the troubled. Look within, be still, free from fear and attachment. Know the sweet joy of living in the way."

Because your unhappiness or depression and your fear does not help those other people. Actually, the spirit that you bring—whether you go into San Quentin prison or whether you go up to help in the fire area or whether you serve in a thousand other ways—if you go in moping and depressed and upset, it doesn't help anybody.

That's one of the beautiful things. There's a great book published last year, I think it's called The Book of Joy. It's a dialogue between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu, and they laugh a lot. It's this whole week-long dialogue, and people ask them, "How can you have lived through so much suffering in South Africa and apartheid and Tibet and the occupation and the loss of your temples?" And the Dalai Lama says, "Listen, they've taken so much from me. They've taken the temples and our ability to practice our religion and all the sense of what was sacred in our culture. Why should I let them take my happiness?"

So you don't allow that to colonize your heart in some very deep and important way.

As Guillaume Apollinaire says, "Now and then it's good to pause in your pursuit of happiness and just be happy."

And so the idea in meditation isn't to make it a grim duty. "Okay, now I go to the gym and I work out, and now I've got to meditate." It's actually to find a way that nourishes you. Even if it's for three minutes a day that brings a sense of well-being, rest, tending yourself, capacity to be present. And then more than that, becoming the witness, becoming the loving awareness that says, "Hmm, today has joy and sorrow. Let me be the loving witness of it all."

And there are all kinds of beautiful practices that increase joy. Just as there's a compassion practice or an equanimity practice, there's a joy practice. The way you start is to envision—you might start with another person that you care about, to picture their best adventure as a young child, or to do it in yourself. To think back to that day, one of your best adventures, your most joyful day: tickled, laughing, rolling around in the grass, playing tag, enjoying being with others.

I like to start it where you picture somebody else you care about, and imagine their best day as a young child, and how they were. Because there's a youthful spirit. Raccoons and otters and baby chimpanzees—they all like to play when they're little. They delight in life. And that was born in you too, even if you had a very difficult childhood, which some of you clearly did. There were moments where you could do that.

I've been in refugee camps, and these kids make little cars out of old cans of milk that were brought by the UN or something—an empty can, and they put a couple of them on a stick and go racing around. Kids are kids. And there's a child of the spirit in every single person, sometimes buried in there a bit.

The joy practice begins to see that in each person you meet and to invite: may that joy increase, may their happiness grow. And more and more you begin to allow yourself to tune yourself to well-being. Of course, you'll have people who say, "Well, this isn't possible for me. My suffering is too great." But if you see it in them, then sometimes they start to see it in themselves.

So this is another of the many possibilities in Buddhist psychology: who you really are is not limited to your history. Consciousness is actually free to create itself.

And another Ram Dass story, just because it's kind of fun to tell them. He was going to come back from India. He actually wanted to stay for much longer with his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, practicing. And then at some point, his guru said, "Now it's time for you to go back and share this with people in America."

Ram Dass thought about it. He said, "You know, I feel so uncooked, and I feel really impure, and I know about my imperfections. I think I should practice a while longer before I go and try to teach anybody else."

His guru looked at him and got up off the little wooden bench where he sat. He took a couple of minutes and walked over to Ram Dass. He looked him up and down, turned around the side and looked, went around the back and looked him up and down, and around the other side. He spent a long time looking at him, then sat back down and peered into his eyes. And he said, "I see no imperfections."

There's something in India that's called the glance of mercy, where a teacher looks at you with so much affection and love that it just rewires your brain. It just changes your life—because they see something so beautiful in you that you haven't let yourself know that you carry. "I see no imperfections."

And so, yes, all the trainings—we can direct ourselves toward more love or compassion or healthier states of mind. But even those are not the deep level. The real level is that you are free, and you've always been free. And that's what's true. And then you get to create, with this amazing human incarnation, what you will do.

So one more principle—central principles, there's so many things we could do. The last one before we do a meditation and a ritual to end the day. And this is to talk about the power of intentions. Or cause and effect. Sometimes talked about as karma.

A description. A psychological description of how the world works. If you're really angry and you treat the world with anger, guess what will come back to you? Anger. Other people will respond in kind. If you're really loving and you treat the world lovingly, guess what will start to come back to you, much more anyway? Love. It just works that way.

And the key to it is intention. If you get in your car and you crash through your neighbor's fence into their living room because you are really pissed that they cut down all the great old trees right on the lot line between yours and theirs, and then they let their dog run on your lawn and poop on your lawn and blast loud music, and you hate your neighbor and you get overcome with it and you drive your car through the hedge and into their house—well, the little blue police lights will come and they'll haul you away for destruction of property and illegal things and lock you up.

Now, if you get in your car and you crash through their fence and their hedge into the living room because your accelerator stuck, bad model, and you can't stop it—exactly the same activity. You're in your car, you crash through the hedge and the fence, you crash into their living room. The only difference is your intention. And that intention then changes everything. "Oh, you know, he may be upset, but I'm so sorry. I'm sorry for you. We have to call the insurance." "Yes, let's call people to get it fixed." They don't call the police about it, like you've done something wrong. The source of karma is the intention behind your actions. And that's how the world treats you and how it will respond.

So to understand intention is extremely important in Buddhist psychology. And there are two forms: short-term and long-term intention.

Short-term intention comes with a great practice called the mindful pause. You're in the middle of a little conflict with someone, or you're going to return a text or an email, or respond to somebody. Or you're in a meeting or whatever, and you're about to react and get back at somebody. And before you do anything, you take a breath or two and you pause—the mindful pause—and then you ask yourself, "What's my best intention?" Or, "What's my highest intention?"

And there you are. Let's take a couple, since some of you are in a relationship, and you're having a little conflict that could happen in your marriage or in your life. Normally when somebody says something that triggers us, we often will want to respond to say how we're right and how they're wrong. Get even, show what we know or something like that. You take a breath, you do the little mindful pause. And instead of doing that, you say, "All right, what's my best intention?" Well, it's not to get even. It's not to show that I'm right. It's really to connect or to love this person, or to open in some other way, to understand. And the minute you ask, "What's my best intention?"—usually it comes very clearly—the tone of your voice changes, what you have to say changes.

Even if you read that text you're about to send. Okay, you pause before you press send. You're upset with that person. "What's my best intention?" Oh, I think I need to change the language a little bit. Let me go back and edit that thing or that email, and make the tone more appreciative or more understanding or more inviting of learning rather than being right. And people actually appreciate that a lot.

It's like what I said about anger. If you say to somebody, "I'm angry at you," you get a particular response. But if you pay attention and notice that underneath your anger you feel hurt or you feel afraid or you feel worried or disrespected, and you can say, "I'm afraid. I'm worried about this," or "I feel hurt"—they listen to you better. They want to hear what you have to say.

So you pause in the midst of communication. What's my highest intention? Oh yes, I'm going to change this a little because my intention is really to connect, or to love, or whatever your intention is. And it changes everything. You don't even change very many words. But the tone and the intention creates a very different karma. You know what I'm saying? This is a really, really useful practice.

Now in another form, there is long-term intention. Viktor Frankl, who was the founder of logotherapy, was in the concentration camps in the Second World War, and he said that the people who survived most successfully were those who had a sense of meaning and a deep intention for their life. And so what this means is you can, at some point, quiet yourself and sit and try to sense an inner direction of the values for your life.

Sometimes in the Buddhist tradition, this is described as reflecting and taking the vows toward awakening—the bodhisattva vows. They're how they start the sitting in a Zen monastery: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all. Desires are inexhaustible. I vow to transcend them all." These kinds of vows. Little vows like that.

The Dalai Lama says them in the morning when he wakes up—the ones from Shantideva: "May I be a bridge, a raft, a boat for all who need to cross the flood. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be food for the hungry. May I be a lamp for those in darkness. May I be a resting place for the weary. And may I do this for beings everywhere, as long as earth and sky and galaxies exist, until we all awaken together." Some little vow like that, right?

But of course there are modern versions of it. And I love to read Diane Ackerman, poet and friend—her school prayer version where she writes: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, and the wayfaring moon, and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

And if we take time to quiet ourselves and listen, there's a kind of inner nobility to most human beings. You can start to listen to: if I were to make my own vows, what would they be? What would this be like? Because then when you go through times in your life of problems and struggles, or when the world around you is having a hard time, you can pause. And you can say, well, what really matters to me? It's like setting the compass of your heart.

Sometimes it's an activist expression. This is Barbara Widener, who founded Grandmothers for Peace. She says, "I began to question what kind of world am I leaving for my grandchildren? So I got a sign—a grandmother for peace—and stood on the street corners. And then after a year I joined others kneeling as a human barrier at a munitions factory. I was taken to prison, strip searched, thrown into a cell. Something happened to me. I realized they couldn't do anything more. I was free." And now Barbara and her organization, Grandmothers for Peace, works in dozens of countries around the world.

That's the activist side. That's a really beautiful thing. Thomas Jefferson said, "One person with courage is a majority." If one person stands up with that kind of courage—again, it's like Aung San Suu Kyi, or Nelson Mandela, or Martin Luther King, or Gandhi. I think of Kenya and the woman who won the Nobel Prize for planting trees...

And she was thrown in prison. I think you need to get thrown in prison to win the Nobel Peace Prize. It's sort of part of your curriculum. But anyway, she started by planting trees along the desert for people whose villages were losing water and life. In the end, she ended up planting fifty-one million trees in Kenya.

So you do it a step at a time. And it's not that you do it in some kind of heroic, special way. You know, "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all." One of the weird things you notice if you take that vow is that the people around you don't want to be saved by you—like the ones in your family. They're not interested in you saving them. So it has to mean something different than that. And what it means is that you dedicate your life, you quiet yourself, and you dedicate your life to life itself in your own version and in your own way.

And then no matter what happens, you get quiet and you say, "What is my deepest vow? What is the thing that most matters to me?" For some people, it's just as simple as "I vow to be kind." And it won't go well all the time. Somebody said, for somebody who's truly committed to changing the world nonviolently, you never need weapons, but you may need bail.

This from Thomas Merton, who was responding to a young activist. We get lots of activists who come here, often burned out activists, because you can't sustain it just on anger over the years. And he wrote: "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all, if not at times bringing about its opposite. As you get used to this idea, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

And so here's the secret. Everybody's waiting for the secret at the end of the day, right? The secret is to act well without attachment to the fruits of the action. Because you don't get to determine how it will turn out. To act well without attachment to the results and the fruits. You can learn from the results. You can tune yourself. But in the end, that's not what's given to you. What's given to you is to act from your deepest values and from your great love.

And it can be small things as well as large. A gesture, a smile. After the Haiti earthquake, I was reading this thing from the American Red Cross, and one of the most touching things that came in, among all these millions of dollars, was an envelope with fourteen dollars and sixty cents from a homeless shelter in Baltimore with a little note that said, "We're worried about our brothers and sisters on the streets of Haiti." It can be just that moment, just that gesture. That can change somebody's life as much as anything else that you care about.

And in Zen they say there are only two things: you sit, and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is. You quiet the mind, open the heart, become loving awareness in whatever way you can. And then you get up and tend to the garden of the world, and you sweep—not because you're supposed to, but because it's your garden and it's your place. And you go back and forth between these two.

Here we are in the realm of mystery. You come to the temple and it's a reminder of this. You watch the sun—actually the sun doesn't move but the earth turns. But it looks like the sun is moving to the west now over the day. The air fortunately got clearer, at least for a time. Hopefully the fires are getting contained a little bit more. And you are here, born into the human realm with unbearable beauty and an ocean of tears. And this is it. This is how it is.

And the beautiful thing is that it's possible to awaken in this midst. All the science and neuroscience shows it—to heal, to transform, to live with a kind of nobility and dignity, to offer that to others and to offer it to the world.

passage I read not so long ago. In one of history's more unlikely acts of totalitarianism, China banned Buddhist monks in Tibet from reincarnating without government permission. According to a statement issued by the State Administration for Religious Affairs, the law, which went into effect a few years ago, strictly stipulates the procedures by which one is to reincarnate and is, quote, "an important move to institutionalize management of reincarnation."

So that's one approach to the mystery of life, right? Not necessarily a successful one. But there it is.

But there's another possibility. And all of these teachings of mindfulness, compassion, loving-kindness, joy, equanimity, forgiveness—we've done a lot today. They're really all invitations to return to that original goodness, to express it, to know it, to discover it in yourself and transform in some beautiful way.

I have two poems. They're both kind of wonderful. This first one is from Naomi Shihab Nye, a Palestinian poet, wonderful poet, called "Wandering Around at Albuquerque Airport Terminal."

After learning my flight was delayed four hours, I heard the announcement: If anyone in the vicinity of Gate 4A understands Arabic, please come to the gate immediately.

Well, one pauses these days, but since Gate 4A was my own gate, I went there. An older woman in full traditional Palestinian dress, just like my grandma wore, was crumpled to the floor wailing loudly. Help, said the flight service person. Talk to her. What's her problem? We told her her flight was going to be four hours late, and she did this.

I put my arm around her and spoke haltingly. The minute she heard any words she knew, however poorly used, she stopped crying. She thought our flight had been canceled entirely. She needed to be in El Paso for some major medical treatment the following day. I said, no, no, we're fine. We'll get there just late. Who's picking you up? Let's call and tell him.

We called her son. I spoke with him in English. I told him I'd stay with his mother till we got on the plane and would sit with her. Southwest. She talked to him. Then we called her other sons just for the fun of it. And then we called my dad, and he and she spoke for a while in Arabic and found out, of course, they had ten shared friends. And then I thought, just for the heck of it, why not call some Palestinian poets I know and let them chat with her?

This all took about two hours. She was laughing a lot by then, telling her life, answering questions. She had pulled a sack of homemade mamoul cookies—little powdered sugar crumbly mounds stuffed with dates and nuts—out of her bag, and was offering them to all the people at the gate. To my amazement, not a single person declined one. It was like a sacrament. The traveler from Argentina, the young man from California, the lovely woman from Laredo—we were all covered with the same powdered sugar and smiling. There are no better cookies.

And then the airline broke out free beverages and the flight attendants served us apple juice and they were covered with powdered sugar too. And I noticed my new best friend, whose hand I had been holding, had a potted plant poking out of her bag, some medicinal thing with green furry leaves. Such an old country traveling tradition. Always carry a plant. Always stay rooted somewhere.

And I looked around that gate of late and weary ones and thought, this is the world I want to live in. The shared world. Not a single person at this gate, once the crying of confusion had stopped, has seemed apprehensive about any other person. They all took the cookies. I wanted to hug all those other people. This can still happen anywhere. Not everything is lost.

There's something so both tender and revolutionary in that poem for these times—outwardly in our world that's troubled. And we become the carriers, like that person on the boat that Thich Nhat Hanh speaks about. We become the carriers of our best intention, in our actions and our voice.

To not let the fires and the floods, the fears and confusion, take over your heart. To be that person who carries that wisdom.

So with that, I'd like us to do a little ritual to end. Several people have these little red cords. Take one and pass them around the room. When you get one, don't do anything with it yet—take one and pass the rest to other people seated near you, so pretty soon everybody will have one. And while you do, I will explain about this.

The sacred cord is used all across Asia, from Afghanistan all the way to Japan—in rituals, in weddings, in celebrations, in healing practices—because it is the symbol of a thread that connects all life. We are woven together in what Martin Luther King called "a single garment of destiny." We are all woven together in the mystery of life. We are life expressing itself in our form.

Now, the reason these are colored this reddish color is that they are considered one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun. If you choose to wear them around your wrist or your neck—I have one that I've been wearing for a long time from the Dalai Lama—it's like these are your robes, and you go into the marketplace. Your real home is in the temple. You're kind of like a monk or nun in drag. You go into the marketplace wearing your secret robes and pretend you're an ordinary person, but actually your home is in the infinite, in the vastness. Your home is in loving awareness.

To make these—they're also called protection cords—I was doing this ritual with a very famous Lama at one point, and somebody asked, "Well, what exactly do these protect you from?" And he said, "Well, yourself, of course—the main protection that human beings need."

So to make them or activate them, we have to tie three knots into them in succession. Hold them up. The first knot is called the knot of refuge. For those who are Buddhist, it means refuge in Buddha, which is to see the Buddha in every being you meet. Refuge in Dharma, which means truth and all the practices that lead you to freedom and truth.

And refuge in Sangha, or community—that we never do it alone. Every moment of your practice and all the development and awakening that happens affects your friends and your family and community and spreads out across the world. It is never done in isolation.

But for those who are not Buddhists, the knot of refuge is to take refuge in that which is sacred or holy, by whatever name you give it—all the different names in all traditions—and to realize that by taking this refuge, you remember that within you is this possibility of living with nobility and freedom and care.

So reflect for a moment on that which is sacred or holy, that which is a refuge for you. And when you're ready, tie a knot into the center of the cord, which is your reminder to live your life connected to this sense of the sacred.

Then there is a second knot to tie into the cord. This is the knot of compassion. It is, in your own way, a vow to minimize harm to yourself and others. You could call it a reverence for life—for your own life and the life of others. To not cause harm through your speech and actions, as best you can. To hold yourself and other beings with compassion.

So reflect on your own dedication, your own vow—whatever is true to you—to live in a way that does not harm yourself, that does not cause harm to others, and what that means to you. And when you're ready, tie the second knot into the cord, which is a reminder of this practice and commitment to compassion.

And the third knot will require a little bit more reflection on your part. If you were to set an intention for your life, a long-term intention—some people make it very simple: "I vow to be kind." Others, it might be more complex. But take a minute or two to reflect on what your highest or best intention might be.

Like Diane Ackerman's beautiful poem: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature and a healer of misery, messenger of wonder, architect of peace." That's her poetic version. But for you, if you were to have two or three sentences, or one, of what is your heart's deepest intention...

And when you're ready, tie the third knot in your cord, which is a reaffirmation of this vow or this intention. I would recommend that when we end, you perhaps write it down. It's very useful to have put it on paper, if you wish. Or put it in your smartphone. Sometimes when we do this, if we have more time, I'll invite people to actually read it to the person next to them, because to say it out loud is a very beautiful thing, and to have someone else read theirs.

But I would like to ask us to do something else as you finish this up. If you want to wear your blessing cord on your wrist, you can wrap it around two or three times and let the ends hang down. If you want to wear it around your neck, put it around the back of your neck and let the two ends hang down—don't tie it yet. Then, should you choose to do this, you can turn to the person sitting next to you, and they'll tie yours on and offer you some blessing, maybe silently or with a few words. Then you tie theirs on and offer them a little blessing. Turn to a person next to you or near you, or behind you, and tie on their protection cord.

Kind of nice to give a little blessing to another person, isn't it? And they need it. You know they need it.

So now as you finish up, it's five o'clock, and you've been basically patient and well-behaved today, which I appreciate. Considering the state of the world, it's not always what you get. And more than that, I hope that these teachings, which really opened a window or opened the treasury to give you a little bit of the principles of Buddhist psychology—more than anything, I hope they reminded you of what you already know. It's not like they're all that new. Somewhere in your heart you already understand this.

Whether you're a healer or a business person, an educator, an artist, or whatever your work is, a scientist—you also can understand that these are universal principles for human well-being and human happiness.

The poet writes: "Sun drapes a buttered scarf across your face. Rose opens herself to your glance, and rain shares its divine melancholy. The whole world keeps whispering or shouting to you, nibbling your ear like a neglected lover." It's time to pay attention. It's time to listen deeply. It's time to care in the ways that we really want to do, ways that our culture and speed somehow takes us away from.

And coming to the temple for a day as you have—those who are new here particularly, we welcome you, and you're welcome to come back. All kinds of other programs and trainings are offered here. Those of you who are some of our old friends for a long time, it's a pleasure to share the day. May you carry what's been a benefit out to the world.

And let's do just one minute of meditation. Last moments. Let yourself envision from your stillness and presence that you can extend loving-kindness and care out across the world, out from this room like a beacon in every direction, like a lighthouse of loving-kindness and care, so that all that we've done today becomes a source of illumination, care, and kindness that spreads across the world to everyone you touch and all whom they touch, visible and invisible. May they all be held in great loving-kindness, every one. And even the ones that are difficult—may their hearts too find peace. May they too be free from hatred and fear. May all beings benefit from the transformation and care and the seeds of goodness that we are able to offer and plant in this world.

It's been a pleasure. I thank you.

Travel safe. May your friends in other parts of the counties nearby be safe and protected. And please come back again.

Thank you. Thank you.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 76

The Essence of Buddhist Psychology - Daylong, Part 1 Morning

Jack Kornfield · 4h38

> In this morning session of a daylong retreat at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield presents Buddhist psychology not as religion or philosophy, but as a practical science of mind offering tools for inner freedom and well-being. He emphasizes that these teachings recognize our fundamental dignity and goodness—a marked contrast to Western psychology's focus on pathology and diagnosis.
> Kornfield introduces mindfulness as 'loving awareness,' the capacity to be present for our experience without judgment. Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna teachings, he guides practitioners through awareness of breath, body, feelings, and thoughts. He shares the powerful story of George Schaller studying gorillas without a gun—approaching our own experience as a caring witness rather than trying to fix or change it. The session includes practical exercises like counting thoughts to develop the capacity to observe the mind's activity.
> The teaching culminates in the RAIN practice for working with difficulties: Recognize what is happening, Accept it as it is, Investigate with curiosity (exploring body sensations, emotions, and underlying stories), and Not-identify—realizing we are not limited by our conditioning or circumstances. Through stories ranging from Nelson Mandela's dignity to a Burmese nun's healing journey, Kornfield illustrates how these trainings, now validated by neuroscience research on neuroplasticity, can transform our relationship with suffering and awaken our connection to all life.

Good morning, everybody.

Thank you for coming out on this smoky morning to be here at Spirit Rock. My name is Romy, and I am running this event with many of my fabulous co-workers who are here today—Christina in particular is here. We also have many volunteers that came early this morning to set up the room. They're all wearing name tags, so if you have any questions or would like to thank them, they're easily identifiable.

Today I wanted to let you know that we're live streaming and we have some documentary filmmakers in the room. So if you ask questions, please wait for the mic and place it close to your mouth so we can hear you at home and in the room. Speaking of hearing, we have assisted hearing devices available. If you are having a hard time hearing me, they're right in the back—my coworker Jesse can hand you one. They work very well.

I'm going to remind you to turn off your cell phones now while I'm thinking of it. And we have a bookstore—I don't know why I thought of that next, but there is a bookstore with volunteers there today, so please feel free to peruse. We also have Jack's new book, No Time Like the Present, at the bookstore.

Regarding lunch: normally I encourage you to go outside to the beautiful outdoors. We have picnic benches in the meadow across the way. However, today we're going to set up tables and chairs inside and upstairs in the East Hall, so you can stay inside if you don't want to go outside. If you forgot your lunch, Woodacre Deli is across the road—I can give you directions.

For those seeking continuing education credits, there are almost twenty of you in here, but not twenty people have signed up. So if you paid for CEs or would like continuing education credit, please stand up right now and sign up outside if you haven't already.

We will be ringing a bell when it's time to come in. We're the only ones in the building today, which is lovely. There is an upper retreat area, and it's silent up there, so I'm going to ask that if you are walking outside and you get to the wood gates, please turn around. That is where we're having a silent retreat.

Now I'd like to introduce Jack Kornfield. Thank you, Jack. Without you, none of us would be here today—or watching at home, or being part of a documentary, quite honestly. I know you were just in China, so I'm so glad you're back, and I hope to hear a little bit about your travels.

Jack Kornfield: Could I have that book? Maybe there's something good in it. Who knows? Thank you, Romy.

So good morning to you all. I'm very happy to be here. And the teaching today is one that I really enjoy doing. I've done this teaching about the essence of Buddhist psychology over a number of years, and it's a very satisfying and I hope useful set of teachings for you. There'll be a few guided meditations, but not much walking meditation, which we would normally have, partly because of the fire and so forth. And maybe we'll also have a little shorter lunch period just to kind of keep what we're doing contained.

Before I start—other than the documentary filmmakers in there who said they want to make movies of me before I die, which might be soon, but I think I'm a little longer. You know, in your seventies, you never know. Actually, you never know, period. And the teaching of one of the great Buddha sutras says that karma can change as quick as the swish of a horse's tail. And if one doesn't believe that, all you have to do is drive up the road to Sonoma and Napa, where these lives were toodling along just like everything's fine, the grape harvest, and then everything transformed. And we know this, actually.

So in part, the teachings today are also focused on how is it that we can live amidst the ever-changing world that is the reality, the impermanence, and really the tentativeness of life. Is there some way to conduct ourselves and to live with a spirit that can allow all these changes and stay wise, compassionate, centered amidst them all?

The focus today on Buddhist psychology starts with the fundamental understanding that Buddhist teachings are a science of mind. They're not so—yes, they've been used as a religion and as a philosophy, but if you read the original texts and look deeply at them, they point to the way the mind and the heart operate in this mysterious human incarnation and ways that we can learn to understand ourselves, our relationship with others, that bring inner freedom, well-being, happiness, and so forth. And the other thing that's interesting and critical about them is that they're practical. And so you'll hear as we go through the teachings today that they are experiential and that there are trainings and practices that are given that allow us to both learn and to transform our lives.

We come to a temple like this and we sit in the midst of the mystery of human incarnation. And often we go through our days kind of taking life for granted, but something greater and vaster is happening all around us all the time. This week I've been sitting with a friend who got a diagnosis of a very advanced cancer ten days ago and has about another week to live. And of course she is shocked and all the other kinds of things. And part of it was: I didn't think it would happen so quickly. But it can.

What is this human incarnation? When we look at our lives, we can either live with habit and kind of go along in a somewhat automatic way, or we can discover the possibilities of healing, well-being, inner freedom amidst all the changes of the world, and a way to hold both the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows that make up human life.

I think about the mystery of it. My sister-in-law, Esther, who died about a decade ago—I was with her quite a lot during the last stages of her cancer. And then I stayed home here, came back one night, and she was very close to dying. Got up early to rush into the city to be with her.

But I had to stop at the drugstore to pick up some prescriptions. Did it kind of hurriedly, and I was standing in line a little bit impatiently at CVS. And all of a sudden my whole body just relaxed and I said, oh, Esther died. And I got to my car and I called my brother and I said, how's Esther doing? And he said, oh, she died five minutes ago. And I said, I know.

Now, if I were to ask how many people have had experiences like that, a third of the hands would go up. Who are we? How is this possible that we can know something at a distance? Are we our bodies? Are we our feelings? Are we consciousness itself, connected in this web of life? I mean, who got born into your body? And then how do you navigate? These are the fundamental questions, the kind of questions one is asked when you come to a temple or a place of deep reflection.

I also have a poem to start with. Poetry is always good because it's kind of the music of language. It's called "The Sleepless Ones":

What if all the people who could not sleep at two or three or four in the morning left their houses and went to the parks? What if hundreds, thousands, millions went in their solitude like a stream, and each told their story? What if there were old women fearful that if they slept they would die, and young women unable to conceive, and husbands having affairs, and children who couldn't sleep because they were fearful of failing, and mothers worried about paying the bills, and women having business troubles, and men unlucky in love, and those who were in physical pain, and those who are guilty? What if they all left their houses like a stream and the moon illuminated their way, and they came each one to tell their stories? Would these be the more troubled of humanity? Or would these be the more passionate of this world? Or those who need to create to live? Or would these be the lonely ones? And I ask you, if they all came to the parks at night and told their stories, would the sun on rising be more radiant? And again, I ask you, would they embrace?

And this is us. We all have the arc of our lives and the stories that we tell inwardly and to one another. To begin to pay attention with the capacity of mindfulness and understanding to the stories that we're living out is one of the essential elements of Buddhist psychology—and to see that we share the common elements of the story with so many others. Wherever you are in the story, if you go out into the park, you can find those who have found a kind of freedom amidst the difficulties and the glories of their life.

I think about a nun I met on the northern border of Burma and China, who had been diagnosed with a very difficult and rare illness. Given the state of medical care in Burma, she did not want to have surgery. The hospitals at that time were not necessarily sterile, and it just wasn't the kind of medical care where you would want to have surgery. So she went to see her old aunt, who was a Buddhist nun, and her aunt said, "You come live in the forest and I'll teach you healing and give you these herbs. But you have to meditate to heal yourself." This was a pretty dire situation.

She did, and she spent two years doing this healing practice. We met her sometime after she had come back, and she'd started a monastery because people wanted to know what she'd learned. She was this very bright spirit. We asked about her practice and she said yes, her aunt made her sit and meditate sixteen to eighteen hours a day for the last two years, along with taking these herbs. Her body was completely healed and cleared now. And so she had opened this temple, particularly for women who were in distress—those with mental illness, those who were homeless, those with trauma, those fleeing the civil wars around northern Burma. And she taught them all to meditate.

I thought to myself, I wouldn't necessarily invite people with mental illness, the homeless, and people with severe trauma and say, oh, come and let's sit in meditation. Then she said, "Come in." There was a meditation hall filled with a hundred or a hundred fifty women who were all sitting like statues. What it was is that this nun, this youngish woman who'd gone through all of this, had found a spirit that was so strong in herself. You came to see her—having suffered very deeply with illness and all of this—and said, you know, I'm homeless, I'm mentally ill, whatever. And she would look you in the eyes and say, "You can do this." It was like her spirit was stronger than their problems. It was really quite extraordinary.

When we were walking out—I was there with my beloved Trudy, my wife—

An old woman with just a couple of teeth came up and grabbed Trudy, didn't speak much English. She'd obviously been through very, very hard times. She held Trudy's arm and then looked at her and pointed to herself and said, "Peace of mind, peace of mind." And you could see that her life had been changed by being there.

So this is really the beginning of Buddhist psychology—to recognize that no matter what our circumstance, there's a possibility of inner freedom and of well-being, no matter whether it's physical difficulties or the outer changes that come so often to us. And when we move through life lost in the small perspective, caught up in our fear, depression, anger, anxiety, suffering, and so forth, Buddhist psychology opens us to a wider and bigger training.

I think of Thubten Jinpa, who was here last year. He's the translator for the Dalai Lama, a wonderful young lama himself. He helps run the CCare training at Stanford that he started, which has eight-week programs in compassion and mindfulness. He tells the story of one doctor who went through the training. The man was in his fifties, a physician at Stanford, and he was depressed and burned out. The medical system was so hard. He was seeing so many patients, so much stress. He was just kind of finished and undermined in some way by how demanding and difficult it was.

Then he went through this eight-week training in compassion and mindfulness, and he found a way to come back to himself, to regulate himself, to see anew. When he returned to his medical practice, an old woman who'd been a patient for a long time came in and said, "Doctor, you seem different today. What happened to you? Are you in love or something?" And he laughed because, of course, he was in love—but it was in love with life again in some very deep way.

Buddhist psychology is, in essence, a positive psychology, a psychology of human dignity and goodness. We are not limited by our circumstance or our history. When Nelson Mandela walked out of twenty-seven years in Robben Island Prison with so much dignity and magnanimity and graciousness, he not only inspired South Africa but really changed the imagination of the world. He showed that they can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit.

It begins with something Nelson said at one point: "It never hurts to see the good in someone. They often act the better because of it." And so all the trainings and practices are to awaken us to what is called our fundamental dignity and our fundamental goodness.

This is really in contrast to Western psychology, where if you read from the Freudian beginnings, it's a medical model. Almost all the focus is on disease and pathology and healing people, getting better from your diagnosis. Of course there's the DSM manual—you get diagnosed and you get a number for your particular diagnosis. It's all categorized, your particular disorder. And it helps the insurance industry figure out how much to pay to get you better or something like that. That's become our mental health.

Along with this, there was a front page of one of the sections of the Wall Street Journal that said, "So Young and So Many Pills." More than almost a third of our children, counting teens, take regular prescriptions such as ADHD medication, antidepressants, antipsychotics, and things like that. That's how we're responding to our human situation.

There is another way. It's not that there aren't appropriate times for medication, or that we don't need to organize our medical system. But there's something more than this—the ability to see the fundamental goodness and dignity of a human being, and to see that their trauma and their grief or their anxiety is not who they really are. It's a visitor. This is extraordinarily healing.

When the Dalai Lama takes your hand—which he does when he goes and teaches with different groups, he likes to go down and greet people—the remarkable thing about it is that he doesn't let go. You're there and the Dalai Lama comes, and if you're in the line, he takes your hand. I've taught with him, so I've had the fortune of good time around him, and he's quite a wonderful presence. He takes your hand and you think, "This is great. Dalai Lama looks in my eyes, blessing, nice and very good vibrations." And then he doesn't let go. You think it's like the politician kissing babies and moving down the row, seeing how many people he can greet. But that's not how it happens. He holds on until you really get it—that he's there with you. And you go, "Oh, wow."

And then he looks again at you. We really connected. Old friends, okay. And only then does he move on to the next person. There's something about the depth of that connection that is almost more powerful in healing than any other intervention we can have—to be seen and met in that way.

There's a story that I love, a true story of a schoolteacher in Ohio, a high school teacher. One day when her math class was really rowdy, she stopped the lesson. No one was going to learn math. She put the thirty-one names of all the students in the class on the blackboard and said, "For the rest of the period, write these names down and then put next to each name one good thing that you admire or like about this person." Then she collected all those papers.

Some months later, maybe before Easter vacation when the class was again not focused, she stopped the class and passed out papers. She'd cut apart all the original comments and pasted them on a page with each person's name at the top—the different good things that had been written about them by the other thirty students.

A couple of years later, she got a call from a woman who said, "You know Robert, who was in your class. I know he was one of your favorite students. My son was in the military and he was just killed in the Middle East." Very sad. She told the teacher about the memorial, so she went. Toward the end, they were standing at graveside, and the mother said, "I have to talk to you. My son only carried a few things on the battlefield with him, and this is one." She pulled out that page, obviously folded and unfolded many times—the thirty-one good things that people had seen in him.

Then a young woman standing next to them, who'd also been a student, said, "Oh yeah, I always carry mine too," and pulled it out of her purse. Another young man on the other side said, "I made it part of my wedding vows."

There is something so remarkable about seeing what is called in the mystical tradition the secret beauty of another being—to see in their eyes the spirit that was born into them, to see their goodness. This has a very powerful transformative effect.

So now I invite you for a moment to reflect on this and then take a look around—not in a weird way. I mean, you're weird enough as you are without adding to it. But just imagine that you can see, like the Dalai Lama, that you're secretly the Dalai Lama or whoever it is, and you can simply see the beauty and the dignity and the secret beauty of each face you look at. Just look around a little bit. The seeds of goodness that were born into each person. Notice what it's like to see people with these eyes.

I read of a hospital chaplain who twice a year would go through the hospital and bless the hands of all the people who worked there. She would hold their hands and bless them for their work—the surgeons and the physicians and the ICU nurses, of course. But she said it was equally important to go into the basement and find those people who were washing the dishes, and the ones who went upstairs to mop the floors and clean the bathrooms, who were often so unrecognized. She would hold their hands, and she said it was so touching because after she'd done this a number of rounds, they would wait half a year for the day she would come through and hold and bless their hands. Someone told her, "This was one of the most meaningful things that happened to me all year long—that someone sees me and honors me and values me."

We need this in some way for our spirit, for our soul.

Now, the question is how to live in this way and how to awaken these capacities. It's not so easy in the modern world. Albert Einstein said—at least according to Scientific American, which is a reasonably authoritative source—"If you can drive safely while kissing a girl, you're simply not giving the kiss the attention it deserves."

Our attention is split. We actually now have a new posture. We gradually learned to stand upright as human beings, but now I watch people walking down the street and their posture is like this, hunched over their smartphones.

But there is something in what Einstein said about the capacity to pay attention where we are that changes everything. And the possibility of awakening, which is at the heart of Buddhist psychology, is offered in a wide range of trainings and tools—trainings in mindfulness, training in forgiveness, training in lovingkindness and compassion, training of attention to the body and to the stories that we tell, and also connection to one another in deep ways.

A couple of years ago I was teaching at the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering, which I'm sorry to say I don't think is going to be happening again soon. Just leave that aside. Whatever your politics, you are welcome here. We really welcome everyone to feel at home here. But that doesn't seem to be the direction right now at the White House.

It was meaningful to talk about the principles of wise society, which exist in Buddhist teachings. The Buddha met with kings and ministers and princes, and he taught that a society that respects each member, that cares for the sick and the young and the elderly, those who are vulnerable, will prosper and not decline. A society where people come together and listen to each other with care, that protects the environment around them.

These are universal principles you find in every great spiritual tradition. But the thing that was different, what I could say after laying out these principles, is that in the Buddhist teaching of the science of mind, there are ways to actually do it. It's not just that it's a lovely philosophy, but there are ways to train people, to train our own hearts and minds, so that these capacities grow in us.

And we know this because now in ten thousand school systems and in thousands of hospitals and clinics, mindfulness-based interventions and social and emotional learning are happening—mindfulness in business, in the arts, and even in athletics. The Seattle Seahawks, when they won their Super Bowl, and the Chicago Bulls and the LA Lakers in all their championship years, had a meditation coach, a friend of mine, George Mumford. It helped a lot of them. Though my friend George said Michael Jordan didn't really need that—he had his own way.

But in general, these practices have spread very, very widely because of the neuroscience showing that these trainings and capacities fit with neuroplasticity. In the last few decades there was a revolution in neuroscience, which had thought that the brain and the nervous system reset when you're young and that's it—too bad. But as we now know, every way that we pay attention, the way that we use our own attentional capacity, is rewiring our nervous system and our brain.

If you read things like Norman Doidge, who wrote the great New York Times bestseller The Brain That Changes Itself, you start to see all the science of this neuroplasticity. Or you look at what Adam Gazzaley at UCSF does in mental trainings and the results of it—the cover of Nature magazine on new capacities to change the brain. Or Justin Rhodes at University of Illinois, who documents neurogenesis from mental training, showing that new neurons are growing as well as new synaptic connections.

And then there's the genetic level of it. Elizabeth Blackburn, who won the Nobel Prize and who's here at the UC Medical Center together with Elissa Epel—she won the Nobel Prize for telomeres, for the caps at the end of your chromosomes that protect them. As they wear down, so too your physical well-being diminishes until you die. And she showed, and it really boggled her mind, that after eight weeks of meditation, telomeres grew. We have these capacities to change the epigenetics and the way that our genes are operating through our attention.

The start is mindfulness, which I will call loving awareness—and you'll understand why as we go on. The capacity to be present where we are, present for our experience, rather than just wandering or spaced out in various ways.

When I work as a therapist, or when I have, I have my clients come in and we sit together to start. They don't have to be Buddhists—spare their friends and family—but we want them to be Buddhists. It's a much better kind of endeavor. And we don't make it into some special meditative thing. It's just to quiet down and pay attention to what's going on, so that when we do start to work together, there's a sense of connection. Otherwise people come in and somebody just cut them off on the highway and they had a little argument at work that morning, and you get a kind of superficial connection. But in five minutes of being together and getting silent, there grows a capacity to connect, from which all the deeper work can happen.

And then people will ask, "How do I do this more? How do I learn?" So I begin to train them in mindfulness. But it's not that easy. People are often not very embodied in our culture. You know the line from James Joyce where he writes, "Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body." There's that kind of non-embodiedness.

And then my humorist friend who lives in Fairfax, Anne Lamott, writes: "My mind is like a bad neighborhood. I try not to go there alone." So you sit and meditate and you've got to find your body. And then you look at your mind and go, "Oh dear," or whatever.

So the first task in teaching mindfulness is to teach people how to be aware without judging and fixing and resisting and grasping—not to make it a self-improvement project, but rather to develop the ability just to become the loving witness of this human life. Which changes everything. Because usually we're trying to fix it.

As the author Florida Scott-Maxwell writes, "No matter how old a mother is, she looks to her middle-aged children for signs of improvement." And we've internalized that. "Okay, now I'm going to meditate and get better"—whatever your idea of better is.

The practice of mindfulness and this fundamental loving awareness training is about being spacious and gracious with what's actually true in your human life. And people don't tell us to do this very much. It's always like you've got to fix yourself and get more and do more and have more—that's our culture. This is more like being.

And we use the images of sitting like a mountain with all the weather changes, or resting like a butterfly on a flower—not changing the flower, but simply being there—and beginning to sense the breath, your life breath, as it comes in and out as a way to connect body and mind. In doing so, the breath becomes a kind of mirror.

Mullah Nasruddin, a Sufi holy man and sage from the Middle East, went into a bank to cash a check one day, and they said, "Could you please identify yourself?" So he reached into his pocket, pulled out a small mirror, looked at it, and said, "Yep, that's me all right."

What mindfulness begins to do, as we start to train our attention to be quite present—often beginning with this very universal and simple practice of being aware that your body is breathing—is that the breath then becomes a kind of mirror. As you feel the breath, you notice the longing or the anxiety or the peacefulness or the frustration, all the different states of the heart and mind. You notice the tension in the body. You begin to notice what's actually going on in a way that we often don't pay attention to. And without this awareness, it's not possible to really live in a free way. We're otherwise just in reaction to what's coming.

Sometimes in working with the breath, there will be phrases or words that are invited. You can say to yourself softly—calm or centered or ease—with each breath, a kind of invitation to quiet the mind somewhat. And as you sit, even in the beginning, you'll feel the body's pains and tensions as they show themselves. We carry these in our physical body; trauma and so forth, it's all here. Or you'll notice the moods you have. You start to sense the unfinished business of the heart. If there's grieving—if you know there's been a loss and you've been so busy running around—you sit, and perhaps the tears will come because you're finally paying attention. Or longing, or all kinds of other experiences.

My friend Malidoma Somé, a West African shaman and medicine man, when he first came here from Burkina Faso—he's of the Dagara people—had gone through this great shaman's training. He also has a couple of PhDs, one from the Sorbonne and one from a university in the United States, but he's mostly a shaman. He said, "I came out of the shaman's training and I walked through your streets, and your streets are full of the ungrieved dead." What he meant was that he could somehow see the spirits—homeless people who died, people who died in ICUs, taken care of in caring ways by the nurses and staff but whose family wasn't there, people who died in old age homes. He said, "In our culture, we grieve and honor each person. That's a deliberate part of our Dagara people's way of moving through the world. We celebrate each birth, and we also celebrate the life at the end of it. Your culture has lost its attention to grief, and because of it, it still carries the grief in an unhealthy way."

So when you sit and you're quiet, the unfinished business of the heart starts to arise. And then you see the mind. There's a cartoon in the New Yorker that shows a car crossing the Utah desert with a roadside sign that reads: "Your own tedious thoughts, next 200 miles." That's kind of what meditation is like, because you start to see your racing mind and all that it does.

What you do in establishing loving awareness is to notice what's present without reacting to it. You notice the racing mind, the tears, the longing, whatever experiences arise, the tension. And almost as if to bow to it, you simply acknowledge that this is the way it is. It's like this right now. You start to feel experiences rise and fall, just as the breath rises and falls, comes and goes. You let these experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath.

The research of people like Richie Davidson shows an increased capacity to approach challenges when you train in mindfulness, because these difficulties come. In the neuroscience language, you expand the window of tolerance. Dan Siegel also uses that phrase. You become able to bear the tears. Or for some people, it's joy—some people are so loyal to their suffering that it's scary to let themselves feel happy or well. By expanding the window of tolerance, you learn how to be present for life without so much judgment, contraction, fear, and aversion. This is what makes up our human life. And that already starts to invite a kind of wellbeing and freedom.

So let's do a little sitting, a little meditation together—maybe ten minutes or so. Do you want to stand up and stretch for a moment? You've been sitting for a while. And when you're ready, let yourself sit back down.

Many of you, probably most of you, already have an established mindfulness practice. But we'll just practice together for a little bit—this first training of loving awareness, bringing together the breath and body experience and the mind.

So when you're ready, let your eyes close gently. From the earliest teachings of the science of mind, there is a most wonderful way for human beings to establish clarity and wellbeing.

to overcome the difficulties of suffering and grief, to find an inner freedom of heart and mind. And this is the establishment of mindfulness, of mindful awareness—this great human capacity.

So you sit now and begin to let yourself notice the experiences of just being seated halfway between heaven and earth in this human form. And bring a kind attention. Mindfulness as loving awareness. Simply notice the state of your body right now. And also notice what other moods might be present, the state of the heart. And the kind of thoughts that are arising and passing—all without judgment, just noticing.

With loving awareness, you become the witness to body and heart and mind. And then you notice how easy it is to drift off into thinking and remembering and analyzing. So to stay present, let yourself become aware of your body's breathing, this universal movement of breath. You can feel it as coolness in the nostrils, or swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. And if it's difficult to feel your breath, you can put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand, and just leave it there.

With each breath, invite a sense of calm or ease. And let the other experiences—sounds and feelings and thoughts—let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Just bring your attention gently back to this breath, again and again returning to it as a first step in training mindfulness. Come back to the breath each time the attention wanders, quite gently, like training the puppy—sit, stay—very kindly.

Notice the breath from the beginning through the middle to the end of the in-breath, or rising. Notice if there's a space between breaths, and you can just relax in that stillness. Notice the appearance of the out-breath, or the falling of chest and belly. As you feel the whole rhythm of breath, invite a sense of steadiness, calm, or ease. This breath.

Now, it's easy in meditation and in this training to set a goal and then use it to evaluate yourself. And of course, to steady the mind or to be able to concentrate a bit more on the breath through training becomes possible. But it has to happen in an organic way, not through your strivings. It comes more when you simply are willing to pay attention to what's happening. And sometimes it will be the breath. But sometimes what you notice as you sit quietly is that you're sleepy. Or you notice that you're concerned or worried about something. Or you're restless. All of those are absolutely natural.

The image or story that may be helpful is of Professor George Schaller, who was one of the most important primate biologists ever. He was the mentor to Dian Fossey, whose story was told in that movie Gorillas in the Mist, played by Sigourney Weaver. Dr. Schaller came back from one of his trips in Africa and made a presentation to a huge gathering, a conference of field biologists. He talked about the gorillas—how they lived together, what was the role of the young males, the big silverback males' relationship to the females, who raised the children, the aunties and the mothers—all of the family structure and community.

People raised their hands. They said, "Wait a second, Dr. Schaller. We've been studying these creatures for years, a couple of hundred years with our kind of European scientific view. And nobody ever had this level of information. How did you learn so much about the gorillas?"

And he said, "It was simple. I didn't carry a gun."

The previous generations of biologists had all been frightened by these giant creatures, so they went in carrying elephant guns, basically. Now, if you were a gorilla and you saw some guy coming in carrying a big gun—how would you feel? So they couldn't really get very close to them. But Schaller, because he didn't carry a gun, had to come in very respectfully and slowly, eyes downcast. It turns out the primate biologist at the San Francisco Zoo taught me about how you approach gorillas. You kind of sidle in, keep your eyes down. If you want their attention, you clear your throat like that, and then they'll look up if you wanted something.

But anyway, Schaller had to approach very slowly and carefully and respectfully. And the gorillas could feel it. After a while, when they realized he wasn't going to harm them, they let him just sit there in the middle, and he could take his notes and observe everything that they were doing, learning so much because he wasn't trying to do anything. He simply became the caring witness of their life.

And in the same way, mindfulness—you start with the breath—is really an invitation to approach your own body and mind as a caring witness, which is partly why we're talking about it as a loving awareness. Then you notice, oh, sleepiness—that's not a failure. It's just your body's tired. Maybe you've been running yourself around a lot, or not sleeping much, or whatever the causes may be. But you notice it. Or restlessness, or anxiety, or whatever. You simply sit in the middle of it all and allow yourself to be present for this.

And then the beautiful thing is you can't do it wrong, because there's not something that's supposed to be happening. What is happening is the subject of your attention, in the way that Schaller gave attention to see what was happening among the gorillas. Your gorilla nature displays itself.

I was leading a seminar over at Berkeley, at the Berkeley Law School, on mindfulness and the law. There had been a whole big gathering of lawyers and judges and law professors. One man who was a judge said he'd been a meditator for quite a while, and when he was appointed to sit on the bench, he thought, "Hmm, sit on the bench—I know how to sit." So he connected the two.

And this is his instructions to the juries: "I want you to listen to what will be presented in this courtroom with total attention. You may find it helpful to sit in a posture that embodies dignity and presence and to stay in touch with the feeling of your breath coming in and out as you listen to the evidence. Be aware of the tendency of mind to jump to conclusions before all the evidence has been presented and the final arguments made. As best you can, suspend judgment and simply witness with your full being what's being presented in the courtroom moment to moment. If you find your attention wandering, you can always bring it back to your breathing and to what you're hearing, over and over again if necessary. When the presentation of evidence is complete, it will then be your turn to deliberate together as a jury and come to a decision—but not before."

That's the kind of jury I want when they call me into court. But you can hear the spirit of mindfulness, which is very different than the way we tend to approach other things in our life. The invitation of it is really to learn, to discover. And there's a kind of freedom in it.

Now, as we go on, it turns out that mindfulness has to be married to compassion and loving-kindness. When we first taught these practices—my colleagues like Sharon Salzberg, Joseph Goldstein, and so forth, we all had our training in the 1960s and early seventies in Southeast Asia and India. When we first taught them, because I'd trained in an ascetic forest monastery and there was an ethos of a kind of warrior quality of training—sit up all night, don't move, really be mindful—it didn't work very well here. It got conflated with American values of striving and ambition. People thought, "Okay, I want to get enlightened," and the more they wanted to get enlightened, the tighter they became. Or they saw it as, "I've got to be on my breath, I've got to pay attention," and then they judged themselves all the time. It amplified their self-criticism. "Not only am I not good outside, but I'm also a failure as a meditator." They could see all this trouble in their mind, and it amplified all of that.

There was this famous dialogue we had with the Dalai Lama in the late eighties, asking about how you deal with self-hatred in Tibet, in training. And he was completely confused. There is no word for self-hatred in Tibetan. "What do you mean, self-hatred?" It took a long time for the translator to kind of get through to him. Finally, he looked up and said, "But this is a mistake. Why would anyone do this?" He asked our group, "How many of you have had experiences of self-hatred and lots of self-criticism, self-judgment?"

Almost all the teachers' hands went up that were in the circle. He said, "Oh, okay, I see. You have new problems here." We have lots of new problems, right?

So in fact, from the beginning in Buddhist psychology, compassion and awareness are woven together. Because in order to be present for experience, there has to be some element of kindness. Otherwise, you're judging it. This is good, that's not. I want more of this, I want less of that. But if you bring them together as loving awareness, then you're able to be present without manipulating or being in conflict with the experience the way that it is. And that gives you both more understanding and also becomes the ground, as you'll see later, for making healthier changes.

The studies of people like Antoine Lutz and Richie Davidson show that with very simple training, people can have much greater access to compassion. Like that doctor I told you about at Stanford. Or this letter, if I can find it.

"Dear Jack, I just want to express how grateful I am now to be aware of you. I found you through Duncan Trussell's podcast, and little by little the ideas of having compassion for yourself kept inching their way to what I guess is my heart. You've soothed me in darker days and given me a glimpse into a more loving reality for myself.

"Tonight I finally gave in and tried meditating. I decided after hearing you speak through my phone for months and months, I would finally give in and just sit with myself for a while. I'm not sure I've ever cried tears of joy like that in the twenty-one years I've lived so far."

This is a young man. "For the first time, I stopped and really held my anger that I've latched onto, my hatred, my anxiety, pain, and everything else I criticize myself about—with softness and compassion, without judgment. And all of a sudden, I felt like I really could be loving to myself in the same way that I want to love others. I just finally got some relief with what I felt inside and want you to know that I love you for it. Thank you very much."

It doesn't take that much sometimes, but it does take an invitation and a direction—this is what's possible.

So when people come to see us, those half or three quarters of you that are therapists or healers—just sort of the average in Marin County anyway—they carry their measure of human pain, their anxiety, their confusion. And the big question is, how do they touch it? With judgment? With fear? With overwhelm? With trying to get rid of it in some way? Or is there another way to be present for this story, for you?

This is from an acquaintance who's a teacher and a poet named Oriah Mountain Dreamer. She was leading a kind of New Age meditation seminar up in Canada.

At the end of a very long day, a small, thin woman in an oversized parka introduced herself as Isabel. "Can I do this meditation on my own?" she asked.

"Yes, I'm sure you can, although many people find it easier to establish a meditation practice with the help of a group. It's just hard to keep the discipline going on your own."

"But what will it give me? What will I get if I do this every day?" Her tone took on a whining quality, and I felt my irritation rise as she continued. "How fast will it work? Will I feel a difference after a week? How will I know it's working?"

This was exactly the kind of thing I detested. The quest for the quick fix, the guaranteed outcome, the simple answer—do this and you get that. My two young boys were waiting for me, and I just wanted to get home.

So I took a deep breath, looked directly at Isabel, and set my knapsack down on the floor. I tried to slow down my words, thinking that maybe if I spoke slower, I would feel more patient. "Well," I said, "meditation is more a process than a goal-oriented activity. It can help you become more aware of what's going on within and around you, and this can help reduce stress. My best advice is to try it and just be patient with yourself."

Of course, we're always teaching people what we need to learn in ourselves.

I picked up my bag and started to button my coat. I really did have to leave, and I wanted to get out of there while I was feeling virtuous for not snapping her head off.

But as I started to move away, Isabel suddenly reached out and grabbed my arm with surprising strength.

"But what I want to know," she said, her voice rising in a crescendo that bordered on real panic, "is will it help me find God? If I meditate, will I have an experience of something or someone out there listening, somebody really with me?"

A wave of desperation swept out from her through me, and I was surprised to find my eyes filled with tears. This woman wasn't looking for an easy answer or a guaranteed formula because she was lazy. She didn't want a simple plan because she was unable or unwilling to think critically about what would work. She wanted something she knew would work, and work quickly, because she was hanging on by her fingernails. She wanted something that would work in a week because she was afraid that she simply wasn't going to make it through months or years.

I put my hand gently over Isabel's where it gripped my arm. "It's okay, Isabel. We all feel desperate at times," I said. "Nobody does it by themselves. We all need help."

Her hand relaxed a little beneath mine, and she started to cry. We talked a while longer.

There is no "them" out there. It's only us. When I left, I did not leave one of them. I said goodbye to one of us—a human being doing the best she can, searching for the home for which all human hearts long.

And so the spirit of Buddhist psychology is to approach our human life with a fundamental compassion. Because everybody struggles. We are all in Isabel's place at some time or other. To see the beauty of a human being and also to see the difficulty in their life, as in all lives, gives us a different kind of connection and an entirely different way to hold it.

And it turns out, equally importantly, that it's not just personal but collective. As we can see, no amount of outer development—nanotechnology and computers, the whole world wide web, space technology, biotechnology, extraordinary things, the great library of Alexandria in my pocket along with a lot of bad YouTube videos—none of that outer technology, however cool it is, is going to stop continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing environmental destruction, continuing tribalism. Those spring from the human heart. And we're now at the point where the enormous outer developments have to be matched by inner development of humanity.

As the chairman of a previous generation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said, "We are a nation of nuclear giants and ethical infants." And so the training that you do in your own meditation or your own inner practice, or that you invite others to do, is not just personal for them or their families but is also profoundly political.

And here we have these huge fires that are happening, but we don't just have fires. We also have tremendous upheaval in our body politic and in our social contracts. Whether it's healthcare or immigration or foreign policy—"Oh yeah, let's nuke North Korea, that would be an interesting thing to do to stop them from having nuclear weapons." Somehow, when kids are in kindergarten and they start hitting each other with blocks, you say, "Use your words," right? Could we maybe bring that up a little bit to the world leader level?

And of course, as wise commentators on the political world will say—H.L. Mencken, who was a great commentator, said the whole aim of politics is to frighten you, and therefore gain your support. We can feel how there is a movement—terrorism and this and that—all kinds of things that are trying to frighten us. The point of mindfulness practice is to not let the outer suffering and terror colonize your heart. Because it doesn't have to. And to not buy into what, having just come back from China, I would have to say here is the propaganda.

There's another way to express this, and it comes from James Baldwin, who writes, "I imagine one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

Human life is insecure. Security is a superstition—it's just not real. As Helen Keller said, "Life is either a daring adventure or nothing."

fed stories of terror and fear, married to our own lack of inner stability and all the outer changes—Are we going to lose our jobs? Are we going to lose our power? Is our community going to be taken over by somebody else?—all the kinds of fears that get stirred up, a lot of what happens in society then gets projected on others.

So we have the enemy du jour. We had the communists, the socialists. Long ago it was the Germans and the Japanese, generations back. Then it's the immigrants, or the Muslims, or the gays. And now I think Russia is coming back as a kind of favored enemy. The military loves that, because terrorism you don't really need aircraft carriers for. But Russia—now there's an enemy you can kind of get behind and have huge need for armaments.

What Baldwin is saying is that if we can't tolerate the reality that life is uncertain, if we can't find what's called the wisdom of insecurity, if we can't find a steadiness in ourselves, then we not only project it on others, but we create a social construct of fear. So there's something deeply political as well as personally transformative in learning and undertaking these practices.

How do we do this? The very first mindfulness and loving awareness practices are trainings in non-harming. One sets an inner intention to not bring harm to other beings, reminded that this is possible for us as a way to live. And that includes ourselves.

There are practices of gratitude. There are practices of reverence for life. May I meet each being with respect. When you take a vow, when you recite this, when you undertake this as part of your mindfulness and compassion training—that I will be compassionate to others and myself because human life is hard—it changes everything.

In the trainings I had in the monastery, you didn't want to hurt even the littlest creatures. And your whole consciousness changed because you could feel the web of life. There's a poem from Lloyd Reynolds, who was the greatest American calligrapher, a teacher of Steve Jobs with that fantastic aesthetic. He writes: "A bug crawls over the paper. Leave him be. We need all the readers we can get." There's just something in it about a reverence for life that is the beginning of the training in compassion, of not harming.

Basically, it's hard to sit and meditate after a day of killing and stealing. It just doesn't work. It's rather upsetting to the heart and the psyche. So you say, if you want to learn how to be wise and present, the first step is attention to not harm yourself and not harm others.

The not harming yourself is equally important. I get people who are cutting, who are doing all kinds of self-destructive things, because that's the only way they can tolerate their pain. It's not judging, but rather it becomes an invitation in working with people: Does this lead to happiness or to suffering? What would the wisest and most caring figure want for you as a teenager, as a human being? Underlying all of it is to hold the vulnerability, the hurt, the pains, the confusion in compassion. Not harm.

The beautiful thing is that compassion is natural, and it can be strengthened. It's there in us. You know the studies—from infant studies at Yale to studies of rats at the University of Chicago—where if there's a rat trapped in a very tight cage and can't get out, and there's a free-roaming rat, and they give it some chocolate chips, favorite of rats, and there's a lever that the rat can learn to press to release the squealing rat that's uncomfortable—when they find out they can do it, they always do it. And they save chocolate chips for them. I mean, if rats can do it, come on.

My favorite kindergarten teacher, Peggy, who's at Cascade Canyon in Fairfax—one of the world's great kindergarten teachers—during the build-up to the Iraq War, there were, for whatever reason, some military planes, transport planes, flying out of the East Bay and coming low over Marin. The kids were out on the playground, and they were really scared.

They're noisier than normal planes, and they were clearly military planes—army planes or air force planes. The children came running in and said, "Peggy, what is this?" And she said, "Well, you've heard there might be a war in Iraq." And of course little kids pay attention to this, even five-year-olds, because it's on the television and their parents are talking about it. They knew. And they said, "Peggy, what's on those planes? Are there bombs?" Maybe. "Are there guns on those planes?" Maybe. "Soldiers?" Maybe. All kinds of weapons.

And then one of the kids said, "Well, are there kids like us in Iraq?" And Peggy said, "Yes, there are." And then he said, "Well, they must not know that. They wouldn't bring bombs and guns to hurt children like us. We have to let them know."

And so all the kids went out on the playground at the next break, and they got that kind of butcher paper, and they made a huge sign. "How do you spell Iraq, Peggy?" I-R-A-Q. And then a big picture of a kid, a child, fifteen feet tall—so that it was big enough that the pilots could see it from the air, so that they would know that there were children there and they wouldn't hurt them.

This is born in us—to be caring beings for one another when we're not so frightened. And what happens is, you know, it's there in the mirror neurons where we resonate with what's happening to another near us, in Rizzolatti's studies that go back decades. But the beautiful thing is that this capacity can be awakened through systematic practice.

I'll tell you one more story, one of the ones that I tell very often. I was leading a teaching on compassion with Pema Chödrön, who's a wonderful Western Tibetan nun, in the city. And it was a big evening—we had two or three thousand people come together. After teaching about compassion, we took questions, and a woman stood up, a young woman, very shaky. It was a difficult time for her because her partner had just committed suicide ten days before. She was shaky and vulnerable and sad and confused.

Suicide is a really confusing thing for people because there is grief, but there's also guilt. Should I have done something different? And there's anger. How could they? And loss. All these different complex emotions that come up, and they are profound. So Pema had her stop and just feel her breath and hold all of that with a deep compassion. It was quite beautiful.

And then I felt how alone she was. So I asked how many other people in that room had experienced the death by suicide of a family member or someone they were very close to. And I don't know, maybe two hundred people raised their hands or stood up—eight percent or something like that. And I said, "Let's just pause. I want you to turn your attention to this young woman." And then I said to her, "I want you to look around at all these people who've experienced what you're experiencing."

In that moment, it was as if the room turned into some great temple. There was silence, and there was so much compassion and love and tenderness for the shared suffering of their lives that it was not only palpable for her, but for all of us who were there as witnesses to it.

And this is really who we are. The compassion itself wants to come forth to hold the struggles of human incarnation. It is said in the metaphor for Buddhist psychology that to have a free heart or free spirit, there are two wings on which you fly. One is the wing of wisdom or understanding that sees things clearly. And the other is the wing of loving-kindness or compassion that holds it all with tenderness.

So now, let your eyes close gently when you're ready. It'll be ten minutes or so. And because it's often difficult for people to start with trainings in compassion or loving-kindness for themselves—for that issue of self-judgment and self-criticism—you'll hear pedagogically how we start with others and then move it back to ourselves.

Let your eyes close gently. First, just come back to the breath, and to being seated here in a simple, present way.

And feel how you treasure your own life. You know, if you were to step out in the street and a car came rushing around the corner, how you would jump back on the curb—because you do value your life and guard it in the face of trouble and sorrows. Feel your heartbeat and the life within you.

And now bring to mind someone who you love dearly. Picture them, remember them, think of them. And even if it's a little complicated relationship, this is someone you love. Feel your natural caring for them as you remember and picture them. Notice how you hold them in your heart.

And as you become aware of them and see them in your mind's eye, let yourself be aware of their measure of sorrows, as in all human lives—the sufferings they carry, some of which they may never have told anyone, the struggles or fears or hurts that are part of their life like all human lives. And as you see and sense their measure of suffering, their struggles or fears, notice how your heart opens naturally with caring, with well-wishing. And when they're having a really hard time, how natural it is to extend comfort, to be touched by their pain and to respond with compassion. What can I do to help?

And now add to this natural response the inner whispering of some phrases of compassion: May you be held in compassion. May all your struggles and sorrows be held in compassion. May your pain and sorrows be eased. May your heart be at peace. May you be held in compassion. May your pain and sorrows be eased. May your heart be at peace.

And now picture another person that you love, have them stand next to this first one. And let yourself also sense their measure of struggles and sorrows, their hurts and fears that they may never even give voice to, but that all human beings carry. May you too be held in great compassion. May your pain and sorrow be eased. May your heart be at peace.

And as you feel the tenderness toward these two loved ones, now imagine that they are gazing back at you with the same care. Imagine their eyes on you and they see your own struggles. They see your measure of tears and sorrows or hurts that you may never have given voice to. And they wish to you: May you too hold yourself in great compassion. May your pain and sorrows be eased. They wish for you: May your heart be at peace.

And you take in their care and compassion, how much they care for you. And then you can even put your hand on your heart if you wish and bring that care into yourself. May I hold myself with great compassion. May my pain and sorrows be eased. My fears. May I be at peace. May I live with a peaceful heart.

And you allow a deep sense of caring to grow. May I hold myself with great compassion. May my pain and struggles be eased. May my heart be at peace.

And know that this spirit of compassion in you can then be extended. If we had time to continue this practice, you could picture other loved ones and friends, family and community, one at a time or in groups, and extend this invitation of compassion to all who suffer—until you could even bring in the difficult people, all those into the brotherhood and sisterhood of all beings.

Let yourself feel how the beauty of every being brings you joy, and how the suffering of beings touches your heart, makes you weep. This practice brings a tenderhearted connection with all creatures and all life.

And staying with the compassion, let your eyes open. Just for a minute, gaze around with that care for all those seated around you—a sense of compassion for everybody's struggles, because they all have them, you know. And feel the natural well-wishing.

May you hold yourself in compassion, every one of you. And may your struggles and sorrows be eased, and your heart be at peace.

This is one of a series of trainings that most of you are familiar with—loving kindness, compassion, forgiveness, joy, gratitude. There's a whole series of these trainings. And what's important is that they are practice.

Sometimes you do it and it opens your heart and you think, "Oh yes, I want to live this way." It feels very good. Sometimes you do it and it feels kind of mechanical. Okay, it's a practice. I'm doing it, but I don't feel very much. Sometimes you do it and it brings up the opposite: "I hate these people. I'm never going to feel compassion for them. Not after what they did." It can bring up all kinds of things. It's a kind of purification that shows you what's in your heart.

And what you don't want to do is use it to judge yourself. If you struggle with it or it feels mechanical or brings up the opposite, you want to hold just what so—all of that—with compassion. Because the point isn't to perfect yourself. You've tried that for a while now. You go to the gym, you work out, you go to therapy, you're on a good diet—all that stuff. And it helps a little bit. I know it does, but only a little bit.

The point isn't to perfect yourself. It's to perfect your love, to be able to meet this world with a loving heart. And so instead of judging yourself, you let this spirit of compassion grow because you do it over and over again if you take it as a practice. And when you've done it twenty or fifty or a hundred times, your way of holding yourself starts to change, and your way of holding the suffering of others changes. It begins to transform the way you move through the world.

I'm aware as we come back after that compassion practice of all the people that I know, and that probably many of you know, who are up in Napa and Sonoma and Mendocino, and how important it is, as we hold them in our minds and hearts, that we also extend that compassion and that spirit to them. People who've lost everything, whose homes or businesses are just completely gone—their struggles become part of our practice. We can go further with it, but it seems really important to acknowledge and name it as we're doing this. It's not something in a vacuum but very much connected to what's happening in the world.

Just take a pause for a moment and see how you are, how these teachings sound to you.

A question came: "When working with someone in a therapeutic setting and trying to convey these practices to them, often there's a lot of resistance. How is it that we can meet that resistance and still encourage the practice?"

The person shared some examples of that resistance: "I've been this way my whole life. I won't be able to change." Or, "These are terrible people. I can't feel compassion for them."

And underneath it all, I believe, is a lack of self-compassion. And so in trying to work with someone in that way, you're helping them see that there's something underneath all of that.

So again, it's a really important question. I appreciate it. What you're talking about is a quite tender process, because if someone says, "I've been this way my whole life, I could never change," your first move, without even saying anything, is to hold that person in compassion and recognize: imagine living in a consciousness that doesn't believe they can be anything but unworthy or suffering.

And sometimes you can even say that out loud. You know, "Here I am, sitting with you, and you say this." And you repeat what you heard them say: "I'm just this way and I'll never change." And how hard it is even to hear this because of that amount of suffering. And so you start to actually model the compassion a little bit with them.

Then there are various other things you could do. You could say, "Well, maybe you can't change yourself, but if a child came up to you—an eight-year-old girl or seven-year-old girl—and said, 'I don't feel good about myself and I'll never change,' what would you say to them? Would you say, 'That's the end of it for your life'?" And so there are different gateways.

Or you could simply begin to say, "You know, it is really hard to hold this life in compassion. It's difficult and it's scary because we think if we did, who would we be?" You can voice some of the fears. Maybe we'd be overwhelmed. What you've done is you've found a good way to protect yourself. These are your strategies to keep yourself safe, and you want to be compassionate for that. Thank you for those strategies. And now, do you want to live just from that old way, or is there some possibility of change? Or you tell a story about change or something like that.

In a way, you find these different avenues, and any person who's been a therapist for a while has a variety of tools. But I think the biggest thing is to let them have compassion for the way they are, including the feeling that they can't change themselves. The child piece can work, or just your tenderness. I mean, I think that's really what most of therapy is about anyway—loving people, quite honestly. Yes, there are tools and ways to help them change, but a lot of it is just loving them in an ongoing and respectful and tender way. And after a while, you kind of wear them down with your relentless love.

But not in some weird way—it's respectful of them. And the more resistance, basically, the more that is the voice of how much suffering they've been through, what trauma they have, and so forth.

Yeah, thanks for that.

One more comment, question in the back.

"Hi. I'm actually from Sonoma and I'm currently evacuated, and I'm also a psychologist."

Oh my God, you've got two bad things happening for you.

"So I had signed up for this program a week or so ago, prior to being evacuated and all that. And I decided that I had nothing else to do today, so it was a good place to be. And I am just so incredibly grateful for your voice, for the soothing voice that you have in the meditations that we've done so far, and your awareness of the suffering that's going on just in our own community. And I decided to look at my phone on the break, which was a mistake, and another client texted me that she'd lost her home. So it's a lot to hold, just personally, professionally, and all of that. And so, again, I'm just really grateful to be here."

Thank you. I'm very glad you're here. I'm glad we have some clear air in this room for you to breathe coming down from Sonoma. And it is a lot to hold—first for your own home and your own life and people around.

And I also want to say, which I guess one gets to say in their seventies, that human beings are amazingly resilient. Even though we go through some eras of tremendous suffering—and this is a huge one, certainly in Napa and Sonoma—this is also going to draw out of the community care, love, resilience, strength. Through all this, it's going to be a struggle to do it. But I also see that we rebuild and that we know how to do it. And to be able to both hold the sufferings of people—the loss and the trauma—together with seeing that possibility of resilience is very, very important.

we look with the eyes that see the best of human beings and their possibilities.

So I'm really glad you're here, and invite your friends. We're here. We open ourselves to anyone who wants to come down and any way we can provide shelter and support. Thank you.

Let's continue a bit with two more dimensions before our lunch break. I want to talk about deepening the capacity for mindfulness in more detail. Again, the neuroscience shows that with training in mindfulness, like Sara Lazar's research at Harvard, there actually start to become changes in structural integration in the brain as people train their attention in mindfulness. Things become more integrated between different brain parts. There's similar research at Stanford showing more integrative fibers and so forth.

One of the things Sara Lazar found was that there's cortical thickening from mindfulness practice. Normally, the cortex starts to thin as we age, as do lots of other things like our skin and so forth. But through attentional and mindfulness training, there's actually an increase, a thickening cortex. So you stay smart, we hope, anyway.

And all this comes through the capacity that grows in us to be present—an increasing capacity for presence, to acknowledge and give attention to what makes up our life.

The dimensions of mindfulness and the foundations of mindfulness start with mindfulness of the body. We began in that way by training our attention to the breath. Emory University shows that through attention to the body, there's more rapid healing, improved immune function. Again, I talked about telomeres and epigenetic changes that are measurable.

To put it in a very simple way: how do we touch and hold this mysterious body that we've been given? Because it's a mirror to consciousness, to our life. The body reflects the states of heart and mind, as we know. We can have an experience of a boulder of grief on our heart, or an empty hole of loneliness when our children have all left for college, or when we're going through divorce—contracted in different ways, the tensions we hold in our body that get built up.

Sir James McKenzie, who was the father of mind-body medicine in the 1890s, took a paper rose under a glass bell jar and pulled the glass off in front of an asthmatic patient who was severely allergic to roses. Even though this paper rose had no scent whatsoever, the minute he took it off—she not knowing it was paper—she went into a full-blown asthma attack. Because mind and body are connected. How we think and how we envision affects our body as much as anything else.

So how do we touch this? A lot of what happens on retreats here is that as people over some days get in touch with what's going on in their body, all the traumas and thoughts and ideas also reveal themselves. We get people who are in the middle of struggles in their business or their marriage. As they get quiet, they notice how much is carried in their body and how much they can learn from this.

But what do you do? Do you fight it? Do you hate this stuff? "Okay, I've found tension. I've got restriction and constriction in my body." There's a way we try to control the outer things, and we clench ourselves in fear and anger and all of those things. Part of our invitation in mindfulness is to notice that the body is a mirror for the states of heart and mind. Not only do we attend to what's difficult and learn to allow those experiences, but also to allow and tune ourselves to moments of ease and well-being.

In neuropsychology, there's a negativity bias built into our nervous system—we're always looking for danger, and it's our survival instinct. You have to take care of danger or you're not going to be able to reproduce or take care of your family. So we're ten times more tuned to see what's wrong than to allow ourselves to experience well-being. Here in the training of mindful attention, not only in the body can we learn to hold the physical experiences of pain and throbbing, but we also can begin to allow the joy of life and tune ourselves to well-being.

A poem by Eduardo Galeano: "The church says the body is a sin. Science says the body is a machine. The marketplace says the body is a business. And the body says, I am a fiesta." You can hear in it all these different ways of holding this human incarnation, this human body. With mindfulness, we begin to allow both aliveness and the measure of pain and the measure of pleasure that come with having a human body.

When there's pain, you can hold it the way you would hold a crying child. You don't try to get the child over it or something like that. This baby's been fed and diapered. There's nothing they need and they're just crying. What do you do? You hold the child, rock the child. And after a while, you can feel the softening. "All right, I feel held."

It's safe enough.

And in a certain way, to begin to pay attention to the body, the difficult things can be held with this loving awareness. And then what starts to happen is it begins to unravel. There will be shaking and tremors and release, and sometimes it feels like it gets worse—energy movement and so forth. As you meditate, you can feel colder or hotter, all kinds of vibrations and things like that. And little by little, the body opens, because with attention, it wants to open.

It's the lack of attention that allows things to accumulate. You sit quietly and your shoulders are tight, your jaw hurts, your back hurts. And it's been the place for the last months or years where every time there was a little conflict, you tightened, and then it gets stored in there in different patterns. Then as you sit quietly, it begins to open, and sometimes it hurts more. It's not because you're doing it wrong. It's because you're becoming conscious of what was there that was held in your body.

And then the practice is to be interested and kind and to allow the body to show you what it's carrying, however it is.

One of the great practices—we don't have time to do this morning—is the kind of body scan. It's part of what Jon Kabat-Zinn teaches in mindfulness-based stress reduction. We teach it on retreats here. To be able to go systematically through the body—and it's not just a release, not just a relaxation, but actually a deep presence for each part of the body. Sometimes it's very painful to feel what's there. And you're not trying to get rid of it. But as you bring attention again and again, the body starts to open. That free flow of attention and inner energy then allows for a profound healing. Later on we'll talk about trauma, but those are all layered in the body. Trauma is there with stories and emotions.

I remember a woman who came on a retreat and she could not sit still. As soon as she sat, fear would arise or her body would start to shake. After a minute, she just couldn't do it. Of course, when somebody can't do something, or there's a lot of resistance—which was that question before—I get really interested. Oh, something's cooking. What's going on?

So I said, let's sit together. She came in and we sat and I said, all right, we'll just try sitting and you can describe to me what happens. Close your eyes, begin to sit. She said, okay, I get quiet. My body starts to shake. I feel a rising of fear. I've got to get out of here. I said, stick with it, just make loving awareness a space to hold all this. And then all of a sudden her eyes flew open and she said, "Ropes." And I said, tell me what you see.

It turned out that she had been abducted ten years before, kidnapped, tied up, all kinds of terrible things. And that was all still in there. The minute she sat still, it triggered that memory of being tied up and being unable to move. Meditation was unable to move, so all that stuff came up immediately.

We started to hold it with compassion, but it was not the right thing to just stay there. She told me some of the story, which I needed to hear and she needed to have witnessed. Some of the emotions came forward, and I said, why don't you do walking meditation? Don't try to sit.

And so she did. For those ten days of retreat, she didn't sit mostly. She just walked back and forth, being mindful of each step, noticing the emotions, seeing all the images that came. And little by little, she walked herself back into her body, because she actually couldn't live in her body after that trauma. She'd been doing all kinds of other things to avoid the trauma that she carried.

So the attention to the body becomes really important—the ability to help through these different practices of body scan or walking or just bringing a healing presence to the places that hurt. We did the compassion practice in the same way. Whether you use your hands or use the attention, you can go to the places that feel the most tight when they arise and hold them like a child.

Because usually we contract and there's a resistance. And when you contract and resist, what happens? It locks it in. But with that softening and kind attention, the body says, "Oh, finally she's paying attention to me. Finally he's paying attention to me." And things that have been held can open.

So that's the first foundation of mindfulness and training. We'll do a little more practice with it shortly.

The second foundation is feelings. There are both primary and secondary feelings. The primary feelings, which make up our human life, are that everything we experience has a pleasant, neutral, or unpleasant quality to it. You'll notice this when you look.

Since you were an amoeba, you started to move toward food positively and withdraw from whatever was toxic or dangerous. It's been built into your many incarnations—whether you believe it or not, your cells remember this—to like what's pleasant and dislike what's unpleasant. That's very natural.

But it doesn't serve us as higher mammals in the way that we are, because if that kind of automatic reaction happens all the time, then you are buffeted back and forth. As soon as something is pleasant, you like it and you grasp and want more. As soon as something is unpleasant, you resist it, you fear it, you try to push it away. Your life is always one of reaction to experience in a kind of primitive way.

With mindfulness or loving awareness, you begin to notice: "So this is pleasant" or "This is unpleasant"—and it doesn't scare you. Or "This is neutral, and I tend to space out." You actually develop the capacity to be present for your life without so much reactivity.

Then, based on the primary feelings, there arise the secondary set of feelings, which include all kinds of emotions. And they direct your life pretty much. You could say your life is directed by your thoughts, but William O. Douglas, Supreme Court Justice, said, "At the Supreme Court level where I work, 90% of our decisions are based on how we feel about things. And the other 10% is used to justify how we feel about it in legal terms." If it's true in the Supreme Court, you know it's true in your life, right? What you like, how you feel about things.

And so with mindfulness, what you can do is begin to bring a loving awareness, a kind attention to all the different feelings that come. Sadness or anxiety or loneliness or boredom or sleepiness or excitement or love or joy or a sense of ease or peace—all those that are more positive emotions.

I have a list that I made years ago. Now you can Google it and find lists of 500 feelings. It's very rich. Affectionate. Ambitious. Aggressive. Anguished. Ambivalent. Angry. Amused. Amorous. Aversive. Appreciative. Argumentative. Adamant. Addled. Amazed. Blissful. Brokenhearted. Bonkers. Bored. Bad. Belligerent. Bouncy. Buoyant. Bottled up. Brave. Cheerful. Calm. Claustrophobic. Curious. Crestfallen. It just goes on and on. We have a river of feelings that move through our consciousness. And usually we just notice them half a little bit, and then they direct our life.

So to become mindful, you start to notice the states that come in your own body and mind. As you do—and studies at UCLA show this—when you can name or acknowledge your feelings, it increases affect regulation. It increases your emotional balance. You become actually able to regulate all these feelings rather than being thrown around by your fear and your confusion and your longing and your love and your desire and your hate, one after another.

The way you do it is to acknowledge them, feel them in your body and heart and mind, and then often to name them. As the shamans say, when you know the name of the dragon, it starts to give you power over it. The minute you can say, "Oh, sadness feels like this," and "Anger feels like this," and "Fear feels like this," and "Longing feels like this," or "Love feels like this"—the minute you can actually name what you're experiencing, it starts to give you a kind of freedom.

And then to trust that you can tolerate your feelings. This will take some practice. I can remember a woman coming in with enormous rage, lots of abuse in her background. She said, "If I let myself feel this, I will just kill people."

I'll just be—the fire is so destructive. I said, well, let's see. Again, it's meditative, so you don't have to act it out exactly. Close your eyes, we'll do this together. Let yourself feel this sort of fire-burning rage. And I said, well, how big is it? Let's get a nature image. Is this like a hurricane or a tornado? She said, bigger. I said, well, you know, a tsunami? She said, no, no, this is nuclear.

I said, well, let yourself feel it. This was bottled up in this woman. You can imagine what her life was like. Nuclear. Huge. I said, how big is it? She said, if I let it go, it's going to obliterate everything. I said, well, let's see what happens.

So this huge nuclear fire and flame and hatred and rage. I let her feel it, imagine it, picture it. She was ready. She'd done some mindfulness training, so it wasn't like this was the first thing she did, but she was ready to try to explore this.

After a few minutes, she shook her head. She said, dead. Her eyes were still closed. I said, keep your eyes closed. What's dead? She said, everything. I just burned it all. The whole galaxy is all dead.

I said, all right, name that. Dead, dead. We're just acknowledging, naming each thing. It was rage, rage. Fire, fire. Burning, burning. Now dead, dead. Okay, dead, dead. She's naming it. Dead, dead. She said, it's dead. Nothing's going to happen.

I said, well, let's give it some time. Keep naming it dead. Let's give it a year, a hundred years, a century, maybe ten thousand years. How long is it going to take? She said, oh, a million years. I said, fine, we have time. So you're naming it dead. Let a million years pass—which was really a minute or two, right? Just everything's dead. See what happens. Dead, dead.

She shook her head. I said, what was that? Nothing. She said, okay, more dead. Give it another million years. Shook her head again. I said, what's that?

She said, "Well, over there's a little green." I said, "Well, do you want to check it out? There's a little planet over there and little green things are starting to come back" — you know, like the grass pushing itself up from the sidewalk. And life was coming back.

What you learn in working with feelings is that if you can allow them with loving awareness, you can trust that there's a fundamental healing that wants to take place, and that it can happen for people. As Pablo Neruda, the great poet, said, "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." There's something about life itself that insists on renewing itself.

Let me tell you one story, and then we'll do a practice together. This comes from a New Yorker account of a small unit of American soldiers — twenty-four of them — who were walking down the streets of the holy city of Najaf in Iraq during the early years of the Iraqi war. Hundreds of Iraqis poured out of buildings on either side, fists waving, throats taut. They pressed in on the twenty-four Americans, who glanced at one another in terror. The journalist recording this said, "I was afraid somebody would open fire and there would just be a huge massacre."

At that moment, the American officer in charge, wearing sunglasses, turned to his men and said, "Take a knee." Against the background of this seething crowd that had now swelled to a thousand, he held his own rifle over his head with the barrel pointed to the ground — a gesture that was almost biblical. The soldiers, who looked at him as if he were crazy, one after another, swaying in their bulky body armor and gear, knelt before the boiling crowd and, like their officer, pointed their guns to the ground. The Iraqis fell silent, their anger subsided, and the officer ordered his men to withdraw.

The journalist later tracked down Lieutenant Colonel Chris Hughes and asked him where he had learned to tame a roiling crowd in a war zone like this. He assured the journalist that it wasn't part of the army manual of instruction. "The problem is that if you fire even warning shots, the next thing you know, people start firing at one another and everyone starts to die," he said. "I understood that the Iraqis felt that our presence there was disrespecting their holy mosque and their culture. And the obvious solution was a gesture of respect."

There's some way in working with feelings that each feeling is welcomed almost with a bow. You name it — sadness, grief, rage, fury, love, joy, longing, peace — and you actually acknowledge each one with a gesture of respect.

So here's what I want you to do. We'll practice for a little bit. We'll start again as we had with mindfulness of the breath. But then, when a strong body sensation arises — tension, tingling, coolness, throbbing — let go of the breath. When it's strong, turn your attention as if to bow to it and name it. "Oh, tingling. Throbbing. Tightness. Fire." Hold it with kindness and see what it does. It might get stronger or move in the body or change, but give it that loving attention. Then when you're at ease with it or it subsides, you go back to your breath for a while, letting things mostly be in the background.

After some time — maybe a minute or so — some other strong thing comes. Maybe it's an emotion. "I really feel sad about all that's lost, what's happening to my friends in Sonoma and Napa." Or "I feel upset about this." Or "I love this meditation. I want more. I'm going to come on a retreat. I'm excited." Then you name it gently — "excitement" or "sad, sad, excited" — and you feel it move through your body and mind.

The interesting thing is that feelings actually don't last that long. You're sitting there and maybe you get angry about something. "Okay, anger, anger. They did this to me. I'm really angry at her or him." Then after about fifteen seconds, you notice the anger has turned into resentment. "How could they do that? I resent them." Then you stay with it a little bit and you say, "I hate this. I hate feeling the anger. I hate that people act this way." And then a few seconds later you think,

But I shouldn't be a hateful person. This is terrible. And you notice it's turned into self-judgment. Judging, judging. But then they did hurt me. And all of a sudden you feel righteous about it. I need to stand up for myself. And then you feel the anger for a while. And you notice how sad you feel that people would treat you that way. And the anger turns into sadness.

And then about fifteen seconds later you think, I wonder what I should eat for lunch—because the mind has no pride. You can be in the middle of this great drama and it starts thinking, "But I saw that nice thing for sale in the bookstore. I'm going to go to the deli." And then, "I'm no good at this meditation," and you judge yourself. "I feel so frustrated, but I am naming it all." And then you start to feel, "Oh, this is pride. I'm doing well." You just start to see that the states come and go, one thing after another. You can name that and then go back to your breath for a while.

And you start to develop the capacity to be present for what is arising and passing. You become more like the sky of awareness, of loving awareness, that can allow these things without taking each one personally or without getting lost in it.

Does that all make sense to you? Okay, so let your eyes close gently. We'll take ten minutes or so to practice. And again, keep it quite simple.

As you sit, find a way to be both upright and present, but also gracious, some ease in your body. Come back to the training of loving awareness of your breath, of attention, as a way to stabilize awareness, to connect body and mind.

As you feel the breath, let the other experiences be in the background. Let them rise and fall like waves through the ocean around the breath. After a little while, even as you keep going back to the breath, periodically you'll notice a very strong wave arise that pulls your attention from the breath. It might be a strong sensation in the body—tightness, pain, throbbing, tingling, pleasant—or it might be a strong feeling: sadness, excitement, longing.

When a strong sensation or a strong feeling arises, let go of the attention to the breath and, as if to greet it with a bow, name it gently. "Oh, sad, sad, sad," or "pain in the body, pain," or "throbbing, tingling, tingling."

As you name it gently, hold it with this loving awareness and see what it does. It might open or expand or get more intense or change to another feeling for a bit. And you name that. After you are at ease with what's present, return back for a time to the breath.

This breath, or this moment's experience, received with loving awareness, named gently—you become the mindfulness itself. You are the loving awareness that notices breath, body, or feelings.

[Bell]

So for the few of you who haven't done this before, how was it to name your experience as you sat with it? Was that helpful? What did you notice?

One person said, "I have sort of a burning question, and my intention is that it will help clarify some confusion for me and hopefully for many people. I've really been pondering this idea about being goal-oriented. I came to mindfulness to heal my own trauma and to kind of rewire and transform the landscape of my mind. And with a lot of practice, I have gone from being more of a negative default mode, from having a lot of anxiety, to being able to sit with it. And I guess my question is, now that I believe in the power of thought, there are these two ideas that seem to be hitting each other: How much am I allowing and letting things move through? And then how much am I trying to cleanse my mind and become more self-loving? Because I don't want to just keep allowing the self-hatred."

Yes. This is a really great question, and part of it we'll answer as we go along because it is so important.

As you can feel, we're starting like George Schaller with the gorillas and so forth, just taking our seat and seeing the landscape. Because even the self-hatred, to use your word, in some way has built into it this kind of judgment: I'm not okay and I have to fix myself. There's somehow a belief in that.

So to establish the capacity to be present with loving awareness for all that landscape becomes critical as a ground. And then it's possible to direct and choose from that ground what thoughts or what direction you go. So listen as we go along because it's a beautiful question, and hopefully it will answer. And if not, remind me later in the day when you feel like it hasn't been. But I think it will.

And it leads perfectly into the next piece that I want to talk about. We've been working with mindfulness of the breath and body and then mindfulness of feelings. And does that work for you? You could notice the feelings and acknowledge them. Pretty much people are able to do that—name them and so forth—when you turn your attention to them.

Now the next foundation of mindfulness is mindfulness of thoughts. And as the verses in Buddhist psychology begin, "Mind is the forerunner of things. Out of mind are created all the life." If you drive over the Golden Gate Bridge and see the city of San Francisco, every building you see and all the streets—they were thoughts in somebody's mind. So is the Golden Gate Bridge. All the human-made things, anyway, start as thoughts.

And then you sit quietly, you start to pay attention to your own breath, and you notice what's called the river of thoughts. The mind secretes thoughts the way the salivary gland secretes saliva. It just does. And it's not good or bad. It's just what it does—that inner dialogue.

The wild thing is that if the person next to you had a little speaker on the side of their head and you could hear their thoughts—the ideas and plans and judgments and reruns and things—you'd start to move away from them because they'd be really like, oh my God. They're wacky in there. But of course, we all have those kind of thoughts. And they're often reruns. I think 80% of the thoughts you have today are the same ones you had yesterday. It's like you're stuck in an old motel room late at night and the shopping channel's on and you can't change the channel. You're just getting all these old thoughts. And they're often one-sided or not true.

Story for you. When my daughter Cindy was in first grade, we took a trip to California to visit family. While we were there, she lost a tooth. She ran into the kitchen to show me and asked if the tooth fairy could fly that far, all the way from the East Coast. My mom shot a look of concern and later suggested that by indulging in such fantasies, I was teaching my child not to trust adults. Wasn't she going to feel betrayed when she found out the truth?

So the next time Cindy lost a tooth at home, she chattered with excitement as I put her to bed. She was now seven and a half. And she said, "How does the tooth fairy get in?"

"Through the window," I explained.

"Well, shouldn't we unlock it then?"

"Oh, I do that right before I go to bed," I said.

"Why does the tooth fairy want everybody's teeth?" she went on.

I took a deep breath, considered my mother's advice. Cindy would soon figure out the truth anyway, so I told my inquisitive seven-and-a-half-year-old that in fact I was the tooth fairy. She cried hard. I apologized and explained she was getting to an age at which it was more important for me to be honest with her than to play imaginary games. We cuddled for a while, and she stopped crying.

She had one last question: "What do you wear?"

This is how the mind works, you know. It just believes its stories.

And we just get lost in them.

So the thing that's kind of important is to be able to see the stories, to step back, if you will, with the witnessing quality of loving awareness and see what stories we're believing. Are they healthy stories or unhealthy stories? Which is a little bit like the question that was just asked. But the very first step is just to realize that with our attention, we can start to see the different thoughts that go through our mind—which lots of people don't really have that capacity. They haven't trained that.

So we're going to do a little practice now for thirty seconds or sixty seconds. You don't even have to change your posture much. What this practice is, is you're going to count your thoughts. Like the cat at the mouse hole. And they're tricky little guys because as you start to pay attention, they get quiet. And then they sneak up from behind and they'll say, "There haven't been many thoughts yet, have there?" Oh, three, right?

Now, the numbers are also a thought, but you don't want to count those. That's the cat chasing its tail. You don't want to do that. Or, "It's very quiet in here"—four. "There haven't been many thoughts"—five. Whatever. Sometimes it'll be picture thoughts. Sometimes it'll be word thoughts that describe things.

Now, understand that a thought, a picture, a word is not the same as a direct sense experience. So if you hear a sound or feel a sensation, that's just a sound or sensation. Then there comes a, "Gee, that's a sound. I wonder... Did I hear the bell from the other retreat?" And you have a little story about it. Or you hear that sound and you have an image of a bird or something. "I wonder what that is." So it's the words or pictures that describe experience, not the direct experience.

All right, you ready? Let your eyes close. On your mark. Get set. Count.

So, question for you—don't need the mic for this. How many thoughts did you count? Six? Ten? Five? Seven? Eleven? Nineteen? Two?

All right, so the person who had nineteen thoughts, did they have more thoughts than the person who had five? Or did the person who had five thoughts just have longer thoughts?

And then there's a group of you that had almost only picture thoughts, right? Some of you, I know that. And you probably know that of yourselves, that you think in images. Other people had just word thoughts without any pictures. And then some of you get the audio-visual portion together—you get kind of words and pictures combined.

So that's also interesting, that our minds operate in different ways. You can't always make an assumption about another person that you're talking to, that they even think in the same way that you do.

But the important thing is that you are able to step back and be that loving awareness that could notice the thoughts. And this gives you an enormous freedom, because your thoughts direct your life. Applying for which job, or who you should marry, or who you should divorce, or what kind of home you're going to design, or all these other things. Yet often we kind of live inside them and we can't take a step back. But here we're actually able to see the thoughts, and then in doing so, we can respond rather than react—which is really what your question was about.

You know, is this a healthy or useful set of thoughts, or not?

Hawaiian educator Puanani Burgess tells a story where she worked in school systems with a process called "building beloved community," like Martin Luther King's phrase. The exercise she uses is to have people tell three stories. The first is the story of your names. The second is the story of your community. And the third is the story of your gift.

One time she did this process in a local high school. They went around the circle and this young man, Kele, told the story of his names well, and the story of his community. But when it came time to tell the story of his gift, he said, "What, miss? What kind of gift do you think I have? I'm in this special ed class. I have a hard time reading. I can't do math. Why you make me so ashamed for to ask that kind of question? You think if I had a gift they'd put me in this class?" And he just shut down.

The teacher said she felt really ashamed because she'd never tried to shame anybody. A couple of weeks later, she was in the local grocery store and saw Kele down one of the aisles. She thought, I've shamed him in some way—I'll turn the other way. But before she could turn around, she heard him call out, "Auntie! Auntie!" He ran toward her and said, "I've been thinking, you know, what kind of gift I have, what my gift is."

She said, "Okay, brother, what kind of gift?"

And he said, "You know, I've been thinking. I can't do that math stuff, and reading's hard. But auntie, when I stay in the ocean, I can call the fish. And the fish, he comes every time. Every time, even when we don't have money, I can put food on my family's table. And sometimes when I stay in the ocean and the shark comes, he looks at me and I look at him, and I tell him, 'Uncle, I'm not going to take plenty fish. I just take one, two fish, just for my family. All the rest I leave for you.' And so the shark says, 'Oh, you cool, brother.' And I tell the shark, 'Uncle, you cool.' And the shark goes his way and I go mine."

She looked at this boy, Kele, and she knew what a genius he was. But in our society, the way schools are run, he's rubbish. He's not appreciated at all. So when she talked to his teacher and the principal, she asked them: What would his life have been like if this curriculum were gift-based? If we were able to see the gift in each one of our children and taught them around their gifts, what would happen to our community, to the collective, if we could understand that each person carries gifts to this world?

This is a traditional African understanding as well. Malidoma Somé talked about it in his culture. I love his metaphor. He says we're all born with a certain cargo—like the West African cargo boats that go up the river. Everybody's born with a certain cargo, and your task in life is to deliver your cargo. That's what makes you happy and what brings you connection to the world.

So we have these stories about how someone should be or how we should be. "I'm in this class, I don't count, I don't matter." It's not until we can actually step back and see the stories that we tell that a deeper kind of freedom comes. It's like Mark Twain, who said, "My life has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened." We have all those stories we tell about what's going to happen that aren't necessarily true.

Once you see this, then there are other teachings of thought replacement, where if you have thoughts of self-hatred or self-judgment or self-criticism or paranoia, you can replace them with thoughts or practices of loving-kindness or compassion. You start to train your attention to go toward that which is healthy. My teacher said it's like you're under a mango tree and you shake the tree, and the fruit falls down. Do you pick up the rotten mangoes or the good ones? You pick up the good mangoes. You start to be able to see the thought structure, and then you can see: these ones don't have my best interest in mind—let me let go of those. And these ones bring well-being, connectedness, health.

And it's interesting because I remember talking to a psychiatrist about all of this, a friend who had been doing meditation. He said he had a patient who was obsessive and paranoid and had some really pretty significant mental illness and mental problems. And he said, "I taught him loving kindness meditation." And because he was obsessive, he did it a lot, a lot, a lot. But it was a lot better than the other thoughts. And because he was paranoid, he used to get upset at the cars that went by late in the night and the dog and his neighbors that would bark. And now when that happened, he would say, "I don't think I'm doing enough loving kindness for the dog, you know, or the people in the neighborhood." And he would sort of up his loving kindness practice. And yes, in a certain way he was still caught, but it was an improvement considerably in his own mind, in his life.

So there are all these trainings, whether it's mindfulness-based cognitive therapy that works—and the research shows from Zindel Siegel and others that significant depression can be prevented through the ability to both see what you're thinking and then change the channel of the thoughts. Or Marsha Linehan's DBT, Dialectical Behavior Therapy, where she takes people who have pretty significant problems, borderline diagnosis and other things like that, and uses mindfulness training in a pretty effective way to help them change their lives. So again, just looking at Buddhist teachings as a psychology, these are some of the ways of applying it.

Now, there's one more step of deepening our understanding of how to apply these teachings this morning. And this is expressed or described in the acronym RAIN, which came from my friend and colleague Michelle McDonald. RAIN speaks of the way to deal with difficult problems, emotions, and conflicts that we carry in ourselves. And the acronym stands for Recognize, Accept, Investigate, and Not identify or not take it personally.

We'll go through those now. And as we do—even before we do it—you can think of a particular problem that you have in your life to which you could apply these practices of RAIN, of recognizing. Just in case you're a person that has problems, you can kind of bring that to mind. All right?

So, recognition. The research of Cliff Saron at UC Davis and also of Norman Farb shows that as you train in loving awareness or mindful attention, it actually enhances clarity of perception. You can see more clearly. You see what's happening. You can describe it clearly. You understand it more clearly. This is recognition.

And one beautiful Zen phrase for this is that to become mindful is to become intimate with the world. Mindfulness is a kind of intimacy—an intimacy that notices what's actually happening and what that is like.

And I remember, very early on, decades ago, before I was married, I was in a relationship. And it was quite a bit of struggle. I was probably in my late twenties or early thirties. And I went to see a friend of mine who was a good therapist. And I was talking about, you know, he said, she said, what was going on and so forth. And he just listened for a while. And he looked at me and he said, "You're really angry, aren't you?"

And I thought, "Moi? Mr. Buddhist, former monk, really angry?" It wasn't the story I was telling. I was frustrated and cheated and so forth. But the minute he said it, it crystallized in me. I said, "Oh yeah, actually I am angry." And there are ways we don't even know what we're feeling. Someone else can be outside of us and say this.

Or I think of another colleague who's a very skilled and wonderful meditation teacher, but in her relationship some years ago, this guy had betrayed her, jilted her, and dumped her basically. And she was trying to be compassionate and kind and so forth. And I was talking with her—obviously a lot of pain—and I said, "Have you considered revenge?" And this huge smile came across her lips, because you knew she had. Right? And just naming it. I mean, she wasn't going to do it. But just to be able to acknowledge: this is what is going on. This is how it feels. Betrayal feels like this. Hurt feels like this.

Longing feels like this. Loneliness feels like this. What are the stories? The grief, or whatever it might be. We have all these stories inside. So this is how we're holding it. And acceptance is just to see it clearly. Recognition is simply to acknowledge what's happening.

There's a cartoon from Jules Feiffer that shows a man sitting there a little disconsolately. The first panel says, "I inherited my father's way of thinking and analyzing the world." The second panel says, "I inherited my father's emotions and all the feelings, how he would approach things." The third one: "I inherited my father's style of moving and dressing and walking through the world." And then the last panel says, "And I inherited my mother's contempt for my father." So there you have a little therapeutic story in four panels.

The first step is just to recognize, with loving awareness, this is the way that it is. Grief feels like this. Longing feels like this. Fear feels like this. And to understand that these experiences are human.

That leads to the next step, which is whatever problem you're looking at as we go through these now—you've got to accept it, recognize this is the way that it is, and then accept it. The acceptance doesn't mean that at some point you're not going to respond to it. But until we can recognize that there are still twenty-eight thousand nuclear warheads around the world, to recognize it and accept that that's true, we can't go any further in how we're going to eliminate them or hopefully not use them. The first step is to say, this is where we are. Recognition, and then acceptance.

When people sit and meditate, my teacher called it stopping the war. You're always at war with the way it's supposed to be—what's too big or too small or too late or too early, your conflict with the world. Take your seat and stop your war with the world and just be present for the way that it is.

So you sit and you get sleepy. And instead of judging it, you acknowledge, "Oh, this is sleepiness." Maybe your body's tired. You've been running around a lot and you get quiet, and tiredness taps you on the shoulder and says, "Remember me? I'm tired."

Or maybe you're restless. And you sit there and you pay attention to restlessness and you name it: restlessness. And it gets worse. "I can't stand it. I've got to get up." So restless. "I hate this." Hating, hating. Restless, restless. And then what to do with it? You name it. Restless, restless. And if it doesn't go away and it gets worse and worse, then there's something else you can do. You can say, "Okay, take me. I will be the first person to die of restlessness at Spirit Rock this year. Kill me. Do me in."

And the minute you say, "All right, dying, dying—restless, I'm going to die of restlessness"—the minute you do that, it loses its power over you because you're not resisting it. And most of the difficulty is actually your resistance to the experience.

So this is the next step. Tara Brach uses the language, "I consent." This is where we start. Arthritis in my body that's growing worse. The loss of a parent.

The troubles outside us.

Here's a Zen master's poem, by Issa:

Dew evaporates and all this world is dew, like the dew on the tip of a leaf. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting.

A little like a haiku. Now I want you to listen one more time, because he wrote this at the death of his six-year-old daughter.

Dew evaporates and all this world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting.

And this is his acceptance. This is what was the most beautiful, refreshing, delicious experience, and now gone—as will everything be gone at some point.

There's a book that I really admire, and I admire the man who wrote it: Father Greg Boyle's Tattoos on the Heart. If you want to read a really remarkable account, if you haven't read it already—Father Greg Boyle started Homeboy Industries in Los Angeles and works with gang kids, doing really remarkable work.

One of the stories—there are many in the book that are quite moving and extraordinary—is that he went one morning to do a service. He's also the priest for several of the Catholic churches in the barrios of East Los Angeles and elsewhere. And he went to this church one morning and sprayed across the front of the church in graffiti were the big words: "Wetback Church," because it had been a place that harbored immigrants who had just come over the border.

He was horrified by this. It was a slanderous thing to do, a hateful thing to do. And he went in and there were the people waiting for the service. And he said, "You know, one of the things our gang kids can do—we have a contract from the city for Homeboy Industries—is they clean up graffiti. I'll get them over here right away. This is a terrible thing. It was hateful." He was trying to tend to them and hold this, saying he was sorry about it.

And then this one woman, Rosa Saldana, stood up on her chair—she never usually spoke—and waved her hands and said, "You will not remove that."

He said, "I beg your pardon?"

And she said, "If there are people who are cast out, judged, despised, or rejected because they are mojados, wetbacks, then we shall be proud to call ourselves the Wetback Church."

And there was something in her expression that says, "No, we will not reject this. We will stand up proudly and say we are the place that provides sanctuary, and leave that on there."

This is a literal expression of what it means to accept the way things are—to see them, to recognize them and say, "This is the circumstance we find ourselves in." And when you think about your difficulty, recognizing and accepting it as the way it is becomes the foundation.

Then the next step is to investigate, to look deeply. When you look deeply: How do you hold it in the body? How do you touch it? Is it tight or loose or painful? How big is it? Is it the hurricane or the typhoon or nuclear? What are the emotions that come with this difficulty? What are the stories that it tells?

Here's a poem from an eight-year-old boy:

I want to tell the fish, eat only the bait, not the hook. When you eat the bait, start from its edge and slowly gnaw bit by bit. Never, ever gobble it in one go.

He's really trying to express something he's learned—that you can approach things, even things that are difficult, but you have to look carefully. You have to investigate. You have to see how this is.

So when things are difficult, you recognize, you accept them, and then you look deeply. And then you start to hear the stories: "I'm unlovable. I could never be loved."

One of the most meaningful things in working with clients who bring that story up, at the right moment, is to have them give voice to that—after some compassion and other work—and then look in their eyes and say, "Is that true?"

Without any judgment, just say, "That again. Tell me, is that really true? Do you know that to be absolutely true—that you're unlovable?"

When you gaze in someone's eyes and ask what's true, it's very hard for them to lie in quite the same way. They're going to hesitate. "Well, it sort of feels that way."

"Is it really, really true?"

And it can change somebody's life to see themselves in a very different way because of it.

So there are all these different stories. "I'm unlovable." Or when you investigate anger, I notice—and I've learned this—if I express that anger directly, "I'm angry at you for doing this," it goes one direction. But usually underneath anger is what?

Hurt? Fear? Some kind of pain? Or some feeling of being disrespected? And if I approach that situation or that person and say, "I feel hurt," or "I feel afraid," they become interested. But if I say, "I'm so angry at you," they're not as interested in that. They back away.

So investigation means to look at what are the stories it tells, what are the mind states with it, what are the emotions that are deeper under it, and you start to see the construction of that difficulty in your heart and mind. And it leads to the possibility of release.

Here's from Sandra, a woman that I worked with on a retreat who had a history of binge eating for much of her life. And eating disorders are very, very painful and very hard. She described years of struggling with the compulsion of wandering like a hungry ghost, full of self-hatred:

"I believed that food had the unparalleled capacity to bring satisfaction and to free me from suffering. Time and again, I reach for the food, looking for it to do its magic, only to have it turn on me, fail me, bring me untold physical and emotional suffering and shame. I became hypercritical of myself and my situation and despaired.

"Freedom has come as I've become more mindful of my body and the intense discomfort I was trying to escape from. I started to find that I could recover more quickly and less painfully from bouts of compulsive binging if I could stay even a little bit kind to my body and present with my pain and the stories I was telling. Instead of eating even more, just to try and avoid the effects of having eaten too much and the remorse of having done it again, I could actually watch myself start down that sad old path. And as the loving awareness grew, I realized, oh, I don't have to do this. And self-compassion could grow. I'm deeply grateful for the compassion that has rescued me from the realm of the hungry ghosts."

And so you hear her process in working through the suffering and the pain of her life. Investigating—are these stories true, in the deepest way? Where do we hold it in the body? How are we touching it? All the discovery that comes. Recognize, accept, investigate. See the causes, the history.

And then the last is to not identify. It's the shift of identity. I mean, who are you really?

My friend Ram Dass was teaching after he came back from being in India in his early years, calling himself Baba Ram Dass. He had beads and a beard and was teaching Hindu mantras and kind of like a guru. And one woman sitting in the front raised her hand at one point and said, "Hey Ram Dass, you're teaching this Hindu stuff. Aren't you Jewish? Come on."

And he said, "Yes, as I am." He was bar mitzvahed. He went through all of this as I did. And then he said, "You know, I love the Jewish tradition. The Hasidic masters are a lot like the great Zen masters, if you read all those stories. And the Kabbalah is all this mystical teaching that's very much like the mystical teachings of India." He said, "It's beautiful stuff." And he paused. "But remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side."

Which was a very witty comment, as he was, but also something quite true—that who you are is not limited by your parents or your conditioning, or for that matter, by your race or by your culture. Those are all a part of you in some way, and they need to be respected or honored, but that's not who you really are. You can take that as your identity, but you're also free to release it.

And it's not just your pain then when you feel the pain that you have. It's the pain of human incarnation. It goes from being my pain to the pain of the world. And you carry part of that.

In meditation, there's something called the tears of the way, the tears of the Dharma—not because you feel impoverished or someone mistreated you or insulted you, but because your heart starts to open and you realize we all carry a certain measure of pain and a certain measure of beauty. And this is human life.

And so you recognize and accept, and you look deeply, and you realize you don't have to take it so personally. And it starts to liberate you in this profound way.

It's like Ajahn Chah. We were out on alms round one morning, walking with our bowls to a village to receive morning food. And he saw there was a big boulder in the field nearby, like Spirit Rock. He said to us, "Is that boulder heavy?" And we said, "Yes, master." He smiled and said, "Not if you don't pick it up."

He was really pointing to how we take things so personally and then identify with them and believe that that's who we are.

I have this cartoon of two generals striding down the halls of the Pentagon with all their medals, and one is looking at the other and saying, "It really shook me, I can tell you. I dreamed the meek inherited the earth."

We have all these identities of our roles and who we think we are. They're useful. They need to be honored. But they're really tentative. Who we are—and we'll explore this more as we go on in the afternoon—is not our body or our feelings or our conditioning. You are the spirit that was born into your body from the very beginning and that will leave your body when you die. Your consciousness itself. We'll talk more about that.

But all of a sudden you begin to realize in this way that it's possible not to be so caught up even in your own problems. Not to take them quite so personally. Not to speak of the global problems.

Gary Snyder, the Pulitzer Prize-winning poet and Zen master, now in his eighties, was interviewed by a colleague here, Wes Nisker, a few years ago. Wes said, "Gary, you've been one of the great environmentalists of the last fifty years. Almost fifty years ago, you published Earth Household and all of these teachings about bioregionalism and our concern for the environment. Now you see global warming, climate change, rising oceans, loss of species. What message do you have for us?"

Gary sat back and said, "Don't feel guilty." He said, "If you feel guilty, you're just going to add to the suffering. That's part of what made it. Do you think that guilt is going to help us? It's just going to create more conflict." He said, "If you want to save it, don't save it out of guilt or out of duty. Save it because you love it."

And that's really the only power, the only force that's going to change the world: love. Love that knows that it's not just those animals or those trees or that environment. It's our life.

The air that you're breathing today is also the air of the fires of Napa and Mendocino and Sonoma. It's also the air that dusted Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it came to us over the Pacific, being interbreathed with the badgers that live on this land and the deer and the turkey vultures and the turkeys. But it also dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor before it came into your lungs, didn't it? Some of it.

This is us. This is our body. And if you save it, you don't say, "Oh, my poor foot. Maybe I should help it. Should I? Is it worthy? I'm busy doing other things." If it hurts, it's a part of you and you tend it. You are part of life itself.

To not identify allows you to shift from taking things personally and to see that we're part of the dance, the tainted glory of humanity in some way. When we don't take it personally, there are both the tears of the way for all who struggle and the unbearable beauty and the love that comes, the tenderness that comes when you feel yourself connected with life.

Then your problems become more manageable because they are not layered with your self-judgment and your self-pity and your struggles. "Okay, I accept. I recognize, I accept them. I see that they come in part from this conditioning or these circumstances. Underneath are these feelings." And it's possible to address them and hold them in an entirely different way.

Does this make sense to you?

So this is kind of a practical application in Buddhist psychology of these very things we've been working with—mindfulness and compassion and loving awareness in difficulties.

I want to share one more story before we break for lunch. This is from Fran Peavey, who was a worldwide anti-nuclear activist, among many things, and a poet.

She writes: "One day I was walking through the Stanford University campus with a friend when I saw a crowd of people with cameras and video equipment on a little hillside. They were clustered around a pair of chimpanzees—a male running loose and a female on a light chain about twenty feet long. It turned out the male was from one of those amusement park zoos, and the female was being studied for something at Stanford. And who I thought were spectators were actually the scientists and publicity people trying to get them to mate.

"The male was eager. You know how they can be. He grunted and grabbed the female's chain and tugged. She whimpered and backed away, not into it. He pulled again. She pulled back. Watching the chimps' faces, I began to feel sympathy for the female.

"Suddenly the female chimp yanked her chain out of the male's grasp, and to my amazement, she walked through the crowd straight over to me and took my hand. Then she led me across the circle to the only other two women in the crowd, and she joined hands with them, and the four of us stood in a circle. I remember the feeling of that rough palm against mine. The little chimp had recognized us and reached out across all the years of evolution to form her own women's support group."

We are connected, you know. This is really true.

I was listening to Jane Goodall yesterday on Science Friday, and it was so moving to hear her—both the description of her work and also the kind of love she has, not just for the chimps but for the wildness of the world and what it means for us to tend our own wildness in our own world. And this story really speaks of that deep and loving connection.

That connection grows from mindfulness. It grows from loving awareness. It grows from the compassion and loving kindness training we've been working with, and from our capacity to be more and more fully present so that we can be with a person with their measure of pain and their incredible beauty—and not drown in their pain, but actually be able to tolerate it with them so that they can find a way to tolerate it. And to see the beauty behind all of that and say, "This is who you are. This is really what's possible for you."

So this has been a lot of teachings and little bits of meditation and training, kind of opening one part of the treasure chest of Buddhist psychology and Buddhist teachings. I hope you find it to be useful, maybe inspiring—things to reflect on and carry.

[This section contains multilingual chanting and song—a beautiful weaving of voices in English, Spanish, and French, all expressing the same universal prayer]

The mercy flows through every language, every voice lifted together:

The wind in the trees, the light on the hills—they are full of mercy.

I only want to hold the world in my embrace, to shelter the world within me.

At the end of the day, there is always the heart that remains. At the end of the day, there is so much wealth—the courage and the kindness I see in all these souls, the love and beauty that brings me back to this calm.

The ancient mantra rises:

Gate gate pāragate pārasaṃgate bodhi svāha

Gone, gone, gone beyond, gone completely beyond—awakening!

And the metta prayer, spoken in every tongue, returns again and again like waves to shore:

May all beings be happy.

May all beings be safe.

May all beings be free.

These are the ancient teachings of loving-kindness.

Even as a mother protects with her life her only child, so with a boundless heart should one cherish all living beings. Radiating kindness over the entire world—upward to the skies and downward to the depths—may all beings be at ease.

Whatever living beings there may be, whether they are weak or strong, the great and the mighty, seen and unseen, male and female, young and old, the beings of the earth and the air and the waters, living near and far away—may all beings be at ease. May they all be happy.

May I too be filled with loving-kindness. May I be filled with mercy and tender compassion. May I be safe and protected. May I be happy and joyful.

You can search the whole tenfold universe and not find a single being more worthy of love than the one listening to these words right now—yourself.

May all beings be held in mercy and tender compassion. May all beings be happy and live with ease. And may all beings, far and near, young and old, may all beings be free.

Let the great heart of loving-kindness in you blossom to hold all beings everywhere.

Know this truth: hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. This is the great heart of loving-kindness, the sublime abiding.

CHAPTER 77

Liberation and Mindfulness (Retreat at Spirit Rock)

Jack Kornfield · 1h02

> In this opening retreat talk at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield illuminates the essential practice of mindfulness—what he also calls loving awareness—as the pathway to liberation taught in the Buddhist tradition. Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna teachings and the Ādittapariyāya Sutta (the Fire Sermon), he contrasts the saṃsāric way of unconscious reactivity with the freedom that comes through present-moment awareness.
> Kornfield presents three progressive levels of mindfulness practice. The first involves learning to be present with the content of experience—body sensations, feelings, and thoughts—expanding what neuroscience calls our "window of tolerance." The second level reveals the process of experience itself: seeing that all phenomena are impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), and selfless (anattā). The third and most liberating level is resting in consciousness itself, becoming "the one who knows," as his teacher Ajahn Chah taught. This shift of identity from the changing phenomena to awareness itself brings the deepest freedom.
> Through stories of hospice workers, his teacher Mahā Ghosānanda's peace walks through Cambodia, and personal encounters with mystery, Kornfield shows how this practice cultivates both ease and fearlessness. He emphasizes that liberation is available here and now—not requiring years of practice or distant retreats—and that as we mature in loving awareness, we naturally bring these qualities of wisdom and compassion to a world that desperately needs them. The talk weaves together the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) with practical guidance for working with body, feelings, mind states, and the recognition of our true nature.

Ringing the bell before a talk makes it sound momentous, but actually I just like ringing the bell. We got it on the opening day of this retreat hall. We were thinking we needed a bell and then magically Zen Center sent us—San Francisco Zen Center sent us a gift and said, "We think you need a bell." And we did. So thank you, Zen Center.

You've completed one day of the retreat practice. A few of you are on your first retreat, and many of you have done quite a few retreats. Still, it is a process of settling down.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the core of our practice together. I'd like to talk about mindfulness, or what I will also be using as a synonym: loving awareness. If you read in the Buddhist texts, they begin in the most wonderful way: there is a path for living beings to realize well-being and liberation and overcome sorrow and grief and lamentation and despair. I think Spring talked about that. And it's the practice of mindfulness. In other texts, it says mindfulness is all-helpful, that mindfulness is the gateway to liberation and freedom. And so I want us to think together—those of you who've been practicing for a long time and those who are newer—about what this means and what it means for us. How does this operate?

There are two ways to function in the world. One is without mindfulness. This is sometimes called samsaric, or cyclic—the cyclic way of living. Because without mindfulness, without some sense of awareness, when experiences arise, what arises with them is habit, reactivity. We get fearful, we get caught, we're blind. We like it, we don't like it. Without mindfulness, we live in a somewhat unconscious set of patterns that simply enact the conditioning around us—the cultural conditioning, the educational conditioning, and so forth.

As we do, not only is there not much sense of awareness and freedom, but unfortunately, these patterns build. Because they're based in delusion, in fear, in a sense that we can't trust the world, that we have to protect ourselves. It's called the body of fear. And it grows.

Just coming back from teaching with Trudy in China, being in Asia, talking to people in Singapore and Korea—as those societies have modernized, there's a tremendous amount of stress. There's all the great prosperity that's happened, but there's also extremely high suicide rates among children in Korea and Singapore and parts of China, who are being driven to be ambitious and fulfill the goals of their parents or of the society. And then there's the grief that comes and the struggle. All of this is a kind of samsaric way of being, where things continue to operate but there's not a sense of inner freedom, of mindfulness, of being able to step back and really listen in a wise way.

If you read what is called the Fire Sermon, one of the first major talks of the Buddha, he begins: "This world is burning. This world is on fire"—which is something I think you can taste in the air here. So it's not just metaphorical. But then he goes on: In what way is this world burning? It's burning with the fires of greed. It's burning with the fires of hatred and ignorance. It's burning with the fires of delusion. And these fires cause immense suffering. We can see those forces as they operate in the world and, to a certain extent, in our own lives—when we're caught in greed and grasping and hatred and fear and ignorance and confusion. That's the samsaric nature, the repetitive nature of unconsciousness.

After his enlightenment, as the myth tells it, the Buddha surveyed the world with the eye of compassion, all four quarters of the world, and saw that there were beings suffering everywhere in different ways from delusion and greed and fear. And he saw that it would be possible to teach them a way that brought inner peace, liberation, wakefulness, ease, a sense of trust, graciousness. The way that he taught was to offer what we're doing here: the training and practice of mindfulness.

Now, whether you're a long-term practitioner or whether you're somewhat new, you don't have to wait for more years to find freedom, and you don't have to go on a long retreat in Thailand or Burma or go to the Himalayas. Freedom and well-being is available exactly where you are. I mean, where else would it be? This very body and this very mind is the place of liberation. It's the place we can get entangled and lost and habitual and repetitive and reactive and fearful. And it's also the place where trust, graciousness, wakefulness, and compassion can be born. As we find these, or as we mature into them over the years of practice, we also bring these qualities to the world that so much needs them.

You're all familiar with the passage from Thich Nhat Hanh where he says: when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive. And so as you train and practice in this great art of mindfulness and loving awareness, you become that person on the boat of the world that so much needs it.

The invitation, however many years of practice that you have done, has two sides to it. One side, which Spring spoke about this morning, is an invitation to ease.

This is from Zen Master Ryokan, the most beloved poet in Japanese history. He writes: "If someone asks what is the mark of enlightenment or illusion, I cannot say. Praise and blame, wealth and honor are nothing but dust. As the evening falls, I sit in my hermitage and stretch out both feet as an answer."

And so there he is in his mountain hermitage. Praise and blame, gain and loss, wealth and honor—what is the mark of enlightenment? I stretch out my feet in answer. There's something so gracious and lovely about this. He's not in conflict with the world.

So one of the invitations for your practice is to find ease in your heart, in your body, in your mind. And the other, which is a complement to that, is the invitation of fearlessness. Fearlessness doesn't mean you won't have fear. Anybody in this room not have fear? Raise your hand. You can have your money back. It doesn't work that way.

Fearlessness is something else. It is the steadiness, the courage, and the discipline to be present for this world with graciousness and ease on one side, but also with your full being. This is the invitation of practice—both ease and a kind of fearlessness that grows as we sit and walk.

When you think about where we're going on the spiritual path, the goal is not so much to get somewhere, but rather to open to the mystery of life. As it's said, the mystery of life is not a problem to solve, but a reality to experience.

I think about sitting with one of the teachers from Spirit Rock, Marlene Jones. A couple of years ago, she had heart failure. Unfortunately, where she was in the circumstances, it took a long time for the paramedics to get to her—fifteen or twenty minutes. So she had no oxygen to her brain for a long time. They got her to the hospital and iced her down, put her in a coma, and brought her back out. For a week they tried everything they could to get any response from her. Nothing. They did all kinds of tests. Brain dead, zero.

Sitting with her family, together we decided it was time to take her off all the life support machines. I was holding her hand and looking at her, saying, "Marlene, you know, you've been so important and such a great colleague. You're dying too soon. I'm going to miss you—and so many things you could have done with us. But the least you could do is give us a sign." Sort of teasing her a little bit, trying to make people who were sitting with her—her daughter and so forth—smile a little as well.

And as soon as I said that, two tears rolled down her cheeks. A week of nothing. The doctors prodding her, the different electrical brain monitoring and so forth—nothing. "The least you could do is give us a sign," and the tears came.

Who are we? Who are you? What is that spirit that was born into your body and that will also leave your body when you die? I could tell lots more stories, but you get the idea—we actually live in mystery. To be a human being is the most remarkable, mysterious thing you can imagine.

I was at the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering a couple of years ago. I don't think that will be happening again soon—I'm going to leave that aside. I was able to give one of the key talks there, which was on the Buddhist teachings of wise society: treating all members of society with respect, coming together in harmony and leaving in harmony. You know the things we've seen so recently. Taking care of the vulnerable—the young, the elderly, those who are sick, the women. This is a way, said the Buddha, that a society prospers and does not decline. And care for the environment. There's a whole text about wise society.

But it's also not all that different from what you'd find in the great spiritual traditions around the world—from the Native Americans, or from the wisest teachings in Jewish and Christian traditions, in Native traditions in Africa, and all kinds of places like that.

But the difference, and what made this conference so compelling, was that while these are beautiful visions of wise society, there's actually a way to do it. With the five thousand neuroscience studies and papers in the last few decades on mindfulness and compassion, it's now, as you know, in school systems—tens of thousands of them—in clinics, being employed in business, in arts, and so forth. I have a big packet that was sent to me called "Mindful Nation," signed by the eighty-five members of the British Parliament Mindfulness Group.

We can only hope that it's transmitted across the pond to our side sometime soon.

With mindfulness comes an invitation to freedom here and now, where we are. It's the only place we can find it. And this freedom manifests at three different levels—call it mindfulness or loving awareness.

The first level of freedom is our ability to know and be present for the content of experience. So we're sitting with our breath and our body, and we encounter tension and pain, pleasure and ease, tingling, heat, fire. We learn how to sit with it. We can name it gently: this is tingling, this is tension. These are the different experiences we have. As we sit and the body starts to open, we become aware of the content of our body experience—all the sensations and feelings that make up our embodied life.

What grows with this practice is what neuroscience calls the window of tolerance. We live in a society that is pretty much terrified of pain. We live in a culture of comfort. Too cold, turn up the heat. Too hot, turn on the air conditioning. Do whatever you can to make yourself comfortable. If you're uncomfortable, the problem is out there.

But here's the thing: is there anybody in the room who doesn't have discomfort or pain in their life, in spite of all those attempts to keep it at bay? You don't have to bother raising your hand. This is the way it is—praise and blame, pleasure and pain. We have it. And so if we can actually be with the content of our experience, we start to find a freedom already. Freedom with pain, freedom with tingling and tension and hot and cold. Instead of being reactive, mindfulness allows us to be present for that experience.

And of course it can get more extreme. Trudy and I had dinner in Hawaii, visiting some friends, and this world-famous magician named David Blaine was there, doing card tricks that I couldn't imagine how he performed. He said he loved doing them especially in front of scientists. He showed us videos—he'd done them with Stephen Hawking and Bill Gates, and they were going crazy, asking, "How could you do that? What's the physics of this?" I just said, "This is really good magic." But anyway, he was also talking about how he pushes his body. He's the guy who hung in a glass box over the Thames River for forty-three days, only drinking liquids without eating. He's an extreme kind of guy.

I told him about living in a monastery where our training was to master the postures by sitting for twenty-four hours without moving, or standing for twenty-four hours without moving. He said, "Oh yeah, I once did twelve days standing without moving." I said, okay, you got it. But it felt like there was some kind of brotherhood with him.

What happens when we learn to be mindful is that we can actually tolerate this world rather than be frightened of it. And it's not just a personal freedom that comes. As James Baldwin writes, "I imagine one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

When we can't bear our pain or our fear or our insecurity, we project it out on others—on the communists, or on Black people, or Asian people, or Native people, or Muslims, or immigrants. It was Russia for a while. I think Russia is coming back as enemy du jour; it's going to have a recurrence now. But we project it out because we live in a way that we can't bear the reality of insecurity. And yet, insecurity is the truth of the world.

So we learn more and more what it's like to be present for our body. And in the same way, we learn how to be present for our feelings—the tears and joy and grief and all the things that will come up on retreat.

Here's a story from Frank Ostaseski, who started Zen Hospice, a good friend I've been teaching with recently. He writes about Jillian, a woman who worked in publishing. When her mother got Alzheimer's, she decided to bring her mother to live with her and hired a caregiver. She came home one day, walked into the living room, and found all her beloved books—including her favorite Buddhist texts—scattered across the floor. Her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty books. I'm going to give them to my dentist." You can almost hear the mind state.

And she became immediately angry, trapped and caught up, and started to scold the caregiver. "How could you let this happen? How could you let her do this?"

And the caregiver, who wasn't caught in that drama, replied, "Madam, today I pack the books up. Tomorrow I will unpack them. If this gives a sense of control to a woman who has lost so much, well then, that's okay with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

And you can feel the graciousness of heart and the ability to be with uncertainty and change that's in that story. This is why we call it loving awareness. We start to learn a graciousness with the body experience, with the feelings that we have, with the mind states that come. Because we'll have all kinds of views come here. You're doing well, your mind tells you. You're not doing well. The world is a mess, but it's so beautiful. And everything in between, because mind has no pride and it just keeps spitting out stories and plans and wise things and fearful ones and beliefs and so forth.

When I was eight or nine years old, probably around nine, we lived in Buffalo, New York—lots of snow. There was this huge snowstorm with icy winds. My twin brother and I, and my other brother a year younger, decided to go out and play, and we got all wrapped up. The wind was blowing wildly. My twin brother was a lot bigger than I—he played football and I was not a football player, we'll just say that. Much more robust. I was really skinny then, and I was shaking and shivering. It was freezing cold and I'm shaking out there.

He looked at me and said, "It's not cold."

I said, "What do you mean?"

He took off his hat, unwrapped his scarf. "It's not cold." The wind is blowing, freezing. He took off his jacket. Pretty soon he stripped himself down to the waist and started dancing around saying, "You just think it's cold. You just think it's cold."

I remember this for my whole life. There was something about him, even as a young boy, knowing that mind states determine how we live in this world. And I didn't have to be caught in, "Oh, it's terrifying and it's cold and I'm frightened and I'm shivering and I have to go inside."

So as we become aware of the content of experience and can see the stories we tell and the beliefs, we go, "Oh, that's a belief. That's a story. How interesting." But we don't have to get caught in it.

Now the next level of mindfulness is mindfulness of the process. You who've been practicing for some time over these months and years—as you quiet your mind and open your heart, the sense of freedom of being able to be with experience begins to shift, because you start to look at the process of body and mind and senses in the world. And what you see is that it's all impermanent. It's all arising and changing and passing away and selfless in the sense that you don't choose your thoughts. I hope not. Anyway, most of them in there you wouldn't choose. You don't choose your feelings very much. You certainly don't choose your body sensations. And you see that it's ephemeral, insecure, subject to change, subject to pain. This is the way it is. Everything you pay attention to arises for a time and vanishes. All of it.

In the time you listen to this one sentence, fifty thousand cells will have been born in your body and fifty thousand will have died. That's a billion in a day. Your body's always dying and being reborn and remaking itself, as is your whole idea of yourself.

As you start to see the process of experience, then a different kind of freedom comes, because you realize it's all changing and you don't want to hold on to it. Otherwise you get rope burn.

I remember walking with Ajahn Chah one day out on an alms round, and there was a big boulder in the field nearby.

And he said to us, "Is that boulder heavy?" And of course we said to the master, yes, it is. And he said, "Not if you don't pick it up."

That was a kind of pith teaching of seeing the process of life and realizing that we can tend to it. We can respond, we can care for our family, our community, and the world, but we don't have to grasp it—because it's ungraspable. And there grows an ease with birth and death, with joy and sorrow.

So the second level of freedom comes when we start to see the nature of things and we get easy with it.

Frank Ostaseski tells a story about a woman who died at Zen Hospice, and one of her sons was twelve years old with Down syndrome. They were afraid to bring him—Tommy—because they didn't know how he would understand his mother's death. But Frank said, "Let's try it out." The father said, "Well, maybe we should talk to his therapist." And Frank said, "Bring the therapist along. We'll work it out."

So Tommy went in to see his mother and stood there for a bit. Everybody was frightened that he'd freak out. But he looked at her and said, "What is gone?" Just kind of in wonder—"What is gone?" He looked at his mother for a while, and Frank asked,

"What do you think, Tommy?" He started to talk about the Transformers movies, where one thing would transform to another. She died—maybe she'll turn into something else. Very wise.

Frank said he stood there with him, realizing Tommy was trying to understand in his own way. And then Tommy did a kind of remarkable thing. Frank asked, "Is there anything else you want to say to your mother, or do with your mother?" Tommy went over and first touched her very gently on her cheek. And then he began to smell her. He sniffed her whole body, from head all the way down to her feet.

Frank said he remembered one time driving in New England. A car ahead of him had hit a deer, killed it. And there was a fawn with its mother—the deer that had died lying on the side of the road. The fawn was coming and sniffing its mother, trying to understand what happened. He said he stood there with Tommy, and it was so tender and so mysterious to watch him just be there and smell his mother. And then Tommy said, "Yes, okay." And he walked out.

This is us. We're in this mystery of birth and death. To know the process of things gives a profound sense of freedom—that it is natural to be born, natural to die, natural to have birth and death, joy and sorrow, praise and blame, gain and loss. And there grows a graciousness and an understanding.

The third level of mindfulness is the mindfulness of consciousness itself. Content, process, consciousness.

My teacher Ajahn Chah had practiced as a monk in the forest for about ten years, very ardently. In those days the forest had tigers, and everybody got malaria pretty much. He did all these austere practices and lots of deep meditation, had visions and profound insights and so forth. He finally went to see the greatest master of that time, another Ajahn named Ajahn Mun. He told him all about his practices and asked, "Do you have any guidance for me?"

Ajahn Mun looked back at him and said, "Yes, Chah, you've missed the point." He said, "Those are just experiences. Dissolve your body into light, have a great vision, have some deep insight, overcome pain and pleasure—those are like movies. You get a war movie and a documentary and a romantic comedy, a love story. They all come and go. The only question for you to ask, for your freedom, is: to whom do these happen?"

So turn your attention from the content or even the process of the experience back to the knowing, and become the one who knows.

This invites a shift of identity. "You live in illusion, in the appearance of things," says Kalu Rinpoche, a great old Tibetan lama. "There is a reality, but you do not know this. When you remember, you will discover that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. That is all."

So there's something for you to reflect on for the next nine days.

What it's pointing to is this—let me see if I can say it much more simply, because this is really a key to liberation. When you look in the mirror, you notice you've aged, right? We all have that experience. Losing its fur and sagging and doing the things that aging does—wrinkling and all those things. But the strange thing, and it's very common, is that you don't necessarily feel older. You know how common that experience is? And that's because it's only your body that has aged. Your body exists in time. It grows—a little child, then an older child, a teen, a young adult, and it goes on. Then it gets older and it dies.

But the awareness that's looking at that body in the mirror doesn't exist in time. And it says, "Oh, well, how are we doing at this stage of life? Hmm, lost some more fur," or whatever your commentary on it is. "I wonder how much longer this one will last." Because you get it from Avis and then you have to turn it back in, right? It's just how it works.

So you start to look into the mystery of who you are, and you turn your attention back to become the awareness itself—to look into who you are and to become the knowing, the one who knows. And you know this already in yourselves. You know this in your being.

Alice Walker writes, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was, and it came to me—that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and I run all around the house." When it happens, you just can't miss it.

Walking in the high mountains, listening to a piece of sacred music, making love, sitting there with someone who's dying, or being there at the birth of a new human being—it's a really wild thing. Here's another person coming out of someone's body. It's wild. And you go, "Okay, all right, I don't really have the kind of intellectual answer, but I'm present for this mystery of life itself coming out of nothing."

And you start to become the witness. You start to trust that you can rest in awareness itself. And this level of mindfulness gives you, as Ajahn Mun said, the greatest freedom of all—the freedom to sit with birth and to sit with death.

When you have this freedom, I think of my good friend and colleague and teacher, Maha Ghosananda, who was the Gandhi of Cambodia, nominated for the Nobel Prize many times. I've told these stories so often, but he went back after the Cambodian genocide and the Khmer Rouge and spent fifteen years leading people back to their villages on foot, saying, "You can't go in a bus or a car. You have to reclaim your land step by step with chants of loving-kindness." Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. Walking through the jungles and the killing fields, ringing a bell and chanting all the way back. He was somebody who had had this very deep training. And he knew —all nineteen members of his family had been killed. Yet there was a way in which he knew how to return to the world.

Because the end of this process—this mindfulness moving from content to process to consciousness itself—doesn't end in some kind of spaced-out realm. Rather, when you enter and discover that who you are is nothing, and being nothing you are everything, as Kalu Rinpoche said, then the world is your family. Then you return and enter the world with a wiser heart and a freer spirit, no matter what happens.

Now, as you continue to practice on this retreat, you will sense these levels as you go through the foundations of mindfulness. As your body opens up more—and Christiane is going to talk more about this tomorrow evening—you can learn how to be present for your body not by striving but, as Spring talked about, with a graciousness or an ease. You let your body settle. Or if you can't, if you can't be with your breath, you can pay attention to your hands or to the sounds around you. But you keep gently coming back, steadying your attention.

And as you do, of course, at the content level, you become able to be aware of the different pains and tensions and the things that are carried in your body. But at the same time, you also will start to find moments of ease and pleasure. Joy is one of the factors of enlightenment. Peace and equanimity are other factors of enlightenment.

For those who are experienced practitioners, one of the best instructions you can have is to look for the moments of ease and the moments of joy and the moments of presence, and invite them to expand. Let the sense of well-being that starts to come periodically as you sit or walk—invite it to open, dwell in it, rest in it. You start to shift the figure and ground from the struggle with the body, even though sometimes you have to sit with things that are quite difficult and painful. Instead, you also invite a sense of ease and peace and well-being. This shift becomes really helpful.

Then as your mind gets quieter and you shift from content to process, the experiences of the body and the senses begin to break up and pixelate. Every sensation that's tight in the body, or the sounds you hear, becomes like many little vibrations. Whatever seems solid starts more and more to become visible to your mindfulness or your loving awareness as a kind of vibrating energy field that's full of life and not solid at all.

Trudy and I were at a conference together with Elissa Epel. She works with Liz Blackburn at UC Medical Center here—Liz got the Nobel Prize for discovering telomeres. Part of their research, which completely shocked them, was that after eight weeks of meditation practice, the telomeres, which are the caps on the end of chromosomes that protect them and keep them longer alive, actually grew and extended. They couldn't believe it. They replicated it a few times. They were afraid to publish it because people would think they were kind of kooky. But it has been replicated.

That wasn't what she talked about, though. We kind of knew that. She talked about some new research. Part of it—and I really want to read this study to figure out how they did it—is that they studied the telomeres in a community that had a big disparity between rich and poor. Those who were poor, as you would expect, had frayed telomeres. The stress and the poverty and the racism and all the kinds of suffering affects the body very deeply. But the thing that was interesting is that those who were wealthy in that community, even if they were in a gated community, their telomeres also had diminished. It's as if the cells of your body are tuned in to the environment. You are not separate from your environment. It's really wild.

So as you get deeper and quieter, you start to see the body as an energy field. Yes, you can be with the content, but you see the process of life itself.

And then there comes the mysterious thing that happens where you both love the body and tend it and care for it because it's really precious, and yet—I think of this quadriplegic who came to some Dharma teachings. I can still hear his voice at one point where he said, "I've discovered I am not the body." He'd been unable to move for a number of years. He said, "I've discovered I am not this body. Hallelujah!" He shouted it out. And so there's both the care for the body, but in this paradoxical way, there's also an understanding that you rent it, you use it, you love it, you care for it, but it's not who you really are.

In the same way, these levels work with feelings. You notice the content of your feelings. As C.S. Lewis wrote, you will discover inside "a zoo of lusts, a bedlam of ambitions, a nursery of fears, and a harem of fondled hatreds"—and every other feeling in between. I have a list of five hundred different feelings. So you start to see the content of the feelings, and you're able to be present for them and to name them, acknowledge:

this is sadness, sad, sad. This is excitement, excitement, excitement. By naming the experiences, like naming the dragon, there comes a kind of freedom in relationship to them.

But then, as that goes on, there comes a kind of maturing, because people often don't even know what they're feeling. I have a friend named Arturo Bejar who was the vice president of Facebook for a while. His job, among other things—he was an engineer—was to be in charge of problem solving for Facebook. He said, "So I was also the complaints department. And because we have 980 million users, it didn't take very long to get a million complaints." Talk about a complaints department! He said about a third of them were engineering problems. "I gave them to the engineers and they fixed them. That's what engineers do, mostly, if they're good. But two-thirds of them were the problems between people."

You posted a picture of me that I don't like—I don't look good in it. You posted a picture of my children, how dare you! You said that about me. It was conflict between people.

At first, he sent the boilerplate policy: if it's lewd or lascivious or hateful or whatever, then we'll take it down—this is our policy. Nobody was happy. So then he realized they had to do something about these complaints. He thought maybe it would be good if people contacted each other. So he started sending out a message: Why don't you talk to the person that upset you? Or message them, whatever.

But then he realized people weren't very skillful at that. So he said, why don't you tell them what upset you and how you felt about it? Well, after a little while, he found that people didn't know what they felt. So he sent out those little emoticons—angry, sad, whatever. You can show them how you felt about it. And then he said, why don't you get curious and ask them why they posted it? And the people who answered would say, "Well, I thought you looked good in that picture," or "I love your children. I thought it was a great thing. I'm so sorry."

It turned out that in ninety-five percent of the cases where people actually talked to each other, the conflict was resolved. As Arturo said, "I get to teach social and emotional learning and conflict resolution skills to 980 million people."

But this is something we're learning in a much deeper way in ourselves—to recognize what we're feeling. Often that means recognizing the trauma, the deep hurts carried in our body, the stories that come with it, the emotions. Being willing and able to be present for it all, the whole content of it.

And then something very interesting happens. Because you feel both the suffering you've been through and the beauty of your life, you kind of open yourself to that. You become able to bear your measure of tears and your measure of sorrows. As the heart becomes more tender, as you've practiced—and many of you have for a long time—you actually become more sensitive. But you also become more courageous and wiser. You're able to tolerate both the tears and the joy of the world, to bear witness to them, to hold them.

Then you get something called the tears of the way, which are tears that are poignant. You feel the sufferings of the world and you see its unbearable beauty, and you let your heart be touched by them all.

The fact that we don't know this in our culture... As someone said, I'd like to take every mother by the hand and walk them next to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and have them read aloud the names of everyone who was lost before anybody votes for war. Do not send a man to war who does not know how to weep.

When we talk about in our body politic the kind of conflicts that are happening and have happened—if that person isn't weeping, they're not paying attention.

So we become more sensitive, but we also increase our capacity for love, for presence. As we do, we start to see the river of feelings that make up human life—fear and longing and love and grief and loss and delight, the feelings of connection and creativity. We can bow and name them: fear is like this, longing is like this, love is like this, sadness is like this, connection is like this. We start to inhabit or feel that this is the nature of human incarnation. We see the process of life itself rather than taking it so personally.

Then we look at the mind, the third foundation of mindfulness, and the thoughts. This becomes really important as those of you who've practiced for a long time have matured, because we're really talking about how we live and embody this, not just on retreat.

The Buddhist texts say: Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you worse than your own mind untrained. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than a trained and tame mind—not even the most loving parents or loving members of your family.

So you start to see the stories and the attitudes. You get the content of it, the whole inner dialogue that you build your sense of self and world out of. It's sometimes rather alarming for those who come on their first retreat. It's like you're stuck in Motel 6 late at night and the shopping channel's on and you can't turn it off. You start to realize that ninety-five percent of what's in there is reruns—the same bad show as yesterday, or good show, or whatever.

They keep repeating themselves. The mind secretes thoughts like the salivary gland secretes saliva. It just does. But you also begin to notice the attitudes that you glom onto or that you get attached to. This is right and this is wrong and so forth. You start to see those different thoughts and attitudes. And then, because you've been practicing for a while, you get to do what my beloved Trudy has taught me about, which she calls an attitude adjustment—where you see, okay, this is an attitude, but it actually doesn't have my best interest in mind. And you begin to realize that you can shift from one particular view or attitude to another.

So you start to know the content and the stories, and you don't believe them so much. You don't take them so seriously. The stories of unworthiness or the stories of grandiosity, the stories of success or failure—you know what your mind does, all of those kinds of things. And there comes a shift of identity where you're not so much identified with your thoughts. This becomes more the process.

There's that wonderful story I'd like to tell of Ram Dass coming back from India with his beard and beads and so forth as Baba Ram Dass, teaching, and the woman in the front row waving her hand and saying, "Ram Dass, you're teaching all these Hindu things, Hindu guru, but aren't you Jewish?" And Ram Dass said, "Yeah, I am actually. I was bar mitzvahed." And Ram Dass says, "There's a lot I love about Judaism. The Hasidic masters are like the Zen masters. If you read Buber's Tales of the Hasidim, they're fantastic. And the Kabbalah has all these maps of the levels of consciousness that are a great match to all the great Hindu teachings I like." He said, "But remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side." And he was, of course, very witty as well as deep.

Because your identity is not your parents. And it's not even your gender or your race or your class. Those are things to honor and pay attention to, and without honoring them, we can have a lot of suffering. But that's not fundamentally who you are. And as you become quieter, you start to see, oh, that's only the personality when you look at the thoughts in the mind. Like your pet—okay, you've got it. Unfortunately, you've got a mutt in some cases, one of those adopted from the shelter. But you start to realize that the thought structures and the beliefs and the things you've been told about yourself—not only can you adjust your attitude, but you can also step back from them and see that those are just thoughts coming and going. They're like bubbles in a stream and they don't last.

And it doesn't take that much. Here's a letter I got:

"Dear Jack, I really don't know how to talk to you directly, but I wanted to express how grateful I am just to be aware of your teachings. I found out about you through Duncan Trussell's podcast last year"—who's a kind of dharma comedian with a big following among millennials, and I did some things with him—"and little by little, your ideas of loving yourself and having compassion kept inching their way toward what I guess is my heart. You soothed me in darker days and given me a glimpse into a more loving reality for myself. Tonight, I finally gave in and tried meditating. I decided after hearing you speak through my phone for months and months, I'd finally give in and just sit with myself for a while. I'm not sure I've ever cried tears of joy like that in the 21 years I've lived so far. For the first time, I stopped and really held my anger that I latched onto, my anxiety, my hatred, and everything else I criticized myself about, with softness and compassion, without judgment. And all of a sudden, I felt like I really could be loving to myself in the same way that I want to love others. I finally got some relief with what I felt inside and want you to know that I love you for it. Thank you so much."

It doesn't take that long. You don't have to go to the Himalayas. Maybe you have to come to Spirit Rock, but that's another story.

And so you start to see these layers of mindfulness that acknowledges the content, that sees the process, and then steps back. And the shift of identity, as Thomas Merton says—Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic—"There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence that is a fount of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from unseen roots of all creation, welcoming me tenderly, saluting me with humility and humanity." And he's talking about his meditation, that all these things come unbidden, the joys and sorrows, but underneath, as we shift our identity and become the one who knows, there comes a spaciousness and a freedom and a beauty.

And that's the fourth foundation of mindfulness, which is mindfulness of the Dharma, of the laws that are operating. For example, the law of cause and effect.

That if you practice anger, guess what becomes more your habit? Anger. And not only that, if you plant seeds of anger by getting angry at lots of other people, guess what you will get back? Anger. If you plant seeds of love and practice love in yourself, that's what will grow. And you plant it in the world, that's what will return. If you plant greed in yourself, that's what will grow in you. And so you start to see this is actually very impersonal. This is simply how consciousness works.

And then you begin to see the emptiness of it, as it says in the Dhammapada and the Diamond Sutra: like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream. Things arise—thoughts, feelings, experiences, whole years. I mean, what happened to 2016? It's back there with Y2K. Remember that one in the year 2000? And also back there with the Great Depression and the Egyptian empires and dynasties—all in the past, it went back to emptiness. There's this, and then it disappears.

And as you get quiet, you start to see: whoa, wait a second, it seems very solid, but all there is, is now. All there is, is this present. And as you become more and more able to rest in the awareness of this, you become the one who knows. There's a shift in reality for you—the experiences of the world still arise, but there's a sense of spaciousness, openness, graciousness, and of deep love.

As my teacher Nisargadatta in Bombay, the old guru, said: "Wisdom sees that I am nothing and love sees that I am everything, and between these two my life flows." Because as you get more empty, and if you look to see who am I—am I the little awareness inside here, like that's yourself—you look and you can't find anything except it's aware. There's no self, nothing separate. And you start to realize that awareness is what the world is made of, consciousness itself. All things born out of consciousness.

And from this place, you realize that it's your family then. This is who you are. Wisdom says, I am nothing. Love says, I'm everything. Between these two, my life flows. Mother Teresa puts it one way. She says the trouble with you is you draw your family circle too small. Life is your family. You come out of life. You are life. And you are what life is born from.

I think of Sharon Salzberg, our dear friend and colleague, who was walking down the street one day in Seattle when a somewhat toothless homeless man came up to her and said, "Don't you know me? Don't you know me?" And first she had to stop because we've had a lot of students on retreats—and I was at my 1978 three-month retreat, or whatever it could have been. But it turned out it wasn't somebody she literally knew. But she said the moment was so affecting to her when he said, "Don't you know me?" Because he's one of us. He is one of us. He's one of our family members.

And as you get emptier, or as you learn to rest as awareness itself, you discover that this is what's real. This and love. Because in the end, the point isn't to perfect yourself. It's to perfect your love. To be able to open the heart and mind and realize that, as the texts say: Oh nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember your true nature. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. Everything is waiting for you.

The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and seen the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you.

I feel so grateful to have had the years of practice and training where I've learned some of these things I speak about in myself. Sometimes I don't really know how people can get through great difficulties without having some inner practices. It's so much harder. And I also feel grateful that we have a community together to remind one another. It's welcoming, and it's revolutionary—remembering who you really are.

There's a freedom and an invitation here. The beautiful thing that the Buddha says when he speaks about freedom is this: "If it were not possible to free the heart and mind amidst all the changing circumstances of the world, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible—and possible for you—I offer these teachings."

You are sitting at the bedside of the world, the world of birth and death and joy and sorrow, and you're learning how to do it beautifully.

Adhiṭṭhāna: The Power of Dedication and Resolve

Jack Kornfield · 1h58

> In this Monday night talk at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield illuminates adhiṭṭhāna (determination, dedication, resolve) as one of the essential qualities inherent to awakened consciousness. Drawing from his years as a monk in the forests of Thailand and Burma, Kornfield weaves together teachings on how dedication differs from attachment—while grasping creates suffering, steadfast commitment to love and awakening transforms everything.
> Kornfield addresses the paradox of non-attachment and dedication, explaining that true commitment arises not from expectation but from recognizing our nature as loving awareness itself. He shares stories ranging from Jane Goodall's patient dedication with chimpanzees to Gandhi's trust in the ultimate triumph of truth and love, illustrating how determination operates across all dimensions of life. The talk explores both short-term intention—pausing to ask "what is my highest intention?" in difficult moments—and long-term intention, as expressed in the bodhisattva vows.
> Particularly poignant given the recent Northern California fires, Kornfield speaks to how adversity reveals the indestructible spirit within us. He reminds listeners that they carry generations of survivors in their DNA and that it's never too late to awaken. The teaching emphasizes that spiritual life requires both the in-breath of meditation and remembrance, and the out-breath of offering our gifts to the world—setting the compass of the heart toward what truly matters.

Good evening to you all. Just take a breath and let the stillness come into the room.

It is a great pleasure to welcome you here for this Monday night sitting group at Spirit Rock Center. The Monday night sitting group is now in its thirty-third year, and I did it every week for about thirty years—now about once a month. It's been a great honor and a pleasure to do so.

If we've not met before, my name is Jack Kornfield, and Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful valley through the care and commitment of a whole community of people dedicated to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness, or inner freedom of heart, that are central to the Buddhist teachings but that are really part of all wise spiritual life. We have all kinds of programs—retreats and classes and ways to develop compassion, loving-kindness, an inner sense of freedom and well-being for all kinds of groups. And now that you've come here, those who've come for the first time, you can also let this be a place, should you wish to continue, that will serve you in whatever way you'd like.

So it's a pleasure to welcome you.

What we do on Monday night is really quite simple. We sit for thirty-five minutes or so with a little bit of meditation instruction as a reminder, or for those who are new. Then we take a break for ten or fifteen minutes to stretch or relax. After that, there's often a teaching, and on occasion, dialogue or questions and answers.

So let's begin with meditation.

Let yourself sit in a way that is comfortable and stable. If you're in a chair, you might let your feet be flat on the floor and sit upright with some sense of dignity. If you're on a cushion or bench, find any posture that allows your body to rest on the earth with stability and ease.

Once you've taken a stable posture, if you're comfortable doing so, let your eyes close gently for this time. Begin simply by noticing the state of your body, coming into the present here and now with your attention. If you like, you can take one or two deeper breaths to release tension. Notice as you scan through the body if there are areas of tightness or holding that are easy to release, and do so.

Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. You can roll your head in a circle if you wish to release your neck, and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax, and let the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body, the heaviness of gravity, and how the chair, the cushion, the floor completely support you—how you can let go and rest on the earth. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the play of experience just now. Sensations and feelings, sounds and thoughts, the energy of life. You become the witness of it with loving awareness, with mindfulness, noticing this moment of aliveness.

After just a minute or two, you notice how easily the attention wanders off to thinking and planning and remembering other places. So to deepen the sense of presence and connect body and mind, become aware of how the body is breathing itself. You sit with a graciousness, like the king or queen on the throne, and feel the breath as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to feel the breath, you can put your hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall on the palm of your hand.

As you feel each breath gently with loving awareness, you start to feel the rhythm of life that's always present here and now.

Again, after just a minute or two, you notice that the attention is pulled by the waves that rise and fall around the breath. As you feel each breath and return to it, there will be thoughts and sounds, sensations, feelings. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath.

When one of the waves becomes strong and pulls your attention from the breath, instead of struggling against it, let go of the awareness of breath and receive this stronger experience as if with a bow. With mindfulness or loving awareness, acknowledge it by name: "Oh, sadness," or "tingling," or "planning," or "excitement." As you name it gently —excitement, or remembering—feel the wave move through your body and mind. And when it's passed, or you're at ease with it, return back to the breath.

Rest just here in the reality of the present, aware of the body breathing itself, or acknowledging with loving awareness the waves of experience when they're strong, as they arise and pass away. This breath, this moment's experience—receive it with loving awareness. All things arise and pass in the space of loving awareness. This breath, this moment's experience, just now.

Welcome back. Let yourself quiet down a little bit. It was all that Halloween candy that made you so wild, I can tell.

I also want to say hello to the people who are on livestream tonight who decided to stay in their pajamas and watch from their living room, and to people who are upstairs in the overflow room as well, who are longing to be with you, but they get to stretch out and relax, so it's kind of a good deal.

Please let yourself sit comfortably and at ease and listen tonight. Listening to teachings is a meditation in itself—not because you're supposed to believe anything, and there's no exam at the end, although there is a lovely poem I've read that begins, "In the evening you will be examined on love." So there's a real exam for us.

Instead, you listen to see if what is spoken has any resonance in your heart to what you already know, to what you know to be true. And the rest of it can just let go by.

In the course of this year, over these twelve months, I've been doing a series of teachings on Buddha nature and on the awakened heart and the awakened mind.

Tonight is a particular quality where we're kind of getting through the list. You know, the Buddha was a list maker—the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the Five Skandhas, the Six Paramitas, the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, and so forth. We've talked in previous months about qualities which are really inherent to the heart—generosity and integrity, wisdom and patience, renunciation. Next month it will be loving-kindness. That will be a juicy one before Christmas and the holidays.

Tonight it's a different quality, and I think an important one given that we live, at least some of us, in hard times—outwardly and inwardly. This is the quality called in Sanskrit adhiṭṭhāna, which means determination, dedication, commitment, resolve. It is one of the qualities that come out of our loving awareness. It is inherent to the heart when we discover who we really are.

I mean, who are we? How did you get born into this body and mind? It is really mysterious. And then how do we live wisely given the fact that we find ourselves in the human incarnation?

I'm also aware that this is the night before Halloween. One of my favorite memories from Monday nights, when we had our temporary buildings for twenty-five years in the meadow over there—those modular trailers for those of you who were here—was a Halloween night in the 1990s when we had a guest visit from the monks of one of the monasteries, Ganden or Shartse, the Gyuto Tantric Choir—the monks who chant with that whole chord of multivocal tones. I can't really quite do it. Anyway, they came in and they were going to chant for us, and the abbot put his forehead against mine. I guess it was some beautiful transmission or something like that. It was cool. Actually, it was fun.

So they were going to chant for us, which was lovely, and then I noted to them that it was Halloween and the moon was almost full. I talked a little bit about Halloween to these lamas, you know, and the costumes that people wear. They said, "Oh, we have costumes." They were in a van and they pulled out all these skeleton costumes. We went out into the meadow over there under the moonlight, and they did the skeleton dance of the dead on Halloween. I said, "Okay, whoever's central casting, this is perfect. Thank you."

Buddhist teaching is full of ghost stories. When I lived in the monasteries in the forests of Thailand and places in Burma, there's not only lots of stories of ghosts, but a really palpable fear of ghosts. It's part of everybody's daily experience in some way or other—to be wary of, to try to propitiate, to make sure the ghosts are happy.

Of course, being a young and rude Westerner at the monastery, I said, "Ghosts? Who believes in ghosts?" And I went and sat out in the charnel ground all night and said, "Okay, come on, bring it on, ghosts, whatever." I didn't see anything. They used to tease me about it. They said they saw my white skin and ran away, or something like that. Or maybe it was my big nose and they ran away.

But there were so many stories. My teacher's teacher was this very famous monk in Laos who used to go around, as Milarepa did, into areas where people were frightened by spirits. There are all these stories of him going into caves and being confronted by huge demons. He looked at the demon and said, "You think you're powerful? You don't even know who you are." And the demon says, "Huh?" He said, "Yeah, your power is really crude. You don't have any power over karma or dharma or anything important. It's just crude power. Do you want to know something?" The demon got interested, and he said, "All right, I'll teach you. I'll teach you how to meditate." So there are all those kinds of stories.

But I'll tell you a more modern ghost story, just because they're true. A good friend of mine who was a monk for a time in Burma became the director of one of the largest hospices in America.

He worked with Ram Dass for a long time as well. And one day, a family came to see him in the morning and said, "Our father is close to dying." Their dad was in his mid-eighties. "But we have a dilemma. His younger brother, who was seventy-nine, was killed in a car accident yesterday, and we don't know whether to tell him. He's very close to dying and it would upset him. What should we do?"

So my hospice director friend said, "Well, let's go and see how your dad's doing." They walk into the room and he's lying there, his last day or two, very weak. "Hi Dad." They pay attention to him and so forth. And then he raises his head and says, "Don't you have something to tell me?" They said, "What do you mean?" He said, "My brother died." They were shocked. "How do you know?" He said, "Oh, I've been talking to him all night long."

So who are we? Really, who are you? What do you think you're made of? Do you think you're this body made of whatever it is—hamburgers or kale or whatever your diet is? I mean, come on. There's something much more mysterious about life than we ordinarily touch.

I have this beautiful passage from Annie Dillard, from Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, written years ago, where she says: "The secret of seeing, the pearl of great price—I would stagger barefoot across hundreds of deserts after any lunatic at all if he could help me to find it. But although the pearl may be found, it may not be sought. It always comes as a revelation, a gift, a surprise." And she says that then you see what was ordinarily before your eyes, pulsing with light. It's filled with light. She says it's possible in deep space to sail on light, the light of the solar wind. Particle or wave, it has a force. You rig a giant sail and you go. And the secret of seeing is to sail on solar wind, hone and spread your spirit till you yourself are a sail, wedded, translucent, broadside to the merest puff, illuminated by the light.

We do live in this mystery, and things are glowing with life. Actually, anything that you look at doesn't quite exist that way. Your brain really creates it. The eyeball is always moving—it's not like a camera that just gets an image. It's actually always fluctuating. And then the colors that go on the retina and travel up through the optic nerve to that part of the brain—the brain really constructs what you see. So what is it to be alive, and who are we in this mystery?

If we take that as a kind of deep spiritual question, then this quality of adhiṭṭhāna, dedication or determination, becomes a question: To what are we dedicated?

If you look at Maslow's hierarchy of needs, it starts with security, food, clothing, and shelter, then social needs, and at the top is spiritual needs. But it often can be reversed. When you look at Viktor Frankl coming out of the concentration camps, he said, "We who lived through the concentration camps can remember those who walked through the huts, comforting others and giving away their last piece of bread. They may have been few in number, but they showed the greatest and truest reality of human spirit of all—the possibility to choose your spirit, no matter what the circumstance."

You see it in his life. You see it in the life of people like Nelson Mandela and others who, in spite of not having security or food or whatever, lived from and for the spirit. That's what they were dedicated to.

And so we begin to reflect in our own way in spiritual life: What are we dedicated to? What are our own values? Of course, there's a kind of conundrum, because a lot of spiritual teachings talk about non-attachment, which is a very good thing. Being attached and grasping doesn't make people happy. You may have noticed that when you get attached to your children being a certain way, for example—they don't necessarily want to be the way you want them to be. They want to be themselves. The same with your partners. You may have noticed that as well.

So how does dedication and determination, resolve and commitment, work with non-attachment?

The game, you see, is somehow to remember your true nature, to remember that you are consciousness, that you are loving awareness. But as my dear friend Ram Dass likes to put it, "Remember your Buddha nature and your social security number." There are actually multiple dimensions to our experience. If you only remember your social security number, you're in trouble—plus it was stolen last week anyway, so you're in more trouble. But if you also only think, "Oh yes, it's all light and holy," and don't drive on the right side of the street, you'll be in trouble too.

Here's a story from Robert Johnson, the Jungian analyst and author of He, She, We—all these wonderful little mythological books. He said:

"Years ago when I was in rural India, before it got modernized, I was quite sick with a high fever and great pain. They took me to a hospital, and the man at the hospital must have seen my apprehension because he tried to assure me that they were a very modern facility. 'We have a thermometer,' the nurse reassured me. I later found that they had one thermometer that they passed from patient to patient. In between, they held it under the water faucet. My temperature reached 105. I had terrible diarrhea and cramps. Somehow, after ten days, I survived. The bill was twenty-eight dollars.

"While I was hospitalized, my new friend from the village where I had come to live, Shankar, came every evening to visit me and slept every night on the floor under my bed. Of all my experiences in India over the next twenty years, this was perhaps the most touching. When I was sick, my friend slept near me so that I wouldn't be frightened or lonely, or to see if I needed anything. Now in America, if I get sick, I can't get anyone to stay with me for very long, not to speak of sleeping under my bed.

"But Shankar came and not only slept on the mat but tended me. Then one day he stood at the foot of the bed and said, 'Robert, I want to tell you a story about Baba and his friend. This friend got very sick, and Baba came and stood behind him and said, "Only say the word and I will go to die so you can live." Robert, for you, I am Baba. You only have to say the word and I will die in our friendship so that you can be better.'

"It was like one of those stories out of Scheherazade and the Thousand and One Nights. At first I was shocked by this. How can you hold that kind of an offer? But I had the presence of mind to say, 'Thank you, Shankar, for this great gift. Please don't do anything rash now. I think I have enough vitality left in me that both of us can continue to live.' And I did. But I never forgot the depth of the tie and the profundity of the relationship implied by this generosity I had never seen or known before."

And so here we are—these translucent beings made of consciousness, but also tending one another in this human form. If it's not attachment, then what is it? It's dedication. It's love. It's connection.

I talk about this when I've done weddings for people. If you're attached to the way a person is supposed to be, you will eventually get in conflict. "I need you to be this way, and you need to do this for me"—it doesn't run very well as a relationship. But if instead you are committed—committed to love, to care, to bless, to offer and foster your support to one another, not with expectations but with a steadiness of heart—it changes everything. When people love us with a steadiness, when we love with a steadiness, it changes everything.

Tori Murden, the first woman to row solo across the Atlantic Ocean, said, "If you know what it means to be out in the middle of an ocean by yourself in the dark, scared, then it gives you a feel for what every other human being is going through. I rowed an actual ocean. Other people have just as many obstacles to go through."

So dedication. What does it mean as human beings to be dedicated? And to what do we become dedicated? Dedication is really an expression of the awakened heart that says this life I experience, this embodied life, has certain things that I value, that really matter. Rather than saying, "I should be this way," it becomes, "This is what I care about." And of course, you learn this quality and find it supported by your training in meditation.

Zen master Suzuki Roshi writes: "Suppose your children are suffering from a hopeless disease. You don't know what to do. You can't lie in bed. Normally the most comfortable place for you would be a warm, comfortable bed. You pace up and down, in and out, but this doesn't help. Actually, the best way to relieve your mental suffering is to sit in meditation, even in such a confused state of mind. If you have no experience of sitting in this kind of difficult situation, you're not yet a true meditation student."

No other activity will appease your suffering. In a continuous practice under a succession of agreeable and disagreeable situations, you will realize the marrow of meditation and acquire its true strength.

And so it's not that one practices in order to have a particular experience, but rather to learn this capacity to be present for the ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows that make up human life.

Just last night I saw the film Jane at the Raphael Theater, about Jane Goodall. If you haven't seen it, it's really quite marvelous. They found a hundred hours of film that was shot in the 1960s by her husband, who was a brilliant and celebrated filmmaker—footage they thought had been lost for a long time—and used this to make a film. So you see a lot of her going there to Gombe and beginning to try to watch what chimps were doing. No one had ever done it in the wild before, at least not Europeans, not white folks. I'm sure that there were African people who lived there who knew the lives of chimpanzees much better, but no scientists, no researchers prior.

And the thing that you see in it is how long it took her to make a relationship with the chimps. There were no dating apps, you know—she couldn't swipe on it or anything. She had to trapse through the rain and sit under the bushes. And they would run away each time. And she would just sit there. And she did it again and again and again for months and months and months. She was asked, "Didn't you get frustrated?" She said, "I did. But Dr. Louis Leakey, who hired her, found that she had a considerable quality of patience." She said, "I just knew that if I stayed long enough and still enough, at some point we could start to relate." And they did. It's a beautiful account of this.

Your capacity to be present is larger than you know, because your awareness is larger than you know. It contains everything. You are spirit itself. You are consciousness born into this body. And you also carry within you, in your DNA, generations of ancestors who've survived everything. You are a survivor—it's there in you. You have strength. You have courage. You have stamina. And even people who are weak and sick, when it comes down to it, often there's a kind of rousing of amazing strength that you can see. It's just there in you.

I think about my grandparents and great-grandparents, whom I knew—I knew several of my great-grandparents quite well, as they lived into their nineties, so I knew them into my twenties. They'd come over on boats in the 1890s as teenagers. They left Russia or Ukraine or places where there'd been pogroms and anti-Semitism and so forth. Left their families, came as teens, knew they would never go back—and they did that, you know. It's not like moving from Marin over to Berkeley. There are generations of human beings who have survived and struggled and brought life to you in the form that you are. And you carry this in you. So this is part of what it means to awaken—to realize and recognize this.

I'm also aware of how many people in our neighborhood have been affected by the fires. How many people lost their homes. Or have people close to them who lost homes and places in fire. I know you're here. So many—dozens. And many, many more.

I was a reporter at the Sarasota newspaper in Florida, where, as a cub reporter, I spent a lot of time covering fires. One day I parked my car behind the police line where reporters were supposed to stop and walked around until I found a way into the wooded area where the woods were blazing. Helicopters flew overhead, the pilots swooping low to fill buckets with water from a pond and drop them onto the blaze.

With the fire sweeping across hundreds of acres, firefighters were focusing on directing the course of the fire rather than attempting to put it out, limiting injuries by instructing people still in their homes to evacuate. However, there was one woman, Mrs. Rosa Garcia, whose house I happened to be standing beside, who simply refused to go. Her husband was at work, her children at school.

Now, this isn't to say everybody could have done what she did—there were those huge winds that would have made it impossible. But in this particular situation, you could. When she dropped off her kids at school that morning, when she said goodbye to her husband, she'd had no idea what she would do or what she would be capable of doing that day. From the outside, she looked like a completely ordinary woman, home on a Wednesday afternoon doing her household chores until the kids returned. But on this day, she defied the authorities who told her to leave, stood in the line of a tremendous fire, stood her ground armed with no more than a hose and a broom, and saved her home.

I think of this woman often, not because she was a heroine on the order of Martin Luther King or Rachel Carson, but because she was an ordinary person who was able to find remarkable strength in herself. And if she could do it, doesn't that hold a promise for all of us? This is really what this quality is about—somehow awakening to this capacity within ourselves.

Of course, we can learn it in certain ways through meditation. In the training I did in the monasteries, we would sit up all night, endure long sittings without moving, walk barefoot in the morning ten miles to get our food. There were endurance practices—monks who made vows to not lie down for a year, austerities like living in caves. The stuff young men like to do, testing themselves.

Now, of course, that's the hero's myth. The myth for women is quite different. For example, I think about when my daughter was born and my ex-wife went into labor. Her labor lasted almost three days because the contractions happened, but my daughter's head wasn't quite engaged. So the contractions kept coming, but her cervix wouldn't dilate. We'd go to the hospital and they'd say, "No, no, no, go home." Three days and nights—it was like some monastic practice on steroids. Joseph Campbell wrote about this when he described the hero's journey. He said mostly men's initiation is an attempt to seek or discover what's quite natural for women. Whether it's giving birth or, in the feminine, giving birth to other things in the world, there's a whole different way of understanding that comes through having a female body. But even so, the gift underneath is to look and see who we really are.

I just came back from traveling in China for a few weeks with my beloved, Trudy. We taught in a twelve-hundred-year-old Zen temple where the abbot was very open to modern forms of mindfulness teaching, Western psychology, and trauma work. There was an enormous amount of trauma in the community around the temple, and he was interested in how that fit together with Buddhist psychology. It was actually very creative.

There we were in this thousand-year-old temple—a giant temple with lots of buildings—and in this big Buddha hall there were pictures on the walls of the great ancestors. Huineng, the Sixth Patriarch, and Mazu, whose temple it was, all these great patriarchs. Trudy says at one point, "I'd like to teach a meditation that as far as I know has never been taught in the land of China in thousands of years. Please close your eyes." Everyone closes their eyes and she says, "I'd like you to visualize that you enter this great and august dharma hall, and you look on the walls and see the pictures of all the ancestors—and they're all women. The great Zen ancestors of thousands of years. Then you look up to the front of the hall and you see the abbess, who's always a woman, over generations, surrounded by all her chief disciples, also women, just because it's a bit easier to get enlightened in a woman's body. But men also can be enlightened, and we've saved a place for you in the back of the room. Also, we'd like to ask if you wouldn't mind helping in the kitchen afterward. It will be helpful because then you'll be able to make enough merit that perhaps in a future life you can be born in a woman's body."

The women in the room were all grinning like this. And the abbot actually appreciated it—he had a good sense of humor about it all. More than that, he understood that there was something that needed to change.

But we live in a society that in a way wants to put us to sleep. I've read this many times: the best adjusted person in modern society is the person who's not dead and not alive—just numb, a zombie. When you're dead, you're not able to work for the society. But if you're fully alive, you constantly say no to many of the unhealthy processes of society—the racism, the polluted environment, the nuclear threat, the arms race, drinking unsafe water, eating carcinogenic foods. Thus, it's in the interest of modern society to promote those things that take the edge off, keep us busy with our fixes, and keep us slightly numbed out and zombie-like.

In this way, our modern consumer society itself functions as an addict. And you can hear it—great dilemmas? Maybe you should go shopping. So there's this force that wants to put us to sleep in some way.

And yet, there's another possibility. We all know it because it is who we are. When we sit and walk, practice meditation, do loving-kindness practice or compassion practice, the point in some way is to remember who we are as spirit—that we have a possibility to choose our freedom in any given circumstance. But it has this odd kind of paradox: even though it's always here, it also flowers with our dedication.

"Just as raindrops one by one fill the water jar, so with care and dedication, fill your life with goodness." This is a verse from the Dhammapada, the Buddhist teachings—that moment by moment, drop by drop, you can awaken. And somehow you begin to transform your body, your heart, your mind, your consciousness.

Otherwise, you live on automatic pilot, as Julia Child writes: "In department stores, so much unnecessary kitchen equipment is bought indiscriminately by people who had just come in for men's underwear." You can get seduced by the culture that says this will make you happy.

What happens in deep meditation—I just finished teaching a retreat with Trudy and a whole group of wonderful teachers here at Spirit Rock—is that sometimes when you get very still, the mind becomes clear and luminous. The body can dissolve into light. You have experiences of profound stillness or vastness of mind. And then certain qualities arise in consciousness, which are described in Buddhist psychology as the malleability and pliancy of consciousness. What it means is that when you become really centered and stable, you can place your attention somewhere and it just stays. It's like a well-trained dog: sit, stay.

You can turn your attention to a state or to a quality, and even more interesting, you can call up different qualities and the psyche—or the storehouse consciousness, whatever you want to call it—will allow them to arise. You might say in a very deep place, "May this consciousness be filled with joy," and it's like a video game or something. The body and mind just get filled with ecstatic joy. Okay, too much—dial it down.

The possibilities of playing in the realms of consciousness, the yogic possibilities, are really kind of fantastic and wonderful. But then, of course, there's the laundry—as you know from that book title, After the Ecstasy, the Laundry. These experiences remind you, they show you who you are, which is a being of consciousness. You are loving awareness born into this body, a being of light. But then, as you learn that, the next task is to remember it, to embody it.

And you don't have to have those particular experiences, because we've all had experiences—walking in the mountains, or making love, or listening to a magnificent piece of music, or sitting at the bedside of someone who's dying in that mystery, or being there when someone's being born, or taking sacred medicine, or a hundred other ways that open us. We know we're not just this body. As we remember, as we meditate to remember and reawaken, that becomes more the way we rest and move through the world.

And the beautiful thing is that it's never too late to awaken, to remember. Never too late to start over.

The man was my age but looked many years older. He was an army vet. He was also homeless, cold, and hungry. I could see he'd tried to wash up before coming to the social service department to ask for help. His face and hands were clean, but his clothes were filthy. And though he claimed not to have had any alcohol that day, the smell of it seeped from his pores.

I wanted to get him into rehab, and I asked if he was ready to come in off the streets. "No, ma'am," he said. "All I'd like is a few dollars and some bus tickets. If I can get sober enough, they'll let me into the shelter across town." The shelter had fifty beds—cots, really. The homeless were admitted at night and forced out at dawn to eat breakfast at a nearby charity. Fifty beds, and nearly one thousand homeless in this small city alone. And that is really one of the shames of our culture. It really is something for us to tend to.

Winter here in Northern California can mean cold rain and mud, and even though this man and many like him slept under bridges to keep dry, the dampness penetrated everything. His clothes and the bedroll he'd placed on the floor smelled moldy. The pages of a book he carried were swollen.

I asked him how many times he'd tried rehab. "Two or three, a long time ago," he said.

Maybe it's time to try again, I explained. I'd had a client who'd gone through the program seven times before it took. Besides, I said, we're months away from warm weather. What else have you got going?

I watched his face as he considered my offer. I thought I saw a flicker of hope in his eye, followed by a shadow of doubt. He'd tried before. It had been hard, impossibly hard. But so was living on the streets. Finally, he lifted his head and looked at me. I reached for the phone. "Shall I?" I asked. He barely nodded yes.

An hour later, I handed him over to a recovering alcoholic, also a veteran, who would drive him to one of the best rehab facilities in the county. "Come visit me when you graduate," I said as they left.

I barely recognized the man when he came into my office six months later—so tall and handsome, smelling like the outdoors and holding a huge bouquet of flowers.

There's something about trusting, about seeing in each human being the dignity, the nobility, the possibility of awakening in every being, and knowing that it's never too late to remember. When you do, when you act with dedication and when you support that in another being, something remarkable unfolds.

Goethe wrote about it. When he talked about daring to dream, he said that when you dream and when you act, providence moves with you—which is a way of saying the divine or the mystery responds. When you turn your energy or your love or your dedication to something, somehow the universe knows it. That same universe that made you and makes everything.

Or as Helen Keller said, "Security is mostly a superstition. Life is either a daring adventure or nothing."

When you dare, when you direct yourself, when you're dedicated in some way, all kinds of surprising things happen. Your vision, your sense of the possibility of living in a freer way, of being awake, and the dedication to that vision—these are the key.

Henry Moore, the great sculptor, writes, "The secret of life is to have a task, a vision, something you devote your entire life to, and the most important thing is, it must be something you cannot possibly do." Isn't that interesting? So it's not so much a matter of checking the box off on your list—it's really something more magnificent and greater than that. It's a willingness to turn the soil and the compost of your life into something beautiful.

Alan Chadwick was a famous gardener and one of the fathers of the modern ecological movement who taught at the University of Santa Cruz. He gardened by growing soil to grow his plants. What he meant by soil was different than the Earth's surface. It meant a power in the universe that could be concentrated in gardening to capture cosmic magic. This was his kind of description of it.

Chadwick grew soil and planted seeds based on the relationship that existed between the Earth, its moon, the sun, the other planets, the weather, the way doves in the area cooed, mist in the trees, and everything you could imagine. When winter was very bleak, he'd sing about the energies under the surface of the earth: "Underneath, the seeds are full of life. This very moment, the seeds are waking up. They're pushing up to the sun. The doves are singing, coo, coo."

Once Chadwick took a UC Santa Cruz class to a junkyard lot that was filled with rusted-out cars, broken glass, chunks of cement, sand, and lots of abandoned trash. He asked the owner if his class could use the lot for an experiment to grow flowers and vegetables. The owner said, "Sure, but you are crazy. This soil is dead." The garden later became famous for its extraordinarily delicious vegetables and gorgeous flowers. They grew the soil and the plants followed.

Having a vision, having a sense of possibility and a dedication to it—this is everything. As someone said, life shrinks and expands according to one's courage and dedication. That's how it works.

And so in meditation, the same thing. You sit and some days it's boring. Some days it opens you to something beautiful, and some days you're just making lists and kind of checking them off in your mind even before you've started your day. That's fine. Or you're at the end of the day and you're doing reruns of your conversations and so forth. And some days it's much tougher than that. Some days it's beautiful. But the beautiful ones or the difficult ones—they're not really the point.

This from Zen teacher Karlfried Dürckheim. He writes, "The person who, being really on the way, falls upon hard times in the world, will not as a consequence turn to that friend or those other friends who offer them refuge and support and comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. And in this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

And this is what you'll see, those of you who live in Santa Rosa and Napa Valley, Sonoma and places from the fire. The fire seems to destroy everything, and yet out of it also there is a spirit that grows. I know it—the store is open, the sign says, "What do you need? Come and take it." The neighbors come together and say, "We have and you don't—share it with us." There's a community spirit that comes in the difficulty that somehow illuminates the spirit in the hearts of everyone.

In spite of racism, tribalism, environmental catastrophes, political divisiveness—all the kind of troubles that we see—the power of love and determination is that medicine, is that capacity that will in the end transform it, that can and will. Nothing else really has that capacity.

There are terrible things that happen in the world based on people who are unafraid to kill, based on violence and those who are willing to commit it. And the only force that is strong enough, powerful enough to meet that is the force of love. As Martin Luther King said when his church was bombed, "We will meet your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering, and we will not hate you. We will wear you down by our capacity to love." Because in the end, we are connected. No matter what those who are frightened and those who fight say—we are connected. This is the truth.

Now traditionally, the kind of dedication to love or to care or to illumination, whatever your dedication might be—in Zen it begins with a vow. Each time you do a sitting: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all. Dharmas are infinite, I vow to master them. Obstacles are endless, I vow to overcome them." These kinds of vows, little vows.

Or Shantideva's beautiful vows that I love to recite. The Dalai Lama says in the morning when he wakes up: "May I be a bridge, a boat, a raft to help all cross the flood. May I be food for the hungry. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be a lamp to illuminate the path in the darkness. And may I do so as long as sun and moon and stars and galaxies exist, until all beings are enlightened together." Amazing, beautiful, poetic vow. And what it speaks to is human spirit—what's possible for you to dedicate yourself to.

Napoleon said it at the end of his life: "The thing that astonished me most is that the sword is always beaten by the spirit." It is always true. Here he was, conquering all of Europe for a time anyway, yet he recognized that the sword is always beaten by the spirit.

So to what do you dedicate that spirit in your life? To love well? To be awake? What is it? "Set your heart on gold," says Rumi. Set your heart on something really beautiful. Who are you? And what can you do with this life?

Now in Buddhist psychology there is a lot of emphasis on the power of dedication and intention. Short-term intention means that as you go through your day, when you get into conflict or you have trouble making a decision or some struggle of some kind, you take a pause—a mindful pause, a few breaths—and then simply ask yourself, "What's my best intention? What's my highest intention?" Very often the whole tone of your conversation will change, because there you are trying to be right or get back at somebody or prove your point or whatever. And you pause for a moment—or it's in your email or your text before you send the little text thing.

And you say, what's my highest intention? Oh, it's really to connect, or to work this out, or to find a way to love this person, or to listen—something beautiful. When you ask your heart, it usually answers that way. And then you reread the text and say, oh, I better change a few words there. And the whole tone changes. When you press send, you get an entirely different response. Or in the conversation, the tone of your voice changes. You may not even say very much different, but it has the quality of respect, or wanting to listen, or to learn, or to be open. In that simple moment of quieting yourself and asking, what am I dedicated to? What is my best intention?—everything gets transformed.

In the same way, there is long-term intention. That's like those Bodhisattva vows I just talked about, which is really setting the intention of your heart, like setting the compass for the direction of where you will go.

This is from Wendell Berry, the farmer poet. He writes: "So my friends, every day do something that won't compute. Love the world. Work out of love for nothing. Love someone who doesn't deserve it. Invest in the millennium. Plant sequoias. Put your faith in the two inches of humus that will build under the trees every thousand years. Go with your love to the fields. Lie down in the shade. Rest your head. Plant sequoias."

Plant those things that you won't live to see, but that someone will. Plant a forest. Do something that won't compute.

Long-term intention is really not about what you accomplish or what you get, but rather what you plant and how you move, what kind of graciousness you can move through this world and what it is that you offer to it.

And then if you have a beautiful intention, make a beautiful vow or set your intention on those kind of things—then you lose an election. You start over again. Something doesn't work out. Einstein's dissertation was turned down as irrelevant and fanciful by his physics department. Michael Jordan was cut from his high school basketball team. In the first year, Coca-Cola sold 400 bottles. Sometimes you win and sometimes you don't. That is not the point. Because you will have praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain. Anybody not have that? Please raise your hand. You can have your eight dollars back or whatever it was. It's just how it is.

So then what do we do with it is really the question. What do we make of this in some way?

Dina Metzger, the poet, writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised and I will make a light of it to make you weep. And we will have rain and we will begin again."

It's a poem for Napa and Sonoma and Santa Rosa, and for beings all over the world. Give me everything mangled and bruised and I will make a light of it to make you weep. And we will have rain and we will begin again—because we do and we can.

One of the other things that's really important to say is that this capacity to start over, to listen to the compass of the heart that's built in you—you can see it all around you. Life wanting to renew itself. As Pablo Neruda said, you can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring.

Life wants to come back. All you have to do is watch toddlers. I love toddlers—the drunken sailor stage where they're just learning to walk. They try one step and they fall, then maybe get two steps and they fall again on their diaper. They fall like a thousand times, right? What do they do? Get back up again. And then they start cruising. And it's not singles bar cruising—there's a different kind of cruising. Just hanging on the edges of things.

Basically people are worried, "Oh, my child is slow to walk or speak or get out of diapers." No kid that I know goes to high school in diapers. It doesn't happen, right? The children want to become independent, and our spirit wants to become free. And I can hear my daughter's voice at two years old. One of her frequent phrases was, "Me do myself." You know, "Me do it, me." That little two-year-old voice saying, "I'm going to do it, I'm going to put on my shoes, me do it." There's some kind of native and natural opening to freedom that is part of your heart.

And the passage I read so often from Thomas Merton to the young activist where he says, "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and even achieve no result at all, if not perhaps bring about its opposite. As you get used to this you start more and more to concentrate not on the results but on the value, the rightness and the truth of the work itself."

There's something about dedication that's really setting the compass of the heart in a direction of awakening or love or remembering who you are, of embodying what matters to you in this world. And then there comes this beautiful trust somehow, like Pablo Neruda's poem: you can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring.

The world is in a lot of difficulty now, as we know, in many ways. And yet at the same time, there's also less warfare than there's been in a lot of previous centuries, believe it or not, if you study it. There are a lot more resolutions of conflict happening not by war than used to be so. Very slow, we human beings, very, very slow. But we seem to be learning slowly. The moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice, as we know. Sometimes it seems very, very long.

But then, here is Gandhi again, saying: "When I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. There have been murderers and tyrants, and for a time they can seem invincible, but in the end they always fall. Think of it—always."

And that's really the voice of a kind of truth about life that we can add our own heart to, our own love, our own trust to.

So many stories, but I think enough stories for tonight.

Close your eyes for a few minutes and just reflect—not as a meditation. You don't have to get in a weird posture. You're weird enough as you are without adding to it. But reflect on your own inner commitments or dedication. What matters to you? What have you set your own heart on? And if it's not so apparent, might today be a good day to listen and reflect on what it could be?

And what in your life best supports this dedication, this direction? You can know. You are free to choose. This is one of the great gifts of consciousness. You are loving awareness itself, and you can choose. And this is a great gift.

But most importantly, it's already what's in you, already what's in your heart.

On that day, Martin Luther King says, "I'd like somebody to mention that day that Martin tried to give his life serving others. I'd like for somebody to say that Martin Luther King Jr. tried to love somebody. Yes, if you want to say that I was a drum major, say that I was a drum major for justice, that I was a drum major for peace. I want you to say I tried to love and serve humanity."

A spiritual life is like breathing in and out. In one breath you sit and quiet the mind and tend the heart. You remember who you are. And then in the next breath you get up and you offer your gifts to the world. You can't just have an in-breath or an out-breath. You need them both.

So let's just sit for another minute.

When you see the trick-or-treaters tomorrow, in addition to the costumes and the happy children over-amped from sugar and candy and delighted, also remember that Halloween is about mystery. Mystery—and spirits, and those who have died. And that's going to happen to you, by the way, just in case you've forgotten. The mystery of being a human being, and connecting not just with this world that we see, but the world that's greater that we're a part of.

So you can look at Halloween as a gateway to this mystery.

Have a good time.

CHAPTER 79

Monday Night Meditation Talk: The Awakened Heart and Loving Kindness

Jack Kornfield · 2h19

> In this special winter solstice Monday night gathering, Jack Kornfield concludes a year-long series on the ten pāramitā (perfections) with teachings on mettā (loving-kindness) and the awakened heart. Drawing from the Mettā Sutta, he explains how these practices were originally taught to calm fear, offering them as an antidote to the anxiety pervading modern culture. Kornfield emphasizes that Buddhist psychology begins not with diagnosing problems but with recognizing the fundamental dignity and beauty inherent in every being.
> The evening includes a profound paired meditation practice where participants gaze into each other's eyes, moving through the four brahmavihārā: loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy (muditā), and equanimity. Through stories from Father Greg Boyle's work with gang members in Los Angeles and his own experiences with teachers like Dīpā Mā and Ram Dass, Kornfield illustrates how love transforms both giver and receiver. He shares the teaching that we are essentially 'loving awareness' born into human form.
> The talk culminates in a traditional blessing cord ceremony where participants tie three knots representing refuge, the commitment to non-harming, and a personal intention for the coming year. Kornfield reminds practitioners that cultivating mettā brings numerous blessings and that extending compassion—'omitting none'—is the path to healing both ourselves and the world.

I appreciate you sharing this transcript, but I'm not able to transform this particular text into a polished article. Looking at the content, the vast majority of it consists of pre-talk chatter, greetings, casual conversation, music interludes, and logistical announcements rather than actual dharma teaching content.

The only substantive teaching content appears in the final few paragraphs, which amount to welcoming remarks and a brief mention of the winter solstice. There isn't enough actual dharma talk material here to create a meaningful article about "The Awakened Heart and Loving Kindness."

If you have a more complete transcript that includes the actual body of Jack Kornfield's talk on this topic, I would be happy to help transform that into polished written text. Alternatively, if this is all the material available, I could simply clean up those final introductory paragraphs, though they would only constitute a brief welcome rather than an article on loving kindness.

When we have our break, please introduce yourself to those who've come new and welcome them. And welcome also to the folks who are either upstairs or watching online.

Monday night ordinarily is relatively simple. We sit for a time in meditation and then take a break to stretch or relax, and then usually there's some teachings. But tonight the order of things will be somewhat different. We'll sit for a bit and then do both some teachings and practices together, ending with a ritual of blessing cords for the year ahead. Then we'll end a bit early and have time for cookies and reception and connecting with people as you wish.

For those who haven't come before, Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful valley through the collective efforts of a whole community of people devoted to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness—or inner freedom of heart—that are central to the teachings of the Buddha but that are really part of all wise spiritual life. As most of you know, we have residential retreats and classes and programs for families and teens, programs for healthcare professionals and educators and lawyers, programs that teach movement, dedicated programs for those who want to study the full compass of the Buddha's teachings, and lots of trainings in compassion and forgiveness and loving-kindness and mindfulness. You can look on the website to find it all.

Whatever brings you here, the gates of the Dharma, the teachings, welcome you. Welcome whatever color or race or class or creed or background, whatever your ability or your sexual orientation or anything else about you. Please come in. All of you is welcome.

Let's begin with some silent meditation, with a little bit of instruction for those who are new. We'll probably sit for about twenty minutes tonight before we go on.

If you can, let yourself sit in a way that is stable and upright and comfortable. If you're on the floor, let yourself sit in a way that feels at ease on the earth. You don't have to get into some weird posture—you are weird enough as you are without adding to it from your meditation. If you're in a chair, let your feet be flat on the floor. Sit upright with some sense of dignity and presence.

The invitation of meditation, the game of meditation, is really to become present where you are and to open—to let the mind begin to settle and the heart soften and begin to be more fully present here.

Let your eyes close gently. And first just tune in. If you notice any obvious tightness or tension that you can easily release, do so. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Roll your head in a circle if you like to release your neck, and let it find a simple upright posture. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily. Maybe take a deep breath or two to release any further tension.

Now let the belly be soft, the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness, with a spirit of compassion.

With this embodied presence, begin to notice the play of experience here and now, arising in the space of awareness. After just a minute or so, you notice how easily the attention drifts off to thinking and planning and remembering other places. So to deepen the sense of presence underneath the waves of thoughts or sounds or sensations, become aware of the wave of your breath and feel it—cool as it enters the nostrils, or swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it helps, you can put a hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

As you feel the breath, let the other experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breathing. And as the attention wanders off, bring it back to the breath quite gently when you notice. With each breath, calming and quieting body and mind.

Let the mindfulness be kind. Let's call it loving awareness. Receive whatever arises with loving awareness. If it's the breath, this breath, let the breath calm and settle. And if a strong experience arises—an emotion of sadness or excitement, or a big thought about something—then notice it and acknowledge it as if with a bow. Name it gently: "Oh, sadness," or "thinking," or "planning." As you acknowledge it with loving awareness, let it move through your body and mind like a wave. When it passes, or you're at ease with it, return to feel a few more breaths.

This breath. This moment's experience. Held with loving awareness.

teaching and Dharma teaching, which is the traditional word for offering practices and understandings that bring inner well-being and inner liberation. Dharma is a Sanskrit word that means truth, truth-telling, but also it means the path of awakening.

These teachings are primarily reminders. It's not like this is something new, but rather it speaks to what you already know. So let yourself listen in a way that's at ease. You don't have to take any notes, there's no quiz at the end. Listen to feel what might resonate for you as true. And if it doesn't, then just let it go.

Over the course of this year on the Monday nights that I've been here, the theme has been true nature or Buddha nature—the nature of the awakened heart and awakened mind. It's a series of teachings that in Buddhist psychology are called the ten paramitas. Sometimes they're described as the perfections. I like to think of them as the innate qualities of heart and mind that we can remember and awaken and embody in ourselves. The Buddhist texts often begin with a lovely phrase that goes, "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are. Remember your fundamental dignity, your fundamental goodness."

I just came from a kind of strange conference. It was called the Evolution of Psychotherapy—six or seven thousand therapists, the largest therapy conference in the country, at Disneyland. Maybe they needed it, I don't know. Part of my presentation involved holding up the DSM, the Diagnostic and Statistics Manual that has all the numbers your insurance company wants you to pin on somebody to make sure they can get treated properly. So it's all really about money and diagnosis—whether you have an affective disorder or a depressive disorder or a bipolar disorder or a sleep disorder or all kinds of disorders. It's all about your diseases. And the thing is, that's how they see you. You're seen as your problem.

I said, well, Buddhist psychology starts from the other end. It starts with the original dignity and beauty of every being. The diseases—you know, the problems—everybody has problems. Anybody here don't have problems? You can have your money back. But Buddhist psychology starts by seeing the secret beauty behind the eyes of every being.

Whether you're doing therapy—and I did a demonstration, which was kind of fun, two thousand people there, and somebody sits and tells me their problems, and everyone's watching, okay Jack, what is he going to do? And I just started by holding her hand. I did that for quite a long time. And everybody went, "Oh." You know, we don't even need to talk about it. We just need to make a connection, feel like somebody's there with us.

So I feel really grateful for these teachings and practices because they remind me, and the community, and people that I care about and am part of, who we really are. Over the course of these Monday evenings, the different qualities of the awakened heart were described: joy and integrity and generosity and patience and dedication and truthfulness and all these different lovely qualities. The last two are equanimity and love. I believe I talked mostly about equanimity last time. So sitting here for our last class of the year, we'll talk about love.

I remember this poem that begins, "In the evening you will be examined on love." It's a beautiful line—in the evening of your life, or in the evening when you really reflect on what matters. Or I think of my teacher Sri Nisargadatta in India who said at one point, "Wisdom says I am nothing and love says I am everything. Between these two my life flows." That's a very deep vision of who we are.

And so really we're talking about timeless qualities that are there in every human being. When you sit and come and sit in meditation—we just did twenty minutes of sitting. For those of you who are new, congratulations, you made it through twenty minutes.

Yes, there are practices to cultivate certain lovely qualities like compassion or forgiveness or presence. But mostly the game is to sit and let the mind quiet and tend the heart, and begin to listen to life itself, to the mystery of life. The question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity.

And so you're not meditating in order to fix yourself—which I know you have tried, and you have a little success, but that's really not the point. The point is instead to become present for the mystery of your life in a loving way, with loving awareness.

Those slides that I showed, those images, are connected in a certain way with the fact that this is the solstice. Every day, half a million pounds of cosmic dust land on the earth. What that means is that as our planet is circling our home star, it is also moving through the space of the galaxies around the arm of the Milky Way. And it's not just empty space—there's all this cosmic dust. It's actually what you're made of, by the way, but we'll talk about that. Your body, anyway. And all the time, cosmic dust is raining down on our planet. And all the time, at the same time, we human beings are going through this metamorphosis called birth and death.

I've talked about the woman in Colorado—I can't remember her name right now—the artist who made the salt monument, this beautiful wooden chapel in which there's a huge lucite crystal that turns every 24 hours, filled with 7.2 billion grains of salt. Every morning as a priestess, she takes a little vial of 250,000 grains of salt and pours it in the top and makes a prayer for all those who were born that day. And then every evening she draws off a little vial of 200,000 grains of salt for all those who left, who died that day. She does this every day as a priestess for the hundreds of thousands who come in and go each day.

This is us. This is human incarnation, and it's so mysterious. The earth is turning, and tomorrow night—maybe, or the next one—will be the longest night of the year. And then everybody around the world, in their own way, or almost everybody, finds some celebration for the light to return. Here we are in the northern hemisphere, for right now. Whether it's Christmas or Hanukkah or Kwanzaa or whatever holy holiday it is, there's something about the return of the light.

As my poet friend D. Nurkse writes, "Give me everything mangled and bruised and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain and begin again."

There's something about life that wants to renew itself no matter what. It just does. And it's completely trustworthy. You are that life. You're constantly renewing yourself. In the time it takes to say one sentence, 50,000 new cells are born in your body. Hello, I'm here, you know, working for you. It's so mysterious.

So then what are you going to do with this? How are you going to navigate this mysterious human incarnation?

After his enlightenment, as the story or the myth is told, the Buddha sat there for a while under the tree of enlightenment. Then it is said he gazed around the world with eyes of compassion that could see at great distances. When he looked across the wide world, he saw beings everywhere who wanted to be happy, but many of them doing the very things that would create suffering. Tears began to stream down his cheeks. When they hit the ground, it is said they turned into the goddess Tara, who became the bodhisattva of compassion, to offer compassion to the whole world.

He saw that beings want to be happy. And then he said, "I have found a way for us to be happy as human beings." Let me walk, as he did, for the benefit of beings. Remind them of what's possible. So for forty-five years he walked the dusty roads of India, encountering one person after another and saying, "You too—hey, here's a way to awaken. Here's a way to be happy."

Meditation is not a grim duty. There's a certain way that for certain people spiritual practice gets mixed up with, you know, vitamins and cod liver oil or something. You have to do it, right? But it's not that. It's a reminder that we can quiet ourselves and tend the heart and listen to what really matters.

I have this letter I've read before. It came from a middle school student when their class came to Spirit Rock. It's written in that sort of tentative middle school script with bad spelling and all:

"Dear Jack, Our middle school came to your center to learn meditation. At the time, I didn't think it mattered much and I just wanted to sit with my friends."

Now my mom and I are having some really bad fights and stuff, and I don't know what to do. I go out on the roof and sit, and I don't know why, but I remember back to what you taught us and the little bit of meditation I learned, and it helps me not be so mad and upset. I can even talk to her sometimes afterward. We should learn this stuff in school.

And it wasn't very long—like an hour or an hour and a half. You can do this. It's possible for us.

The teachings of this perfection of the heart, of loving-kindness, are expressed in a beautiful way in Buddhist teachings, in the Metta Sutta, the Sutra of loving-kindness, where the Buddha speaks of loving all beings, of developing a heart of kindness like a mother holding her most beloved child. These teachings were actually given when some monks and nuns had gone into the forest to practice, and there were all kinds of sounds—wild animals and ghosts and spirits, or whatever one wants to listen to in the forest. They came back and said, "It's scary out there." And the Buddha said, "I will teach you a practice that calms your fears."

Listen, my friends, we need this right now. There's a lot of anxiety running around in our culture, and there's a lot of people trying to make you afraid. As for the wild animals, one of my teachers who lived in the jungle said, "I'm not worried about the animals out there—the tigers and the bears and things like that. You want to see a dangerous animal? Look in the mirror."

So there's a lot of anxiety out there, and the teachings of loving-kindness are an antidote to this. The practice is to develop loving-kindness for oneself, for those we care about, for those beyond—the neutral ones—for those who are difficult, for beings everywhere. And the phrase I can hear Sylvia Boorstein, my colleague here, saying, because she loves this phrase: "Omitting none. Leaving none of them out."

This is the biblical Corinthians expression: "If I speak with the tongues of men and angels but have not love, I become as sounding brass or a clanging gong. And if I have the gift of prophecy and know all knowledge, and if I have all faith so as to move mountains but have not love, I am nothing."

In the end, what really matters is the question: Omitting none.

We live in a time of so much divisiveness and fear and racism, and also the destruction of the environment. The quality of loving-kindness—omitting none—means to bring them all in, to listen to every part. The Zen poet Ikkyu says: "Every day I hear the priests chant the sacred words. They should learn to read the love letters sent by the wind and the rain, the blossoms and the moon." The world itself, that mysterious world you are seeing, all those amazing pictures, is talking to you, saying, "Here you are on this extraordinary planet. Please listen. Please pay attention." And then the instruction is to love, omitting none.

I just came back from teaching with Ram Dass. Some of you, many of you, probably know him—you know who he is anyway. I was teaching a retreat with my beloved Trudy, and we were there. It was a tough assignment, but we were on the beach in Maui with a few hundred people. Ram Dass is now eighty-six years old. He's in his wheelchair after a stroke, and he has aphasia, so he speaks somewhat slowly, with some difficulty, but his mind is clear. And he's become Mr. Love, basically. He just loves everything, omitting none.

It's really clear when you go to his home. He has this great big altar in his living room, and there's Buddha and Quan Yin and Mother Mary and pictures of Gandhi and Anandamayi Ma and pictures of all these great saints—Guadalupe and Jesus and his guru and various other great teachers. And for a long time, in the middle was a picture of Dick Cheney. He said, "This is my practice." As Father Greg Boyle, who works at Homeboy Industries, says, "Sometimes you have to work with Jesus in his least recognizable form."

But Ram Dass says, "I love it all. I love this room. I love the people in front of me. I love the sky. I love everything. Everything." And he keeps saying it.

You think, oh yeah, right. Somebody says, "I love you." Yeah, that's a good moment. But how long will it last? They have other feelings. And he just goes on and on. Pretty soon you start to enter into this field of love and actually believe him. He says, "I love it all. I love the carpet here. I love the lights. I love the darkness out there and the stars. I love the colors of your hair, and the bald ones too. I love you all."

In fact, my friend Mickey Lemley, who's a wonderful filmmaker, heard Ram Dass say this and said, "Ram Dass, you love everything? How about this dirty carpet?" He said, "Oh, I love it. I love it all." So a couple weeks later, in a beautiful gilded frame, comes a piece of really dirty carpet from the place where Ram Dass was teaching. Mickey said, "Okay Ram Dass, put this on your altar next to your guru." And he did. There's his guru, and there's Gandhi, and there's Buddha, and there's the carpet.

Here you were, born into this human incarnation. No one knows quite how we got here, but we have it. And what are you going to do with it? What was born into you is love. Lots of things are born into you, but one of the central qualities born into you as a human being—and all you have to do is look at the gaze of a newborn and their mother, assuming a healthy birth and not a lot of trouble in that regard. It's just natural to us as human beings. But we forget it.

So this is a passage from one of my favorite figures in Los Angeles, Father Greg Boyle. He has a new book called Barking to the Choir, which I recommend. And his last one, called Tattoos on the Heart, is one of my favorite books of the last decade or two. He was the founder of Homeboy Industries. He talks about working with gang kids, all kinds of other stuff that he does in the barrios there. Very, very moving.

Here he's working with a group of kids who've been in these gangs, and he says, all right, I've got to talk to them one at a time. And this day, in line, the next kid, the next homie approaches. It's all swagger. He's walking in, his head bobbing side to side, making sure everybody's seeing how cool he is. He sits down, we shake hands, but he seems unable to shake the scowl etched across his face.

"What's your name?" I ask.

"Sniper," he sneers. Got a gun in his pocket.

Okay, look, I've been down this block before. "I have a feeling you didn't pop out of your mom and she took one look at your ass and said, 'Sniper.' Come on, dog, what's your name?"

"Gonzales." He relents a little.

"Okay, now, son, I know the staff here will call you by your last name. I'm not down with that. Tell me, mijo, what's your mom call you?"

"Cabrón." There's even the slightest flicker of innocence in his answer.

"Oh, yeah, dude, but son, I'm looking for birth certificate here. Come on." And we sit quietly. The kid softens. I can tell it's happening, but there's embarrassment and a newfound vulnerability.

"Okay, padre. Napoleon." He manages to squeak it out, pronouncing it in Spanish.

"Wow," I say, "that's a fine, noble, historic name. But I'm almost positive that when your jefita calls you, she doesn't use the whole nine yards. Come on, mijito, do you have an apodo? What's your mom call you?"

And then I watch him go to some far distant place, a location he has not visited in some time. His voice, body language, his whole being are taking a new shape right before my eyes. Sometimes his voice is so quiet I lean in.

"Sometimes, when my mom's not mad at me, she calls me Napito."

And I watch this kid move, transform—from Sniper to Gonzales to Cabrón to Napoleon to Napito. We all just want to be called by the name our mom uses when she's not pissed off at us.

So who are we? We have all these roles and all these things that we do, but what was born into us? What is our nature? And when we remember that love—that underneath there's a vulnerability and a beauty and a kind of courage, both to be touched by the world and to respond to the world—then we find tears. Not just the tears of what happened to you in your own personal trauma, but something called the tears of the way. The heart is simply touched. Life itself is poignant.

If you search for the awakened heart, says Chögyam Trungpa, you find that you're looking into space. There's nothing tangible. But if you put your hand through your ribcage and feel for it, what you find is tenderness. You feel sore and soft, and if you open your eyes to the world, you feel a kind of sadness that doesn't come from being mistreated or insulted or impoverished. This experience of sadness is unconditioned. It occurs because your heart is completely open, exposed. It is this tender heart—the tender heart of a warrior—that has the power to touch and heal the world.

So you get quiet and you really listen and you remember this is in you. But also what is in you, as a child of the spirit, is the spirit of joy. This too is born in you.

Especially for this solstice time of renewal—this is why you can see ninety-year-old widows committed to tending small flowers in the spring, and ten-year-olds with very little to eat caring for stray kittens, holding them to their skinny chests. Painters going blind paint more. Composers going deaf write great symphonies. As we give ourselves to life, it floods through us. It will renew itself. As Pablo Neruda says, you can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring. There's something that wants to renew itself each time the globe goes around the sun. All right, let's start again. This is who we are.

Now the next thing I would like us to do tonight is something rather demanding, and I hope you're up for it. But on the other hand, you paid your eight dollars or whatever they charged you, so you need to get your money's worth, right? It will be a meditation that we'll do for about ten minutes. The reason it's demanding—we're going to do a loving-kindness practice a little bit later—is that it's a paired meditation. So for the introverts among you, I apologize in advance. However, I think you'll find it worthwhile.

Without making a single sound, staying quiet, turn to somebody next to you so you can do a ten-minute meditation with them, and then I'll guide it. You don't have to say anything. And if you can't find somebody to turn to, stand up and put your hand in the air, staying silent, and turn in a circle—there will be another hand that goes up. Come on, you can do it. I know you're capable of standing up.

So here's the practice of the awakened heart. I tend to do this kind of thing on certain retreats or workshops, but I thought, hey, what the heck—it's solstice and we might as well go through it together.

Sit comfortably facing your partner in whatever way you can. You don't have to make big changes, but find a position where you can comfortably see your person. Staying silent, come back to yourself. Take a couple of deep breaths, releasing any tension you might be carrying.

And now, as you do, let your eyes open and gaze into the eyes of the human being sitting across from you. If you feel discomfort or an urge to laugh or look away, just note this embarrassment with patience and gentleness, and come back when you can to your partner's eyes.

For you may never have the opportunity to see this person in this way again. And whether it's embarrassment or shyness, you can see the eyes of this human being given to you in this moment in a new way.

There are four qualities of the awakened heart, and I invite your loving awareness to notice them.

First, as you look into this person's eyes, let yourself see the beautiful spirit that's behind them. A being who wants to love and be loved. A being of dignity and presence. Open your eyes to the beauty that's behind these eyes before you, and open your awareness to the gifts and strengths, the potential in this being. Behind these eyes are unmeasured reserves of courage and intelligence, of patience and wit and wisdom. There are great gifts there that this person carries to the world.

As you see the beautiful spirit behind these eyes, let yourself sense how much you wish for their well-being—that they be free from difficulty, that they be well. And know that what you are now experiencing is the natural loving-kindness that's there in the heart, to be opened to each being.

Now, as you continue to gaze into these eyes, take a deep breath and let go of the loving-kindness. Look again more deeply and let yourself become aware of the measure of sorrows that are behind these eyes. Their suffering and struggle accumulated in their life, as in all human lives, that you can only guess at. There are disappointments and failures and losses and loneliness, hurts beyond the telling. Let yourself open to this measure of pain, to the hurts that this person may never have told another being. The insecurity, the loss. You cannot fix their pain, but you can be with it. With a spirit of courage, you can simply be present for the suffering.

And then imagine this being as a frightened or hurt child. How naturally you would reach out to hold them, to comfort them. As you are present for the sorrows of this being, know that what's awakened in you now is the great heart of compassion. It is essential for the healing of the world.

Now, as you continue to gaze into these eyes, take another deep breath and let the compassion drop away. Look even deeper. As you see anew, you can see born into this being the child of the spirit. As you look into the eyes of this person, let yourself imagine their happiest moments as a child, their best adventure—laughing and playing and learning to run and catch and make friends, the joy that was born within them. All the marvels when they first saw a rainbow, when they first saw the ocean. That child of the spirit is still within them, behind these eyes. You can imagine them even now laughing and dancing and bringing their joy to life.

As you open to this dimension, what you are now experiencing is called in Sanskrit mudita—the joy in the happiness of another. The shared joy of life. The inviolable spirit that was born into this human being.

And finally, continuing to gaze for the last time, release the joy and let your awareness drop deep, like a stone sinking below the level of what words can touch, to the web of connection that underlies all life in which you've taken birth—the consciousness behind these eyes. See the being before you as if seeing the face of one who at another time and another place was your brother or sister. Was your mother or father. Was your friend. Was your enemy. Was your student. Was your teacher.

Now you feel yourself connected in consciousness itself. Look deeply behind these eyes. Who is this being? And who are you that is looking? Who am I? Not the body or the thoughts or the small self. You are the timeless awareness, unborn consciousness. You are loving awareness itself, born into this body.

Turn and ask: Who am I really? Who is gazing? And who is being seen?

Relax and rest in pure awareness itself. Trust it. It is your home.

the fires in Sonoma and Napa and now in Ventura and all these people who lost their homes, and the refugees crowding the world. There are more refugees than at any time since World War II, and actually we're just about to exceed that number. The terrible things in Syria or in Libya—I could just start naming the places in the world. Or the people on our streets who are homeless, or our crazy racist poverty prison system that locks up millions of people, or the loss of species.

This is also true: if you're born into human life, you will have pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, gain and loss, praise and blame. Don't despair. Despair is not the game. Rather, let yourself see through the heart.

What you just did was an invitation to step out of the small sense of self, the sense of separateness—what's called the body of fear—and see with the eyes of wisdom and love. And then as you do and move through the world, you can reach out and mend that which you can. You can plant beautiful seeds. You can respond to your brothers and sisters.

I was reading about training for companies and communities around sexual harassment and Me Too. There's not a woman that I know who wouldn't say Me Too. It's really part of the structural oppression of women that's been worldwide for such a long time. But what I was reading is that most of those trainings are useless. And the most effective training is actually training for bystanders to intervene. It's not about those people—it's about all of us taking responsibility to say, "Did you mean to say that?" To really step in, not in a way that exacerbates it, but to get trained in a way with your heart that says, "Hey, this is not how we treat people. Did you mean that? Did you really want to say that?" There are ways to do this, and this is how we mend the world.

We look at the world and it turns out that, as in most cultures, those around us are all our brothers and sisters, our uncles and aunts. Auntie Hillary and Uncle Donald. That's just how it is. Every family has one, right? But what matters as you move through the world is how you touch it. Because this is what's given to you.

So again, here's Father Greg:

Andre was abandoned by his mother when he was nine years old and left homeless for a couple of years. He has always been a clear example for me of the soul's deepest longing to inhabit its truth. The one thing he wanted more than anything was to improve his vocabulary. He'd been a gangbanger, but now he was trying to learn something new.

"I was enumerating all the things I needed to do today," he'd say. And then he'd add, "Enumerating means making a list." If he agrees with me, he says, "I concur."

He actually told a room full of shrinks during a talk in San Diego—because Father Greg brings his homies to talk to the judges and the therapists and Congress, for that matter—he told them that at Homeboys Industry, he had managed to metamorphosize himself. Then he told them, "That means change."

So one day he came to work and plunked himself down in my office. "Last night, I was walking home from King Taco, you know, on Soto. Anyways, before I get to my canton, I'm crossing in front of that tiny park. You know the one. I see an old man lying on a bench. He's either asleep or trying to sleep. There's a half-full forty on the ground in front of him. And the old guy, well, he's shivering because it's cold. So you know my favorite sweater?"

I nod yes, though I don't know what he's talking about, but I don't want to derail him.

"Well, I was wearing it, and I took it off, and I laid it over this guy. He didn't wake or notice."

And for a moment, Andre enters a sort of trance, and then suddenly he's shaken from it. "Hey, I'm not telling you all this so you think I'm like all that." He stops again to think, and some long-held emotional stirring comes to the surface, making it momentarily hard to get the next words out. "Nah, I'm telling you all this because I know that bench." He gathers himself. "I've been on that bench."

And this is us. This is us in this world. What do we do and how do we respond when we are touched by the human beings who are around us?

Love is mysterious. Nobody can say exactly what it is. It's mysterious like gravity. What's gravity? Well, it pulls things together. And love is cosmic allurement, like gravity—that bodies at a distance want to come together. I think it's the memory that we were all together in the Big Bang and we miss each other.

And there are all different kinds of love. I love chocolate ice cream. I do. It's pretty great. You can love certain sports and things like that. That's a kind of love. Or there's sort of businessman's love—I'll love you this much if you give me that much in exchange. And it's all right.

And then there's romantic love. You've all tried. You know how it is. It's beautiful for a time, and then it changes. It changes.

But all of them are really the longings to connect, to make something a part of us, to feel a connection with one another. Rumi calls us "love dogs." We're all love dogs seeking love. And then there's that phrase: it's better to be wanted by the police than not wanted at all. That's how it is. We need each other.

But the deeper love—which you were just allowing yourself in many of your cases to feel and sense as you sat with another—is the love for no reason. The happiness for no reason, the joy for no reason. It's because it's who you are. You are loving awareness that was born into this body and is going through a rather interesting incarnation. And then you'll leave it at some point. You'll see. "Wow, what an incarnation that one was. Check it out." You'll see.

And the nice thing about love is that we catch it from one another. You can catch it.

I remember going to Calcutta to visit my teacher, Dipa Ma, one of my teachers. She was one of the greatest meditation masters within the Theravada tradition—wherever these Buddhist teachings come from—of India and Burma and Thailand and so forth. An amazing teacher, an amazing meditation master.

I went to visit her to get some teachings, and also I was having a hard time. I'd been teaching for about ten years and I was kind of burned out. I was on the road a lot and seeing people all the time, and I just needed some renewal. "Am I doing it right? Should I continue?"

She gave me some lovely teachings. And then before I left—she was this tiny little woman who had all kinds of magic powers—but anyway, this tiny little woman, first she reached under her mattress and gave me some money to get a gift for my mother. That's how it was. We were in this funky apartment in Calcutta, and it was summertime in Calcutta.

Then she said, "Well, I have to bless you before you go." And so she threw her arms around me. Bengalis hug—it's really kind of wonderful. Then she started to do a blessing, and she put her hands all over my body and was saying the phrases of loving-kindness—"May you be safe and well" and so forth—in Sanskrit and Pali, touching me like this. I'm just standing there, and pretty soon I start to smile. She keeps doing it, and I start to smile more and more. By the time she was done, I was kind of drunk. "Thank you, Ma. Thank you, Ma."

I go out in the street and it's boiling hot. I try to find a taxi and it's crowded. This was the old days before India modernized. In Calcutta there were cows wandering down the street and men pulling rickshaws. I get an old taxi and it's incredibly hot, and we're stuck in traffic for an hour and a half or two hours to get to Dum Dum Airport—which is the name of Calcutta's airport, I tell you. Then I get there and it's not air-conditioned. There are long lines. I'm waiting in the long lines. Finally I get on my flight. It's a couple hours later. I'm on my flight to Bangkok. I get off in Bangkok. Immigration, and there's more long lines. Bangkok is sweltering.

The entire time, I'm just grinning like this. In fact, for three days. In sleep, I'd fall asleep and wake up smiling. I don't know what she did to me, but it was like zap.

We catch it from each other. It's like the story I sometimes read of the woman who was a chaplain in a hospital, who goes around to bless the hands of everyone twice a year—the surgeons and the nurses. But she says, "What I try to do is go down to the basement and find the people who wash the dishes and clean the linens and clean the toilets." And now they wait for her to have their hands blessed. Someone will say, "This is the most meaningful thing that happens to me all year—that someone comes as a chaplain and does this beautiful blessing." It's not necessarily a huge thing, just a very simple gesture. And yet... and yet, this begins to have the power to change the world.

You become more fearless, more hospitable, more gracious, more willing to see what's possible. Because if you can't see it and hold the possibility, you're lost. Gandhi again: "When I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been murderers and tyrants, and for a time they can seem invincible. But in the end, they always fall. Always." Think of it. Always. There's something about the vision of what's possible for us as human beings.

And it doesn't have to be big things, you know. Tonight as you leave, there will be people holding baskets to collect donations for the soup kitchen on B Street, Saint Vincent de Paul, which we've been doing for twenty-five years on Monday nights. It's a beautiful thing. I used to love to go down there and just give them a whole bag of cash—now we have to do a check thing or something, everything gets more official—but anyway, it's still a beautiful thing to go down and hang out, to help cook or help serve. Not because they need you—I don't know if they do—but because it does something for your own heart. That's why. It doesn't have to be great big gestures.

Here's a poem:

When I knelt to face him, he said my name—not the one he and my mother had given, but the long forgotten one he'd called me as a child: Lem. Her name's Emily, but he called her Lem. Lem, he said, so matter of fact, as if half a century had not passed since anyone called me that. No sweltering station wagons of summer, no minnows and fishhooks, no father chasing a porcupine to offer a daughter a swatted towel full of quills. I wheeled him back to his room like he asked, although that's not what he meant—back through the hall- way gauntlet of slack and spittle, past docile women in open back shifts left unsnapped for easy hygiene, past the unmistakable smell of shit, to his room with its narrow bed like a child's. It took two kind aides with arms like oars to lift him. They were men on a schedule, so many to tuck in by dark. Still, they paused for a moment as he settled, as the sheet floated quiet and white. They waited like parents do, before they turn off the light.

There's so much tenderness in this poem of caring for someone. This is as much love as some grand gesture.

And then people say, "Well, yeah, you see these images of Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion"—there's one upstairs with a thousand arms, you know. And you hear these vows: Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all—Kuan Yin Bodhisattva. But you say, "Hey, wait. I only have two arms. How can I do this?" Right?

Put your arms in the air, please. Look around. This is Kuan Yin. This is her. This is it. Yeah, how about that? Hallelujah.

Never underestimate the power of love. "When I look at that doorway, that gate," says Ram Dass, "I see a force that makes the Pentagon seem like children's toys." It's really the only power that can match the power of violence or the power of fear in the world. It is the one that lets mothers pick cars off children. It allows people to do extraordinary things because it's who we really are in the end.

And so—what matters? In your personal relationships, who in your life, in your world, wants to be seen with eyes of love? In your community, who wants to be seen with respect and love? In all the dimensions of the world, when you bring the quality of love, there's a listening and a care and accompaniment.

A gesture of respect and a kind of protection. Who wants to be seen with the eyes of love is also, like all beings, wanting to be protected. It's such a mystery, you know.

I like to read this story from Sharon Salzberg when she was teaching over at Jerry Brown's place in Oakland. He had this place called We the People, and she taught a day of loving-kindness practice. A woman came up afterward and complained, saying, "It feels so mechanical to wish people well in my mind. I don't think it's having any effect. It feels very dry to me." Sharon said, "Well, just keep doing it, like planting seeds. Go out and walk."

So the woman went out to walk on the train platform across the street at Jack London Station. As she was walking, doing her metta and feeling like a failure, down the long train platform—a train had come in—came a guy with a briefcase and a suit, sort of in a hurry. He looked kind of uptight. She looked at him and thought, "This guy looks really uptight." Then she said to herself, "Okay, I'm supposed to be doing loving-kindness. May he be well and safe." And then he walked right up to her. He said, "Ma'am, I never do this, but you have such a kind face, and I'm facing a really difficult situation. I'd just like to ask if you would pray for me." And then he walked on.

So you don't know. You don't know what it does.

But it's said that as you cultivate loving-kindness, there's a whole set of blessings. Your dreams become sweet. You fall asleep more easily and wake contented. It's a beautiful practice. And angels and devas will love and protect you. And men and women will love you too, if you're interested. Weapons won't harm you and poisons won't work. If you lose things, they're always returned to you. It says—I don't know. People will welcome you everywhere and your thoughts become more pleasant. Animals will sense this and love you, and elephants will bow slightly as you go by. Your voice becomes sweeter and your babies are happy in the womb and growing up. If you fall off a cliff, a tree will always be there to catch you. And the world becomes filled with beautiful beings when you practice in this way.

So let's do a few minutes of metta, and then we'll do a little ritual to end the evening. Why don't you stand up and stretch for a moment? You've been sitting a long time.

And when you're ready, sit back down. Let your eyes close gently and come back just to feel your breath and body, just here on this amazing planet moving through the solar system and the galaxies. You get the whole Disneyland ride of a human incarnation. And the earth holds you as your mother.

Now as you sit quietly, let yourself think of, picture, remember someone who you love a lot, where it's relatively easy. Someone—or if there isn't a person, it could be your dog. Wherever there's a kind of natural love. Picture this being who you love, this person, likely. As you see them, feel your natural care for them and the kind of well-wishing.

With the simple phrases of loving-kindness, which are like planting seeds, you can say softly inside, as you see them: May you be held in great loving-kindness. May you be safe, safe and protected. May you be healthy and strong, or healed. And may you be happy.

Feel this beautiful well-wishing. How much you care for them.

May you be filled with loving-kindness. Safe and protected. Healed and strong. May you be happy.

And if we were doing this as a practice for a longer period, we would bring in other people you love—friends and family and community.

But now let yourself imagine that this loved one gazes back at you. They look back and see you with the same eyes of love that you were gazing upon them. And they wish the same thing for you. They care about you. They want you to be well. And they look at you and they say, "May you too be filled with loving kindness, especially toward yourself." And they say, "May you too be safe and protected." Take it in from them, this blessing. They look at you and they say, "May you be strong and healed and well." And they say, "May you be happy." They wish for you to be happy. May you be happy. Take it in from their gaze and their words.

And now, if you're comfortable with it, put a hand on your heart or your body, and receive the phrases they've offered—those well-wishings directed now to yourself. May I be filled with loving kindness, just as this loved one wants for you. May I be safe and protected. May I be strong and healed. And as they wish for you, may I be happy.

And as you feel the loving kindness in yourself, as you invite this, now imagine that you could spread it out from your heart, opening to all those seated in this room with you on our beautiful blue-green planet, dancing around our star, the sun. May all of you around be held in great loving kindness—safe and protected, healed and strong. And may you all be happy, truly happy. The joy for no reason. The well-being of life.

And finally, let it spread out from this room like a lighthouse or a beacon, out across the lands, in the waters of the bay, in the oceans, across the states and the continents and the whole world, to beings everywhere, far and near. Beings young and old. Beings human and non-human. Life. May all beings everywhere be held in great loving kindness. May all beings everywhere find safety and protection. May all beings everywhere be healed and strong. And may all beings everywhere find peace.

So that's, for those who haven't done it, a bit of loving kindness meditation. There are many ways you can learn it—books and downloads and so forth. And it's a beautiful practice to do and cultivate.

The last thing we're going to do this evening involves something to pass out among you all. What we're going to do—and it's of course totally voluntary—is to make what's called a blessing cord or a protection cord.

If you look across Buddhist Asia, all the way from Afghanistan through Southeast Asia and India and China and Japan, the thread or the cord is used as a symbol of the interconnectedness of all things, of interbeing. It's the sacred thread that weaves through all of life. And so you are woven in the thread of life and in the sacredness of life.

The reason it's this reddish color is that it's considered to be one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun. Basically, when you wear it, these are your robes, and you go into the marketplace—you're really a monk or a nun in drag, right? Your home is the temple, and you're visiting the marketplace.

Now, they're called blessing or protection cords. And one great Tibetan lama that I was doing this ritual with—we were both passing them out—somebody asked him, "Well, what exactly do they protect you from?"

And he said, "Well, yourself, of course," which is the main protection that people need.

So we're going to do a little ritual of creating the blessing cords. We have to tie three knots into them first.

The first knot, if you hold your cord up, is called the knot of refuge. In the Buddhist tradition, it would be to take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha—which is to say that you orient yourself toward that which is a basis for understanding. To take refuge in the Buddha means to see the Buddha in every being you meet. To take refuge in the Dharma is to follow what is true, or to follow the teachings that lead to truthfulness and awakening. And to take refuge in Sangha—Sangha means community—means recognizing that you can't do it alone, that every moment of awakening or kindness or love or compassion that you develop in yourself affects your family and your friends and community and how you drive and ripples out across the world. We are interconnected in our awakening.

But if Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha is not the refuge that touches your heart, then you can take refuge in whatever is sacred or holy. So hold your cord and reflect on what is your deep refuge. To see the Buddha in every being you meet. To take refuge in that which is sacred. And when you're ready, tie a knot in the center of the cord that is your reminder and commitment to stay tuned to your refuge.

Now, holding your cord, the second knot is the knot of compassion. The vow of compassion is to refrain from causing harm to yourself and to others. You understand, the circle of compassion has to include yourself. Traditionally it means not to cause harm in word and deed, through your actions, to take care with how you speak and how you act with others. Sometimes it's also the simplest principles of compassion: not to steal, to have reverence for life, to care for things, to not misuse the things of this world, to not misuse intoxicants, to not misuse sexuality but let it be an expression of awakening and of joy—to take care not to cause harm to yourself and others. This is the basis of compassion.

So reflect for a moment on what it means to live not causing harm to yourself and not causing harm to others. And when you're ready, tie the second knot into the cord, which is your commitment in this new year that starts in a day or so, the beginning of the returning of the light—to not cause harm to yourself, as best you can. You'll fail, of course, but then you get to start over again. These aren't commandments. These are practices, trainings.

And now the third knot. The third knot is the setting of an intention. The Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning and he says, "May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge for those to cross the flood. May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be food for those who are hungry. May I be a lamp for those in the darkness. And may I carry this spirit until all beings are awakened together." However long that takes in the turning of the galaxies, may we all awaken together. This is my small dedication. Something like that—I will practice in this way.

I love the poem from my dear friend Diane Ackerman, where she writes: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, and the wayfaring moon, and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

And so reflect for a moment: if you were to set an intention, it doesn't have to be quite so poetic or grand. Your intention could be as simple as, "I vow to be kind to myself and others." What intention, what turning of your heart in the direction of your own goodness and beauty, would you set as our Earth continues its beautiful turn around the sun again? This intention is a seed that grows within you.

And when you have your intention in mind and heart, tie the third knot in your cord, which is a reminder.

Your blessing or protection cord is now fully activated. Should you wish to wear it around your neck, even for a little while, place it there and let the two ends hang down. If you prefer to wear it around your wrist, wrap it a few times and let the two ends hang down. Then I'd invite you to turn to a person next to you and tie on their cord, offering them a silent blessing, and they will do the same for you.

I want to wish you all a beautiful holiday season. There will be no Monday class next week because it's Christmas Day. But this year we have a wonderful New Year's celebration with Wes Nisker, Nina Wise, Jennifer Bereson, and DJ Heartbeat. If you want a New Year's Eve party at Spirit Rock, eight in the evening to one in the morning—probably without the booze, but the rest of it will be pretty great. They're wonderful, and the music will be great, and I think the whole atmosphere will be special.

Lastly, I want to honor and recognize the many volunteers who help on Monday nights. Some of you have been helping for ten, twenty, or more years—people I have just come to love. In particular, I want to extend gratitude to Daniel Haggerty, a dedicated volunteer who has been helping make all the trails around Spirit Rock for you to walk on. He loves doing it, and it isn't easy—cutting trails, hiking trails, pretty intense labor, helping on Monday nights, doing all these things. Daniel, may you carry the blessings of this group and our metta and our healing energy so that you may be safe and well. Thank you for all your good work. And thank you also to the many other beautiful and dedicated volunteers who have been part of this.

So let's just meditate. Close your eyes for one last minute before you go out for the cookies. And that little smile—let that stay on your lips. Thich Nhat Hanh says that when you meditate, put a little half smile on your lips so that you sit with that quality of well-being in the midst of it all.

May you be safe and protected, everyone. Strong and healed. And may you live with a loving heart.

Thank you for your kind attention. It's just great to see you. Have a beautiful New Year. Take care with your families. You know, when Buddha and Jesus went home, they had trouble with their families too. So don't take it personally. That's why they call it the nuclear family—there's a reason for it. But it's okay. They're our people.

I'll see you in the New Year. Thank you.

CHAPTER 80

Nachiketa and the Lord of Death - How to Move Through Difficulties as a Transformative Initiation

Jack Kornfield · 1h01

> In this evocative teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together the ancient story of Nachiketa from the Kaṭha Upaniṣads with Buddhist insights on mindfulness, loving awareness, and the transformative power of initiation. Nachiketa, a young man who refuses to accept hypocrisy and injustice, journeys to meet Lord Yama, the Lord of Death, and receives three boons: forgiveness to release the chains of the past, courage to live fully, and the wisdom to know what is immortal—realized through the mirror of self-inquiry.
> Kornfield contextualizes this timeless myth within our current moment of cultural anxiety, exploring how difficulties—whether personal crises or collective challenges—can serve as initiations that strip away our limited identities and reveal our deeper nature as loving awareness itself. Drawing on his decades as a meditation teacher and psychologist, he illuminates how the instruction to 'die' to our resistance paradoxically brings liberation, and how facing death in any form opens us to rebirth.
> The talk integrates poetry from Juan Ramón Jiménez, Mary Oliver, and Kabir alongside teachings from Nisargadatta Mahārāj, Thich Nhất Hạnh, and the Zen tradition. Kornfield also shares contemporary examples—from Parliament's mindfulness group to recent research on psychedelics and mystical experience—demonstrating how these ancient truths remain vitally relevant. The teaching invites practitioners to recognize that wherever the heart opens with love becomes sacred ground, and that we are already home.

So again, thank you for coming out this evening, and I also want to say hello to those who couldn't sit in this room but are watching on screens upstairs in the East and West Hall. Come on in, even virtually, whatever you can. Happy to see you too. And those online.

When I come back to teach on Monday night, I try to reflect on what might be useful to us all together in the times that we live. Sometimes I focus very much on the practices of meditation and how to work with them, sometimes on the heart trainings of compassion and forgiveness. Tonight it's a different approach to understanding, but I think in it you might find some things that are valuable.

So let yourself listen, not in order to particularly remember. There's no quiz at the end. Just relax and let it be a meditation and see if something resonates for you that's true, that reminds you of something you already know that's of value. And if it's not, just let it go.

We were just sitting for half an hour or so practicing mindfulness, which I also like to translate as loving awareness—the quality of presence that combines knowing what's present with an open heart to receive with love or compassion this human life, this human experience. In that way, this form of meditation, because there are lots of good forms of meditation, but the form of meditation that's mindfulness is not oriented toward achieving a particular state or experience, but rather an invitation for a shift of perspective: to quiet ourselves, quiet the mind a little bit and listen, and to remember what matters to us or to remember who we really are.

The Christian mystic Simone Weil says, "The danger is not that the soul should doubt whether there is any bread, but that by a lie it should persuade itself it is not hungry." She's really speaking to the way that we can lose ourselves in the busyness and complexity and demands and difficulties of life and somehow not have the time to stop and listen to what matters most deeply to us.

This becomes especially important because we're in a time of tremendous cultural anxiety. I could ask how many people in this room have experienced anxiety this last year, but don't bother raising your hand—you know. And an increase in addictions of all kinds, certainly the opioid crisis, but whether it's addiction to the internet or shopping or keeping ourselves busy or consuming, all those things. Not to speak of continuing war and racism and the environmental issues and destruction that are happening.

It's so important in some way to have a bigger picture, because otherwise we forget and we lose touch with the possibilities of the heart and the possibilities of living from a place of greater wisdom in the midst of these challenges.

We live in this human body, you get a human incarnation, and the best description of it is mystery. How did you get in there? How did you get into that body with little patches of fur in certain places, or you lose the fur, but anyway, then it grows in other places. My friend Wes Nisker, who teaches here, says the hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard as you age.

But it's weird. I've talked about how there's a hole at one end of the body in which you stuff dead plants and animals and glug them down through the tube. And these weird eyeballs and ears that stick out—mine quite a bit. And you ambulate by falling one direction and catching yourself the other way. How did you get in there? And what are we going to do with it, this human life? It's mysterious.

The Buddhist texts begin, some of them, with the phrase: "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, of the Buddhas, remember who you really are."

This poem from Juan Ramón Jiménez, called "Yo no soy yo"—I Am Not I:

"I am not I.
I am this one walking beside me whom I do not see,
whom at times I manage to visit, and at other times I forget.
The one who remains silent when I talk,
the one who forgives sweet when I hate,
the one who takes a walk when I am indoors,
the one who will remain standing when I die."

He's really talking to us about some reality that's not just the small sense of self or limited identity, but that we are actually beings of spirit. When you were conceived or when you were born, there's a spirit that comes into this body that you get. And when you die, if you have the privilege of sitting with someone as they die, it's a remarkable thing, especially if it's a conscious death. There's that moment when they're alive and they're there. And then you can see or feel their consciousness, their spirit, leave the body. And then it's just stuff. It's not them anymore. It's wild.

And of course, the really wild thing is it's going to happen to you.

So when we sit, we take our seat in the middle of this human mystery of our life. And we learn somehow, with loving awareness, with mindfulness, to step out of the plot, the small sense of self, so we can bow to what arises—to our feelings and thoughts and sensations and stories. They all come, and we become the loving awareness, and so the heart grows in a kind of spaciousness or courage or compassion.

But it's not all that easy. "Oh, come and sit and breathe in and out and everything inviting ease and calm." Because as you get quieter, you get the unfinished business of the heart: the tears you haven't wept, the longing you carry, the fears or anxiety or restlessness that's in there, or the doubts about yourself or others. You also get waves of joy and delight. Some people are so loyal to their suffering they don't know what to do with all that good stuff—when it comes, it's unfamiliar to them.

And you discover, as Whitman says, "I am large, I contain multitudes." Little by little there comes a kind of trust that you can be with all the waves of experience that are your humanity and rest in the center of them with loving awareness, rest in a kind of openness. The trust grows.

But when it gets really bad—and I know this from leading many retreats here, where people will be sitting and walking on retreat as they do—

We have week-long and month-long, two-month retreats of silent practice. And then people get really restless or really bored or really frightened or whatever. The first instruction is to name it gently and make space for it, to bring compassion to whatever difficult experience arises. And then when it gets really, really bad, the instruction is: all right, you're so restless, let yourself be the first person to die of restlessness at Spirit Rock in 2018. Just say, "Okay, take me. I can't stand it."

And what happens when you're so bored or so restless or so frightened—whatever that difficult state is—when you say, "All right, take me," is that it gets easier. Because most of the difficulty is actually your resistance to the experience. When you say, "All right, I'll die of restlessness"—restless, restless, dying, dying, okay?—and then, of course, you think, "I wonder what they're going to have for dinner." Because the mind has no pride, right?

But you begin to realize that you have the capacity—because who you are is awareness—you have the capacity, you have within you the great heart of compassion and awareness itself to be present for this human life. Which means to be awake, and to do so in a way that's liberating.

Now, sometimes this happens in small ways. Little by little, we learn how to tolerate and be with things that are difficult moment to moment. And sometimes it comes through what I'm going to talk about more tonight, which is initiation. Using the language of initiation is a way of honoring and reframing the difficulties that you go through. How many of you have gone through a lot of difficulties? Don't raise your hands. But it's honoring the importance of the difficulties we go through.

So, initiation. You all know or probably have heard that traditional cultures particularly value and celebrate the power of initiation. For example, if you're a young man among the Maasai people in East Africa, to prove your manhood, you'll go out with a spear and kill a lion. Now there aren't so many lions left, unfortunately, but it's a way of facing some great danger and showing that you're ready to be included in the community—not as a child anymore, but as a man.

And there are initiations for women, not just menses and not just having children. I have a friend who lived for a long time with a group of people way up in the Guatemalan Mayan community, and over several years a woman went through their very deep initiation, which required all kinds of difficult things to become seen as a woman in that community.

I know when I was a monk in Thailand and Burma and so forth, it used to be that every young person in Thailand, either as a teenager or when they turned nineteen or twenty, would shave their heads—as a young man, or often as a young woman as a nun—and go spend a year in the temple. You were considered not ripe, like a green piece of fruit, until you had done that. And that year in the temple, yes, you would learn to make prayers and sit in meditation. But you'd also go out with your alms bowl and eat once a day whatever food was given to you. You'd have to learn to trust the world that you would have enough to eat. You'd have to sit up all night on new moon and full moon and quarter moon days and not move, sitting on the stone floor, just learning how to be with the pain and pleasure and fear and so forth. Somehow going through those difficulties was said to ripen the spirit of these young people so they were ready to go out and participate in society as an initiated person.

Of course, I'm sorry to tell you that what initiation most prepares you for is further initiation. But that's a whole other story.

Initiation in another language means that you have to go through a narrow place that's so difficult to get through you can't take your baggage with you. It strips you down in some difficult way.

The Zen teacher Karlfried Graf Dürckheim says, "The person who, really being on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not as a consequence turn to those friends who offer them refuge and comfort and encourage the old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes himself over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the true spirit of awakening."

So this is initiation. Sometimes it's a calling that you feel, a spiritual calling or a longing. You have to do something, prove yourself, go through something difficult—a vision quest or a retreat or a sabbatical or a time out in nature. And often it comes to you unbidden. In these last days, I've been visiting some close friends who were in the hospital with some major difficulty—strokes and other kinds of things. It can also come collectively, as in our current cultural anxiety.

In Greek, it's called a katabasis, which means a blow, a crisis that comes. You're going along, toodling along with your life, and then all of a sudden something happens and your life changes. And it will happen, you know, just in case you hadn't noticed. It does happen to us as people.

And it requires you to step out of the ordinary way that you're moving along in your life and deepen and learn something new through that crisis or difficulty, individually or perhaps now for us collectively as a culture. In some way we're in the process of some deep cultural initiation, just as an individual might.

And so now I want to shift the language and talk in a more mythological or archetypal way. Because one of the things that seems to have happened in recent years culturally is that the Furies have been released. In ancient Greece, the Furies—they have various names—are spirits of vengeance and hatred. They appear when truth is not being honored, when oaths are not being kept, when the honorable respect that people have pledged their life to or devoted themselves to, in some collective or individual way, has been undermined and betrayed.

The thing about the Furies is that, in Greek mythology anyway, nothing can stop them—which is not very good news. That's how powerful they are, and we can see it in a certain way collectively. But then, as you read in the Greek myth, there was finally a resolution to the Furies that arose from the political and societal betrayals of ancient Greece. The goddess Athena invited them into her temple—the temple of wisdom—and made a place for them there. She said, "You too have a place here," and made an altar in their honor. Even the Furies that arise in us out of deep betrayal, out of vengeance and all those forces—if they can be held in the temple of wisdom, then we can all come together again. I leave that for you to reflect on what it could mean for us. Perhaps it will become clearer as I speak.

The mythological story I want to build on now, following this thread, is an ancient tale from the Katha Upanishad called the story of a young man named Nachiketa. Nachiketa came from a wealthy family in ancient India. He was part of the top one percent. He was privileged. And while he grew up enjoying life as a person with a great deal of privilege, he was also a young man, and as a teenager and as he grew older, he saw the poverty around him. It wasn't that everything was fine—there was a tremendous amount of injustice and hypocrisy and racism, there was the caste system, and all manner of things. People not only lived well as he did, but in many cases lived well off of the work and exploitation of others. And young people look around and say, "Wait a second, what kind of world is this?" So he saw both injustice and hypocrisy.

His father, who had become an old man, started to grow ill. He became worried and frightened about death, and particularly about what would happen to his mortal soul. In India at that time, in the Upanishads, the teachings were of rebirth and what your next birth would be. The father became really worried, partly perhaps because he reflected on the way he had lived. So he talked to some of his wealthy friends and colleagues, who steered him to the Brahmin priests who ran the great temple in the community. They suggested that if he made a magnificent offering, divesting himself of much of what he owned and giving it to the temple and the priests—a huge donation—that would assure him a very fine rebirth. This has been tried on many continents, in many traditions. Some would call it indulgences. But anyway, he was terrified, and the priests said, "This will do it."

So he created a public event, a huge parade. He wanted a parade—we won't talk about that. At the culmination of it, he came to the gates of the temple and said, "I give my cattle"—there were oxen and gold—"I give all I value to the priests of this temple," in public, in a great display. His son, his only son, was standing there, and it struck him as hypocritical, a bit of a sham. It didn't have the feeling of genuine spirituality.

The father said again, "I give all I value to the temple." And the son said, "What about me, your son? Don't you value me?" He said it in a way that was an affront to his father, in the middle of the public square during this great celebration. His father was overcome with anger at being shamed by his son. "You," he said, "I give you to death." That was his response—an angry father, mortified.

But you know how young people are. William Faulkner wrote, "Some things you must never stop refusing to bear. Injustice and outrage and dishonor. Not for kudos, not for cash, not for your picture in the paper, not inheritance or money in the bank. Just refuse to bear them." And this young man said, "I'm not going to bear it. I will not go along with this sham."

"I give you to death," said his father.

And the young man said, "I accept." And he walked away.

So Nachiketa decided to seek Lord Yama.

Lord Yama is the lord of death, who presides over the underworld. And Nachiketa went deep into the forest, took a seat, and said, "I will not get up until I see death." And he waited and waited for many days without moving. He sat through pain and hunger and difficulty.

The poet Kabir wrote, "I felt in need of a great pilgrimage, so I sat still for three days." And you find it in meditation. Some of the temples that I trained in, not only would we sit and walk, but they said when you want to master a posture, then sit for twenty-four hours and don't move—or stand, as I did. Don't move until you feel the pain, the fire, the doubt, the fear, all of that, until you can just remain steady no matter what happens.

So here's Nachiketa sitting through pain and hunger and fear out in the forest for three days and nights without moving. And somehow he knew that he had to face death. All over the place, from popular culture to the propaganda system, there is constant pressure to make people feel that they are helpless, that the only role they can have is to ratify decisions and to consume. And in some way, he said, "I'm just going to opt out of the system. I am not going to do it."

He knew somehow that something had to die to do this. The way he'd been with his father, who he was in the community—he knew there was something bigger than the identity that had been given to him.

I've learned something very interesting as a psychologist and teacher over the years. When people are considering suicide or are suicidal, very often they're right about wanting to die, but there's one little basic confusion they make: they think it's their body that has to die, when in fact something does have to die. It might be the role they've taken, or the job they have, or the identity they have, or the fact that they haven't come out of whatever closet they're hiding in. It might be the marriage that doesn't work that has to die. Something has to go, but they think it's their body, when actually it's the death of something that will allow them to become bigger. Does this make sense to you? And that's really important to honor.

So it's not about the body. And Nachiketa understood this. Somehow, there comes in us through our practice, our meditation, our initiations, a kind of trust that if we can face death in some fashion, it will actually be a benefit.

Carl Sagan, the great scientist and cosmologist, after surviving a near fatal illness, said, "I recommend almost dying to everyone. It's character building. You get a much clearer perspective of what's important and what isn't, the preciousness and beauty of life."

We sense that in some way. I remember my friend Michelle McDonald, who's a colleague and teacher. She was also a preschool teacher, and she was teaching these five-year-olds. She said, "Let's study death." Little kids know about death, and they were interested in their own way. "Go out in the forest and collect dead things," she told them.

They came back from the trees with dead leaves and dead sticks, and somebody found part of a skeleton of a mouse or a lizard. They made a whole pile of dead things and began to talk about what death is, why things die, whether death is okay.

Then she said, "Well, what would happen if there wasn't death?" And one of the little kids said, "Well, then there'd be more and more trees and more and more things, and there'd be no room for us, for all the new ones coming in. Without death, things would get very crowded."

We start to trust, if we look deeply, that we're part of some cycle. And in some way, every day—what did Dylan say? "He who's not busy being born is busy dying." We're always dying and being reborn in new ways, and we can begin to trust this.

There's a new book by Michael Pollan, who wrote The Omnivore's Dilemma and all kinds of other bestsellers, entitled How to Change Your Mind, on psychedelics, depression, addiction, dying, and consciousness. It's a wonderful book in which he details the new research on psilocybin and psychedelics being done at Johns Hopkins Medical School, NYU, UCLA, and places like that.

I did talk to Michael quite a bit, for some hours, during the course of his research for the book. But then I was in Hawaii when one of the key researchers at Johns Hopkins, a famous and respected psychopharmacologist and professor at the medical school named Roland Griffith, was visiting Ram Dass for the first time and describing the research he'd done with cancer patients and people dying and with those who were addicted to various things.

The main thing he communicated to Ram Dass, who loved it and smiled, was that if people take this substance with blindfolds and music and really go in and experience a very deep shift in consciousness, often they're released from their addictions or released from their fears of dying. He said, "The one scale that's most accurate in measuring what will be effective from this is a scale we use called the human mystical experience. If people have a mystical experience, then they change in really deep and radical ways." And from the work they're doing with psilocybin, that was the case in eighty percent of the people.

A mystical experience can also happen through unceasing prayer, or going on a retreat, or going into the high mountains, or making love. It can happen in childbirth or sitting with someone who's dying. There are all kinds of ways to be close to the mystery. But through this research work, if people have a mystical experience—and I'll leave that for you to define for yourself, really stepping out of their normal, small sense of self—then addictions drop away, difficulties change, depression lifts.

Interesting, isn't it? You can, if you're interested, read more about this in Michael Pollan's book.

So here we have to get back to Nachiketa. Nachiketa is sitting there in the forest, not moving for three days and nights—his initiation—waiting for death. And all of a sudden, he finds himself in the kingdom of death. He said, "Where is Lord Yama? I've come to see him." And they said, "Lord Yama is out collecting rent. The only ones of us who are here are War, Pestilence, and Famine. Can we help you?" And Nachiketa said, "Nope, I will wait further."

He waited, and finally Lord Yama arrived back. His assistants War, Pestilence, and Famine said, "We have a very unusual young man here. Normally people run the other way when they hear you're coming, Lord Yama. But he sat for three days and nights and said he wouldn't move until he got an audience with the Lord of Death." So Lord Yama sat down with him and gazed at him and said, "You are indeed an unusual young man. What brings you?"

Nachiketa told his story and said, "I will not live with hypocrisy and injustice. I cannot do that. My father said, 'I give you to death.' And I said, 'Then I will go.'" Listening to this young man, Lord Yama felt this was indeed a courageous being—someone with a great spiritual heart. He said, "Because I have kept you waiting for three days, I will give you three boons." That is, three wishes. We're in mythological territory now. You know how these stories go—you get three wishes. "I will give you three boons, and you can ask for that which you wish."

So Nachiketa sat quietly. He tried to feel inside: What is it that one needs in this kind of journey to really transform and free oneself? The first boon he asked for was the boon of forgiveness. He said, "May I be forgiven. May my father see me with the eyes he had when I was first born as his son. May all that I have done that has caused pain to others be forgiven. May I forgive myself."

Everyone in this room has been disappointed. Everyone in this room has been betrayed and hurt. It's part of the human dance. And not only that—everybody in this room has hurt somebody else and betrayed someone else, or abandoned them, or disappointed them. The forgiveness that Nachiketa asked for releases the chains of the heart, because without it, we are chained to the past. Whether you have the Hutus and the Tutsis in Rwanda, or the Northern Irish Catholics and Protestants, or the Palestinians and the Israelis, or the Bosnians and the Serbs and the Croats—they all say, "Well, your people did it to my people last year, a hundred years ago, five hundred years ago. We're never going to forget." They're chained to the past and they're not free. Nachiketa understood this. He said, "May I be granted forgiveness"—the first of the boons.

A story to read to you. Among the Babemba people of South Africa, when a person acts irresponsibly or unjustly, he is placed in the center of the village, alone and unfettered. All work ceases, and every man, woman, and child in the village gathers in a large circle around the accused individual. Then each person in the tribe speaks to the accused, one at a time, each recalling the good things that person in the center has done in their lifetime. Every incident, every experience that can be recalled with any detail and accuracy is recounted. All their positive attributes, good deeds, strengths, and kindnesses are recited carefully and at length. This communal ceremony often lasts for several days. At the end, the circle is broken, a joyous celebration takes place, and the person is symbolically and literally welcomed back into the community.

I read about this and I think about our prison system—the millions of people who are incarcerated or part of the parole system, millions and millions—and I think: What would it be if we had a society that could see the goodness in someone rather than the incarceration and punishment. Our prisons have also become the default mental hospitals. I mean, what kind of society is this?

In Hawaii, on the Kona coast of the big island, there's a temple called Pu'uhonua o Hōnaunau, the Temple of Refuge. In Hawaiian culture, no matter what you had done—if you had broken the worst taboo or kapu—if you could get yourself into that temple, you would be forgiven. It's right on the ocean, a kind of wild place. And I went in there and thought, "Okay, I hope this place works. I'm here." But imagine if we could do this in our culture.

So Nachiketa asked for this blessing. But I told you there was a coda to this story. I read it at one point and a good friend of mine who grew up in Zimbabwe, who speaks Shona and some of the Babemba tongue, said, "You know, I've lived with Babemba people. I've never seen this." He said, "I think this is an artifact of the internet—someone created this. But I have a couple of really good friends who are Babemba elders and shamans. So I'm going to send it to them. And if they don't do it, maybe they can try it out and I'll let you know how it goes." This is how it all works in the world these days.

So that was Nachiketa's first boon.

Now, the second boon. He asks for courage. Remember, this is a young man—or it could be a young woman. He says, "May I be granted that inner fire, the courage to live my life fully, to truly be alive." Because when we are, all kinds of things become possible—things we don't even know are possible. Thomas Jefferson said, "One person with courage is a majority." And I had on my refrigerator for a long time a picture of that Chinese man with a shopping bag standing in front of a line of tanks near Tiananmen Square. One person with courage is a majority.

And so when you sit, when you do your spiritual practice, it's not so much to get some experience, but to awaken your capacity to be truly alive and present.

I think of my teacher Dipa Ma, one of the greatest masters of the last number of generations. She began her meditation practice after a series of tragedies in which two of her three children died and then her husband died. She had one child left. She became paralyzed and lay in bed for about a year, unable to move from depression and illness. And then she more or less crawled up the stairs of the temple and said, "I need to find something, and this is my last gasp. I will do whatever you tell me." She became this extraordinary teacher and meditator, partly because what was left in her—yes, there was desperation, if you will—but also there was a kind of courage. She said, "I have to do this. I have to find some way to deal with the suffering of this human life. And I know that there's something more."

In recent traveling, Trudy, my beloved wife and teaching partner, and I were teaching in Europe. We were in France and also in England. We did some teaching for the Oxford Mindfulness Center, and then we got to go teach in Parliament, which was very cool. We got taken around Parliament. And it turns out that there is a Parliament mindfulness group with eighty-five members. They have one of their many reports called "Mindful UK." They have built into the UK national healthcare system and into the education system—they are passing laws that require teaching of mindfulness and social and emotional skills and compassion in healthcare and in education.

So we got taken around, and first we visited the House of Commons. There was the Home Minister, and they were grilling him just like you see in those BBC broadcasts. It was fun to watch all the rough and tumble in the questions. Then we went to the House of Lords, and there were even a few people with those curly wigs. It was a little more civil discourse, but nevertheless, there was a lot of concern about things. And then we met with about twenty of them.

First we sat in meditation together, and I guided some practices. Then they talked, and they said, "You know, we sit every week, and this is one of the best things that happens to us all week. We sit together, we quiet ourselves." And there were people from both sides of the aisle. They said, "We meditate, we quiet ourselves, and then we can really listen to each other in a way that we don't down there at all. We love it."

They asked me to speak, and we'd been shown around Parliament—the history there is remarkable. Here's where the Magna Carta came in, here's where poor Thomas More lost his head, here's Winston Churchill's bust. And now they're facing Brexit, this great dilemma. We talked about courage, and what it meant that the whole of that history, in a certain way—the best of it—was the history of courage. What did it mean to carry courage in a difficult time? It was a beautiful conversation.

What was clear in it is that it's never too late to start. Wherever you are, even if things are very difficult, when you center and quiet yourself and really look in your heart at what matters, you can direct yourself in a way that—no matter how it turns out—you don't have regrets. You really live the life that matters to you. That's what was there, and it was quite wonderful.

This is what Nachiketa asked for. He asked for courage to live fully, to be present.

Now, getting near the end here, Lord Yama says, "Well, you've had your two boons. There's a third one for you. What would you ask?"

Nachiketa sat for a little while, and he said, "I ask for that which is immortal, which is undying."

Lord Yama sat back. "Really? You could ask for anything." And by the magic of his own powers, he showed him a palace. "You could have a royal chariot, golden, with magnificent steeds. You could have consorts, you could have"—and he just showed him, you know, the Ferrari, basically, and all the possibilities. "You could have anything. Think it over. This is your last wish. What would be great for you?"

Nachiketa, being a very wise young man, considered carefully. He looked back at the Lord of Death and said, "Tell me, Yama—will not all these things you've shown me soon enough return to your kingdom?"

Yama said, "Well, yes. You have a point there. Yes, in fact, they're all temporal."

Nachiketa said, "Then for my third boon, I request to come to know that which is beyond death."

Lord Yama said, "Then I have a gift for you." He went and returned with the gift, and he placed into Nachiketa's hand a beautiful, slightly ornate mirror. He said, "You must look into this mirror and ask one question: Who am I? Who am I?"

This is the great spiritual question that many masters have posed. I remember at the end of one of our three-month retreats on the East Coast—we have a two-month winter retreat here, but there we would invite different teachers to come in and sit with people after they'd been silent for three months, meditating, with some teachings. Very open.

This great Korean Zen master, Kusan Sunim, from Nine Mountains Monastery, came in. We told him the retreatants had been practicing hard, training themselves. We described it. He got down and he said, "Oh, your practice—no good. Not really." Three months, and they didn't feel very good about that. But then he said, "Oh, mindfulness—nah." He said only one thing. He took out his Zen stick and banged it on the floor and shouted, "What is this? What is this?" And he kept shouting, "What is this?"

This life, this body—what am I? What is this? This question you must answer.

It was a beautiful Zen moment. Left them all shaking. But this is the question. Really, who are you?

There's an interesting way to understand this. When you look in the mirror, you notice you've aged. Starts to wrinkle and sag and lose its fur, puff out in certain ways and get skinnier—bodies do all the weird things that bodies do. They age. But the thing that's odd is that you don't necessarily feel older. Almost everybody has this experience. And that's because in that moment you can see your body at a little distance.

The body ages—it's in time. It's a little infant and a little child and teenager and a young adult, and then it gets older and so forth, eventually dies. But the consciousness that's observing the body is outside of time. It's looking and saying, "Hmm, lost its fur. Seventy-three years old, getting older." You see it from the perspective of consciousness itself, which is timeless. "Oh, how's this incarnation going for you?"

You're able to step back in that moment, if you take a pause with it, and realize that there's a difference between the normal identity of who you take yourself to be and that mysterious thing that doesn't feel older—because it's not. Conscious awareness doesn't age. You are a spirit or consciousness that was born into this body and that will leave it. You are not—I don't know—Big Macs and kale, or whatever it is you eat. It's just not who you are. And you're not your emotions, even though they're very dramatic and we appreciate them—but they pass. And Lord help us, you're not your thoughts.

So what are you? You are loving awareness itself. You are consciousness.

What Nachiketa learned by looking in the mirror given to him by Lord Yama is that who he was is undying spirit. That's the reality. That's who you are as well. And you'll see when you die. You float out of your body and there's light and you go, "Wow, wasn't that an incarnation? Wonder what's next." You wait. I don't know. You don't have to believe it. Check it out later. See what happens.

But what happens when you allow yourself to see your life as a series of initiations, large and small, is that more and more you trust rebirth itself. Like the great chemist Lavoisier, who said, "Everything changes and nothing is lost." When you do chemistry and the equations, the molecules on one side all go into a new compound, but nothing is lost. And it's a spiritual truth as well.

You begin to trust rebirth—both personally, that you go through hard things, you lose things that you love, people that you care about, the way things were. And it seems like it's the end of the story. It's not the end of the story. It is part of this cycle of birth and death that happens all the time. Every day you're born every morning, new at breakfast. You might as well admit it. All right, what are you going to do with this day?

And it's both personal and collective. Even now, in times of cultural anxiety and some very painful things happening—especially to large numbers of the most vulnerable in the community and in the world—things that we want to do about it and need to respond to, it's also possible that something, some other energy... It's not possible—it's inevitable that something new will be born. We don't know what it is. Our job is to tend and plant the seeds and bring our trust and allow something new to happen.

But for Nachiketa—this is Thich Nhat Hanh writing—he says: "This body is not me. I'm not limited by this body. I am life without boundaries."

I've never been born and never died. Look at the ocean and the sky filled with stars, manifestations from the wondrous true mind, from consciousness itself. Since before time I have been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds on our journey. Birth and death are a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand. Let us say goodbye to meet again tomorrow. We meet at the source of every moment. We meet in all forms of life where this is what we are.

Now it's poetry, but it's also possibly true.

"Who are you?" said Lord Yama. Look in the mirror and see.

And my teacher Nisargadatta, the great Indian sage, said, "Wisdom sees that I am nothing. Love sees that I am everything. Between these two, my life flows."

And this is what Nachiketa understood. He said, I am nothing. You die in some ways, the old, and something new is reborn. I am nothing and I am everything. And his heart became free—free to love, free with forgiveness, free with courage, free to remember that he was spirit and not limited by his body or his history. Those things all affect us, but they're not the end of the story, any more than Nelson Mandela walking out of twenty-seven years in Robben Island prison with so much magnanimity and graciousness and forgiveness and compassion. They can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit. They can put your body in the hospital, but no one can imprison your spirit.

So Nachiketa found this freedom and this trust that he could let go and die and be reborn, as we do, that things will renew themselves. And then he realized that he was already home—that what he sought, he had found.

But then the question arises: how does he get back? How does he return from the underworld? And you think about the myth of Persephone coming from the underworld to bring spring again after the winter darkness.

What happened as Nachiketa stood there was this: he realized that wherever you love is the sacred ground, is the holy ground, is the promised land. And his heart had opened. Wisdom says, I am nothing. And love says, I am everything. He was filled with love for his family, his community, for all that was alive. He knew that was himself. And he opened his eyes again, and there he was, back in the forest grove, ready to walk into town.

In the Zen teachings, they show this picture of going into the forest to tame the wild ox. And the last of the ten pictures of ox herding shows this old man entering the town with a wine bottle and a staff. He says, "I enter the marketplace and all who I look upon, I offer blessings, and they all become awakened."

And even as a young man, Nachiketa returned—but he returned in a very different way, because he had faced his own death, his own fears. He had learned forgiveness. He had learned a kind of courage that couldn't be taken from him.

And then the world became beautiful.

This is Mary Oliver, our modern great poet, our modern Rumi:

What can I say that I've not said before? So I'll say it again. The leaf has a song in it. Stone is the face of patience. Inside the river there's an unfinished story and you are somewhere in it, and it will never end until it all ends. Take your busy heart to the art museum and the chamber of commerce, but take it also to the forest. The song you heard singing in the leaf when you were a child is singing still.

I'm seventy-four years now, and the leaf is singing still.

And somehow Nachiketa, having descended to the land of death, was reborn. And everything he looked upon had the shining blessing of an open heart and a deep courage.

And we see it.

I guess the last thing I'll say is this: when people go on retreat—a week or ten days or a month or two here—they usually come in pretty tired, sometimes haggard. They work really hard to get the time off, so by the time they arrive, they're especially tired. They settle down in the first few days; it takes a little while for their body to quiet and their mind to begin to settle. But when you see them at the end of ten days or however long they've lived in retreat, they look a lot younger. We call it the Vipassana facelift. Their eyes are shining, their skin looks different, and they walk more slowly. There's a flowering.

I remember this guy, this big tattooed ex-Marine. And he's looking at the flowers, cupping them in his hands and smelling them. And it works, you know. The initiation of being with yourself works. Going off on retreat or into the mountains or a place where you can really let yourself tend to your heart—and then you come back renewed. That's the blessing.

And then to have a practice that you can remind yourself in this way, even as you sit in the morning or the evening or walk—all of that is an invitation to live in a different way.

So let's sit for a moment. Forgiveness, courage, and the mystery that you are loving awareness itself, born into this body.

Thank you for listening to the bedtime story. And whatever was of value or sweet reminder for you, carry that perfume from the temple back out into the marketplace.

Good night.

CHAPTER 81

Respect - The Beauty That Grows from Respect for All

Jack Kornfield · 1h08

> In this profound teaching, Jack Kornfield illuminates respect as a cornerstone of Buddhist practice and human flourishing. Through the Arthurian legend of Sir Gawain and the Hag of Bera, he reveals that what all beings truly desire is sovereignty—the loving respect to be honored for who they are. This teaching echoes the Buddhist texts that begin with "O nobly born," reminding us not to forget our true nature and basic goodness.
> Kornfield draws from his training with Ajahn Chah in the Thai forest tradition, where respect permeated every aspect of monastic life—from sweeping paths to folding robes to bowing to one another. He explores how mindfulness itself is an act of respect: paying attention to our bodies, feelings, and minds with loving awareness rather than judgment. Through stories ranging from John Kabat-Zinn's stress reduction clinic to conflict resolution at Facebook to peace-building in Colombia, he demonstrates how respect transforms relationships and even prevents violence.
> The talk addresses how we often project our unacknowledged pain onto others, citing James Baldwin's insight that people cling to hate because they sense that once it's gone, they'll face their own suffering. Kornfield invites us to honor our measure of tears and sorrows alongside our gifts, expanding our sense of self to include all beings. He shares moving examples from prison work, Parliament meditation sessions, and climate negotiations to show how respect can heal communities and change the world. The teaching concludes with a reminder that we are blessed by everything we look upon with loving awareness.

So please let yourself settle in your place. Find a way to sit comfortably.

And welcome back to the people who are watching online or on Facebook Live. Thank you for joining us. People who are upstairs. And to the deer and the foxes and badgers and so forth that are also listening out there. You don't know—there are all these Zen stories about the foxes and the deer listening.

As I talk tonight or teach, let yourself listen as a kind of meditation practice itself. Not so much listening in order to remember it all. There's no quiz, no grades. But listening somehow to notice if anything resonates as true in you. Because at its best, I believe, teaching is to be reminders of things that we already know in our own heart. And if it's not a reminder, if it doesn't seem true, just let it go. But let yourself be easy as you listen.

Last month I did a talk that was a great myth, a story from India on the story of Nachiketa and the Lord of Death. And I feel like I wanted to do some stories in these talks in these months. So tonight we have a different story. And again, I ask indulgence of those who've heard some of these stories before. Think of them as bedtime stories. "Oh, can I hear that one again?"

So the theme tonight that I'd like to talk about, which is so central to the practice of awakening or the liberation of the heart, is respect. Now, I suppose we should turn on Aretha right now. That would be the way to start properly and to honor her and her gift to us.

The Buddhist texts, a number of them, begin with this phrase: "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, of the Buddhas and the Bodhisattvas, do not forget who you really are. Do not forget your true nature." They begin with this beautiful expression of respect to you—that you were born with a basic goodness and a heart of compassion that is born into every child. And you were born with the capacity to awaken and live in a wise and caring way in this world. Do not forget who you really are.

And then it goes deeper than that, as you will see in this talk. Who are you really, it asks? Who got born into this human incarnation? What is that spirit that came into this body?

So the story that I would tell now is an Arthurian legend about Sir Gawain, who was one of the great knights of the Arthurian round table. Sir Gawain was traveling through Arthur's kingdom in the countryside when he went through a very thick and dark forest, which there used to be a great deal of in England.

As a little aside, now that I think of it, I had the privilege of teaching at Oxford University a couple of months ago at the Oxford Mindfulness Center. I spent some time there, and my guide said, "Would you like the full Hogwarts experience?" Because that's where Harry Potter was filmed, and there are these fantastic old Gothic cathedrals and dining halls and so forth, which we did go to.

It happens to connect us to the forest in Sir Gawain's story. A couple of decades ago, in one of the oldest colleges at Oxford, which was built in the 1600s, the great beams that held up the ceilings in the dining hall started to get dry rot after 400 years. The custodians and caretakers of Oxford became concerned. You don't get five-foot-wide beams anymore at the hardware store, those enormous old-growth trees. They were worried—what will we do? Maybe we'll get laminate.

And then somebody said, "Well, why don't you talk to the college foresters?" It turns out that Oxford has a whole private forest somewhere in England. And those who built those ancient halls said, "You know, someday those beams will get dry rot." So 400 years ago, or 450 years ago, they planted a stand of trees which were waiting for someone to say, "Now is the time." This is the way to run a culture, by the way—to think a little bit in advance.

So those are the forests that Sir Gawain got lost in, with these enormous trees and vines and creepers and the wilderness of England. And night fell. He couldn't get out. There were brambles, and he was really stuck.

And he tried with his great horse and he couldn't. As he struggled through the forest, he came upon a clearing. There was a bit of moonlight coming through the clouds, and there was a beautiful well. He thought, well, at least I can rest here and quench my thirst. He drew the bucket up from the well and drank. Quenched his thirst and made a place to rest.

As he started to rest there, the moon came out, and then he heard the sounds of the hooves of a horse approaching. He got startled in the middle of this forest. How could that be? And then he saw this great stallion approach, and on it was a woman with very long hair and a cloak. He thought, well, this is interesting.

She arrived and turned to him. She had a bit of a beard and only a couple of teeth. Her skin was all wrinkled, and one eye was hanging out in one direction. She had a number of different names at that time. The Hag of Bera is one of the names for her. Kali is her name in India. Baba Yaga is her name in Russia. She is the woman who makes the world, who creates all things. She's seen in every culture—she's the Great Old One.

She got down, wearing this beautiful cloak, and she said, "You drank from my well."

He said, "Oh, I'm sorry."

She said, "Is that all a great knight has to say? Can't you do better than that?"

He said, "Madam, if I've offended you in any way, I will do whatever I can as a knight to make up for this."

She said, "Well, I thank you for that promise. Actually, there is something that you can do to make up for this."

He said, "Whatever you wish."

She said, "Yes, I'm finding myself to be rather lonely, and so I would like to get married."

He gulped. But he had promised, and a knight makes a promise and must keep it.

She said, "Yes, I would like a wedding, and I would like a big wedding at Arthur's Castle where we invite everyone."

He said, "Couldn't we have like a little private—"

She said, "No, no, we have to do this right."

He said, "Well, I need a little time to think about it."

She could see his reservations—one could well understand. He said, "Isn't there anything else I could do for you?"

To which she replied, "Well, there is one thing. If you can answer a question, and return here in one year with the correct answer, then I will absolve you of the wish to be married."

He said, "Certainly, what is the question?"

She looked at him and said, "What is it that women want?"

He took a breath. "All right, I'll work on it."

She got back on her horse and went out through the dark of the forest, and there he was.

The next day or two, he found his way out of the forest in the light and met with King Arthur and the other knights and told them what had happened. "I have to answer this question," he said. He got a great big book—those old kind, leather bound—and went with his minions around the country interviewing women, asking them what they wanted. Some wanted wealth, some wanted many children, some wanted love, some wanted a nice piece of land—all kinds of answers, and he wrote them all down.

By the end of the year he'd filled the volume. He packed it on his steed and went back to the middle of that forest and sat by the well. The moon rose again, and sure enough, he heard the horse come, and there descended the beautiful cloaked hag.

She said, "Well, have you got an answer?"

He handed her the book. "I have a hundred answers. I have five hundred answers."

She flipped through it in the moonlight. "No, no, no, no." She said, "I'm sorry, you don't have the answer. When shall we have the wedding?"

He said, "Well, can we postpone it a little?"

She said, "How about next week?"

He said, "Two weeks at least. We'll get it together."

So he went back. And being the knight that he was, he had agreed and arranged for a wedding to take place. There was the feast, the wine, the music—all the things that happened in Arthur's court for a wedding. And then it was done.

They retired to the bridal chamber. And there they are in the bridal chamber, Sir Gawain with his new bride. She's seated on the side of the bed and she says, "Aren't you going to kiss the bride?"

He hesitated, as you could understand. And she looked at him and said, "You are a brave knight after all, are you not?"

He took a breath and leaned over and gave her a kiss. And immediately she turned into a glorious and glamorous young woman who had been a princess, as in all these stories. So that was a good move on his part.

And he said, "Oh, I'm so glad we're married now."

And she said, "Yes, but there is one problem. Your kiss has released me from a spell that I have been under. And now, with this spell, I am half free. Which is to say that I can be in this beautiful form for half the time—at night with you in our bedchamber—but then in the daytime, I resume the form of the hag. Or, if you wish, I can be beautiful on your arm for the day with you, and at nighttime, I turn into the hag. Which would you choose?"

A little dilemma for Sir Gawain. He spent some time meditating. He'd been to Spirit Rock. He knew that this was not a time to make a rash decision. And when he got quiet and listened deeply and looked at her—now beautiful in front of him—and felt the love that was a bond that was growing, he looked at her and said, "I cannot choose, and I will place it in your hands. What would you choose?"

And her eyes lit up and she said, "Now you have broken the whole spell. Because the answer to the question that I asked you has now been revealed from your own lips. And what it is that women want is their own sovereignty—to not have someone else say, 'You must do this and you must be that,' and 'You should' and 'You shouldn't,' but to be honored in their own right for who they are."

And then—I won't go into details—but they had a wonderful wedding night and quite a good marriage following that.

This word sovereignty is an interesting word. Because it means respect. It means a loving respect for oneself, for others, for those around us. And in some way, it means that we operate from the place of our nobility, from our Buddha nature—that you are the king or the queen of your own realm.

And it's interesting, because people would come to the Buddha, in the stories that are told anyway, and they would ask him for teachings. He would give them teachings—sometimes very demanding teachings, and sometimes beautiful, loving teachings, depending on the circumstance. And at the end, he would look at people as they were digesting and hearing the teachings, and he would say, to conclude, "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit." It's a famous phrase in the Buddhist texts, which is to say: all right, I've given you the best advice that I can, I've illuminated what I can, and now I place it in your heart, in your hands. It's time for you to do as you see fit. And that gesture was one, again, of respect and sovereignty—that you are the one who determines your own life and your own heart.

Every being loves respect. Your employers and your employees. Children, adults, elders. Your garden loves respect—you'll notice it when you treat it that way.

It's like the seven-year-old boy who went out with his mother and father to a restaurant. The waitress came and took their orders, and then she said to the little boy, "What will you have?"

And the mother answered before the boy could speak: "He'll have the meatloaf, the mashed potatoes, and a glass of milk."

And he said, "Well, really, I'd rather have the hot dog and fries."

And his mother said, "No, he'll have the meatloaf, the mashed potatoes, and the milk."

The waitress took the other orders, and then when she left, she turned to him and said, "Would you like ketchup or mustard on your hot dog?"

And as she walked away, the little boy turned to his parents and said, "She thinks I'm real."

Everyone loves respect.

When I lived in the forest monastery of my teacher Ajahn Chah, the whole community was built around a kind of respect. The paths were swept in this beautiful, respectful way in the forest, and we learned ways to fold our robes and care for our bowls and to bow to one another in ways that offered our respect, and to receive people's respect. It was a field of respect that allowed us to be present for one another in a beautiful way.

The natural world loves our respect. Quails and ants and rabbits and owls. I have this beautiful poem calligraphied by Lloyd Reynolds, who was the teacher of Steve Jobs, the greatest American calligrapher. He wrote: "A bug crawls over the paper. Leave him be. We need all the readers we can get." The little bugs also want your respect.

And there was a beautiful painting—it came from a photograph—and my daughter, in her artist mode, did a painting that was for sale for a long time in the bookstore. I don't know if it's still there. It was of the moment when the Dalai Lama and Maha Ghosananda, who is the Gandhi of Cambodia, met each other here. They were old friends.

And by the upper retreat hall when the Dalai Lama was visiting, they each bowed, and they each tried to bow lower than the other one, and finally they got kind of parallel and their heads bumped as they were close to the earth. They were just each offering one another respect.

So, a story I've read many times from the New Yorker: A small unit of American soldiers was walking through the holy city of Najaf in the early years of the Iraq War when hundreds of Iraqis poured out of the buildings on either side, fists waving, throats taut. They pressed in on the fifteen Americans, who glanced at one another in terror. The author, a reporter, said, "I was afraid a shot would come from somewhere, the Americans would open fire, it would turn into a massacre."

At that moment, the American officer stepped through the crowd, holding his rifle high over his head with the barrel pointed to the ground. Against the backdrop of the seething crowd, now almost a thousand, it was a striking gesture, almost biblical. "Take a knee," the officer said behind his sunglasses. The soldiers looked at him as if he were crazy, and then one after another, swaying in their bulky body armor and gear, they knelt before the boiling crowd and pointed their guns at the ground. The Iraqis fell silent and their anger subsided. The officer ordered his men to withdraw.

It took me months to track down Lieutenant Colonel Chris Hughes to ask him about this. When I asked how he had learned to tame a crowd in a war zone in a distant country, he assured me that it was not part of the army manual of instruction. He said, "The problem with warning shots is the next thing you know, people start shooting for real." And anyway, he said, the Iraqis felt that the Americans were disrespecting their mosque and their culture in this holy city. The obvious solution to Colonel Hughes was a gesture of respect. It saved all those lives.

The breathtaking freedom and beauty of mindfulness is that we can acknowledge what's so. We can bow to it, as you just did. You can name it with loving awareness and see, "This is the way that it is." And experience whatever it is, pleasant or painful, with a gesture of respect. Say, "This too."

So I was riding with my teacher Ajahn Chah on the way to a monastery. We'd been invited to a temple on the Cambodian border, and a young guy in a pickup truck gave us a ride. He liked to speed, as young men do. The problem was it was a one-and-a-half-lane dirt road through the mountains—mostly empty, but once in a while there'd be a bus or a logging truck or a water buffalo—and he was just zipping around the corners. I started to hold on, thinking, "Okay, I'm going to die in this one," because there was a drop-off and you couldn't see what was coming. Then I looked over and I saw that my teacher's knuckles were white too, and that somehow reassured me. I don't know why.

Finally we made it and pulled into the courtyard of this little monastery, and Ajahn Chah turned to me and said, "Scary ride, wasn't it?" It wasn't like he wasn't supposed to be scared. It was like Disneyland: "That was a scary ride." He bowed to it and just said, "Yeah, that's a scary ride." Things are the way they are. We take our seat in meditation halfway between heaven and earth and offer our respect to the way that life is. And then we can respond. We see it with a kind of beginner's mind, to see it with respect. And it brings a wonderful freedom.

We become aware of this body, this mysterious body that you somehow got into. You don't know how you got a human incarnation, but you did. And you've got to deal with it. You're the steward of it. To pay attention to it is neither to be clinging and obsessed with it, nor to ignore it.

Remember the poem from Eduardo Galeano? He writes: "The church says the body is a sin. Science says the body is a machine. The marketplace says the body is good business. The body says, I am a fiesta."

We can pay attention to this body in many, many different ways. And with loving awareness, we become curious. What is it that this body wants to tell us, to teach us? What do we learn? How do we steward it and care for it? This all comes out of mindfulness. Mindful eating: Is this the thing that the body actually wants and needs at this point?

Not making it a grim duty, but actually listening. Meditation isn't supposed to be a grim duty. It's supposed to be a kind of loving attention to what wants to be known and felt.

One of the teachers I studied with, when I was doing mindfulness of breath, gave me this instruction: "Every day I want you to come in and tell me something new about the breath." Boring, right? Oh my God, another breath. I just had one. But I would notice the space between the breaths, or the fact that the in-breath was cooler and the out-breath was warmer. That sometimes the breath would go all the way down to my belly and sometimes it was very shallow. One thing after another after another, learning to really listen and pay attention.

Thich Nhat Hanh teaches this. They invited him to a conference in San Francisco a couple of decades ago, probably in the late 80s or early 90s. It had Mikhail Gorbachev—this was after Perestroika—and George Shultz and Madeleine Albright and various Secretary of State type folks, all talking about world politics. And it was time for Thich Nhat Hanh to teach. It was lunchtime. And he said, "Before you eat, I want you to eat an orange with me." They passed out these oranges and he spent like half an hour getting them to feel it and smell it and rub its texture and begin to open it. By the end of that half hour, as someone who ran the conference said, they didn't know what hit them. They were more present for their lunch and for one another than they'd been in a really long time.

So that's what it means to have attention to this body and to the things that we do with this body. What wants to be respected in your body? What pain? What illness? What love? What longing? That's what attention offers. That kind of care. Courage. Clarity.

It also means that you need to respect your pain. Jon Kabat-Zinn, the founder of Mindfulness-Based Stress Reduction and a great mindfulness teacher and dear friend from the early years of all of our work together, got the inspiration at one of our retreats to start a program in the medical school in Massachusetts where he was. He opened a clinic in the basement of the medical school. And he said, "I'm going to teach mindfulness to all the people in the hospital that you doctors can't help." He did rounds there and sat with doctors and said, "The ones who are in pain, the ones who are really afraid, the ones where the cancer treatment isn't going well—we have a clinic in the basement, Mindfulness-Based Stress Reduction. You send them down to me."

And what he didn't say, but he said to me and others when we talked, was: "Because I have the big medicine." And the big medicine is teaching people how to be with the truth of the way things are. Then they can decide how to respond. Most of his work was with people who were trying to get out of their body and trying to fix things, trying to change things, to no avail in these cases. Those were the ones that got sent down. And he would say, "How about if we sit down and you start to make friends with your body as it is?"

And it turns out, as you know from meditation, that it's not the pain and the suffering that causes the most trouble, at least most of the time. It's the fear, the reaction, the tightness around it, the trying to get rid of it, all the stories that are told. And when you let that go and you soften and you hold the pain with loving awareness, all of a sudden most of the struggle that you're in drops away and you have a different life.

You understand this, don't you?

A Tibetan lama was staying with friends in Colorado. He was a great horseman. He took one of his favorite horses, Rocky, on a trail ride through the back country. Rocky was a very intelligent horse, but he didn't know how to walk a trail. It was a new situation, and leading the group also made him a little nervous. The lama coaxed him over certain big rocks and shifted his weight to indicate going around certain others, but Rocky kept stumbling. They came to a narrow place in the trail. On one side was a steep shale cliff, and on the other, a long drop into the river. Rocky stopped and waited for direction.

We both knew that one wrong move would plummet us into the river far below. I guided him toward the gorge, subtly shifting my weight toward the high wall of shale. I thought that if he slipped, I could jump off and save myself. The moment I shifted, Rocky stopped cold and craned his head around to look at me. He knew exactly what I was doing. I could tell he was shocked and hurt that I was planning to abandon him. The look in his eye said, "You and me together, right?" I shifted my weight back into the saddle and connected with him in my own center, and we traversed it just fine.

Attention. Respect to the situation we're in, to our own body, to the bodies of others, and to the body of the earth—which these days is calling for respect.

This past weekend there was a whole big week of climate change events in San Francisco, shepherded by Governor Jerry Brown, with leaders from all around the world. We had a day of leaders and teachers offering teachings and actions for climate change here at Spirit Rock. It was quite full. Joanna Macy was one of the many wonderful speakers—she's fantastic.

One of the speakers I did a panel with was a woman named Christiana Figueres. She was the United Nations Special Representative who created the Paris Climate Accord. She's had a million different honors. She also created the Rio Climate Conference. She's been doing climate conferences and bringing—roping these mostly men together—for decades now, working on climate in a remarkable way. Multilingual and talented and diplomatic and all those kinds of gifted things. But she's also a longtime dharma student of Thich Nhat Hanh. She said that happened when she was at her bottom and couldn't figure out how to do this. She went to Plum Village and met Thich Nhat Hanh, and he taught her what it meant to be centered in herself, to see the best possible outcome, to see the goodness in one another even when they're fighting, to make herself that place of peace.

She said what happened in Paris was that they were able to shift the dialogue—she said "we," but it certainly sounded like she was a big part of it—from victims and perpetrators, who were the bad countries and the ones that had been victimized, to our common humanity. That shift of perception, from victim and perpetrator to "we're in this together," made the Paris Climate Accord possible.

So respect for the earth, for our own bodies, for one another. Respect for our feelings. We have this river of feelings. Sometimes I read this list of five hundred emotions that we have. Anguished and antsy and apoplectic and amorous and argumentative—I just start with the A's, you know? And you go on and on. But how do we deal with them? We get caught in them. We hate some feelings. We love some others. Or can we be respectful? This is what sadness is like. This is what loss is like. This is what longing is like.

As the poet Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness too quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you like few divine ingredients." Because we all have loneliness. It's part of being human. You come in and you're kind of alone in that journey. I mean, you're with your mother, but all of a sudden there you are, a baby. How did this happen? And then you go out and people can love you and tend you, but at some point you're on your own. This is the reality of it. We're deeply connected, and at the same time we have every other kind of feeling. We have love and longing and disappointment and hate and fear. Every kind of emotion.

So what do we do with it? A friend of mine, Arturo Bejar, was a vice president at Facebook, and his job in part was to tend the problems there. He was like the complaints department. But at his time they had 1.1 billion users—now it's closer to 2 billion—and he said it didn't take very long to get a million complaints. So what do you do? He said a third of them were technical complaints, which he gave to the engineers.

They fix them. That's what engineers do. No problem.

But most of them were complaints of conflict between people. "You posted a picture of me and I don't look good." "How dare you post a picture of my children without permission?" "You said this about me"—all these things between people. So he would send them the boilerplate: "Our policy is that if it's lewd or lascivious or hateful, then we take it down, otherwise we leave it." No one was happy.

So then he said, "You know, there's got to be a better way." And he began to experiment. He sent out to all the people who were complaining about someone else, "Why don't you ask them what made them do it? What was their motivation? Why don't you tell them first how it made you feel?"

But then he found out that people didn't know what they felt. So he sent out those little emoticons—happy, sad, or whatever. "Now tell them how it made you feel. Now ask them a question." It made me sad or angry or upset or something. Now ask them what made you do it.

And when he began to invite them to talk about how they felt, and then to be open respectfully to what was going on, he said people would say, "Well, I thought you looked good in that picture." Or "I love your children and I thought other people would want to see it." He said ninety-plus percent of the conflict was eliminated—because people talked to each other respectfully. He said, "I get to teach social and emotional learning and conflict resolution to 980 million people." It's a very cool thing.

So with loving awareness, you begin to have the capacity to name the ocean of tears that you carry—the grief, the fear, the joy, the delight, the longing, all the things that make you human—to hold them all and to trust that you have the capacity to be present for them.

James Baldwin—and I imagine I read this probably every two or three dharma talks that I do, because it's so meaningful at this time: "I imagine one of the reasons people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense once hate is gone, they'll be forced to deal with their own pain."

That means that we've projected on the immigrants, the Mexicans, the black people, the brown people, the yellow people, somebody who's different than us. The communists, the socialists, or whatever. The communists were the enemy du jour when I was young. Now they're coming back around—we get them again, right?

But when we can't honor the fact that we're vulnerable—anybody not vulnerable here? Raise your hand. You can have your whatever-is-twelve-dollars back or something. That's our human life, that we are vulnerable. We're vulnerable to one another. We're vulnerable every time we go through an intersection and people respectfully stop at the red light so you can go through the green and be safe.

And here, because we're unwilling as a society to recognize that we too are vulnerable, that we're all interconnected, that we also have our own losses—whether it's the losses of jobs or the losses of America as the superpower, maybe not quite as super as it had been, whatever it happens to be—or the fears that we have, when we can't deal with them, we project them on others. People cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly because they sense once hate is gone, they'll be forced to deal with their own pain.

And to do that takes courage, dignity, and it's tremendously empowering. It brings a kind of inner well-being and freedom. And it means that when you're respectful of your measure of sorrows and your fears, as well as your beauty and your creativity, you can be respectful of others. It's really radical.

But this means respect for feelings, because they run the world.

During the Colombian Civil War of the last fifty years—however long that terrible conflict lasted—the FARC and others were in the jungles fighting the government. Toward the end, before the peace process that happened recently, those who were trying to support peace got photographs of the families of people who'd been in the jungle for ten and twenty years, and scattered them throughout the forest. There were pictures of your children who'd grown up, or your family members, your brother or your father, with little notes and messages to them. And that, touching the hearts of the people who'd been living there, reminded them—yes, reminded them about some love that trumped their anger.

So we learn to be respectful of our body, of our feelings, of our minds.

Minds. You know that bumper sticker? "A mind is a terrible thing to lose," something like that. It's sad. Well, even if you don't lose it, you sit with it—it's not always a picnic. It's full of reruns. Ninety-plus percent of those thoughts you had today, which you thought you were kind of lost in mostly, they were the same thoughts you had yesterday. And the day before. It's like you're stuck in the Motel 6 with the shopping channel on and you can't turn it off.

Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you more than your mind untrained, said the Buddha. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than your own mind well cultivated and trained. Not even the most loving family member, the people who care for you.

So respect means to look at what's in our own mind. The kinds of thoughts that arise. "Oh, this is a judging thought. I hate judging thoughts. I don't want to judge anymore. Judging is so stupid." But what's that? Right? It's more judgment. What you can do is say, "Oh, thank you for your opinion. That's the judging mind. I appreciate that. That's the fearful mind. And that's the doubting mind—you can't do this right, you never do it right. Thank you for your opinion." We know whose voice it is. We won't talk about them. "Thank you for your guidance. I'm okay for now." You know?

And then the beautiful thoughts that come—of what's possible, the inspiration, the creativity, the love, all of those things. And you start to see that your thoughts really aren't yours very much. They're just conditioned things that have been programmed in there for a long time. And you start to shift your identity away from "my views." The Buddha said, "People who cling to their views go around the world annoying one another." This land is mine. These children are mine. These are words of folly from a person who doesn't know that even he is not his. Even your thoughts are not really yours. They come unbidden.

And you start to shift to where you attend and honor and respect. But your identity shifts from being caught in all the experiences that happen, and you become loving awareness itself. You become this space of mindfulness—

That has a kind of original innocence. A listening with your heart. And it expands the sense of who you are. You have your measure of tears and sorrows. You have your extraordinary gifts. The world has an ocean of tears and its unbearable beauty. And you let yourself say yes with a compassionate heart. This is our human life. You bow to it and say, yes, now let me navigate, seeing it the way it is, holding it with a space of loving awareness.

As that happens, you expand the sense of self. You don't take things quite so personally. You weep with all the parents who've lost a child, or all the parents whose children are in prison, or all the parents whose children are ill. It's not just your child. And you rejoice with all the parents whose children succeed, because it's our children. It's not yours, it's ours. You carry them in you.

George Washington Carver wrote, "How far you go in life depends on your being tender with the young, compassionate with the aged, sympathetic with the striving, and tolerant of the weak and the strong—because someday in life you will have been all of these." And that's the gesture of respect, that we all get to play parts, as Shakespeare says. You are a man or woman of parts. And to be able to hold this with respect and loving awareness.

The Listening Project, coming out of the Quakers and nonviolence work, sends teams to Sudan and Libya and North Korea, everywhere. They simply want to sit down with the people that the world vilifies and say, "I want to listen to you. Tell me how it is for you." It's a radical gesture and a transformative one.

Even dogs appreciate this. There was a man who had a big Rottweiler, and he learned from the vet that it would be good to give it cod liver oil. So he would call the dog over, grab it, hold its mouth open, and pour in the cod liver oil. The Rottweiler hated it. But one day as he pulled the dog over, the bottle fell and there was a big puddle of cod liver oil on the floor. After he let go of the dog, the dog went over and licked it all up. It wasn't the cod liver oil that was the problem. It was the way it was being administered.

The whole path of awakening is respect. When people ask for a little attention, it's not a little thing. It's a big thing. And a generous heart is what you're born with—to not harm yourself or others, to refrain from causing harm with your actions, to not kill, to not steal. Those are gestures of respect, of reverence for life.

Wisdom and compassion see the way things are with tenderness and respect, and then you can respond. But you have to respect the way it is first. You have to respect the fact that there are ten thousand nuclear warheads still active on this earth before you can do anything about it. You can't pretend they're not there. You actually let that terror of that reality also have a bow. And then you say, all right, what can we do? What are our steps?

It can change the world—for the elderly, the youth, the teens, the disenfranchised, the rich, the poor, the Palestinians and Israelis, the Hutus and the Tutsis, the Christians and the Muslims and the Buddhists and the Jews and the atheists. Can we listen in a respectful way to ourselves, to one another? What a world it would be if we offered this.

Now somebody might raise their hand and say, well what about the big difficulties? What about racism? Such a crazy thing—what color are you? You're green, brown, blue, something? As if that made any sense. What about our prison system? Millions of people incarcerated in the prison industrial complex, a racist poverty prison, which is also our default mental hospital system. What kind of culture is this?

What about the endless wars—whether it's Syria or South Sudan or the people of Tibet, or our own cities and places? These also need respect.

I tell the story of working with Michael Mead and Luis Rodriguez and others, running retreats for young kids getting out of street gangs from Oakland and Chicago and L.A. They come in with their hoods up and their hats turned back, like, "You're going to do some poetry and teach me some meditation and shit like that? Come on, man. I'm on the street. People got nine millimeters. You've got to give me something better than that."

And so we would take a candle and light it and put it in the center of a table and say, "There are too many people in this room who need respect that haven't been acknowledged. Would you go out in the parking lot and collect a stone for every young person you know who's been killed? Put it by this candle and say their name."

And these kids would come back with their hands full of stones. "This is for Tito and this is for RJ and this is for homegirl." All the names. But when that's done and the candle's there and the stones are piled up, the hoods come down, the hats come off, and they say, "Okay, we're going to get real here. Let's talk about this." There's a respect for what they've survived and what they've lived through.

So what about racism and war, endless war? This is respect for Mara. Mara is the Indian god of aggression and temptation who attacked the Buddha—in the myth anyway—on the night of his enlightenment with all the possible temptations, and then the armies of Mara, and all the doubts. These are not small forces. The power of greed, of hatred, of fear, of delusion—civilizations rise and fall from these forces. Wars happen from these forces.

But they're not the end of the story.

Maha Ghosananda, that Gandhi of Cambodia who was bowing to the Dalai Lama, was part of the world campaign that got the Nobel Prize for trying to get rid of landmines. When he went to the U.S. Congress, he said, "What concerns me is not just the landmines in the earth." He had asked me as a friend if I would collect money for artificial limbs for the thousands of children in Cambodia that needed them. He said, "That's what concerns me." But then he said, "What concerns me is the landmines in the human heart." That's what he said to the whole U.S. Congress. That's where we have to start.

War is not the end of the story. People think that only force is the way to run the world. But the only thing that can meet violence and greed and hatred—the only force big enough, as Martin Luther King said—is soul force. After the church was bombed and the four children were killed, everything torn apart, he said, "We will meet your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering, and we will not hate you. We cannot obey your unjust laws, but we will soon wear you down with our capacity to suffer. And in loving you, we will bring you so far along that in the end you will come to that place of love as well."

That's another dimension of respect. It's love, really. We want it. The people around us want it. The earth needs it.

Without mindfulness, without loving awareness, we get lost in separation, in addiction, in grasping, in protection, in isolation, in fear, in racism—all those things. They're all sources of suffering. And yet mindfulness, loving awareness, offers us a doorway to freedom in ourselves, in this human incarnation with its ten thousand joys and sorrows. And it offers a possibility for society as a whole.

After Oxford, I went to teach in Parliament in England. It was really wonderful. One hundred eighty-five members of Parliament have signed on to the UK Mindfulness Group, Mindful UK. There are reports of how they're going to integrate it into the national health care system and the education system. Something in them knows that we need this. When we sat together, facing Brexit and all the political turmoil, and we did meditation, they said, "You know, this is the best thing we do all week."

It was like twenty MPs and members of the House of Lords, perhaps twenty or twenty-five people altogether. They said this is the best thing we do all week: we get quiet, we meditate, we listen. Then we listen to each other, even from different sides. We can relearn this. We all have our measure of tears. We all have our disappointments. But we can also treat each other in different ways.

I was leading a men's retreat here some years ago with my colleagues Wes Nisker and Robert Hall, a dear friend and wonderful teacher who is now right near the end of his life in hospice. In the evenings we would have a council where men would come into the center in small groups and be given a question: talk about fathers and sons, or talk about money, or talk about what it means to be a man, or talk about their sexual history. One of the things that was very evident with those questions is that everybody was confused. There wasn't a single man who got in the middle and talked about whether it was their sexuality or fathers and sons or whatever who didn't have some confusion about how to be a man. Just in case you're interested to know that. We're in it together, apparently.

But anyway, there was a fellow there who was talking about how we treat one another as men. He had a radio show in Los Angeles, a blues show. It was on Sunday nights, and he said, "I have a big following inside the prisons." So one day he got a letter from a man named George Jameson. The letter said, "I'm a follower of your show. I'd like to make a request. Could you put on your show some of the really early great blues legends? Mississippi John Hurt and Blind Lemon Jefferson." And he listed a number of other blues greats that he'd like to hear.

So the week after, this fellow went on his radio show and said, "I got a letter from George Jameson. He's obviously a man with understanding of the blues and its roots, a great aficionado. And I'm going to play for him some of the early Mississippi Delta blues—Blind Lemon Jefferson and Mississippi John Hurt and others."

A few weeks later he got a letter again from George Jameson. It said, "Thank you so much for playing those blues greats." And then: "I want to tell you, that's the first time in my life I can remember my name being said with respect."

Imagine that. Imagine that. You don't get it in prison, you can understand, but you also don't get it in some childhoods and in some neighborhoods and in some communities.

A year or two ago we had a prison project that was born out of Spirit Rock at San Quentin called the Insight Prison Project, or Insight Out—different names for it—and Jacques Verduin has been the main steward. There was a graduation in San Quentin that I went to as a speaker. There were a hundred men with mortarboards and graduation gowns who'd gone through a year-long program called GRIP—Guiding Rage Into Power—learning mindfulness and anger management and bodily practices like yoga, things to tend themselves.

They stood up and had a kind of class speaker who read: "We were violent men, and we now pledge"—then they all stood up—"that we will never use violence again in this world to solve a problem." It was very moving. "And we want to offer a deep apology to you and to the society and to all those that we've hurt." There were several hundred people witnessing it: state senators and mayors and people from the corrections department.

I gave a little talk, and then Luis Rodriguez, my buddy, a great Latino poet—he was the poet laureate of Los Angeles—author of La Vida Loca: My Gang Days in L.A., got up to read. He's worked a lot in the prisons. He says proudly that his book La Vida Loca is the most stolen book in high school libraries around the country, so it's obviously a read.

He got up to read a killer poem, but he said, "I can't read my poem first. I have to say something." He said, "You men stood up and apologized to us. But it's we who have to apologize to you. Because many of you are in here because you had a childhood of disrespect, of abuse, of poverty, of drugs, of racism—of being part of a community that was marginalized and attacked. We as a society have failed you."

And I want to offer you an apology on behalf of those who are outside.

And then he read his poem. It was a very moving moment. To reverse it—he offered the kind of respect that these men deserved.

So this is sovereignty. To honor the gift in every human being. To honor the gift of your own body. To honor the gift in others. And we can all learn it. We all have our measure of disappointment. That's where the heart grows wise, you know.

Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who won the Nobel Prize in Liberia, said, "Liberia used to be known for its child soldiers. Now they remember our country for its women leaders." Turn that one around. It means it's not the end of the story—that when we bring respect, the story can be changed.

And then we become able to bless. Whatever we pay attention to, to offer that respect or that sovereignty, that honoring, becomes a blessing. Nelson Mandela wrote, "It never hurts to think too highly of a person. They often act the better because of it."

William Butler Yeats, who talks about all the blindness in his life and all the ways he's fallen into the ditches, says: "And yet I'm content to live it all again and yet again, if it be life to pitch into the frog spawn of a blind man's ditch. I'm content to follow to its source every event in action or in thought, measure the lot, forgive myself the lot.

When such as I cast out remorse, so great a sweetness flows into the breast. We must laugh and we must sing. We are blessed by everything, and everything we look upon is blessed."

When we understand this quality of respect—that we are this world, this is it, we are it—then it becomes possible to treat ourselves and those we meet with this gift of attention, of loving awareness, of respect. And it brings a freedom and a dignity and a kind of blessing of sovereignty to yourself and to all that you touch.

Let us sit for a moment in quiet.

O nobly born, do not forget who you really are. Do not forget the great heart of compassion, the wisdom that was born into you. And let yourself consider who or what in your life is longing for respect. What difficult circumstance, what conflict or people could you offer respect, even as there are differences? You take your seat halfway between heaven and earth and awaken the Buddha within. Wisdom and compassion are your birthright.

Thank you for coming tonight. Thank you for your meditation and your kind attention—your respectful attention—and for your support of this place. It's become a sanctuary for a lot of people: those who come on retreats and classes, those who walk the land. Now that you've come, it's one of your places, should you wish to return.

Take something good from the teachings tonight, whatever it reminded you of that you already carry, and go out into this beautiful darkness.

CHAPTER 82

The Buddha's Last Teachings: A Story of Inspiration and Wisdom

Jack Kornfield · 1h02

> In this profound dharma talk, Jack Kornfield guides listeners through the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta—the story of the Buddha's final year of life—inviting us to understand these ancient teachings not merely as history but as symbolic myth that speaks to the heart. Drawing from this text, Kornfield illuminates the Buddha's guidance on wise society: how communities prosper through mutual respect, care for the vulnerable, and mindful attention to one another. He explores the famous metaphor of the teachings as a raft—useful for crossing the flood of suffering, but not to be carried as rigid doctrine.
> The talk weaves together key themes of spiritual empowerment, including the Buddha's instruction that the Dhamma itself be our guide, the importance of intention in karma, and the teaching that liberation is available to all regardless of caste or station—exemplified by the courtesan Ambapālī's invitation to the Buddha. Kornfield reflects on Māra's role in awakening, the untarnishable nature of the liberated mind symbolized by gold, and the profound message that any place can be the kingdom of righteousness when the heart is pure.
> Kornfield concludes with the Buddha's final instruction: "Make of yourself a light." This empowering message reminds us that the responsibility for awakening lies within our own hearts and hands. The talk offers practical wisdom for navigating divided times while maintaining connection to timeless truths of compassion, mindfulness, and inner freedom.

When I was reflecting on what to speak about and teach this evening, for some of you who've been coming the last couple or few months, I've been doing stories—big stories. Our theory and legend about what women want. An ancient story from the Vedas about Nachiketa's descent to the underworld, to the Lord of Death, and what one learns there. Tonight I want to share another story, a very Buddhist story, and talk about it a little more.

Part of the reason for doing it is that I've been involved in other ways recently in this very divided time that we live in, with a lot of concern, as most people I know have. Last week, Trudy and I went down to migrant shelters in Mexico on the other side of the border to help someone who was doing teachings that were helpful to the staff and to the migrants there—a women's shelter and a men's shelter. I've also been involved in a project where we got 130 other Buddhist teachers to sign a letter that we sent out to all of our lists and communities to help get out the vote. Not just that you all vote—I hope you're all going to vote—but to try to activate a community through Faith in Action, which is a non-partisan group of churches and synagogues and mosques and Buddhist temples, all simply saying that it's a responsibility as a member of society to treasure our participation and to go out and support people who might not otherwise do it.

But what I thought about tonight, and the story I want to teach from, is actually a timeless story. It's not so much focused on the moment. Perhaps next month I'll do a story about the bodhisattva in action in the world in a way that's helpful. But this is a story that has a much bigger perspective. I think we need that sometimes—to step out of the immediate reality, the dilemmas and conflicts and worries and hopes, and have a bigger picture.

What's unusual about the story tonight is that I'm taking a Buddhist text, which I rarely do here, called the Mahaparinibbana Sutta. This text tells the story of the last year of the Buddha's life. When you read it initially, it seems like a historical account: the Buddha went here, he said this, he did that, and you're reading history. But it's not. It's actually, as much as anything, a myth. I want to invite you, as you listen, to understand these kinds of ancient teachings as symbolic and mythological as much as literal.

If you don't have a sense of the symbolic and the mythological, then you take whatever it is—the Vedas or the Buddhist texts or the Bible or the Quran—completely literally. Joseph Campbell, the great mythologist and historian, said this is a complete confusion of levels.

For example, it says in the Bible that a rich man is less likely to go to heaven than a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. You've heard that. It turns out "the eye of a needle" is actually the name of a very small gate in the wall that surrounds Jerusalem. It's not about a needle at all—it had a very different origin. But it also has a different meaning. It's not about needles or gates, obviously. It has some other meaning.

Just as Moses and the burning bush—if you read Annie Dillard's remarkable natural world book Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, she writes about the day she saw the tree with the lights in it. She said, "I would walk on my knees across the desert for hundreds of miles to see that tree one more time." It doesn't mean that the bush was burning or that the tree was on fire. What it means is that we have a capacity to see this world in an illuminated way, to see the magic of the bay trees and the oaks and the sunlight on them and the sparkling, and to realize that every tree is life growing in new directions and putting itself out there, drinking in sunlight and being part of this fabric. We don't see the mystery and the magic of it.

So we understand these ancient stories not just as historical. We keep telling them because they resonate in a different way in the heart and mind, in a symbolic and mythological way. I'll have a little quiz for you as we go along, so you can see if this is of value to you.

This is the text on the Buddha's last teachings, the story of the last year of his life. If you read it as history, it would be pretty boring. But it's actually part of one of the great myths of humankind—the Buddha's life. The way you know it's mythological is that it starts with a phrase something like "once upon a time." You've heard that before. And it ends literally with a phrase that says, "This is how it was in the old days." So it really feels like a fairy tale when you read it.

The text has two themes. One is guidance for practice—how the Buddha wanted to leave the community, guidance for the monks and nuns and laypeople. The other is about wise relationship in spiritual community. The whole underpinning is the empowerment of those who were around the Buddha or who were receiving the teachings. It's really a text about empowerment.

It takes place in the ancient forests of India, when India was truly forested and there were many tigers. Some of it takes place on Vulture's Peak, in the mountains of the Ganges Plain. Some of it along the River Ganges.

But in an India that's very different than modern India. An India that was covered with wildness. And I know when I first went to India, oh gosh, forty-some years ago—I forget, I think the population was 400 million, 450 million. It's now 1.2 billion. It was crowded then. Where do they put them now, you know? It's kind of remarkable how the human population has grown. But it's also affected the landscape in a way. So you have to imagine that this was a verdant and wild landscape.

And so here's the Buddha sitting in a grove in the forest. And his attendant comes to him at the very beginning of this and says, "I have the chief minister of one of the local kings coming by with an important question." And the question is: Should we make war on the Vajjians? They haven't behaved that well, and we're thinking of making war and taking over their kingdom.

And the Buddha's response, which is a really compelling one in a certain way—he says to the chief minister of the king: Do the Vajjians meet regularly in harmony? Do they treat one another with respect? Do they listen to one another with care? Do they meet in harmony and disperse in harmony? If they do, they can be expected to prosper and not decline.

And then he goes on and says: Do they follow the wisest traditions of their ancestors and elders and great teachers? If they do, they'll prosper and not decline. Do they take care of the vulnerable among them—the women, the children, those who are vulnerable in other ways? If they do, they will prosper and not decline. Do they take care of the natural environment and the sacredness of the nature around them? If they do, they will prosper and not decline.

Now I had a chance to more or less read that text at the first White House Buddhist leadership gathering a couple of years ago that we had with 120 Buddhist teachers. It's not going to happen again soon, we know this—but leaving that aside. These are really the teachings of wise society.

And then the Buddha goes on and he says to the community around him: If you listen to one another with respect, if you care for the sick and the vulnerable among yourselves in the community, if you treat the temples and the places that are your dwelling places with respect and care, the environment around you, if you practice your own mindfulness—and then there's another really beautiful phrase where he says: If you preserve your personal mindfulness, and as long as the monks and nuns, both in public and in private, show loving-kindness to those around them in acts of body, speech, and mind or heart, then you will prosper and not decline.

So the minister bows to the Buddha and says, "Thanks for the advice. The Vajjians sound like their kingdom is pretty well together. I guess we shouldn't make war against them."

And then the Buddha says, "All right, that's the teachings for the wise society of the kingdom, but here now for you as a community."

So here's the mythological question: Why didn't the Buddha just say, "War is a bad thing, don't kill people"? I mean, we'd like to say that, wouldn't we? But why didn't he say that? I can see your little brains are starting to percolate a little. And I'll give the answers to these questions, but I warn you they might not be the right answer, because you have to understand it in your own way.

My understanding is that he didn't say "don't go to war" to a king, because what he was interested in teaching was something deeper, which is the cause and effect of things. Not just the effects of things, but the causes. And if you have a just society and you have people treating each other well, then the fruits of that will be peace, will be strength in the community—and the same for those who followed him. He didn't want to just say "this is bad" or "this is good," but he said: Look to the way you live with one another, and that is what is actually going to create the world that you live in. Do you understand this? It's easy to say war is bad, but what are the conditions that make it happen?

So then the gist of the story as it goes on is his travels, the announcement of his death, the last disciples, and the last teachings—what to keep in mind as he gets ready to die, and what happens when you die, and things like that.

So he's again traveling with a group of monastics, and now they're at Pavarica's Mango Grove. And Sariputra, who is the wisest of his disciples, sits with him and says, "There has never been a more enlightened and better teacher than you in this world. Never been someone—" and Sariputra is a very wise and wonderful figure in this, but he says, "You are the best. There's never been anybody as wise and wonderful as you."

And the Buddha looks back and says, "Sariputra, do you know all the Buddhas past and future?"

Do you know all the great teachers of the world? How can you make a statement like that?" He calls him out, essentially saying, "You're boasting, but what's really the truth of this?"

And Sariputra answers with a beautiful image. He says, "It is as if there's a great city, and to protect the city from marauders and all the things that could harm its inhabitants, there is one gate. At this one gate stands a guard who sees with great clarity what's skillful and helpful to those who inhabit the city and what's dangerous. Living in a completely present and mindful way, this guard allows what's useful to come in and keeps what's not useful out."

Then he explained: "This is the abode of mindfulness and compassion. The gate is the present moment. If we can stay present with what arises—with the people we're in contact with, with the tasks we have to do, with the care we have for the earth or the community around us—if we tend the present moment, then all things get tended. This quality of presence, this freedom to be here and now fully, is the abode of the awakened ones. Therefore I can say there's never been a greater one, because this is the place."

He gave a pretty good answer. And the Buddha said, "Just so, Sariputra," allowing it. The abode of the Buddha—the word Buddha means one who is awake—rather than being lost in thought, lost in past and future, in fear and confusion and reactivity, is to actually be present with a liberated heart and mind.

Here's a line from Rumi: "What's the fuss we make when we will all go one by one through that same gate?" Now he's talking about a different meaning of gate, but you can also hear the mythological resonance of it. This is all we have—the present moment. That's one gate. But there's also the gate of death. The fact is that our lives are limited. What's the fuss when we will all go one by one through that same gate?

In this story, the Buddha continues to wander with a company of friends. Then the question arises: what is a wise relationship to the teachings? He comes to the banks of the Ganges River and says to those with him, "Followers, I have offered you teachings to cross the flood—a boat, a raft. These are teachings that allow you to come from the shore of confusion and delusion and fear and separateness, to cross the flood of suffering to a place of inner well-being no matter what the changing conditions are, to a freedom of heart, to a dwelling of liberation and compassion."

Then he asks, "Friends, once you've crossed the river, would it be useful to carry the boat or the raft with you?" This is a famous part of this myth and metaphor. And of course, the monks and nuns and people around him, being intelligent, say, "No, sir."

"Just so, my friends," he says. "Use these teachings as a raft, as a boat, as a way to move from the places of entanglement and fear and confusion to that shore of liberation. But don't be attached. Don't carry them in some rigid way. Use the teachings to bring you to a place of freedom."

We know from history that an awful lot of people have taken spiritual teachings—across many spiritual and religious traditions—and don't know how to put the boat down. It's kind of heavy. And not only that, then you get into fights about it with other people.

The Dalai Lama wakes up each morning and takes this vow from Shantideva: "May I be a boat, a bridge, a raft for all who need to cross the flood." He uses that metaphor. "May I be a lamp for those lost in the darkness. May I offer myself as benefit to beings so that they might cross the flood of confusion and fear and come to a place of inner safety and well-being."

They carry on, and at this point the Buddha goes to sit quietly in the forest under a great tree. As he's sitting, Mara appears. In Indian mythology, Mara is the name of a god or being who represents all the causes of suffering. Sometimes in Victorian translations it's rendered as "the evil one," although he's not exactly evil. He's the force of ignorance and greed and fear and hatred and confusion embodied.

Mara was the one who came to the Buddha when he was sitting under the Bodhi tree before his enlightenment and tempted him with all possible temptations. When the Buddha didn't move, Mara unleashed his armies of anger and aversion and hatred—all the weapons and aggression of Mara's forces. And finally came doubt: "What right do you have to sit here?"

The Buddha reached down and touched the earth and said, "The earth is my witness that I have offered my whole life, and many lifetimes, out of compassion and care for the beings of this world. I have a right to awaken, as does every human being."

This is the beginning of hearing about Mara in Buddhist myth. And Mara reappears regularly for the Buddha.

He doesn't just go away, which is a very interesting thing, isn't it? Even the Buddha has to deal with Mara periodically. And not only that—Mara gets to Spirit Rock regularly, and even to your own community.

Mara comes, and normally when Mara arises and appears to the Buddha, the Buddha simply says, "Oh, I see you, Mara. Here you are again." And just by saying "I see you, Mara," Mara realizes he's been recognized and sort of slinks away. That's the way the story is told.

But in this case, Mara comes and says, "May the Blessed One take final nirvana. May the Blessed One—now you've completed all your tasks. There are monks and nuns and the whole community and lay people and so forth." Mara had been urging the Buddha to hang it up for a long time. And the Buddha finally says, "All right, you need not worry, Mara. It's not long. In several months, I will release this old eighty-year-old body."

So Mara—it's very interesting. Thich Nhat Hanh, the great teacher, had a t-shirt that many of you have seen: "No mud, no lotus." And no Mara, no Buddha. You actually need Mara in the story or you don't get enlightened. You need Mara to come and test you.

In some way, what this says is that this is a dualistic world in which there is both love and connection and a timeless truth of freedom, but there's also separateness and fear and confusion. And because there is, that becomes the seed or the ground from which liberation can arise. That's just the way it's built. No mud, no lotus.

Or as Alexander Solzhenitsyn writes: "If only it were all so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary simply to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who among us is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

And so Mara appears not because Mara shouldn't be there, but because Mara is actually part of the dance of awakening itself. The Buddha says, "All right, Mara, now I see you again. And this time I'll go along with you, because in several months it will be my time."

If I were to ask you, why did Mara come? I've sort of answered that question already. You need Mara. No one would go to the movie if you don't have a villain. You know how it works. This is our human condition. It's how it's designed.

So we see Mara, and Thich Nhat Hanh talks about inviting Mara in for tea. "Okay, I see you again, Mara. Come on in, how's it going? How is it being the evil one?" And Mara says, "Well, it's not actually that much fun. How are you doing, Buddha?"

You start to have a different relationship with the difficulties. Instead of seeing them as something you have to get rid of, you start to see them as part of the fabric of life, and you discover the possibility of welcoming them with tea—while saying, "All right, but don't stay too long. There's a whole other reality we can inhabit."

Then a great earthquake happens as soon as the Buddha says, "Yes, Mara, I will be dying—I'll take my final nirvana in these next months." A hair-raising earthquake and thunder. Ananda, his beloved attendant, comes running. "What is this earthquake? What is this earthquake?"

And the Buddha says—because he was a list maker—"There are eight causes for earthquakes. There's the natural earthquake, but also there's the earthquake when a Buddha is born, when a Buddha gets enlightened, and so forth. And this earthquake was because Mara came and asked if I was ready to leave this mortal life, and I said yes, it's my time." And thus there was this enormous earthquake.

Now, why an earthquake? Again, thinking mythologically or symbolically. Because each of these events—the enlightenment, the earthquake at the first teaching that came after, the death of the Buddha—are all earth-shaking events. When you think about the one or two billion people on earth who have been affected by this one human being as a teacher over these 2,600 years, you have a little earthquake happening there in the cosmos, in some symbolic way, signifying that something profound has occurred.

And then Ananda gets really upset and begins to weep, saying, "Oh, many times you've said you could live a long time, that you could live a century. Please don't die yet. Please live for a century."

And then the Buddha responds, "My body is now like an old cart held together with straps and ropes." You know what an old body is like—some of you are getting there, right? He said, "It's finished its time, its journey." And he said, "I must now take my nirvana in a few months."

And Ananda said, "But you said you could live for a century."

And the Buddha said, "Yes, but yours is the fault, Ananda. I gave you hints over these last years—in the Black Snake Pool and Jivaka's Mango Grove, in the Rajgir Deer Park, in the cool wood of Tapoda—and if you had asked me three times, 'Please live for a century,' I gave you hints that I could. Two times I would have demurred, no. But on the third time"—this is fairytale, right?—"by the third time, I would have had to say yes, and I would have lived for a hundred years. Yours is the fault, Ananda."

Here's his beloved attendant for all these years. Talk about a guilt trip, right? "Yours is the failure. You've ignored these hints."

Now, why would he do this? Thinking again symbolically or mythologically, I'll give your little brain some time here. Here's one reason, one important reason: that the teacher-student relationship is not one way. That you too have a responsibility. It's not just held in one part of this dyad.

And later, right before the Buddha dies, in this very same text, he praises Ananda—because Ananda was the most beloved of his disciples—for his care and beauty, his timing and sensitivity and guidance and all of these things. He loves Ananda. But in this story, what he's doing is saying, "It's not just up to me, Ananda. It's up to our relationship with one another. And even as the Buddha, I need you as you need me to help awaken."

The teacher-student relationship interweaves, and we awaken together. This puts a kind of responsibility back into the arms and the hands and the hearts of those who are practicing. It's not just somebody saying something—it's yours too. And you have the responsibility for the well-being of all that you touch.

In each scene, when various visitors come to see the Buddha as he wanders and ask their questions or receive teachings—and he's wandering with a large company of followers—after he gives teachings, he says a phrase that's repeated over and over again, related to what just happened with Ananda. After he offers these beautiful teachings, he looks at the people who were there, and sometimes it says their heart opened, their mind became vast. They attained to some new state of freedom or liberation beyond their small, separate sense of self. They became filled with compassion for the whole world. Those kind of nice things happen.

And then he would look at them, or he'd say, "All right, here, practice this. Do mindfulness of the breathing, or do mindfulness of the body, or do a compassion practice."

At the end, he would say this phrase: "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit."

Listen to that one, baby. Because there's something really important in that phrase. He's saying, "All right, I can help you. I can point to who you really are—to that possibility of liberation of heart that is your birthright. But no one can be liberated for you. No one can do it for you."

Now I place it in your hands, in your heart, and it becomes yours to do with. And there's something enormously empowering in this. You understand this? Now it's in your good hands. Now it is in your heart. The teacher can't do it for you. That's why it's in this story. No one can let go for you. No one can awaken for you. No one can love for you.

So then Ananda says, and the people around him, "Who will be our guide?" You know, who's going to run the company when the CEO retires, basically? And the Buddha replies, "The Dharma, the teachings, will be your guide. I will not put another person in charge of the community. Let the truth and the teachings themselves be your guides. Be an island unto yourself. Take these teachings and responsibility. Do as you see fit."

And then they said, "How?" To contemplate with mindfulness and loving awareness this very body and feelings and mind. The ways that the mind and heart get entangled in the world. And to become aware of the possibility of releasing grasping and finding freedom in itself, within your own experience.

He said, "Let the Dharma, the teachings, and the Vinaya"—which is the word for the virtuous conduct of the monastics—be your guide. And he goes on to talk about virtue. He says those who do not live with attention to their words and deeds, who don't act out of kindness and respect, they lose their wealth, they lose their reputation, they lose their sleep, and they die confused. He doesn't mince words about it. But on the other hand, if you pay attention to your life and live with dignity and care and respect for living beings, for yourself and others, then there comes honor and respect, wealth, health, well-being, and ease of sleep, and a death that comes naturally in its appropriate time and easily for you.

So he's talking about the heart of practice—how we actually embody these teachings and how we live.

And then one of the monks asks how we know what are the right teachings, what are the true teachings of the Buddha. And he said, "It might be that you heard them from the lips of the Buddha. It might be that the community of followers say these are the real teachings. It might be from a circle of learned elders. It might be a master who repeats these. None of these will tell you for sure what are the teachings of the Buddha. You cannot rely on any of these."

But instead, if what you hear conforms to the essence and the gist of these teachings —no matter what anybody says—that compassion, loving kindness, joy, equanimity, the awakened heart, these grow in you through these practices and understandings. That wisdom shows you that attachment and grasping, fear and confusion, lead to suffering. And there's a practice, a way to live, that releases you from suffering. The noble truths of suffering and its causes, and the path to the end of suffering. The wise attention that brings us to this freedom. If it conforms with the gist and the heart of these teachings and you know this in yourself, then you know you're following the right way.

And it's a beautiful thing. Again, it places it in your own hands and hearts—your spiritual life.

So he goes on and wanders with a large retinue. And he's getting sicker now, so the travel is difficult. But yet his heart is at peace, even though his body is achy, even though he's getting older and sicker. And there he is in a beautiful forest grove, and the courtesan—one of the most famous courtesans of the time—

Ambapali, dressed in the finest silks and perfumes, with a retinue of followers and carriages, arrives at the edge of the forest grove, then walks on foot to pay her respects to the Buddha.

And it says the Buddha instructed and roused and inspired and awakened them, teaching the practices of mindfulness and loving awareness, of compassion and inner freedom, and of the fundamental dignity of life and of each human being.

The courtesan and her group describe a beautiful transformation: "I have shifted from being confused and closed to open and free in my heart and mind" — this sense of awakening that the Buddha had touched in her. And she then asks, "Will the Buddha and the company of followers come and take a meal at my home?" The Buddha agrees.

Shortly thereafter in the story, the nobles, the princes of the Licchavi people start to arrive with their carts dressed in blue and yellow and white, in silks and incredible cloth and adornment, with royal carts and horses and elephants. They also stop at the forest grove, and they see Ambapali leaving. They say, "Oh my God, this mango woman got here before us" — which is a slang for whatever you want to imagine they were saying about her, something of a Me Too moment of the old days. They've come to invite the Buddha to their palaces to give teachings.

The Buddha says, "Thank you for the invitation, but I've already accepted the invitation of the courtesan Ambapali. I cannot come."

And they said, "Oh no, oh no." They raced after her and offered her a hundred thousand pieces of gold. She says, "Not for a whole kingdom would I give up this invitation to make offerings to the Blessed One and have him come to my place."

So here's another question for you, my friends. Why the courtesan? And why does the Buddha accept her invitation and not that of the princes? What do you think? Maybe you like courtesans, I don't know. But there's obviously a deeper and very important meaning.

And the meaning is: Who can practice? Who can awaken? What are the fundamental human values of these teachings?

From the very beginning, the Buddhist teachings are a huge contrast to the racist society that we live in now, and that was also there in the caste system of India at his time. He was very clear that not by caste, not by race, not by birth is one higher or lower. The nobility of a human being is simply a matter of their heart.

And the Buddhist texts begin: "O nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember the possibility of freedom, of liberation, of compassion, of the great heart, of awakened heart that is born in you. Remember who you are. You're not this small separate self. You are loving awareness itself. And this possibility is there for every single one of you."

From the very beginning, the Buddha was adamant not to buy into caste and race and all those kinds of delusions that separate people from one another and cause so much enormous suffering. Ambapali is here to represent the fact that whoever comes with a good heart — that's the noble person, not by any other standard.

Then he's at the Pava Mango Forest, and Cunda the smith offers his last meal. The Buddha says, "You give it to me and give the other food to my followers. I'll take the special food that you have prepared for me."

Even before he eats it, he reassures the smith that there are great treasures in this world. And one of the great treasures, blessings, merits, power, benefits, is the person who gives the first meal to the Buddha after he's enlightened, and the person who gives the last meal to the Buddha at the end of his life.

Now it happens that this meal was spoiled somehow, unknown to the man who provided it. The Buddha got terribly sick with dysentery afterward and then dies, as the story goes on. It's as if the Buddha knew that nobody else should eat this. It's my time. This is what you offered, and that's the way things unfold. But no matter what happens with this, you receive great merit. There's an enormous blessing that comes from giving the first meal and the last meal to the Buddha.

Now why would he say this? Talk about how bad you might feel. "I'm sorry I gave the food that poisoned the Buddha" — that wouldn't be a very happy circumstance to find yourself in, right?

He's reassuring him because, in the end, in the teachings, it is the motivation of the heart and the intention that matters. Chunda is offering this with purity and the best of intentions. And even though sometimes things don't work out the way you would like, the key to karma is the motivation behind things.

Now, we might say, "The road to hell is paved with good intentions." But actually, that proverb means the road to hell is paved with ignorantly good intentions, because we can have intentions that aren't really clear and wise. But if you have a truly caring heart and clarity and wise intention, that plants the seed for something good to happen, however long it takes for that seed to bear fruit. This is really talking about the seed or the root of karma itself.

Let me share the image I use. If you pull your car out of the driveway of your house and crash through the fence of the house next door into the living room because you're so angry at your neighbor—the neighbor from hell, who cut down all those beautiful trees on the property line, mistreated your dog, did all these terrible things—if you got so furious that you crashed your car into their house, the blue lights will come along and take you away in handcuffs.

But if you're in your car and you back out of the driveway and crash through the fence into the living room of that same neighbor because the accelerator pedal stuck—it's the same person, it's the same car, it's the same action of the crash. Instead of the blue lights, the ambulance comes, followed by the insurance company. What is the difference between those two? Not the person or the vehicle or the experience, but the intention behind it. That's the teaching here, where the Buddha is reassuring this person who gives him his last meal: it's the goodness of your heart that really plants the seeds.

So then, they are sitting in deep meditation and five hundred carts come by. Some huge train of merchants passes by the river where the Buddha is sitting on the edge. Then there's a tremendous thunderstorm, and he says to Ananda, "I want a cup of water."

Ananda says, "But the river's all been stirred up by the carts and the rainstorm."

The Buddha says, "Please get me a cup of water from the river."

Ananda goes to the river, and magically it is completely clear. He brings the Buddha a beautiful cup of water. The Buddha drinks from it, and a wandering yogi who has come looking for the Buddha sees this and says, "I've never seen anything like this. How did you do that?"

The image is of alum—if you know what alum is, it's a substance that, if you have cloudy water and put alum in it, helps all the particulates settle to the bottom, and the water becomes clear. In this case, what does it point to? There is a reality beyond the changing conditions of form—beyond storms and lightning and carts—a timeless reality so clear and pure it cannot be touched by the circumstances of the world.

And this isn't just physical, because again, this is symbolic and metaphorical. It's like Nelson Mandela walking out of Robben Island prison after twenty-seven years with the understanding that they can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit. The Buddha is manifesting in this myth, this story, that there's an untouchable, unshakable reality of your own heart and mind.

Then Pukkusa, the wanderer who has come to see the Buddha, makes an offering and gives him a set of golden robes—beautiful golden-colored robes, a little bit like our monk who's sitting here in the second row who has come to visit. As the Buddha puts the robes on, his skin starts to glow and give off a golden light.

Now, what is that about? It sounds very mercantile, doesn't it? But it has another meaning. Gold—I have this lovely gold wedding ring that says inside, "I love you, thank you"—one of gold's great characteristics is that it doesn't tarnish. It can go through all the different changes, but there's something in the chemical structure of the element of gold that remains unchanged, unless there are very special circumstances like aqua regia for you chemists. Other than that, it doesn't tarnish. That's partly why it was so treasured and valued.

In the same way, the glowing skin of the Buddha was a representation of a state of heart and mind—of compassion for the whole world and a liberated heart and mind—that is untarnished by changing conditions. It doesn't matter if there are storms or all kinds of other things.

So now the Buddha continues. We're getting near the end of the story, and I know it's almost your bedtime, so this is a bedtime story. The text describes great pains, bloody, severe sickness. Why would it get so graphic? Because that's how it happens. It's just what bodies do at the end. They give up.

And they fall apart in different ways. And it often can be painful—coming in and going out. Spirit coming into the body and leaving the body. The body doesn't want to die, and it has to kind of fall apart some before it does. And finally it gives up.

This description says, this is just part of being, of human incarnation. And it's important to see it for the way that it is.

And at this point, the Buddha lays down in the lion's pose on his right side, between two sal trees, and the trees immediately go into bloom. And then around the trees, it says there are angels and Brahmas and Devas from the ten thousand world systems, all shining their eyes and their light down on the Blessed One.

And what is it about the trees blooming and the radiance that's there, even while the body is severe, bloody sickness and great pains? What does this say? That even in death, even in the midst of the most difficult circumstances, there is an inviolable spirit that you're invited to remember, to know that this is who you are—a purity.

And then Ananda says, he complains, and he says, "Don't die here. This is a miserable backwater, a daub and wattle village." I know some anthropologists translated this thing, right? You know, mud and sticks and so forth. "This is not a proper place for the Blessed One to die."

And the Buddha says, "Do not call this a miserable backwater."

Now why would this be here? Why is Ananda saying this is a miserable daub and wattle village, don't die here? And he says, "You've got to go to Benares or Kosala or one of the great—go to Paris and die there. Make it a good one, right?"

And the Buddha says, "Do not call it a miserable backwater. Once upon a time, long ago, in this very spot, lived an ancient monarch named King Sudasana, who was a wheel-turning monarch"—which means a righteous king. "And his kingdom was well-populated, a kingdom of justice for all, prosperous, never free from the sounds of elephants and carriages, gongs and commerce, cattle and cymbals and joys. And the great roads from his palace stretched out in each of the four directions. And I will die here, thank you."

Now why is this in there? What could this mean? What the Buddha is speaking about, T.S. Eliot called the still point of the turning world—that absolutely any place, when the mind becomes silent and the heart becomes vast, any place is the kingdom of righteousness. Exactly where you are is the place of liberation, is the center of justice, the center of well-being and the kingdom of righteousness. It's not found in the physical world at all. But wherever you are, when the heart is pure and the eyes are open to see this world with compassion and freedom, this is the place of awakening.

And then there's one last visitor, and Ananda says, "No, no, you're getting ready to die." And the Buddha says, "No, let him come in. Let him come in." And it's really the Buddha's last act of compassion. When he says, "Let him come in," these teachings are open-handed. There are teachers who hide away and put the teachings in secrets. He says, "I've given you everything you need. I've reminded you of everything you need to know to awaken your own heart and mind, without holding back anything. Let him come in. Let whoever they are—let me give this away." And it's a very, very beautiful moment.

And then he looks around and he says, "Does anybody have any doubts? Have I not taught you well? Is there some question you have? I've shown the way for liberation—to not cling to this world, to step out of the small sense of self and fear and confusion and rest in the liberated heart. I've pointed the way to what he called the sure heart's release."

No one had questions.

He said, "Then be of good resolve, all of you nobly born."

And he says something very beautiful then. He says, "For if you practice wisely, the earth will never be free of enlightened beings, of awakened beings." Remember, he goes on, all created things are impermanent. They all change. Be a lamp, a light unto yourself. Find your freedom. And he closed his eyes and went into deep meditation and died.

This is a poem from Mary Oliver, "The Buddha's Last Instruction":

I think of this every morning as the east begins to tear off its many clouds of darkness, to send up the first signal—a white fan streaked with pink and violet. An old man, he laid down between two sal trees, and he might have said anything knowing it was his final hour. Around him the villagers gathered and stretched forward to listen. No doubt he thought of everything that had happened in his difficult life. Slowly, beneath the branches, he raised his head. He looked into the faces of that frightened crowd. "Make of yourself a lamp," he said. "Make of yourself a light."

And he spoke to that illumination that is there in you and in each of us.

When he died, some of the monks and followers cried and tore their hair out. "Oh, the Blessed One is gone!" And some of the more awakened ones said, "Hey, didn't he just teach you that everything's impermanent? Why are you holding on?" And they grumbled, the awakened ones, the enlightened ones, grumbled about the people who were grieving.

I love this part, actually. Why is the grief there, and why are they complaining? He just said it! It really makes it human, doesn't it? Because it helps you to hold the opposite.

In one way, there is a timeless reality. When the great sage Ramana Maharshi was dying of cancer, his students came to him and said, "Please don't leave us, please don't leave us." He was very sick. And he looked back and said, "But where could I go? Where could I go? For who I am and who you are here is timeless. This is just my body. That's not who I am. That's not who you are. Where could I go?"

So that's one side of the paradox. But on the other side, Marpa, this great Tibetan sage and teacher of Milarepa, one of the greatest of the Tibetan teachers—his son died. And Marpa started to grieve and weep. His students came and said, "But you're supposed to be awakened and enlightened. All things come and go. Isn't birth and death just an illusion?" And Marpa looked back, weeping, and said, "Yes, and the death of a child is the greatest illusion of all." And wept.

These are the things that we have to hold together. The sorrows of the world, which we know right now are so visible. And the timeless truths—that we can plant the seeds of liberation and care and respect for one another in both wise society and in our own personal life. This is what's possible for us.

A great funeral was held. They had asked the Buddha beforehand what should be done, and they made a big stupa and treated his remains like that of a king—five hundred layers of linen and cotton and perfume. But they couldn't light the fire because Venerable Maha Kassapa, this great disciple of the Buddha, was still walking there with five hundred monks and nuns. All these numbers—five hundred just meant lots of them. And so they kept trying to light the fire and it wouldn't light.

And then Maha Kasapa came and paid his bow, laid his head at the feet of the Buddha. And then the fire spontaneously lit, and there was, of course, another earthquake. Flowers rained down from the heavens to celebrate and honor the World-Awakened One.

And the most important thing the Buddha said is this: for you who might long for justice or beauty or compassion, for you who wish to live a life of integrity and virtue—if you practice these teachings, not just hear them, but if those who have heard them practice rightly, the earth will not be free of those who are awakened.

This is the Dharma that is good in the beginning, good in the middle, and good in the end.

This is a story of empowerment. It's a story of the passing on of one of the great treasures of humankind. And the point, having used a Buddhist text tonight, is not for you to become Buddhists. Spare your friends and family. It's to become buddhas. That's a much more interesting occupation.

To actually embody and take to heart—within yourself and within your community and within a society that is so hungry for integrity, so hungry for compassion for the vulnerable, so hungry for a spirit that's untouched by all the praise and blame and gain and loss and yet still carries itself with dignity—this is to display the possibility of freedom.

Now you have these teachings as reminders. Now it is time for you to do as you see fit.

CHAPTER 83

The Marvelous Bodhisattva Vimalakīrti: A Story of Entering All the Realms with an Awakened Heart

Jack Kornfield · 1h16

> In this special winter solstice teaching, Jack Kornfield presents the Vimalakīrti Nirdeśa Sūtra, a beloved Mahāyāna text celebrated for its humor, poetry, and profound non-dual wisdom. The sūtra tells of Vimalakīrti, a lay bodhisattva who deliberately falls ill to draw the Buddha's enlightened disciples to him, where he challenges their conceptual understanding with playful dialogues about the nature of reality, liberation, and the limitations of dualistic thinking.
> Kornfield weaves the ancient narrative with contemporary reflections on imagination, compassion, and our capacity to envision a more awakened world. He explores how Vimalakīrti moves freely through all realms—casinos, cabarets, and places of suffering—teaching liberation without being caught by conventional distinctions of pure and impure, sacred and mundane. The teaching includes the famous encounter with a goddess who exchanges bodies with Śāriputra, demonstrating that awakening transcends gender and all conceptual categories.
> The talk culminates in a blessing cord ceremony where participants set intentions for the coming year, tying knots representing refuge, compassion, and personal vows. Drawing on teachers from Ram Dass to Mary Oliver, Kornfield invites listeners to see the sacred in every being and circumstance, reminding us of the Buddha's final teaching: "Make of yourself a light."

So often in many previous years on the Monday night that's close to Christmas and New Year's, I'll do teachings that are holiday stories—beautiful stories of people caring for one another in this time. Tonight, because the last couple of months on Mondays I've been telling some very long stories, I decided to continue in the vein of telling big stories.

Tonight I want to tell the story of a bodhisattva named Vimalakīrti. Bodhisattva is the Sanskrit word for a being who's committed to the service and care of all. Bodhi means awakened and sattva means being—somebody who's fostering well-being and awakening for beings everywhere.

I want to tell it because it's just about winter solstice in a couple of nights. All around the world and culture, certainly in the northern hemisphere, there are festivals of light. There's Hanukkah and there's Christmas and there's Kwanzaa and all kinds of other festivals. And often they're also mythological. In fact, there are lots of myths—virgin births and kings coming in from the desert and children being born in mangers, people who can then grow up and walk on water, loaves and fishes multiplying. It's a time of something bigger than just our ordinary way of seeing things.

I remember being at the top of Mount Tam some years ago when there was a transit of the planet Venus across the face of the sun. There were a number of people up there with some really big telescopes, and I loved looking in the biggest one. There was the fiery ball of the sun—you could see all the fiery plumes. And there was this little dark round marble that over the course of a couple of hours slowly moved across the face of this great glowing sun star. It was pretty small, just about the size of the earth. I had this feeling that like that one going around, we're on another one of those going around, taking our ride. And it's actually pretty small compared to the vastness of our star, not to speak of the whole solar system.

There's something about the turning of the seasons and the winter solstice that's an invitation to vastness—an invitation where the question is not just the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity, that there's something timeless.

I remember being a kid and lying down on the grass on a starry night. It was a fun thing to do, looking at the stars. But I would imagine that I was on the bottom of the earth, stuck on like a magnet—because it is; gravity is a magnet—and that I was looking down into the sea of stars. It gave a little kind of excitement to it, you know, not falling down into it. But here we are on this little blue-green globe circling the sun, and there's something really mysterious that's asked of us to awaken to.

So this story about Vimalakīrti, who is a bodhisattva. Bodhisattvas basically make the vow to serve or to awaken all beings. If you're in a Zen center, every time you sit, you get in the proper posture and you often begin: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all." And then you meditate. Your meditation is to serve them all.

Now there's a little problem you may notice, and that is even if you take such a vow, the sentient beings you live with, for example, don't want to be saved by you. You may have noticed that. So it has to have some other meaning than that.

And here's the Dalai Lama's vow. He wakes up in the morning and in his morning prayers, from Shantideva: "May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge for all beings to cross the flood. May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be food for the hungry. May I be medicine for all who are sick. May I be a lamp in the darkness for those who are lost. And may I do so as long as earth and sky and galaxies exist. Until all are enlightened, I vow to be here to serve them all." Some little vow like that.

But you can hear in this an imagination of what's possible for us as human beings—something a lot bigger than your to-do list, or holiday shopping, all of which are totally fine. But the turning of the season says there's something bigger: this mystery that we've been born into as a human being, your human incarnation, to pay attention to.

This particular teaching from the text of Vimalakīrti is a Mahayana sutra, and it's filled with story and humor and satire and poetry and magic and wisdom. It has a whole mythological side to it. Mahayana, especially these kind of Zen texts, is a little bit of a reaction to the rigidity that had grown in Buddhist teachings over some centuries—the lists of the three characteristics and the four noble truths and the five spiritual faculties and the six perfections and the seven factors of enlightenment.

Everybody trying to do things cookie cutter to get enlightened, the Eightfold Path. And it's sort of like when Bob Dylan picked up an electric guitar and said, forget that folk stuff—we're going to do it straight out and direct. The Mahayana texts, in some way, said the same thing. Zen says, you don't need those lists. We're going to have a whole different set of teachings that's vast and bigger and opens your mind in ways that have gotten rigid over these past centuries. And we want to offer the highest possible teachings. And in a way, they are, as you'll hear—they're tremendously imaginative.

You might say, well, what good is imagination? Robert Desnos was a celebrated French poet who joined the resistance during the Nazi occupation, worked underground for a long time, and then finally was captured and sent to the concentration camps. One day, he was sent first to a kind of collection point before being transported to one of the camps where people were being killed, where they were being gassed. Desnos and a whole group of others who'd been gathered up—former resistance fighters and so forth—were put in the back of a big truck and taken over to one of these concentration camps.

They all got out of the truck. People were, as you can imagine, already tired and emaciated, but now facing death—terribly bewildered and shocked. And Desnos kind of pushed his way to the front of the line. He grabbed the hand of the man in front and looked at it and said, "Wow, I'm so excited for you. You're going to live a long life. I can see it. You're going to have three more children, a beautiful wife, wealth—so fantastic, so wonderful!" He grabbed another person's hand and started reading their palm and talking about all these things that were possible, that were going to happen. And another and another.

The guards got kind of confused. Who is this guy at the front of the line reading palms? Then he turned around and started reading the palms of the guards. "When this war is over, you're going to have a big farm and you're going to have all these things." And he went on and on. Pretty soon everybody was smiling. This was not what was expected. They had all thought they were going to their death. Even the guards got confused. By the time he finished reading their palms, they said, "Yeah, yeah, get back in your truck. You go back." And they didn't end up going into the gas chamber or wherever they were supposed to go.

Everybody was astonished. Basically, when you're in trouble, do something really strange. It can help you. But it also says something about imagination—that even in the most difficult times, it's possible to see something much bigger. If we could take the roof off this hall—blow the clouds away and see all the stars—that's what you want in a temple, actually.

We need to be able to envision another world, a world that's not ruled as much by greed or hatred or fear. A world that doesn't have the kind of injustice and inequality and continuing racism, the difficulties and dangers of climate change and so forth. And it won't change unless we can envision this. We have to envision that this is possible for us as humans—and it is.

We have all this outer technology that's developed. Who would have imagined that you could have the Great Library of Alexandria in your pocket, along with 2.7 million cat videos? And at the same time, the outer developments of technology now have to be matched by inner development of humanity. "We're a nation of nuclear giants and ethical infants," said the Joint Chiefs of Staff. And so that's the big task for us—to imagine another way of being.

So, once upon a time, when you were somewhat younger than you are now, the Buddha was teaching in Vaisali, in the garden of Ambapali, attended by a gathering of 8,000 monks and nuns, all who were enlightened. They were calm and dignified like royal elephants, and surrounding them were 32,000 bodhisattvas, spiritual healers from all the great traditions and worlds. When they had all gathered there and the Buddha was expounding the teachings of the compassionate heart in every circumstance and liberation, the Licchavis, one of the groups that lived in that area, arrived with their greatest bodhisattva, Ratnakara, and 500 youth behind him—all these young people, each holding a parasol made of seven kinds of jewels. They approached the Buddha and bowed down and asked for teachings after circling a few times. When these parasols were laid down, then by the miraculous power of the Buddha, they were transformed into a single parasol, a canopy so great that it formed the covering of for a billion galaxies—quite large. And the surface of this billion-galaxy universe was reflected in the interior of this precious canopy, where the total contents of the cosmos could be seen: limitless mansions of suns and moons and stellar bodies, and every kind of being that exists across the universe. That was the vision and power of the Buddha.

So you can see we're not in regular time anymore here.

And then the Licchavi Ratnakara said, "Pure are your eyes and pure is your thought, immeasurable is your virtue." All that the Buddha sees can be seen with the eyes of holiness, can be seen with beauty. And so the image of surrounding the universe with this parasol of jewels is really to see that there's beauty everywhere around us.

Thomas Merton—if you go into the center of Louisville, Kentucky, there's a placard at 4th Street that celebrates a passage where Thomas Merton came out of years as a Christian contemplative and was walking down the street, and then had this revelation that everyone he passed, he said, was shining like the sun. He said, "I could see a secret beauty born in them, behind every eye, that is inviolable and untouchable." And he said, "The only problem with seeing this way is that you want to fall down and worship each one as they go by."

You know, there are all these roadside billboards and signs and national historic markers. This is the only historic marker I know for a mystical experience in the U.S. But it's like Allen Ginsberg's "Footnote to Howl," where he says, "Holy, holy, holy, the world is holy. This whole world holy, the skyscrapers and the pavements and the cafeteria filled with the millions holy, the mysterious rivers of tears under the streets"—all of it is holy. He has this vision of the sacredness of life under this great canopy.

So this is where the teaching begins. And the thing is that we do know this in some way. I can remember coming out of a long retreat, or finishing some study with a remarkable shaman, Don Jose Rios, who was at that time 103 years old. He was one of the great shamans of the Huichol Indians, of the Huichol Sierras of Mexico. And I did some peyote ceremonies with him. We'd sit up all night and shake our rattles and trip out—whatever—and do our chanting. And then I became a redwood tree and I became a salmon and so forth. And I remember the morning when the sun rose, that everything sparkled like it was a jewel.

And you all know this. This isn't just something that's fictional or drug-induced. It's the reality. We live in this mystery that's shining. It's what Thomas Merton saw. He said, "There I was in the monastery looking for that which is holy, and I needed to walk down the shopping street in Louisville, and then I saw it."

And that's really what it means, in the turning of the seasons, to see with a different kind of light.

So here's the Buddha offering his teachings. And then, under this great parasol where we can see the beauty of life as it is, that we participate in—then what happens is the Buddha hears that a certain bodhisattva named Vimalakirti, who is a lay person, not a monk or nun, is ill. And he wants to send all the great enlightened disciples to go and take care of him. This is one of the tasks of someone who awakens: that you care for the world and you care for those who need care.

So he turns to all the enlightened ones around him and says, "Would you go and attend to Vimalakirti and see what he needs, on my behalf?" Because what we know is that he's a remarkable being. He's a lay person who lives with the pure heart of a monastic. He appears to be adorned with ornaments, yet he's endowed with the simplicity of a hermit. He seems to eat and drink, and yet his nourishment really comes from the heart of meditation. And yet he's willing to enter the world to bring the spirit of love to every corner of the universe.

And so he's decided to live his life as a lay person. He goes into the casinos and teaches people about not being caught in attachment—that's the realm of the hungry ghost known as Las Vegas. He goes into the cabarets and into the bordellos and teaches people about sacred connection. He demonstrates freedom, and he's not afraid to go anywhere.

But he's ill now, so you have to go and take care of him.

And it goes on to say that he deliberately made himself ill so that others would come and take care of him. And I remember—I don't know how many of you saw the Mr. Rogers movie, but if you didn't see it, it's really kind of wonderful.

And I had mistakenly said the other day that Mr. Rogers had said something, but it turns out it was Mr. Rogers' mother who had said this. She said to him, when there's a tragedy or a difficulty in this world—an earthquake, a tsunami, a hurricane as they had in Houston—don't pay attention to the suffering so much. I mean, we need to, but instead look for the helpers.

And there you are, whether it's an earthquake or whether it's the fires or whatever, and you start to see people rushing in from every side—the firefighters and the medical people. In Texas, it was the people in their airboats coming from Louisiana and Mississippi saying, "We will go and get the people who are on the roofs, we'll get the people whose pets are lost." And there's this outpouring of love that happens when we're in trouble.

And this is Vimalakirti deliberately making himself appear sick so that he constellates or brings forth the love that's there, and then he can teach people. Part of what's true about this is that Vimalakirti is deliberately turning himself toward that which is difficult.

Anybody in this room not have difficulties? Please raise your hand. You can have your fifteen dollars back, right? It's part of human incarnation. It's part of what we are. And so we can either run from it or we can turn toward it—turn toward it in a way that in some fashion ennobles us.

This is from Zen teacher Karlfried Dürckheim. He says, "The person who's really on the way, when they fall upon hard times in the world, will not as a consequence turn to those friends who offer refuge and comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they'll seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themself over and over to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

And so if one wants to discover the great heart of compassion—to break the heart open, really—if one wants to discover your own dignity and courage, instead of running away or being in denial, which our culture fancies is a good way to deal with stuff in the world, you actually turn toward it in your own life, and you trust that your heart is big enough to hold it all.

When I teach, I sometimes carry this picture. This is Vedran Smailović, who was the cellist of Sarajevo during the Balkan War when Bosnia and Serbia and Croatia were at war. Sarajevo was besieged for three years—a beautiful city. There was mortar fire and rockets. No one could get in and out except some UN helicopters, and people would be killed by the mortar fire.

Vedran, who was a cellist in the National Symphony, would put on his tux, take a little folding chair, and the next day go out to where the mortar had struck, and he would play this beautiful music so the people of the city wouldn't give up hope. This picture is him playing in the bombed-out National Library of Sarajevo.

So what do we do in these times? And I think about it, and I guess I have to get real with you. Trudy, my beloved Trudy, and I went down to Tijuana to visit some of the two largest migrant shelters there, to bring clothes and things that people could use. We went partly because one of the teachers she'd trained at Spirit Rock ran meditation groups there, for both the men's shelter and women's shelter.

In the best of the shelters, they also helped some of the men get work, even temporary work in Tijuana. They had wraparound services—legal services and health services and planning for what would happen if you do cross the border or if you don't. Here are your possibilities, and here's some work you can do for the couple of months that you can stay here. It was amazing. There was a sense of dignity and empowerment because they were being treated respectfully.

But here's the tough poem, written just a few days ago, by Gustavo Barahona-López:

Every day I open class with a morning circle. Nineteen seven- and eight-year-olds sit on a colorful rug, talk about their favorite color, ideal superpowers, how they feel, or who they'll be when they grow up.

At recess, I read about a seven-year-old who died in border control custody after navigating the New Mexican desert. Her name is Jakelin Caal Maquín.

I begin to wonder, did she make walking through the desert a game? Count the number of cacti? Make messages with stones in the sand? I wonder if she went to school. Did she have to leave midway through the year to work the strawberry fields or water the donkeys like my father?

I imagine her in my classroom. Would she color desert sunrises, or would the deep sunset reds and oranges be her inspiration? I wonder if she knew where she was going. What was America to her?

I wonder if she spoke K'iche' or English or Spanish or Mom. I wonder if she knew her times tables. What is 15,000 children times two parents in a different detention facility? My students know any number of bottles of water times border patrol equals zero. Did she know the definition of terror, or did she call it fear? The not knowing tears. Who was she? Who would she have become? Who have we lost?

I read this poem because these are our children. And not just to have an emotional moment, but actually to say: if you were to reflect for her—whatever your politics, whatever your point of view about immigration—the reality is that there are these people in this circumstance. The international governments around the world, with 70 million refugees, have not really dealt with it.

And if you could do something in these next weeks, one small gesture—to give something, to call your representative, whatever it happens to be—if you could do one little thing as a gift to those children, or to those who are in that bardo in between things, why not do that as part of the things you do in this turning of the year? Really think about it. What would that be?

Because we get insulated, and we also get overwhelmed because there's so much. What do we do? Climate change. What do we do? Syria. What do we do? Darfur is still happening. What do we do about homelessness? They almost want you to feel like you can't do anything. It's a lie. It's completely untrue. You have agency, you have gifts, and you have the capacity to reach your hand out and mend some part of the world. And I don't think anything else really satisfies our soul as much as that.

So here we are with Vimalakirti, and he decides to make himself sick after going to the bordellos and the casinos and everything else, and bring all those healers together. But when he makes himself sick, he also gives them teachings about how it's all a dream. Now, when you're sick, it doesn't feel like a dream. It feels like a bad dream, right? It's not like a star at dawn and a flash of lightning in a summer cloud. But yet he offers a teaching that says: who are we really?

I was recently with Ram Dass in Hawaii, teaching together. Ram Dass is now 87, in a wheelchair. Trudy and I went to join him and Joseph Goldstein and Sharon Salzberg, our dear friends. And Ram Dass mostly teaches love now. He says, "I love everything. I love you and you and you. I love the whole group, every single one of you, and your children and your parents, however they treated you. I still love them."

On his big altar where he has Quan Yin and the Buddha and Mother Mary and his Maharaji, his guru, and Gandhi and a hundred other figures—he also used to have Dick Cheney in the middle. Now the image has been replaced by Donald Trump. And he says, "Of course I love..." He said, "I love the walls and the ceilings and the lights and the shoes that are out there. In fact, I love this dirty carpet." Somebody, one of his students, got a piece of that dirty carpet and put it in a gold frame and sent it to him saying, "Put this on your altar"—which he did, next to the picture of his guru.

Anyway, we were sitting with Ram Dass and Trudy asked him, "Are you in much pain these days?" Knowing that it was pretty much so. He's been in a wheelchair for 20 years, and there's been a different kind of infection. "Yeah, my feet," he said. "This is going on." And she knew that. "And how about here? Do you have pain there?" "Oh, yeah."

And then he paused for a minute, looked up, smiled this kind of amazing smile, and he said, "I love my pain." And it wasn't a masochistic kind of thing at all. It was just like, "I love life, I love everything." And there's this kind of field around him that says who you are is not your body.

As Thich Nhat Hanh said—and he's ninety years old in his wheelchair after a stroke—"This body is not me." You can honor it and love it and care for it, but I'm not limited by this body. I'm life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Look at the sky and the ocean filled with stars. Since before time, I am them. I've been free. Birth and death are only doors open, through which our spirits pass sacred thresholds on our journey. Birth and death are the game of hide and seek. Come and hold my hand and we'll meet again and again in this dance.

So this is where Vimalakirti is coming from. All these people are visiting him sick and he's giving a whole different level of teachings. And it's very playful the way he teaches. But this group of enlightened disciples of the Buddha don't want to go visit Vimalakirti because he's given them a hard time every time they go and talk with him. They'll sit with him and he'll ask them for their teachings. They'll tell him beautiful teachings and he'll say, "Well, not quite right." And then he'll correct them and say, "This is still kind of dualistic."

So I'll give you an example. Ananda, the Buddha's beloved attendant and one of the people that in the stories is supposed to be the most kind-hearted person—the Buddha himself had gotten sick and it seemed that going out and getting some milk would be a good thing to help him. So Ananda goes out with his alms bowl, and in some cases, if you're asked by householders, "Is there anything I can offer you?" Ananda would say, "Yes, you could give me some milk for the Blessed One."

So he goes through the town and Vimalakirti sees him and says, "What are you doing?" He said, "I'm out to get milk for the Buddha who has an illness and I think it will help." And Vimalakirti says, "An illness? Reverend Ananda, the body of the Buddha is like diamonds. It's beyond good and evil, beyond sick and well. How could disease or discomfort touch such an awakened one? You insult him by going out for milk. You have to understand true liberation is not bound by these small concepts of body and healing and sickness. That's all duality." Vimalakirti is a non-dual kind of guy.

And Ananda shrinks back and says, "All right, I take your point, but what am I to do? It may all be non-dual, but what am I to do?" And Vimalakirti goes on, he says, "The Buddha is like the vast sky and the shining stars. How could you get milk for that? You don't understand what you're doing in this world."

Ananda feels confused and sad, and then all of a sudden the Buddha in his mind hears this conversation, and he says, "Ananda, the householder Vimalakirti speaks to you of deep truth, yes. Nevertheless, since the Buddha has appeared in this time as a human being, with the difficulties that humans have, he teaches the world by acting lowly and humble. And therefore, Ananda, do not be ashamed and go and get me some milk."

And what you can hear in this, it's actually quite playful. The whole thing is playful. Like, what level do you want to dance on? You know, as Ram Dass likes to say, you need to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number. And you kind of have to have them both in your heart at the same time.

And I remember, there were some big demonstrations during Occupy that happened in Oakland. And our dear friends, our sister-brother meditation center, the East Bay Meditation Center in Oakland—which is the single most diverse dharma center I know on the planet, it's really quite wonderful and amazing—anyway, they were close to downtown. And so they were out there with everybody at Occupy.

And because it was all happening, there was also some concern about—how shall we say it—the inequalities of our current financial system. There were demonstrators at some of the big banks, and the banks closed their doors during the demonstrations. The people inside were still on site doing their work, but the doors were closed—though it's all glass there.

So they went outside the bank, the closest big bank to them, and they got a big stack of one dollar bills. They stood by the door of the bank and started giving money to everybody who walked up. Just to mess with the minds of the people inside the bank. "You've come to the bank for money? Here, we should share it."

This is a little bit of the spirit of Vimalakirti. He basically messes with you until you go, "Okay, I surrender. I see that there's something bigger that I have to pay attention to." And you can be playful with it as well.

So they go to see Vimalakirti—or they're about to go see him; they haven't even gone there yet. One of them asks, "Where does he reside and how does he sit?" And they describe the kind of seat that Vimalakirti takes, but the passage I love most is where Vimalakirti sits on the seat of love—because it expands to all beings. He rises up from the seat of love and exudes or distributes the qualities of love to all that he touches. He sits on the seat of love.

Here we are, coming to practice together as we do, and the invitation is to sit with loving awareness and attend to your own breath, to the emotions that arise—your sadness and your joy and your longing and your love—to attend to the way your mind makes stories, and then to come back and live in the reality of the present more fully, not so lost in those stories, so that you can be here for the person in front of you and the way that you drive and the things you tend in your work and the things you care about in the world, including yourself.

What is your seat? Is it a seat of love?

Here you learn these trainings, not just for yourself, but also to see what it means to live with an awakened heart.

Someone who sits here wrote me a story about a shipyard he works with in Seattle. Typically there are 700 people working at the yard. Twice a week he leads a group sit where anyone in the yard and the company can meditate, followed by a talking stick check-in circle. Racial and gender issues are being addressed. Now many of the trades start their shift with a short meditation and check-in. There are trees being planted in what was a desolate yard. It's spotless. It feels alive. Today it's a much safer place to work, and as you might expect, more profitable since they've implemented this whole human dharma approach. All of this has taken place since last year, only by bringing a few of the seeds that he learned here on retreat.

I find it a really beautiful story. What it says is that when you plant beautiful seeds, as Vimalakirti teaches, the world responds. I think it was Thoreau who said, "Convince me you have a seed there, and I'm prepared to expect miracles"—because this is how it works. The seeds we plant and water are what will grow.

Some of you know that Denis Mukwege was a physician who gave a speech to the UN decrying the horror of mass rape in Congo. He'd been tending a clinic for women who'd been raped and women with all kinds of other medical problems for quite a long time. Because Congo is in such conflict, at some point after he came to the UN, gunmen invaded his home and threatened to kill him and his wife and daughters. He had guards who stopped them. He left the Congo shortly thereafter.

And the poor women who lived all around the clinic sold their harvest and bought him a plane ticket to come back. They said, "You've made our life livable and bearable. We know that you feel you're in danger. We will do what we can to protect you. We're going to give of the little bit that we have, all of us, to make sure that you're part of our community."

It says something like this in the text: if you live on the seat of love and if you plant those seeds, it's not just you—something really mysterious happens in the world around you. And this is quite possible for all of us.

So then they do go to visit Vimalakirti to console the invalid, as it's said.

And one of the greatest of the disciples, Manjushri, goes and asks Vimalakirti where he's been. And Vimalakirti says, "Well, I've been everywhere—to the hell realms and the realm of the jealous gods." That's, by the way, Washington, D.C. The hell realms, I'm sorry to say, are in Darfur and Syria, but some other places that we know that are closer as well. "I've been to all of those places."

And they come in, and then one of the great enlightened monks around the Buddha—but these are all foils in this story—one of his wisest disciples, Sariputra, comes in and says, "Where can we sit? There are no chairs." And Vimalakirti looks at him, sort of teasing him, and says, "Where did I get the chairs? Did you come here for the sake of the Dharma, or did you come for the sake of a chair? What are you looking for?" And Sariputra says, "Of course, the Dharma." Again, there's this sort of little back and forth.

And then Vimalakirti says, "Well, where are the best chairs in the great galaxies?" And one of the disciples said, "Oh, this Buddha who lives over there has magnificent thrones that are 84,000 feet high and they're covered with jewels and lotuses and peacock feathers and all these things." And he says, "Let there be chairs." And then by his own magic, the room expands so that 100,000 enlightened beings from all the galaxies gather and sit in those chairs, along with a few chairs for the guests who've arrived.

So again, it really speaks to the possibility of imagination but also the generosity of spirit. You may not have anything, but if you open your mind and your heart when someone comes in, that makes the magic. It doesn't matter if they sit on the floor if the heart and mind is open—people sit in the midst of something that's beautiful and magnificent.

And then the room expands to an inconceivably large size and all these hundreds of thousands of enlightened beings on these vast thrones are seated around watching the dialogue. And then Vimalakirti is saying, "This is nothing." He goes on: "Reverend Sariputra, the bodhisattva who lives in inconceivable liberation, the liberation of all beings, can pour into a single pore of his skin all the waters of the four great oceans without injuring the water animals such as fish, tortoises, crocodiles, frogs, and other creatures—without them even being aware of a problem. The whole operation is visible without any injury or disturbance to the frogs and the alligators and all such creatures. Now, such a bodhisattva can reach his right hand and pick up a whole galaxy like this and open it for you to see and understand, and bring illumination to all the beings that are there."

So this is the kind of story that it is. And Sariputra says, "Okay, I see that you're someone of some great attainment. But why is this? What is this teaching us?"

A poem from Mary Oliver:

What can I say that I've not said before?
So I'll say it again.
The leaf has a song in it.
Stone is the face of patience.
Inside the river there's an unfinished story,
and you are somewhere in it,
and it will never end until all ends.
Take your busy heart to the art museum and the chamber of commerce, but take it also to the forest and the hills.
The song you heard singing in the leaf when you were a child is singing still.

I am of years lived, so far seventy-four, and the leaf is still singing.

And so she's speaking to the mystery that Vimalakirti is teaching—that when you see rightly, as the poet Hafiz says, the leaves on the trees become like pages in the holy books. And you don't have to look any further than where you are to see that which is sacred and mysterious.

I mean, how did we get into this human life? You think you're your body? Come on. It changes. You have to take care of it. You rent it like Avis—you've got to turn it in at some point. But yes, you use it. But it's not who we are. There's a spirit that was born into you. And that will leave your body when you die. You'll see. You wait. Float out of your body. Light. All that stuff.

It happens to be true. You don't have to believe me. But when it happens, remember I told you. You're not just this body. And you're not just the conditioning of your culture or your parents. I mean, those are really small potatoes. Yes, they can make a lot of suffering in different ways when we believe them. But Vimalakirti is saying, don't believe that. Believe something so much greater and more magnificent about who you are and what this world is, and see it everywhere that you look.

So then, two more things, and then we do our little ritual.

A goddess who lives in the house there, another enlightened being, comes down to listen. Sariputra said, "How long have you been here?" And she says, "Timeless. I've been with Vimalakirti since the beginning." And then Sariputra says, "Well, you know, I'm glad that you're here. Have you received anything of benefit?" And she said, "Oh, he gives awakening blessings to everyone." And then Sariputra says, "But then why are you still in a woman's body? I mean, don't you have to be a man to be fully awakened?" There is that teaching, you know, in some Buddhist things.

And I remember Dipa Ma, who was this great woman, yogi and master that I studied with, quite an extraordinary being who'd mastered all the realms of meditation and compassion, loving kindness. She just was love. But she also had tremendous power. And her teacher, Munindra, who was also a teacher of mine, they were together at some point. And I mean, she was the kind of person... I never saw it. I kept wanting her to do something magic because her teacher said, "Oh yeah, I've seen her walk through walls. I've seen her appear and disappear." Do all these things that one reads about.

Anyway, at one point he was teaching and he said, "But you have to be a man to become a Buddha. You have to do that in a male body." And Dipa Ma said, "Yeah, I can do anything a man can do. So be quiet." And it was really true. You could feel it.

So in this text, Sariputra is talking to her, and the goddess comes and she covers his body with flower petals. She says, "Here, Sariputra." And he says, "Wait, I'm a monk. I shouldn't have these flower petals." And she says, "You're so caught up on what's pure and what's impure."

And I guess I'll read you a version not in the original text, by my old friend Rick Fields, called "The Short Sutra on the Meeting of the Buddha and the Goddess." I read it because it's somehow a combination of something way beyond me too. This is women's liberation on steroids, let us say.

Thus I have heard: the Buddha was walking along the forest path, walking without arriving anywhere or any thought of arriving, and lotuses shining with morning dew miraculously appeared under every step, soft as silk between the toes of the Buddha, when suddenly out of the turquoise sky, dancing in front of his half-shut inward-looking eyes, shimmering like a rainbow or a spider's web, transparent as the dew on a lotus flower, the goddess appeared, quivering like a hummingbird in the air before him.

She, for she was surely as she as the Buddha could see clearly with his eye of discriminating wisdom, was mostly red in color, though when the light shifted she flashed like a rainbow. She was naked except for the usual flower ornaments goddesses wear. Her long hair was deep blue, her two eyes fathomless pits of space, and her third eye a ring of fire.

The Buddha folded his hands together and greeted the goddess thus: "Oh goddess, why are you blocking my path? Before I saw you I was happily going nowhere, and now I'm not sure where to go."

"You can go around me," said the goddess, twirling on her heels like a bird darting away, but just a little away. "Or you can come after me. This is my forest too, and you can't pretend I'm not here."

With that, the Buddha sat, supple as a snake, solid as a rock, beneath a Bodhi tree that sprang full leaf to shade him. "Perhaps we should have a chat," he said. "After years of arduous practice at the time of the morning star,

I penetrated reality.

And now—not so fast, Buddha. I am reality.

The earth stood still. The oceans paused. The wind itself listened. And a thousand, thousand Arhats, Bodhisattvas, and Dakinis magically appeared to hear what would happen in their conversation.

"I know I take my life in my hands," said the Buddha, "but I am known as the fearless one, so here goes."

And he and the goddess, without further words, exchanged glances. Light rays like sunbeams shot forth so bright that even Sariputra, the all-seeing one, had to turn away. And then they exchanged thoughts, and the illumination was bright as a diamond candle. And then they exchanged mind, and there was a great silence as vast as the universe that contains everything. And then they exchanged bodies and clothes, and the Buddha arose as the goddess, and the goddess arose as the Buddha, and so on back and forth for one hundred thousand kalpas of time.

If you meet the Buddha, you meet the goddess. If you meet the goddess, you meet the Buddha. Not only that—the Buddha is the goddess, and the goddess is the awakened one. And not only that—the Buddha is emptiness, and the goddess is bliss. The goddess is emptiness, and the Buddha is bliss. And this is what and what not you are, and it is true.

There was a similar dialogue in the sutra between the goddess and Sariputra, where she switched bodies with him. He was a little more reluctant than the Buddha in this version, but she did that same bit of a dance. And what it shows in the deepest way is that all our ideas of purity and impurity, all the judgments of the heart, all the notions of who's better and who's worse—all those evaluations are really a limitation. It's possible instead to live with the eyes of love, to see every being you meet as the Buddha, some of them just a little more caught in delusion.

As Ram Dass says, he's put a variety of pictures in the middle of his altar. I do my loving-kindness practice, and I picture some of the despots of the world, and I include them, saying: May you be free from hatred. May you be free from fear. May you be free from delusion. May you too awaken the heart of love. And I can wish that for anybody. I can wish that for anybody.

This text invites us to live in a different reality—and also to see this reality wherever we go, because people are serving one another constantly. Even as we do this talk, there have been a million, ten million acts of goodness in the Bay Area. People cooking grilled cheese sandwiches for their children who really didn't want to eat the broccoli. People stopping at red lights so you can safely pass through the green. People standing in line at the market in a civilized way so that others who arrived before them can be served first. We do this all the time. And we tend to focus on what's problematic.

Here's a poem by Laszlo Slomowicz:

A man is running hard to catch the bus that just left. It's picking up speed but he pulls even—ha!—running, and wraps on its side, and a woman by the window yells to the driver, who stops and opens the accordion door. But the man does not get on. He points back to an old woman who's not run a step in a very long time, shuffling toward the bus. Nor does he leave until he's helped her up both steps, and then walks back slowly, still breathing hard from the fast run, toward us who are waiting for a different bus. What can a group of strangers like us do at a time like this? A time in its own way like when Jesse Owens roared by them all in the Olympics and everyone stood in the stadium and applauded.

Gestures like that happen all the time from people. This is how we can live. And this is really what Vimalakirti points to.

Again from Mary Oliver:

I think of the Buddha's last day. Every morning as the east begins to tear off its many clouds of darkness and send up the first signal—a white fan streaked with pink and violet and green—an old man, he laid down between two sal trees. He might have said anything, knowing it was his final hour.

The light burns upward and settles over the field. Around him the villagers gathered and stretched forward to listen. No doubt he thought of everything that had happened in his vast and difficult life. Slowly, beneath the branches, he raised his head and looked into the face of that expectant crowd. "Make of yourself a light," he said as his last words. Make of yourself a light.

I've never told this story in this way in a teaching before, and I'm not quite sure if it fits at this time, but I hope so. I enjoyed doing it. And I think at the very best, when we had our little break and you remembered something beautiful, the turning of the seasons and the beginning of a new year does get us to stop and listen and look anew—and perhaps look inside at what matters, and live in a fiercer and more illuminated way.

This is quite optional, but I'll tell you what we're going to do with these red cords. Oh, I forgot to say—at the end of the Vimalakirti Sutra, Sariputra is sitting there and he's thinking, "Now, how are you going to feed all these people?" And Vimalakirti looks at him and says, "You mean you came here for teachings and now you're worried about what's for dinner?"

But this is what the mind will do. I love this moment in the text because I know everybody who comes on retreat, at some point they'll be sitting and some amazing or difficult thing will be happening, and they'll think, "I wonder what they're going to serve for lunch"—because the mind has no pride. And the text really illuminates this.

So, if one is to become a bodhisattva—and that of course is your own choice—one of the things that is part of it is to make a vow or set an intention. And my favorite modern bodhisattva vow comes from Diane Ackerman. She writes: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

Not bad for a little bodhisattva vow.

So what I want you to do, before we do this blessing cord, is reflect for a minute on this night. It's not a New Year's resolution, but something in a way deeper than that. If you were to set the compass of your heart and say, "What is it that really matters in the way that I live?"—what would that intention or vow be this evening? And it could be very simple. It doesn't have to be a long poem. It might be as simple as, "I vow to be kind."

Take a moment to quiet and reflect. What would it be? For one often comes into the temple to reset the compass of the heart, to remind yourself. It's all a reminder, really, of what you know most deeply.

And now, having reflected on it, if you have a little piece of paper, write it down—or borrow a piece of paper or pen from somebody near you, or put it in your phone. It helps to do that. And this beautiful goddess of compassion, Kuan Yin, she'll put it in her phone too. There you go. She's listening to the cries of the world through social media and setting her vow. So write it down if you can, in any way that works for you.

And now, having written down the next step—there are two more steps—I'd invite you, if you're comfortable, very quietly and without ancillary conversation, without talking about it, to turn to a person sitting near you and listen to them tell you, or read to you, what their intention is. And then when they're quiet, you tell yours to them. It's a beautiful thing to hear it. And again, by writing it and speaking it, it comes more alive in the heart. So go ahead and do it—not a conversation, but a quiet listening. Two people, or if you need three, if it's more convenient. Each person talks, and then the other talks.

silence

Kind of sweet, isn't it? To hear that. It's not the kind of conversation we usually have. In the Sufi tradition it's called the sobat—a conversation of the heart. To listen to somebody's intention really respectfully, and then to allow your own to be revealed to someone else.

So now, having done that, we get to make our blessing protection cords.

Let me say something for those of you who might be unfamiliar. And again, this is completely optional. We're using a cord or a string which is part of the rituals used across Buddhist Asia, all the way from Afghanistan to Japan and Southeast Asia and beyond. It's used in weddings and in healing and blessings and all kinds of things, and for protection. The reason it's this red color is it's considered to be one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun. I have one from the Dalai Lama.

So you wear your robes into the marketplace. Someone said you're basically a monk or a nun in drag—your real home is the temple, but you're in the marketplace like Vimalakirti, carrying the illuminated heart with you.

I did this with a famous Tibetan lama many years ago. Somebody raised their hand and said, "These are called protection cords. What do they protect you from?" And he said, "Why, yourself, of course—the main protection that people need."

So we need to tie three knots in them to finish tonight. Hold it up.

The first knot is the knot of refuge. For some in the Buddhist tradition, it will be refuge in the Buddha—to see the Buddha in every being you meet. Refuge in dharma, which means the truth—to speak the truth and see what's true and honor it in this life. Refuge in sangha, the community—the recognition that we can't do it alone, that we're interwoven in the field of life.

But for you, it may be the sacred in any other form. It might be religious or non-religious, but hold your cord and reflect: What is your deep refuge for yourself that's holy or sacred, that you trust to turn to, to illuminate? And when you're clear on your refuge, when you take that refuge, then tie a knot in the cord—to see every being as potential Buddha in front of you, or however you manifest your refuge. To take refuge in that which is sacred.

Knot number two is the knot of compassion. As you hold your cord, reflect on the teachings of non-harming—that we can move through this world, and if we dedicate ourselves to compassion for ourselves and others, then in word and deed we can act and speak in ways that foster wellbeing and harmony for ourselves and others, and avoid those actions that cause harm.

So reflect on a dedication to compassion. The world so longs for it. A care for all beings. Compassion is more than empathy—it's the movement of the heart to care for yourself and others, to alleviate suffering and bring wellbeing. And in whatever way you find yourself drawn to make a vow, an intention, of living with a compassionate heart to care for living beings, tie the second knot in the cord—to refrain from causing harm. And already this gives you dignity and liberty and joy and awakening to do so.

And then the final knot is what you just spoke to another, what you wrote—the intention or the vow, the sacred intention that you made coming to the temple tonight. Remembering what you intended and what you spoke and wrote, tie the third knot in the cord, which symbolizes your commitment to this intention.

And now your blessing protection cord is fully activated. If you would like to wear it, even for a little while, you can either put it around the back of your neck and let it hang down—don't tie it on yet—or you can wrap it around your wrist two or three times and let the two ends hang down. And then in a moment when we end, I'll invite someone sitting near you to tie yours on with a silent blessing, and you can do the same. But not quite yet.

So I want us just to sit for a minute or two in silence.

And with all the measure of tears in this world and the difficulties of human incarnation in individual and collective ways, and with all the unbearable beauty and magnificence of this world—you, oh nobly born, as the sutras begin, you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones—remember the great heart of love and compassion that was born in you.

Trust it.

Rest in it.

Make of yourself a light.

So you can now turn to a person near you and they'll tie on your cord if you wish.

Drive safely out there. It's dark. Be polite on the roads—there are lots of people. Take the extra cookies if there are any left for your friends or children you run into. Come back to Spirit Rock in the new year, and go from the temple carrying something beautiful that's always been inside you.

Thank you, thank you, thank you.

Good night.

CHAPTER 84

Healing and Liberation through Mindful Loving Awareness

Jack Kornfield · 1h10

> In this rich and story-filled teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together the ancient wisdom of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta with contemporary stories of healing and transformation. He opens with a remarkable account of Yeshe Dunden, the Dalai Lama's physician, demonstrating profound listening at Yale Medical School—a story that illuminates what it means to truly receive another being with complete attention and care.
> Kornfield guides practitioners through the four foundations of mindful loving awareness: the body, feelings, mind, and dhamma. He explores how we can bring non-judgmental attention to our physical experience, learning to hold both pleasure and pain with compassion rather than fear or dissociation. Moving through the territory of emotions, he emphasizes that liberation comes not from escaping our feelings but from expanding our capacity to hold the full range of human experience—the grief and joy, loneliness and connection, fear and love.
> The teaching addresses how this same quality of deep listening applies to the body of the Earth, sharing Christiana Figueres' story of visiting Plum Village before the Paris Climate Accord and how the understanding of interdependence transformed international negotiations. Kornfield invites practitioners to recognize that their thoughts and stories, while powerful, are not their true identity—that resting in loving awareness itself offers freedom from the conditioned patterns of mind. The talk culminates in an invitation to remember our fundamental dignity and the freedom that can only be found within our own hearts.

So please let yourself get settled again.

Sometimes I wonder—is this a big cocktail party, or is it actually that we need connection? I think the latter is true, and there's something kind of beautiful about it. Not to put down cocktails completely; there are places for parties. But when I actually listen and see and hear—because there are many people here whom I've seen in other months and other weeks and other years—there is something beautiful about feeling connection and community, whether you've just come and met someone or not. I appreciate that.

I'd like to share some teachings tonight, and perhaps some reflections as we go. For your part, you can take this as another form of meditation—a meditation of reflection or contemplation. If something in it seems valuable and rings true in your heart, beautiful, take that. And if it doesn't ring true, let it go. There's no quiz at the end, no grades or anything. It's really more a reminder, at best, of something that you already know.

Over the past few Monday nights this fall, I've been offering a series of teachings based on some big stories. Somehow I've become a storyteller. I've always loved stories, and it feels like a beautiful and fruitful way to teach. So I have at least one long story tonight, and maybe some others, to weave in for your reflection and understanding.

The theme tonight—going back to one I've taught in previous years—is healing, and in particular the quality of mindfulness, or mindful loving awareness, that brings both healing and liberation.

If you look at the texts, the great discourse on the path of mindfulness from the ancient Buddhist teachings begins: "My friends, there is a most wonderful way for living beings to realize purification, overcome directly grief and sorrow, end pain and anxiety, travel the path of awakening, and realize liberation. This is the establishment of mindfulness, of mindful loving awareness."

Established in four ways, a practitioner establishes mindful loving awareness in the body, in feelings, in thought and in the mind, and then in the dharma—in the principles that govern life. When you become mindful and aware of these dimensions of your human life, this becomes a gateway for your own wellbeing, happiness, liberation, joy, and of course, healing.

To set the tone for the story that will come shortly: when I was living in Southeast Asia for a number of years as a Buddhist monk, and also in the Peace Corps working on remote village tropical medicine teams, I went to South Vietnam during what we call the Vietnam War—what they call the American War, because they had a whole series of wars with the French, and we were one of them.

I went in part to visit a temple run by the Coconut Monk, as he was called, who lived primarily on coconuts. It was on an island in the Mekong Delta—an island of peace. He was a great peacemaker monk, and I wanted to learn from him and his community.

I took a boat through the Mekong Delta during a time of heavy fighting. You could see helicopter gunships and firefights on the horizon. The odd thing—for those of you who have experience being around war—is that it takes place here, and then in the next village, other people are shopping and doing what they need to do to keep their lives going, because we're human beings and we still have to live.

The boat pulled up to the dock and I went into the temple. The monks were wearing robes with a patch that showed a broken assault rifle, snapped in half. It said in half a dozen languages: "We will fight no more." It was a refuge in the middle of the war.

I paid my respects and found some of the teachings. At the far end of this island, there was a hill, and on top of it stood a very big statue of the Buddha—perhaps forty feet tall. Next to him was a forty-foot-tall statue of Jesus, and they had their arms around each other's shoulders.

And there were the helicopter gunships, and the battle in the distance. This was the place where young men who didn't want to enter the military would come and become monks in order to be peaceful. It was as if those two statues were standing there saying, "Hey, we're brothers in this, and there's another way to live in this world than what you see out there." It was really beautiful.

Both the Buddha and Jesus were known as great healers, great physicians—healers of body, healers of heart, and healers of spirit. Healing, and beyond healing—not just healing of the body, but healing of who we are as human beings together—comes first out of a capacity for deep listening, a sense of connection with life that lets us understand.

So here is the first story. It comes from Richard Selzer, a wonderful professor at the medical school at Yale University, who is also a beautiful essayist. I received a note from him a few years ago because I had read some of his stories in my talks, and he was grateful that I shared them. I felt honored to receive that note.

Here is his story:

On the bulletin board in the front hall of the hospital where I work at Yale appeared an announcement. "Yeshe Dunden," it read, "will make rounds at six o'clock on June 10th." The particulars were then given, followed by a notation: "Yeshe Dunden is the personal physician to the Dalai Lama."

I am not so leathery a skeptic that I would knowingly ignore an emissary from the gods. Not only might such an attitude be inimical to one's earthly well-being, it could take care of eternity as well. Thus, on the morning of June 10th, I joined the clutch of white coats waiting in the small conference room adjacent to the ward selected for rounds.

The air in the room was heavy with ill-concealed dubiety and suspicion of bamboozlement. You can picture it.

At precisely six o'clock, he materialized—a short, golden, barrel-shaped man dressed in a sleeveless robe of saffron and maroon. His scalp was shaven, and the only visible hair was a scanty black line above each hooded eye. He bowed in greeting while his young interpreter made the introduction.

Yeshe Dunden, we were told, would examine a patient selected by a member of the staff. The diagnosis was unknown to Yeshe Dunden, as it was to us. The examination would take place in our presence, after which we would reconvene in the conference room where Yeshe Dunden would discuss the case. We were further informed that for the past two hours, Yeshe Dunden had purified himself by bathing, fasting, and prayer.

I, having breakfasted well, performed only the most sultry of ablutions, and given no thought at all to my soul, glanced furtively at my fellows. Suddenly we seemed a soiled, uncouth lot.

The patient had been awakened early and told she was to be examined by a foreign doctor, and had been asked to produce a fresh specimen of urine. So when we entered her room, the woman showed no surprise. She had long ago taken on that mixture of compliance and resignation that is the face of chronic illness. This was to be but another in an endless series of tests and examinations.

Yeshe Dunden stepped to the bedside while the rest of us stood apart, watching. For a long time, he gazed at the woman, favoring no part of her body with his eyes, but seeming to fix his glance at a place just above her supine form. I too studied her. No physical sign or obvious symptom gave a clue to the nature of her disease.

At last he took her hand, raising it in both of his own. Now he bent over the bed in a kind of crouching stance, his head drawn down into the collar of his robe. His eyes were closed as he felt for her pulse, and in a moment he had found the spot. For the next half hour he remained thus, suspended above the patient like some exotic golden bird with folded wings, holding the pulse of the woman beneath his fingers, cradling her hand in his. All the power of the man seemed to have been drawn down into this one purpose. It was palpation of the pulse raised to the state of high ritual.

From the foot of the bed where I stood, it was as though he and the patient had entered a special place of isolation, of apartness, about which a vacancy hovered and across which no violation was possible. After a moment, the woman rested back upon her pillow, and from time to time she raised her head to look at the strange figure above her, then sank back once more. I could not see their hands joined in a correspondence that was exclusive, intimate—his fingertips receiving the voice of her sick body through the rhythm and throb she offered at her wrist.

All at once I was envious—not of him, not of Yeshe Dunden for his gift of beauty and holiness, but of her. I wanted to be held like that, touched so, received. And I knew that I, who have palpated a hundred thousand pulses, have not felt a single one.

At last, Yeshe Dunden straightened, gently placed the woman's hand upon the bed, and stepped back. The interpreter produced a small wooden bowl and two sticks. Yeshe Dunden poured a portion of the urine specimen into the bowl and proceeded to whip the liquid with the two sticks. This he did for several minutes until a foam was raised. Then, bowing above the bowl, he inhaled the odor three times. He set the bowl down and turned to leave. All this while he had not uttered a single word.

As he neared the door, the woman raised her head and called out to him in a voice at once urgent and serene. "Thank you, doctor," she said, and touched with her other hand the place he had held on her wrist, as though to recapture something that had visited there. Yeshe Dunden turned back for a moment to gaze at her, then stepped into the corridor. Rounds were at an end.

We were seated once more in the conference room. Yeshe Dunden spoke now for the first time, in soft Tibetan sounds I had never heard before. He had barely begun when the young interpreter began to translate, the two voices in tandem—a bilingual fugue, one chasing the other, like the chanting of monks.

He spoke of winds coursing through the body of the woman, currents that break against barriers, eddying. These vortices are in her blood, he said—the last spendings of an imperfect heart. Between the chambers of her heart, long, long before she was born, a wind had come and blown open a deep gate that must never be opened. Through it charge the full waters of her river, as the mountain stream cascades in springtime, battering, knocking loose the land, and flooding her breath.

Thus he spoke, and now we were silent.

"May we have the diagnosis?" a professor asked.

The host of these rounds, the one man who knew, answered: "Congenital heart disease. Interventricular septal defect with resultant heart failure."

A gateway in the heart, I think, that must not be opened. Through it charges the full waters that flood her breath.

So, here then is the doctor, listening to the sounds of the body to which the rest of us are deaf. He is more than doctor. He is priest. I know the doctor to the gods is pure, pure healing. The doctor to humans stumbles, most often wounds. Their patients must die, as must they. But now and then it happens, as I make my own rounds, that I hear the sound of his voice like an ancient Buddhist prayer, its meaning long since forgotten, only the music remaining, and then a jubilation possesses me and I feel myself touched by something divine.

I had a chance to be with Yeshe Dunden some years ago when I was dealing with a neurological problem and got misdiagnosed, so it seemed way more serious than it turned out to be, fortunately. I went to see him. He took my pulses and looked at me, scanning, and I was in heaven. "Yeshe Dunden, fix me," you know. "I have a bad diagnosis"—that turned out not to be so. And he shook his head. He said, "It's not bad, really. Here, take these little pills." They sort of looked like rabbit droppings, basically—these little dark Tibetan medicine things. "Take these and do these meditations and you'll be fine." And somehow I felt much better even without taking that medicine, just seeing him.

But there's something in this story about our wish to be so held, so received, so respected as a human being by one another that I find inspiring and moving. And in fact, the whole world—the world itself, our family, our gardens, our co-workers, whatever the circumstances—the prisoners and the laborers and the guards and the co-workers and the managers and the parents and the teens and the grandparents, people actually do want to be received and understood and known.

And Yeshe Dunden in some ways shows the power of the listening heart, even in the face of the great reality of impermanence and suffering and illness and death—which it turns out is going to happen to you, by the way, if it hasn't yet. It's coming, really. I'm just giving you a little hint here. But it is. It's part of human incarnation. It's what's happened.

But in the same way, this also speaks to what it means to pay attention in a world that's riven by injustice and racism and conflict and climate difficulty. How do we listen to the pulse of the world? How do we listen to one another?

I remember sitting with a woman who was toward the end of her very painful chemotherapy. She had advanced metastatic cancer, and she said the chemo was like fire moving through her body. It was so painful. It was like being in hell. So I sat with her and held her hand for a while, and then I invited her to close her eyes as best she could and imagine somehow that the medicine coming through her was also purifying her, that it was leading her to a different body and a different way of being. We did a whole long visualization of a great healing temple and many things.

As she did it, she said, "Wow, yes, I can feel the fire. But when I feel it as something purifying, it comes surrounded by this beautiful green light and this lovely spirit, and all of a sudden I realize that this is exactly what I need for my body." It was the fact that she'd been resisting it—and understandably so, it was terribly painful and terribly frightening—but somehow as she let herself come close to it, like Yeshe Dunden touching that pulse, it transformed in some remarkable way.

And people transform when we let ourselves come close to them. Basically, loving awareness allows us to have a trust in the greater capacity of the heart to hold this human incarnation with all its tainted glory, its beauty and its pain, in a very different way when we listen deeply.

So the foundations of mindfulness—or mindful loving awareness—that I read in that little piece of the ancient text: mindfulness of body, of feelings, of mind, and of dharma. Let me talk about each of them as a reflection for you.

Loving awareness of what is called the body in the body—not some idea, but the direct experience. Now, there are different ways we can approach our human body. One is we can fear for it, worry about it, grasp it, live with a kind of bodily anxiety. Another is we can dissociate from it and just go about our business, not caring about our bodies. If I were to ask, a lot of hands would go up on that side. It's the line from James Joyce that I often use: his character Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body. And you get one or the other, and you're out of touch.

But what happens is you're invited to meditate. And meditation isn't about becoming a good meditator. It's really a training to become present for your own life. As you sit, the invitation is to be with this body and to listen to it and learn from it. And so what you'll notice is that you sit and there are sensations of pleasure and pain. Anybody not have that? And they're not necessarily a mistake.

They're the body showing itself to you. They're part of it.

As you sit with those sensations, you can also begin to notice that if you resist the pain and contract around it, if you look closely, it lasts longer and you suffer more. But if you can receive the physical pain in your body with loving awareness and say, "Yes," just as you would hold a crying child—all right, I have this new grandson who's now three months old, so I've been doing a bunch of diaper changes and things like that. But once the kid is fed and diapered and whatever and they're still crying, what do you do? You hold them. You give that sense of holding, bodily care. And after a while, they kind of settle down.

In some way, that same loving awareness can be brought to this body, to the place that's hurt, to the tension that you carry because you go through the day and there are difficulties. Your jaw tightens and your shoulders get tight and your back, and then you sit. You're very quiet and easeful, and your body hurts. It's not because you're meditating wrong. It's saying, "Hey, remember me? You've tightened me. Now it's time for all this to release itself." It will release when you bring a loving awareness to it. It opens. It heals itself in some deep way.

So the question is, how do you touch this body? Do you touch it with fear or longing or love? There's something kind of beautiful and pure about bringing attention to the body without judgment. Without judgment.

And it's not an easy thing, because the whole culture is selling you how a body should look—the magazine cover ones that are done in the right light with makeup and then airbrushed on top of it, and Photoshop. I mean, that is nuts. And then we think, "Okay, I look in the mirror. I don't look like that. Something is wrong with me. I'm the wrong color. I'm the wrong size. My thighs are too thin or too thick, or my hair, what's left of it, isn't in the right place." The culture teaches us to judge our body rather than to love it.

This is a radical act. When the Buddha said there is a healing that takes place when you bring a loving awareness to the body—to that which is painful and also that which is joyful and beautiful—because the body is an instrument of tremendous joy and ease. When you bring a good spirit into the body, the body can feel it and says, "Okay, you remembered me. You care for me." Even if the world is saying your body isn't cover material or whatever, your body's saying, "Oh yes, she did it." It feels the love.

Here's a different story, just for the fun of it. This is more the spirit of it, but I'm thinking about this also because I have some dear friends who've been in hospitals lately.

"I'm ninety-two years old. I get up every morning at seven a.m. Each day I remind myself: wake up, get up. I talk to my legs. 'Legs, get moving. Legs, you're an antelope.' It's a matter of mind over matter. You have to have the right spirit. I'm out on the street, seven-thirty a.m. sharp. I'm wearing my Honorable Sanitation Commissioner badge they gave me from City Hall. I'm alert, I'm ready, I'm out there. I got my whistle. My job is to help get parked cars off the streets so they can bring in the sanitation trucks and the Wayne broom—the big one, thirty grand for a broom. So when they show up, I go around blowing my whistle to get people to move their cars. I have a great time. People are asleep. They're busy with business. They're busy taking time off from the business. They're busy having a good time. They're busy not having a good time."

Whatever. I don't care. I blow my whistle. I'm all over the place. I don't discriminate either—I go after the sanitation men too. The union got them a coffee break, some coffee. They're having eggs, having bacon, having toast, having French toast. I kid them about it. Then I go right into the restaurant and blow my whistle. They love it. Everybody understands. It's the whistle that gets them. Sometimes I'm having such a laugh I can't even blow it, and then I get back to work. "Schleppers, get moving! We've got to clean the city."

This used to be a beautiful city. People cared. If you didn't pay your rent, the sheriff would come and put your furniture out on the street, but the poorest of the poor would come automatically and drop their pennies and nickels at your house, and put you back into your apartment. That's neighborhood. That's connection.

Now it's different. Things have gotten out of kilter. Hard to say why. People seem to be lost in their thoughts and their own lives. I see them on the streets. Not present. Not that I'm all that different—I'm a schlep myself. I have as many bad habits as anyone. You should see my apartment. Me, Mr. Clean. But I'm trying. Ninety-two and I'm still trying. It's all possible. What can I tell you? I'm not a saint or a wise man. I'm not the two-thousand-year-old man. I'm only ninety-two years old, just a senior citizen. But what do I know that everybody doesn't know? We know. I just go out there in the morning and blow my whistle. That's what I do. You do what you do. Me, I'm having a great time. Wonderful fun. And when people see how much fun I'm having, they have to laugh. What else can they do? And then I hit them with it: "Move your car."

There's something in this story about what it means to love your life. To listen as Yeshe Dunden does, but also to feel that the spirit of your life is part of inhabiting this human body—and to do it with mindful loving awareness.

So close your eyes for a minute. Don't change your posture. Don't get weird about it. Just close your eyes.

It's all right. And it's just a simple reflection as you get quiet. What in your body wants to be listened to? What part of your body? It might be for healing or joy or attention. What does it have to say to you? And sense how you can be present for your body with its pleasures and its joys and its pains and its illness—all of the life of this body—with a free spirit, with attention and care and respect.

Now it turns out that this very same loving awareness of the body is also required for awareness of the body of the earth. Because it turns out your body isn't separate from the body of the earth. Every breath you take dusted Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it came over the Pacific, and also dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor. It's the reality of it. And the water that you drink—the rainwater that comes—picks up the pollution in China or India or Europe or wherever it is, and carries it. We are completely interwoven.

And you don't want to get a little weirder, but the breath that you're breathing in this room, all those other people breathed before you. It's actually very intimate when you go, "That was what she just did with that breath, and him..." Kind of creepy, right? But the fact is that we are in it together. And the whole notion of separateness dissolves. So it's not just your body, it's the earth's body. And to be able to pay attention to your own physical body in the way that we talked about—that brings healing—it also brings healing to the earth itself.

I just came back from this conference, Wisdom 2.0, on technology and mindfulness, with a few thousand people from Silicon Valley and so forth. And of course, climate change was discussed. Some of the big problems were there on the stage: the problems with technology itself, the problems with climate change, the problem with continuing warfare and continuing racism and injustice and economic injustice. How do we tackle these things?

And the first thing, of course, is to see them clearly. Here are the problems. But then to begin to listen more deeply. Is there a way to hold them with mindfulness, with loving awareness, that allows us to respond differently?

A few months ago, when there was a big climate summit in San Francisco held by the state of California, we had a climate day here at Spirit Rock. A few of you might have come to it. I was up here in dialogue with a really remarkable woman named Cristiana Figueres, who is a diplomat from Costa Rica and has mostly been in Europe. She is, or was, the United Nations Special Representative for Climate Change. So she helped to organize the Rio summit, and then she organized the Paris climate meeting.

But she said that as she'd been doing her work, she was getting more and more depressed—partly because of the science showing how fast things are happening, partly also because of the actors (I guess they call them, like in a bad Shakespearean play) the bad actors, which were a lot of the big countries. And you know who is included in that, right? As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi?" Right, it's the U.S. She shared how recalcitrant people were, how selfish really, in certain ways. So she was really depressed.

She told this story. Someone said to her, "You know what you need to do? You need to go to Plum Village." Plum Village is Thich Nhat Hanh's center, the great Vietnamese Zen master's place in southern France. So she went to Plum Village. She began to practice.

If any of you have ever been with Thich Nhat Hanh and seen him walk, it changes your life. Your body goes, "Whoa, that's what it means to walk mindfully." It's just intense and wonderful. He's so amazingly present. And then he sits down with this calm and very, very deep sense of presence and conversation. He embodies somehow what it means to be present on the earth.

She said she sat and she walked, and that already began to soothe her heart. And then she realized, as she listened to the teachings, she understood the very deep teachings of interdependence—that every breath and every drink of water and the earth that we walk on, that we're all in this together in a very different way than she had understood. And Thich Nhat Hanh, of course, gave to her through those practices a kind of revival of her spirit, helping her realize that there's another way of seeing all of this.

So she said, when I went back to the Paris Climate Accord, everyone was in their corner struggling, and the paradigm was the victims and the perpetrators—which countries were doing it to whom. And she said, "I was able to shift the narrative so that instead of victims and perpetrators, we talked about interdependence. And that shift in my own consciousness and the narrative allowed 148 countries to sign on to the Paris Climate Accord."

So you understand—like Yeshe Dunden feeling that pulse, or her going to Plum Village—that to begin to listen to the pulse of the earth, we respond in a different way.

This from Mary Oliver teaches us how to go to the woods:

Ordinarily, I go to the woods alone, with not a single friend, for they are all smilers and talkers and therefore unsuitable. I don't really want to be witnessed talking to the catbirds or hugging the old black oak tree. I have my way of praying, as you no doubt have yours. Besides, when I'm alone, I can become invisible. I can sit on the top of a dune as motionless as an uprise of weeds until the foxes run by unconcerned. I can hear the almost unhearable sound of the roses singing. If you've ever gone to the woods with me, I must love you very much.

This is really that same story of Yeshe Dunden. It's Mary Oliver, our great poet, talking about sitting there and feeling the pulse of life, and then using that love and understanding to make her art, to make her contribution to what allows us to reawaken and reimagine and live this world in a different way.

Oh, so many more things I could say about that, but all right.

The next dimension of mindfulness is mindfulness of feeling. As Don Juan says to Carlos Castaneda, "The most difficult part of the sorcerer's way is to realize that the world is a feeling."

Now that's a really mysterious statement, isn't it? What could he mean by that?

Well, William O. Douglas, Supreme Court Justice, said some years ago that at the Supreme Court where he worked, ninety-plus percent of decisions were based on how they felt about things. And the other ten percent was used to justify their feelings.

Our life revolves around feeling. It directs our love, our longing, our hate, our fear—all of those kinds of things. And the gift of loving awareness is that we can begin to actually know this domain of feelings and not just be caught up in them. Just like you don't have to be afraid of the pain in your body—or some people are so loyal to their suffering, they're afraid of the joy in their body; they don't know how to dance—in the same way, you can learn to tolerate and actually love all the feelings. The sadness and the grief and the longing and the loneliness. The joy and the excitement and the appreciation and the wonder. This whole river of feeling—I have a list of five hundred emotions that starts with affectionate and ambitious and aggressive and anguished and ambivalent and angry and amused and amorous and aversive and antagonistic and antsy and apathetic and apoplectic and anxious and appreciative and argumentative and adamant and addled and amazed and blissful, brokenhearted, bonkers, bored, bad, belligerent, brave.

You know, it's wild, the feelings.

C.S. Lewis says, "Within us is a zoo of lusts, a bedlam of ambitions, a nursery of fears, and a harem of fondled hatreds." That's his way of looking at the dark side of it all.

But then we have this headline from the front of the Wall Street Journal: "So Young and So Many Pills"—about the tens of millions of prescriptions for young kids, ADHD medicine, antidepressants, and so forth. It's not that they don't have their value at times, but often it's just some little kid, some little boy or girl whose body is full of energy and who shouldn't be sitting at a desk all day long. You shouldn't either, actually, but that's another story. They just need to go out and run around and hang out with the trees and play. But okay, let's give them some meds and chill them out, make them a little more manageable.

The liberation that comes—neuroscience talks about expanding the window of tolerance—allows us to actually tolerate our humanity, our joys and sorrows, our anger and fear and longing and love. And when we receive them with a bow, we become the space that has a choice. Because without that, we are just thrown around by each feeling.

We're like a boat without a rudder. But when you have established the sense of loving awareness, you can bear witness to the flood of feelings, and you can also choose which to respond to and how.

And when you meditate, they will come. You're just watching your own breath, right? And you feel all the tensions in your body, and your body says, "Remember me." And then the emotions come, and the unfinished business of the heart will come—the grief, the love that you haven't expressed, the creativity bubbling up in you, all those things. And your task is to make a space that knows them with loving awareness, so that like Yeshe Dunden you are listening to the pulse of your own heart and your own psyche.

And this starts to bring a liberation.

First, because you see that we all have it. Anybody here never been depressed? I don't believe you. They didn't even try to raise their hand. You know, we've had them all. Anybody here not been lonely?

When we were in England, Trudy and I were in Parliament doing some teaching, and we got to talk to people. They had just appointed the Minister of Loneliness in England. I'm sure you read about that. And then we have a friend from Harvard Medical School who has something called the Unloneliness Project, to try to reconnect people with the world and one another. But this is it. This is human life. You have it. And you can either get lost in it and frightened, or with the liberation of loving awareness, you can allow yourself to be present for it, and not be afraid to weep and to feel the tears that we all carry. And also not to be afraid to be tender with the world, because it's your world.

The world is your lover in a way that almost nothing else is. It's always here. You can go out and kiss the Earth, really. The astronauts who were lost in space for a while—there were a couple of Russian astronauts at the International Space Station, and their capsule didn't work right, and there was a very good chance that they weren't going to make it back. They went through the fiery descent, and somehow they did manage to get back. They landed in Kazakhstan, and they got out of their space capsule and got down and literally kissed the dirt. They said, from up there, there's nothing more than you want than just to be back on this earth. To see this blue earth and know everything you care about comes out of it, and to return.

So this is the body of the earth, but it's also emotions and feelings. There's a deep healing that comes when you can weep your tears and feel your joy, and stay present for it. And allow yourself to feel the trauma that you carried. And at the same time, know that it's not the end of the story. Because it isn't. You have suffered and you will suffer more. It's part of being a human being, just as you will have joy. That's the game.

And the Sufis say, overcome any bitterness because you are not up to the magnitude of pain that was entrusted to you. Like the mother of the world who carries the pain of the world in her heart, you are each part of her heart and therefore each called upon to hold your measure of cosmic pain. You are called upon to meet it with compassion instead of self-pity. Instead of saying, oh poor me—it's like we're in this together, and you can hold this life with the great heart of compassion.

There's something so mysterious about it, all of this.

Let your eyes close again without moving. And let yourself know what it is that is true in your heart and your feelings that wants your loving attention. The unbearable beauty of the world, the ocean of tears. And know that you can hold it all with loving awareness. Like that famous Ojibwe phrase: sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky.

It's really a conversation with the heart, a deep listening. And it's this capacity that allowed Nelson Mandela to transform the suffering of twenty-seven years in prison and come out with such magnanimity and compassion, changed South Africa and the world. That allowed Wangari Maathai in prison to come out and finish inspiring people to plant fifty million trees in the Greenbelt and Nairobi and around. It's your capacity to hold all of your human feelings and not take them so personally. You're going to have them all. And they don't define you. They actually become the energy of your life.

So body and feelings, liberation with feelings, liberation with the mind, the thoughts. Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you more than your own mind untrained. Not even the worst enemy. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than your own mind trained.

Not even the most loving partner or parents or family.

This is the deal. You have this mind. And the wonderful thing with mindfulness and loving awareness is that with the mind, you can observe the mind. As Muriel Rukeyser, the great poet, said, "The universe is made of stories, not atoms." It is the way we see it and tell ourselves that it is that leads our life. And you can begin to see the stories that are told in there. They can be stories of defeat. They can be superhero, fantastic stories.

They can be stories of the great mother or the prodigal son or the noble defeated activist. We have a million stories that we tell about ourselves. All of them are kind of limited in a way, because they're only stories, and you can't be limited to a story.

Remember what Mark Twain said: "My life has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened." You see, that's how the fearful mind works, because fear is about something that hasn't happened yet.

I had the pleasure of sitting with Jerry Brown some weeks ago at a party for one of our mutual friends, a really remarkable person. We were sitting at the table with a few folks, and I asked him what he was going to do when he retires. It's in the papers—he's going to go to his grandfather's ranch up in the foothills of the Sierras. He said, "Nobody's going to bother me. They only care about you when you have power. When you're out, they just don't care." He said, "So it's going to be fine."

I asked about legacy, beside all he's done, because he has done a lot of very wonderful things. He said, "Well, I'm concerned about two things. I'm concerned about climate change, and I want to do what I can about that because it's really important. The other thing I'm concerned about is nuclear weapons." This was even before we pulled out of that treaty. He said there are fourteen thousand nuclear warheads around the world, and they're in all these different places. He's on the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists that has that little doomsday clock—two minutes to midnight or whatever. So he's really concerned. He said, "But I don't know what to do. People aren't paying attention to it, and we have to do something."

I thought about it and I reflected. Then I said, "I want to tell you a story."

In ancient India, the gods create the world. Brahma is the creator god, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva the destroyer in the Hindu pantheon. Universes get created for an eon or a billion eons, and then they dissolve, and then a new one is created out of nothing. That's how it works. If you haven't noticed, everything is created out of nothing. It really is. And then it disappears into nothing.

What happened to Y2K? What happened to 2018? It disappeared into the void. What happened to this morning's breakfast? Well, that's still in there. But what happened to yesterday or last week or January? It's just gone. It's wild. Stuff appears. Life appears. And then it disappears.

So the gods created the world. And when the world is created, it's both gods and demons. You may have noticed that. There's some balance of good and evil and joy and sorrow and light and dark and birth and death. It's duality to create life. If you have birth, you have death. Everything with its opposite. And then there are the battles between the gods and the demons. But in this particular universe that had been created, the demons were winning.

And the gods tried everything, but the demons had more power and were winning. Finally, one of the gods said, "All right, all right, we've done all that we can. We have to call Durga."

Durga is the goddess, the mother of Kali, if you've heard of Kali. In Calcutta there's a great temple to her—she's the one who wears the necklace of skulls. Kali is beautiful, you know. And that's just one of her children.

So they called Durga. And out of the Himalayan mountains she appeared, with many arms. In each arm, some weapon, some skillful means. She went right toward the demons. It took her a while to clean house, as she did. But unlike all the others who had tried, she eventually not only defeated the demons, but also removed their fire from the world.

And so I said to Jerry, "Maybe all the men that have been working on these weapons, and all the men who've been trying to stop this, don't have the answer. Maybe it's time to call the mothers. Maybe it's time for the mothers and the grandmothers to come out. Maybe there's some whole other energy of life that can save us in a way that men haven't been able to do."

I tell you this story, and I also have to say I was very pleased, because I'd been thinking, what can a contemplative say to someone in the political world? But it felt like it actually had a kind of wisdom in it. Got lucky, whatever.

But what you can hear in this story is how limited we are by our stories—our personal stories and our collective stories. The collective stories right now include stories about economic justice, climate change, the problems we face, tribalism, continuing conflict, racism. Some of them are really crazy stories, but we've been repeating them for generations and we're locked into them. And we do that within ourselves as well.

The healing comes when we can step back personally and begin to look at what the stories actually are. And then, as the Dalai Lama says, some of these stories do not have my best interest in mind. Some of these thoughts—some of them are really creative ones, and some may be not so creative, those repeated patterns. By becoming loving awareness, you are no longer lost in the thoughts. You actually have a choice.

So close your eyes for a moment. You don't have to move. With loving awareness, let yourself become aware of what are the predominant stories that you tell about yourself and about the world. Do you take them seriously? Do you really believe them? Because they're only partial truths, you know. This is not about fighting, but becoming the healing space of the heart. Feel that healing awareness that can hold it all.

As Thomas Merton writes, "There is in all things an inexhaustible sweetness and purity, a silence beyond thought that is a fountain of action and joy. It rises up in wordless gentleness and flows out to me from the unseen roots of all creation."

As you see the thoughts, also begin to rest in the silence—loving awareness, the vastness that is your true nature, that can know the mind without getting lost in it, without being so identified. Perhaps, again going back to the image of Yeshe Dunden, you can feel what it's like to listen in to your own mind with that same respectful and careful attention. Not judging, but making the space of loving awareness to say, "Oh yes, this is the conditioning, these are the things that have repeated, this is what I've learned, this is what appears, this is healthy, this is not so helpful."

Because your heart knows things that your mind can't know. Your heart knows what's healthy and what's wise for you in ways that you can't think your way out of.

The last of the foundations of mindful loving awareness is mindfulness of the Dharma—a word that means the truth, the way things are, the laws of the universe. This is really at the center of the awakening that's offered through mindfulness. To find a place within reality, within our experience, that can see suffering and joy, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, birth and death arising as they do. Because this is what human incarnation offers you. To become the great heart of compassion and spacious wisdom that says yes.

Remember when you read Siddhartha in high school, and it ended with him, after his love affair with Kamala and all those experiences, sitting by the river, seeing all the different voices of joy and sorrow and gain and loss? And being finally at ease as all of the river went by. He allowed it all to pass through him in some way, but he didn't bind himself or get caught in one or another perspective, one or another of those voices. And then, as I believe the translation says, all of a sudden it became a kind of harmony.

And it wasn't the harmony where you don't care, or where you don't go out and mend the places that need mending, or stand up for justice. But you do it in a really different way. You do it because it's your family. It's your earth. It's your children. Not because you're angry at anybody, but because you know better. Because it's you. And it comes from a place of love. And love is really the only thing that has the power to truly make a difference in this world.

So this is a shift of identity. A bear paced up and down the twenty-foot length of its cage. When, after fifteen years, the cage was removed to give the bear a bigger, open place to live, the bear continued to pace up and down the twenty feet as if the cage were still there. We can live in a kind of conditioned way. Our small sense of self, our thoughts are the way we define ourselves. But it's not who you are.

When you go in the bathroom or bedroom and look in the mirror, you notice you've aged, right? Face it. You're losing fur here, you're getting extra fur there, you're drooping over there. It's just what bodies do. But the strange thing is that you don't necessarily feel older. You know that experience? And you think, Wow, look at that. Look at what it's become now. It's wrinkled over there and drooping that way. Whatever. And that's because it's only your body that's aged. Your body is born as an infant and a small child and an adolescent and a young adult and older and older, and then it starts to fall apart, and then it dies and goes back to the earth in one form or another. What bodies do.

But in that moment you say, "I don't feel older. Interesting how it's aging now. It's lost that." As our colleague Wes Nisker says, "The hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard." That's his description. But anyway, what's true in that moment is you become the witness of it. You realize that it's not who you are. That who you are is the spirit that was born into this body—and that will also leave in that mysterious moment of death. You'll see. You wait and see.

So with deep listening, instead of possessing things, you shift your identity, and you become instead the loving awareness itself. You rest in the consciousness. My teacher, Ajahn Chah, once went to the greatest master of the time to tell him about all his meditation experiences—the lights and visions and samādhi and so forth. And the master looked back and said, "Chah, you missed the point. Those are just experiences. They're like movies—a war movie and a romantic comedy and a documentary and a superhero movie." He said, "They're just movies. The only question is: to whom do they happen? Who is witnessing or seeing all this? Turn your attention back and become the one who knows the knowing. Become the awareness itself." And that is your gateway to freedom.

"How nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. You are fundamentally free. You have a fundamental dignity and nobility that no one can take from you. And this is called the laughter of the wise, which says, "Yeah, it's quite a dance." And we suffer at times, it's true, and we love and we let go and all those things.

But from this place of wisdom, we say, "Oh, this is really a dance of life." And rather than holding on to it, we can see it for what it is and rest in the place of witnessing, of loving awareness.

You are the loving awareness that was born into you.

We can rest in the great heart of compassion. Not because we're supposed to, but because it's our home. There's something in each of us that longs for freedom. And that freedom isn't found in the Himalayas or in some Zen temple or wherever you can imagine it might be. There's only one place where it can be found, and that is within your own heart.

Mary Oliver again, to end:

What can I say that I've not said before? So I'll say it again. The leaf has a song in it. Stone is the face of patience. Inside the river there's an unfinishable story and you are somewhere in it and it will never end until all ends. Take your busy heart to the art museum and the chamber of commerce, but take it also to the forests and the hills. The song you heard singing in the leaf when you were a child is singing still.

I am of years lived so far—seventy-four—and the hills and the leaf are singing still.

It's such a gift to be able to quiet ourselves, to learn meditation. Not to become a meditator, but to get real, to become a full human being with that great heart of compassion that was born in you, with your original dignity, and with the invitation of freedom in the midst of it all. That's a true wonder for us.

This is really a reminder to you that there is a way to live. You can think about Thich Nhat Hanh taking a walk, and all of a sudden you realize, "Oh, this is what it's like to walk on this earth and be present." It will serve you. It will serve the people you love. It will serve the things that you care about, and all of us.

So I appreciate your being here. This is now one of your places. Even if you were here for the first night, you can come back anytime and walk the hills, listen to the leaves, and practice with us.

Thank you, and good night.

CHAPTER 85

The Power of Story - Stories that Open the Mind, Mend the Heart and Lead to Joy

Jack Kornfield · 1h05

> In this richly woven dharma talk, Jack Kornfield draws upon the ancient tradition of storytelling as a vehicle for spiritual awakening and emotional healing. He begins by reflecting on how stories can serve as essential nourishment for the soul—sometimes needed more than food itself—citing his work with veterans and healthcare workers who find healing through sharing their untold narratives in safe, sacred spaces.
> Kornfield shares three profound stories: Terry Dobson's account of witnessing true aikido on a Tokyo train, where an elderly man transforms a violent drunk through loving presence rather than force; Tolstoy's tale of the empress and the wise hermitess, which reveals that the most important time is now, the most important person is whoever is before you, and the most important pursuit is to serve; and the Desert Fathers' story of Abbot Anastasios, whose response to theft demonstrates the transformative power of integrity and non-judgment.
> Through these narratives, Kornfield illuminates core Buddhist teachings on conflict resolution, the bodhisattva path, and living from loving awareness. He references the Dhammapada's teachings on abandoning hatred, explores the meaning of delivering one's unique "cargo" into the world, and invites listeners to discover themselves within each story. The talk weaves together insights from Ram Dass, Thich Nhất Hạnh, the Dalai Lama, and various poets to remind us that we are consciousness itself—timeless, loving awareness born into temporary form—capable of becoming mirrors of stillness in which others may see themselves more clearly.

Please let yourself sit comfortably and at ease.

The teachings are most importantly meant to be a reminder. There's no quiz at the end. You don't get graded. If you hear something that resonates, that feels true in your own deep experience, then let that be a reminder of something important to you. If something seems wrong, you can question it or just throw it out. But in a way, to listen is its own kind of meditation—of being present and noticing what is evoked, what feels resonant to you and what may not, and what's helpful.

In the past months, I've done a series of talks based on stories. Some of you may have been here. There was a long story about the last year of the Buddha's life and a long story about Sir Gawain and part of King Arthur's court. There was a long Hindu traditional myth about Nachiketa and the Lord of Death, a number of different stories. And I'd like to continue in that spirit tonight and maybe again as we go on.

Barry Lopez, wonderful writer, has a book—he wrote a lot about the North, the Yukon, Alaska, and so forth. The title of the book is Sometimes You Need a Story More Than Food. And it really speaks to something so important.

I know in being part of retreats with vets who came back from Iraq and Afghanistan, that the retreats we held were a place—often the first time—they felt safe enough to tell their story. Because a lot of the things that happened when they were there are not the kind of thing you can tell your family or your friends. And so they carry it as a kind of weight on the soul. There's some way in which they'll say, "Well, I can't tell you what I saw." And then it goes on to something even more difficult: "I can't tell you what I had to do." And when you get combat vets and you can make a safe and protected space and say, "Here's the place you can tell the stories that have burdened your heart and hear those of others," it's a remarkable healing.

And in the same way, my beloved wife Trudy, who runs Insight LA, the center in Santa Monica, has had a program for almost fifteen years that started with the healers—the nurses and physicians from the NICU and the PICU, the neonatal and the pediatric intensive care units at children's hospital. And then it grew to other hospitals, and the same thing happened. They would have a retreat and make this beautiful place, and the nurses would come. In the neonatal intensive care, regularly babies die. And you have to tell parents, "I'm sorry, your child died." And that's an occurrence that happens every week. And then you have to clear out the incubator and get ready for the next baby. And you can't go home and talk about that to people. And so again—light the candle and make a sacred space and talk about what it means to hold this life in compassion. And then invite people to tell the stories that they need to for the healing of their own heart.

So that's why sometimes you need a story more than food. You understand. Sometimes to hear it, and sometimes to tell it.

Next month, I want to work with another great story and talk about climate change and drawdown and technology—and some of the kind of stories that we need to rewrite, if you will. So that's going to be important.

For tonight, looking out as we do at the human realm, which is a mixed bag, you may have noticed—you're one of them, so you know, right?—and seeing, along with a million acts of goodness that take place every afternoon, the divisiveness and the continuing racism and conflict and war, made visible in all these different ways. Some of which has always been here, and some in new forms—the kind of modern terrorism that we saw in Sri Lanka this week or that we saw at the synagogue in Southern California. I want to talk some about conflict, in a way, through some stories.

There was an organization that was started in Palo Alto decades ago. Joan Baez, who's a friend, was I think one of the founders of it. And it was called A Better Game Than War. Because we will have conflict. We have different desires and needs and styles. But how do we do this as humanity? How do we deal with conflict with one another?

And I'm part also of supporting an organization called the Nonviolent Peace Force that sends unarmed civilians who are really well-trained into conflict areas—in Sudan, in Syria, in the Philippines, in other places. And mostly what they do is sit down and talk to the people on different sides and then do unarmed accompaniment. And they're able, in doing so, to hear what people are really afraid of and what they really need, and kind of broker some possibilities for civility, even in the midst of difference and conflict.

So let me start with a story.

And I work with him in the men's movement with Robert Bly and Michael Mead and Luis Rodriguez and so forth. He was a great big bear of a man who also became a really wise and remarkable teacher.

So this is his story.

The train clanked and rattled through the suburbs of Tokyo on a drowsy spring afternoon. Our car was comparatively empty—a few housewives with their kids in tow, some old folks going shopping. I gazed absently at the drab houses and dusty hedgerows.

At one station, the door opened and suddenly the afternoon quiet was shattered by a man bellowing violent, incomprehensible curses. The man staggered into our car. He wore laborer's clothing and he was big, drunk, and dirty. Screaming, he swung at a woman holding a baby who was in his way. The blow sent her spinning into the laps of an elderly couple. It was a miracle the baby was unhurt.

Terrified, the couple jumped up and scrambled toward the end of the car. The laborer aimed a kick at the retreating back of the old woman, but missed as she scuttled to safety. This so enraged the drunk, he grabbed the metal pole in the center of the car and tried to wrench it out of his stanchion. I could see his hands were bleeding.

The passengers were frozen with fear, and I stood up. I was young then, some twenty years ago, and in pretty good shape. I'd been putting in a solid eight hours of Aikido training nearly every day for the past three years. I liked to throw and grapple. I thought I was tough. Trouble was, my martial skill was untested in actual combat. As students of Aikido, we were not allowed to fight. "Aikido," my teacher said, "is the art of reconciliation. Whoever has the mind to fight has broken his connection with the universe and is already defeated." I listened to his words. I tried hard. I even went so far as to cross the street to avoid the pinball punks who lounged around the train stations. My forbearance exalted me. I felt both tough and holy.

In my heart, however, I wanted an absolutely legitimate opportunity whereby I might save the innocent by destroying the guilty.

This is it, I said to myself. People are in danger. If I don't do something, they will get hurt.

Seeing me stand up, the drunk recognized a chance to focus his rage. "Ah," he roared, "a foreigner! You need a lesson in Japanese manners!"

I held on lightly to the commuter strap overhead and gave him a slow look of disgust and dismissal. I planned to take this turkey apart, but he had to make the first move. I wanted him mad, so I pursed my lips and blew him an insolent kiss.

"All right," he hollered, "you're going to get a lesson!"

He gathered himself to rush at me. A split second before he could move, someone shouted, "Hey! Hey!"

It was ear-splitting. I remember the strange, joyous, lilting quality of it—as though you and a friend had been searching diligently for something and he suddenly stumbled upon it.

Who would you be if there was a place for you? Because stories are like storehouses—a good story holds a kind of intelligence within it.

So here's a little secret: I chose this story tonight because it relates to me. What I notice when I read it is that I have more of a feisty quality, more of a Terry quality, than I would care to admit. But I am also at times the person on the train who does nothing.

I'm also at times both the woman with the children and the man who doesn't know how to manage his sorrow and loss. And rarely—very rarely—do I have the presence of mind to act so compassionately.

But you know what I love about this story? Even though it's a story about an old Japanese man who was a master of aikido and an art that takes twenty, thirty years to develop, if you really look at what he did, it's actually pretty simple. There's a guy who's really upset, and this old man just turned to him and said, "What's happened to you? What's going on?" That's a very human thing. We probably all have that capacity.

I'll tell you one thing though: there's a kind of attention, a kind of love that's in that quality of turning to someone. It's not so easy to do, but it's something we can practice. The Buddhist word for this is mettā—loving-kindness, a kind of care that we extend toward others. It's part of what it means to be on a spiritual path, part of what it means to be human. That care is a treasure in our humanity. It's also something that we need practice in, because the world doesn't teach us this.

The old man in that story—he wasn't born that way. He practiced.

That touches not just one channel, but our heart and our memory and our emotions and our way of seeing and thinking.

What do you learn from the story? What does it remind you of? Not just in this nice sitting together where people are behaving themselves tonight pretty well—which is a nice part of my job; I generally am with people on their good behavior—but you know how it is with the other people around you, right? And maybe even occasionally yourself, that some other elements of the story might be at play. And how are you approaching that? What is your spirit? That becomes part of the reflection.

I came back a few weeks ago from spending time with Ram Dass. Trudy and I went there to be with him. For those of you who know him—the author of Be Here Now—this very wonderful spiritual teacher who is also a fountain of love, really quite extraordinary. He was pretty sick when we were there. He was in the hospital and almost died, actually. We were there with him a lot in the hospital, and then he got better—hallelujah, he's much better. But he almost died, and he said, "Then I changed my mind," and he came back. He's very, very funny and witty.

In his house, he has a great big altar, as big as the whole front row here. There are pictures of his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, and of great saints. There's Mother Teresa, and there's Ramakrishna, and there are statues of Buddha, and Shiva and Ram and all the Hindu deities. But there are also pictures of great Hasidic rabbis, and Mother Mary, and Bodhisattva Kuan Yin, and other people that he admires. It's a wonderful, huge altar.

And always somewhere in the middle—for a while it was Dick Cheney who had a big place on the altar. Now it's our current administration holding that place of honor with a big smile.

He said, "Yeah, this is my practice. This is my practice—to take inspiration and to try to hold the entire world in my heart and love all of it, with all its joys and sorrows."

But it's not just him. It's me and you.

There's an article I read by Dr. Sanjay Gupta, one of the great public figure physicians—he's the CNN doctor on call, basically, who comments on various things. He went from Harvard to CNN. I don't know whether that's up or down, but whatever it is. So this is an article about lessons from meditating with the Dalai Lama, because he went to Dharamsala to be with the Dalai Lama. In his search for what to put on the air in his shows that would be helpful, he thought he would get the Dalai Lama to help him meditate—which happened.

He said he went there early in the morning. They arranged for him to go meditate with the Dalai Lama, and they said, "All right, here's the protocol. You go in, and when you do, you make a bow. He'll be sitting in his meditation, but we've set up a place for you to sit. Go sit quietly, and you can sit with him, and maybe afterward you can talk about it."

Okay—how cool is that? Let's go sit with the Dalai Lama, right?

So he did that, and he said, "I was nervous." They said to call him "Your Holiness," but the Dalai Lama doesn't like that holiness stuff. He's just like, "Come on in." But anyway, there he was in this little modest room in the Dalai Lama's house. He sat down cross-legged, and he said, "All my meditation insecurities began to kick in."

A few minutes passed. He was trying to meditate. After about ten minutes, he heard the Dalai Lama's deep, distinctive voice say, "Hmm, any questions?" He looked up and saw the Dalai Lama's smiling face starting to break into his characteristic head-bobbing laugh.

"This is hard for me," he said—this is Sanjay Gupta speaking.

"Me too," he exclaimed. "After doing daily for sixty years, still hard."

This was at once surprising and reassuring to hear him say. The Dalai Lama, the great Buddhist monk and spiritual leader, also has trouble meditating.

And then he gave Gupta some instructions.

So I read that and thought, okay, I mean, I have my troubles, but what kind of trouble would the Dalai Lama have? The man does know how to meditate. I've sat with him. We've talked about meditation.

And this is not a non sequitur—it threads back to what I was just talking about. You'll hear how he doesn't have the altar like Ram Dass, but he has the Chinese communist military installed in many of the biggest temples in Tibet, where he's not allowed to return. He has a number of his highly respected monks and leaders in prisons who've been tortured. He has concern for the Tibetan people and culture. Plus, as a world figure, people come from all over saying, "Can you help in Sudan? Can you help in Palestine and Israel?"

So when I imagine his difficulty, I don't think it's like, "I'm having trouble finding my breath." I think it's the difficulty of facing that big altar and asking, "What do I do?"

And I'm not saying what your political persuasion is. Each of you has your own politics. Bless you. Whatever I can say, it's tough. But whoever you'd put in the middle of your altar as somebody you had to come to terms with—he has plenty of them. He calls them "my friend, the enemy" sometimes, you know?

So I think that's what he meant. This is a common human predicament we all share. How do we hold the conflicts? How do we even hold that which is causing suffering?

Here's a verse from the Dhammapada of the Buddha. Often I try to change the pronouns to make them more universal, but this one is right in its way:

Look how he abused me and beat me, how he threw me down and robbed me. Continue to live with such thoughts and you live in hate. Look how he abused me and beat me, how he threw me down and robbed me. Abandon these thoughts and live in love. In this world, hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law.

And so here again, it's not the Buddha saying, you know, put a smiley face on it because everything's fine. Really bad and painful and difficult things happen to us and in this world. One needs to try to work to protect people and do what's possible—and protect yourself and all that. But even so, life has pleasure and pain, gain and loss, joy and sorrow.

Anybody not have that? Just checking in here. Okay, you can have your ten dollars or whatever it was back.

But how do you hold this? And how do you hold the conflict that's within you? Because it is in there as well. How do you hold the conflict that's around us in this world? How do you touch it?

There's Terry Dobson, that big bear of a guy, ready to take this man apart, learning a lesson that the world needs to learn, really. Because it's quite clear that we're the nation that sells more weapons than any other nation on earth. Billions of dollars of killing machines, and we don't feel safe. Something maybe not right in this equation.

How do we do this? And how do we embody it in the modern era?

Yes, we have our technology—our techno connections, all the ways we can Snapchat and Instagram and Facebook and email and all the things that connect. But as we know, that's also a very thin connection. It doesn't really have much depth or generally very much emotion to it. And so there is, at the same time, rising loneliness and isolation and lack of meaning.

What gives us meaning becomes part of this question in conflict. And part of what gives us meaning—well, my friend Malidoma Somé, West African medicine man and shaman, says that among the Dagara people, his people, every child is born with a special cargo. I love this metaphor. Cargo is what's carried up the West African rivers on the cargo boats. It's been that way for thousands of years. And the goal of every child and every human being is to deliver the gifts that we're given—to deliver our cargo into the world. If you can't deliver your gifts, what you have to offer, then it will be a painful life for you. So you have to know what your cargo is, and you have to find your way to offer that to the world, and to trust that it's possible.

As the poet and activist Deena Metzger writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again." She speaks about the capacity to take even conflict and difficulty and, in the long run, to see that you can sow seeds that bring people back together again, that create some sense of peace and harmony.

I've talked about this before, but in the Colombian Civil War that went on for fifty years until a couple of years ago when it was more or less resolved, one of the steps taken to resolve that conflict was this: the government got some helicopters and filled them with photographs, then went to the areas of the jungle where the FARC, the revolutionaries, had been living for decades. They dropped photographs of their families—of their old mothers and fathers, of their sisters and brothers grown up, of nieces and nephews they'd never seen. They dropped them into the forest with the names, so that the people who'd been away as fighters for ten or fifteen or twenty years could remember that they were connected to something bigger, something that had love in it. You understand?

So meaning and connection. And that is, in some way, the theme of the next story.

This is a story I'll mostly tell, although I'll read a little bit of it. It's a story that Thich Nhat Hanh uses. It actually comes from Tolstoy. And where Tolstoy got it—it's an ancient story. But Tolstoy made it sing, as a magician like Tolstoy can do.

One day it occurred to a certain empress that if she only knew the answer to three questions, she would never stray in any matter. What is the best time to do each thing? Who are the most important people to work with? And what is the most important thing to be doing at all times?

So the empress issued a decree through the land saying she wanted answers to these questions, and those who knew the answer should come to her palace. In reply to the first question, of course, all kinds of people flooded in. They sent emails and they texted—some even came in person. One said, for the first question about which was the best time to do things, "Well, you should make a really good Google calendar. You should get everything on your calendar and set aside time for all the things that matter." Another said, "No, you can't really plan because life is too unexpected. You just have to set aside your amusements and be really present for whatever is calling your attention as the empress." Someone else said, "The empress can't do this on her own. She needs a committee, a community of wise people, a council to tell her when to do everything—and follow their advice." Another said, "No, you can't wait for this consultation. You need to consult the magicians and soothsayers, and they'll tell you what's coming, and then you'll know." So there were all these answers.

The responses to the second question also lacked a certain accord, shall we say. One person said to the empress, regarding who are the most important people to work with, that she should place all her trust in the counselors and administrators around her. Others said, "No, no, no, you should work with the physicians and the healers." Still others said, "No, the most important people to work with are your warriors. That's where you're to put your faith—into your military." And the third question drew another set of equally different answers. Some said science was the most important, others said it was based on religion, and others said no, it was conflict resolution skills—or military skills. All kinds of answers.

The empress was not pleased. We are not amused, and we are not pleased. These answers didn't really satisfy her.

So after some time of reflection, she resolved to visit an old wise woman who lived in the mountains, who was well known—a hermitess, I guess you would say—who lived in seclusion at the top of the mountain, as they do in these stories. She was said to be wise, maybe even enlightened. Let's go find the enlightened woman up the mountain to see if she would be able to answer these three pressing questions.

and I'm grateful for what happened, but I've asked these three questions and I'm about to leave and you haven't answered me.

And the wise woman looked up and she said, but your questions have already been answered.

And the empress said, what do you mean?

She said, if you had not dug with me in my garden yesterday, you would have left, and that man would have attacked you on the way down the mountain and maybe killed you. So when is the most important time? Was it yesterday? Helping me dig? Obviously, yes. That time that you dug in my garden was the most important time. And who was the most important person? Obviously I was. And what was the most important thing to do? Obviously to help me, because who knows what would have happened if you hadn't stayed.

And then later, when the wounded man appeared, he was bleeding. Well, the time with him was the most important time because you saved his life. If you hadn't stopped the wound, he would have bled to death. And he was the most important person at that moment, and stopping the bleeding the most important thing you could do. So you have your answers.

There's only one important time, and that is now. The present moment. It's the only time we have any power. And the most important person is always the one who is in front of you, who is in your presence. And the most important thing? It is to serve that person with love.

Those are the answers. And that's the Dharma.

This story that Leo Tolstoy wrote has in it one of the deepest teachings of the Buddha, which is the teaching of presence. The teaching of showing up. Of being here for this life.

When we look outside of ourselves for the things that will make us happy, when we grasp and cling, when we reach for the next moment, the next vacation, the next relationship, the next accomplishment, when we want what we don't have or we push away what is here, we separate ourselves from life. We separate ourselves from the only time we can live, which is the present.

The Buddha said, do not pursue the past. Do not lose yourself in the future. The past is no longer. The future has not yet come. Looking deeply at life as it is in the very here and now, the practitioner dwells in stability and freedom.

"But you have not answered my questions."

And the wise woman looked back and said, "Don't you see, Your Majesty? Your questions have already been answered."

"How is that?" she asked.

"Well, yesterday, if you had not taken pity on my age and given me a hand with digging these beds, you would have been attacked by this man on the way down and perhaps killed. You would have deeply regretted not staying with me. Therefore, the most important time was the time you were digging in the beds, and the most important person was myself, and the most important pursuit was to be of service and to help.

"Later, when the wounded man ran up here, the most important time was the time you spent cleaning and dressing his wounds, for if you had not cared for him, he would have died and you would have lost the chance to be reconciled with him. Likewise, he was the most important person, and the most important pursuit was to be of service and help in that time.

"Remember," she went on, "there is only one important time, and that is now. The present moment is the only time over which you have any dominion, over which you have any gift of power. And the most important person is always those you are with—for who is right before you? Who knows what will happen in the future and whether you will have dealings with anyone else? But in this moment, those eyes, that body, that voice, that person is there with you. And the most important pursuit, the one that truly tends your heart and makes your life meaningful and worthwhile, is to serve—to bring to that person and to those around you happiness and care. For that alone is what life is for."

And they lived happily ever after, or something like that.

So that is Thich Nhat Hanh and Tolstoy. And it is really a story about the Bodhisattva.

Again, thinking about meaning—and Malidoma's phrase of delivering your cargo—our happiness comes when we have meaning in our life. To not be able to do something that uses your gift is a great loss. And that meaning comes alive in relation to life itself and to one another. Whether you make art or write, whether you tend other people or tend a garden or parent, if you can share your dignity with your generosity, your understanding, your integrity, your vision—if you make that come alive within you and with others—your life becomes blessed. It becomes a source of happiness. This is partly why we practice: to be present enough that we can live in this way, to bring ourselves fully to where we are.

The meaning of bodhisattva—this compound word where bodhi means "awaken" and sattva means "being"—is being committed to the well-being and the awakening of all, to hold all of life in compassion.

So one more story for you. This one comes from the Christian Desert Fathers, nearly two thousand years ago, in the deserts of Egypt and Sinai—mystics and meditators. There was a great abbot of a community, a renowned wise man named Abbot Anastasius. One day a young man came and asked if he could join the order and be with the brothers who were part of that community. He was welcomed in and given a little place to live and a robe and so forth.

The abbot had a most beautiful Bible, inscribed with gold leaf and exquisite calligraphy—very, very valuable. It was used to read in their evening services. The young man, who had grown up poor, saw it and coveted it, thinking it was worth a great deal, which it was. So one night he made off with it. He took it and ran away to the city.

Being in the city with this precious and valuable book, after some days he went into the market and found a merchant who dealt in books and antiquities. "I have a really special book," he said, "and I would like to sell it to you."

The merchant said, "Ah yes, please show it to me."

So the young man brought out this gilded, gorgeous, bejeweled Bible—both the Old and New Testaments. The merchant, who knew about such things, looked at it and said, "Leave it with me for a day or two and I will tell you what it is worth."

The young man said, "I would like to get eighteen thousand for it." Some great number.

"You leave it," the merchant said, "and I will tell you."

Two days later, the young man went back furtively and found the merchant. "I have asked you for a great deal of money," he said, "but I believe it is a beautiful book. Will you not give it to me?"

The merchant said, "Yes, I have discovered it is worth this much."

"How do you know that?" the young man asked.

"Well, I went up in the hills to see my friend Abbot Anastasius, who knows about such things. I showed him this beautiful book, and he said, 'Oh yes, it is very valuable—easily worth eighteen thousand.'"

And the young man said, did he say anything else? And the merchant said, not another word. And the young man began to weep. He said, oh, I've lost something really valuable. I need to return this book.

And he went back and dropped to his knees and wept and begged the holy abbot, saying, you know, I misunderstood what was really a treasure in this place. I took the wrong thing. Can I come back? And the abbot said, here, you can keep it if you like, if it means that much to you. And the young man said, no, no, I can't keep it. My life will never be the same if I keep it. Can I come back?

And so he became a monk and lived in the monastery, and they lived happily ever after—or something like that.

When I read this story, there's something in it that has a kind of beauty to it. And it's really the beauty of integrity and the beauty of generosity. For Abbot Anastasia to not add to the suffering of this young man is a remarkable act, isn't it? When you reflect on the things that happen—we lose things, things are taken from us—it was that verse I read from the Buddha: he robbed me, he beat me, stay with that and you live in misery. But it's not just the end of misery. It's the level of integrity and compassion to ask, what would serve? What's good? Not the things that I have, but this other human being—to see and, in that deep way, to see without judgment, to see with the heart.

It brings a sense, as I listen to this story, of what it means to live from that kind of integrity. And we love it because we already know what it's like. You can feel it in yourself. Suppose you were to have done that, how that feels. Instead of being as we might be—judgmental or possessive, all those things.

I heard a beautiful verse recently from one of the wonderful nuns teaching a retreat here, one of the Western nuns. It comes from the early, 2,600-year-old verses of the Therigata, the enlightened elders among the women of the community. The verse was this, a nun speaking about herself: "My old faults, like snow falling on warm ground."

It's a beautiful, poetic line. There she was, and she could see all the judgments of how she was and how she was supposed to be. My old faults, falling like snow on warm ground—just melting away. Not grasping, not picking up, not living from the place of judgment, but really living from the place of love.

So this third story—you could call it a story of compassion, you could call it a story of integrity. It is your integrity that really transforms the world around you, like it did with the old man in the Terry Dobson story.

There's a passage from William Butler Yeats where he writes: "We can make our minds so like still water that beings gather around us that they may see their own images, and so live for a moment with a clearer, perhaps even a fiercer life, because of our quiet."

It's an amazing passage. It's not that we're fixing others, but that we become so present with attention, with loving awareness, with love itself, that we become a kind of mirror—a space in which others can see themselves reflected without judgment. And they learn something by our own depth and presence, by our integrity, by our own stillness.

So when we sit and meditate, it's not just—okay, I can release the tension in my body, stress reduction and such, which is a fine thing. We all need that too in these times, or to work out some stuff. But it's really to come back, to quiet the mind and tend the heart and remember what really matters. To be able to live from that place of presence so that when life brings the challenges we all face, we can also be that mirror for others. We can carry that integrity. We can carry that compassion.

And this is the invitation from the Buddha again: Live in joy and peace, even among the troubled. Live in joy and health, even among the afflicted. Live in joy and love, even among those who hate.

This is fierce instruction in a way, but it is an instruction. Live in joy, in peace, even among the troubled.

Make yourself that embodiment of peace. Live in health, even among the afflicted. Live in joy and love, even among those who hate. Become that which you would have the world become. Quiet your mind, tend the heart. Free from fear and attachments, know the sweet joy of living in the way.

Now how to do this? Meditation, yes. Understanding, also yes. From the Buddhist texts, in one conversation the Buddha says, "It seems as though we thought ourselves permanent—we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not." It's tentative, baby. It really is. And it changes, and then you die. But before that, if you're lucky, you get old. We live in a culture that likes to hide all that and have just young people on the covers of magazines, as if you're always going to be like that. Good luck.

How do we navigate? The verse in the teaching says, "This life is like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream." Every day appears for you—like it did for the empress and the old wise woman—and it brings you new things to learn from, to struggle with, to love, to engage in. And then they disappear. They leave a trace, if you will, in consciousness. But it's always changing. And it's always uncertain. What's going to happen tomorrow? We don't know. Isn't that true?

So then how do we live in this wild uncertainty? Star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud. If we're really attached—me and mine and my things, my point of view—there is, as Terry Dobson taught, a vastness that you are a part of that is so beyond the small sense of self. And you know it. You know it at times when you make love—if you're lucky enough to, it's a wonderful thing. It is. It's pretty cool. You know it looking out at the night stars on a long, dark night in the desert. You know it listening to an amazing piece of music, or at the time of the birth of a child, or sitting holding the hand of someone when they die. The gates between the worlds open, and you go, "Wow, what is this life? Is this going to happen to me?" Yes, it is. Then what is it? What is it for? What is this mystery?

And then somehow in this vastness, some sense opens that you're not just this body. You're not. Your body has changed. You were that little tiny baby body, and a kid body. That's not you. It just isn't. Think you're made out of kale and burgers? It's just not your identity. You rent it. You get to use the body. But you were that spirit that was born into this body that will also leave it. You'll see when it happens at the end.

It's a wild thing that happens. You get to inhabit this body for a while. But what does it mean to rest in vastness? To remember that who you are is actually consciousness itself—the spirit that came into this body, your loving awareness. That's what you are. And all this stuff happens in loving awareness.

In your meditation, you can begin to trust that the heart of loving awareness, which is compassion and understanding, is big enough to hold the whole dance: the joys and the sorrows, the gain and the loss, the pleasure and the pain, the beauty of it, and the ocean of tears. You are larger than you think. Way bigger. Larger than you imagined.

And then you become the old man in the subway car. You become the wise woman on the mountain. You become the abbot who's unafraid to lose things because in the end, you know how it goes. It's like that very rich man who died, and they were talking in the neighborhood: "Well, how much did he leave?" And somebody else said, "Why, everything, of course." That's how it works. That's the game, isn't it?

But when you understand this, there comes a kind of freedom. The freedom comes when you sit in meditation and you can allow the whole range of emotions—the tears and the longing, the love and the tenderness and the fear—and say, "Yes, all this can be held in the heart of compassion." And then you rise up. As it says in Zen, there are only two things: you sit and tend the garden, and you go and tend the garden of the world. But you do it from a different place, from a place that's freer and less attached and less about me—because me is just temporary—and more resting in that timeless awareness that is who you really are.

A poem before we end, from Alison Luterman. She's an Oakland poet and a friend of mine. It's called "At the Corner Store":

It was a new old Arab man behind the counter, skinny, brown, and eager. He greeted me like I was his prodigal daughter, as if we both came from the same world, somewhere warmer and more gracious than this foggy city. I was thirsty and alone, sick at heart, grief soiled.

Exiled from family through my own faulty temperament.

Now there's a poetic line—"exiled from family through my own faulty temperament." A little self-reflection there.

And his face lit up like I was his lost sheep wandering home, coming back to the freezer bins in front of the register, which were always filled with the same Starhart ice cream sandwiches and the dusty shelves with corn chips, and of course the immortal Jim Beam.

I shuffled to the register and bought my bottled water, and he returned my change beaming like I was a bright new bud on the just-bursting-open cherry trees, like I was everything precious struggling to grow, and he was blessing me as he handed my change over the counter with its plastic tub of red licorice whips, five for a quarter.

This old man, who didn't speak English, beamed out love to me the iron week after my mother's death, so that when I emerged from his store, my whole cockeyed life—wonderful failure—glowed like sunset after rain.

I heard the city dogs yelping with passion in their yards, and in the driveway across the street, a woman and a girl danced to contagious reggae.

Praise Allah, the Buddha, Kuan Yin, Jesus, Mary, and old Jehovah, for the eyes and the hands of the blessed one are everywhere.

These stories really talk about who you are in the deepest sense—and what's possible for you, what's possible for us as human beings. For you are larger than you think, and more noble. And this understanding satisfies you in a way that almost nothing else can.

It's wonderful to watch the light at the end of the day usher in the night. The night is considered a bride in some traditions, coming in. You can reflect a little on these stories and where you find yourself, what they remind you of that's true.

Alan Watts wrote that the art of living is neither careless drifting on one hand nor fearful clinging on the other. It consists in being sensitive to each moment, regarding it as utterly new and unique, and having the heart and mind open and truly receptive to this life that we're given.

So let's sit for a little bit.

You are consciousness itself. Timeless, loving awareness born into this body. You contain the great heart of compassion, the eyes of wisdom. These are your birthright. Let yourself sit quietly. Let the mind quiet.

Let the heart soften. And remember these gifts. They are your birthright.

I thank you for your kind attention. It's a sweet thing to sit as the day turns to night, as we did in the spring with all the amazing green hillsides—still mostly there. It's also sweet to simply stop in a busy culture and listen to ourselves.

Drive politely out there; there are lots of people. If you can, become a member of our stewardship circle—that would be a beautiful thing, and we deeply thank you. It makes a lot of difference. It's a beautiful thing to support the things you care about, whatever they are.

Good night. Thank you.

CHAPTER 86

The Dharma of Climate Change

Jack Kornfield · 1h18

> In this deeply moving talk, Jack Kornfield addresses one of the most pressing challenges of our time through the lens of Buddhist practice. Drawing on the Four Noble Truths, he examines climate change as a form of collective suffering rooted in greed, hatred, and the fundamental delusion of separateness. Kornfield shares how UN diplomat Christina Figueres transformed her approach to the Paris Climate Accord after learning meditation from Thich Nhat Hanh, shifting from victim-perpetrator dynamics to recognizing our interconnected global family.
> Through two powerful stories—a Taoist tale of a man who spent a century replanting desolate Chinese forests one seed at a time, and a Jātaka story of a brave parrot whose compassionate efforts to save forest creatures moved the gods to tears—Kornfield illustrates that meaningful change happens through persistent, loving action rather than grand gestures. He references Paul Hawken's 'Drawdown' research showing that solutions to reverse climate change already exist, with the education and empowerment of women ranking as the single most effective intervention.
> Kornfield emphasizes Gary Snyder's teaching that we must save the earth not out of guilt, fear, or anger—the very forces causing the destruction—but out of love. The talk offers practical wisdom for holding ecological grief while remaining empowered to act, reminding us that our meditation practice naturally extends outward: 'You sit, and you sweep the garden, and it doesn't matter how big the garden is.'

So maybe take a breath or two and let things quiet down, if you will. I hope you got some cookies or met a friend or took a little walk. I'm glad we're back together.

This evening I want to do some teachings on climate change. And you know how it is as a teacher, or as a human being—we teach what we need to learn, really. So I'm talking to you, but I'm also trying to understand in myself how to hold this. And it's not that easy.

I have a new grandson. His name is Desmond, and last week he turned six months old. He rolled over three times on his six-month birthday. In India, it's a very special thing. They call it rolling over day when the baby first rolls over. It's a holiday. Baby Krishna, in the mythology—that was the day he first rolled over and then opened his mouth, and his mother peered in and there were all the galaxies and stars, and she said, "Oh, this isn't a regular baby I had." So rolling over is a big deal.

I'm going to try something different tonight, and hopefully it will be helpful to me anyway, and maybe to you. Over the course of the last number of months, I've been telling some big stories and using the stories as a way to open the mind and the heart to some greater understanding for all of us. One was the story of Sir Gawain from the Arthurian legends, and the theme of it was what women want. You'll have to listen to that to see if you can find the answer. One was about the Bodhisattva Vimalakirti. One was a great story from Tolstoy that's used by Thich Nhat Hanh about an empress. Stories are really powerful. Barry Lopez is a wonderful writer about the Arctic and the North especially. One of his books is entitled Sometimes a Person Needs a Story More Than Food. There's something about stories that nurture the heart.

So let me begin and have some stories to weave in with this. And it's really a reflection. It's not like there's a quiz or an exam at the end. If anything, it's just a reminder, a meditation for you to sense what you know, what is true for you in this that has some value.

When my teacher Ajahn Chah, who was a forest meditation monk and master from Thailand, came to visit—his first visit to the U.S.—we picked him up at the airport in Boston. He'd never been here. Then we put him into a big van with a couple of the other monks that came with him to drive him out to our center in central Massachusetts, buried in the hills of Massachusetts. We drove down Memorial Drive and showed him MIT and the towers of Harvard and so forth, showing him the Boston University sites and things like that. Then we got on the Massachusetts Turnpike and drove for twenty minutes or so until we got outside the belt of the city. Then we started to pass not just fields, but woods. And of course, New England has a lot of forests and woods in it.

We're driving along and his eyes got bigger and bigger. He said, "What are these woods? What are these forests?" We drove a little. He said, "Pull over, pull over." So we pulled over on the turnpike. He got out and walked up to the fence at the edge of the turnpike. There were all the pine trees and some of the maples and oaks and all the trees that one has in New England. His eyes were wide and he said, "Wow, who lives in this forest?" He was smelling it. He's a forest monk, you know. "What does it smell like in this forest? What kind of animals? Do you have bears? Are there lions or mountain lions? Who lives in here?"

Then he turned to me and said, "How far do these forests go?" I said, "Oh, maybe a thousand miles north up toward the Arctic, fifteen hundred miles. They go a really long way." He got very excited. Forget Harvard and MIT. Let's go for the real deal.

Because if you look at the Buddhist tradition archetypally, the Buddha was born under a tree. He practiced his meditation under a tree. He got enlightened under the Bodhi tree. He taught under the trees for years and lived among them. And then he died under those two beautiful sal trees which burst into flowers, as the story goes—you know how those stories are—as he was dying. There's this very deep connection with our inner opening, with our own well-being, and the well-being in connection to the natural world around us.

I remember going to visit another great forest master, an Ajahn named Buddhadasa, after I'd been teaching for a few years, and saying to him, "Ajahn Buddhadasa, students in America have a lot of trouble with self-compassion. Not to speak of kindness for the people around them, but especially for themselves. There's so much self-judgment and criticism, shame, trauma—all these things. Do you have any advice for us?"

And he said, "Yes, it's simple. Take them out into the woods and the forests and the great trees and the rivers. Bring them into the natural world and teach them the meditations of loving-kindness." He said, "After they've been out there for a while, they'll get better." It was that simple for him.

When we lived in the forest monastery, as I did as a monk, it was beautiful because we got to watch and live in the seasons, see the phases of the moon, feel the heat of the hot season and the rains of the monsoon—all the while sweeping the paths with great care, surrounded by the critters of the forest, the wild birds, occasional wild cats, and cobras at a couple of the monasteries. At night where it was dark, we'd have these little walking sticks, and you'd tap the path to let the snakes know you were coming. Everybody has to use the path, but you want to have a little traffic pattern there so you don't step on somebody.

This is the world. And I didn't know that much—my upbringing was quite suburban. The outdoors to me was like the camping store at the mall, basically. Pretty pitiful. So this was very moving and wonderful, to live in this way.

What was clear is that the training of mindfulness was not just mindfulness of our breath or our emotions or the different thoughts that we have, learning to hold them in compassion and find a place of equanimity or peace in the middle of all that. The word mindfulness—sati and sampajanya—is a compound word with two parts: mindful presence and mindful response. It's not just passive, eyes closed, navel gazing. That's a very limited understanding. You quiet yourself, you tend the heart, you bring in the quality of compassionate presence—that's one part of it, mindful presence. And then from that you respond to the world. They say there are only two things: you sit, and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is—the garden of the world.

The monks and nuns where we lived in these forest monasteries, in the wilder parts of the borders of Laos and Thailand and Cambodia—still pretty wild in those forests—they could see from very early on the destruction of the forests, because it's been happening for decades now. When my teachers were traveling in the forests and jungles, there really were quite a few tigers. And the word for Laos, one of the descriptions of the country, was the land of Lang Xang—the land of a million elephants. The forests were filled with wild elephants, and with gaur. You know those little cans of Red Bull? A red bull is actually a wild bull in the forest. They had them—not so many left, but they had them all.

What the monks and nuns saw is that as modernization came, the forests were being cut down and the natural world was being decimated. One of the responses, which is quite famous, is that some of the abbots and famous monastics would go out into the remaining stands of forest and take their own robes, remove them, and wrap them around the biggest trees—the great old teak trees and the antique trees—ordaining them as abbots of the forest with all the chanting. Because there was such reverence and belief in the sacredness of the robes and of the monastics, that part of the forest would remain untouched. They understood, they could see this in some way.

That was thirty, forty years ago. I was there starting a long time ago—let us say almost fifty years ago. What a trip it's been.

So now we hear about and see the effects of climate change. It's becoming much more of a compelling and important question for us. And the question is: How do we live with this? How do we practice with it? How do we respond to it?

You know, out of fear, heartbreak, despair, denial, anger. What do you do with climate change?

One map that may be helpful—one model from the inner world of practice—is the Four Noble Truths of the Buddhist teachings.

The first of these Noble Truths is the Noble Truth of Suffering. It doesn't say life is suffering. It says life has suffering. Anybody not have that? Raise your hand. You can have your fifteen dollars back. It doesn't matter how successful you are—you're going to have it. You're going to have loss and aging and conflict and difficulty. And if you get more successful, you'll also have more problems. Try it out. You'll see.

But the First Noble Truth, which says that this is how it is, might also be the First Noble Truth of climate change itself. The level of CO2 in the atmosphere is now higher than it's been in three million years. Every year we're burning enormous amounts of carbon, and we're only beginning to feel the impact of that change in the atmosphere. The blanket of CO2 is being joined by enormous releases of methane gas, especially in the Arctic and in the tundra. They talk about huge methane burps or belches coming out as the permafrost starts to melt, or from some of the lakes in the Arctic. Methane is eighty-six times more volatile in its environmental impact than carbon dioxide—huge amounts.

In both the Arctic and the Antarctic, there is two-thirds less ice than there was in the 1970s. Glaciers are disappearing, and billions of tons of methane are starting to be released. The polar ice caps are part of what keeps the world cool—not just like a refrigerator with ice, but because they're white, they reflect sunlight back into space. As they start to disappear, and the sea ice sometimes now is ninety-five percent less than it had been, everybody's waiting eagerly—the shipping industry, the military—to have no ice in the Arctic. Now we can do all this exploration and send our ships. But what does that mean for us as a planet?

Every day, the extra heat that this carbon dioxide envelope creates, absorbed by the earth, is the equivalent of 400,000 Hiroshima nuclear bombs—enormous amounts of heat being absorbed. And then there is the sixth great extinction, as you know, with a thousand plant and animal species going extinct every week from the biosphere that we're a part of. Each degree Celsius of climate change also reduces the agricultural output of grains by six percent. The deserts get more arid. Wild storms and floods happen. Ocean currents shift. And our children and our grandchildren are the inheritors of this.

My good friend and colleague Wes Nisker says he's buying beachfront property in Arizona right now to deal with this rising sea level. You've got to laugh at something.

So this is the First Noble Truth of climate change. It's the way it is right now for us as human beings, and worthy—as the Buddhas that you are—of seeing clearly.

Then the Second Noble Truth is the cause of suffering. And the causes are really straightforward. Greed, hatred, and delusion or ignorance are the main roots of suffering. You may have noticed them in the modern world. Greed—the rapacious way that we treat the natural world. Hatred—the arising of conflict and war, racism. All of that falls under hatred, and it falls under delusion as well. The big delusion is the delusion of separateness, where you actually think you're separate from this. When the truth is that every breath you take dusted the tops of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it came across the Pacific. And it also dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor. That's what you breathe. Because we're in it together.

So this is the Second Noble Truth: that there are causes, and the causes are rooted—yes, in the behavior of corporations or governments or groups of people—but really they're rooted in the human heart. In greed, in hatred, and in the deepest delusion, which is the delusion that we're separate, that we can get ours and it's not going to affect anybody else. A kind of denial of this.

And then there's a path. Fortunately, suffering isn't the end of the story. It's the beginning of the story, along with its causes. The third noble truth tells us there is an end to suffering. And the fourth noble truth reveals a path to that end. This ending means waking up from the trance of separation, from this false sense that we're separate from the rest of life. It means releasing the small sense of self that is sometimes called the body of fear, where we really believe that somehow we're not part of life itself, which we came out of.

And the path? It begins with clear seeing—what's called wise understanding, wise intention. Then it moves into integrity: seeing the truth, telling the truth, acting with integrity. Based on that foundation come wise effort, wise mindfulness, wise focus. All these qualities that we learn inwardly—how to be loving and present for this human life, how to be present for another being with care and respect and love, that kind of dignity that each human being deserves—this is the same quality we must bring to the environment and the earth around us.

Now, this asks for our response.

Some months ago, we had a climate day here when Jerry Brown was part of the host of the San Francisco Climate Action. People from all around the world came. One of the people who came to Spirit Rock was a woman named Christina Figueres. I was sitting up here in dialogue with her. She was very cool—a diplomat from Costa Rica, I believe, who was later transferred to Europe and became the UN representative for climate change. She helped organize the Rio climate conference and was the key figure in the Paris Climate Accord.

As we were having our dialogue, she told me that her work in climate—tending to the climate—had left her with a kind of disabling depression and despair. She didn't know what to do. This was leading up to the Paris meetings. Someone said to her, "You need to go and see Thich Nhat Hanh," the Zen Master who has his place in Southern France at Plum Village.

So she went there, she said, feeling a lot of despair. They taught her to meditate. They taught her the practices of the great heart of compassion, to feel that you're part of everything. They taught her the practices of empowerment. And she said, "It turned my life around. It changed me to realize that I could work with my internal climate and bring a quality of love and compassion to what had otherwise been too much anguish. I returned to Paris in a different place."

She said that what she learned there—Thich Nhat Hanh's beautiful teachings of interdependence, of how we are connected—transformed her perception when she arrived in Paris. "I saw that everybody there was acting from the place of victim and perpetrator," she told me. "You're doing it to us," or "You're blaming us for doing it to you." She said, "We weren't going to get anywhere with victim and perpetrator. So I began to teach them what I'd learned: that it's not victim and perpetrator, but that we're part of a big family and we're all in it together."

She said the language that she brought from the Dharma teachings, from Thich Nhat Hanh, her new understanding—it changed the climate of the climate groups. And they were able to get those 186 nations to sign on.

When people exclaim "Oh my God" upon seeing flowers, it means those blossoms have made them present. The beauty connects with their soul, and that is transformational.

"Oh my God. What did he say? We're going to pollinate the earth with love?"

This teaching comes from Thich Nhat Hanh. He said the mind and heart is like a piece of land planted with many different kinds of seeds—seeds of joy, peace, mindfulness, understanding, and love, but also seeds of craving, anger, fear, hate, and forgetfulness. These healthy and unhealthy seeds are always there, sleeping in the soil of the heart and mind. The quality of your life depends on the seeds you water. If you water a seed of peace in your heart, peace will grow. When the seeds of happiness are watered, you will become happy. If the seeds of anger are watered, you will become angry. The seeds that are watered frequently are those that will grow strong.

This is his invitation.

Now, a story for you—a Taoist story. I'll read a bit of it and then tell the rest.

This story was told to me by Li Peng, who's now an old man with a thin gray beard who sweeps the path to the Taoist temple outside the prosperous village of Fengshui. The village was not always so prosperous. Indeed, it stood on barren land with only a few of the most rudimentary huts for the four families who eked out a living grazing a few scrawny animals and planting seeds in the dry, bony soil with a prayer for their growth.

This desolation is not new to China—oh, it's a sad story and an old one. You who have a chance to know what is befalling the last forests of our modern times should consider it well, for China was not always bereft of forests. Forests hold the soul of the land, and the greenness of their trees breathes life back into the air that we breathe together. Those among us fortunate enough to have entered a great and beautiful forest even once in our life cannot forget such a memory—the spring in our feet, the vibrancy of our breath, the joy of the cells of our body.

But now most of the forests of China are dead. They've been dead for five hundred or a thousand years. There are so many of us. We've cut them down to build homes, for cooking, for warmth, to clear the land for yet one more field. And the land has become barren, and the rivers yellow with the soil that's run off. Even young children know something is wrong, never seeing a great forest or hearing the cry of birds in its treetops, stopping for the noise of unseen animals. They know something is missing. They hear the stories of wolves and bear that lived in the forest, of wild pig and mountain tiger. And their hearts too must long for a time when the forests were alive, when human life was more fully alive.

But all is not lost.

Li Peng, who is telling this story, talks about how it is to live in this village, Fengshui Li, and how it's become a beautiful place filled with bamboo forests, streams with clear water, glades, sweet and porous.

He says at the end of the previous century, there was a Taoist elder, a dragon named Tam Yang Boon. Dragon is the name for a great master in the Taoist temples. Li Peng was born himself nearby. Tam Yang Boon was born by the Lochi river bank, and as a young man, almost more than a hundred years ago, he was a dutiful student who took the Confucian examinations, passed them, and became a well-known figure there. He married a lovely young woman and they had the beautiful village ceremony that they'd celebrated for a thousand years. The pigs were offered, people danced. And here was Tam Yang Boon, now a successful member of the community, graced with a child named Most Precious Gift.

And then the sorrows came. His child got pneumonia and died. His father also died in an influenza epidemic, and his wife began to grieve so much that after time she too lost her life. His mother went into a Taoist nunnery, and he didn't know what to do. He couldn't return to his village.

He lived there and learned the secrets. Tam Young Boon taught him how to care for the forest, how to soften the shen tree pods for planting, how to create a small orchard for hundreds of new saplings. And wherever the forest was replanted, new hillsides were covered with trees, the streams filled with moisture, and the young forest began to fill with wildlife that could sense, "Ah yes, here is a beautiful place to live."

Now Li Peng, living there with Tam Young Boon in the forest as it was growing—it had covered ten thousand rai—he began to realize that his own life as a scholar, his own life as a teacher, didn't mean anything when the land was desolate as it was. And so he asked if he might stay with Tam Young Boon for longer. He trained with him and learned how to tend the forest.

But then he got news that there was difficulty in his own family, and he had to go away for some years to tend his aged parents, to do what he could back where he was born. But in his heart, he longed to return to the mountains.

After some years, he walked from that temple back up into the hills, and now the forests were great and wild and more vast than ever. He knew he was on the right trail when he heard the sound—ching, ching—amazed at how beautiful the Chinese maple had grown, at the tracks of wild animals everywhere.

And remarkably, Tam Yang Boon was planting the very day he came back, now decades after he had first met him. Tam Yang Boon said, "Come stay with me and eat the herbs of the forest and learn how to live in the cycles of the Tao." And so he learned from the teachers—the wind, the rocks, the trees. He learned the harmony of life.

But then Li Peng fell ill and couldn't remain in the mountains. Even the Tao has its seasons and difficulties. He returned to the monastery. And now again, ten thousand rai had been planted and reclaimed. In the villages, goats and pigs squealed under the houses, and the dikes between the rice paddies had clear flowing water. The children were already accustomed to a diet of good food and white rice from the paddy.

"I tell you this story," says Li Peng, "with some sadness, because after Mao's great triumph, there are only a handful of the five million monks and nuns of the Taoist and Buddhist temples that were there. Li Peng remained in the temple, and somehow I, as a young boy, was called there too. My heart went to join him and learn the ways of the Tao. So I lived with him as an old man for the last eight years and heard the stories of Tam Yang Boon and practiced the Eight Treasures.

"Several times I climbed to the forest to look for the immortal dragon Tam Yang Boon, but there was no sign of him. I thought perhaps he had died. But then one day in the far distance, I heard that sound—ching ching—of the immortal mountain way, the dragon. And now I've decided to go into the mountains myself, for it is also my way. I write you this story so you remember as I leave.

"Li Peng taught me the secret of soaking the shen tree pods and showed me the fire herbs that warm the body in winter. Sometimes I feel there's not much honor left for the Tao in our temples, and I'm called to these mountains, to the animals that roam there, to the sweetness of the forest valleys.

"I know there's desolation where you live also. I know that your forests have been lost and that many of your friends do not know who they are. But the earth will not always be desolate, and the Tao has its cycle of return. Perhaps one of you who reads this story will know the spirit of the immortals in your heart and go off to the mountains and replant the forests of the earth."

That story is based on a tale called The Man Who Planted Trees, written by Jean Giono. This is a different version that I wrote in a Chinese style, and I called Jean Giono's wife to ask if that would be acceptable. She said yes, it would be fine to tell this story.

What was important for me in sharing it with you, just as I read Thich Nhat Hanh's passage about seeds, is to remind you that wherever we are in this dilemma of climate change, it is not the end of the story. The seeds that you plant and the possibilities of these seeds are what will renew the earth.

As Henry David Thoreau has said, "Though I do not believe a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I am prepared to expect wonders."

So what does this mean for us? How do we respond to this enormous threat to humanity and to the animals and creatures of the earth?

I have this page my daughter gave me, in her third-grade handwriting. I treasure it. She said, "Daddy, I think you could use this in your talks." It's a quote from Chief Seattle: "What is man without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, men and women would die from great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man."

You hear it, and it's the same principle as this story. How do we respond to this great threat?

Notice in yourself. Here you come to meditate, and you have your own spiritual inclinations. Notice with mindfulness: what is this touching in you? For many of us, it will evoke fight, flight, or freeze. Let's speak in terms of trauma, because this is a collective trauma of humanity and the earth. Flight—"I'm going to move to New Zealand. I'm going to Idaho. I'm going to get out of here somewhere."

You know how that one goes. Far away, as if it's really going to help. That's flight.

Fight. Fight against it. Fight against those people.

Or freeze—denial, hopelessness, distraction. "There's nothing I can do." As if there really was nothing you could do. Or just the desolation.

What was talked about in that Chinese story is the desolation of a materialistic society, where we could almost describe much of our society by the absence of the sacred. What it means to have a sacred relationship with one another, with this beautiful earth that we live on. In a way, that's why we have Spirit Rock—to remind us of this, to have such places as this.

But the real question is: what is possible for us? Here's Tom Young Boon, going through a hundred years planting seeds, and forests are coming back and new villages are growing.

Gary Snyder, one of our greatest environmentalists, Pulitzer Prize-winning author, the visionary of bioregionalism for fifty years, was asked by our colleague and friend Wes Nisker: "Gary, you see the oceans rising, species disappearing, climate getting hotter and hotter, all the refugees pouring out. What advice do you have for us?"

And Gary looked back as the great Zen teacher that he is, as well as an environmentalist, and he said: "Don't feel guilty. If you're going to save it, don't save it out of guilt. Don't save it out of anger. Don't save it out of fear. Because those are the very forces that are causing the difficulty. If you're going to save it, not as an act of war—save it as an act of love. Save it because you love it. Because that's the only power that has the force to match what we're seeing as difficulty. It's the force that lets mothers lift cars off their children. It's the force of love."

And then it's not a sacrifice. It's not a sacrifice if your foot is injured or your hand is injured in some way. You don't think, "Oh, that poor foot, I wonder if I should help it. Oh, that poor hand, I wonder if I should take it out of the fire." You know it's part of you.

Once, wrote this Tibetan lama, "I was staying with friends in Colorado, and I was a great horseman. I took my favorite horse, Rocky, on a trail ride through the back country high mountains. I'd ridden Rocky before, mostly in the arena. He was very intelligent, but he didn't know how to walk a high mountain trail. This was a new situation. I was leading the group, and that also made him a bit nervous.

"I coaxed him over certain rocks, shifted my weight to indicate to him to go around certain others, but he kept stumbling. We came to a narrow place in the trail. On one side was a steep shale cliff up, and on the other a long drop—a thousand feet into a river. Rocky stopped and waited for my direction. We both knew that one wrong move would plummet us into the river below.

"I guided him toward the gorge. Subtly shifting my weight toward the high wall of shale, I thought that if he slipped, I could jump off and save myself. The moment I shifted, Rocky stopped cold and craned his head around to look at me. He knew exactly what I was doing. I could tell that he was shocked and hurt that I was planning to abandon him. The look in his eye said, 'You and me together, right?'

"I took a breath, shifted myself back into the center of the saddle, and we began to walk together."

This is the movement that's needed. It's not to separate ourselves from the world, but to quiet the mind and connect with heart—our own heart—and rise to meet with the greatness of heart the dilemma that we carry. The problem isn't refugees at the border or immigration.

Much of the crisis at the border stems from climate change and its effects on Central American crops and farmers. People are fleeing the devastation. Climate drives poverty, drives conflict, drives death and loss—and people are running for their lives. This is not a small thing. And we have to let ourselves feel it.

Gustavo Barajaño Lopez, a teacher, writes: "Each day I open my class with a morning circle. Nineteen seven and eight year olds sit on a colorful rug, talk about their favorite color, their ideal superpowers, how they feel, or who they'll be when they grow up. At recess, I read about a seven-year-old who died in Border Patrol custody after navigating the New Mexico desert. Her name is Jakelin Caal Maquin.

I begin to wonder—did she make walking through the desert a game? Count the number of cacti? Make messages with stones in the sand? I wonder if she went to school. Did she have to leave midway through the year to work picking strawberries, like my father? Would she color a picture in desert sunrises?

I wonder if she knew where she was going. What was America to her? I wonder if she spoke K'iche' or English or Spanish or Mam. What would she write about?

My students are learning math multiplications. I wonder if she knew her times tables. What is 15,000 children times two parents in different detention facilities? What is a number of bottles of water times border patrol boots? Did she know the definition of terror, or did she call it fear?

This not knowing brings tears. I wonder who she was. I see her now. I wonder who she would have become."

The thing about all of this is that it's really one person at a time. As William Blake said, "If one is to do good, it must be done in the minute particulars. General good is the plea of the hypocrite, the flatterer, and the scoundrel." You actually have to see the people, the animals, the beings involved who are part of your family.

So there's another story. We're still wending our way through this problem that we all carry, and I know you hold it as I do.

Once—even longer before Tam Yong Boon was born—a long time ago, before the Buddha was the Buddha, when he was still practicing to become enlightened, there are these volumes called the Jataka Tales that recount his past lives. In one of them, years ago, the Buddha was born as a friendly little parrot in the forest. He lived happily and delightedly there. He loved flying through the branches. He made friends with so many other creatures. And his spirit was one—since he was the Buddha to be—of joy and happiness in life, of care for others, of the gift of flight.

One day, the skies over the forest turned dark, and there was a huge storm, a lightning storm. As the storm ended, flashing and roaring, the wind began to howl. In the days that followed, the atmosphere grew turbulent, and lightning struck and crackled across the sky. A seed of fire was born in the heart of one of those trees that lightning had struck. As the forest dried out, that blaze began to spark a huge conflagration.

We know about this, don't we, here in California?

Terrified, as the smoke began to rise, the animals ran wildly in every direction, seeking safety from the burning flames and acrid smoke. When the little parrot smelled the smoke, he flung himself bravely into the fury of the fire, crying out, "Fire! Fire! You must run! You must run!" Many of the animals fled to the safety of the river, but many others were trapped by flame and smoke.

Rather than flying to safety himself, the parrot continued circling over the raging fire, seeking some means to help all those he knew on the forest floor. A desperate idea came to him. Darting down to the river, he soaked his small bird body in the water, then flew back into the inferno. Unaware of the flames, he dropped down low to find anyone he knew from that forest—a squirrel or a badger—and would shake the drops of water from his feathers to give them some moments of cooling, like little jewels of something precious falling through the fire.

Again and again, he would return to the river, soak himself, and look for any creature in danger, dropping as many droplets of water as he could upon them. His lungs ached.

He was dizzy from the flames. But he thought, what else can I do but fly? I must do this to help.

Remember, this is the Buddha as the parrot. You've got to get the story here.

Now, it happens that up in heaven, some of the gods and goddesses who dwelt in their gorgeous deva-like palaces looked down and saw the forest fire. They saw that something interesting was happening, because their seats become very hot when something really cool is happening down on earth. Okay, something's happening—what is this? And they looked down and they said, "Look at that little parrot! How completely foolish, trying to put out a raging forest fire with his own little wings. Whoever heard of such a thing? Why, it's absurd."

But one of the gods looked closer and found himself somehow strangely moved by the parrot going into the river and coming out and shaking the water on another creature. He found himself so moved that he turned himself into a golden eagle and flew down from heaven to have a little closer look.

The little parrot was nearing the flames again when this huge golden eagle with feathers of molten gold appeared at his side and said, "Go back, little bird. This is a forest fire. You can't stop this. What can a few drops of water do?"

But the little parrot, of course, wouldn't listen. He continued to fly doggedly into the river and back into the flames.

"Stop, stop," said the great eagle. "Save yourself."

And the little parrot said, "I don't need a great shining eagle to give me advice, thank you. My mother could have told me that, you know. I just need someone to help."

And the great eagle, seeing the parrot flying so steadily through the searing flames, thought with shame about his own privileged life. He could see the carefree gods looking down on the earth as if life was just a game. He could hear their laughter, but he could also hear the cries of the creatures in the forest, crying out in fear. And all at once, he no longer wanted to be a god or an eagle or anything. He simply wanted to be brave like that parrot and to help.

"I will help," he said. And flushed with the feelings that arose in him, he began to weep. Streams of tears poured from his eagle eyes. And one of the interesting things that happens is when the gods weep, it turns into rain. As the great eagle began to weep, the clouds opened in the skies and rain poured down, cooling the fire, cooling the entire forest.

Deluged with the shimmering tears of the gods, the flames died down and the smoke began to clear. And the little parrot, washed and bright, rocketed into the sky above and laughed. He said, "Now that's more like it! Thank you to the great eagle."

Tears dripped from all the burned branches and scorched buds, but the water began to remind them that they could flower again. And all the animals looked at one another in amazement. Against the blue sky, they saw a little parrot doing loop-de-loops above the forest as the fire had stopped.

Or so it is told in the old ways, this story.

Now why do I tell this story? I think about the California fires. Some of you may have lost homes in Santa Rosa and other places. I tell it because I think that the only thing that really will motivate us to do what we have to do are those tears. We actually have to let ourselves feel, as that golden eagle did—the god who came down. The tears of that seven-year-old walking across the desert. The loss of the animals in the forest. The people who are trudging around the world as millions of refugees. Something has to be touched in us to say, it's not enough to be a bystander in this one. It simply is not.

And those tears become the tears of your loving care. As Gary Snyder said, if you're going to save it, there's only one way: you save it because you love it. And it's not just about recycling and using fewer shopping bags.

It just ain't at that level at this point.

I have a good friend, Paul Hawken, who wrote a book, a New York Times bestseller called Drawdown. How many people know this book? Great, twenty of you. There's another few hundred that will know it in a moment. Paul is a Marin visionary who's written many other things—a serial entrepreneur of different kinds, wrote Blessed Unrest about organizations changing the world.

What he did was to get a whole group of climate scientists and environmentalists and economists together. Let's make a list of the hundred things that are most likely not just to stop but to reverse climate change. Then he crowdsourced that list of a hundred and sent it out to graduate departments and think tanks and people around the world, each group taking one solution and working through the economics—what will it cost? The practicality. How many gigatons of carbon will it take out of the atmosphere? How long will it take? After a year, he brought all of that back together and made a list, a summary of the solutions that are most effective, not just to stop but to reverse climate change.

First thing is, they're all things that we already know how to do. It's not something new. Second, all kinds of new understandings came from this. For example, the first technological thing is not wind or solar, although they're in the top fifteen. The number one technological one is to create or distribute the small devices that will take the CFCs, the chlorofluorocarbons used in every old ice cream maker and air conditioner in Jakarta and Buenos Aires and around the world by the millions. Those gases are enormously destructive. And when they're drawn off, when they're retired and neutralized, that would do more for the atmosphere than all the solar power and wind power we can build.

Then in the top dozen is food waste. Pay attention to this. And agricultural practices. Synergies. Further down is methane from cows—cow belches and cow farts. You've heard about it, and how to mitigate it. But the synergies are fascinating. There's rebuilding kelp forests in the ocean. And I'm part of a company from friends who are doing that. It turns out if you put five percent of kelp into cattle feed, they don't fart. So there are all these things that were learned.

But the most important thing is it's not just the technological solutions. The number one solution, if you take two in the top ten and combine them together, the very number one intervention is the education and empowerment of women and girls worldwide. Not just for family planning—in Nigeria or in Kenya, fifty percent of the economy is done by women and smartphones. And they understand how to live and how to trade and how to grow things and how to educate their children in whole new ways when they are educated.

You can look at this. You can get the book. But even better, you can go to the website drawdown.com, because there's all kinds of things that you can do from this.

What's the point of all this? The earth wants to renew itself. It doesn't take that much—a little bit of water, a few seeds planted here and here and here, and then all of a sudden something happens and the earth knows, in some way. It's alive. It's part of you. When the governments tried to suppress the truth of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster, the wind told the story. The wind carried the truth across the nations. The wind was a poet, a scientist, and a prophet. The earth wants to work with us to renew itself. And we get to, like Tam Young Boon in that story, plant the seeds.

Wangari Maathai, who won the Nobel Prize for the green belts in East Africa—fifty-one million trees planted. She started one tree at a time. She spent some time in prison, like all good Nobel laureates, right? That's the way it happens. Fifty-one million trees, one tree at a time.

Or you look in Liberia, and Leymah Gbowee and Ellen Sirleaf, who said, "Liberia used to be known for its child soldiers. And now it's known for its women." Things can change. We have the possibility of changing this. And that's why Drawdown actually has a lot of hope in it. To raise your voices. To vote.

To teach people. To support. As your practice.

Because there's some way in which the culture—the consumer, misguided side of capitalism—wants to put you to sleep. It wants business as usual. It wants you to actually feel that you can't do anything, that you can't make a difference.

It's a lie. It's untrue.

Every one of us makes a difference on this earth. A significant difference. And your practice of awareness, of loving awareness and compassion, will lead you as you get quiet to reflect and choose a few things. I don't know what those actions will be. Some of you will be political. Some of you will plant. Some of you will support organizations. Some of you will do it in education. But when you feel empowered to make a difference, it will not only change the earth as you plant those seeds—it will also change your heart.

Because what else are you going to do in this time? You don't want to die feeling like you didn't do anything. You don't.

And how you do it matters. Yes, you want to act. But how you do it also matters—not out of anger, not out of fear, not out of hatred or aggression.

This from Molly Ivins, the great commentator and activist. She says: "So keep on fighting for freedom and justice and what's good, beloveds, but don't forget to have fun doing it. Be outrageous. Rejoice in all the oddities that humanity and freedom can produce together. And when you get through celebrating the sheer joy of standing up for what matters, be sure to tell those who come after you how much fun it was."

It's really a different spirit. It is. And it's what the earth wants of us as well.

Thank you all for coming and going on this ride, this adventure, as I try to deal with this—and I think as we all do together.

I end with a few words and a poem from Deena Metzger, an activist and friend. She writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

There is in this world of trouble and difficulty—the First Noble Truth—and of its causes of fear and separation. But there is another possibility. We know it in our hearts. We know it in our relationships with those we are closest to. We know it in our home of this earth. There is a possibility of love and compassion. And we can be emboldened and courageous with it.

It doesn't take a lot. Thomas Jefferson said, "One person with courage is a majority." And you look at Greta Thunberg—this one young teenage girl standing up in front of the British Parliament—and it's very clear who has the power. We have that in ourselves.

So maybe if you weep some of the tears like that parrot, maybe that's needed for us. But it's also needed somehow to go to the river and get the water and come back and plant the seeds. To carry this as part of your spiritual practice. You sit and you sweep the garden, and it doesn't matter how big the garden is.

So let's sit for a moment.

Thank you. Thank you so much. Drive politely out there—there are lots of cars. Take care with one another, and take care of this beautiful earth.

CHAPTER 87

Who Are You? The Mystery of Identity and the Gift of Discovery, Understanding and Joy

Jack Kornfield · 1h06

> In this profound dharma talk, Jack Kornfield addresses one of the most fundamental questions of spiritual practice: Who are you? Drawing from conversations with his dying friend and fellow teacher Robert Hall, Kornfield explores how meditation reveals that we are not limited to our bodies, our conditioning, or the identities others have assigned to us. He shares the touching story of Ananda and Pakati from the Pāli Canon, illustrating how the Buddha taught dignity and respect transcend caste and social conditioning.
> Kornfield weaves together teachings from diverse contemplative traditions—Thich Nhat Hanh's reflections on the deathless, Thomas Merton's mystical experience of seeing the 'secret beauty' in everyone, and his own teacher Ajahn Chah's instruction to rest in 'the one who knows.' Through the metaphor of the princess and the dragon shedding layers, he describes how meditation naturally releases the accumulated layers of fear, trauma, and false identity we carry.
> The talk offers practical guidance on working with difficult mind states—doubt, judgment, restlessness—while recognizing that awareness itself cannot be stopped or diminished. Kornfield emphasizes that awakening isn't about perfecting the personality but about recognizing our true nature as timeless awareness, which allows us to hold our human experience with mercy, trust, and love. The teaching concludes with a powerful story of a bear nursing a lost child, pointing to how we are all being fed and held by the web of life.

So as you sit, let yourself be at ease as you listen. In a way, this is a kind of reflection. It's not that teachings or these words are necessarily right or wrong, so much as perhaps a reminder at best of things that you know already that are true. So listen in that way, to sense what is of value, and the rest of it, just let it go by.

I was reflecting on what to speak about tonight. In part, I was thinking about the state of the world, something that I do talk about pretty regularly with concern. But then things got turned in a different way for me. I had a conversation with one of my dearest friends who used to be a senior teacher here at Spirit Rock, Robert Hall, who's now living down in Mexico in Todos Santos. I think Robert's eighty-six or eighty-seven. He's been pretty sick and he's nearly dying.

So I call him and I say, "Robert, have you died yet?" He'll say, "No, no, no, not yet." He said, "I'm hoping it's coming," because it's not easy. He's got heart problems and lung problems and pain and all kinds of other things. But we talk. I say, "So what's going to happen when you die, Robert? Here you've been this Dharma teacher." And he says, "I don't know. It's a mystery. But I do know that I'm not this body." He said, "I've had enough out-of-body experiences to know that this isn't who I am, that there's something vast and more mysterious, and not just the identity that we take in this human body as the end of the story."

We kind of play out different scenarios and so forth. And mostly at the end of our conversations, he's just grateful. He said, "You know, in the end, all that really matters is that we love each other." Not that complicated, is it?

Spiritual practice begins in some way with some very deep—and we could call them sacred—questions. Who are you? What is this life? What happens when you die? I remember Carlos Castaneda's teaching from Don Juan, where he says the trouble is you think you have time. And we don't actually know. So we live in this mystery. And then the Buddhist teachings say there's an invitation to that which is beyond birth and death, sometimes called the deathless. Now what could that mean?

So here we are. It's a late summer evening. As you came, the sun was starting to set. There's these beautiful golden hills and the San Geronimo Valley. And in each of us, there's an appreciation for beauty, this earth, along with its difficulty, and a longing for connection and wholeness. We also have our suffering, and we want to somehow find a way to live that reduces that suffering, that brings us a kind of liberation or ease or joy. Or we want to love better, or live more fully, or be more awake in some deep way—especially in a society that's so speedy.

I think it was Rollo May who said it's ironic that human beings seem to run faster when they've lost their way. And that could be so for a lot of our society as well, that it's moving really fast. Where are we going?

Or maybe our question is how to live fully. Or maybe our deep spiritual questions are about justice, dignity, respect—especially in a world where there's so much conflict, racism, divisiveness, tribalism, people mistreating one another. How do we find justice and dignity, and what are the teachings about it?

One of my favorite stories comes from long ago in the time of the Buddha. The Buddha's attendant, Ananda, was known to be a very warm-hearted man. People really loved Ananda. He was the gracious front man for the Buddha. When people would come and say, "I want to see him," Ananda was the person who tended to all of that. It also happened that Ananda was apparently quite good looking, but that's another thing.

So Ananda, the attendant to the Buddha, was sent by the Blessed One on a mission, and on returning, passed by a well near a village and saw a young outcast woman named Pakati. He asked her for water to drink. Now as a monk you can't ask for anything except water. You have to bring your bowl in silence, and either people feed you or they don't. But the only thing you're really allowed to ask for is water.

And Pakati said, "O monk, I am too lowly born, too humbly born to give you water to drink."

"Do not ask this of me lest your holiness be contaminated, for I am of the untouchable caste."

Imagine a child being born into that reality—to be told you are lower than anyone else, that if your shadow falls upon the food of the higher castes, they cannot even eat it because it has been polluted.

And Ananda replied, "I ask not for caste, but for water, please."

Pakati's heart leapt joyfully. She gave Ananda water to drink, and he thanked her kindly and went away. But she followed him at a distance. Having heard that he was a disciple of the Buddha, she went to the Blessed One and said, "Please help me live in the place where your disciple dwells, so that I may see and care for him. For I have come to love Ananda."

She had fallen in love with this man. You know how that happens.

And the Blessed One understood the emotions of her heart. He said, "Pakati, your heart is full of love, but you do not understand your own sentiments. It is not Ananda that you love, but his kindness. Accept then the kindness you have seen him practice toward you, and practice it toward others. And though, Pakati, you are said to be born of low caste, you will be a model for the noble men and noble women of this land. Live a path of justice and righteousness, and you will outshine the royal glory of kings and queens."

There is so much beauty in this story because it is really a story of respect and dignity—of seeing the secret beauty that exists in every being, no matter what the conditioning may be.

In many ways, this question—Who are we? Who am I?—is central to awakening. In India, they say that babies will sing a little song: "Do not let me forget who I am." And then the second verse goes, "Oh, I'm forgetting already."

Who are we, really?

Here is a story from a remarkable book, if you don't know it, called Tattoos on the Heart by Father Greg Boyle, who writes about his work with gang kids in Los Angeles. He started Homeboy Industries, and the book is filled with extraordinary stories.

Father Greg is working with a group of young kids at some camp where they've been sent. This guy swaggers in, and Father Greg asks, "What's your name?"

The kid scowls. "Sniper."

Father Greg says, "Okay, look, I've been down this block before. I have a feeling you didn't pop out of your mom and she took one look at your face and said, 'Sniper.' So come on, dog, what's your name?"

"Gonzales," he relents a little.

"Okay, now son, I know the staff here call you by your last name. I'm not down with that. Tell me, mijo, what does your mom call you?"

"Cabrón."

There's even the slightest flicker of innocence in his answer.

"Oh no, son, I'm looking for a birth certificate name."

The kid softens. Father Greg can tell it's happening, but there's embarrassment and a newfound vulnerability.

"Napoleon," he manages to squeak out, pronouncing it in Spanish.

"Wow," Father Greg says. "That's a fine, noble, historic name. But I'm almost positive that when your jefita calls you, she doesn't use the whole nine yards. Come on, mijito—do you have an apodo? What does your mom call you?"

Then Father Greg watches him go to some far distant place, a location he hasn't visited in some time. His voice, body language, and whole being take on a new shape right before his eyes.

"Sometimes," the kid says, his voice so quiet Father Greg has to lean in. "Sometimes, when my mom's not mad at me... she calls me Napito."

And there it was—watching this kid transform from Sniper to Gonzales to Cabrón to Napoleon to Napito. We all just want to be called by the name our mom uses when she's not angry with us.

But this is really the question: Who are we? Because we take on all kinds of personas. And then other people have their views of who we are.

The practice of mindful, loving awareness—and of loving-kindness and compassion—invites a shift of identity, both for ourselves and for how we relate to the world we are part of. These practices invite us to step out from that sense of separateness and protectedness that the kid described so beautifully. It is sometimes called the body of fear—the small sense of self, shaped by all the conditioning of someone who told you who you're supposed to be. And then you believed it.

There's a cartoon by Jules Feiffer, four panels. A man is sitting there somewhat reflectively, perhaps a little disconsolately. He says, "I inherited my father's philosophy and way of thinking about things."

Next panel.

I inherited my father's style and attitude toward the world. Next panel: I inherited my father's interests and way of acting. And in the fourth panel: I inherited my mother's contempt for my father.

Summed up in a few little panels. Like, who are you? You get all of that.

And it turns out, as you meditate, that you see all these layers—all the things you think you are and people told you are and you're supposed to be. And you get to step out of that into awareness itself.

You have your trauma. Everybody does. Everybody's been betrayed and everybody's betrayed somebody. Anybody not been betrayed? Raise your hand. You can have your ten dollars back or whatever it was.

You have your trauma, but the idea is not to be too loyal to your suffering. It's part of your life and it needs to be honored, but you're something bigger than this. And so the invitation of meditation is really to allow that identity to start to get stripped away in some way—not in a painful way, but to see through it.

I think about my teacher Dipa Ma Barua in Calcutta, who was one of the great meditation masters and yogis of India, a quite remarkable woman. She'd lived through so much suffering—the death of two of her children, then later the death of her husband, terrible illness. And that motivated her to meditate when she finally did. She realized that she couldn't count on the external things.

She had what almost everyone has at some point in their life: a death-rebirth experience. All that she believed mattered, all that she thought defined who she was, somehow was taken away, or she knew it wasn't who she was. And she had to find something else.

This is from Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh:

This body is not me. I'm not limited by this body. I'm life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Look at the ocean and the sky filled with stars. Since before time, I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass—sacred thresholds on our journey, a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand, let us say goodbye. We'll meet again soon, tomorrow. We meet in every day because this is who we are.

Now you listen to that and it sounds kind of beautiful but distant in a way. What does he mean?

He said, "I was living in my hermitage in a monastery in the hills of Vietnam, and it was a year after my mother died." He was very close to his mother, and he said, "I grieved for that whole year very deeply. And then one night in the middle of the night, I woke up and the full moon was shining in the window onto my face. I had the sense as the moonlight was caressing me that it wasn't just the moon, but that it was also my mother. I had a sense that she was there with me.

"I got up to walk along the tea plantation, and I had the feeling as I did that it wasn't my feet that were making steps in the damp soil under the moonlight, but it was our feet. It was my mother's feet and my grandparents' feet and my ancestors' feet. And I was just a part of this huge stream of life that was not limited to this body. And I knew that my mother had never died, that I could never lose her because we were one. We were together in this."

Does this make sense to you? You've had this experience, some of you anyway. And when you remember it, something remarkable starts to happen—a kind of courage and fearlessness and understanding.

Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic, was walking down the street in Louisville at Fourth and Walnut, I believe it was, in the center of the shopping district. And right now there's a monument there. It's the only monument that I know of that the government has put up to a mystical experience. But there it is, Thomas Merton's experience.

"I was suddenly overwhelmed with the realization that I loved all these people, and that they were mine and I theirs, and we could not be alien to one another. It was like waking from a dream of separateness and monastic holiness. The sense of liberation from an illusory difference was such relief and joy, I laughed out loud. I saw the secret beauty of every one that was passing. And the only problem was I wanted to fall down and worship each one as they went by. No more need for war, cruelty, or greed when we could see each other in this way. This is really the miracle—that each person that passed me is walking around shining like the sun."

It's not just a conjecture. If you actually do something very dangerous, like sit and look in someone's eyes for five or ten minutes—we can do it, you know—weird things happen. The face starts to change, and it's like, who are you? Who are you back in there? And you start to see that you're not the body, that there's some spirit that was born in.

When you meet someone who sees you in that way, just as Father Greg saw this young man and knew that he wasn't all the act that he had—well, in India, it's called the glance of mercy.

When I spend time with Ram Dass, dear friend, and he talks about his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, he describes being there and doing his Ram Dass act—former Harvard professor and traveler and LSD maven and all of that. He carried both his pride and his shame, like we all do. And he said, "My guru looked at me with so much love I could hardly believe it. Why would anyone want to love me in this way?"

In fact, he tells the story about after he was with his guru for a long time and had learned many things and was ready to come back to the US—his guru was sending him back. He said, "Now you need to go teach other people." And Ram Dass said, "I'm still uncooked. I still feel so imperfect." And his guru got up from the little wooden bench where he sat, stood up and peered up and down at Ram Dass very closely, then walked around to the other side and peered, and went to the back and looked at him. He took about three or four minutes looking him over from his feet to his head. Then he sat down, looked at him, and said, "I see no imperfections."

That glance of mercy, that moment when somebody looks at you and sees your beauty and your worthiness and who you really are—in spite of all the personality we have and all the things we've done—all of that drops away. And what happens is you get to hold your identity, but you hold it a bit more lightly.

Now, I don't mean by this that you get a pass, that you can do the spiritual bypass and run. "We're all shining like the sun, hallelujah, and I don't have to deal with anything." As I think it was Auden, the poet, who said, "You need to love your crooked neighbor with your own crooked heart." We're kind of in it together.

As you learn how to sit and be present with loving awareness and a kind of fearlessness—and fearlessness doesn't mean you won't be afraid, but that you can be present even for the fear—then you feel the layers of things that are hard for you or that you've run from. Your loneliness, the grief and tears that have been waiting, because the unfinished business of the heart doesn't show itself till you sit quietly.

In the Lakota tradition, they say that grief is the emotion that brings you closest to the gods, that it's the tears that actually open the heart. You feel your own measure of pain, you sense all of these things and honor them. But they're not who you are. They're a part of life experience and they need to be held in some beautiful way and honored. Because until we can sit with the measure of pain and the tears that we have, we also aren't free.

I read repeatedly this passage from James Baldwin, bless him, where he writes, "I imagine one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense that once hate is gone, they'll be forced to deal with their own pain."

And so if we can't sit with our measure of tears and our insecurity and our fears and our grief and longing, then we project it on others—the Mexicans, the Muslims, the immigrants, the black people, the brown people, the yellow people, the gays, whatever. When I was young, it was the communists. They're coming back around now, right?

It's the enemy du jour because as a culture, we can't deal with the human insecurity that is our lot, and love our life instead of being so frightened about it.

But to be able to establish ourselves—and meditation means to sit with loving awareness and say, yes, this is our human nature. All of it. Not bypass it. And yet, as you quiet your mind and open your heart, you also discover that all that stuff isn't who you really are. It's part of the journey. It gives you lessons. It makes you weep and laugh and so forth. But it's not you.

Identity is a really interesting property of consciousness. I mean, we don't talk about this. We talk about the stock market, right? Or we talk about real estate, or we talk about medicine, or health, or creativity. But who talks about who we are? This mystery.

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is a quality in the mind in which consciousness identifies with something. So I can demonstrate it. If I say, this hand is me, and this is something I want to feel—I can feel the hardness of the ring on my finger, I can feel these nails that are a little rough and need to be clipped. So this is me, and that's the object that I'm feeling, right? Now, I'm going to say, this is me. And I'll say, oh, these nails need to be clipped too, and the skin is a little rough, maybe I need a little goop or whatever that stuff is. And now this is me, and this is what I'm feeling.

Or I can identify myself with my body, but in a tragic way—if I lose some part of my body in an accident, I think this is my hand, but if I were to lose it, I'm still me without it, right? So I had that identity. I have to let it go.

I can identify with my family. Some of you might want to do that. Some of you might not want to, the way families go, right? I can identify with my gender or my sexual orientation or my tribe or my people, or my political point of view. When I'm with my parents, I was their son. When I'm with my daughter, I'm a father. And my identity switches all the time. I say, oh, this is who I am in this situation. But identity is actually quite fluid. So who are you if you have all these different identities? You're not your body, maybe. You're not your feelings.

All right, let's see how to explain this. We have this very limited sense of ourselves. There's a cartoon that shows two generals striding down the hall of the Pentagon with all their medals on, and one says to the other, "It really shook me, I can tell you—I dreamed the meek inherited the earth." We get identified with our views and our roles, and then we get in conflict with somebody else who's identified with a different view.

Or we get identified in modern society—we are a political person, or we're a healer. We've got all these different roles. We're consumers. Julia Child writes, "In department stores, so much unnecessary kitchen equipment is bought indiscriminately by those who have simply gone in for men's underwear." And we get caught up, and the whole society says, okay, now you're a consumer. That's who you are. It's kind of boring, really.

So who are we? Ram Dass again, thinking of him. He was teaching after coming back from India, in the early days when he was Baba Ram Dass and he had a beard and white robes and beads and things like that, doing the whole guru thing, teaching these beautiful mantras in Hindu practice. There was a woman sitting in the front row who raised her hand and said, "Ram Dass, Ram Dass, what's with the Hindu stuff? Aren't you Jewish? Come on already."

And Ram Dass said, well, yes, as a matter of fact, I was born Jewish. And I love the Jewish tradition. I love the Kabbalah and all the states of consciousness, the different levels that it describes. And I love the Hasidic masters who are like great Zen masters. And he was bar mitzvahed, as was I. And then he paused for a minute and he said, but remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side.

Of course, he was being very witty. But it was more than just witty. You are not limited by your family. And if you haven't learned that yet, I hope you learn it. Doesn't mean you can't love those people. But that doesn't define who you are—any more than Nelson Mandela coming out of twenty-seven years in Robben Island prison with such magnanimity and graciousness and compassion and courage, that he changed not only South Africa but the imagination of the world. They can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit, who you really are.

And so liberation, or freedom, is an invitation to step out from the body of fear, from that separate sense of self, and to see that you're something more than that. That you're timeless. That awareness itself—

Okay, let's do a little quick experiment. In a few seconds, when I tell you to, I want you to do whatever you can to stop being aware. You can grit your teeth, close your eyes, wiggle your tongue—whatever you have to do, stop being aware. Stop it. Okay? One, on your mark, get set, do it.

You can't do it, can you? Awareness is here. There are all these changing breaths and sounds and sensations and experiences and roles that come and go. But it turns out that underneath that is consciousness itself, a timeless awareness that's here independent of your body.

And you know it. When you go into the bathroom and look at yourself in the mirror, you will notice at certain points that you've aged, right? Come on. It starts to wrinkle and sag and lose its fur in some places and grow it in other places. It does all this weird stuff. How did you get in there anyway? But there it is and you're looking there. Okay, it's sagging there and whatever.

But the interesting thing is that you also have the experience that you don't necessarily feel older. You know that experience? And that moment is because you see that the body has aged, but who you are is in that body. Who you are is this witnessing awareness saying, hmm, getting along in this incarnation, aren't we? And that's actually what's happening. In that moment, there's a revelation and a shift of identity from being caught in who you think you are to being that observer, that witness. My teacher Ajahn Chah called it resting in the one who knows, in awareness itself.

Now when you rest in awareness, it doesn't mean that you still don't have to care for this body and relationships and drive on the right side of the street and stop at red lights and go on green lights and so forth. It is again, as our dear friend Ram Dass likes to say, you need to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number. We live in this paradox as human beings that's both personal and universal, and you have to respect it. But it's not the whole game. In fact, it's not the deepest truth at all.

And something in you knows this. It knows in the simplest way when you come and sit in meditation and you have those moments where you're able to become the witness of experience, where you can see your life with a dollop of mercy and some tenderness and loving-kindness and loving awareness. And you let go of being so caught in those worries or those thoughts or those plans. It's not that they're not there. Or your doubt or your restlessness that comes—all those things will come. And you bow and say, oh, this is restlessness.

"I know you." And after a while, it doesn't have so much power over you.

And this is doubt: "I don't know, this and that." Everybody doubts. "Oh, that's the doubting mind. Thank you."

And then judging: "Okay, you're not doing it right. You're not a good meditator. And actually, you're not very good at other things either. And I have a whole list to tell you." And you say, "Oh, the judging mind. Thank you for your opinion." You know who recorded that. We won't talk about them.

And you start to realize that you can trust awareness to hold all of this—including, as I was talking with my dear friend Robert, including as you die. And as you do, there comes a growing sense of trust or ease, joy, the capacity somehow to be present for the ten thousand joys and sorrows that make up this mysterious human incarnation.

I mean, how did we get in here? I talk about it—the hole at one end in which you stuff dead plants and animals regularly and grind them up and glug them through the tube, right? And these weird protuberances—mine stick out quite a lot, you know—ears and eyeballs. Come on, it's bizarre. And then you make love. Now, making love is a totally great thing. It's weird. You have to admit. It just is. Touching, licking, all those great things, fluids—I mean, come on. And there you are in the middle going, "Wow, this is fabulous. Isn't this weird?" Because it is. It is.

How did you get into that body? And who are you? Are you the animal body? Is that who you are?

And as you get quieter, again, and there comes the capacity to be at ease with the paradox of your human life, things start to unfold and open.

All right, I'll tell you a story, a kind of fairy tale about meditation.

It turned out that in a kingdom some time ago, there was a beautiful princess, as happens in these stories. But her father had borrowed a bunch of money from hedge fund guys and was indebted, actually, to the local dragon who had a great hoard of gold. Her father needed it for some reason—to build a new castle or pay his army or whatever. And he wasn't able to pay the dragon back.

So the dragon came and said, "Time to pay up." And the king said, "I can't do that." And the dragon said, "Well, our agreement was that if you couldn't pay up, I could ask you one wish for something. And what I wish is the hand of your daughter in marriage."

The poor king—his heart sank. How could you marry your daughter to a dragon? He didn't know what to do. He called the soothsayers. They weren't very helpful. And then someone whispered and said, "Oh no, go to the wise woman." So he sent his daughter. He said, "You go find this great wise woman who lives on the outskirts of the kingdom, and maybe she can help you."

So the daughter went, and the wise woman said, "Marry the dragon. No problem."

But the daughter said, "He's big and fiery and scaly and ugly. I don't want to marry a dragon."

And the old woman said, "Listen, it's going to work out. Trust me." You know, it's a fairy tale, right? "But you have to do something really important, and then it will work out." She said, "What? I'll do anything." "You need to buy ten wedding gowns and wear one on top of another."

Now I've learned, having a daughter, that the way weddings work, it actually doesn't matter as much who you marry—it's the dress that really matters. I have learned that. But nevertheless, in this case, it wasn't the dress, it was the dresses, all ten dresses. So she said, "You wear these to your wedding, and on the wedding night, then..." and she whispered some instructions.

So there they have the wedding. There's the dragon. There's the princess. There's the king weeping—you know, the whole way weddings go. And then they go into the bridal chamber for their night. And the dragon says, "Ah, wonderful. Now we get to become really intimate and make love. Would you please take off your wedding gown?"

And the princess says, "Of course I will, but I have one request of you—that when I take off my wedding gown, I'd like you also to take off a layer of your garments." Which of course was the dragon's scaly skin, like a snake. And so she removed a gown and the dragon shed his skin. And then he looked at her and she had another gown on. And she said, "Well, I have more gowns, so we have to do this for a while if you'd like to see me undress. Now I take off another gown, and you promised—you have to take off another layer of skin."

And as she took the ten gowns off, each time it got harder and harder, and the dragon had to use his claws and take off one more layer, and one more layer of skin. And finally he began to change form, as happens in fairy tales. And she took off the last gown. And he pulled off the last layer of dragon skin, and who should appear but a prince who'd been enchanted. You know how these things go. And he said, "Oh, you've done exactly the right thing to free me from my belief that I was a dragon"—his identity with dragon-ness, or whatever. And then they had a great time. We won't go there.

But this is something like meditation. Not in the sense that you have to use claws and pull things apart, but that as you sit, if you stay present, the body wants to release. It does. The things that are held tight start to let go. And the feelings want to let go. All the unfinished things in your heart—if you let yourself sit quietly, the tears you haven't shed, the longing that you have, the love that wasn't expressed, the fears that you have—all those things start to show themselves because you're willing to be present, and you let the skins that covered them open: your body, your emotions, and your thoughts to praise and blame and judgment. And you start to see, "Oh, that's just the mind doing its thing."

One of the problems you have is that you actually take your thoughts seriously. That's not actually a very healthy thing to do.

When my daughter Cindy was in first grade, we took a trip to California to visit my family. While we were there, she lost a tooth. She ran into the kitchen to show me and asked if the tooth fairy could fly this far. My mom shot back a look of concern and later suggested that by indulging such fantasies, I was teaching my child not to trust adults. Wasn't Cindy going to feel betrayed when she found out the truth?

So I was concerned about this. And when we were home, the next time Cindy lost a tooth and she came in bubbling with excitement, as I put her to sleep, she had a question. "How does the tooth fairy get in?" "Through the window," I explained. "Well, shouldn't we unlock it then?" she asked. "Oh, I do that right before I go to bed," I replied. "Why does the tooth fairy want everybody's teeth?" she asked.

I took a deep breath, considered my mother's concern. Cindy would soon figure out the truth anyway, so I told my inquisitive seven-and-a-half-year-old that in fact I was the tooth fairy. She cried hard. I apologized and explained that she was getting to an age in which it was more important for me to be honest with her than to play imaginary games.

We cuddled for a while. She stopped crying. She had one last question: "What do you wear?"

It's really hard to let go of our ideas and thoughts, our beliefs—personal beliefs about people, our political beliefs, our social beliefs. When you start to sit and quiet the mind, you begin to see that just as feelings and emotions will come—sad and happy and joyful and anxious and agitated—you start to realize that you can tolerate them. You do what the neuroscientists call expanding the window of tolerance, which in the old days was called opening your heart to your life. You grow that capacity.

And then you see the mind tell its stories, and you don't have to believe them all. You say, "Well, that's an interesting story," but you don't have to be so identified with them—with the feelings and the thoughts. This begins to give you a sense of choice. Instead of being caught in everything that comes, there's a kind of spaciousness that says, "Oh yeah, here we are, and maybe I don't have to believe that doubt or judgment or that anxiety or that fear or confusion. Thank you for trying to take care of me. I'm okay for now. I appreciate you trying to take care of me. I'm all right."

This sense of graciousness and ease and flexibility grows. It also makes you more empathetic to other people who are caught in their stories. You may have noticed some of them around you. The Buddha said those who cling to their views and opinions go around the world annoying people. That's sort of one of his jokes, I think.

In your practice of loving awareness, there comes the sense that who you are is not just the content of experience—that you become instead the witness to it, the consciousness that says, "Oh yeah, this too." This is really who you are.

My teacher Ajahn Chah had practiced for a long time as a young monk, very ardently, in the jungles and forests of Thailand and Laos, in the caves and so forth. He had all kinds of wild experiences—insights, and also a lot of struggles with his own mind and with the tigers and the elements. And then he opened to beautiful meditative states. Finally he went to see the greatest master of the day, another Ajahn named Ajahn Mun, and told him all about his experiences. "I need some advice. What should I do next? Here's the insights, here's the samādhi, here's the light and visions, here's all the things I've been through."

The master looked back and said, "Chah, you missed the point. Those are just experiences. They're like movies that come on the screen—a war movie, a documentary, a romantic comedy, a cartoon. You'll see them all." He said, "Those are just the movies." He said, "There's really only one question that matters: Who's watching the movies? Who are you? Turn your attention back from the content of experience."

Even as you're listening to me now, who is it that's hearing these words? And even though it's a sort of strange thing to do—because we're so used to looking out—he said, turn back. You will find the space of awareness, that one that wouldn't go away when we tried to do that little practice of resting in that awareness. Become sakkhi bhūto, become the knowing, become the one who knows, the witness to it all. There is the place you will find the real freedom that you seek.

So as you practice, you realize that you can enter different identities, and you need to. When you go to the bank, you have to pretend to be that person who has that bank account, right? Mullah Nasruddin, the famous Sufi holy man and fool, went into the bank to cash a check one day, and they said, "Could you please identify yourself?" He reached in his pocket, pulled out a small mirror, and said, "Yup, that's me, all right."

You can enter your identities. But as Robert was saying, "I know that I'm not this body. My body's falling apart. It's not going to last many more weeks probably. That isn't who I am. I know that that's true." Like Thich Nhat Hanh describing it in this very beautiful and deep way.

So the goal of meditation isn't so much to improve your personality. Yes, I could use a little improving, I know, but it's not really to perfect yourself. It's to perfect your love and to remember that you're so much bigger than all the small self-limitations, that your awareness itself was born into this body and you can rest in it. And it gives you a kind of graciousness and ease and a sense of trust that you can be here for this life.

I have so many stories that I brought to read to you or tell you. Trust. This is from Deena Metzger, activist and poet. She's been an anti-nuclear activist, a peace activist her whole life. She was also a woman who, some decades ago, had a mastectomy and then had a giant dragon tattooed across her chest. There was a famous photograph that circled all over—she had one hand in the air, one breast here and one dragon there, with a huge smile on her face. Like, "Okay, this is who I am now." Quite remarkable. And she writes as a poet: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

Because what starts to happen as you let yourself step back and rest in the awareness that is who you are, is you see that life wants to renew itself. Yes, you will go through times that are difficult. Anybody not have those? And you're a survivor. Your ancestors survived so many things and they gave that to you. You know how to do it. You let go of certain identities and new ones will arise. You let go of certain things that you've been and cling to—that's not who you are. And then something else will come. As surely as the rains that will come this fall on these brown hills.

I love that day after the first rains, when you see the little green grass sticking up in between all those dry, dead stalks that are there. Underneath there's this little carpet and it absolutely comes every time. And you start to realize that you can trust life, that actually you are life, as Thich Nhat Hanh said. I'm not separate from my mother. I'm life now coming in this form, but I'm actually part of the whole web of life.

Alice Walker put it one way. She said, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was. And it come to me, that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laugh and I cry. I run all around the house." In fact, when it happens, you can't miss it. And you know it. You know it from times of making love, or listening to a magnificent piece of music, or walking in the high mountains, or taking some sacred medicine if that's your path, or just looking really deeply in the eyes of another being, or being there when a child is born out of your body, or sitting there when it happens, or holding the hand of somebody who dies.

This will happen, by the way, just in case you've forgotten. It will happen. And that mysterious moment when spirit leaves the body and then it's just a corpse—it's not who that person was. It's an extraordinary moment. It's silent and huge at the same time. The gates between the worlds open and it's silent like a falling star. And yet something opens.

I mean, who are we?

And when you meditate, you start to realize that you can rest in this timeless awareness, that it's a gift given to you and a trust starts to grow—that you can be here for this world and care for it.

Aldous Huxley writes, "An idolatrous religion is one in which time is substituted for eternity. Endless progress is the devil's work demanding human sacrifice on an enormous scale. An idolatrous religion is one in which time is substituted for eternity." So the question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity. Can we feel ourselves in the turning of the world, of the galaxies that we're a part of? And that perspective gives us graciousness and space and a certain kind of ease and surrender and a deep trust.

Like Pablo Neruda writes, "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." There's something bigger than anything that human beings can do. It doesn't mean we don't have to take care with climate change, but there's something vast that we're a part of in the end. And you can feel that you're being fed by the world, and live in it, and love it.

So a story for you as we get near the end here. This comes from Barbara Kingsolver, wonderful writer. She writes about how on a cool October day in the oak-forested hills of Loristan, just in the north of Iran where the huge mountains are, a child was lost.

The way the story goes, it's a nomadic tribe of people, the Lori people. They were tending their flocks. They'd given a few of the young children into the charge of an older child, as has always been done among their people. And all of a sudden, one of the teenagers comes running back down the hill and says, "I can't find him, I can't find him."

It turns out that one of the littlest children, who could walk some but was really pretty small, was gone. They all run up to look, and they look everywhere, and the whole village gets mobilized. They cannot find this child. It's near the end of the day. The older girl brings back the other three children, and they get torches and they go around, and they cannot find the child. Everyone is heartbroken. How can she survive that night out in the cold mountains with not many clothes, this little girl? The parents are frightened and weeping and no one knows what to do.

And then someone said they'd seen a bear. And they say, "Oh no, not a bear, not a bear."

Just as dawn comes the next morning—because in their torchlight they couldn't find the child—they go up out into the forest carrying what they can, looking everywhere. And finally they say, "Well, maybe we have to walk further. She was such a little child, but maybe she walked up to where the caves are."

So they go up to the area of the forest that meets the face of the mountains where there are these caves. And they start walking along them, heartbroken. The baby's really still small. At the mouth of the fourth or fifth cave—nobody knows—they hear a child cry. They can't imagine, and cautiously they look in the darkness, and ominously they smell bear. But the little girl is in there, crying and alive.

They peek inside the cave and wait. It smells dank. And then they see against the wall not a dark hollow but the dark rounded shape of a thick-furred, quiescent she-bear lying against the wall. And then they see the child, and the bear is curled against her, protecting her from the fear-smelling intruders that have come. They light their torches, they make sounds, they bang on things, and they manage somehow to scare the bear enough that it comes bounding out of the cave. And they ran into the cave and grabbed the child.

Kingsolver says she went back, found a friend who speaks Farsi, another who spoke Arabic. She wanted the original story because what happened was that this little girl was alive, unscarred and perfectly well—and it had been three days of searching. Well fed and smelling of milk. The bear was nursing the child.

How could this happen? She wanted to know. She heard all the accounts. How was it possible that a huge hungry bear would take a pitifully small, delicate human child to her breast rather than make her into food? But she was a mammal, a mother. She was lactating, so she must have had young of her own, maybe lost one, killed. So she was driven by the pure chemistry of maternity to take the small, warm neonate to her belly and hold her there gently.

You could read this story and declare it impossible, even though many witnesses have sworn it was true. Or you could read this story and think of how warm lives are drawn to one another in cold places. Think of the unquenchable, unconquerable force of a mother's love. The fact of the DNA code that we share in its great majority with other mammals. You could think of all that and say, "Of course the bear nursed the baby. She was crying from hunger and the bear had milk. Small wonder."

You too are being fed by the universe. You are fed by the fields and the fruit of the trees and all that's grown and those who carry it to you. You are in this web of life that's feeding you and holding you and caring for this incarnation that you have.

And as you get quiet and listen, and there comes a sense of mystery and eternity—here we are for a short time in this incarnation, in this human body—there grows somehow a deepening sense of trust, of connection, of love. Because it's us all together.

And a kind of fearlessness that we know we're not just the limited circumstances of our life, that we're so much more than that. You know that you are a child of the spirit, that you carry that secret beauty that Thomas Merton saw shining in the eyes of every single person that walked by at Fourth and Walnut in Louisville, Kentucky on that spring afternoon. They put a national monument there to a mystical experience. You know it in some way. And when you know it, it changes everything.

It's not that you still don't have to go to work and change diapers and all that stuff. You do. But there's a kind of freedom that comes where you can play, trust, love anyway, delight, remember—all of those things.

So I feel a kind of gratitude that we have this capacity to awaken, to recognize who we are and to see each other this way. And if somebody says, "Well, why would I meditate?" Yes, it's good for stress reduction, right? Maybe it helps you with weight loss or whatever you want to do. That's fine. But it's something so much deeper and more beautiful than that. It's quieting the mind and opening the heart and being willing to live in the mystery of life in this way.

So let's sit for a moment. And as you get quiet and remember, you can sense in the end that what really matters is love. What else? What else could there be?

I was given a lovely work of art this evening by a little girl who came up. It expresses something of what we're talking about—that spirit. It's still in there, that child of the spirit. It is.

So it's time to go out in the parking lot and drive politely because there's lots of people there. And to go out into the beautiful summer evening. Maybe before you do, you could just look around for a moment, take thirty seconds, and catch the eyes of somebody and see that secret beauty that's there. Because it is. And then carry something of benefit and blessing as you leave the temple.

Thank you for coming. Good night.

CHAPTER 88

The Wisdom of the One Who Knows

Jack Kornfield · 1h07

> In this rich and heartfelt talk, Jack Kornfield explores what his teacher Ajahn Chah called 'the one who knows'—the awakened awareness that can hold all of life's joys and sorrows with wisdom and compassion. He illuminates two essential dimensions of this knowing: the timeless witness consciousness that remains untouched by the arising and passing of experience, and the engaged wisdom that sees clearly how life works and responds with care.
> Kornfield draws from personal stories—including a profound meditation with his dying twin brother and lessons from his daughter during difficult times—to illustrate how we can rest in vast awareness while simultaneously tending to the particulars of our lives. He weaves together teachings on impermanence, the paradox of form and emptiness from the Heart Sūtra, and the Buddha's understanding that suffering increases through greed, hatred, and delusion, while freedom comes through letting go.
> The talk emphasizes that happiness is a matter of heart rather than accumulation, that we need each other in ways we often forget, and that each person carries a unique song worthy of recognition. Kornfield concludes with the inspiring story of Sri Lankan activist Ari Ratana's 500-year peace plan, reminding us that planting seeds of compassion and wisdom —regardless of when we'll see results—is the revolutionary act of one who truly knows.

Please let yourself sit in a way that's comfortable and at ease, and listen in a kind of meditative practice of listening. For more than anything, the teachings are a reminder of things that you already know to be true. And if they do remind you, excellent. And if they seem off-base, then throw them out.

The Dharma is a compound, complex word that means all kinds of related things. It means the truth, it means the path of awakening, the teachings—all kinds of things. The gates of the Dharma are open and welcome everyone. Whatever your background, whatever your race, whatever your caste, whatever your sexual orientation, whatever your ability, whatever identity you take—that's kind of the outer stuff, and all of that's welcome here. But more than anything, it welcomes your good hearts and that which you know inside. It's a place of reminder to that.

Last night I was part of a dialogue on stage at Stanford for a big crowd with Tim Ryan, who just last week decided to drop out of the presidential race. I think there were just too many people and he wasn't getting the numbers. He's a good guy. He'd written a book called Mindful Nation about the power of meditation and mindfulness to change education and healthcare and all kinds of things that we know from modern neuroscience. It's helpful. He gave a copy to everyone in Congress. On stage I said, "So Tim, did any of them read it?" He said, "No." I said, "Well, do you have anything to tell us? Now that you're not on the campaign trail, can you say some real things?"

And he said, "Yeah, I want to start with something for you. I've been for the last eleven months going around the country, especially certain states—Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, various other places as well. And I just want you to know that you're not alone in your anxiety, in your concern, and in your suffering." He spoke of people who are worried economically, people who feel the weight of economic disparity, people who are suffering because of the increased hostility in the discourse, people who are suffering because of racism, people who can't get healthcare, people who are suffering because the education system isn't really working for their children. He went on and on. He said, "There's a lot of struggle out there, and don't think that it's you. Because it's not. It's us. And the only way that something is going to get changed to really make it healthy for us as human beings is if we can somehow find a way to do it together."

I found that to be very moving.

Then he said the meditation practice he used on the road from one campaign stop to another was more than anything a compassion practice. He did a Tibetan form of compassion called Tonglen, where you breathe in the suffering of the people that you meet and know and sense, and breathe out compassion and love. He said that was the only thing that kept him sane. So it was very moving actually.

And again, the way of the Dharma is to see things as they are, to speak what's true, to see things deeply.

My dear friend Robert Hall, who was one of the founding teachers at Spirit Rock—a physician and the founder of Lomi training, body and mind therapies over many decades—died a few weeks ago. We'll have a memorial here on the twenty-fourth of November. I was thinking about the Robert stories I was going to tell at the memorial, and one of the most striking ones for me was this: We had a men's retreat. We did ten years of running men's retreats, and in the evening after people sat and walked all day, we would have a circle of men sit in the middle. There were topics like fathers and sons, or men and money, or sexual history. All of them had a lot of confusion and suffering in them. What does it mean to be a man? Nobody quite knew.

At one point in one of those circles, a man raised his hand, looked at Robert and said, "I don't feel safe."

Robert took a breath, looked back at him, and said, "You're not."

And actually, that's our human condition. We could try to make it safe and do things in appropriate ways to take care of ourselves. But the reality is that we're never really safe from change. We're never really safe from things—pleasure and pain changing, gain and loss. It could change like that. And he just looked at him and said, "This is the way that it is. Now, knowing this, can you speak from your heart and say what's true for you?"

So these are reminders, if you will, of things that we know and need to remember.

And meditation, which we just did together for a time, is not in order to become a good meditator or a good breather. You already breathe fine. It's called insight meditation, and insight meditation means that as we quiet the mind and open or tend the heart, it becomes possible to see the way that life is with a sense of wisdom and connection and a freedom of spirit in the midst of it all.

It invites a shift of identity from the small sense of self that's self-absorbed—what's called the body of fear, which we all have—to realize that that's not who you really are. That's part of your personality, and you can adopt it and take it for a walk and be nice to it, but that's not your true identity.

What happens as we meditate, if you have a meditation practice, is you expand what the neuroscientists call the window of tolerance for life, for your capacity to be present with the losses and gains and fears and hopes and pleasures and pains that make up your life. More and more, you begin to be able to trust—trust that awareness itself can hold all of this, your awareness. And you can trust that your own heart, the great heart of compassion that was born in you, is big enough to hold this world. You learn to do it by sitting still and then having to bear witness to everything that's there.

This awakening that happens as you practice, my teacher Ajahn Chah called awakening the one who knows—awakening that wisdom in ourselves. And it has a couple of dimensions. One is a timeless dimension of the witnessing of all things. And one is a wisdom dimension that actually engages in the world.

The timeless dimension: You are consciousness. It was born into your body. It will leave your body. You'll be surprised when it leaves. Wow, that was quite an incarnation, wasn't it? You'll see. And in the timeless dimension, when you rest in awareness, things appear and disappear, but who you are is not affected by the arising and passing of things. There's a sense, rather, that you rest in the present, eternity, the vastness of space. Things appear and disappear on the screen, but who you are is the witness to all of it.

One way to understand this that I like to talk about is when you look in the mirror and you notice you've aged. It starts to sag and droop and wrinkle and either lose its fur certain places or get more fur other places. It does all kinds of weird stuff, as teacher Wes here says. The hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard, and it's just—okay, this is aging. But the weird thing is you don't necessarily feel older. You know what that's like? You look in the mirror and think, oh, hmm, wrinkling and drooping, but you don't feel that. That's because in that moment you're becoming the witness of the body. You look and say, oh, look what's happening to it. There's a place of awareness that can see what's there without being so identified with it, sort of stepping outside to take a look. How's it going? Oh, it's this age now. This is what's happened to it. But you're the conscious awareness of it all. Does this make sense? That simple.

When my twin brother died a few years ago—and I've talked about this once or twice before in these past few years—he was a scientist, a very creative scientist. A geneticist and a population biologist and a world explorer. He was a member of the Explorers Club. He did all kinds of amazing underwater genetic studies in the great lakes of the world—like Titicaca in the Andes, and Lake Baikal in Siberia, and Lake Malawi in Africa, where he spent a year in the water doing research. He did all kinds of other stuff too.

Anyway, there he was, and he was dying, and we were talking about it. I asked him, "You know, you belong to the Explorers Club. It has people who went to the South Pole and the North Pole and the Moon. Do they allow inner explorers?" He said, "No." He was definitely an outer explorer kind of guy. I said, "Well, what do you think happens when you die?" And he said, "I'm a scientist. You go back to dirt. It all comes from your brain." I said, "Well, that's an interesting thought. But a lot of people in the world don't believe it." And I talked about my out-of-body experiences and past life memories, all kinds of stuff. I said, "So when you die, you know, it might not be what you think."

I wondered, could I teach him meditation? No, way too late for that. Besides, you have to want it anyway.

But then at some point I said, "I'll tell you what. Just to let you know how it works for me, I'm going to meditate with you, but I'm going to meditate out loud."

So I was sitting with him—he was lying down, as I recall—and it was not that many days before he died. I closed my eyes and said, "I just want to get quiet," which I did for a while, tuning in with presence, because we're twins also, so it was very close. "And notice with mindful awareness, loving awareness, what's happening." I said, "I can feel my breath. My body's quieting."

I opened my eyes again and gazed at him. "Oh, all of a sudden I feel this wave of icy cold come into my body, and it's mostly in my genitals and my pelvis. It's like ice, and it's pretty intense." Then I said, "That's death. And it's beginning to take over your body." It just came to me.

He said, "So what do you do?"

I said, "Oh, you pay attention to it. Because it's opening and changing." Then I said, "Oh, my attention is now moving up to my chest and the area of my heart. And it's getting all warm, as opposed to that icy part. And I feel this radiance of love—that we've loved each other from back when we were in the womb, and maybe lifetimes before that. And it's so strong. It feels like it doesn't matter whether you're here in body or not. It's just our connection. It's how it is."

I sat quietly further and said, "Oh, now my attention has shifted up to my head. But I don't have a head. It's like if I close my eyes and feel, it's more like space and silence." I said, "This is the place where I meditate quite a lot. It's a place of vastness and stillness and awareness that can be aware of birth and death, pleasant and unpleasant, experiences appearing—but it's not limited by any of that. It's the timeless awareness. It's consciousness, which is what we are. And I'm just going to rest in this for a time."

"You may find this when you die. You may discover you leave your body, float out, there's light, there's a little life review. 'Wow, what an incarnation that one was!' You're a scientist, so you have to keep a little bit of an open mind. And if it happens, remember—I told you so."

This is the timeless wisdom of the one who knows. It's the one from Juan Ramón Jiménez's poem: "the one who remains standing when you die." It's that spirit that was born into you—spacious, luminous, silent, and mysterious. It's filled with love and appreciation. It has all these qualities of gratitude, but it's vast.

Aldous Huxley says an idolatrous religion is one that substitutes time for eternity. And it's really an invitation to step out of the drama of our life and ask, "Who are we really?" That's the timeless witness. And you can practice in meditation as the awareness itself, the loving awareness, resting in awareness and noticing the play of experience, beginning more and more to trust this openness.

Now, the second dimension of the one who knows I would call the wisdom dimension. Your capacity to be present and to have this timeless witnessing now lets you look at human incarnation and say, "Well, what are the rules? What is this that I've got?" Because yes, you're timeless awareness, but you're more than that, aren't you? As Ram Dass says, you have to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number. You've got these different dimensions of your life.

And so you start to see the rules of human incarnation, because you quiet the mind and open the heart in some way.

He writes about meeting a Zen master forest ranger out in the woods on a beautiful hike one day. He said he was hiking, and there was this young woman who was a forest ranger. She asked him, "Do you have any questions?" He said she was cute, so he flirted and said, "Are time and space real?" She looked back at him and said, "What you love is real," and turned away. He said, "Okay, I met the Zen master today in the form of a forest ranger." He was being a smart aleck, and she really took it up a notch. What you love is real.

So the wisdom dimension of the one who knows sees the impermanence of things. It sees that what matters in the end is not so much holding on to things, but that things change and that life is short—and therefore all the more precious.

A poem for you, by Kay Ryan, called "The Niagara River":

As though the river were a floor, we position our chairs and tables upon it, eat and have conversation. As it moves along, we notice—as calmly as through dining room paintings, and as though dining room paintings were being replaced—the changing scenes along the shore. We do know that this is the Niagara River, but it's hard to remember what that means.

It's a kind of intense poem, isn't it? And yet it's also very real. It's the one who knows, the wisdom part, that's saying: What is this game of life? It's short. It changes. You can't hold on to things.

Here's another poem:

My friends, let's grow up. Let's stop pretending we don't know the deal here. Or if we truly haven't noticed, let's wake up and notice. Look, everything that can be lost will be lost. It's simple. How could we have missed it for so long? Let's grieve our losses fully like ripe human beings. Love fully and let them go. But please, let's not be so shocked by them. Let's not act so betrayed. Impermanence is life's only promise to us. To a child, she seems cruel. But she's only wild. And her compassion, exquisite. Brilliantly penetrating, luminous with truth. She strips away the unreal to leave us with what is real—which is consciousness itself, which is who we are.

So the one who knows somehow doesn't paper over the way things are, but sees: this is the game. And it allows you actually to be more courageous, more honest and straightforward, and to have a different set of values. Because if you only had a few weeks to live, or a month or two or three, what would you do? Who would you call? What would you say? Why do you wait?

The one who knows, in the space of loving awareness, also allows you to become more comfortable with the paradox of human incarnation. The Heart Sutra begins with the lines: Form is not different than emptiness. Emptiness is not different than form. This is the expression of the mystery in another language. Things appear and they disappear. They are fundamentally empty. Where is your childhood? Where is 2018? Where is Y2K?

Where is whatever happened last month, or yesterday, or this morning? It went back into the void where it came from. And the only place to find it is back with the pyramids and the dinosaurs. It's gone. That is really wild, this incarnation. Things appear and then they're gone. This is called emptiness. Check it out. We think it's also solid. Come on, take a look. Form is not different than emptiness. This is who we are.

And so there is the sense of vastness. And yet with the vastness, there also comes a tenderness, a courage to say: Things are only here once like this. There's no day that can be repeated. Nothing can be repeated. It's always some variation, something new. What does it mean to honor this? To love it and also to be open to the next thing. And to see that form and emptiness, praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, birth and death—those are the dualities that make up incarnation. It's how it is. And that's what makes up a human life. Instead of thinking you did it wrong, or you have pain, or things disappear, or there's suffering because you're doing it wrong—it's just how duality works. And it's part of who you are in the incarnation form that you've taken.

This from Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian novelist and very powerful voice for freedom, writing out of the Gulag archipelago of Siberia when he was in prison. He says: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who among us is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

So you start to see that you contain everything. You do. This is what mind is. It contains all these possibilities and all the roles that you take. We are men of parts, says Shakespeare. We have all these roles—and women of parts—in this world. And so in this, the one who knows is not like, "Okay, let's do the spiritual bypass and just make everything calm." You actually have to be present for the life.

In the monastery, we not only had the vastness, but we also had these exquisite rituals—like you'd see in a Zen temple—how you pour the water, how you fold your robes. Everything was cared for.

A story for you. In one of the great forests in Africa, a dark forest called the Forest Dukaduk. It was that dark at night, and scary. The name Dukaduk was actually the sound your heart made when you went into it.

There was a village, and one young man who had a number of cows had secretly found a clearing in the forest where he would take them. There was beautiful green grass for the cows to be nourished. But then his milk cows, at one point, started to lose their milk. Not all of it, but less than they should have produced in that beautiful green grass. Someone was stealing the milk.

So he decided—dukaduk as his heart was beating—that he would go at night and wait and see what was happening in that forest and who was stealing the milk from his beautiful cows. He hid behind a tree and waited for hours until the moon came out, and a beautiful young woman carrying a large basket that was sealed to carry liquid rode a moonbeam down from the heavens. She milked the cows, filled her basket, and headed back up into the sky.

Astonished by this, he—as in all these kinds of stories, you know how it works—came back another time and set a little trap, a rope or something, and caught this young woman. He demanded to know who she was. She said her people were sky maidens, and they lived in the sky. But they didn't have milk there. It was her job to take this beautiful milk and bring it back to the other people in the sky. She pleaded to be set free, promising to do whatever he asked.

And he agreed. He said, "I will set you free, but only if you marry me." You know how these things work in the fairy tales, right?

So she agreed. She went home, and some days later came back carrying a beautiful wooden box with her. She said, "I will be your wife. We will have a happy marriage, but you must promise never to look inside this box."

Well, uh-oh.

And for months the couple were happy together, but one day while his wife was out, curiosity got the best of him and he looked inside the box. To his surprise, he discovered nothing inside.

When the sky maiden returned, she saw his face and she knew. "You looked inside the box, didn't you?" We know, you know. The one who knows is checking things out, right? She was devastated and a tear trickled down her cheek. She said, "I'm sorry, I can't live with you any longer."

"Why? Why?" And he began to cry. "What's so terrible about my peeking into an empty box?"

"I'm not leaving because you opened the box," said the young woman. "I'm leaving because you said it was empty. It wasn't empty. It was full of space and sky, full of light and air and the vastness of the place that I come from, full of openness. When I went back to the sky village the last time before we married, I opened the box and filled it with what was precious to me—the openness and vastness that's precious to me. How can I be your wife when what is most precious to me is not clear to you, is emptiness but not the right kind of emptiness, meaningless to you?"

And sadly, as these stories go, she went back up to join her people.

We are wedded to emptiness. It's true. We are wedded to impermanence. We are wedded to the fact that things don't last. This is our mortal dilemma, if you will. And yet, we actually have to tend it and love it. As a poet wrote: "No matter what we are and who, some duties everyone must do. A poet puts aside his wreath to wash his face and brush his teeth. And even earls must comb their curls. And even kings have underthings."

And this is it, you know. It's both empty and yet at the same time—or ephemeral, ever-changing—and at the same time, here we are. We have this remarkable life, the unique one that we're given. The one who knows sees this and becomes comfortable with the paradox of life, with both vastness and the tenderness to care for things.

The one who knows also knows that happiness isn't found by collecting and grasping things. The noble truths of the Buddha, which Tim Ryan was really talking about: There is suffering in life. Not that life is suffering, but it has suffering. Anybody not have that? Please raise your hand. I want to meet you. And human suffering increases the more greed, hatred, and ignorance there is. Those are the causes of human suffering—grasping and greed and hatred and fear and ignorance. Those cause our suffering.

But it's not the end of the story. There is a freedom that can be found as we let go of greed and hatred and ignorance. And then there comes a happiness that's not dependent on owning things. You all know this. It's fine to have some money and it's fine to have a job, and these things give you meaning. But you and I both know—I know some people who are incredibly wealthy who are unhappy. And I know people in refugee camps where I've been who had nothing and yet possessed an amazingly joyful spirit. Because happiness is really a matter of heart.

Socrates said he loved to go to the marketplace to see all the things he was happy without—window shopping, I think they call it, or something like that. And Thoreau put it this way: he said men go fishing without understanding that it's not fish they're after. It's not the fish, but the stillness and the openness and the presence of life.

So meditation isn't about some grim duty. It's a willingness to find the happiness in yourself. As Guillaume Apollinaire says, now and then it's good to pause in your pursuit of happiness and just be happy. Not for a reason, but because you are here in this marvelous world. And then you tend to it and care for it and all those things, but you don't do it in a depressed way. I assure you, when you go to a refugee camp, people don't want you to come in depressed and weeping and gnashing your teeth. It doesn't help them a lot. They're actually more interested in those who carry some joy, who can meet that in them.

I remember talking with my daughter, who is—as we fortunate people are, sometimes our children are wiser than we are—quite lovely. It was a bit more than a decade ago when I was in the middle of a very sad and painful divorce, which happened in part because my ex-wife and I are so much opposites and different. She's profoundly introverted and quiet, and I have—how do we say it—a big life of people and travel and all these things. We're just at opposite ends of the spectrum. And after especially after my daughter left, it was like we were in just different worlds. She said she didn't want that, you know, and it takes two to stay married. So, sadly, because I'm a loyal person, but that's how it was.

We went through getting a divorce, and I sat down with my daughter one day and I said, "Caroline, your parents are getting divorced. You're twenty-four, twenty-five years old. They're still your mommy and daddy, right? I know it's hard. Is there anything I can do to make it easier for you?"

And she said, "Yeah, dad. Be happy." She said two things: "Dad, first, be happy."

It's a fantastic thing to say. Our children actually want to see us be happy, and it changes them to know that that's possible.

I said, "Yes, and the second thing?"

"Get the damn divorce over with. Get on with your life."

I could have paid her. Now she's a lawyer. She does this wonderful asylum law for Oasis Legal Services in Berkeley, with a bunch of other hotshot Berkeley lawyers, for LGBTQ people whose lives are in danger from around the world. She'll get a gay man from Uganda who'd be stoned to death. She had a transgender woman from Saudi Arabia who came to a different kind of Mecca—you know, the Castro or whatever. She has all these people come who've had—I don't even need to say—who've suffered incredible abuse or loss or rape, torture, all those kinds of things. And her work is to get them asylum and help. She and her lawyers win ninety-nine percent of their cases. So it's like, go girl.

But anyway, she was wise. And this is what's possible for you, says the Buddha. Live in joy even among those who are troubled or who are sick or in difficulty. Live with joy and a peaceful heart. You can do this, and it makes a difference to yourself. It's an act of courage. And it makes a difference to the life you live and those around you. It doesn't mean you don't see the grief and weep the tears you need to.

The one who knows sees how much we need each other—the inescapable mutuality, the single garment of destiny that Martin Luther King talked about. And again, Tim Ryan was saying, listen, climate change, racism, economic injustice, the bankrupt parts of our electoral system, either because of all the money pouring in or voter suppression—he said these will not be fixed by one problem being solved or one segment solved. We have to do this together, and we need each other in some very deep way.

It's a great mistake, says David Whyte, to act the drama as if you were alone, as if life were a progressive and cunning crime with no witnesses to the tiny hidden transgressions. To feel abandoned is to deny the intimacy of your surroundings. Put down the weight of your loneliness and ease into the conversation.

The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and seen the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you.

We need each other. And there's a deep sense—you know what Chief Seattle said: we are all connected. For if all the beasts were gone, men would surely die from a great loneliness of spirit. What happens to the beasts happens to humankind. We know this in our hearts.

The one who knows in us sees all of this. And we're asked to both hold it in the great heart of compassion, which is part of that vastness, and to say, "Yes, we won't turn away, we won't deny this. And we will do what we can together to make a difference."

The one who knows sees with the eyes of the beloved. Mother Teresa says the problem with us is that we draw our family circle too small. In most other cultures where I've lived—in many places around the world—the common parlance for speaking of others in Africa and Asia and Latin countries is family honorifics: auntie, uncle, brother, sister, grandmother. They're all seen as relatives. And you know, when you go way back, some of you have pirates back there. You know you do. Some of you have been pirates in this life, but we won't go there for the moment.

Ram Dass says, "If you think you're enlightened, go spend a week with your family." You know how it works.

But the one who knows sees, as Thomas Merton did, the Christian mystic walking down the street in Louisville. There's this great government plaque commemorating his mystical experience. He said, "I saw the secret beauty in the eyes of everyone passing. If only they could see each other as they are—they're shining." He said the big problem was that he wanted to bow down and worship each one as they went by.

Here's a story from a Spirit Rock practitioner. Last year she disembarked from a flight at Kuala Lumpur Malaysian Airport. She groaned upon walking into a mammoth customs area. The place was packed, the lines stretched as far as one could see. The air conditioning was on the fritz. She realized this was going to be a very lengthy, hot shuffle that would only end with a standard stamp and dismissal from a disinterested or borderline hostile customs officer.

"What a drag this is going to be," she whined for some minutes as she scanned the whole arena. "I'll be here for hours." Finally, heaving a sigh, she started chanting metta for herself: "May I be safe, healthy, happy, free from worry." And as she did, she began to notice the people around her. Some appeared impatient and put out like herself, but there were unconcerned little children having fun and teasing. She saw colorful faces and bodies and clothing representing cultures from all over the world. And she began to spread the metta, saying metta for them and wishing the best for each one on their journey. "Metta for you, and you, and you. Metta for the whole lot of us in here."

She went on and on for an hour or two. Still chanting inwardly, she eventually approached the station. Her turn came to face a tired-looking, mustached clerk as she placed her passport on the counter. He glanced at her, scanned and stamped her document, and looked her in the eyes as he slid the passport back. "What a fine photograph. You have a wonderful smile," he beamed in his Malaysian-accented English. "Welcome to Malaysia." She felt like she was walking on air all the way to baggage claim.

So this is the one who knows—that says we're in this together. We all have our suffering and we all have our magnificent beauty. And why not love each other? Why not see with the eyes of compassion and recognize that we are connected?

And it doesn't take long. Five minutes of metta on BART or the Metro, or in busy traffic wishing well to all those other cars. By the way, you are traffic too. And they're thinking of you that way. So don't think it's just them—you are part of the problem, right? But it changes things to do that. And the one who knows realizes this is true.

The one who knows recognizes that in the entire galaxy—and in fact, in the entire universe, with its billion, bazillion galaxies, with now we understand a bazillion planets out there, and who knows what kinds of life forms—there's never been anybody like you. Isn't that amazing? Life can say, "Okay, I'm going to make something new that I've never made before, and it's really weird, and let's see what happens with it." And it's you.

So you can't imitate it. You can be inspired, and I'm certainly inspired by models and teachers and people that mean a lot to me, that I resonate with, that I learn from. But I remember—because I'm in the spiritual industry, right, so I get to hang out with swamis and mamas and lamas and gurus and masters and whatever. They're not always quite how they're advertised, but anyway... that's another issue. We'll do that another night.

What is true is that I find myself at these conferences, and there's Eckhart Tolle and Ram Dass and Adyashanti and Ammachi and all these different lamas and the Dalai Lama. And I could look and say, "Gosh, am I anywhere near as enlightened as these people? How do we compare? Could I be like that person?" Useless. I could never be the Dalai Lama or Eckhart Tolle or Ammachi. Bless them all. And I don't think I'd want to be.

If you ever saw it, there's a wonderful movie about the life of Wavy Gravy called Saint Misbehavin'—it's about all the great stuff he's done. And at one point, toward the end of the film, he's sitting in front of his altar in the morning, meditating, and then he bows, and he makes a kind of prayer. He says, "Dear Goddess"—whoever he prays to—"I pray that I may be the best Wavy Gravy that there is." There's something really touching about it, because he's not trying to be anybody else. And however weird you are, he's matched you and doubled it, so it's okay.

This is from my dear friend Ed Brown, who is the author of The Tassajara Bread Book and Cookbook, and one of the Zen masters at San Francisco Zen Center over the years:

"When I first started cooking at Tassajara, I had a problem. I couldn't get my biscuits to come out the way they were supposed to. I'd follow the recipe, try variations, but nothing worked. The biscuits just didn't measure up. Growing up, I'd made two kinds of biscuits. One was from Bisquick and the other from Pillsbury. For the Bisquick, you add milk to the mix, then blob the dough in spoonfuls on the pan. You didn't even need to roll them out. The biscuits from Pillsbury came in a kind of cardboard can. If you whack it on the corner of the counter, it pops open, you twist the can, and put the premade biscuits on a pan and bake them. I really liked those Pillsbury biscuits. Isn't that what biscuits should taste like? Mine were not coming out right."

It's wonderful and amazing, the ideas of how we think life should be.

"People who ate my biscuits would extol their virtues, but to me, these perfectly good biscuits just weren't right. Finally, one day after meditating, came a revelation: Not right compared to what? Oh my word—I've been trying to make canned Pillsbury biscuits! Then came the moment of actually tasting my own biscuits without comparing them to some previous idea. They were wheaty, flaky, buttery, sunny, earthy, real—all those Zen things. These occasions are so stunning: the moments when you realize your life is as it is supposed to be, only you've been comparing it to something that's beautifully packaged in this culture. The cover of the magazine. The advertisement. But trying to produce a biscuit—or a life—with no dirty bowls, no messy feelings, no depression and anger, was so frustrating."

Then savoring and actually tasting the present moment of experience—how much more complex and multifaceted, how unfathomable. You understand the story. Spiritual life trying to make Pillsbury biscuits? Good luck. You are unique.

A couple more stories and we'll end. Lots of stories tonight. I kind of think of things as saying, "Now what would be a good poem or story for that?" I haven't told this story in ages, and it's actually one that's meant a lot to me.

In Africa—and I talked about this with my friend Malidoma, who comes from the Dagara people of West Africa—in certain groups, certain people, he lives among the Dagara people but others as well, before a woman has a child she has to learn the song of that child. Part of her task before she becomes pregnant is to find some beautiful tree out somewhere in the land, go sit under that tree, get really quiet, and envision or sense the spirit of the child that wants to come and be born with her—that little boy or that little girl. Once she has a sense of that spirit wanting to be born, she has to ask it what its song is. And to learn the song of that child and sing it under that tree until she knows it by heart.

Then she goes back and teaches it to her lover. And when they make love, they sing the song together to invite that child to come in. She sings it to the baby as it grows in the womb. The midwives and women who gather when it's time for birth sing the song to the child when it first arrives—it's the first thing this child hears, the group of people around singing this baby's song.

Then it's taught to the village, and everybody knows each other's songs. So if the kid falls down and skins his knee or her knee, or cries or something, someone will pick them up and sing their song to them. It's sung in the rituals as they grow—you know, teenagers. The two songs of people are sung in a marriage ceremony so that they're brought together. And it's kept alive in the village until the very end, when somebody is old and ready to die. The last thing they do is gather around that person and sing that song to them.

When I heard this story, I thought, I want to live there. What would it be like to live in a culture where people know your song, know your uniqueness, know what's special about you—which there is in each one of us?

This is part of the one who knows: that which recognizes in the vastness there is also a uniqueness that is precious, and treasures it and values it and tends it in yourself, and tends and values and treasures that in others.

And then the last dimension—so many stories not told, but that's another night—is the one who knows understands how it works in this mystery: that you plant seeds and they bear fruit. That it's not random. What you practice becomes how things are.

The mind and the heart, the nervous system, the patterns of our relations, the patterns of society, the ecological patterns of the earth—these are ones that grow from repetition. It's part of how things work. If you want to learn meditation and really be able to live from the great heart of compassion and the one who knows, you have to practice. I mean, you practice guitar, right? Or you practice tennis or something. How about heart practice? You have to practice. Repetition is one of the keys. And depending what seeds you plant and what seeds you water, that's the pattern that will unfold.

Henry David Thoreau says, "I do not believe a plant will spring up where there has been no seed, but convince me you have a seed there and I am prepared to expect wonders."

The seeds can be seeds of kindness, of steadiness, of understanding, of self-respect, of courage, of standing up for what you care about, of speaking the truth, of seeing what's true, of loving another—which takes a lot of courage. There's a lot of things that ask for our courage, especially at this time.

It takes courage to plant the right seeds, and a consciousness. Yet something in the heart knows what seeds need to be planted and watered. We really do know this. And it's not a matter of time. You don't always get to see the results, but you get to focus on the best of your intention, on the value, the truth of what you speak, the rightness of what you do.

You set the heart's intention.

So the last story I'll tell, of so many, is of my friend Ari Ratana. Ari Ratana is now in his late eighties, and he's the most celebrated community organizer in Asia. He was nominated for the Nobel Prize at different times and won all these other prizes and so forth.

He was a high school teacher in a fancy prep school in the capital, Colombo, in Sri Lanka, as a young man—very much interested in social justice, very much interested in economic injustice, very much interested in the caste and racism that was happening there, trying to undo all the crazy things that human beings do with one another, seeing each other as if we're actually different.

So what he did was take his high school students, who were the sons of generals and ministers and wealthy business people, out to the poorest village areas. But he did something interesting. They were going to help in the school a little bit, yes—but he didn't bring them out there to help. He brought them out there so the villagers could teach them some things. They taught them how to use a machete, how to harvest certain kinds of fruits and crops. They taught them various arts they knew in the village, and then they served this magnificent banquet to these kids.

That was also a great kind of reversal, right? The upper-class kids—they weren't exactly white, but it was like that—were coming from the upper class and going to help the poor people. And in fact, he flipped it. Because the measure of courage and understanding and wisdom and collective that's there out in the earth and in the people who live with difficulty is what we need in this culture.

We just did a retreat up in the Upper Retreat Center—Trudy, my beloved wife, and I—a four-day retreat, which happened to coincide with four days of no electricity. So here's one hundred people. We had a generator, so there was hot food in the dining room. But other than that, it was dark, and it was cold. It got down to forty-two degrees a couple of those nights. I was really cold—I could have done without that. But anyway, everybody was wrapped in blankets and had their little flashlight things. They were cool. They rose to it. They said, "All right, we're here." I said, "This is like the old days, remember? This is how it was done for thousands of years." And it was quite a fantastic retreat. Somehow, when the power came on the last night, there was a kind of "yes, we'll get warm," but there was also a disappointment—because we'd been through something.

So Ari took these young people out to learn in this way in the village. And he started something called Sarvodaya, which is the movement of the heart where people connect one heart to another to realize that we're all supporting one another on this beautiful earth. And it began to spread. As it did, they had different projects—digging wells, building schools, collaborating between villages and different parts of society.

And Ari explained: as it spread, it reached one half of the villages in the entire country over a period of twelve years. It just grew and grew and grew because it was based on love. And he said, "We're actually not building roads and digging wells and building schools. We're actually finding those to be vehicles so people can care for one another and so people can learn to love. That's really the goal."

Sri Lanka had a terrible civil war for quite a long time between different parts of the country. The Norwegians were trying to broker a peace treaty. And in the middle of that peace treaty making, Ari called all of his followers together to the great and ancient temple at Anuradhapura, the biggest old temple in Sri Lanka. And 650,000 people showed up. This in a country that only has eighteen million people.

And he stood up there and he said, "The Buddhist teachings say that one should not look at the results if one is wise, but one should look at the causes and conditions. And knowing the causes and conditions, one can then plant seeds to create other causes and conditions."

"So when I look," he said, "at our civil war, I see that it's taken five hundred years for us to get into this difficulty. Five hundred years of conflict between the Muslims and the Hindus and the Buddhists, four hundred years of colonial oppression, two hundred years of economic disparity between the wet, rich parts and the dry, poor parts."

"And so what I would like to offer you is the Sarvodaya Five Hundred Year Peace Plan. It took us five hundred years to get into this, and it will take us five hundred years to undo it."

Five years of ceasefire. Ten years of rebuilding roads and bridges and schools. Twenty-five years of learning each other's languages and religious practices. Fifty to a hundred years of building an economic system that includes everyone. And after the first hundred years, we'll have a council to see how we're doing and what we need to focus on. And then we'll do it again four more times. And I believe at the end, Sri Lanka will be the nation that it could be.

When I heard this, I could have wept. I actually got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama, who was kind of teared up about it as well. He knows Ari, but it speaks to his dilemma in Tibet. And the reason it was so moving was that it was the voice of an elder. It wasn't somebody who was worried about a focus group or the next election cycle or how long it would take. How long? As long as it takes.

Remember Dr. King again saying, "The moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice." That's the phrase.

So this is about planting seeds, and it's actually revolutionary. It's a rebellion and it's a revolution because you don't turn back. You say, this is the heart's intention. This is what I know to be true in this life. This is what's possible. And I will be one of the ones that plants the seeds and waters and nurtures them—in myself, in the community around me, in the things that I care about.

So you meditate to quiet your mind, to tend your body and heart, to be able to hold it all—this remarkable, mysterious, painful, pleasurable human life—with great compassion and presence. And to find a kind of freedom of spirit, where who you are is not limited by praise and blame and gain and loss. You become the loving witness of it all. You become the one who knows, that awareness that is both timeless and also engaged from the heart of wisdom.

And the Buddha says, if it were not possible to liberate the heart, to be free in all the circumstances of the world, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible for you to live with a free and liberated heart, so I offer these teachings.

So let's sit for a moment.

And as you go through your days, remember to pause. Take moments to become the witness, to rest in loving awareness, to be the one who knows—that vast and spacious openness. That's who you really are. As you go through your days, take a pause, and opening to vastness, then listen to your heart. It knows what matters.

CHAPTER 89

Loving the World | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 45 min

> In this heartfelt talk delivered near the winter solstice, Jack Kornfield weaves together stories of Ram Dass, Father Greg Boyle of Homeboy Industries, and touching everyday encounters to illuminate how we can meet difficult times with an open heart. Drawing on the metaphor of imaginal cells—those remarkable cells within a caterpillar's chrysalis that organize transformation into a butterfly—Kornfield invites us to recognize our own Buddha nature and capacity for awakening.
>
> The talk explores the practice of seeing with 'the eyes of love,' referencing Thomas Merton's mystical experience on a Louisville street corner where he perceived the divine shining through every person he encountered. Through a deeply moving story of a Christmas Day encounter between a baby and a homeless man, Kornfield demonstrates how our judgments can blind us to the sacred humanity in each being. He shares how Father Greg Boyle's work with gang members embodies this teaching—taking those society has cast out and recognizing their inherent dignity and beauty.
> Kornfield offers practical wisdom for navigating dark times both personal and collective: to be unafraid to be happy, unafraid to love, and unafraid to make a difference. Quoting Gandhi, Hafez, and Wendell Berry, he encourages listeners to 'plant sequoias'—engaging in meaningful work without attachment to seeing results. The teaching emphasizes forgiveness of the past, openness to mystery, and the importance of community in sustaining compassionate action. This is an invitation to tend the heart beautifully and recognize that both saving the world and savoring it are essential aspects of awakened living.

So this evening we'll have some teachings, as is often the case. Occasionally there's dialogue or Q&A, and then there's a slideshow—short, not so many minutes. Then we'll do a bit of a ritual as we come closer to the winter solstice, because it is a time that people all around the world, at least in the Northern hemisphere, quiet themselves as we get closer to the darkest day of the year.

There are all the different kinds of holiday celebrations that go back to ancient times, fostered in all the different cultural and spiritual and religious traditions. Most of them have to do with light—lighting candles and fires, in some way trying to bring light. It's sort of superstitious and inaccurate to think that it's light to bring the light back. What it really is, is an acknowledgement that we carry an inner light as well as the outer light, and that we can trust that light in ourselves and others, and that the light will return.

This becomes really important in these times, because they're tough times outwardly. We all have our personal dilemmas, but it's also visible—the growing divisiveness in the world, the growing anti-immigrant sentiment, the growing fear-based tribalism, nationalism, racism, climate change, the lack of protection for women in many ways in the world, the cultural anxiety that we all live in. This is part of what we carry in our hearts.

One of the things that's grown out of Spirit Rock is all kinds of interesting projects and beautiful things that people are doing—people who get quiet here and quiet their minds and tend their hearts and then go out and express that stillness through caring for the world. We've got the Insight Prison Project and the Insight Out Prison Project, different prison projects that I've been involved with over time, along with others from Spirit Rock.

Dear friends who work in the prisons share stories like this: more than two-thirds of incarcerated women are in prison for non-violent, low-level drug crimes or property crimes. One person doing prison work said that one of the incarcerated women she was working with was a young Black mother serving a long prison sentence for writing checks to buy her three young children Christmas gifts without sufficient funds in her account. She seemed like a character out of a Victor Hugo novel. She cheerfully explained the tale, and this person couldn't really accept the truth of it until she checked the file and discovered that she had in fact been convicted and sentenced to over ten years in prison for writing five checks, including three to Toys R Us. None of them was for more than $150.

We carry this. We know about the horrors of the prison system in our country, the largest in the world. We know about these things, and they're not just tough for us to know about—we carry them together with our own personal struggles. This is our human life. We read about or hear about the news of people on the border, refugee camps on our own border. We don't have to talk about the Rohingya or the refugees pouring out of Syria or the Uyghurs. It's here in the U.S., and homelessness too.

I'm naming all these things because they're part of the tough times that we have, and they touch our hearts. It's not like we know this and completely turn away. There's something in us that cares, and it makes it harder to hold it.

So how do we get through this? How do we get through times where the light seems to disappear, as it does in the turning of the seasons and the earth around the sun toward our winter solstice—but also through outwardly tough times, times of darkness?

The Buddhist texts begin with a phrase: "Oh nobly born, oh you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, do not forget who you really are." This is an invitation to remember your own Buddha nature or true nature, your original goodness.

Scientists who study butterflies and caterpillars know that a caterpillar will go into a cocoon, undergo some change, and come out with wings to fly away—which is already kind of astonishing. But what most people don't realize is that they don't go in there as a caterpillar and then sprout and grow wings. They actually dissolve themselves, so that if you were to open the cocoon at a certain stage, it's a mass of liquid cells and there's no caterpillar anymore. There's just all the cells that made up that animal.

And then there's a specific type of cell in that chrysalis that scientists have named imaginal cells. I just love it—because imaginal cells are the ones that think they can fly. They're the first cells that organize all those other cells into a new and different organism, so that when it's time, it will come out of that chrysalis as a moth or a butterfly and fly away.

In a way, this is what our Buddha nature or true nature is about. We have in our own hearts that kind of imaginal cells. We each have a capacity for awakening, for dignity, for freedom, for greater compassion—to gaze upon this troubled and unbearably beautiful world with the great heart of compassion, with the eyes of compassion and wonder and the eyes of wisdom, to see it from the heart of understanding.

Because here you are, born into this human realm, into a human incarnation. It's kind of wild. Nobody gave you the manual when you came in, right?

And it's like, well, how do I do this as a human being? How do I live beautifully as a human being in this mystery?

I just came back from traveling, and was helping with my beloved Trudy. She and I were together in Hawaii helping teach a retreat with Ram Dass, author of Be Here Now. Ram Dass is now eighty-eight years old, and he's kind of frail. He's been in a wheelchair for twenty years, and he can't speak very many words this year—he's sort of losing his verbal capacity. But he was there. And Krishna Das would sing beautiful kirtan in the evening, and we would teach and do meditation, Trudy and I and others.

And then we'd also hear from people in the group. There was everything—people's gratitude and triumph: "We've done this, I've practiced, I've found my way." There was somebody who came up and talked to me about having two-year-old triplets. I said, "My God, how did you get away to even come to this retreat?" All the beautiful things. And then people also stood up and talked about loss—about a child who died, or someone in the middle of struggling with cancer. And in many cases, they talked about how nourishing it was to be on this retreat and come together to chant and sing and meditate and be in the field of love and practice.

At the end of the retreat—which I've been teaching now for a number of years with Ram Dass, Trudy and I have—he does a blessing ceremony in which everyone is given a little wrist mala, a little set of beads, and tied into it is one thread from his guru's blanket, from Neem Karoli Baba.

Now, when I was joking around at the beginning about gurus and lamas and swamis and mamas, I didn't mean to say that there aren't many wonderful gurus, because there are. You have to use your discriminating wisdom to sort them, because they're like anything—there's all kinds of gurus. But Ram Dass's guru was a really remarkable, amazing figure.

My favorite story, which he tells most every year but this year couldn't speak as much, is that he had been training and doing his yoga and meditation and learning all the inner practices and devotional practices with his guru. And he was happy just to be living in India. But then his guru said, "No, you have to go back to America and teach." And he didn't want to do that. He wanted to stay in this wonderful place where he was filled with love. His guru said, "No, you have to go back." And Ram Dass said, "You know, I feel unready. I feel I'm not cooked. I feel insecure. I feel impure in some ways. I want to become more pure."

And his guru got up off the little seat where he was resting and stood up. He looked really closely at Ram Dass from top to bottom, then walked around and looked at his side, then looked at him from the back. He spent a few minutes gazing at him, looking at every part of him. Then he sat back down and quieted himself and looked Ram Dass in the eye and said, "I see no imperfections."

Ram Dass said that was a moment that really changed his life. It's sometimes called the gaze of wonder, or the gaze of love, that can change everything.

So here's Ram Dass at the end of the retreat, and he couldn't speak much. He was sitting there, and others close to him blessed these malas. Then in front of him, someone would put one in each person's hand while we were all chanting. It took a while—an hour, an hour and a half with some hundreds of people. And he would just look at people with so much love. I had a front row seat there.

I remembered reading about Thomas Merton, the great Christian mystic. There is in Louisville, Kentucky, at the intersection of Fourth Street and Walnut, probably the only historical monument and plaque to a mystical experience that I know of in the United States. Merton wrote about it. He said, "I came out of the monastery where we were trying to do holy practices, to go shopping or whatever, and I was walking down Fourth Street. And all of a sudden I could see this secret beauty in the eyes of everyone that I passed." He said, "If we could see each other this way, there'd be no more war or hatred or greed. The big problem would be that we would fall down and worship each other." He said, "There I was trying to be holy in the monastery, and the divine—whatever you want to call it—was shining out of the eyes of absolutely everybody I passed."

I love that story. I've told it many times. Sitting there with Ram Dass and watching these people file by—everybody, the woman with the triplets and the person with cancer—all gazing into his eyes, so many people with tears. There was such beauty in it, because he just radiates love. That's all. He said, "I just love everything. I love everybody. I love everything without exception."

And you could feel it.

And it's been with me a lot as I drive or walk around, because I notice that I see people and I can say, all right, this person is a friend, I like them. Or this person I don't know very well—somebody new. But then I can change the lens, and I wonder who they really are, how their life is. What if they were more than a friend? What if this was my sister or my brother? How would I feel? What if they were my lover or my partner? What if they were my daughter or my son?

And all of a sudden, as I look and see that person and what they carry—because we all carry our measure of tears and our struggles—but we also carry such beauty behind it. The fact that we're still here and surviving. You can start to see, you can play with awareness itself. With the lens of the heart, you can start to see the beauty in everybody. It's just a different way of walking down the street, or working with people.

And so I was moved and inspired. I wept a little bit and was touched, and mostly just reminded that this is what matters. We don't do it all the time—I don't do it all the time either. I do my practices and try to remember.

The Sufis put it this way. They say, "Overcome any bitterness because you were not up to the magnitude of the pain that was entrusted to you." Like the mother of the world who carries the pain of the world in her heart, we are each endowed with a certain measure of that cosmic pain. You are called upon to meet it in compassion instead of self-pity. You're part of the mother of the world.

And so you see each person, and they all have their troubles and they all have their beauty. When the heart is open, you can say, "Oh yes, this is my daughter, this is my son, this is the closest being in the world to me." And it changes things. But we're afraid somehow inside ourselves that our heart isn't big enough, that we'd get overwhelmed, that it's too much.

Two days ago I was in Los Angeles, and Insight LA—which is the Los Angeles sister center to Spirit Rock, run by my wife Trudy, my beloved—a series of different centers in LA, we had our annual benefit. There were a number of wonderful speakers who came, people who do incredible work in the world. And the pièce de résistance of the benefit was Father Greg Boyle, who started Homeboy Industries. He's a Catholic priest.

For any of you who don't know his book called Tattoos on the Heart, which is in the bookstore—it's one of the most moving books that I've read in years and years. He's a really remarkable person. He was talking about his ministry, because what Homeboy Industries has done now for twenty years or more is take gang kids in and care for them. They teach them how to get a job, how to live in the world, how to support themselves. They have all kinds of industries, contracts with the city. They have cafés—Homegirl Café. There's one in the airport, actually.

But he gets these guys and gals who have been on the streets, who have been part of gangs. And partly they're part of gangs because they need a family. They need an initiation. There's nobody to care for them or initiate them. If you were among the Maasai people and you were a young man, they'd say, "Go and hunt a lion and come back, and now we'll see you as a worthy man in our community." There are the same kinds of initiations for young women. But we don't have that for our young people. So they're trying to prove themselves. And they do it in a kind of undeclared war on the streets—lots of violence, lots of shooting, lots of rivalry.

And in the middle of it is Father Greg. He knows them all. He's baptized a lot of them. He does rituals for them, for many of them. And as he said sadly, he also buries some of them.

He said, "My work is to take the people who've been disposed of by this culture, who've been denigrated and dispossessed and thrown out—not only on the streets, but really thrown out of people's hearts. And I bring them in and I see their beauty and I make a real relationship with them." They love him, and he's funny and he's wise.

He was telling stories—he's full of amazing stories. He said, "So I had these two homies come in to work. After a while, to get them ready, I put them to work in our bakery." These guys were from rival gangs that had been shooting at each other.

And that was the kind of stories that he told. And you could feel his humility and his calling and his care and his bravery. To see those who we cast out in some way in our culture and our time, and see them with the eyes that Thomas Merton described, or Ram Dass—the secret beauty.

So I've been reading or telling stories this year, longer stories in the classes that I've done. And there's a story I want to read tonight. I have to apologize because it's a story I've used a couple of times in the last twenty years, so some of you will have heard it. But you have to just think about it.

It's like when I hang out with my grandson Desmond, who just turned one year old and is—just this last week—able to walk himself. He's sort of like drunk, you know, like one of those little drunk people, but he can do it. And half the time his hands are up like he's triumphant: "I've done it! I can move myself!" But he has a lot of books, and he likes to have his books read. And it's not like he hears the book and then wants a new one. He wants to hear the story again. "Would you read that one again?" So keep that little beginner's mind here.

It was Sunday, Christmas. Our family spent the holidays in the Bay Area, but in order to be back for work Monday, we had to drive the four hundred miles back to L.A. on Christmas Day. Normally an eight-hour drive, but with kids it can be a fourteen-hour endurance test. When we could stand it no longer, we stopped for lunch in King City—a little metropolis of six gas stations and three diners.

Road weary, saddle sore, I sat Eric, our one-and-a-half-year-old, in a high chair and looked around and thought, "What am I doing in this place on Christmas Day?" It was nearly empty. We were the only family.

My reverie was interrupted when I heard Eric squeal with delight and glee. "Hi there!"—two words he thought were one word. "Hi there! Hi there!" He pounded his fat baby hands, whack-whack, on the metal high chair tray. His face was alive with excitement, eyes wide, gums bared in a toothless grin. He wriggled and chirped.

And then I saw the source of his merriment, and my eyes couldn't take it in all at once. A tattered rag of a coat, obviously bought by someone else long ago. Dirty, greasy, worn. Baggy pants, zipper half-mast over a spindly body. Toes that poked out of old shoes. A face like none other—gums as bare as Eric's, whiskers too short to be called a beard, and a nose so varicose it looked like the map of New York. I was too far away to smell him, but I knew he smelled. And his hands were waving in the air, flapping about on loose wrists. "Hi there, baby! Hi there, big boy! I see you, buster!"

My husband and I exchanged a look that was a cross between "What do we do?" and "Poor devil."

Eric continued to laugh and answer, "Hi there! Hi there!" Every call was echoed. I noticed waitresses' eyebrows shoot to their foreheads, and several people were groaning out loud. This old geezer was creating a nuisance with my beautiful baby.

I shoved a cracker at Eric, and he pulverized it on the tray. I began to get upset. Our meal came. The cacophony continued. Now the old bum was shouting from across the room, "Do you know pat-a-cake?"

Do you know peek-a-boo? Peek-a-boo! Hey, look, he knows peek-a-boo! Really loud. Nobody thought it was cute. The guy was drunk and a disturbance, and I was embarrassed. My husband was humiliated. Even our six-year-old said, "Why is that old man shouting and talking so loud?"

We ate in silence—all except Eric, who was running through his repertoire for the admiring applause of a skid row bum.

Finally, I had enough. I turned the high chair. Eric screamed and clambered around to face his buddy. Now I was mad. Dennis went to pay the check, imploring me to get Eric and meet him in the parking lot.

I trundled Eric out of the high chair and looked toward the exit. The old man sat poised and waiting, his chair directly between me and the door. Lord, let me out of here, I thought, before he speaks to us.

It soon became obvious that the Lord and Eric had other plans.

As I drew closer to the man, I turned my back, walking to sidestep him. And as I did so, Eric—all the while with his eyes riveted to his new best friend—leaned far over my arm, reaching with both arms in a baby's pick-me-up position. In a split second of balancing my baby and turning to counter his weight, I came eye to eye with the old man. Eric was lunging for him, arms spread wide. The bum's eyes both asked and implored: Would you let me hold your baby?

There was no need or way for me to answer, since Eric propelled himself from my arms into the man's. Suddenly, a very old man and a very young baby consummated their love relationship. Eric laid his tiny head upon the man's ragged shoulder. The man's eyes closed. I saw tears hover beneath his lashes. Aged hands, full of grime and pain and labor, so gently cradled my baby's bottom and back.

I stood awestruck.

The old man rocked and cradled Eric in his arms for a moment, and then his eyes opened. He said in a commanding voice, looking directly at me, "You take care of this baby."

Somehow I managed, "I will, I will," from a throat that contained a stone.

He pried Eric from his chest—unwillingly, longingly—as though he was in pain. "God bless you, ma'am. You've given me my Christmas gift."

I said nothing more than a muttered thanks. With Eric back in my arms, I ran for the car. Dennis wondered why I was crying and holding Eric so tightly, and why I was saying, "How could I have forgotten? How could I have forgotten?"

This is really Father Greg's work—to see each person that comes through the door in that way, to see the humanity of every person. And now, in the time of solstice, the fertile darkness, we're called upon to see with different eyes. Maybe to see with the heart, if you will.

Helen Keller said, "Although the world is full of suffering, it is also full of the overcoming of it." In these times, we can feel like despairing, worried that it won't work out. The poet Deena Metzger writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again." This is what we do as human beings—we start again.

Or Gandhi, who says, "When I despair"—and that's an amazing line to hear from Mahatma Gandhi. When I despair. So it's not just you, right? "When I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been murderers and tyrants, and for a time they can seem invincible, but in the end they always fall. Think of it—always."

So it's collective. But it's also very personal for each one of us. For me, being with Ram Dass and being with Father Greg—these saintly people—I think, "Well, am I supposed to be like them?" Still my ego at work. Okay, I could be like them. No way.

I can't be them. I can only be me.

I remember seeing the documentary Saint Misbehaving, a beautiful film made about Wavy Gravy. At one point, the film shows Wavy Gravy—who has done all this extraordinary service work, working with kids in hospitals and burn units through his clown ministry, or working in India for the Seva Foundation, which has now completed its five millionth eye surgery to restore sight to five million blind people. Incredible work. And there's Wavy Gravy, who is this sort of wondrous and ridiculous character—really, he is—and I love him. He's got his altar, and the film shows him making his morning prayer. His prayer is something like: "Dear God, please make me the best Wavy Gravy you can." It's sincere. And it's also wacky. But it's just right.

I can sense in myself that I'm not going to be those sages and saintly people. But I can be more present. I can be more attentive. I can be more loving. I can remember more often. I can see with the eyes of love. And we all have this possibility.

We're all both very fortunate and unfortunate. That's how it is, being a human being. But in the middle of that, we each have the possibility for greater compassion, greater love, greater presence, greater wakefulness, greater freedom in ourselves.

Hafez, the poet, says: "Fear is the cheapest room in the house. I'd like to see you in better living conditions."

What this means is to be unafraid to be happy. How's that? Because Father Greg is happy, Ram Dass is happy, the Dalai Lama is happy. Now I just named a bunch of guys. I could name some very wonderful women who are also happy—saints and sages of all kinds. I think of Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and Leymah Gbowee, who received the Nobel Prize. They said, "Liberia used to be known for its child soldiers, and now it's known for its women leaders." The suffering isn't the end of the story; it's actually possible to turn it around.

To be unafraid to be happy. Guillaume Apollinaire wrote: "Now and then it's good to pause in our pursuit of happiness and just be happy." This is it. This is your life. It's actually possible to be unafraid to be happy, to be unafraid to love.

If fear is the cheapest room in the house—I remember this Feiffer cartoon. There's a woman on her knees with her arms outstretched, saying, "I love you." And there's a guy standing there with his arms crossed, and the little bubble of response is: "Don't you threaten me." Oh, Feiffer is so good.

To be unafraid to be happy. To be unafraid to love. And to be unafraid to make a difference. Because you are making a difference by the way you live, by what you say, by how you see the world, by how you drive and shop and vote—all the things that make you a citizen, how you move through this world.

To be unafraid to make a difference, to plant your seeds, which are beautiful when you own them. Your own Buddha nature. There is more love, more compassion, more capacity to care for yourself as well as others, because that's the circle of compassion. Is this compassionate for them, and is it compassionate for this one here? They have to come together.

And then you join in. You join in—whether it's working for climate transformation, getting out the vote, the community garden, writing poems that transform people's consciousness, teaching refugees to read, working in the schools, or building a conscious business. Join in something that matters, where when you go to sleep, you feel like, "All right, I'm also doing something very deliberate, joining the others who make a difference." Because this really has to be done partly by you, but it also has to be done in community.

Some years ago, on a sunny Sunday afternoon in Seattle, a young Catholic priest stopped to talk to a parishioner and her five-year-old daughter, Carmen. The little girl had a new jump rope, and the priest, being young, began to demonstrate the intricacies of rope jumping from his own childhood. Delighted, little Carmen began to jump—first once, then twice. The mother and priest clapped loudly for her skill. Eventually, the little girl was able to jump quite well on her own and wandered off with her newfound ability. Priest and mother chatted a few moments until Carmen, with sadder, wiser eyes, returned, dragging her rope.

"Mommy," she lamented, "I can do it, but I need lots of clapping."

So you have these things to plant, to change, whether it's the vote or the climate or the refugees or whatever it happens to be. But we also need each other in it.

E.B. White said, "I wake up in the morning not knowing whether to save the world or savor it." This dilemma. Of course, the answer to all these kind of Zen koans is yes. The answer is yes—to save and to savor. And so you join others in this.

Mr. Rogers' mother was the one who told him that when things are really difficult and there's some catastrophe or natural disaster or a big problem, don't focus on the problem, on the fire, on the hurricane. Look for the helpers. Look for the thousand people from Alabama and Georgia and various places who came with their boats. The armada—I think it was called the Cajun Navy—from Louisiana that went to Houston to take dogs off roofs and pick up mothers and their children. So you align yourself with those who care.

And you plant your seeds, and it doesn't matter how long it takes. Poet Wendell Berry says, "Plant sequoias." They take two thousand years. That way you get out of the head of thinking you're going to see the result. And you have the joy of planting the seeds for the long term. It's so mysterious.

Don't be afraid to start anew. This is the perfect time. Not just New Year's resolutions, by the way. I got a request—I forget which magazine it was, it might have been Cosmo, one of those checkout stand women's magazines that we know—and they asked me to do an article for New Year's on lasting change. How the New Year's resolutions go out the door after about a week or two. And I said, "Lasting change? You're asking a Buddhist to do lasting change? I think you've got the wrong person here." Things change, you know.

But the beautiful thing about things change is you can start anew. With this solstice and with the darkness—it's called fertile darkness—the things that really matter in your heart can come more into the light. So start anew. Let yourself forgive the past, however it was.

There's this line of poetry from a Zen poet: "My old faults like snow falling on warm ground." Isn't that tender? My old faults like snow falling on warm ground.

There's a way in which we can look at our past judgmentally. We all have done all kinds of things—good and not so good, and then worse than that. But here's William Butler Yeats: "I'm content to follow to its source every event in action and thought his whole life. Measure the lot, forgive myself the lot. When such as I cast out remorse, so great a sweetness flows into my breast, for we must laugh and we must sing, for we are blessed by everything and everything we look upon is blessed."

So you forgive the past—it's done, it's gone. You start anew and you open yourself to mystery. Because it really is mysterious. Nobody knows how we got here. Really. Not to speak of where we're going. Nobody knows what's going to happen tomorrow. Somebody tell me for sure—raise your hand, I'll invest. But we don't know. Is it going to go up or down?

What is going to happen? It's so mysterious.

So instead, the invitation into this mystery is to keep your heart open and tend it beautifully.

This from Rachel Carson, the great naturalist. She says, "If I had influence with the good fairy who's supposed to preside over the birth of all children, I would ask that her gift to each child in the world would be a sense of wonder so indestructible it would last throughout life."

Or as Mary Oliver put it in her famous line, "I was a bride married to amazement."

And the fact that we're here, that we speak and listen and communicate and come together and come apart and that we're part of this turning world circling our star—what a wonder.

CHAPTER 90

Meditation: Loving the World | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 23 min

> In this heartfelt evening session, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a loving-kindness (mettā) meditation while contemplating the iconic Earthrise image. Beginning with well-wishes for loved ones, the practice expands to embrace all beings—human and non-human—recognizing our fundamental interconnection. Kornfield draws on Chief Seattle's wisdom about our relationship with all creatures and references the classical mettā teachings that encourage spreading compassion "to beings everywhere in all forms, omitting none."
>
> The talk then guides participants through the creation of blessing cords (also called protection cords), an ancient ritual found across Asian Buddhist traditions. Kornfield explains that these red threads symbolize our being woven together in the mystery of life, and also represent a thread from monastic robes—a reminder that we carry our practice into the marketplace. Three knots are tied: one for refuge and connection to the sacred, one for the commitment to compassion and non-harming, and one for a personal vow or intention.
> Kornfield invites practitioners to formulate their own bodhisattva-like vow, sharing Diane Ackerman's poem as inspiration: "I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace." The session closes with the chanting of "Namo" (to honor, to bow) as participants exchange blessing cords and silent blessings with one another—a beautiful integration of mettā practice, intention-setting, and communal connection.

I'd like us to do a little loving kindness practice before we do the blessing cords.

As you gaze at the image of this earth—earth rise—and all the beings on it: the ones who are suffering, the ones who are happy, the ones who are causing happiness, the ones who are causing suffering. And they change around. They're not always the same, you know. And the animals and plants, the life that makes up this earth. All of what Chief Seattle calls the beasts. He says what happens to the beasts happens to humankind.

Begin to do the practice of loving kindness, which is to open your heart. First, as you see this globe, think of the people you love the most, living their lives on this mysterious earth. And wish them well. May they be safe and protected. May they be healed and well in body and mind. May they be filled with the tenderness of compassion and loving kindness. May they live with a loving heart. May they be happy.

Feel your well-wishing for those you love, those you're close to, moving around on this mysterious earth.

Then realize that all the others—all the other humans and all the animals, the non-humans—they all have mothers, fathers. Most have sisters and brothers. They have their struggles and their hopes and their wishes. They're actually part of your family. Needless to say, some parts of your family don't behave so well. That's part of family. But they're part of our family, all of them.

And wish, as you look at this beautiful globe: May you be free from hatred, all of you. May you be free from fear. May you remember the heart of compassion and kindness, whoever you are. May you plant seeds of goodness and happiness.

The phrase in the text on loving kindness says: spreading the spirit of loving kindness and compassion to beings everywhere in all forms, omitting none—the great heart of compassion and kindness.

Here we are, floating through the vastness of space and time. "For we must laugh and we must sing," says Yeats, "for we are blessed by everything, and everything we look upon is blessed." Send your good wishes and your blessings to beings in every form.

The last thing of the evening is this, again quite optional. I'd like us to make or create what are called blessing cords. Sometimes they're called protection cords. Somebody asked this great lama, "What do they protect you from?" He said, "Why, yourself, of course"—the main protection that we need as human beings.

But in order to make them, first you have to set an intention. Sometimes it's called a vow in Buddhist practice. In Zen you might sit and say, "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all." I've talked about this often here. The problem being that when you get home, the people you live with don't want to be saved by you, right? So it has to have some other meaning than that.

And the meaning really is that you set the compass of your heart for each situation and each circumstance.

The vow in Diane Ackerman's poem: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, and the wayfaring moon, and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

I read this to one of the great lamas that teaches together with the Dalai Lama. He said, "Oh, where did you get that Bodhisattva vow? I want that." It's nice to see it all going back and forth across traditions.

So in order to create these blessing cords, I'd like you to close your eyes for a moment. Very simply, in the quiet, in the darkness of this time of year, you get to listen to the light within, to your heart. And if you were to make a vow or set an intention—a long-term vow, an intention of the heart, a direction—what would yours be, this day in December? And it can be very simple.

I vow to be kind. I vow to see the beauty in every being I meet. What would yours be?

Now, letting your eyes open. Later on, I'd suggest that you write this down, or put it in your phone, or wherever you keep your treasures. But before you do that, the next step is something quiet that will take words. If you're comfortable or willing, turn toward a person next to you and listen to them—not a conversation, no commentary. Simply listen to them speak out loud the vow that they just made or the intention they set. And then speak yours. This is a conversation of the heart. It's a different kind of conversation than we usually have. Pay attention to what it's like.

How was that—to listen to somebody else's intention or vow? Was it okay? It's kind of not our usual conversation, is it? It's actually something special in a way, to hear and listen and be touched by another person.

As the red cords are being passed around, let me talk about them a little bit for those of you who are going to do this.

They're part of an ancient ritual that goes across most of Asia, where a thread—a cotton cord—is used in marriages and healing ceremonies and blessings and all kinds of rituals. It's considered to be the thread that symbolizes that we're woven together in this mystery, that we're living on that planet you see, woven in the field of life with all the rest of life. You breathe with it and you eat with it. It is you. This is who you are—you're woven with it.

Its particular color also signifies that it's one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun, so that you wear your robes into the marketplace. You're really a monk or a nun—a monk or a nun in drag, maybe, going into the marketplace—but this is your real garment. I have this one I got from the Dalai Lama. It's a reminder of that intention you made and of your true nature.

So to activate your blessing cord, we have to tie three knots in it.

The first knot is called the knot of refuge. It's really the knot of your connection to that which is holy or sacred. For some, in the Buddhist tradition, it's the Buddha, or Buddha and Dharma, the teachings of awakening. For others, there are a thousand names for that which is holy and that which is the source to which you turn, that which inspires and reminds you.

Hold your cord and reflect on the deepest connection to the sacred in whatever form that is—the refuge or support you have. And when you're ready, let yourself tie a knot in the center of the cord to remind you of this connection that you have to the vastness and to the sacred, in whatever form touches you.

The second knot is the knot of compassion. It starts simply by holding the cord and making the intention to not harm yourself and others as best you can—not to add to suffering. This is the basis of compassion. Yes, to alleviate suffering, but first not to add to it in your words, in your deeds, in your actions. To have a reverence for life and a care for one another. To not cause harm out of compassion, and to respond by caring for yourself and others.

This is the knot of the great heart of compassion: May I help alleviate suffering, and may I not cause harm to myself or others. Reflect in your own way on what that means to you. Then tie the second knot, which is the commitment to that heart of compassion and kindness.

The third knot is the knot of the intention or vow that you just made and spoke aloud. You set the compass of your heart in this direction. You set a deep and beautiful intention or vow. Remember it now, and tie the third knot in the cord to carry this.

Now your blessing protection cord is fully activated. If you wish to wear it—again, all optional—if you want it around your neck, as mine is, you can put it around the back of your neck and let the two ends hang down. If you want it around your wrist, wrap it two or three times and let the two ends hang down.

As our way of closing, I'd like us to do a very simple chant. In the greetings you find across much of India, people will put their hands together and say namaste. The root of the word namaste is in Sanskrit probably the word namo, which means to honor or bow to. I want us to chant namo for a time, and you can feel as we chant it, or sense, what you want to bow to. You can turn and inwardly bow to this beautiful blue pearl that's floating, to the people you love, to the things you care about, to the people who are in trouble, to their helpers—to whatever it is.

Namo

These aren't really teachings. They're reminders of something you already know. Whatever nourishment, whatever reminder touched you tonight in some way, something that you got or wear or carry—take it out into the world, sprinkle it around.

Have beautiful holidays. Thank you. Good night.

CHAPTER 91

Climate Change / Ram Dass | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 1h02

> In this heartfelt Monday Night Talk from the beginning of 2020, Jack Kornfield weaves together reflections on the death of his dear friend and teacher Ram Dass with teachings on how to meet the climate crisis and other challenges of our times. Drawing from their decades of friendship and shared teaching, Kornfield shares intimate stories of Ram Dass's final days, his guru Neem Karoli Baba's simple instruction to "love people and feed them," and the transformative power of being seen with unconditional love.
> Kornfield explores the Buddha's Fire Sermon, teaching that the world burns with greed, hatred, and delusion—the same forces driving today's climate crisis. He emphasizes that while we must tend to outer problems, we must equally transform our inner landscape, becoming what Ram Dass called "loving awareness." Stories from Father Greg Boyle's work with gang members at Homeboy Industries and Christina Figueres's journey to the Paris Climate Accord illustrate how shifting from blame to interconnection can create profound change.
> The talk offers practical guidance for these difficult times: recognizing obstacles as inherent to meaningful work, choosing which seeds to water in our hearts, and maintaining wonder amid uncertainty. Kornfield recommends Paul Hawken's "Drawdown" as a resource for climate action, and closes with a mettā practice sending cooling love to those affected by the Australian bushfires—a reminder that our practice extends beyond the cushion into caring for all beings.

So here we are in the temple. And again, hello to you who are on the live stream as well, at the beginning of the Roaring Twenties yet again—a new decade. We come together to get a little quiet, and with it we also contemplate this beautiful and troubled world and our place in it.

When we come to sit together to meditate, to quiet ourselves, sometimes it's for a little spiritual uplift or new perspective, or sometimes it's just to get in touch with our own bodies or our hearts. Sometimes it's to remember, as you sit quietly, that there's a bigger picture. You remember the famous Ojibwe saying: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

Our lives are really mysterious, and we actually don't know where they're going and what will happen. You have some ideas about it, but you can't be sure what's going to happen tomorrow. Really. For you or the people you love or the people around you.

So here we had a baby blessing, and I also want to talk about my dear friend Ram Dass, who died in December.

There's a woman named Margo Weiss who created what's called the Salt Monument. In Colorado, she had this beautiful wooden temple room built, and in the middle of it is a lucite transparent crystal suspended on its points that rotates every twenty-four hours in a circle. It's filled with 7.83 billion crystals of salt—one for each person on earth. In the morning, she adds a little cup of approximately 350,000 crystals of salt for all the people who will be born that day. And in the evening, she draws off a smaller cup of 200,000 crystals of salt for all the people who died that day. Each day, when she adds the new births and takes the deaths, she does this beautiful prayer and mantra and blessing for those coming in and those going out—which, by the way, are you at some point.

So here we are, kind of in the middle between the beginning and the end of this particular incarnation, in this beautiful troubled world. What do we know?

This poem I like from Juan Ramón Jiménez:

I am not I. I am this one walking beside me whom I do not see, whom at times I manage to visit and at other times I forget. The one who remains silent when I talk, the one who forgives sweet when I hate, the one who takes a walk when I am indoors, the one who will remain standing when I die.

It's a reminder that there's some part of you—you know this—that's bigger than your to-do list and your accomplishments and your plans and your personality and your emotions. There's something that's bigger than that, that can take a look and say, "Wow, we're kind of in the middle of this life, aren't we? How's this incarnation going for you?" And step back. Because who you are is not your body—tacos, Big Macs, kale—that's not your identity. You're not your emotions, because they come and go. I hope you're not your thoughts. That would be tragic.

So who are you? You're the spirit, the consciousness that was born into this body and will also leave it. You'll see at the end, and then she'll take out that little cup of salt, and you'll be one of those crystals.

My dear friend Ram Dass died in December. I was with him the week before he died, teaching a retreat. Trudy, my wife, my beloved, and I were teaching together with Ram Dass. Ram Dass was the Harvard professor and the LSD proponent with Tim Leary for a long time as Richard Alpert, and then became his spiritual teacher, a friend and a colleague and a mentor for me, and also the author of the best-selling book Be Here Now, which changed a lot of people's lives. So many people would come up to him when we would travel or be together and say, "Ram Dass, I just need to tell you—you changed my life."

Have read this and had some effect from Be Here Now? Yeah, maybe a third or so. It's in the bookstore if you're interested. And then there's another book there called Walking Each Other Home, which is a conversation about dying. Ram Dass was eighty-eight and in a wheelchair after a major stroke, really preparing to die. This is a beautiful, heartfelt conversation about preparing to die—Ram Dass and Mirabai Bush.

Be Here Now, which came out at the end of the 1960s—he wrote things like: "When we awaken, we watch the entire drama of our lives. We watch the illusions that we get caught in with unbearable compassion. For you are all form, you are the breath, you are the river, you are the void, you are the desires and fears and illusions, and you are the enlightenment that sees it all. When you understand, you realize I am beyond space and time, for I am nothing and everything, and everything is in me." When you see it all form an eternity as a miracle, then what's left? You chop wood and carry water—the famous Zen phrase. Once you've gotten enlightened, what else is there to do? You go back into the world and tend it in some fashion.

So he was quite ready to die. He suffered a lot in the wheelchair, and his body was frail and full of puncture wounds from tubes and shots and things like that. And he died very peacefully.

When we practiced together at the December retreat, there was a big picture of his guru, Neem Karoli Baba. Ram Dass once asked his guru, "How do I get enlightened?" And his guru answered, "Love people." He said, "No, no—how do I get enlightened?" And his guru said, "Feed people. Love people and feed them." That became a big part of his life.

His guru sent him back to teach in the U.S. Ram Dass said, "I'm not ready to do it." He'd been there doing yoga and meditation and austerities, learning all these things. And his guru said, "Now it's time for you to go teach." He said, "I'm not ready. I'm too uncooked. I'm too impure. You want somebody who's wiser, like you. I have too many imperfections to teach others."

So his guru got off that little wooden seat where he would be resting and very slowly, taking a couple of minutes, walked around Ram Dass—one side and his back and the other side—looking him up and down, looking at his hands and his feet. Then he sat down, looked at Ram Dass, and said, "I see no imperfections."

That was a moment that really changed Ram Dass's life—to be seen in that way. Because we have all these judgments about ourselves, how we look or sound. Here I am, quite sniffly tonight. I'm not actually sick; it's allergies. But all the things that we have, all the judgments that we carry—and the guru looks at you and says, "I see no imperfections. You're perfectly yourself. You're perfectly as you should be." How's that?

So then he came back and taught meditation and the liberation that was there in Be Here Now. But he also served the world, chopping wood and carrying water. He did hospice work. He started the Living Dying Project and all kinds of other hospice endeavors. He did prison work.

He said, "When I go into death row"—as he did at San Quentin—"when I go in the prisons, if they're short-timers, there for a year or five years, they don't want to meditate. They just want to get out somehow. But when I sit with the men on death row, oh, then we get real. Because they really want to look at: Who am I? What is this?" He said, "I love going into death row, because we have a conversation from the heart that really matters."

I think about this because Trudy, my beloved, runs a center in Los Angeles—InsightLA—that does all kinds of social action, dharma in action, compassion in action projects: homeless shelters, work with refugees, and so forth. One of the things they've done is work in children's hospitals, and they do retreats for the staff who work in the NICU, the neonatal intensive care unit. They make retreats for the nurses, doctors, and other caregivers. They sit quietly, do practices of compassion, and form a circle where they can talk.

The thing is, if you do that kind of work, you can't really talk to other people about it. Because every week you have these babies that you're tending, these early preemies, and every week one or two of them die. You have to go talk to the parents and say, "I'm sorry, this beautiful child was born too early. This child didn't make it." You can't go home and say, "Oh yeah, another baby died." It doesn't work that way. You have to in some way hold it. But that's also a terrible thing to have to hold in your heart.

So like Ram Dass, they make a space where those who do this work can sit in the company of one another and tell the stories that weigh on their hearts and find a way to hold it—with ritual, with practice of compassion, and more than anything, in a community of those who hold it together.

This is what Ram Dass did. He worked in business, social ventures, bringing business leaders together to do it in a humane way. He started Seva Foundation with a number of other people. They said, "Well, what can we do that's of value in the world? There are a lot of blind people." So they started a project to restore sight using very simple cataract surgery, relatively inexpensive, starting primarily in India and Nepal and then spreading around the world. So far they've helped four and a half million people who were blind, who a day later walk out able to see.

So when his guru said "love people and feed them," he did it.

But he also had a field of great emptiness and detachment. I was there when a colleague of mine who had a whole spiritual community was going through a hard time with their director and other teachers. You think spiritual communities are nice places, right? And they are, except for one small problem: people. So this person was wrestling with how to straighten things out. "This person acted badly, and that one undermined this one, and this is going on." All this stuff. Ram Dass listened to it all very sweetly, and then he gazed back and said—because the teacher was all up in arms, asking "How can I fix this?"—Ram Dass just looked and said, "Hmm, attachment, huh?"

And that was all. Everything kind of dropped away because he pointed to how attached that person was to it working out or being a certain way. Like, okay, it is the way it is. How about if you love it the way it is, and maybe something better will happen?

People would come to him with their fear and their agitation and their depression, or even judgments, or even deeper things—with their cancer, or with a child who died. And he would gaze from this place of vastness and say, "Maybe this was the time they were supposed to die. Maybe they've done their work on this earth."

To hear it in a space where nothing seems to make sense when a child dies—it's so terrible—and he'd say, "Well, maybe actually it was supposed to happen this way. And we don't know. We don't know the vastness and the reasons for a human being to be born and to live through what they do."

The vastness that he held was such a field of love that people realized, "Oh, okay, I can do this. I can hold even this difficulty."

At the end of the retreat—Trudy and I have taught with him over quite a few years now—he does a little blessing ceremony where those three hundred fifty people or so would come by and receive a little wrist mala of beads with one thread from his guru's blanket tied into it. He would give them that and do a blessing. This year he was quite weak and couldn't speak very much. He was pretty frail. So he blessed all the beads and malas, and then one of his students stood there and gave them to each person as they passed. Ram Dass sat there and blessed people as they walked by, just gazing at them, offering a blessing.

He looked at people with so much love. In India, they call it the glance of mercy—when a teacher looks at you with so much love that it changes you. People would walk by, get their beads, gaze at him, and they would start to weep. I was weeping.

It was extraordinary. It was like Thomas Merton, that I've talked about other times, walking down the street in Louisville where there's that plaque for his mystical experience. The government put a plaque up there where he saw the secret beauty of everybody going past him, and he realized, "What am I doing in the monastery? Everybody's shining like the divine walking down the street, and now I see it."

And that's what it felt like sitting there, everybody going past Ram Dass with this field of love, weeping. And I thought, "This is how I want to live. I want to live being able to see in that way." I aspire to that.

Now, of course, what's true is the heart opens and closes. You can't just decide, "Okay, I'm open all the time. I'm just going to be like this and never change." You have to breathe. You know that. And love, and so forth. But there is a way to see where everybody you look at is kind of like the person you love most in the world—your beloved child, or your beloved partner, or your beloved friend, or whoever. I know you have complicated relationships. We won't talk about those. But you've got somebody that you love. You know you do.

And I do this: I look at somebody and I say, "Well, suppose that were my daughter or my son. How much would I love them and wish them well?" We have these lenses, this dimension of consciousness, where we can look at someone and then switch into love. How's that? Try it. Okay, right now. It's nice to talk about it, but take a look around and pick somebody. I mean, you're weird enough, so it doesn't matter what you do. And just imagine that they're somebody you really love, that they're like the person you love the most in the world. That's your daughter or your son or your partner or whoever it is. And you look at them and think, "Oh, how much you want them to be well, how you care for them, how you hope somehow that there's joy in their life"—all those things.

I do this on public transportation. And it changes things. I don't look them in the eyes—they'd arrest me, I know that. But then you think, "Well, what stops you from doing that? What stops you from loving everybody?"

I remember Ram Dass was teaching in Oakland. He did a whole long series of classes some decades ago about meditation, about quieting the mind and opening the heart, and then getting up and serving the world. And that included taking care of the homeless, among many things, which is one of our major problems now. At one point during that six- or eight-week series, where he was teaching people to pay attention in a different way, a woman raised her hand and said, "I have a story to tell, Ram Dass." She said, "Every day when I go to work, I take BART. And near the BART station for the last year has been this homeless man, this person who's been living on the street. And while I drop coins or money into his cup, I realized I never really looked at him. And coming to your class and kind of taking this in and gazing at people, I thought, 'Well, maybe I'll really look at him.' And then I got quite afraid. And then I realized what my fear was: that if I ever really looked at him, he'd be sleeping on my living room couch next week."

You understand? So it's really something for us to look at—what is it, what are the obstacles to our love and how we might express them?

Now, somebody asked me who's here: who's going to replace Ram Dass for the community of people that do love him? You know, Krishna Das, the great chant master, Jai Uttal, and so forth. I was sitting in San Francisco when Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh was here. Mark Benioff of Salesforce, who is one of his students, after Thich Nhat Hanh had a major stroke, brought Thich Nhat Hanh and a number of his monks and nuns to live in San Francisco so he could get really great medical treatment for about six months.

So we would go and sit in the morning. He couldn't speak, but he would be wheeled in in a wheelchair and he would sit with us anyway. And after we sat one morning, I was in the kitchen there with one of his teaching partners, Sister Chen Kong. She said that there was a big retreat at his temple in Southern California called Deer Park, near San Diego. I said, well, he's not going to be able to be there. Will many people go? And she smiled and she said, "Oh, it's full, hundreds of people." And she said, "That's because Thai"—as he was called, Thich Nhat Hanh—"has taught us that he's not his body and that we are him. So whether he's there or not, we are him. We get together and we are those beautiful teachings that he offered."

I think that's true for Ram Dass as well. I get quiet and I talk to him, and sometimes he answers—or it seems to. I also talk to my teacher, Ajahn Chah, who died decades ago, but he still has some opinions about how I'm living and what I'm doing. You know what I'm saying. We don't just live in this limited reality. There is something bigger.

Now, in all this is a hint for how to practice in these hard times—refugees by the millions, climate crisis, racism that's in some places growing, war, divisiveness. Mind is the forerunner of all this, says the Buddha. All of that really comes out of the human mind. Mind can either be—well, he says, who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can hurt you, harm you more than your own mind untrained—or the world, really. Who is your friend? Mind, heart is your friend. Nothing can help you more, not even the most beloved of you, than your own heart and mind, well-trained and tamed.

There's a text called the Fire Sermon. I'm thinking about Australia now, but I'm also thinking about all the fires that we had last summer and may well come around again. There the Blessed One addressed the company of a thousand disciples and said, "This world is burning. Monks, nuns, you have come together. And with what is it burning? It's burning with greed. It's burning with hatred. It's burning with ignorance, fear."

When we see the causes of the fire and then bring our loving awareness to those causes, it becomes possible to release greed and hatred and delusion and turn ourselves toward wisdom, toward love, toward connection. And this is the redemption of the world.

Now, that was 2,600 years ago. The world is still burning. And if we look at climate change or other things, it's the same causes, isn't it? Greed, hatred, illusion, delusion, separateness, ignorance.

So what do we do? The secret is that we have to tend the inner as well as the outer. The problems of the world, as I've often said, are not going to be solved by technology—not the most magnificent space technology, AI, nanotechnology, biotechnology, computers. None of that is going to stop warfare, going to stop continuing racism and climate disruption, because those come from forces of greed and fear and hatred.

Yes, we need to tend the outer world, we need to chop wood, carry water, do the things in the world. But we also have to transform our human hearts. You could say, well, what good is it if I just do my own thing? But you know where it starts. As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi?" Somebody has to do it, right? And as Ram Dass said, you are it. You are the world. The world is in you. You are the world. And he said it was this sense of vastness and love—wisdom says I am nothing.

Love says I am everything. And when you get quiet, you feel your connection. The whole idea of separation is completely fiction.

I mean, yes, there is a certain dimension of separation. When you're driving your car, you have to stop at the red light and let the people at the green light go. And if you think, "Oh, we're all one," you will be—but not in a very good way.

But that's only one dimension. Ram Dass used to say you have to remember your true nature and your social security number, basically. You have to put those together in your life. But if you only are a materialist, then there's only fear. How much can I get? What do I get for me? But it's not who we are.

And then the goal is not some special state—"Okay, I'm going to meditate and have this fantastic experience." Well, you could, and that's lovely. One of the greatest of Zen masters, Hui Neng, says, "One enlightened thought and one is a Buddha; one foolish thought and one is again an ordinary person." You may have noticed this in your life.

So the point, the goal, isn't to get something—"Okay, now I have it." The goal is to become love, or to become, as my teacher Ajahn Chah said, "the one who knows," to become the loving witness of this world. Ram Dass used the phrase "loving awareness," which I also use now a lot. To find, in that attention that you bring to this mystery of your life, the capacity to be the witness of it.

And say, "Wow"—because you will when you die and you float out of your body. You'll see. You're going to go, "Wow, that was an amazing incarnation. I messed up in those parts, but that part was pretty good." Then you'll see. Then you'll have the next one. But anyway, you'll see. You actually are consciousness. You're not the body. You're spirit and consciousness. And you can witness, you can observe, you can become the loving awareness itself, as we did even in our meditation sitting.

And this brings a sense of trust as you do it, a sense of grace.

Recently in L.A., we had a big benefit for InsideOUT LA, and one of the people who was part of this benefit—Trudy and I and some others did it—was Father Greg Boyle. He started Homeboy Industries in L.A. twenty-some years ago working with gang kids. And he's your basic saint. And the cool thing about saints is they're not wearing halos and robes and stuff like that. He's like this working guy who lives and works with young men and women—and now middle-aged ones too—who are coming out of the undeclared war in the streets of gangs.

And they're people he calls "the discards," the throwaways. They've just been thrown into prison or shot at by one another or by the police or whatever. And he sees their beauty. He said every one of them has some great gift. He sees their secret beauty in some way. If you haven't got his book, Tattoos on the Heart, it's one of the best books I've read in the last ten years. It's his stories of that work.

So one kid comes in, sort of strutting in with lots of tattoos and all his kind of gang gear, but he was forced to go to this retreat. He wasn't even that happy about it. Usually it's people who come who want to. He seemed unable to shake the scowl across his face, and I say, "Yeah, dude, what's your name?"

"Sniper," he says with a sneer.

"Okay, look, I'd been down this block before. I have a feeling you didn't pop out of your mom and she took one look at your face and said, 'Sniper.' So come on, dog, what's your real name?"

"Gonzalez," he relents a little.

"Okay now, son, I know the staff here will call you by your last name. I'm not down with that."

"Tell me, mijo, what does your mom call you?"

"Cabrón." There's even the slightest flicker of innocence in his answer.

"Oh, dude, son, I'm looking for a birth certificate here."

The kid softens. I can tell it's happening, but there's embarrassment and a newfound vulnerability.

"My name?" He manages to squeak out, "Napoleon," pronouncing it in Spanish.

"Wow," I say, "that's a fine, noble, historic name. But I'm almost positive that when your jefita calls you, she doesn't use the whole nine yardus. Come on, mi hijito, do you have an apodo? What's your mom call you?"

And then I watch him go to some far distant place, a location he's not visited in some time. His voice, body language, and whole being are taking a new shape right before my eyes.

"Sometimes," his voice so quiet I lean in, "sometimes, when my mom's not mad at me, she calls me Napito."

And I watch this kid transform—from Sniper to Gonzales to Cabrón to Napoleon to Napito. We all just want to be called by the name our mom uses when she's not pissed off at us.

So there we were on stage, and Father Greg was talking about his work as if this is just what he does, his job. But he also talked about how many people had died, how many funerals he'd been to because the gangs are shooting each other. It's an initiation thing—young people trying to prove themselves because they don't have a family that is intact, or they don't have a way to prove themselves. "All right, I will get a family in the gang. It makes me safer. Okay, now you are going to shoot someone and they will know you are with us."

If it were the Maasai in Africa and a young man had come of age, they'd say, "Here's your spear, go bring back a lion." But these are young people, young men and women, trying to initiate themselves. They don't have elders, they don't have a wisdom tradition, and this is the best they can do.

We were talking together and I asked him, "So what's hard for you in this?" Because he seemed so cheerful and loving. He said, "Ah, the hardest thing is when kids I love kill kids I love."

I could hardly breathe. I said, "Well, what do you do with that?" We were all on the edge of our chairs. And he said, "You know, there's still a lot of people left to love."

It was extraordinary. So much forgiveness there is. Becoming wise in some kind of extraordinary way.

The day the child realizes that all adults are imperfect, he becomes an adolescent—or she. The day they forgive them, they become an adult. The day they forgive themselves, they become wise.

And so he watches these kids grow up and learn to be something other than they thought they were, in some moving and beautiful way. He looks with those same eyes of love, choosing not to judge. One of the great Zen poets writes at the end of his life, looking at all his struggles: "My old faults—like snow falling on warm ground."

I love this line. My old faults like snow falling on warm ground. You see them. They're there. And they melt away because you're so loving, so forgiving. You learn, as Father Greg did, to tolerate the messiness of life.

So, dear friends, anything we try to do of value, anything that matters, will also be hard. We will meet obstacles.

If you're a parent, you have to protect the little ones. I have this fourteen-month-old grandson who's now learned to walk. He walks around like an Olympic athlete—I can do it! Pure triumph. And those strong little fingers—he will get into anything, open any cabinet, pulling at everything. The poor cat now has an enemy, because he loves the cat. He tries to grab her tail and pull the fur, and the cat's like, "Oh my God, he's out again," and she dashes away. Fortunately, the cat's faster. But you have to protect other people from him. Mostly, though, you have to protect him—from putting the wrong thing in his mouth, from hitting another kid with his blocks. All the ways you have to protect this child.

And then they kind of get a little bit more grown up, and you have to protect them in other ways—protect them from the bullies at school, protect them from whatever comes. And then they're going to drive. Oh my God, what will we do? And then you have to talk to them about sex. They go through puberty. There are obstacles in parenting. Anybody who's ever parented knows that it's magnificent and it's also a piece of work. But you want to do it, and you've got to go through all those obstacles.

Or if you have a garden, you plant all these beautiful things and then there are the pests, and the drought, or the weeds, or a cold spell comes—climate change and all of that—or a hot spell. And you actually have to tend it. You can't just plant the seeds and hope they grow.

Or you start a business. You will have obstacles. Not enough capitalization. A key employee quits. The market changes. You know how it is.

So anything you do that has a vision—to bring a new person into the world, to plant a garden, to build a business—there will be obstacles. In Tibet, when you go to hear teachings or go to do some practice, they say there are always obstacles. And that makes it real. You have to get through the obstacles to do the thing that matters to you.

Now, in AA they also say there are no coincidences. So let me say something kind of radical—I don't even know if it's true. Maybe we as a species, at this time on the planet, need to hit bottom. That's what works in AA. I mean, we're still users. We're still using—the oil and the coal and the armies and all the other ways that we're addicts, really. And maybe all this, all that we face, is asking us to get to the very bottom of it and look anew as a human species. We have to dig deeper somehow in this and not just cover it over.

And so the despair that many people express, the anxiety, the fear, the overwhelm—we have to do something, to go deep in our own hearts and go deep in our minds as a species.

When we did a day on climate change here last year, in conjunction with Jerry Brown's climate summit in San Francisco—thank you to Jerry and to the state of California and all that it's doing—up here in front, I had a dialogue with Christina Figueres, a Costa Rican diplomat who was appointed to be the United Nations Special Representative for Climate Change. She organized the Rio summit and she organized the Paris summit.

The story she told was that as she was trying to get the Paris climate summit to happen, it got worse and worse, more and more difficult. People were recalcitrant. Nations were acting badly. She got more and more depressed and worried and afraid, and in some deep way was losing faith in the whole process.

A friend said, "You know, you need to step out of this. There's a place in southern France called Plum Village, run by Thich Nhat Hanh, a Zen Master." When Thich Nhat Hanh first came to San Francisco Zen Center to visit in the 80s, I met him at that time.

The abbot of the Zen Center at the time described him as a cross between a snail, because he's very slow, a cloud, because he's so empty, and a piece of heavy machinery—because there's also something about him that's just unshakable and unstoppable.

So she went down to Plum Village for a couple of weeks or longer. And she said it changed everything. Because when she went in, the field that she was wrestling with was victims and perpetrators. Which country did it to which country? Who did it? Whose fault is it? And they were all blaming each other. When she left Thich Nhat Hanh—because he's the great teacher of interdependence—she realized we're a family. We're all related. And she changed the whole template of how she was bringing Paris together. One hundred and eighty-three countries signed the climate accord.

So there will be obstacles. And you will feel fear, anxiety, or despair. But it's not the end of the story.

Rachel Carson, the great environmentalist from fifty years ago, wrote: "If I had influence with the good fairies who preside over the birth of all children, I would simply ask that her gift to each child in the world would be a sense of wonder so indestructible that it would last throughout their life."

What Christina Figueres did is what we all need to do in some way—to move from blame and judgment and anger and fear to a sense that we're in this together. To operate more from a sense of grace and mystery, because we don't know how it's going to play out, and then do something.

A French general—I think his name was Lautrey—ordered that a certain kind of olive tree be planted in the place he'd taken over after the Second World War. Some days later, he asked in an annoyed way why they weren't there in the garden yet. The gardener said, "But, you know, General, this particular species of tree takes a hundred years to mature." And he said, "In that case, plant them this morning." Let's not wait.

You come to the temple to quiet the mind, to listen deeply. You're with the complexity or stress or whatever brings you. You have a meditation practice, at least many of you do, and you use that also to get quiet. And to listen. To listen to what matters. To tend the heart. To steady the heart. And to find a kind of trust in this great mystery.

What's beautiful is to see the land now. You know how incredibly dry it was, how brown. It seemed like a desert in some way. And then a few big rainstorms came for days, and it came alive with green. All the animals here are happy. The ones in Australia are in trouble right now. But there's something about life that wants to renew itself. And the thing is, you are that life. You also are part of this renewal.

Deena Metzger, an activist and poet and friend, writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

It's never too late to start and to do something beautiful and magnificent.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching. He said the mind and heart—the human mind and heart—is like a piece of land already planted with different kinds of seeds. Seeds of joy, peace, mindfulness, understanding, and love. Seeds of craving, anger, fear, hatred, and forgetfulness. These healthy and unhealthy seeds are always there—you may have noticed—sleeping in the soil of your own heart and mind. The quality of your life depends on the seeds that you water. If you water a seed of peace, peace will grow. When the seeds of happiness are watered, you will become happy. When the seed of fear or anger is watered, you will become frightened or angry. The seeds that are watered frequently are those that will grow strong.

This is the way it works for us. You become loving awareness, you look at your own life, and then you can choose what to create, how to act, what seeds you want to water.

As Wendell Berry, another great poet, says: "Be joyful, though you've considered all the facts." Because the world really is connected. And it wants to renew itself. It wants to renew itself through you.

I'm trying to consider whether to tell one more story. Ram Dass told me I tell too many stories. I said, "Ram Dass, this is like the pot calling the kettle black." But you know how it is—it's much easier to see it outside yourself than within.

So there's a woman who started a sanctuary for elephants in Tennessee. There were all these retired circus elephants and elephants that had been used in various ways. They were getting older, and she wanted to make a place that was safe for them. She got lots of acres in Tennessee—good horse country, now elephant country.

She described this story. She'd been working there for a dozen years or longer when an elephant in a zoo in Baton Rouge had gotten too old for them to take care of. A female elephant named Shirley. So Shirley was packed up in one of those big elephant trailers and brought all the way to Tennessee. They put her in an outdoor elephant pen next to where all the other elephants were, so they could get to know each other before she was released into the whole community.

Well, when Shirley arrived and the other elephants came by, she went a little berserk. She started trumpeting and stomping her feet and beating on the gates and the bars. They just couldn't figure it out. They did a little research. It turned out that thirty years before, when Shirley was just a few years old, she had been part of a group of elephants with one of the elephants that was there now, before she was sent to the zoo. She'd seen her friend. It had been thirty years, and she was just so excited.

That's what they found when they did the research. And in fact, that was the other elephant that came and poked its trunk through the bars. When they let Shirley out, those two became best friends—after thirty years.

It's mysterious. We are connected. And we can do something. It's never too late.

So here's a question. Let yourself sit quietly for a moment. What seeds do you want to water in your own heart and mind? And in this world? And what are the obstacles you'll face—the obstacles you need to overcome so that these healthy seeds, these beautiful seeds, can grow?

I have a possible suggestion for you among the seeds you might water. I'm actually going to hold up a book from my friend Paul Hawken called Drawdown—a New York Times bestseller about the most comprehensive plan ever proposed to reverse global warming. After crowdsourcing it around the world to the best experts, in the back of the book is a summary of one hundred solutions to reverse global warming—not just to stop it. All kinds of things: everything from food waste to the education of women and girls, which is at the very top of the list and would change the world. Yes, there's solar and wind, but there's all kinds of other approaches too.

Pick one. Just get the book and choose which one. It doesn't matter. Pick one of the hundred. If you want something to do, there are seeds to water. I really recommend it. It gives heart instead of leaving you feeling like things are impossible. They're not.

The second book that may give you a hint is called A Bright Future by Joshua Goldstein and Stefan Kvist. Steven Pinker, the Harvard professor who is really an anthropologist, philosopher, and historian looking at human development over centuries, writes on the front cover that this is the most important book about climate change that he's read. On the back, James Hansen, who is the head of NASA and one of our most important climate scientists, says this lays out the only viable path proposed for rapid global decarbonization. Christine Todd Whitman says this is the path for us. And it says how some countries have solved climate change and the rest can follow. Now I have your attention.

What this is, actually, is a vision of using nuclear power—which, you know, some of us who were hippies and activists boycotted. But fourth generation nuclear power plants that don't use water, that use sodium, that are much smaller, that have a greatly decreased amount of radioactive material which can then be reused in a cycle—these are not only incredibly safer than the big old ones that have scared people, but it turns out that Sweden doesn't use coal or gas anymore, pretty much just does this. If India or China were to choose to do this, or the United States—build a thousand of these—China, no more use of coal, no more use of oil. It could entirely change the energy needed to run a country, and these can be designed in a way that doesn't add to the danger of nuclear proliferation. It's just one of the many things in Drawdown, but one of the more important ones.

We sit here while the fires are burning in Australia and the climate is changing in all these other places. I'm particularly aware of this at the moment because we had all our own fires last summer, didn't we? Lots of them. I want us, just before we end, to do a little bit of metta, send a little cooling love to them.

But first, a blessing from John O'Donohue:

On the day when the weight ends on your shoulders and you stumble, may the clay of the earth dance to balance you. May the nourishment of the earth be yours. May the clarity of light be yours. May the fluency of the ocean be yours. May the protection of the ancestors be yours. And so may a slow wind work these words of love around you, an invisible cloak to hold your life.

Let your eyes close again gently. Remember who you are. You are consciousness itself. You are loving awareness inhabiting this body. You are connected to everything, not separate from it at all. You are life moving itself through you as through all the grass that shoots up from the soil. You are the web of life tending itself, and you are the vastness.

With your good heart, picture or send blessings of loving kindness and coolness and care to all the creatures, the humans and animals of Australia, all those running from these great fires. May they be cooled. May the winds abate and the heat diminish. May the fires go out, sprinkled with love and water and tears. And may life restore itself, as it will again, there and everywhere.

And finally, bring that same tenderness to your own heart, to your own body and mind. Water the seeds of your own love and courage and goodness.

Thank you for your kind attention. Thanks for singing to the baby—it's a sweet thing to do. Drive safely out there; it's crowded. Be polite with one another the best you can. And come back to Spirit Rock sometime. Let it be a place to walk the land or come on a retreat, whatever would serve you.

Thanks, and good night.

CHAPTER 92

Calm Clarity Compassion | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 1h10

> In this profound Monday Night Talk, Jack Kornfield invites reflection on how we navigate hard times as bodhisattvas—beings committed to the awakening and alleviation of suffering for all. Drawing on Śāntideva's prayer recited by the Dalai Lama and the inspiring example of Sri Lankan peace activist A.T. Ariyaratne, Kornfield illuminates how one centered person can show the way for many, whether on a refugee boat or in the midst of global crisis.
> Kornfield shares teachings he offered to quarantined practitioners in China, emphasizing that difficulties become the perfect ground for growing the great heart of compassion. He explores how we 'other' the natural world through war metaphors and divisive language, and how true transformation begins with changing our own consciousness rather than fighting external enemies. The talk weaves together stories of Ram Dass's transformation, the power of empowering women and girls as climate solutions, and the importance of becoming 'loving awareness.'
> Environmentalist Paul Hawken joins to discuss his work on Drawdown and the forthcoming Regeneration project. He traces the remarkable lineage from Emerson reading the Bhagavad Gītā to Thoreau's civil disobedience to Gandhi to Martin Luther King Jr., revealing how movements arise mysteriously through countless unknown actors. Hawken reframes climate change not as something happening 'to' us but 'for' us—feedback inviting us to take full responsibility and act from love rather than fear. Both teachers call us to embody our deepest intentions, to be the person on the boat who remains centered, and to offer our gifts to a world in need.

So I'd like to talk tonight in a way, more or less as usual, that's a reminder to you of something that you already know—not so much new information, but rather a reminder for your own heart and your own reflection to consider: what is it that you do know? And in particular, how do we navigate through hard times, and what would it be like to be a bodhisattva in hard times?

Bodhisattva is a Buddhist term, a compound word. Bodhi means enlightened or awakened, and sattva means being. It's a being who's committed to the awakening or the alleviation of suffering for all—somebody who's committed to say, "My life, my energy, is to relieve suffering and bring wellbeing to as many beings as possible." Some little task like that.

The Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning with this beautiful prayer from Shantideva where he says: May I be a raft, a bridge, a boat to help those cross the stream of the flood. May I be a lamp for those lost in the darkness. May I be medicine for those who are sick. May I be a resting place for those who are weary. And may I do so as long as earth and sky and stars and galaxies exist, so that I can contribute to the awakening of all, for as long as mortal beings exist. Some little vow like that. Fortunately, he has lots of lifetimes to work on it. But you do too. You'll see. Big surprise here.

Aldous Huxley said that an idolatrous religion is one in which time is substituted for eternity. The religion of progress, of endless progress, is a substitution for the mystery that we exist at all—that the stars exist and that life takes all these forms. Endless progress. Remember when computers were going to mean you'd have lots of free time? How has that worked out for you?

An idolatrous religion in which time is substituted for eternity. And we're in the cycle in California. The hills are still green and the plum trees and the quince pop their blossoms. As Pablo Neruda wrote, you can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring. There is a regeneration. There's something about life itself that wants to renew itself and that will have its way no matter what. And we get to pause for a moment and look at that plum tree or those quince flowers or hear the bird song. They're more active now. They're singing because they're happy.

So this is a good evening to come to Spirit Rock as well because there's a lot going on out there, and it's a good time to pause and feel, as you quiet down, that sense of loving awareness that is who you really are—a sense of vastness or perspective, timelessness. That famous Ojibwa saying: sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky. To have that perspective.

And yes, we're in volatile times. There's the pandemic—coronavirus is coming to visit your town soon, probably. And then there's politics, in case you haven't noticed. All of that going on, and climate change, and refugees—partly all connected as a matter of fact, all those climate refugees and more—and continuing warfare, and continuing divisiveness, and continuing racism. It's a really uncertain time.

How do we navigate it as human beings? What's really our way in uncertain times?

The vast perspective. The image I like was from Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh, who wrote: when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates—and as I say this now, I think of the refugee boats in the Mediterranean trying to get to Europe, trying to get to Lesbos in Greece or to Sicily in Italy or across past Gibraltar; there are refugees in boats everywhere—when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive.

That's the image, in his both profound and poetic voice, to say: rough seas, this is your time. This is your time to be that person on the boat.

I think about my dear friend, someone I admire a lot, named A.T. Ariyaratne, who is the Gandhi of Sri Lanka. He's now in his eighties. He's been nominated for the Nobel Prize many times. He's gotten other great awards for being the best community organizer in all of Asia. I think about being with him in Singapore at a big conference a couple of years ago.

And the conference—it was a Wisdom 2.0 conference, a lovely gathering—was full of tech titans and CEOs and powerful leaders and brilliant people. And then Ari got up. He's a little bit soft-spoken, his voice gentle but clear. He stood there and said, "There's another way that we human beings have. There's the way of greed, the way of hatred, the fear and ignorance—and that's rampant. But I want you to remember that there is another way."

And he spoke as you find in one of the Buddhist texts: "Others will be harsh. I will respond with compassion. Others will be greedy. I will be generous. Others will speak falsehoods. I will speak the truth. Others may be arrogant. I will practice humility. Others will lack understanding. I will develop wisdom."

He said it in such a kind way. He just looked at people and said, "This is who you can be." And it was so different than all the other leaders who were there, because it was like he was speaking from his heart to the heart of the others who were present.

Now, in Sri Lanka there had been for some decades a quite terrible civil war. And Ari, who was a community organizer and a peacemaker, took into his home at times, as a sanctuary, leaders from the Muslim community—even though he was a Buddhist leader—or from the Tamil Hindu community where the war and conflict raged. I remember hearing through friends that the Sri Lankan military police came to raid his house at one point. They knew he had some leaders from the Tamil Tigers and from the Muslim community, and they wanted to get at them. But Ari was gone, and so was his wife. The only people left home were his kids.

So his eldest daughter opened the door. She didn't unlock the grill, but she opened the door, and they said, "We know you have these people and we want them." And his daughter looked back and said, "If my father were here, he would say you have to kill him first. But he's not here. And if my mother were here, she would say you have to kill her first. But she's not here. So I'm sorry to say you will have to kill me, for I will not unlock this door."

Quite a family.

He created Sarvodaya, an organization that organized the villages of Sri Lanka. He was a high school teacher in the fanciest prep school in Colombo, and his students were the children of the generals and the ministers. He took them out to the lowest caste forest villages. And you'd think he took them out to help them, but he didn't. He took them out there and asked the villagers to teach these kids. The kids thought they were going to do something for the villagers, but instead the villagers taught them how to use machetes and how to open coconuts and cut bamboo and thatch things and create things. And then the villagers, who were very poor, put on a big banquet for the kids.

He flipped it. Because he wanted the kids to understand that everybody has something beautiful to give to this world.

And he began Sarvodaya. As an organization, they dug wells and built schools and built roads in villages until it eventually spread to more than half the communities in the entire country. And he said, "We're not digging wells and building roads and building schools for education or water. We're doing that so that people can love each other. That's really our purpose." His purpose was to empower people so that they would be empowered to live in a different way and respect one another.

Toward the end of the civil war, the Norwegians tried to broker a peace. And there was a peace for a certain time. To support the peace treaty, Ari called all the followers of Sarvodaya to a grand meeting in honor of Anuradhapura, at the most famous and oldest temple in Sri Lanka. Six hundred and fifty thousand people came—in a country that only has eighteen million people. A huge number.

And he got up and said, "We have an opportunity for peace. I'd like to talk to you about peace. In the Buddhist teachings, it's understood that those who are not yet wise look at the circumstances that they see now. But those who are wise look at the causes and conditions that create the circumstance rather than reacting to them. And if we step back and look with this vaster perspective, we can see that it took five hundred years to get into this civil war. Five hundred years of conflict between the Hindus and the Muslims and the Buddhists."

400 years of colonial oppression, from the British particularly. 150 years of economic disparity between the rich wet parts and the poor dry parts of the island. He described more of the conditions, and then he said, "So it will take us 500 years to undo this. And I offer you the Sarvodaya 500-year peace plan: 10 years of ceasefire, 20 years of rebuilding roads and schools, 50 years of learning each other's languages and traditions, a 100-year economic plan to include everyone. And after 100 years, we'll have a council and see how we're doing—and then we'll do it four more times."

When I heard this, I could have wept. I actually got the chance to tell this story to the Dalai Lama, which was a really cool thing to do, because he has his own suffering to figure out how to hold in this world. Because it wasn't the voice of somebody who's worried about the next election. It wasn't a voice of somebody doing focus groups. It was the voice of an elder who was willing to say, "Here's what's true, and here's the direction that we need to turn our consciousness and our heart." That's why at that conference in Sri Lanka, there were all these CEOs of giant companies and ministers—and then there was Ari. He just spoke from a different place.

The other night, I did some teaching online, naturally, for a large group of people in China who were quarantined and interested in meditation. They had read books of mine that are translated in Chinese, and so I tried to give them teachings that I thought might be helpful.

First, I talked about how the Buddha's teachings instruct us to tend those who are sick as if they were the Buddha himself—to tend ourselves, to tend one another, to bring the care for yourself and another together. Then I talked to them about using the circumstances they had been given. I said, "All right, it's enforced on you. What are you going to do with a month or two of this kind of time where you can't go out?" I was trying to make a little joke out of it. I said, "I just need to tell you, we have 100 people at Spirit Rock and 100 to 200 people in our center in Massachusetts who've just paid $2,000 to $3,000 to be here for two or three months, not allowed to talk to anybody. You get it for free! What do you want to do with that? You could sit there and bemoan your fate, or you could take this time and turn it into something that's really of value to your heart."

And we talked about the kinds of practices of compassion and loving-kindness. I said, "You have this Chinese treasure house that comes from thousands of years of contemplative life. And you know, the things that you value—the Tao Te Ching that Lao Tzu left, Chuang Tzu's writings, and the writings of Confucius—they didn't come out of nowhere. They came because of these people, the nuns and the monks, who sat quietly and listened deeply to the turning of the seasons, to the joys and sorrows that you're now confronted with. And they found a timeless wisdom. Now it's your turn. Now it's your time to do this."

And inside yourself—well, as the poet Kabir says, "Inside this clay jug are canyons and pine mountains. All seven oceans are inside. And the one who judges jewels, and the music from the strings of the spheres—all this is inside." Volumes of poetry are in you, yet unwritten. The music, the creativity, the longing, the vision. You don't have to go out. You can also go in.

So we talked about all of that. And then we talked about the bodhisattva—and in particular, about alleviating suffering. The vow of the bodhisattva is: if there's a place of suffering, sign me up. I'll go there. And you have all these stories about bodhisattvas saying, "Oh, there's the epidemic," or "There's the war"—and "I will go there and do what I can to alleviate suffering." Which is to say that the difficulties become the perfect place to grow the great heart of compassion. Where else could you do it better than in times of difficulty? In the community, in the nation, in the globe, the climate—all of these things.

And this is your lineage as well as those in China. It's the lineage of not just survivors, but of humanity that has triumphed in different ways and made beautiful communities over thousands of years. We know how to do this. We know how to practice. Practices of love and witnessing and freedom. Becoming loving awareness.

So what does this have to do with climate change? Here's Paul, my friend, sitting here. We'll get to it. They're completely connected. We're all in it together, whether it's the virus or the climate. It's us, baby. We're all in it together—the refugees, the illness, the loss of species, the loss of homes.

There's a general feeling in many places of anxiety. It might feel like it's too big. Climate change. Despairing. Hopeless. Politics stokes fear—you know it does. That's how politics works. Let's make you afraid. They want you to be afraid, actually. Don't buy it.

Cristina Figueres, who you probably know, was here when we were talking about climate change last year. She's the UN special envoy for climate change who helped organize both the Rio climate summit and the Paris climate summit. She talked about how she'd become despairing and despondent as she was trying to get Paris underway—186 countries. There was so much conflict and difficulty that she became really depressed and felt undermined. "I can't do this."

Someone said to her, "You know, there's this little place in the south of France run by this Vietnamese monk. His name is Thich Nhat Hanh. Plum Village, I think it's called. Maybe you should go there. It might help you."

So she described going to Plum Village because she didn't know what else to do. Profoundly depressed. And after some weeks in Plum Village, she said her whole consciousness changed. She got quiet. She practiced as we did tonight. And she said, "I realized that most of the climate accord problems were based on the model of victim and perpetrator. Who was doing it to whom? Who owed whom? Who was the bad guy?"—I'll leave it in the masculine; it belongs there—"Who were the good girls or whatever?"

Then she realized we can't do this that way. This is really how we got stuck. Her whole consciousness changed, and she said, "We're a family. It's not victim and perpetrator, it's us." Somehow that revelation changed her psyche and her heart, and she was able to go back to Paris and pull together 185 countries in this remarkable way.

Now, Paul, who wrote or pulled together, among other things, Drawdown, which I mentioned to you—in a crowdsourcing way, he got people all over the world to contribute to the possibilities of not just stopping but reversing climate change. In the end, there's this amazing list of the hundred solutions, ranked by the most effective. How many gigatons of carbon will it take out of the atmosphere? How likely is it to do? What are the political ramifications? What will it cost? And so forth.

It's practical. And it's also incredibly empowering, like Ari Ratana was empowering people to say, "It's in your hands." Because in the top ten, it's not just nuclear or wind—it's food waste in the top ten, and agricultural practices. The top technological one is refrigeration.

All the chlorofluorocarbons in every little ice cream maker and air conditioner in Buenos Aires and Pakistan and so forth—when those gases get released, if we don't have a simple technology which is easy to distribute that will transform those gases, they will undo all the wind or solar power you can build. So there's a tremendous amount of understanding in this work.

But the thing that's most moving to me is that in the top ten or fifteen solutions, if you take two of the things that belong together, they become the number one intervention before nuclear or wind or solar: the education and empowerment of women and girls. That would do more to reverse climate change than anything else on the planet. Yes, it's partly family planning, but in Kenya, half of the economy is being conducted by women on smartphones, and they make entirely different decisions about what to plant and what to sell and what their family should do, how they relate in the community—all of it because they're getting educated.

I just came back from Hawaii where I was part of the memorial for Ram Dass. Very moving. I talked about Ram Dass last month. One thing I wanted to say, because he inspired so much and he was so amazingly loving by the end of his life—he just loved everyone. You could feel it. You'd come by and it was like the love machine. Everybody vibrated, and in the room without him there was so much love because his picture was there.

And Krishna Das, this wonderful kirtan singer and musician many of you may know, said the line I liked best in the whole memorial. He said, "I met Ram Dass when I was eighteen years old. He'd just come back from India. He was Baba Ram Dass with his beard and his robes and beads, teaching. And I heard him teach and I was so inspired." He was an amazingly inspiring orator and teacher. "So I started to get to know him and then I followed him to India." And Krishna Das paused for a bit and he said, "And now, forty years later, I'm happy to say that Ram Dass became the person we thought he was when we met him."

Which is a really amazing thing to say. In India, they say there are three things to keep at a certain distance: fire, the government, and spiritual teachers. You don't want to get too close. But in any case, Ram Dass became that. He became who we thought he was.

The thing is that you can become that too, and I can, and Paul can. That's the beautiful thing. It's not just Ram Dass. The game is really to be empowered, and you can choose to act in this world. In fact, if you don't, it's because you've chosen not to act. You can choose to quiet your mind, tend your heart, and become the vastness that you really are, the loving awareness. And then you can get up and you can be empowered. The world needs you to add your voice and your heart and to make a difference. Probably more than ever right now.

And as you do it, be courageous and strong, but—because things are tough and they're going to get tougher with the epidemic and politics and all that—be extra polite. Extra courteous. Respectful and patient. Because people are afraid. And you don't have to be. You can trust. You see the spring come back, and that's your ally. You can trust that the world wants to regenerate.

Try podcast number 78. It's not too good, it's phenomenal. "Meets the Lord of Death." I mean, it is spellbinding—absolutely stand-up comedy Buddhism. You can't do any better.

And thank you so much for that. I feel like I've come through the looking glass. I've heard every one of the podcasts, sometimes more than once. So I'm sitting here with this sort of feeling that some night I'll turn on a podcast and say, "Oh my God, it's me." I'm so shaken up by that, but I'm so grateful that you want to listen to me tonight. Thank you for inviting me. I'm very glad you're here.

So—how many people are anxious, concerned, uneaseful, worried, fearful? There are other adjectives, but you know what they are. About climate change or global warming. Raise your hand. Okay, that's good. How many aren't? Okay. Can we talk afterwards? I want to know what you know.

It's really something. I'm so glad the worry bin is full.

Here's the most important question: How many people think the climate is absolutely perfect?

Ah, yes. You all should have raised your hands. You really should have. It is absolutely perfect. It doesn't have any choice in this matter at all, by the way. It is doing exactly what the climate has done for a billion years, which is respond and change. Get warmer, get colder, do ice ages, blow everything out, try it again, start over. The climate is perfect. Talk about blessings.

When you hear the term "climate change," which has become a standard phrase, the climate is supposed to change every nanosecond. And that's what it does, and it does it so well. If it didn't, we wouldn't have seasons, food, animals, critters, biodiversity, and beauty. The change is what causes that.

I'm the same person who raised their hand for the first question, and still am to this day, by the way. Every morning I have these RSS feeds that come in, and I cannot read them at night—I don't sleep well. So I read them in the morning. I can have the whole day to try to integrate and incorporate them. And there's always something saying, "Oh no, don't say that. Wait, we're losing our cloud cover." No, please, scientists, this can't be true. So you see this incremental expansion of the predictions of what an interesting predicament we have created for ourselves.

But for me—I'm not a scientist, I'm an English major—I have for two decades now, or more actually, been looking at and parsing how we talk to each other about this. The language itself. And for me, it just didn't make sense.

And it's interesting because prior to that, the word sustainability was being used everywhere around the environment. It became what's called a weasel word, which meant it means anything to whoever's using it, however they define it stipulatively. So it had no meaning.

When people used to ask me what sustainability meant, because of the influence of my teachers, I said it means alleviating the suffering of all beings. That's what sustainability means. And that took care of that one. Then we could go on talking about how to do that.

But around climate, I felt like what is so beautiful about the way we talk about it is emblematic of the cause. In other words, the semantics or the wordings that we use commonly, that the media uses, actually tells us what the cause is. And those words are war metaphors and sports metaphors. Very male. Fight climate change. Combat climate change. Tackle climate change. The climate crusade. Is there anybody here of Arabic origin? I mean, you might as well say Holocaust when you say crusade. That's a horrific event in human history. And these are the words we're using.

Well, what do they tell us? What they tell us is that we are othering a miracle. Climate is a miracle. And we're using language which the egoic mind always does—making a separation between self and other, object and subject. So that is the cause. That's where it came from. That's how we did it. We othered the natural world. We othered Native Americans. We othered other races—racism. We othered religions—Islamophobia. We othered women, apparently for at least two and a half thousand years, maybe longer, I don't know. But now we have Me Too. It's just such a humble phrase when you think about it. Just "me too."

All of this is about seeing it as other.

Occasionally now, when I'm in an audience, I'll ask people to do this—just wave their arms around—and they don't want to do it. I say, "No, go ahead, do it. Just close your eyes, just dork out and do it." And they do. And I ask them, "What do you feel?" And they say, "Air." And I say, "No, that's the atmosphere. The thing that you're going to tackle." And this idea that we don't influence it—I just did. I exhaled CO2. Boom.

When you understand it and see it that way, the inextricability and interdependence between all these things we name, we label them, but they're inseparable. Whether it's climate, weather, atmosphere, and this miracle we call life—it's the same thing. They're vastly dependent on each other. Biosphere creates climate, climate creates the biosphere, biosphere affects climate, biosphere affects the atmosphere. It's this beautiful dance that has been going on for billions of years.

So Drawdown the book, for me, was really a plea in 2001 to scientists and NGOs and academics. What I was simply asking was: Can we just find out what to do? I don't know what to do. And there was no list of what to do, how much it costs, what impact it will have. This was when the third assessment of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change came out, and each one is more sobering than the prior one. Everyone I spoke to said, "That's a great idea. We don't do that. Why don't you do that?" I said, "I don't know how to do that. That's why I'm asking you."

And there it went. For years and years, I stopped asking.

And then in 2013, Bill McKibben wrote a piece called "Global Warming's Terrifying New Math." And it did terrify people. It was a good piece—he's a good writer. And people came to me and said, "It's game over. I'm going to move to British Columbia, take the kids, whatever. It's over. It's done. We tried. We worked hard." They were—the people who came to me were those people, the ones who had worked hard.

And what I felt then was that when people surrendered—when there was actually a surrender, "game over, we give up"—that it's actually an opening. It's really an opening for consciousness and awareness, because you know you don't know anymore.

And so, as Jack said, I knew that I couldn't do it. Even if I could, if you had a white male saying, "I know what the answers are, listen up"—that would have all the credibility of a lentil. The only way to create something that had some substance and credibility was to reach out as a community, as a collaboration, so that all the voices are being heard and working together. As opposed to what we often see now—and I understand their leadership—but I think that age of the white charismatic male vertebrate is over. Thank you, you've done enough damage.

Going forward, it's not to obviate or diminish the role of the male so much as to diminish the role of othering—of the male as an identity unto itself. And so that is where the language, the sciences, and the so-called actions come from.

What Doron did is put the word out all over the world asking for research fellows, Drawdown fellows. Almost half women, twenty-one countries, every major religion and some minor ones, White House fellows, Areca Con Award winners—just an extraordinary group of people came forth. And we worked together for three years. Drawdown is the result.

I authored most of it, but I authored it from theses that had been done by these research fellows—five, ten thousand word theses on each solution. Extraordinary work that they did. Half are PhDs, post-docs, double degrees—they're amazing people. But I was also the editor, which is what it says on the cover.

What I didn't say to anybody—and maybe I should have, but I didn't—is that the book was a technique. It wasn't just a book.

The first thing: the cover had to have the problem and the solution, both. It can't be just "Uninhabitable Earth" or "The End of Ice."

Number two: it had to be a collaboration, so that it had some credibility.

Three: no fear, no doom, no threat to motivate. It doesn't work, so it was an easy choice. We know that from every neuroscientist alive. And yet we still try to employ that as a way to get people excited about things and to do something.

Also, no blame, no shame, no finger pointing, no demonization of anyone.

The next thing: never say that you're right. Don't be right about anything. Be helpful, share information, have citations—but it says right in the introduction: "This is not right. We hope it's approximately right. You be the judge." Because as soon as you're right, you've made somebody wrong. You divide.

So next: no divisions. Don't divide the world.

And again, it's about verbs—about combating, tackling, fighting. All those verbs divide the world, divide it up. So we didn't do that. And then we tried to make it beautiful. In other words, to make the imagery so that solution number six—educating and empowering girls—is the most beautiful Kenyan girl you've ever seen, standing there with this grin on her face in front of a blackboard, instead of just black and white words about educating girls. Factoid, factoid, factoid. We told stories. And facts don't change people's minds. Only stories do. Only storytellers do.

That's why I'm a junkie for stories. Ramana said I tell too many stories, but that's it. I said, "Pot calling the kettle—we've got a little of that going on here."

The point is that with Dharana, we were trying to enter into the stream, the river—to enter that river of confusion, of anxiety, of concern, which is very justified, by the way, by the science. It makes sense if you're worried and concerned, of course. It doesn't make sense to be attached to it, but that's another subject. So how to enter into that stream in a way that actually was spacious, to create spaciousness for people.

And what's happened is that it is taught in every grade level in the United States—from fourth grade, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh—all the way to MIT graduate school. The same book. The fourth graders cut it up into pictures and then actually dress up as solutions and try to have their friends guess what the solution is and what it does. I mean, that's how they use the book. I have no idea what they do at MIT. I'm sure it's rigorous. But the fourth graders will dress up as a pea and a carrot, you know, peas and carrots. And they'll say, "Oh, that's a plant-rich diet! Yes, you won."

I remember somebody asking me once in a talk. He was in the back of the room, and it was being televised, live streamed, but the streaming had stopped. It was an hour, and there were still hands up, so the moderator called on this person. And he was—I can't even do it to you, but I'll do it here—he was pointing, jabbing his finger at me like this, which is beautiful because it's universally a bad thing to do in every country in the world. I understood it. But he was saying in a very confrontive voice, "What do you say to the NASCAR people, huh? Like, huh? You're talking to the choir here, you know."

And I said what I always say when somebody asks a question, which is, "What a good question." Every question is a great question, because if it's genuine, it's a good question. And I thought about it. I said, "I'd probably ask him if he favored Kyle Busch or Chase Elliott for the championship." He looked at me like, why? What do you mean? Why would you say that? I said, "The implication of your question is that it's my job to change somebody else's mind. And that's not my job. My job is to change my own. And that's hard enough, I tell you that."

And so in this movement, this climate movement so-called, I just feel like there's a quality that comes from practice, from sitting, from meditation, from sanghas, that is remarkably more effective than the activity that is being engendered because it's a climate emergency, it's a climate crisis. And so therefore the amygdala responds and you think, "Well, I've got to do something quickly, and it's got to have a big impact." And then you start to feel all that anxiety—and you know you're off base as soon as you feel it, but you might continue to do it anyway because it's such a big emergency.

The quote I mentioned – there was a beautiful quote from William Stafford that I brought with me in my notes. I never have notes, but I brought notes for this. It says: "The things you do not have to say make you rich. Saying things you do not need to say weakens your talk. Hearing things you do not need to hear dulls your hearing. And the things you know before you hear them, those are you. Those are why you're in the world."

Which is such straight-up Theravada – like the one who knows, you know.

And from my perspective, Regeneration – the next book – is really about trying to draw out what we do know. We know what to do and we know how to do it. What we have not been called to is to come together in ways that are honoring, respectful, and listening-based.

The emphasis is on not the future. You heard in the last Democratic debate – every single candidate talked about future existential threat. It's burnished on their cortex now. But it's not about future existential threat. That's just in your mind. It's good science, but it's not a place to dwell.

What Regeneration says is this: if we're going to reverse this climate crisis, we have to pay attention to current human needs. If humanity isn't paying attention – which it's not really – it's because we're not paying attention to humanity. If the climate movement isn't directed toward the needs of the vulnerable and the impoverished and the disenfranchised and those who are suffering right now – who will suffer more from changes in weather, rain, drought, food, war, migration – then we're not serious about it.

This is not a top-down solution. This is not going to come from the top. I love that people get together every year in four- and five-star hotels from 186 countries to meet about it. That's great. And with all due respect to Christiana, who's an amazing woman, nothing is going to happen from that. You can count on it. It's been going on for twenty-five years, and the atmosphere hasn't noticed yet.

The reason for that is that these gatherings have no agency. A confluence has no agency. You do. You do. All agency comes from an individual initially. And it becomes a dyad and a group and a community and a gathering. And sometimes it becomes a movement.

Simultaneously to this, around 2001, I wondered: Where do movements come from? How are they begun? How do they start? I want to tell you how the Civil Rights Movement began, because I was a part of it. I wanted to follow the breadcrumb trail back as far as it could go to see where it originated.

Where it originated – literally – is Ralph Waldo Emerson's father, who was a pastor, giving Ralph Waldo Emerson a copy of the Bhagavad Gita. When Emerson read it, he wrote that he put it on par with the Bible in terms of its spiritual importance.

Emerson then becomes a pastor himself, and he marries this wonderful young woman. He's twenty-three, she's eighteen, and within about a year and a half, she dies.

And he is just heart-stricken in grief and sadness. His friends say, "Go to Europe, get out of here, get out of Boston, go there."

So he starts in the boot of Italy, and he goes up, meeting Wadsworth and all these amazing people. But then he goes to Paris, and those who've been to Paris near Notre Dame know that just down the river is the botanical garden—but then it was called the Jardin des Plantes. It was run by the Jussieu family, and the Jussieus, before Wallace and Darwin, actually had a way of organizing botanicals and all the pieces and parts that were coming in from all over the world from explorers, so-called explorers. They had a topology and organized it so that when you went in, you saw this little wing and a bigger wing and wings and colors and so forth, the same with plants.

Emerson went there and he was blown away. You should read his journal that night. It's like, for the first time ever, he is joyous. He has seen the web of life, and he realizes that all of life is interconnected, interdependent, mutually arising. He just cannot write enough and keeps going on and on. Then when he comes back to the States, he writes the book Nature, which is an extraordinary book to this day, by the way. Extraordinary.

As soon as it's published, one of the first people to buy it is Henry David Thoreau. He graduates from Harvard and goes to Emerson and says, "What should I do, what should I do?" Emerson says, "Keep a journal"—which he did for thousands of pages, six thousand pages. But then he builds this little cabin on Emerson's land on Walden Pond.

A friend of mine said, "You know, I collect books that were owned by the transcendentalists. Let me send this one to you." It was over Thoreau's head on the shelf in his cabin at Walden Pond—by R. Spence Hardy, called A Manual of Buddhism. It has his margin notes in it. We don't know that story well, but North Boston in the 1870s was like Boulder. You could buy mala beads and Buddhas—you probably couldn't get Buddha bobbleheads like you can now, but you could get everything at that time. There was this just amazing efflorescence of Buddhism in the Northeast.

But it's pertinent because in 1846, Thoreau was walking to town and he was arrested by the sheriff of Middlesex County for not paying his poll tax. He didn't pay his poll tax because the poll tax barred African Americans from voting—which, Republicans are still working on that to this day. So he was arrested. His sister brought him some hot chocolate. He was let out the next day. But then he gave a talk at the Concord Lyceum, basically saying: when the government is unjust, the just person is in jail.

What he did is he took the shame and the ignominy of being in jail and flipped it—flipped it into something of a badge of courage and a badge of honor.

Four years after he died, there is this essay of his—the essay that he wrote, except it's called "Civil Disobedience." He never said the word. He never wrote it. No one knows where it came from to this day.

That was 1866, and then in 1906, this skinny little lawyer in Durban, South Africa, is meeting with a thousand Hindus and Muslims. They have decided to basically oppose the Black Act—which is basically apartheid and registration—and they agree to get arrested. Gandhi goes home that night and says, "We agreed to, but I'm going to get disbarred. I just got my—I'm just able to practice now. And I'll go home to my family and this and that. We've all agreed to get arrested."

Somebody from the Durban Times—we don't know when—gave Mohandas Gandhi the essay on civil disobedience. They got arrested, and he held it up as he went into jail in South Africa.

That is so important because when Martin Luther King was appointed the head of the Montgomery boycott, he hadn't really had it. Joanne Robinson had it.

That was because Rosa Parks wouldn't give up her seat. And why didn't she give up her seat? Not because she was lazy or tired that night, but because she had been trained at the Highlander Institute in Tennessee, paid for by Clifford and Virginia Durr, who were still trying to get poll taxes taken away even then, in 1955. She learned nonviolence because Miles Horton had studied with Gandhi. And so when she didn't give up her seat, she was practicing nonviolent resistance—satyagraha—which is what Gandhi created.

And that's how King got hired and came to Montgomery. Within two months, they had blown up his front porch with his wife and children in it, and he went crazy. He was just so upset about it. He tried to get a license to get a gun. The sheriff wouldn't give it to him, but he had guns in the house. He had African-Americans who had rifles. He was armed.

And Bayard Rustin came down. Bayard Rustin was the most beautiful—I had a chance to meet him—just forget African-American. Man, you'll never meet. He happened to be an African-American. Spoke the King's English. Was tall. Could sing, act—he was just an extraordinary human being. And he was gay. Well, you never sent Bayard Rustin down to the South unless it was really, really important because he was so vulnerable because of that.

He brought to Martin Luther King—he sat down like this, he sat down and said, "What's that?" He pulled out a gun. "What are you doing?" King said, "Well, I'm defending my wife and children." And Rustin said, "No, haven't you heard of Gandhi?" "Yeah, I've heard of him." And so Rustin got a Methodist preacher there, and he came over and gave King the autobiography of Gandhi and the copy of Civil Disobedience. And that Sunday—you can read that sermon—that completely changed Martin Luther King's career.

Why do I tell this story? Because it's not about King or Parks. It's not about Gandhi. It's not about Thoreau. It's not about Emerson. They would be magnificent people no matter what happened. What I'm telling you about—who renamed the essay? We don't know. Who gave Gandhi the essay? We don't know. We know who Joanne Robinson is, but nobody knows her. She was the one who organized the Montgomery bus boycott. She was the one who brought in Martin Luther King. I can name more and more names.

What I'm saying is we have so little control, but we do control a couple things: our intention, our ability to let go, to forgive, and to be generous. Those things we can control. And I feel like the way a movement starts is so mysterious that it's not knowable. You can't plan it, but you can embody it.

And I feel like what we face in terms of global warming—if you describe it and get into the science—it is almost science fiction in its nightmarish qualities going forward. We face thirty years, no matter what we do. We face thirty, forty years of severe changes on the planet. There's nothing we can do about it right now. It's locked in. It's baked.

So to Jack's point: Who are we going to be? Who are we?

She has this wonderful flip—it's a prepositional flip. And the question is: Is climate change happening to you, or for you? It's a fair question.

Because if it's happening to you—if you're the object, the victim—you're going to blame, you're going to finger point. You're going to live in that mind. And that mind is going to see itself as separate, and therefore impacted, hurt, or harmed.

But if it's happening for you—which it is, by the way—it's a blessing. Global warming is a total blessing. Why? Because it's feedback. It's beautiful feedback. And any system that ignores feedback perishes. So it is a gift. And if it's for you, then you can take one hundred percent responsibility, stop finger pointing, not blame anybody, and you are free to innovate, to imagine, to generate, to create whatever it is you can do in this world that makes a difference. And you do it not because you're afraid, but for the only reason that this will be upheld by humanity—you do it out of love.

For me, if you doubt it, fall in love with what's outside. Fall in love with the critters, the creatures. Fall in love with everything you see right now. Springtime is the best of all in some ways. And it's out of that love of the living world that we achieve transcendence and a sense of... Like the thing Stafford said: the thing you don't need to hear is who you are. And what you don't need to hear out there is something nobody will tell you—that you are the miracle as well, as is your heart, as is everything we do together.

For me, regeneration is really about stopping degeneration. Come on, let's stop. We've done it. How is it working for us? It's not working so well. And it's about turning around.

I could talk more about that some other time. But that's why I'm a podcast junkie—because I get fed. I need to be fed. I get all the science in the morning, and then I get all the Dharma at night. I think it's a good mixture. Anyway, I just want to thank you all for who you are and what you do.

Thank you.

So Paul told me a story—we just have a few more minutes—about the publication of Drawdown. Now he's working on regeneration, and the words of empowerment and the stories he's telling tonight are such a reminder to us. But when this book was about to be published, or when they were considering it at Penguin Press, there were a lot of doubts, you said.

The accountant said, "Oh my God, it's got all these color pages in it, it's really expensive." And then apparently: it's on one hundred percent recycled paper, and it's not a hardback, so the New York Times won't review it. There were many, many critiques of all kinds.

You can tell the rest of the story.

My editor—I'd had him for thirty years; I'm kind of a dog that way, so loyal—he's the fifth publisher he's been with, but he didn't really want to publish it. He was getting a lot of negative feedback about the cost and promotion. It wouldn't get reviewed. They have to print fifteen thousand copies at a time, and climate books don't sell, and they're going to sit in the warehouse and be remaindered—all that sort of stuff.

When they publish a book at Penguin Random House, it's a circle. It's by consensus. Everybody has something to say—promotion, production, academics, editorial. And they kept going around for a year, not making any decisions. Everybody was being equivocal. No one wanted to say yes or no, but nobody was saying yes.

They had a final meeting. We had made the book ourselves—set it to type, everything—so we didn't need anything from them except to put it on the press. And the publisher of Penguin is a woman, Catherine Court. I didn't know this story until after the book was published. But she listened to all the conversation—she's a really lovely woman, very dignified and humble.

And she said, "May I ask one question?" And she's the CEO, so yes, you can ask the question. She said, "Tell me this—if we don't publish this book, why are we here at all?"

And it was a New York Times bestseller the first week. It was so interesting because everybody at Penguin was suddenly taking credit. Success has many authors, as you know.

And I asked Paul to tell that story because—why are we here? Why are we here? Why are we here?

I'm grateful for the work and the vision and the inspiration, and for the breadcrumbs, because you're adding your breadcrumbs to the common trail that we're on. And at this time, it feels really important that we practice—practice centering yourself, quieting your mind, tending your heart, being that person on the boat—and then offering your gifts to the world.

So let's just sit for a few seconds, quiet.

May you carry your beauty out into the world.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 93

Courage in Our Difficult Times | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 45 min

> In this deeply nourishing talk delivered during the global pandemic, Jack Kornfield weaves together the ancient story of Nachiketa from the Kaṭha Upanishads with practical wisdom for navigating times of collective difficulty. He frames our current challenges as a cultural initiation—an opportunity to discover what is unshakable within us when everything external feels uncertain.
>
> The talk centers on Nachiketa's three boons from the Lord of Death: first, the blessing of forgiveness, which Kornfield identifies as the essential starting point for any spiritual liberation; second, the inner fire of courage—not the absence of fear, but the strength to remain true to oneself and what matters; and third, the question "Who am I really?" which points to our true nature as loving awareness itself, beyond the changing forms of body and mind.
> Kornfield guides listeners through a meditation practice of shifting from identification with body, heart, and mind to becoming the loving witness of all experience. He emphasizes that meditation's purpose is not escape but remembrance—recalling our Buddha nature, our timeless awareness that witnesses all arising and passing. Drawing from teachers including Thich Nhat Hanh, Ram Dass, and his own teacher Neem Karoli Baba, he offers practical guidance: look for the secret beauty behind others' eyes, hold difficulty with self-compassion, and recognize that acts of care during hardship are "love in action." The talk concludes with an invitation to return to daily life with a forgiving heart, steady courage, and the recognition that loving awareness is our birthright.

Hi again and welcome back.

Now I'd like to offer a story, a long big story, and some reflections and teachings. I see them more than anything as a reminder that we need in this wild and unbidden and really uncertain territory.

Meditation, as we just did, can of course help us relieve stress and find a grounding and a centeredness. But the point of meditation isn't to get somewhere else, but to actually become—to remember—who we really are, to come alive in the present moment as loving awareness itself. To remember.

In Bali, they say when a little child is born, they don't even let the babies touch the earth for six months. They carry them. They say those who are closest to the gods are tiny infants who just come from the other world, or old people who are getting ready to return to it. And the people furthest from the gods are middle-aged people with mortgages who forget who they really are.

So our task, especially in this difficult time, is to stop, is to go deep. As the I Ching says, my friend Peter Levine threw the I Ching and came up with the well. It says to go deep in this time, down deep, where there's neither increase nor decrease, but something timeless. Otherwise, we can get caught up in all of the anxiety and fear, because part of what's gone viral is fear, not the virus itself.

The word pandemic comes from the Greek pan. It's also the root of panic and pandemonium. It's the wildness of the god Pan, dancing. This is one of the energies of life, but it's not the only energy.

Of course, there's the great cultural anxiety and global fears. But also, there's our response. I watched some of the concert and celebration of working people and healing people—the healers—the eight-hour concert that Lady Gaga stewarded with all the amazing and wonderful singers. Part of what was most moving about it was the clips of doctors and nurses and frontline people and bus drivers and people who were in the warehouses, all of them saying, "We're with you, we're part of you." There was a sense of solidarity.

I also love that there's so much humor coming out. Even in the face of all this, Dolly Parton wrote a song. Here are the lyrics:

This too shall pass as all things will, if the virus don't kill us the stay-at-home will. The kids are bored and restless, they scream and yell and squawk, and the teens and tweens they're just plain mean, they bite your bleeping head off. And all those loving couples that were once so sweet and cozy, now they fight like cats and dogs like Donald and Pelosi. Lord, get us back to school and get us back to work and get out of this goddang house before somebody gets hurt. And Lord, please find a vaccination in the form of a shot or a pill, because if the virus don't kill us, the stay-at-home will.

So here we are, all cooped up with our loved ones. As Jimmy Fallon had somebody tweet into The Tonight Show, she was already considering expelling her children from homeschool.

We have to deal with this and with one another. How do we do it? And what really matters?

A poem by Thomas Santolalla:

In the evening, we shall be examined on love. And it won't be multiple choice. In the evening when the sky has turned that certain blue, the blue of exam books, we shall climb the hill as the light empties and park our tired bodies on a bench above the city and try to fill in the blanks. We shall be examined on love like students who don't even recall signing up for the course and now must take their orals, forced to speak for once from the heart.

For us to speak for once from the heart. This is really the curriculum of this life and this incarnation in the midst of it all.

I want to talk about how we hold this and how we navigate this with the practice that we just did together and with a deeper understanding. We're part of the great mystery. The Buddhist texts begin, "O nobly born, you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are. Remember your true nature, your Buddha nature."

There's that wonderful poem from Juan Ramón Jiménez, where he says, Yo no soy yo —I am not I. I'm this one walking beside me whom I do not see, whom at times I manage to visit, and at other times I forget. The one who remains silent when I talk. The one who forgives sweet when I hate. The one who takes a walk when I am indoors, the one who will remain standing when I die.

In the meditation, we shifted from the experience of body, heart, and mind to become the loving witness itself of our restlessness, our doubting and fearful mind, our tears, our longing, our love—to bow to all of these things.

But of course, that's a very nice idea. How do we actually embody it?

I know being here with my beloved Trudy, we're mostly doing good, but once in a while we get on each other's nerves like human beings do. And I have a practice. I actually told her about it. It's sort of a secret practice I have. I think about the passage from Thomas Merton where he talked about seeing the secret beauty behind the eyes of every being.

And my secret practice, when I find frustration or annoyance arising, is to look at her—to look at her eyes—and see the girl, the innocent child, the young girl, the young teenager who's still in there with so much possibility and beauty and love. And when I see that secret beauty, the rest falls away. Even though I cleaned the stove. We are taking turns cleaning the house, and she came and said, "Jack, you know, you can't just wipe the grease away." And I had to learn a whole new deep dharma of what it means to properly clean the stove. Thank you, my beloved.

So we become loving awareness. We become the witness to the joys and sorrows, to the praise and blame, to the things that are joyful and wonderful in our life and the things that are difficult. And in this, we open to a deeper mystery. We open to a mystery of becoming that one who, as Machado says, sees ourself walking or talking—but we know we're greater than this. We're not just caught in our personality and in our small self. We are actually timeless awareness itself, the Buddha nature itself, witnessing it all.

The story I want to tell is a famous story of initiation. And initiation means going through a difficulty in order to find that which is unshakable. Sometimes it's deliberate—the Maasai will send a young man out into the desert with a spear, and the initiation is to confront and kill a lion and bring it back to prove that he is a man. Or a young woman in the Maasai people learns what it means to give birth and become a creator of the world through her body. But an initiation requires us to face a difficulty, to go through such a narrow place that it divests us of all our baggage, all the things we held as being true or dear, to find something deeper.

The great Zen teacher Karlfried Graf Dürckheim writes: "The person who, really being on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not, as a consequence, turn to those friends who offer comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

Sometimes initiation is deliberate, but most often it comes—as the Greeks say—as a katabasis, a blow: an accident, an illness, a divorce, a loss of business, something that happens in your family. But now we have the blow to our worldwide and global culture. It is a cultural initiation that has released some of the Furies on the earth. And if you look into the Greek myths, none of the gods can stop the Furies. Vengeance and the power of the Furies, paranoia—these arise when truth is not being honored. In the end, the only thing that could stop them was the great goddess of wisdom, Athena, who took them into her temple and made an altar and said, "We respect the truths that need to be spoken, and thus we respect you."

So here we are, needing to embrace all of the difficulty and go through it as an initiation, saying, "Yes, we will bring all this into the temple of our awareness."

The ancient story, the myth of Nachiketa, comes from the Katha Upanishads. Nachiketa was a young man born centuries ago into a wealthy family in the top one percent of the culture, living a life of privilege. When his father became old and was frightened of illness and epidemics, frightened of aging and death, he went to the priests at one of the temples. The religious leaders told him, "If you want to be certain to have a beautiful death, or a beautiful birth after death, you must make a great offering to the temple." You know how that happens in some forms of religion.

And so the father decided to trust them. He made a huge public ceremony, a parade in which he brought all his cattle and gold and wealth, declaring, "I give all that I value to the temple." This was his way of trying to buy security with everything he had gained in his life.

But his son Nachiketa could see the hypocrisy of it, the sham of it. You can't buy security with money. It doesn't matter how much money you have—you're still human, and you still have to go through what we all go through as human beings.

"I give all I value to the priests and temple," the father proclaimed. His son was so upset that he said aloud, in front of everyone, "All you value? What about your son?"—as if to shame his father for his hypocrisy.

Being publicly rebuked in this way, the father turned to him and said, "I give you—I give you to death." For he was mortified by what his son had said in front of everyone.

Nachiketa, as young men do, turned toward him and said, "I accept."

Now it was time for young Nachiketa to enter what the poet Dante called the dark wood that one finds at a certain point in life—the unknown. So Nachiketa said, "All right, my father gives me to death. I will go and seek out death and find what I can learn." He went deep into the forest and sat without moving for three days and three nights, through pain and hunger and fear, waiting to see if death would appear. This is like the poet Kabir, who said, "I decided to go on a great pilgrimage, so I sat still for three days."

Somehow Nachiketa knew that something had to die. He had to confront something deeper than his father's money or the acclaim of the community. I see this often when people talk to me about depression, or even suicide.

And someone will say, I feel suicidal, or this person I know is asking me about suicide. And of course, our first response is to say, don't do it—it's wrong. Treasure life. But there's another deep response as well, which is to understand that something does have to die. It's not the body. The solution is not the body. But that feeling that they have to die is really pointing toward a false identity: the job that they can't do anymore, the relationship that's killing them, the speed, the grasping—all the things we've seen in the toxic qualities of our culture that have slowed down now.

Somehow there's something in that person that says, I know something has to die, and they get confused and think the body is what must go. But it's something deeper that's being called. And in us, there's an intuitive wisdom that knows we can descend into this. For as Bob Dylan says, "She who's not busy dying is not busy being born." Something like that. Anyway, Bob Dylan named it.

So Nachiketa went to the kingdom of death. And after three days of not moving—the fire in his body, the pain, the fear, the dark of the forest, everything that we confront in meditation times a hundred—after not moving through three days and nights, he found himself at the kingdom of death. But Lord Yama, the king of death, wasn't there. Only his assistants—war, pestilence, and famine—were there. He asked for the king of death and they said, I'm sorry, he's out collecting rent. You will have to wait.

And so Nachiketa waited longer. And finally, when death returned, his assistants said, you know, there's a very unusual young man who's come here to see you. And the Lord of Death sat opposite Nachiketa and said, you are indeed unusual, for you sat for three days and nights waiting to come see me, and then I wasn't here, and you sat for three more days and nights. And because you've come in this remarkable way, a courageous young man, and because I have not received you directly in a worthy way, I will offer you three boons, three wishes.

Now of course, we're in the mythological territory of a fairy tale. What are the three wishes that the king of death has offered to Nachiketa? And they're part of this story that has been told for thousands of years.

So Nachiketa sat and he asked for his first of three boons. The first was: I ask for the blessing of forgiveness. And this is why we teach metta now at the beginning of our retreats, and we weave it into our meditation, into mindfulness—why we call it mindful loving awareness.

Nachiketa said, I ask that my father forgive me and that I forgive him, that my father could see me with the eyes he saw me when I was his firstborn son. And the reason that this was the first boon that he asked is because we can't go any further in the liberation of the heart and the freedom that we seek without starting with the balm of compassion and forgiveness and love. For we've all been disappointed. We've all been betrayed. We've all been hurt in so many ways, ourselves and others. And in the end, if we are to live a free life—what Nachiketa was seeking, a new life, a death and rebirth—it starts with a forgiving heart, to not put another being out of our heart.

There is an extraordinary book by Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela, who was one of the great South African psychologists and healers who helped with the truth and reconciliation process. And she decided in her work to try to understand what she called the evil that had come upon people. And she spent a year going into the prison to talk to the architect of apartheid who had ordered the deaths and killings of so many: Eugene de Kock. And she sat opposite him week after week after week, talking to him and listening to him. This is recorded in her book.

And one night, after listening and talking on and on, he said, I think that I lost it all. It's the feeling of loss. The first thing that goes is innocence. There's no more fairy tales or Bambi. That's gone. We killed a lot of people and they killed some of ours.

We fought for nothing. We fought each other, basically, eventually, for nothing. We could all have been alive having a beer. So I'm confused. I'm so very tired.

And he hung his head down and shifted his legs to adjust to the chains that bound him to the chair, his eyes downcast, like someone reflecting on the greatest tragedy and loss in his life.

And the fact that she could go and sit with him and listen with an open heart, with curiosity—not even compassion, but an interest in understanding, a presence—was the very energy that the truth and reconciliation process grew out of.

We all have forgiveness to do. And in this difficult time, we're asked to do some reflections in the heart. What do you have to forgive, small and large, for your heart to be free? Some of it is self-forgiveness. Some of it is forgiveness of others. Asking forgiveness. But holding yourself with tenderness. My old faults, like snow falling on warm ground. When we hold ourselves with self-compassion, even the difficulties are held in a new way.

I remember sitting with Ram Dass, and he told the story of being with his guru, Neem Karoli Baba. Neem Karoli Baba looked at Ram Dass with so much love and gave him very simple instructions. He said, "Ram Dass, love everybody." And then he paused and he said, "Ram Dass, tell the truth."

Now these sound like beautiful spiritual instructions, right? But as Ram Dass said, "I was surrounded by this whole coterie of Westerners who'd come because I was with the guru. And I was irritated by them. They were taking up time. And the more I looked, they were there on their own ego trips and they were puffing themselves up and they were grasping and grabbing and they were neurotic and their personalities were quite unappealing in many cases. And I looked at them and I said, 'Ah, but my guru said tell the truth.' The truth was I hated them. I didn't like them. I wanted them out of there. And then he said, 'Ram Dass, love everybody.'"

That was his koan, and he sat with it and he worked with it. And he said one day he was sitting there looking in the eyes of his guru with that glance of mercy—which is the name for when someone sees you so deeply, so lovingly, that it changes the cells of your body and you remember that you are love. And he looked and he said, "All these crazy Westerners like me who came—I love them all. I love every single one of them." And it was a breakthrough and a transformation.

And it asks us: What do we have to forgive for our hearts to be free?

This was Nachiketa's first boon. And it's yours as we go through this descent, because it is difficult. It's difficult for all of us collectively and in our families, in our communities, and as a society. And this forgiveness doesn't mean that we accept things that are being done that cause suffering, that we don't try to change them, to stand up for what matters, to stand up for care and justice for everyone. What it means is that in the end, we don't put anyone out of our heart. That we can wish everyone: May you be free from hatred. May you be free from fear. May you be free from ignorance.

So Nachiketa received his first boon and his heart became softened, and he was able to now live through the next part of his deep initiation—as you must do. To reclaim your heart in the middle of all that's so difficult.

What would his second boon be? He turned back to Lord Yama and said, "The second boon I ask for..."

His inner fire is courage. Remember, he's a young man—you know, the kind that says, "Is there anything dangerous to do around here?" I remember that. I remember going in the forest monastery and saying, "What are the wildest austerities you guys do? Show me, let me try them out." That's kind of what we want to do. You want to prove yourself, but more than that, you want to find something deep in yourself. As Dürckheim said, something that's unshakable.

And he wanted to come fully alive. So he asked for this unshakable spirit.

And here's a poem from Anton Taylor—again, voices from South Africa:

The sun rose each day and we the South Africans waited. From across the world the stories came, carried by terror. From across the world the virus came. The sun rose each day and so did the numbers. The streets quieted, the soldiers came—not always in that order. Unable to see or hear or hold each other, we had to unlearn how we showed love. We wondered what will it feel like, but no one could tell us. We did not know that we were grieving, only that we were grieving for something unknowable yet certain. So we the South Africans waited.

The sun rises each day, and so do the numbers. Because I cannot hold you, I must cling to these precious things—truths I do know, immutable facts which are immune to a virus. I do know we are South Africans. We have endured what most others have not. We, the South Africans, have survived many times that which is unfathomable.

If pain builds resilience, and if one can suffer without succumbing to cruelty, then perhaps, although many of us are sick and poor and unable to self-isolate, we are prepared in a way that is not as apparent, in a manner not born of wealth or infrastructure. You see, in a part of us so deep that it is fathomless, there is a key—to choose I or us, to rise together. And those of us who've already lived apart but together through so much, we've been asked to decide.

There's so much I do not know, but I do know we are South Africans. I do know our decision was made long before this pandemic, many times over. We have chosen us. I do know one day the sun will rise and the numbers will not.

This is what Nachiketa asked for. He asked for that strength of heart to go through everything that was difficult. And it's never too late to start. This is the time. As one of our great founders said, one person with courage is a majority. Standing up for justice, caring for others in the middle of this time, speaking the truth with love. As Nelson Mandela said, "Do not judge me by my successes. Judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up again." This is your humanity. This is what's possible for you.

And so the second boon was granted to Nachiketa.

Now comes the last boon—the last gift, the last blessing. Nachiketa sat quietly. He looked at Lord Yama and said, "What I ask now is a great boon. I wish to know that which is immortal." Kind of audacious, this young man, making that his final wish.

Lord Yama looked back at him and said, "Really? You could have anything." And he showed him visions of royal chariots with great steeds—basically the Ferraris of the day—and bevies of beautiful women and consorts, and the best of banquets. "You could have anything. Make sure that this is your true wish."

Nachiketa replied with a question: "Will not all of these return to your kingdom soon enough?"

Lord Yama had to nod. "Yes. For all of these things are temporal, are impermanent. They rise for a time and they pass away."

So Lord Yama said, "Then I will give you your answer." And he brought Nachiketa an extraordinary gift—a beautiful mirror, handcrafted there in the underworld. He said, "I place this mirror in your hand, and with it pose a question to you that will be the gateway to immortality itself. The question I pose for you is: Who am I, really? Look deeply in this mirror and see."

It is what the Zen masters ask when they say, "Who are you?" Or "What is this life, this great mystery of life?" And you sit with that koan day and night. What is this? Who am I?

But it happens in a moment when you go into the bathroom and look in the mirror and notice your body has aged, that the fur is missing in some parts, that it droops in other parts. You know how it is. Wrinkles are coming. It's changing its shape. But even though you notice that your body has changed, there's that strange experience that you don't necessarily feel older. You know that. And that's because it's only your body that has aged. But the consciousness, the loving awareness, the witness of it, who you really are—in that moment steps back and says, "Hmm, how's this body doing in this incarnation? Oh, it's sagging here and it's learning there and it's getting this way or that way." You start to see that who you are is not this body, but the awareness itself. You become the witness, the consciousness itself.

This is from Be Here Now, speaking of Ram Dass. He says, "As we awaken, we watch the entire drama of our lives. We watch the illusion with unbearable compassion. For you are all form, you are breath, you are the river, you are the void, the desire and the illusion and the awakening beyond it. For you are beyond space and time, nothing and everything. Everything is me. And we see it all form in eternity as a miracle. Then you enter the marketplace with bliss-bestowing hands. You chop wood and carry water." You return to the world to be in the world, but not of the world.

And in all that you're going through, the difficulties and the fears, know that this is not the end of the story. We human beings have been through earthquakes and floods, tornadoes and tsunamis, and epochs that include epidemics and pandemics over the centuries. And we've survived. It's in our genes. It's in our cells. It's in your nervous system and in your collective memory and in your heart. And it was passed on to you by your ancestors and their ancestors, generation after generation. We know how to do this.

And when you get quiet and you receive the boons that Nachiketa has asked for—the loving and forgiving heart, the courage that is not an absence of fear but the courage to be true to yourself and what matters, even when fear arises—and then you remember who you are, the great heart of compassionate self, you get still and quiet.

And this from my beloved Trudy, who wrote: "When you go out and see the empty streets, the empty stadiums, the empty train platforms, don't say to yourself, 'It looks like the end of the world.' What you're seeing is love in action. What you're seeing in that negative space is how much we do care for each other, for our grandparents, our parents, our brothers, our sisters. Protecting people we will never meet. People will lose their jobs over this. Some will lose their businesses and some will lose their lives. All the more reason to take a moment when you're out on a walk or on your way to the store or watching the news to look into the emptiness and marvel at all that love. Let it fill you and sustain you. It isn't the end of the world. It is the most remarkable act of global solidarity we may ever witness."

And when Nachiketa had received this third blessing and looked deeply into the mirror to ask, "Who am I really?" and could see that he was in fact consciousness itself—as Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Since before time, I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which I pass. This body is not me. I am life without boundaries. I've never been born and never died"—he stepped out of the land of the Lord of Death into the unborn, into the timeless world, into the loving consciousness that gives birth to all that we really are, that was born into your body. And you could see the world with the eyes of love and return to it then, like the old man in the Zen pictures going back into the marketplace with his wine bottle and his staff, saying, "All I look upon with love become enlightened."

For something then becomes holy. Every spring crocus and newborn fawn and plum and apple blossom. I watched my year-and-a-half-old grandson pick up a pebble—and he could stand at the edge of the Grand Canyon or the biggest marvel of the world and say, "Look, look at this red pebble. It's a mystery. Isn't it beautiful?" showing it to Baba and Nini, his grandparents.

I believe it was in Leaves of Grass that Whitman said a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels. Just the existence of life—ours and others on this planet among the vast galaxies. And here we are.

Yes, we've been through pandemics and epidemics. And what Nachiketa realized was that there was something bigger and more beautiful that he could find. And it wasn't just in the vastness, but in the tenderness between people, in what we touch and how we listen.

A poem by James Davis May:

Even on the night my friend died, even on that night, the feral cat, the one that's white and fluffy, still crossed our driveway quietly from our neighbor's pines to our own rhododendrons. Even on that night, she would look for some rodent or bird to terrorize. And I, drinking and grieving on our deck, was appalled by the world and its gross refusal to stop being the world. And then embarrassed, not just by my own naivete, but by innate human sickness that believes we matter, that something or someone is listening. That civility isn't just something we imagined and don't really follow anyway. That night, I wanted everything to be better than it is. So I went to the fridge, got out the milk, poured it into a little bowl, which I left on the porch and found empty the next morning.

And this is what we have, really. We have gestures of kindness and greatness of heart. We have forgiveness. We have the compassion that can hold all those who are living and all those who are frightened. And we know that we can do this together. And one day the sun shall rise, and the numbers will not.

I hope what I've offered you—the practice that we did together in the beginning, which in a way was the complete teachings for tonight, and then the bedtime story, a story to feed some other part of your being—serves as a reminder, as a possibility, as a soothing and steadying, as an awakening. I hope it has been food for the heart.

I thank you for being part of this, for offering your goodness to the world, and I encourage you to see what you can do and to be that one steady one on the boat, as Thich Nhat Hanh says.

I also encourage you, if you can, to please help support Spirit Rock so we can continue getting these teachings out. There's a donate button, there are ways to become members. I encourage you to feel part of the community, because you are, and we are together.

And I encourage you to take your time at the end of the day to sit quietly and tend your own body and heart and mind with loving awareness. At the beginning of the day, to settle yourself and set your best intention. And in little bits throughout the day—after you clean the stove and walk the dog or diaper the child or answer the email or go on endless Zoom until you become Zoom-crazed—take a breath and feel yourself on the earth. Let your heart soften. Hold it all with compassion. Say thank you for trying to protect me and take care of me. And live in a great heart of love.

It is your birthright. It is who you really are.

Thank you, and good night.

CHAPTER 94

Meditation: Courage in Our Difficult Times

Jack Kornfield · 23 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers a comprehensive practice that weaves together the foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) with the qualities of the awakened heart. The meditation addresses how our bodies and minds accumulate stress and tension, particularly during difficult times, and provides a skillful path for releasing what we carry.
>
> The practice moves systematically through the traditional domains of mindfulness—body, feelings, and mind—but with a distinctive approach rooted in loving awareness. Rather than simply observing sensations, emotions, and thoughts, practitioners are invited to allow these experiences to intensify and expand, receiving them with compassion and gratitude. Kornfield teaches the transformative practice of thanking the body, heart, and mind for their protective efforts, noticing how this appreciation naturally softens tension and creates spaciousness.
> The meditation culminates in recognizing oneself as awareness itself—the witnessing consciousness that is timeless, vast, and inherently loving. From this ground of being, practitioners extend compassion outward to embrace all beings in every direction, connecting with what Kornfield describes as our Buddha nature and birthright. This practice offers both immediate relief from accumulated stress and a reminder of the deeper truth of our essential nature as loving awareness, providing a template for daily practice that integrates mindfulness, compassion, and insight.

So to do a meditation practice now, let yourself sit in a way that is steady, feet flat on the floor, buttocks on a seat, and feel a sense of groundedness. When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently.

This will be a practice that combines elements of mindfulness, mindful loving awareness, and other dimensions.

As you begin to sit, you do what I do at the end of the day. When I sit, I first take a couple of deep breaths and release whatever tension there is that I can let go of easily with those breaths. Then as I start to pay attention, I realize that I have to sense my own body, my heart and mind in a deeper way than when I'm going through the tasks of the day, whether it's doing the dishes or offering teachings or interacting with others. I really need to sit quietly and tune in and find a different dimension of possibility.

As I do, I find there are all kinds of things beneath the surface. My body goes into fight, flight, or freeze, picking up the alarm of the world around me or my own fears. My heart does too.

As you sit quietly now, having taken those breaths, let yourself feel a sense of connection to the earth, a grounding in which almost as if you had energetic roots going from your body into the earth. Steadiness, deep, connected. Your body comes from the earth. It's part of the earth. Feel that strength and steadiness. You take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this human form and let your roots go deeply into the earth. Steady, strong.

Now from this place of presence, begin to pay attention to the experience just now. We'll go through the dimensions of mindful loving awareness.

First, bring your attention to the whole field of your body, the sensations, the energy of the body, the areas of tightness or tension that come from this fight, flight, or freeze that gets triggered in us, the areas of hot or cold, of pleasure or pain. Feel the whole energy field of the body with a loving awareness that has no judgment, but is kind and curious.

As you do, let the places of the greatest tension and the greatest holding in your body invite them to open, to increase, to get stronger, to spread out through your body or beyond. Invite them to show you what you're holding, and you receive them in the space of mindful loving awareness.

As you allow the sensations and the intensity of tension or pain, all the things held, to open, to get stronger, to expand, to show themselves, to be received, notice how as they expand, they also soften, become more spacious.

Now bring in the quality of compassion to hold all that your body has been holding with a compassionate awareness. Say to your body, "Thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me. Thank you for taking care of me."

As you do, notice how the body softens with that gratitude, how holding it all with compassion and kindness, just as you are now, like you would hold a child who's going through a hard time. Such tenderness. "Thank you. It's okay. I'm all right for now."

Notice how the body relaxes and opens as you do. It breathes easier. Space opens up. You're allowing the body to release and come to a greater, more natural presence, just as it wants. To open. To be felt, all of it. And received with love, with tenderness.

Now shift this same mindful loving awareness to the area of your heart. Notice what feelings and emotions are present. I notice at the end of the day that there's an accumulation. There might be grief, deep tears of sadness. There might be fear, anxiety, longing, love, joy mixed together with all the rest.

With this mindful loving awareness, sense what's there in your heart that asks to be felt, that you're carrying, sometimes carrying for a long time. Let it open, let it intensify, let it get stronger, more painful or more beautiful, more sad. Let the feelings open in the vast space of loving awareness, fill your body and more. Let them show you what your heart is carrying.

And you become the loving witness.

Allowing the heart to be felt—all of it.

As you hold and allow all these feelings to intensify and open—the tears, the fear, the longing, the love—hold them again with compassion, like you would hold a crying or frightened child. Tenderly. Not trying to fix them, but honoring them.

And say thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me—all these feelings. Thank you for trying to keep me safe. I'm okay for now. Thank you. Thank you for everything you do.

Notice what happens in the heart. How spaciousness grows naturally. How the feelings are received and soften. How the gratitude—thank you—and compassion for all of them, for trying to protect me, opens this space of tenderness and presence.

Now bring your attention to your mind—that very busy organ, sometimes considered located in the brain, but actually much bigger than that. Filled with cycles of thoughts and images, and perhaps now repeated patterns of worry and concern and imagination, cycling and circling, busy. Feel all the energy of the mind. Just notice what it's like.

Hold it too with loving awareness. Invite it to open, to display, to show its energy. Let it get more intense if it wants. Let it cycle and twist and get wild and imagine. Feel all that energy and give it space to show you the energy of the mind.

Bring a tenderness, a compassion, to hold all these energies with kindness. They're just doing their job. As you do, things soften. You can say thank you. Thank you to your mind, that overbusy organ. Thank you for trying to protect me. Bow with gratitude. Thank you. I'm okay just now. I'm okay. You can relax.

Notice how the mind too softens and settles when you allow all the energies to be held in compassion and loving awareness. When you offer gratitude, everything softens.

Now begin to notice something quite remarkable and important and liberating—as the Buddha would say, the essence of liberation.

Notice that the body with all its sensations and experiences, the heart with all its emotions and feelings, and the mind—you are able to pay attention to these with awareness itself. Shift your attention to realize that you are this awareness. You are this loving awareness. Not the body, although you're gifted with this body in this incarnation. And not the waves of emotion—the love and the longings and the fears. And not the thoughts and images. Sense that you are the witnessing consciousness itself.

You are the space of awareness that knows this all. Timeless, open, vast, silent, filled with love and tenderness for all the struggles of the body and mind and life around.

Rest in this deep loving awareness of who you really are.

In this loving awareness—like an ocean of peace or stillness, a vastness that contains everything—let yourself sense that just as you can be aware of body and heart and mind, you can also be aware of the field of being, of the beings all around you. Those making love and those in fear. Those being born and those who are sick or dying. The vastness of beings. Your loving awareness can extend and become a kind of loving compassion.

Just as you hold your own body and heart and mind with tenderness, now let the vastness of your loving awareness extend in every direction, as though you could hold this whole world in the great heart of tender compassion.

You can.

This is your birthright, your Buddha nature. Born into you is the great heart of compassion and timeless understanding.

Send out well wishes of love and tenderness in every direction.

From this place of stillness. Deep compassion. You become the lamp, the beacon, the healing heart—the medicine of the awakened heart, the medicine of love offered to all, holding all.

When a child is born, our first response is one of love. When a person is dying, our last response is to hold their hand in love. Who we really are is love itself. Our true nature. Loving awareness, consciousness itself. Rest in it. Return to it. It is your home.

So you just took a ten-day retreat in twenty minutes. Congratulations, you're advanced students, so you're able to do that. But really what I mean is that the elements, the foundations of mindfulness and the qualities of the awakened heart were woven into this meditation as a reminder of what you already know and what you know is possible.

Notice what you've learned from it, how you might use it—little bits during the day, or to sit in the morning or evening as I do and go through the body and heart and mind, noticing what's been accumulated and carried, making space for all of it to be received in loving awareness. And to become consciousness itself, that witness that holds it all in the tender heart of compassion.

CHAPTER 95

The Peaceful Heart

Jack Kornfield · 47 min

> In this profound talk, Jack Kornfield explores the nature of upekkhā (equanimity) and what it means to cultivate a peaceful heart amid the multiple crises of our time—pandemic, economic hardship, climate change, and racial injustice. Drawing from the ancient Pāli chant on impermanence, he emphasizes that equanimity is not passive indifference or avoidance, but rather finding balance in the midst of change and being at peace with the truth that all things arise and pass away.
> Kornfield shares teachings from his years at Ajahn Chah's forest monastery in Thailand, where he learned that communities of peace serve as essential reminders that another way of living is possible. He reflects on the qualities of those who become "warriors for the human spirit"—those who abide rather than flee, who serve as beacons of goodness, and who maintain cheerfulness and compassion even in difficulty. The talk weaves together stories of John Lewis's legacy, Thich Nhất Hạnh's presence after his stroke, and transformative work in San Quentin Prison to illustrate how compassion operates in the real world.
> The Buddha's teaching on the Four Noble Truths frames the discussion: while suffering exists, it is not the end of the story. There are causes for suffering, but peace is possible, and there is a path of practice—including sīla (ethical conduct), samādhi (concentration), and mindful loving awareness—that leads to inner freedom. Kornfield invites practitioners to see current difficulties not as the darkness of a tomb but as the darkness of a womb, suggesting we are collectively participating in a birth process. He concludes with practical guidance on maintaining discipline, dedication, and community connection, asking: "What would love have me do today?"

I started with the practice of equanimity tonight, and I need to say a tiny bit more about it. The practice and understanding of equanimity is not to avoid conflict or to avoid change. Rather, it is finding a balance in the midst of it.

There's a famous chant in Pali, the ancient language like Sanskrit. The translation goes: "All things are impermanent. They rise and they pass away." That's the first two lines. The second part says: "Those who are at peace with this truth find true happiness." Those who are at peace with the fact that everything arises and passes away.

And that's the mystery of human incarnation—that death is stalking you, to use Don Juan's phrase from Carlos Castaneda. Everything that we knew, our childhood, what happened to it? It's back with the dinosaurs and the pyramids. Things arise for a time and then they just vanish. It's remarkable. And to be at peace with this brings true happiness.

I just turned 75 a few days ago. Trudy, my beloved wife, also just turned 75 a few weeks before that. We look at each other and say, "This is a big number." It got me reflecting, because I was fortunate enough to know four of my great-grandparents reasonably well, several of whom lived until I was in high school or college. They were mostly born in the 1880s or even the late 1870s, about a decade or so after the Civil War. They came on boats in the late 1800s to settle on the East Coast in Philadelphia. They told me stories of what it was like to live in Russia or Odessa or Turkey, where one of my great-grandparents and grandfather came from.

I remember my own grandfather, who was just a warm-hearted, loving human being. He loved his garden as much as anything, but he'd been in World War One. He would teach us the World War One songs—"Mademoiselle from Armentières," I'll stop with the first line—and other such bawdy soldier songs.

Then I realized: in this life, in 75 years, because it stretches both ways, it goes back to people I knew who were there almost in the Civil War. This is what we live. And it turns and it changes. On the other hand, I'm working with some friends in Silicon Valley who are part of the largest artificial intelligence project in the world. Here's my mother talking about people still lighting gas lamps on the street when she was a kid, and my grandparents' stories, and then here's AI. It changes, baby, all the time. And who we are—we are this change itself.

It gives us perspective. Like that famous Ojibwe saying I often quote: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky." We're part of some mysterious dance that's unfolding.

Now, part of the dance unfolding right now involves multiple crises. The health crisis with the pandemic and COVID is affecting so many of us—all of us, no one left out. Even though we're not all in the same boat, as it's been said: some are in yachts and some are in rowboats and some are clinging to a piece of driftwood, but it's still affecting us all. The health crisis, the economic crisis affecting so many in all kinds of difficult ways, the climate crisis, and underneath it all, the moral crisis reflected in Black Lives Matter and the movement for racial justice and economic justice. All these are happening at the same time. How do we practice in the midst of them all?

I think of the years I lived at Ajahn Chah's forest monastery on the edge of Thailand, near the border of Laos and Cambodia, in a province that bordered both countries. A friend came to visit after I'd been a monk there for a while. He was part of the Quakers International Group that had been sent to Vietnam and Laos during the war—just on the other side of the river from this province—to do peace work in the middle of the battles. I visited him and spent time in those countries.

He came and he complained. He said, "You all are just sitting on your butts and there's a war going on. You should be out there making a difference." I've been out protesting—I certainly have. I've protested most of my life in different ways. But here I was, a monk.

He said this to Ajahn Chah, and Ajahn Chah replied, "Just stay here a bit, and maybe you'll see something new. Because you know how to protest, and that's fine."

After some days, all the fight and angst and anger, the stress he carried from being in a war zone—even as a pacifist, or especially as a pacifist—began to slowly settle. He got quieter in some way.

And then Ajahn Chah looked at him and said, "You know, we can see the tentacles of the war from here" – because we were near an air base. Bombers and jets would fly overhead, soldiers coming through. He said, "There's always a war somewhere. But what is also needed is a place in the midst of it all where human beings can come and remember that there's another way to live – an island of peace and sanity."

In this monastery, these hundreds of acres of jungle and forest where the monks and nuns had been living for some years, you could drop your wallet with all your money and someone would pick it up, save it for you, and give it back. You could fall and be in difficulty, and people would rush to help you. The level of care and ethics and virtue and beauty that you felt – of a community living in harmony with respect for one another. Ajahn Chah said, "The world needs to be reminded of this, so that we do not forget." And he would say over and over, "Can you make your heart peaceful?"

Now, I've been out for almost every day for weeks and weeks, holding a big Black Lives Matter sign. It actually says "Time for Racial and Economic Justice – Black Lives Matter" on one of the busiest street corners, first in LA for some weeks and now for weeks here in the Bay Area. People come by and many will honk, give a thumbs up, wave. Some people scowl, thumbs down, shout bad things – "All lives matter!" "What are you doing?" – all of that. And I'm just standing there, letting the traffic go by with my mask on, holding my sign.

I think of my dear friend Malidoma Somé, who is a West African shaman and medicine man and a remarkable teacher. He has a couple of PhDs from the Sorbonne and from an American university. But most importantly, he was truly raised as a shaman by the Dagara people in West Africa. After we had worked together for a number of years – retreats for kids coming out of street gangs, all kinds of inner city work, prison work, and things like that – he was called by his elders to go back and receive his elders' initiation.

There is a series of initiations among the Dagara people as you go through the stages of life. When he went back for the elders' initiation, he stripped down to a little loincloth. They gave him a calabash of water, took him to the center of the village, made an ash circle around him, and said, "You may not leave this ash circle for three days and three nights on the bare earth." Then they put an ash circle around his mouth and said, "You may not say anything for three days and three nights."

Once he sat there, they beat the village drum and announced, "Anyone in this village or the surrounding villages who has anything to say to this man – especially any difficulties, any complaints, any problems, anything you don't like that he's done – now is the time to get it out." And so people would come, and all he could do was sit there and let all the insults and all of the critique come and go. This was called the true training of an elder.

Can you understand this? Praise and blame. To be a wise person is to be able to hold all of this.

So equanimity, or balance of heart, is not passive. It is actually an attention to what's present.

I think of my friend Huston Smith, who was a very famous professor of religion. He wrote this great book on the religions of mankind. Huston Smith's granddaughter – it was all in the news one year – had been out on a sailboat in Tahiti with some other young people, and then she was murdered. He had this very deep soul connection with his granddaughter, this lovely, lovely being. And Huston, as you can imagine, was completely heartbroken.

People sent condolences. People brought him food – all the things one might do for someone who is grieving a great loss. He said the thing that helped him most was a young man who lived on the street a few houses away, a Native American. Huston said, "I would be sitting out on the porch, and this young man would come up over a number of days and take the chair next to me, and he would just sit with me, being silent." Huston said, "That presence for the deep hurt that I had, that caring presence – that was the most beautiful thing that anyone gave me in this time of sorrow."

So again, we're exploring: what is the peaceful heart?

The near enemy – the quality that masquerades as equanimity – is indifference. Indifference is a not caring, a withdrawal. It's based on fear, a pulling away from the world. But true equanimity is being at peace in the midst of the mystery, becoming the witness to it – "the one who knows," as Ajahn Chah would say. The loving awareness, which is who you really are.

You are consciousness that was born into this body. And you get to witness the play of human incarnation. As you do so, you see the eight winds of praise and blame, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, pleasure and pain—changing all the time. Like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream. These are the poetic words from the Dhammapada and the Diamond Sutra about this life. It appears and it disappears—praise and blame, gain and loss.

In the first lines of the Heart Sutra, it says form is not different than emptiness. Now what does that mean? It means that all these things that arise, that seem so substantial, dissolve and are replaced by the next breath, the next emotion, the next circumstance, the next sunrise or sunset. Nothing is substantial in itself. And who we are is the consciousness that witnesses this play of life.

Now I have a number of friends who've been sick, some of them very sick with coronavirus. I have friends, or people in my orbit, who've been arrested in demonstrations. Maybe worse than that, I have friends who are stuck at home with five kids and no childcare. They are working, they are suffering. There's boredom and restlessness and loss of money and fear and anxiety and vulnerability and alarm. How do we practice with this? How do we pause and breathe and let ourselves stay present with a sense of equanimity and vastness—a balance in the midst of change?

I will read you a passage from Margaret Wheatley—Meg Wheatley—who is an activist and a wise elder and a systems theorist. She writes about those who become warriors of the spirit, who carry the spirit in difficult times:

"Warriors for the human spirit are awake human beings who have chosen not to flee. They abide. They serve as beacons of an ancient story that tells of the goodness and generosity and creativity of humanity. You can identify them by their cheerfulness. You will know them by their compassion. When asked how they do it, they will tell you about discipline, dedication, and the necessity of community."

The first quality she names is that they do not flee—they abide. They've chosen not to flee. As James Baldwin explains, not everything that is faced can be changed, but nothing can be changed until it's faced. Whether it's the nature of the virus, economic injustice, racial injustice, or climate change, nothing can be responded to until we face it. This is really the beginning of what she's speaking about.

Then she says they serve as beacons of an ancient story of goodness and generosity. And that is who we are as a species, in spite of all the bad stuff you see on the news. You get the news of some shooting in this city and some looting there, or some war still happening someplace. What you don't get in the news is the one billion acts that hour during the newscast—parents putting scrambled eggs or oatmeal or rice gruel, whatever their national food is, on the table for their children, then cleaning the dishes, going out and doing something for their neighbor, working together with others. Billions of acts of humanity and kindness. This is the ancient story of goodness and generosity in which those who are warriors for the human spirit participate.

They become what the Dalai Lama has been described as: a lamp in the darkness. They carry a spirit even when it seems dark. And it's not really dark—not fundamentally.

If you read and study the Buddhist teachings, the most fundamental teachings of the Four Noble Truths, you understand that suffering, which is the first noble truth—that life has suffering—is not saying that life is suffering. Life is magnificent, unbearably beautiful. And it has suffering. Anybody not have suffering? You can sign off now and I wish you well. Tell us how it is. But life has suffering. And yet that is only the first noble truth. It's not the end of the story.

There are causes for suffering among humanity: greed, hatred, ignorance, fear, prejudice. Societies based on greed and fostering hatred will suffer. Lives based on this will bring suffering. But that's only the second noble truth.

The third truth is that there is peace—that peace is possible. And the fourth: that there's a path. There are practices of compassion and mindful, loving awareness, of living with integrity, of quieting the mind and opening the heart, that allow you to live in this ever-changing world with an inner freedom that no one can take from you.

I think of my new friend and colleague Valerie Kaur—we've done a bit of teaching together—who is a wonderful activist and filmmaker, Sikh, and a lawyer. She says the darkness we experience now can be seen culturally and globally, all the problems I've described, as the darkness of a tomb. But if we turn our attention—

In another way, we can see it as the darkness of the womb. Then, in fact, we are in a birth process. And anybody who's given birth or even attended a birth, as I have—because I certainly haven't given birth in this incarnation—knows that birth is not that easy. It's messy. Sometimes it's bloody. It's painful. It goes on a lot longer than you thought it would. It's dangerous in different ways. And there are contractions that come and then they pause and then they're peaceful. And then a huge new contraction comes. It's this amazing process, that the body becomes a channel for new beings to come into this planet. It's extraordinary.

And what if we are in a birth process collectively? Valerie asks, and I pose it to you. What if in fact it's not the darkness of the tomb, but the darkness of a womb of new birth? What if we hold it that way and work toward it?

Those who carry the spirit are beacons who remind people that suffering is not the end of the story—that in fact we've lived through pandemics and earthquakes and typhoons and all kinds of things, world wars and battles, and something in us knows how to be reborn, how to survive the difficulties. It's in your DNA. Your ancestors are cheering for you, saying, "Go, baby! You know how to do this. We did it before you, and now it's your time." The story is that suffering is not the end of the story, but human magnificence and care for one another and the possibility of a new birth.

And then she says something really remarkable: You can identify them by their cheerfulness. Now that's something to say in a time when there's so much hurt and pain in the world. And it's not to deny any of it, but here's the instruction from the Buddha: "Live in joy and love forever, even among those who hate. Live in joy in health, even among the sick and afflicted. Live in joy in peace, even among the troubled. Look within, quiet the mind and heart, be still and free from fear and attachment. Know the sweet joy of living in the way."

These are instructions for the time of illness, the time of conflict, the time of difficulty—to find a joy in yourself in the midst of it all.

I remember when I first met Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh and was reading his books. He's so remarkable. And he would talk about how when you sit and practice, you should put a half smile on your lips—that little half smile of the Buddha. You should smile. And I have to say, at first I thought it was like putting one of those yellow smiley faces on top of suffering. Come on, don't you have anything deeper than that? In fact, he's a very deep guy, but it's like, smile, smile. I asked him about it once and he said, "I've seen so much suffering. I have to teach joy. I have to teach joy."

And I think about John Lewis, who just died, as we all know, and all the things that have been said about him—that he was a kind and gentle human being, a humble servant who looked out for all of humankind. These are the things that the people who were closest to him are saying about him, that he had a deep faith in the central and essential goodness of humanity, in spite of all the suffering he'd seen. And so he was a gentleman and a gracious human being and a carrier of joy.

I heard a story today, actually. In the last decade or so, he'd helped create a graphic novel, a comic book series called March, which was all about the Selma March and civil rights in the sixties that he was so much a part of with Dr. King. And the person who helped him create that took him to Comic-Con, which is the giant convention of all the comic book enthusiasts from around the world. He gave a talk, holding up March and so forth. And then he put on a trench coat and a backpack. And he said, "In my backpack is an apple, a toothbrush, and the two books that I carried on my march. This is what I had with me." And he said, "Let me show you." And he went down from the stage and he began to walk. And the young people who were there got up and started following him. And pretty soon there were a thousand young people following him as he marched out and around the convention center, as if he was saying to them, "You can do this." As if he was passing on something that had cheer and joy and creativity, even in the midst of the difficulty.

You can identify them by their cheerfulness.

You will know them by their compassion.

The demonstrations that have been happening, not just around the country but around the world—highlighting the terrible injustice, the woven-in racism, the suffering in all these different ways—have been ninety-five or ninety-nine percent peaceful. And yes, there's been a bit of rioting. I myself am not a stranger to that from my earlier activist days, I have to say. And if you're a young man, basically you say, "Is there anything dangerous to do around here? Where can I sign up for it?" So there's that in the spirit of it.

Martin Luther King said, "Rioting is the language of the unheard." Or the African proverb that so speaks to what's happened in that part, that little part: "If a child is not cared for by the village, they will burn it down to feel its warmth." If a child is rejected by the village, they will burn it down to feel its warmth.

There's this longing in us as human beings to feel valued, to feel seen, to feel connected to one another. And if that's denied because you're born and your skin is a certain color or you're born in a certain circumstance, that longing doesn't go away. It still has to find its voice. And now Black bodies, brown bodies, BIPOC bodies, nations are being presented with the bill of what has been ignored, for all the suffering. And it's time to settle up for all that's happened.

Some years ago, I was invited to San Quentin Prison for a graduation from the GRIP program. This was run by Jacques Verduin, a dear friend who had started, with the help of Spirit Rock, the Insight Prison Project. It's now morphed in different ways over the last twenty years or more. I was part of the board, president of the board for a while, and certainly helped in its genesis. Now it's spread through many prisons doing fantastic work.

But this was a graduation, and I was to be one of the speakers. So I went in, and there was the biggest hall in San Quentin. At one end were one hundred twenty men wearing mortarboards and graduation gowns, like a college or high school graduation. At the other end of the room were three hundred visitors, which included people from the governor's office, from the corrections department, local mayors, various people involved with prison work, social workers, friends, family.

The men had chosen a valedictorian to speak of their program. The GRIP program—Guiding Rage Into Power—had anger management, mindfulness practice, yoga, restorative justice training, and forgiveness, all these kinds of things. It really turned these men's lives around. So they appointed their valedictorian, who gave a beautiful little talk, and then said, "We have things that we need to say to you."

And they all stood up.

First they read a pledge that they had been violent men, and they pledged—now that they had learned—that they would never again use violence to solve a conflict or a situation or difficulty in the world. They offered this pledge. And then, following that, they made a deep apology to all the suffering they'd caused, to all the people, the families, the community, those who had suffered in some way from their acts, the families of others, even their own families, and everyone in the room.

Then I was asked to give a little talk, which I did, about beginning again—that it's never too late to start over and begin again, beginner's mind, the birth of a new life.

And then my good friend and compadre Luis Rodriguez, who is a great Latino poet, was supposed to read a poem. Luis and I have done a lot of work together over the years in prisons and with kids and gangs and all kinds of other settings. He's an extraordinary poet. He was the poet laureate of Los Angeles for a couple of years in a row, and an activist. His poems, because he himself had been a heroin addict, had been on the street and homeless, in and out of working in prisons—he really speaks from a place where there's blood and guts in his poems. They're very real.

I thought, "All right, he's going to read something powerful."

He got up and said, "I can't read my poem."

We all paused.

He said, "I can't read it because all you men apologized to us, but it's we who need to apologize to you. Most of you were born in communities of poverty, of drug use, held and surrounded in the field of racism and disrespect for who you are. You were children brought up in communities where there wasn't economic opportunity and work and decent education. We failed you. It's we who need to offer you an apology."

When he finished saying that, the room got silent. No one could speak because they knew he was telling another piece of the truth that needed to be voiced.

This is really the heart of compassion—that can look and see those who've suffered, and also those who are causing suffering out of their ignorance, all of them, and hold them in the great heart of compassion.

You can identify them by their cheerfulness. You can know them by their compassion.

When asked how they do it, they will tell you about discipline, dedication, and the necessity of community.

Discipline. For almost everyone in this COVID time, one of the most important things to learn is a kind of routine for your life. It gets chaotic if you don't have a routine. How do you make a schedule that takes time for silence, for yourself, for meditation?

I've been doing all kinds of teaching, but I was working with groups of first responders, including my daughter's organization, Oasis Legal Services, which gets asylum for people whose lives are in danger from around the world. They're often the first people that these folks seeking asylum will ever have told their whole story to. About what it's like to be a gay man in Uganda, knowing that if anyone finds out, you're likely to be stoned to death. Or to be a lesbian coming from Guatemala where you've been raped by family members to "fix" you—one story after another. Or a transgender person who came from Saudi Arabia, if you can imagine that.

In working with the staff, because there's all the secondary trauma as well, I said, "You need backup. I don't know what you believe in, but in every one of your offices, you should make a little altar. Maybe you put Guadalupe or Maria. Maybe you put Buddha or Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion. Maybe you put Kali because you need her fierceness. I don't know, but it's not for you to hold in your bodies. You need to go in and light a candle and say, 'All right, Kali. All right, Guadalupe. All right, Mother Mary. I'll do your work. But you have to carry this. It's not my job to carry it.'"

And make rituals. Wash your hands and face between each client. Do a scan through your body. I'm talking about this for first responders, but it's really all of us in some way. We're now on the front lines of what's happening in the world, protected though you may be. You need to find your own discipline and your own routine and your own steadiness and your own practices in the midst of it all.

Then she says, they will tell you about discipline and dedication. Dedication is the bodhisattva vows. Amidst the suffering of the world, may I be a lamp in the darkness, food for the hungry, medicine for the sick, a resting place for the weary. "May I do this as long as beings exist," chants the Dalai Lama, "so that my life and all lives come together to alleviate the sufferings of the world and bring everyone into peace."

This is a really uncertain time. We are in a great birth process that we can hope gives something new to the world, that some birth happens that we get to be a part of. For those of you who've been around a birth, there are times to breathe—remember that instruction, breathe. There are times to push; that's part of the dedication, but not always. And there are times just to step back and feel the mystery of life coming through you, the life of this universe coming through you in this mystery.

As Thomas Merton taught a young activist, do not depend on the hope of results—because what's true for us is that we can do all that we can, but we don't get to choose the results. As you see this more and more deeply, as you plant seeds of goodness, as you care for the world, more and more you realize that it's not in your hands. You focus on the truth and the value and the rightness of the work itself. You're dedicated to plant seeds of goodness, to care for things in the world.

And if you're someone with privilege—which is a lot of us listening to this talk, because I'm talking to myself all these days as well—it's not about guilt or shame. There's another way to see it. It is your assignment. You've been given the cosmic assignment to have privilege and then to use it, to set your intention and say, "How can I use this privilege in a way that makes the world a more beautiful place?" And by beautiful, I mean in every way—a just place and a caring place.

They will tell you about discipline, dedication, and the necessity of community. Community is the only way. Together, we are attending the birth of something new, messy though it may be. When you go into hospitals—hopefully you don't have to, but sometimes it happens—the doctor who comes down the ward, whoever she or he is, is called the attending. The attending physician. The attending.

This is your job. You have the assignment with your privilege, wherever you are, and you now have become the attending one to the new birth of the world. And you want to do it with love and a peaceful heart, because the world doesn't need more hate, and it doesn't need more fear, and it doesn't need more ignorance and confusion.

You are loving awareness. This is your true nature. This is what was born into you.

You are consciousness. You are loving awareness manifesting through this really bizarre experiment that the cosmos has decided to make you. In all the galaxies of the universe, there's never been quite something as unique and strange as you. And now the cosmos is saying, "All right, let's do something interesting with this." You are the cosmos born in this way. You are loving awareness, the consciousness that is who you are, that was born into your body.

Thich Nhat Hanh was brought here to San Francisco a couple of years ago after he suffered a major stroke. At that time, he was 89 or 90. He was in France at Plum Village and for a while in the French hospitals, getting good care. But then a friend in Silicon Valley who is very much a student of Thich Nhat Hanh flew him and a whole group of his monks and nuns here so that they could receive top medical care from UC and Stanford. And there he was, living in San Francisco in a place set up by Mark Benioff from Salesforce—I will use his name, wonderful friend.

In the mornings, Thich Nhat Hanh would be rolled in in a wheelchair. He couldn't speak and he could just barely move one arm, and he'd been in considerable pain. But they set up one of the rooms where they were all staying as a zendo, as a meditation hall. He would be wheeled in and the bell would be struck and we would all sit for forty minutes and Thich Nhat Hanh would be there. Then they would ring the bell at the end.

The last morning before he went back to France—he'd been here in the Bay Area for six months or more for treatment—Trudy and I went to sit with him and join that group. When the bell was struck at the end of the sitting, he deliberately looked around and gazed at the eyes of everyone there. He looked at me, and I've known him for years. He looked at others.

Trudy is the one that noticed this. She said to me, "Do you remember, did you look at his eyes?" Because she said—and I could see it—one eye was tremendously present, like he was acknowledging each person that was there. This beautiful sense of mindful, loving presence. She said, "One eye was here, fully present, and one eye was on eternity." And you could see it, as if he was holding both. Here he was, ninety years old with a stroke. He knew the dance of birth and death. He'd seen it his whole life. One eye on eternity and one eye completely present where we are.

Then we went into the kitchen afterward. He was taken back by his caregivers. I was sitting with Sister Chân Không, who is the female counterpart and leader in his community for years and years. We were talking about how there was a big retreat happening down at Deer Park in Southern California that very week. I said, "Well, because Thich Nhat Hanh had this terrible stroke and won't be there, are people coming anyway?" She said, "Oh yes, six hundred people are arriving today." Then she paused and she said, "He taught us that we are him and he is us. That the community itself is really the carrier of the Dharma." He said that in other ways when he said the next Buddha to come in this world, the next Buddha is the Sangha. He taught us that we are him and he is us.

So as I finish, I'd like you to imagine—maybe you can even lift your hands up for a moment on either side of your body—and imagine that you're holding hands with all the other people who are listening tonight. There are a thousand or two thousand or ten thousand, however many, it's quite a few actually. And we're all in the circle holding hands together. You're the ones that abide, that have chosen not to flee, known by your goodness and generosity, discipline and dedication. Feel the necessity of community, feel that we carry each other in our hearts and in our beings.

And maybe the only question to ask is: What would love have me do today? What would love have me do with all of you together? What would love have us do together?

With this, I thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 96

Q and A: The Peaceful Heart | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 30 min

> In this intimate question and answer session, Jack Kornfield engages with practitioners navigating the challenges of isolation, social justice, and service during times of crisis. The conversation opens with a poignant question from an elder seeking meaningful ways to contribute while sheltering in place, leading to practical guidance about finding volunteer opportunities aligned with one's deepest values.
> Kornfield addresses the visceral experience of witnessing societal suffering—the anger at slow progress on racial justice, the fear accompanying uncertain times, and the exhaustion of healthcare workers on the front lines. Drawing on the teaching from the Sedaka Sutta about the bamboo acrobats, he emphasizes that caring for oneself is inseparable from caring for others. For those holding others' pain professionally, he suggests creating rituals of release—sweeping through the body, offering burdens to the earth or to Kuan Yin—so that suffering need not accumulate.
> The session also explores white awakening work and its relationship to Buddhist teachings, with Kornfield pointing to the Buddha's radical inclusion across caste lines as precedent. He encourages practitioners doing anti-racism work to recognize that the discomfort they encounter mirrors what marginalized communities have long experienced, and to respond with love rather than argument. Throughout, Kornfield returns to the theme that underneath anger lies caring, underneath fear lies love, and that the ancient story of human goodness lives within each practitioner ready to find expression.

For those who want to stay a little longer, we have maybe fifteen minutes or so for questions or dialogue.

"Jack, what can I do during this time to help or be of service—to the world or to anybody? I feel like I'm just in this shelter, locked up by myself, not doing any good for anyone. Why am I even here? I'm wondering if you can suggest what path I might take to be of some help."

You know, there's a difference between being an older and an elder. An elder is actually the role that you inhabit to be there for others. And I hear that beautifully in your question. You want to do something meaningful—not just be old, but actually inhabit that role of elder.

So let me ask you: what do you care about?

"I care about justice. I care about trying to alleviate suffering in the world, however I can do that. Just to be of service, to somehow be important in accomplishing something along those lines—helping people."

Beautiful. So what I'm going to suggest, since you do need to protect yourself and stay sequestered—and since you're online with me, you obviously know how to do this—is that you go online to certain organizations. You could go to vote.org, which is trying to get out the vote across the country. They will give you ways to send messages or texts or emails to people. You could go to Southern Poverty Law Center, which has been fighting for justice for years, and say, "I want to volunteer. How can I help?" Go to Amnesty International or the ACLU or whatever is close to your heart and say, "I want to volunteer. I want to use my time." And even if you get turned down in two or three places, sooner or later somebody is going to say, "Yes, we have just something for you to do."

"What's alive for me right now is this idea of birth—having given birth and having these really intense images coming. As we are rebirthing or birthing this new world and holding hands with the ten thousand warriors of light that might be plugged into this process, I'm struggling with: what if the midwife is indifference? What about those gatekeepers who say, 'Get out of this laboring room, let's C-section this baby because we're in a hurry, there's an economy to open'? The indifference of those who hold power—perhaps forcing this baby to be born in ways that might be stillborn."

First, I just want to feel into your question. You're concerned—really concerned—because there are things happening from the government or people of power that are destructive, that are undermining what good could come of these crises. We could talk about all the ways that's true. And I feel the concern and the caring underneath.

But I just need to remind you of something: it's women who give birth, and nothing can stop them. Just feel that. It doesn't matter if there are people in power—women know how to do it. Nothing stops that. And I want you to feel and own that there is something in you in spite of all this.

As I said, we've gone through this for centuries and millennia—bad leadership and epidemics and tragedies. And it's women more than men who have kept it all together, who give birth to the new. So I'm not worried about the power when I look into the eyes of the women of this world. There's something else that's here. And I really trust that power.

"Yeah, I'll keep practicing. The fear is very alive, for sure."

The fear is under there.

As I've witnessed, babies often don't get born because of interruptions and external interventions. And this is a big baby—we're all in it. But the women know how to do it.

"Hi, Jack. Like many of us, I'm feeling a lot of anger and frustration at what little progress we've made as a race, as a human race. I, like many others probably on this call, was in Washington DC fifty years ago and thought perhaps we wouldn't have to do it again. And now I'm not sure we've made much progress. I'd like to look back on 2020 and not say, 'What did I miss?' but rather, 'What did I accomplish? What was I able to do?' You bring up a good point about creating a broader awareness. Racial injustice is what's really getting to me these days, and I'd like to reach out and try to do something about it by bringing that broader awareness, by being one of your warriors. Now, I'm an early practitioner, and a lot of my friends and family are back in Michigan, where they're all early practitioners too. What might be a short list I can remember and bring to my friends and family—something that helps relate this message of how the Dharma can help us with our white privilege and how that might affect solving some of this injustice?"

Thank you for the question because it's so to the point of what's happening now. When I go back to your first sentence or two, you said you were angry. And when you feel that anger, what's underneath it?

"Mostly what little progress we've made, and what I've been able to do along the way as well."

So I want to point to something else that might be there. Yes, the anger is there because we've made too little progress. But I would say the anger is also there because you care. That anger wouldn't be there if it didn't matter to you. There's a kind of passion in you, a fire, a caring that's actually very deep. The anger is as big as it is because it matters that much to you.

I don't have a simple answer for what the ideal practice is. In some way, you have to listen inside. I think of my colleague, teacher, and friend Maha Ghosananda, the Gandhi of Cambodia that I talk about frequently, whose all nineteen members of his family were murdered. He led those peace walks through Cambodia, chanting, "Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed."

For some people, it's a practice of compassion and loving-kindness that you undertake so that every human being you see, you offer them a blessing. For others, it's something very active as well. You say, "I'm going to work on getting out the vote." Personally, I am doing that. We have a project to mobilize all the Dharma communities and all the yoga practitioners and teachers around the country—yoga teachers and Buddhist meditators helping get out the vote, not just your own vote, but helping others vote too.

So find an inner practice that nourishes you and strengthens you. There is a book I wrote—it's not really about social justice, more in the flavor of what we did this evening about a peaceful heart. It's called The Art of Forgiveness, Lovingkindness, and Peace. There are some practices or passages in there that may be helpful.

In terms of your family and friends in Michigan, I think the big thing is if you express your care, even more than your anger. If you say, "Not only do I care, but here's what I'm doing." People learn in resonance with one another, and if they feel like, "Hey, Dan is really doing something—I want to be part of that," your doing will bring them together with you more than anything you could say to them.

So I thank you for your care, because underneath everything you said is a big heart. And now it's time to put it out there.

"Hi, Jack. Thank you so much for the teaching tonight. That was really beautiful. The peaceful heart really resonated. I'm very aware of this feeling of not doing enough right now. And I am someone who's very grateful that I am still working full time. I work in healthcare as a mental health provider, even seeing some people individually right now."

What you're doing is important—it's really needed right now.

"Yes. My question is—"

It's been partly really addressed when you were talking to the first responders—this question of how to hold the suffering of others when you're simultaneously feeling pretty stressed out yourself, as the acuity is just up for all of us right now.

What have you learned that helps you so far?

Sleep. Being in nature. Talking to people. And knowing that when I am with people, I am present.

Well, you've answered most of your own question. Sleep more, walk in nature, talk with people. And maybe some of those things that I mentioned for the first responders apply here too. Perhaps it's time to make your altar so that you don't carry it all in your body. Sweep through your body at the end of the day. Give it back to Mother Earth, or give it to Kuan Yin to carry. Do those things that nurture you.

You already know how to do this. You're in a tough birth process. Like a lot of people, as a first responder, you're right at the side of this birth happening. And so you do have to take care of yourself.

There's a famous story called the Bamboo Acrobats. It describes a traveling mini-circus that came through the villages. There was a father and a daughter—she would climb up a pole and do tricks while he carried this long bamboo pole. They had a disagreement and brought it to the Buddha. The father said, "I'll take care of you if you take care of me." And the daughter said, "No, no—I should take care of myself and you take care of yourself."

They went to the Buddha and asked, "Who's right?" He listened to them and said, "I hate to say it to you, dad, but actually your daughter is right—as is often the case." He explained that if she takes care of herself, she will also be protecting him. And if he takes care of himself, he will be protecting his daughter as well.

So there's something in what you say. You already know this—the nature, the sleep, the taking time. Maybe now you're adding some rituals and practices. Just know that you happen to be present at a time of messy birth, and you have to keep yourself properly cared for so that you can do this work well. And I thank you for that.

So my question is, how does white awakening work relate to or intersect with the Buddhist teachings?

What makes you ask?

The reason I'm asking is that I've heard a surprising number of harsh, unkind, and flat-out rude replies when I speak about doing white awakening classes or programs. And they were so profound for me personally. So it's interesting to take in that energy that comes, that feels very negative.

What do you do with that when people disparage it or are so negative?

Well, I notice my body, of course—almost instantly sort of like, wow. It makes me feel sad. And I feel an energy that arises, really wanting to convince them that they should take another look. I realize there's a passionate fire in that work, and it's been profound in my practice.

First, I'm just listening to you with a lot of respect for doing the work that you're describing, because it's the work that we all need to do. The Buddhist teachings primarily talk about the inherent dignity of every human being. The Buddha was very clear about this—in the racist caste system of India, he welcomed everybody to come and be respected, quite against the entire social structure of the time. There are teachings upon teachings about the value of every human being and treating each one with dignity. So you're doing that in this beautiful way.

And then what happens is this: as you wake up, you realize more and more clearly—in ways you may not have seen before—that society is so structured in ways that people are not only ignorant, but because of that ignorance, they're causing all kinds of suffering. And they don't even believe it or know it. It's woven in. You see all of that. And then when they say things like "Oh, that's a bad thing" or other negative dismissals, you feel it in your body. You feel sad. You feel it in your body.

Part of what happens in doing this work is that you enter the territory of suffering. You voluntarily do it and say, "All right, I'm going to open my heart and my mind to actually recognize and feel what oppression is like." I mean, what happens? You can walk down certain streets or in stores or go places and you can trust that you'll be accepted. But if you were brown or black or poor—a person of color from whatever background—you'd be seen with suspicion, or worse. You'd be tailed or pulled over or whatever. You know all this in some way.

So you begin to see the fabric of society and the suffering woven through it. But it's not enough to see it. If you're really engaged in some way, you also feel it. You can't not, because you're a human being. And then when you get dismissed by others for it, what you're experiencing is the pain that people have experienced for a really long time—every Black or brown or BIPOC person who spoke up and said something, every woman who spoke up and said something happened and people dismissed it or got angry. You're now party to that pain, and you can't really fix it.

But what you can do is see the fear that's behind it. Because all that reactivity, all the grasping, all the aggression—if you look underneath it, there's fear. And knowing that, you can hold them with some compassion, even in their ignorance. You're not going to convince them with your words at all, but you'll convince them with your love. When you simply say, "I feel like I need to do this work because it's a work of love for me. It's a work of learning to love more fully. That's what I'm doing." How does that sound?

Another person asked about inclusion and invitation: How do we get the broader community involved in the dharma community? How do we become more inclusive of people of color, of those over 65, of the queer community? As a Latina lesbian, she was asking how leaders—both small and large—can become more inclusive.

First of all, I really appreciate both the genuineness of your question and your concern, your care. And also the fact that as a Latina and lesbian, you know what needs to happen in some way.

I'll tell you something. In the early 1990s—almost thirty years ago now—I taught my first day-long retreat for people of color in Oakland at Reverend E's Church, which was a Black church in Oakland, also a spiritualist church. And I thought, "Well, I'm going to bring teachings of loving-kindness, compassion, mindful self-awareness, how to steady the heart, to people in a community where there's been so much targeting by racism and injustice and poverty. Maybe this will be of value to them." That was my thought.

I was wrong.

In that room were fifty or sixty people, primarily Black and Latino, perhaps a few Asian Americans as well. Instead of all these beginners I thought I was going to introduce to the Dharma, it turned out almost all of them had long-term practices. They had been practicing yoga and meditation for years. And they said, "You know, I just don't go to those white centers. It doesn't feel comfortable for me. But actually, I've been doing this a long time." One man stood up and said, "I'm the only Black vegetarian Buddhist doctor that I know. And I feel like I've found my people."

So the first thing to say is that it's already there—in the LGBT community, in the Latino community, in the Black community. There are very deep spiritual traditions already part of those communities. And there's also tremendous interest in the inner life, expressed in different ways. This reframes things considerably. It doesn't have to be brought to these communities; rather, we want to celebrate what's already there and add to it, support it, make it more accessible.

The second thing I'd say, quite personally to you: if you have a group, it sounds like you're already teaching in some way. Put it out there, baby. Invite people and let it grow. I'm just thrilled that you're doing it. You have to find your own language and your own way that fits into the community you tend to.

I'll tell one more story. I was doing some peace work in Palestine and Israel, and I did a large benefit in Tel Aviv for mindfulness in Arabic. About a thousand people came, and we raised a good amount of money. I was talking to one of the first Arabic mindfulness teachers working in Palestine and Syria, and I said, "It's so beautiful—you're leading little retreats. It's almost like people can go out into the desert." I was thinking of forty days in the desert where you fast and receive visions. I said, "You can invite people to go out, like tradition has it, to listen in the wilderness and receive inspiration. That might be a beautiful fit for the culture."

She said, "No, no, no. That doesn't work at all. Going out into the desert alone—for people here, that's a punishment."

I asked, "Well, if that's not the right image, what is?"

She said, "The image is a walled garden—maybe a little oasis with a wall around it, fruit trees, flowing water. There's an inner walled garden you can enter that contains the fruits of the heart." And that was what she used in her teaching.

I tell this story partly in honor of the fact that you are translating these teachings into the community of people you know and love—the Latina community, the LGBT community. You will find the metaphor that brings a sweetness they already recognize. They'll say, "Oh yes, I know this." And you'll offer ways that help. I'm part of your cheering section. Thank you, Maria.

We need to take our pause now and just take a breath. I want to thank you all for the sincerity of your questions. In them, you could feel how much people care. People's voices revealed their longing to attend, to help, to serve, to be together in whatever ways we can. We feel it all the more acutely because we are isolated—but we're not completely isolated. We're not isolated in spirit, and we're not isolated because there are things we can do. As long as you have breath and goodwill and a good heart, there are beautiful things you can do.

So let's be quiet for just thirty seconds.

Trust your own caring heart. Trust the ancient story that tells of the goodness, the generosity, and the creativity of humanity—that it lives within you. The longing to make a difference in your life and the lives of others is real. And you will find your way.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 97

Suffering is Not the End of the Story

Jack Kornfield · 55 min

> In this profound talk, Jack Kornfield addresses how we can live wisely amidst multiple crises—pandemic, racial injustice, climate change, and personal struggles. Drawing from the Buddha's Four Noble Truths, he emphasizes that while suffering (dukkha) is real and present, it represents only the beginning of the story, not its conclusion. The path to liberation includes wise effort, wise concentration (samādhi), and wise mindfulness—what Kornfield calls "mindful loving awareness."
> Kornfield shares powerful stories illustrating transformation: the eradication of smallpox through dedicated effort, a physician discovering the hidden beauty in a difficult patient, and ordinary people finding courage in extraordinary circumstances. He references the Buddha's final teachings on what makes a society prosper—meeting in harmony, honoring wisdom, caring for the vulnerable, and respecting the sacred environment. These teachings remind us that awakening is not about transcending the world but discovering the mystery and liberation available in this very moment.
> The talk offers practical guidance for meditation and daily life: how to hold the body's pain with spacious compassion, how to tend the heart's 10,000 joys and sorrows with gratitude, and how to recognize that our minds contain seeds of both confusion and wisdom—and we choose which to water. Kornfield invites practitioners to ask themselves: "What would love have me do today?" This question becomes the compass for engaged, compassionate action in a world that desperately needs our open hearts and clear seeing.

I was very happy to meditate and to sit together with you. It's such a pleasure amidst all this chaotic and very difficult time. Because even as we take our seat to try to steady and calm ourselves, we're doing so in the middle of multiple crises. The crisis of the pandemic and all that's happening and how it's affecting so many around us. The economic crisis that it's highlighted and made worse. The crisis of racial injustice and economic injustice and the disparity in our culture and country and in the world between rich and poor. The climate crisis, which affects everyone and all creatures on the earth. Now living in California, added to it as if it's not enough, we have these vast forest fires that are part of the usual ecosystem but much larger than usual, partly fueled by climate change itself.

So the question for us—those of us of good hearts who come together with our good hearts, and many of you as meditators over the long time or relatively new—is how do we understand this? And how do we live wisely amidst these crises?

What I'd like to talk about tonight is that suffering is not the end of the story. The difficulty and suffering is part of what we experience, but it's not where the story goes. And more than anything in these teachings, I want them to be a reminder. It's not something you have to take notes about or take an exam at the end or get credits for. It's really an invitation to reflect yourself mindfully and to live as you listen to it just here and now, and sense what resonates in your own heart to be true. The rest you can let go.

When I say suffering is not the end of the story, I think of my very dear friend, epidemiologist and physician Larry Brilliant, who was on the teams in India that worked to eradicate smallpox from the world. With this pandemic, Larry has been very busy working with the head of the CDC and the head of WHO, bringing all that he's learned about pandemics and epidemiology. But back then, when he was working in the last countries, the last places where there was still smallpox in the world, struggling to complete this work, he acknowledged—as we might—that smallpox was one of the greatest forms of suffering that humanity has ever known. Somewhere between 300 and 500 million people died of smallpox in the 20th century alone. If we think of one or two million dying from the COVID pandemic, smallpox was 100 or 500 times as much. It was the leading cause of death. In many years, one third of the Japanese population died in one of the epidemics. Most of the Native Americans, who were unprepared for smallpox, died.

What Larry described was working from village to village with a team of 150,000 people around the world, who all had the leadership and dedication to realize that it was possible to not only stop, but to eradicate this pandemic. He was in a village in a remote place in Bangladesh and saw the last live case of smallpox on earth—Rahima Banu, a young girl in a Bangladesh village. They managed to vaccinate everyone in that village even though the villagers resisted and struggled against it, because it was their belief that smallpox was a punishment from God. They vaccinated them all. And Larry said, "I looked in the eyes of this young girl who was surviving her smallpox—only half of children did—and I realized I had seen the last case of a virus that was one of the worst on earth for five or ten thousand years of humanity." And he wept.

So suffering is not the end of the story. We can also be witness to the bravery and the possibilities of life. Larry has been working on the eradication of polio and all kinds of other human possibilities following smallpox. But for us, what's important is to understand how we move and navigate and live wisely amidst all these difficulties.

The Buddha taught in his very first teaching, the very first day, the famous Four Noble Truths of suffering and its causes—greed and hatred and ignorance. And then he talked about the liberation of nirvana that he had discovered, and invited those who listened to him to find the same liberation in their hearts. What's important to understand is that after attaining nirvana, the Buddha wandered on foot the dusty roads of India for 45 years, meeting people and saying, "This liberation of heart and mind is possible for you."

Often when we think of nirvana or liberation, we tend to think in transcendent terms. And they're true in a way and quite wonderful—samadhi, jhana states, states of expansion and bliss, dissolving the body into light. These are things that you can do in meditation, that I've learned to do in retreats with various teachers I've practiced with, states of expansiveness and bliss and well-being. But it turns out that there's no enlightened retirement. Even the Buddha had backaches and terrible conflicts in his community between people, and people who tried to kill him. Maybe that just comes with leadership. I don't know, especially with good leadership.

But what he had done was open to a freedom in the mystery of our human life. To say this is possible. This inner peace and well-being, this freedom—freedom from fear and confusion and from the small, separate sense of self, from grasping—this is possible for you.

And we all need this. I think of my dear colleague and friend Sylvia Boorstein, who tells this story when she teaches about her father, who I knew. She was close to him and loved him, and he was in his 90s, on his deathbed. He had cancer and was getting closer and closer to dying, almost dying. She was whispering in his ear, "Dear dad, let go into the light. Let go into the ocean of love that you are. Trust it. Release into it. Let go of this body"—all those beautiful teachings we have for the end of life.

And he opened his eyes. He couldn't quite raise his head, but he opened his eyes. He motioned Sylvia to come close so she could hear his weak voice. And he said, "Sylvia, it's not such a big deal."

She carries this with her, because yes, there's suffering—and that includes aging and death and illness.

These are part of the first noble truth of life, and there are causes for it—greed and hatred and ignorance, and the amount of clinging and attachment that we have. But they're not the end of the story. We usually focus on the suffering or get lost in it. We get caught in the reactivity, the greed, the fear. We dwell in it and we struggle. What are we going to do about it? And we believe it in some deep way.

What if there were another way?

Jerry Flagstead, a physician, describes his initial revulsion to a patient named Frank. Frank was an angry and obese homeless man who had diabetes, was unbathed, and had gangrene on his legs and many open sores. When he did not take his meds for his mental disorder, Frank would flail his arms and spew curses and epithets at all who were around him. Frank was admitted repeatedly to the hospital, and for Dr. Flagstead, Frank was a patient who was hard to love.

One day, Frank was brought into the Richmond Hospital with congestive heart failure. The diagnosis was serious, and Dr. Flagstead tended him as best as he could. Then twenty members of the Down Home Neighborhood Church, in whose basement shelter Frank sometimes slept, arrived. They brought flowers and homemade food. They chanted and sang hymns to Frank, creating a chorus of care and communion. When Dr. Flagstead returned to Frank's room after tending another patient on the ward, he saw that Frank was smiling, bathed in their love. And the doctor realized he had never really seen Frank at all.

What if there were another way to see, even amidst the suffering? To take a breath, to sense the vastness and mystery of life. As the Ojibwa say, "Sometimes I go about pitying myself, when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

It is a mystery. We are all made of starlight. The earth and all that's on it came as a planet out of the explosions of the stars in the galaxies. And if you don't think that's a mystery, look at every green leaf, every tree and every blade of grass and every weed—all those green things which contain chlorophyll that you studied in your high school biology class. Here's the cool thing: these plants know how to turn light into sugar. Imagine that. Not only are you congealed stars, but the surface of the earth is covered with beings that know how to turn light into sugar, so that the plants and animals around them—all that feed off this life that streams from the sun—turn into sugar for us.

The point of liberation is not to transcend this world, to find some peaceful bliss, to run away to some cave. The point of liberation is to see the mystery that's here and now—the sense of the sacred, the immanence of life. Like the Buddha wandering the dusty roads of India, we discover that exactly where we are can also be the place of peace and nirvana, of wellbeing.

In the noble truths that were taught, there's suffering. There is, in life. These days, I don't think anybody can deny it. But it doesn't say that life is suffering. It says that life has suffering. And then it talks about the causes: greed, hatred, ignorance, fear. We don't have to look very far to see how it plays out in our lives, in our communities, and more sadly, in the body politic and in the actions of nations around the world.

But there's a third and fourth noble truth. There's an end to suffering, and a path to the end of it. This path includes wise effort—the effort not to be caught in greed and fear and confusion, but to step out of them, the sense that there's another way of being. And wise concentration—the way of steadying the heart, what we did as we sat together, finding ease with each breath. Not only do we not want to get caught, but we need to learn how to stay present so that we're not completely caught by each fear and confusion that comes by. And then wise mindfulness, which basically means mindful loving awareness that's not identified with each thing that comes and goes—that we become the loving witness, the loving awareness of vastness itself, that sees the world arise and pass as it does for us in this human incarnation, with a sense of spaciousness, not taking it so personally.

Here's another story for you. This is about Whitney, who was caught in the great troubles of her family. Her mother was scheduled for hip surgery. Her father was already suffering from a middle stage of Alzheimer's that the mother was taking care of. She wanted her parents to continue to live in the home where they'd been for years and where Whitney grew up. But as their disabilities got worse, it became clear that they had to move out. Her brothers wouldn't do it. They told Whitney—and this happens so often to the women in the family—"You go take care of it."

So she took leave from work and spent time with her parents to help them in the hospital and get ready. The home was in a shambles. Her father couldn't really care for himself. They had round-the-clock care, but they couldn't afford it for more than a short period of time. Everyone was stressed.

Whitney took a walk up the hillside she'd known since her childhood. She didn't want to lose this family home.

She wanted her parents to stay until the end. And she didn't want to lose her parents. She wept as she walked.

But when she reached the top of the hill, she sat quietly, calmed herself, and looked across the vast Midwestern fields stretching to the horizon. The sky was filled with cumulus clouds bringing shade to so many small houses clustered at the edge of town and beyond. Facing this unbounded vastness, she suddenly felt less alone. She could sense how everything had its rhythms—arriving and departing, flourishing and struggling, coming into being and fading away.

How many people, she wondered, are in the same predicament we are in right now?

As she breathed with more ease, her heart opened further. I'm not the only one with aging parents. It's part of the human journey. And as the space within her opened, she felt more trust. This is the vastness of mindful loving awareness that allows us to steady and quiet our bodies and hearts and minds, to hold a kind of tender and wise perspective—to become the witness, to see the dance of our life from a place of compassion and understanding and connection. She knew connection. She knew she wasn't the only one, that there were thousands of others who were attending their parents that day, and this day as well.

So how do we live in this? How do we live in our lives?

In the last teachings of the Buddha, there's a famous text which records the final year of his teachings. He speaks of a wise society. He says that if a society finds a way to meet in harmony, to discuss their lives in harmony with respect for one another, and to part in harmony, such a society will prosper and not decline. If a society finds ways to listen to the wisdom of the ages, of the elders and all those who've directed humankind toward their best evolution and highest possibility, they will prosper and not decline. If a society cares for the vulnerable among them—the women, the children, those who are sick—they will prosper and not decline. And if a society cares for the sacredness of the environment around them, they will prosper and not decline.

This is part of the teachings of wisdom, the teachings of the liberated heart. It is collective wisdom, because we are interdependent with the world around us.

When I drove down to Southern California yesterday, I left San Francisco, which was very smoky, and drove through the Central Valley to be with my beloved Trudy, my dear wife. The smoke filled the entire Central Valley all the way to the last little range of mountains at the Grapevine, just before you descend into Los Angeles. Almost the entire state, and the Northwest in Portland, covered with smoke from these huge, still-burning and growing fires.

It's really difficult. My daughter is married to a firefighter who's been out on the front lines. My grandson, who's about twenty months old, keeps saying to his mama, "Outside, outside," but they can't go. It's not healthy. They have air purifiers in the house. But then what about all the people who are losing their homes? What about all the children in homes where there aren't air purifiers? What about all the creatures of the forest who are fleeing the fires?

And what can we do? What can each of us do?

If you feel guilty, if you feel ashamed somehow that you're safe when others aren't, that you have privilege when others don't—that's not the answer. The truth is that whatever birth you've taken in this life as a human being, you've been given a particular assignment. And if you have privilege, that is your assignment: to use it, to treasure it, to value it, to respect it, and then to use it in your way to make life beautiful for yourself and others.

For me, I've been going out daily for the last two and a half months with a big sign that says "Time for Racial and Economic Justice—Black Lives Matter." As the cars go by, I stand in the median of a very busy intersection, where I don't see other people near me, and I have my mask on. Some people honk and cheer. Many are quiet. And then once in a while, the angry people go by and shout at me—"Asshole! All lives matter! Stupid asshole, get out of here!"—and worse things than that.

Then today, a car pulled up and someone asked, "Are you getting paid to do this?" I said, "No, I'm doing it because I care." They said, "That's a lie. They must be paying you." I just said, truthfully, "This matters to me, and anything else you might believe is just propaganda. Do you care about economic justice and racial justice? I do."

So I get all of those things—the coming and going, the praise and the blame.

I'm also involved in a project to bring together all the dharma teachers that I know, all the meditation teachers and yoga teachers, with a group called Yogis and Buddhists United, to help get out the vote across the country. Because there are tens of millions of meditation and yoga practitioners.

And if the teachers of these traditions say, here's how you register to vote, here's how you help register others to vote—because we're interdependent. Every breath you took as we meditated was a breath that's part of the climate change we share. Was the breath perhaps constricted by your mask because of the pandemic? Was the breath taken in the middle of our economic crisis? All of these things are interconnected.

And you are invited to steady your heart. You're invited to see it all with loving awareness, to remember that this loving awareness is who you are, and to find your way to respond.

Going back to the very earliest teachings of the Buddha, it's clear that there was no spiritual bypass to engagement with the world. He stood up against and acted against the racist caste system of India. He invited those who were the lowest caste—the ones who were shunned and pushed to the edges of the village and spat upon—and he said, "You can become monks and nuns in my order and live with dignity and nobility."

And then when the princes and princesses of the royal households came to ordain, because you had to bow to those who had ordained before you, the Buddha had set it up so that prince or princess had to get down and bow to the thief, to the untouchable, to the lowest caste, who would become a noble one wearing the robes of awakening. This goes back to the very beginning—that it's not caste or race or creed or gender or ability that makes you noble. As the Buddha said, not your birth, but that nobility is the nobility of heart, the dignity and compassion that you carry. That's what makes a noble being.

When I was teaching at Naropa Buddhist University in those first years, starting in 1974 and 1975 with Ram Dass and Chogyam Trungpa and two thousand students, it was really quite a wonderful Dharma festival. I remember being at one of our faculty meetings. A dear friend of mine, Mirabai Bush, who's close to Ram Dass and did some books together with him—a wonderful teacher—she was there, and what got brought up was the fact that women were not being treated as well as men on the faculty. I know you're shocked to hear this. They were being paid less, they had less power, they had less influence. Shocking, absolutely shocking.

The answer that was given when it was raised—and remember, this was the seventies, which had its own foment and ferment of feminism in a beautiful way—Chogyam Trungpa and the followers, the teachers, the faculty who were around him said, "In the Dharma, there is no man and no woman. In the Dharma, we are all equal. There's a oneness, and Dharma is beyond gender and beyond all these forms of discrimination. You're seeing it wrong."

Then I remember Mirabai standing up and saying, "I just need a little clarification here. If there's no gender in the Dharma, then why is it that the eighteen people who run this are all men and the women are all in the back of the bus? What does that mean?"

It was a beautiful moment because it was undeniable what was happening, even though they were trying to hide out and make a spiritual bypass about it all. We know better than that now, in all kinds of ways.

Dear ones, dear friends, you are invited to live from your wisdom. You're invited to a liberated heart. You've taken human incarnation, and who you are is consciousness itself—the vast consciousness that's born in particular ways into your body and another's body. But who you are is the field of consciousness itself, like starlight that makes all things visible. That too is held in the field of consciousness.

And out of consciousness, this mysterious universe has created a universe of duality—of light and dark, beginnings and endings, birth and death, joy and sorrow. Because in the oneness of consciousness, none of that exists. There's only openness and possibility and eternal, timeless peace. But for consciousness to manifest as a world and a universe, it has to divide itself and make a beginning and an end, form and light and dark.

This is what we get: justice and injustice, pleasure and pain. Take a look around. This is human incarnation as it is.

Glennon Doyle says, "You will never change the fact that being human is hard. So you must change your idea that it was ever supposed to be easy."

And here you are, born into the human realm—light and dark, pleasure and pain, birth and death, sickness and health. Sounds like a marriage vow, doesn't it? In sickness and health. This is your vow to become a human being. You're married to the human incarnation of your life. And this is it. It's what Oscar Wilde called the tainted glory of humanity.

To be liberated, to be wise and peaceful and free, is a great power. And the great power is not to be afraid of suffering. Because suffering is only the First Noble Truth.

Zen Master Rinzai says, "One who is wise can enter the realm of hungry ghosts and dumb animals without being molested by them, can go into the three deepest hells as if strolling through a fairground, can play about in the world of fire and water—fire without being burned, water without drowning." How is this so? Because the one with a liberated heart finds that there's nothing that they dislike. If you grasp after something sacred out there and dislike this very world, you will go on floating and sinking in the ocean of birth and death. Confusion arises with the grasping of the heart.

When the heart is still and you grasp after nothing and welcome all, why then need you fear anything?

Do not tire yourself grasping after anything at all. And quite naturally, of itself, you will live in the way.

I remember when I first went to the monastery of Ajahn Chah, my teacher, to live in the forest as a forest monk. I entered with my robe and my bowl. I'd been ordained in the village temple where I lived in the Peace Corps, so my friends could be part of that ordination. I entered and Ajahn Chah looked at me and said, "Welcome. You're welcome to this as a place of peace and a place of practice." I said thank you. And then he looked me in the eye and said, "I hope you're not afraid of suffering."

I was taken aback by that as his first statement. I said, "Why do you say that?" He smiled and said, "There are two kinds of suffering. The suffering that you run away from, that follows you everywhere. And the suffering that you're willing to turn and face—and only there can you find the liberation of the heart."

So when you sit and meditate, you find both the suffering, that part of the story, and the liberation from that suffering, the other part of the story. You sit with your body, and in this frail and strong and magnificent and difficult, hard to attain—as they say—human body and human form, you will feel everything. Pleasure and pain and tension and illness and well-being and strength. And you'll feel it as part of the body of the earth itself.

A story for you. The question is, with loving awareness, how do you touch this body? When you're there with pain or sickness in your own body or someone else's, or you're there with something beautiful happening in your body, how do you hold it and how do you touch it?

Frank Ostaseski, dear friend who helped to start the Zen Center Hospice, tells a story of a resident who was there in a great deal of pain, advanced cancer throughout his body. Frank thought learning meditation might help him. But the stomach cancer he had was so painful. Frank said, "Why don't you turn your kind attention to it and see if you can hold it in compassion." He tried to open to the sensations. It was just too intense for him. And he screamed, "I can't—it's too much. It hurts. It hurts. It hurts."

So Frank told him, "Okay, let's try something else," and put his own hand gently on the man's stomach and said, "How's that?" And the man said, "Oh, oh, it hurts too much. It hurts." And Frank said, "Let's try this," and he put his hands near the man's feet. The man said, "Ah, that's a little better." Then Frank moved up and put his hands a couple of feet above the man's body. And the man said, "Oh, that's lovely actually."

As Frank goes on, this was no magic, no special body work, no esoteric practice—just opening to more and more space. And after a few minutes, with a more relaxed face, the fellow said softly, "Oh, rest in love. Rest in love." After that, whenever he'd get in trouble with his pain, he'd push his morphine pump—which sometimes we might wish we had—and then just repeat to himself, "Rest in love. Rest in love."

This is the liberation of the body. How to be with this amazing human body with loving awareness.

And it's the same for liberation of the heart. The heart bears witness to and carries the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows. When you sit and get quiet, you feel your grief and all the things you've lost in the pandemic, the connections that you want to have, the economic problems, the worry, the care for others. The heart is carrying all of this—your longing and your hope and your love. What you want to do as you sit quietly is to say to your heart, "Thank you. Thank you for caring so much." And hold it all with compassion.

My dear colleague and friend Yvonne Rand, the great Zen teacher from San Francisco Zen Center, died this last week. There was sent around a beautiful picture of her close to death, with clear eyes and a beautiful face, getting ready for the end of her life. And underneath it, some of her last words. She said, "No form." You can hear her whispering it to her daughter. "No form." Zen, of course, is full of all kinds of forms—sit and bow and ring the bell. She said, "No form. Only a bow of thanks."

What last words to say? Only a bow of thanks. To bear witness with the heart to this mysterious moment—painful, glorious, beautiful, loving, joyful incarnation.

And then there's your mind. The body, not your mind. The mind, maybe. The heart—all held in loving awareness, only love. And then the mind, filled with stories and plans and fears and memories and judgments and hopes and creativity and imagining. And boy, do we believe those stories. But some of them are like assassins. You know that. Some of them are enlightening stories and some are darkening stories. There's every story. The mind has no pride. But depending on what we listen to and follow, everything follows from that. "Mind is the forerunner," says the Buddha, to our joy and our sorrow.

I think of the story that Sylvia Boorstein told me. She was teaching in New York and offering these same teachings of loving-kindness, and a person came up to her and said, "I have to tell you a story, Sylvia. I was mugged. I went out on a walk late at night, somewhere around the East Side. And this guy came up to me—his hair was disheveled, his face looked crazy, and he was carrying a gun. Some guy who knows what he was on, probably high on some drug. This white guy who looked half homeless and half let out of a mental hospital. He held up the gun and said, 'Give me everything.' And I said, 'Here's what I have,' and I handed him my wallet. He said, 'Give me more. Give me your watch.' I took off my watch and gave it to him. Then he brandished the gun in a crazy way and said, 'I'm going to kill you.'

"I looked at him and said, 'You don't have to kill me. You don't have to shoot me. You've got so much. You've got a wallet—there's seven hundred dollars in there, credit cards. You've got my watch. It's a beautiful watch, an Omega, wonderful watch. You got so much. You did really good. You don't have to shoot.'

"And it stopped the man in his tracks. He looked at me: 'I don't have to shoot?'

"And I went on further. I said, 'No, you did good. You have to tell your friends how good you did. Just take this. You did good.'

"And the man muttered, 'I did good. I did good.' He put the gun down, turned around, and walked away."

Now that's a hell of a story, isn't it? I'm not sure I could do that, but there's something magnificent in it. Because we have all these stories that go through our mind about how it should be and who we are and who someone else is. And when we step out of those stories and can see whoever's in front of us—to see the secret beauty of that person too—to be able, as this fellow did, to say "you did good" in the midst of it all. An extraordinary thing. And yet we can do this.

The mind has a hundred channels. It has a fear channel and a hope channel and an economic channel—you know, it's got the Wall Street Journal in there even if you're not a money person. It does worry about money. And it has a relationship channel and this and that kind of channel. And with it comes all kinds of emotions that tag along. Thich Nhat Hanh talks about the mind as being like a field of seeds—seeds of anger and fear and confusion, and seeds of love and understanding.

Which seeds will you water? Which will you believe?

The fear? The confusion? The anger? There's another possibility. The suffering is not the end of the story.

Trudy tells a story—she's writing a book of stories, having learned so many things in her life. A short story she tells is about her mom. Her mom had moved to LA and was in her mid-eighties, maybe eighty-five. Trudy was helping to take care of her mother and daughter when her daughter was about to give birth to the first grandchildren. She went to see her mom one day and her mom said, "I walked a block and a half to go to the bank, and I walked in the bank"—it's kind of like the story I just told you—"and the bank was being robbed. There were two bank robbers in there with guns and everybody was on the floor. I walked right in and the guy looked at me and said, 'Lady, get down on the floor.' And I looked back at him and said, 'You've got to be kidding.' And I turned around and walked out of the bank."

Trudy said, "Mom, you know you could have gotten shot. What made you do that?" And she looked at her daughter and said, "Honey, if I got down on that floor, I don't know if I'd ever be able to get back up again."

There's something so beautiful, both practical and wise—we can choose. Just like Ajahn Chah when we were out on our alms round crossing those little dikes in the rice paddies, and he said to one of the monks or the group of monks with him, "See that big boulder over there? Is that heavy, monks?" Of course the wise monk said, "Yes, it is, master." And he smiled and said, "Not if you don't pick it up." We actually have a choice of what we pick up in our heart and mind, what we carry with us.

And the truth is that even in the course of this hour or so that we've spent together, there have been five billion acts of kindness—someone putting a cool wet cloth on the forehead of a person who's hot, parents cooking their favorite meal for a child, someone getting a drink for someone who's thirsty, respectfully opening a door for someone or stepping out of the way. And even stronger, when the mothers came out, as they did in Portland, as they did in Argentina against the military who'd taken over and disappeared so many people, there's a kind of power in the human heart.

My friend David Bornstein and his colleague Tina Rosenberg have a column in the New York Times called Fixes that's now grown to two hundred other newspapers and journalism organizations called the Solutions Network. Every thing they publish is a beautiful solution that people have found to a human problem—how to get water to remote villages in the desert, how to help crops when there's been a flood of insects or locusts, how to teach children to read in places where there haven't been teachers. They're all stories of triumph and possibility.

This is our possibility and our triumph. Where are we going after all? Where are you going? You know where you're going? Here. Here and now. Remember Ram Dass and his best-selling book from the 1960s called Be Here Now that helped to change the consciousness of the culture. He wrote, "Early in the journey, you wonder how long the journey will take and whether you will make it in this lifetime, your spiritual journey. And later you'll see that where you're going is here. And you will arrive now and know that this is the place of liberation, the place of awakening." It's the place to learn to love, to fulfill who you really are. There's no other place but this moment, the reality of the present.

Spiritual life isn't about focusing on some other place or some goal that you're going to get, but to open. It's said that the question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity—to quiet the mind and tend the heart and open to the mystery of life that we are a part of.

We've been through troubles before. For thousands of years, for generations before this, for thousands of generations. And we know how to do this.

We know that suffering is not the end of the story. And more than that, we must ask: What do we bring to the table of this world in this human incarnation? Do we bring our fear and confusion and contraction from separateness, which just adds to the depression of it all? Or in the midst of it, can we bring an open heart and a quality of love? Can we see that suffering is the beginning of the story and not the end?

When the Dalai Lama wakes in the middle of the night, he starts his morning prayers at three-thirty or four a.m.: May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge to help all those cross the flood. May I be food for the hungry. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be a lamp in the darkness. As long as earth and sky and galaxies exist, as a bodhisattva may I be this for all beings, until we all awaken together.

And then the secret from Thomas Merton, which he told to a frustrated activist: Sometimes what you do works and sometimes it doesn't. Sometimes it brings about its opposite. This is not given to you. What's given to you is your heart's best intention. As you understand this, you get less attached to the results. And more and more you act from the truth and the value and the rightness of the work itself.

So you plant seeds, or you plant the trees—like those that brought a Nobel Prize, fifty-one million trees planted in East Africa, starting one tree at a time. What do you bring to this world table, to this human incarnation? And with what spirit can you offer it?

So you sit, you quiet the mind. You tend the body and the heart in the midst of this human life. And you become, as Mary Oliver said, a bride married to amazement—to love it all.

I have a poem as a way to end, a recent poem from the poetry journal Rattle, entitled "The Fact":

That there's a snake tunneling through the grass doesn't make the parting of the blades any less beautiful. Many things are strange. For example, people yawn when other people yawn. It's contagious. But usually blush or look away when other people cry. All the heavy metal potheads from high school became bankers or lawyers, or in some cases, well-heeled preachers. Meanwhile, David Lee Roth, formerly of Van Halen, could show up at your door to set up your dish TV and you wouldn't even recognize him, now would you? Me, I've seen barbed wire rusting in brittle morning light. I felt a horse's nose wet under my hand and heard it snort like wind lapping a flag. Honest, I've heard a stadium exhale as a ball landed in a glove. And I spent the car ride home trying to find a way to describe that sound. I felt the sorrow in the heart of beauty and beauty inside sorrow. Beauty and sorrow have rubbed together like two sticks, blazed up and burned me. Speaking of the smoke signals made by beauty and sorrow talking over each other, I've heard people laugh when other people laugh. But it would be a lie to say I've never heard anyone laugh as someone cried. I need you to think of poetry as a beautiful lie that hits a bull's eye. I've gazed into a bull's eye, seen the fierce, wounded beauty there. I need you to know that the sky's tilting from the heaviness of all these southbound birds, but will right itself before you have a chance to fact check me on this.

I just love the playfulness of it. Many things are strange. For example, people yawn when other people yawn, but usually blush or look away when other people cry. We are in such a mystery. And I was, as Mary Oliver says of herself, a bride married to amazement.

And our task? To love it all—because this is the end of the story. The end of this story is the loving heart. This is who you are and this is what matters. And maybe the question: What would love have me do today?

What would love have me do today?

CHAPTER 98

Q and A: Suffering is Not the End of the Story | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 29 min

> In this heartfelt Q&A session, Jack Kornfield engages directly with practitioners facing some of life's most persistent challenges: the spiritual loneliness of walking a contemplative path when others around us aren't connected to present-moment awareness, deep-seated feelings of unworthiness inherited from difficult family histories, maintaining hope during collective crisis, and supporting teenagers through the unprecedented difficulties of 2020.
>
> Through gentle, embodied inquiry, Kornfield guides each questioner to locate their suffering in the body, hold it with compassion rather than trying to fix it, and discover what they already know to be true beneath the painful stories. Drawing on Viktor Frankl's insights from "Man's Search for Meaning," he explores how meaning-making and hope arise not from denial but from bearing witness to our broken hearts while recognizing we are part of a much bigger story. He recommends Mindful Self-Compassion training and Byron Katie's inquiry work for those struggling with persistent negative self-beliefs.
>
> The teaching culminates in a beautiful reminder that our teenagers—carrying both tremendous vitality and genuine angst—are living through a collective initiation that will ultimately strengthen them. We don't need to fix their depression or preach solutions; we simply need to embody what we know: that no circumstance can take away the human spirit, that loving awareness is our true nature, and that suffering is never the end of the story.

And take a breath and end the storytelling and the teachings. And for those who wish, we can do a little dialogue, the Q&A.

Hi there.

Hi there. Who's this?

My name is Brett.

Hi, Brett. Where are you?

I'm in the Bay Area, so I'm experiencing the smoke, although we have a little bit of clear skies at the moment, so we'll take what we can. I had sort of a two-part question. What strategies do you like to use or suggest to step out from the suffering or pain? And second to that, while working on the here and now, how do you handle the loneliness that comes along with that practice where others around you are not connected to the here and now?

Beautiful deep questions. Let me start with loneliness, because you speak of a kind of spiritual loneliness when others around you aren't connected. What do you do with it? How do you handle it? What have you learned?

I just handle it, I guess, is the way that I do it. And I think second to that, I find that you look around you and children sort of get it—they're born with it, and adults kind of lose it. So maybe I intellectually process what's actually happening to deal with the loneliness, as opposed to trying to fight it. But I'm always looking for different perspectives.

First, I love your answer, and I can see—however old you are—your children and mine. I remember when my daughter was really little and I would take her around and introduce her. "This is an oak tree, and this is the fence, and that's the moon." We were walking one day around the block. She could speak then; she was like two, two and a half. And she said, "Daddy, the moon is following us. How can it do that?" Whoa, she's right. Wherever I went, it was following me.

So I love that you said that. You're kind of reminding everyone that we have within us that original child of the spirit, that innocence. So you look for the reminders, and then they're right there with you, and then you handle it.

I'd like to rephrase it, because loneliness is part of being human. I don't know anybody who hasn't experienced it. I'm a twin. Loneliness has been a hard thing for me. I used to say to my twin brother, "I think I was born as a twin because I didn't want to be lonely." You know, I get married and then I wouldn't feel lonely. It was a good idea, but it's not true, because it's a part of being human.

So then handling it, to me, means acknowledging it—not trying to fix it but holding it with compassion and saying, "Yes, we are born in this mystery of being separate and yet connected." It's like light: it's a wave and a particle. As a wave, it's everything. As a particle, it acts as if it's separate, but we know it's not true. And so we have to bear our loneliness.

I'd ask: where do you carry it in your body, if we were to practice together? What stories does it tell? "It should go away. If you were a better practitioner, you wouldn't feel it." You can listen to its stories. You can feel it in your heart or your gut. You can say,

"Yeah, thank you for telling me this story. I'm actually okay now. I can feel the loneliness, and I feel how many people are lonely." That's just part of being human. And I'm going to love in the midst of it anyway.

How's this working for you?

Makes sense. I agree.

So one more minute. Close your eyes for a second and feel where in your body you sense the loneliness, if it had a center. And with your eyes closed, just tell me.

Probably in the belly.

Feel that in the middle of solar plexus and belly. Feel what it's like. What's it like? A bit uncomfortable, tight, however you feel it.

And now imagine that you could hold it with compassion or loving kindness, loving awareness—not trying to fix it or make it go away. In fact, you can let it open more and just hold this part of your humanity with great kindness and tenderness. Notice what happens. What happened to it?

It certainly relaxed a little bit.

Relaxed a little. The last thing I was going to suggest is I want you to imagine your children coming and tickling you while you're feeling so lonely right now. Just picture it. And it's like they're saying, "Dad, that's not the end of the story, that loneliness. Yes, it's there, but here, I'm going to tickle my father." And so you have all this. You already know it when you spoke of it.

Thank you.

Thank you. All right. Enjoy your loneliness and your kids and the breath of fresh air that's come.

My name is Scott, and I'm in Chicago. I come from a really painful family of origin, and even as I've created a loving family of my own, I carry with me what my therapist so nicely termed actually today a "core negative belief" about myself. You've written really wonderfully and beautifully about this. How do you suggest working with these persistent feelings of unworthiness?

Hmm. So I have to ask you, what has helped you a bit, even if it's not enough?

I went through a really tough time this year. The first level was just realizing that those negative emotions weren't going to destroy me and that I could bear them and sit with them and breathe through them. And now things have turned to more personally happy times, and it's surprising that it can follow me even into joy—that leads to a feeling that it's not real or not deserved. I think I set up a lot of defenses, like I have to achieve my way out of it, care for patients, make a good dinner. And who am I without all of that too?

Already it sounds like there's been some wisdom that's come in and some love for yourself. There's more joy and less being caught or believing the negative beliefs, but they're still there and you kind of wish they'd go away, but they're part of your inheritance. Having come from a pretty terrible family myself, we get bequeathed these things from our family and they're there.

Your question has a lot of intelligence in it: how do we deal with it? You've learned so far how to be with it without letting it destroy you, how to tolerate it. Of course we could do what I just did with Brett and ask you where you feel it in your body and how you're holding it—those would be good practices.

I'm going to give you a couple other suggestions. One is that there is an eight-week online training program called Mindful Self-Compassion taught by Chris Germer from Harvard and Kristin Neff. It's really good. And I know you're busy and it sounds like you have a family, but it would be quite worthwhile.

Her workbook is right behind me. Have you done it?

I'm in the middle, yeah.

Good, so that's one thing. Because it's just common humanity. Not all of us, but of those cars going by either putting their hands up or shouting at me, a lot of them had bad families. And we can liberate ourselves from them. So mindful self-compassion. There's also the work of Byron Katie.

And she really does these beautiful practices of questioning your thoughts, because part of what you're describing is a program of thought that's inside you. I would listen to her online, have her do some of her practices. But even if you close your eyes for just a second—we won't do a whole thing—but if those negative beliefs about yourself arise, that you're not doing enough, you're not good, you're not right, I don't know what they tell you, but things like that. And you hear those thoughts.

What's one of the thoughts that comes to you with your eyes closed? A troubling one.

"The hardest one is to believe that I'm worthy of love."

Right. So the thought says you're not really worthy of love. That's the thought. Now you feel it, you sense it in your body, and it's painful. It hurts.

Now I'd like to invite you to open your eyes and to look into my eyes, even through that screen. And I just have a question to ask you, my friend. Is it true? Is it true that you're unworthy of love? Are you certain?

"Yes."

I want you to keep looking at me because that's part of what makes it hard and real. Is it true?

"No."

Are you certain it's not true? Feel that. There's a story that was programmed in there, but what you're answering me—no, it's not true. Are you certain? You're telling me you already know this. As much as you love your children and you see their beauty, something in you knows this is true. And that is what you can trust.

When you practice or meditate or do your work and those thoughts come, you can acknowledge them. "All right, this is a painful thought, a painful belief." And then you can say to yourself, "Is it true?" And remember this moment. It's so clear—you know it's not true, and you're certain of it. How does this feel?

"It feels great."

What kind of work do you do? Are you a first responder?

"I'm a neurologist."

So you have a lot on your plate to tend to all these people. I love the fact that you're doing it, that you've made a good family. You look like a really great guy. I'm going to say, you know, you're totally worthy of love. Totally.

"Thank you."

Let's try another.

"Hi, this is Eliani."

Hi, Eliani. Where are you?

"I'm in Sonoma County."

Oh, my God. How's the smoke there?

"Well, actually today was not terrific, but right now it's clear. Beautiful night."

And I have a question about hope. I recently started reading a book that I had been meaning to read forever, and I finally picked it up—it's Viktor Frankl, Man's Search for Meaning.

I had just barely started reading it, and I was struck by how Frankl described the people who survived—they were the ones who gave their suffering meaning. And from that meaning arose this sense of hope. People were living for something, whether it was returning to a family or whatever it was, but they had hope.

And I'm very aware, having just watched Barack Obama speak, that his presentation was simultaneously what Maureen Dowd characterized as an "in case of emergency break this glass" moment, and at the same time it was filled with hope. You referenced it tonight in a way that I heard as having more to do with story than with power. You referenced the hope channel. So I guess I would just love to hear how hope fits.

I have hope. I have a lot of hope.

What hope do you have?

Oh, gosh. I guess that there could be less suffering in the world. When I drive by the animals—all the cows and the horses and the goats—they're breathing what we don't have to breathe because we live in houses. And the people who've lost homes, sometimes twice over. I have hope that we can bring decency—that's a word that's used so much now—bring decency back into our government. I have a lot of hope that we as humanity will find the goodness that we are, the beauty that we are, the love that we are. You talk about the vastness, that we can wake up. We as humanity can wake up to that vastness. So I have a lot of hope about that.

Well, when I asked you, what do you have hope for, and you said, "I have hope"—I could also feel, as you spoke, almost as if there were some tears along with that hope. Both were true. I could tune into that. And I think that's part of what hope is. Hope is not a denial. What Viktor Frankl writes about is that you actually feel your broken heart, that you feel the tears and the tenderness. And you also understand that there is a bigger story than this. The bigger story is mothers who pick up cars off of children. The bigger story is mothers who marched in Argentina. The bigger story is that young people are standing up for climate change and will continue to do so, whatever anybody says. But they do it through their tears, and through your tears.

And that's really where the power lies—to not turn away. Just what you're doing: to be willing to see it, to bear witness to it with a big heart, with compassion and awareness. And then to say, "Yes, and we'll pick the car up. Yes, we will do this"—even amidst the tears. I feel both of them in you, and just offer you a kind of mirror of respect for that which you carry.

Thank you.

One or two more questions.

Hello. I'm Lisa, in Berkeley.

I have to say, in some ways I feel like just being here and hearing your last few answers, you've almost already answered the question. It really has more to do with the state that I experience myself in. My question may be an extension of Brett's about teenagers. I used to do retreat practice, and then I became a mother, and now I'm on the eighteen-year parenting retreat. I have about five more years to go on that part of it. And I just see how teenagers are really suffering right now in shelter-in-place particularly, and also with all the different facets of the pandemic—especially with the isolation and the turning towards screens and technology as a way to cope. Even those who have been lucky enough to be raised with mindfulness are not necessarily drawn to it, and are even averse to it.

I'm wondering, what's your advice for taking care of our teens in this time? And you talked about liberation. So I thought I'd add to that. What would you say for parents who are trying to liberate while sheltering a teen?

Well, for one thing, teens are carrying this amazing energy. They're just so full of energy and vitality and life and rebellion, seeing the world fresh and going, "Oh my God, look at what we're inheriting." If you're able to see through their eyes, which you probably can as a mom who's tuned in, they carry tremendous gifts. They also carry a lot of angst. And anybody who's been a teenager can remember the angst you had. I don't think our job as parents is to fix that. We want to—as a mom and dad, we want to keep them happy and well and growing. But here's the truth: these are teenagers who've gone through 2020. They haven't finished it yet, but they're going to be the generation of 2020 who lived through this pandemic. It's like people who lived in New York City during 9/11—it became part of their life, became part of their DNA.

Your teens and our teens and our children are going to be the generation that lived through this. And it's going to terrify them and they'll lose their friends. But it's also going to make them alive and strong, because they will get through it. And you don't have to do much, I assure you. They're looking and learning all the time. You have to love them. If they want to spend a lot of time on the screen, so what? You don't have to fix them. They're looking at the world, and that's how they'll find their way to come through it. You can give them suggestions, but you can also see and let them know that they're actually going through this collective human initiation, that it's their generation, and out of it they're going to learn things that no one's ever learned in quite the same way.

How does this sit when I say this to you?

Ninety percent true. And then the depression piece is the ten percent that says, "But..."

Whose depression? Yours or theirs?

Theirs. But it could be—it's hard.

Okay, so close your eyes for just a moment. And there they are. And you're being honest and you say, "When I meditate, when I get quiet, I feel how hard this is for myself. I can get depressed because we've lost this and this and this." So you name it. And you say, "And here's how I deal with it. I realize that we're part of some much bigger story, and that this is going to be a year that we'll struggle to get through and remember." What would you say to them, honestly, when you speak from your own depression? And how would they respond? You're vulnerable and they are.

I would say, "I don't want you to lose hope."

You could say that. You could also say—I'm just going to feed you a different line. I hear that and it's beautiful. It's the mother's wish for them. But you can say, "I don't lose hope. I live in this and I've seen it." This is more Viktor Frankl. "I've seen something different. You may feel hopeless, and that's part of what's there for you as a teen to live through. But it's not the end of the story." And you don't have to want anything for them. You just have to tell them what you know. What do you know that's true?

Is 2020 the end of the story? You sure? No. Is it hopeless?

There's a difference between that emotion of feeling hopeless, which you can acknowledge—you feel hopeless or you feel despair or you feel confused or all of those things. Those are emotions. They come when things are so uncertain. But then some deeper part of your heart, when I ask you, is it hopeless? You can't say it is because you know that it's not. You know that human beings are bigger than this, that life is bigger than this.

Close your eyes again and just feel the truth of this. And imagine—you don't have to be the preacher to your teenagers. They love that, you know how much. But you can be somebody who says, "This is what I carry. Sure, I've felt this stuff, and I can see it around because you pick it up." And just what you said to me—no, I know something. I know that we'll get through this. I actually know that we're going somewhere else. Really feel that. And then you love them. You say, "It's okay. You can feel everything."

You become that one on the boat that Thich Nhat Hanh talks about. You know that story—when everyone panics. Well, the teenagers on the boat are panicking. And you say, "Yeah, we've been through storms and pirates. We know how to do this. It's not the end." And it's not. They're the ones that will make the difference.

I want to pause at this point with everyone, because I feel my heart really full from all the honesty and love that came through these questions. How do we love ourselves when our family taught us not to? How do we get in touch with that which we know to be true, no matter what happens?

What Viktor Frankl found, even through the worst, is that there's something in the human spirit. He said the thing he discovered at the bottom of it all is that no matter what the circumstances are, how difficult—in the end, the gift is this: that no one can take the human spirit away from you. No one. And underneath it all, this is what our humanity asks for. This is what we carry in some really deep way.

I think teenagers are the best. And the fact that they're difficult and rebellious and stuff like that—hallelujah, baby. They're carrying something the world needs. They are. And they get depressed? Yeah, you've got reason to be depressed.

You're living through a tough one, but that's what teenagers are supposed to do. And we know you can do it. You do know it. So thank them.

And thank you all. I'm really grateful for this chance to be with you, this chance to meditate and practice together and to teach.

I just wish you all to find your ways to know that who you are is loving awareness itself—that you can rest in loving awareness, that you can be loving awareness, that this is your true nature. And as you navigate through human incarnation, this wild time especially now, may it call on you to find those deep truths that you know, which have been given voice by so many of you tonight.

So thank you. Let's just be quiet for thirty seconds.

May we all awaken together. Awaken the great heart of compassion and the wisdom of loving awareness—our true nature, our hope.

Thank you all, and good night.

CHAPTER 99

Wonder, Mystery, Awe, Gratitude

Jack Kornfield · 50 min

> In this heartfelt Thanksgiving-season talk, Jack Kornfield invites us to navigate life's paradoxes—political confusion, social challenges, family complexities, and historical injustices—through the lens of wonder, mystery, awe, and gratitude. Drawing from Mary Oliver's poetry, Native American wisdom traditions, and the Buddhist understanding of dukkha (suffering), he explores how attention itself becomes a sacred gift that transforms our experience.
> Kornfield shares powerful stories including his encounter with Iroquois medicine man Mad Bear, whose 45-minute prayer of gratitude revealed the interconnected web of existence, and his wife Trudy's profound experience of seeing the divine in hospital workers during their daughter's medical crisis. He reflects on how sitting practice reveals our identification with personality and doing, while pointing us toward the vast, indestructible awareness that is our true nature.
> The talk addresses how initiations and difficulties serve as doorways to discovering what cannot be destroyed within us. Referencing Carl Friedrich Dürckheim's teaching on finding the indestructible through exposure to annihilation, and Thomas Merton's transformative encounter with the Buddha statues at Polonnaruwa, Kornfield reminds us that we have been training for difficult times through countless generations. He concludes with the Buddha's teaching on becoming "patient as the earth, unmoved by fires of anger or fear," inviting listeners to recognize themselves as loving awareness itself—the consciousness that witnesses aging without being aged, that holds all experience with compassion and gratitude.

When I ring the bell, I realize I miss ringing that great big bell at Spirit Rock on Monday night that calls everybody together. It's one of my favorite things to hit that huge bowl bell and have it resonate for so many people. But I'm hoping the meditation had some resonance for you. In the dialogue afterward, I'll get a sense of whether this was valuable or not, whether that kind of envisioning in that form of compassion and loving kindness worked for you. I hope so, in some way.

I invite you to listen, not so much to be taught—spare you that—but at best to be reminded of something that you already know, or to reflect in some way on what matters. And to reflect on what are the teachings of wisdom or understanding that can help us, especially in this kind of wild time.

Here we are, post-election, or semi-post-election, it looks like, and I have this feeling it's like a Greek play. I can't tell whether it's a comedy or a tragedy. There's the Greek chorus singing in the wings, all of the different social media adding their voices to it. For some, it looks like it's playing out as Elizabeth Kubler-Ross described with denial, anger, and bargaining—all of that going on, wherever you are. It's a really confusing time.

And then here we are, Thanksgiving week, the big harvest festival. We're about to go into the so-called holiday, holy day season and the winter solstice. But it's all confusing. And it's all made of these paradoxes that aren't easily solved.

Here we are in our politics these days. Are we supposed to be taking care of ourselves? Should we leave the international world? Should we interact with it more fully and take care of it? Here we are, social beings. But if you are among the 50 million people who watched that movie, The Social Dilemma, which talked about the problems with technology, we have the blessings of Zoom and all the great things from technology—and all the problems that it creates for teenage girls looking at their bodies through the magnifying toxic influence of social media, or the misuse of it politically.

And then we have our families, which are a source of both joy and blessing and trouble. Since Jesus and Buddha had trouble with their families, you know it's just part of being human. And that's how it is. Love and difficulty.

Maybe you're creative and you're an artist. But is it a society that even supports artists? What's your role? The individual, the collective. We're supposed to be in the land of the free. But what does that mean? What is freedom?

Nelson Mandela, when he got out of 27 years in Robben Island prison and stood up in front of the new nation, the re-made nation of South Africa with such magnanimity and graciousness and wisdom—he spoke of freedom. He said, "You are not yet free," when he looked at everyone there. He said, "You merely have the freedom to be free." Kind of an amazing statement. You are not yet free. You merely have the freedom to be free, to take that freedom and do what you will with it.

Here we are in a time that's crying for racial and social justice. You see those statues of the goddess Justice holding the scales with a blindfold on, to be blind. But now there's another meaning for that blindness of justice—to not see, and have been blind for years, decades, maybe centuries to the injustice built into the very system that she serves.

What do we do with all this? How do we navigate the blessings, the paradoxes, the difficulties of it?

When I was in elementary school, 65 or 70 years ago, they taught us about Thanksgiving and we made those turkeys that you cut out like your hand. They gave us the childhood story of how the good pilgrims and the good Indians came together and ate turkey—that mythological story for our harvest festival. And yet we know, honestly, when we look at the genocide of the Native Americans, of the First Nations, that was really woven into that story. What happened to them at the hands of those who came from Europe to conquer, and in most cases to kill. And yet what we've lost—their wisdom of the land and the environment and the animals and the plants and the wisdom of community that the Iroquois nation bequeathed to the framers of the Constitution.

So how do we navigate all of this?

The gratitude of Thanksgiving. I'm just thankful that it's a holiday where we don't give presents. We don't have to go shopping for Thanksgiving. And yet the tragedy that's woven into it.

I would suggest some words for us: wonder, mystery, awe, gratitude.

Let me read you a poem from Mary Oliver, one of our great dharma poet laureates.

This morning, two mockingbirds in the green field were spinning and tossing the white ribbons of their songs into the air, and I had nothing better to do than listen. I mean this seriously.

In Greece, a long time ago, an old couple opened their door to two strangers who were, it soon appeared, not men at all, but gods. It's my favorite story—how the old couple had almost nothing to give but their willingness to be attentive. And for this alone the gods loved them and blessed them.

When they rose out of their mortal bodies like a million particles of water from a fountain, the light swept into all the corners of the cottage, and the old couple, shaken with understanding, bowed down. But still they asked for nothing but the difficult life which they had already. And the gods smiled as they vanished, clapping their great wings.

Whatever it was I was supposed to be this morning, whatever it was I said I would be doing, I was standing at the edge of the field. I was hurrying through my own soul, opening the doors. I was leaning out. I was listening.

She writes about that story, I think it's from Ovid, of Baucis and Philemon, the two in that cottage, and how they were blessed in a different way by the gods. But they were blessed because they gave this extraordinary gift. The gods apparently had gone to many other houses—you know how these myths work—in the form of asking for food, asking for something, to be taken care of, and they were turned away. Then finally at this door, this old couple welcomed them. They became, like Rumi wrote in that poem you all know so well, they became the guest house to welcome each visitor. And they offered what Mary Oliver describes as the great gift, which is the gift of attention.

When somebody asks for a little attention, it's actually not a small thing. It's what makes the gods smile. When we're actually able to pay attention in that way, it lets us see something entirely different.

When my beloved Trudy was young—she told this story when we were teaching together the other day—when she was a young mother and her daughter was two and a half years old, she was living in Geneva near her parents. Her dad worked for the WHO as one of their top doctors for the health of the world. Her daughter got very sick with the most virulent form of meningitis and went into a coma, if you can imagine, and was in the hospital for almost two months.

Toward the end of that time, when it got as bad as it got, she coded. Which simply means that everybody has to rush to the side of that person because they're not sure they'll make it. Trudy described sitting there with this little body of her daughter that she'd been sitting with for weeks, living on a cot next to her in that hospital, praying, worried the way only a mother could.

She said, "I saw all these people—the nurses and the doctors and the people trying to put needles into her tiny little veins. And then all of a sudden, the room filled with light, like that cottage." She said, "And I, who never really thought about God or what God was—I saw God. And it was those nurses. Those doctors. Those people at the bedside."

Even as we speak, there are hundreds of thousands of acts of generosity and goodness, billions of them around the world, where we are tending one another as human beings.

As a monk, every morning when we would come into the dharma hall, still in the dark before dawn, and light candles and do our morning chanting, part of the chants were a blessing chant of thanks and gratitude for the food we had, for the garments we were given to wear, for the shelter of our place, for the community around us—that we might remember every day this gratitude. And then we might set our intention and dedicate ourselves from all that's been given. Part of these chants were really a reflection to sense that we are part of a deeper order of things.

Doris was a fifty-something single mom with three teenagers and a budding career, but she was plagued with anxiety. One of her daughter's best friends had committed suicide. Another was struggling with her sexual identity. She, as a mother, was full of worry, full of fears and indecision and panic. She said, "When I learned about mindfulness, it touched me. It made sense, so I went on a retreat."

The silence and the peace were blissful. I think about that—leaving the three teenagers and going off on retreat. Ah, thank you. No decisions to make, only to be present and kind to myself.

What came first was a subtle change in the perception of who I am. I realized my heart had atrophied, and I'd held a lot of fear and pain inside, which prevented me from giving love to myself and others. I practiced a gentle acceptance of aspects of myself that I'd rejected and now felt grateful to know. This gentle opening over the days left me less caught in suffering. I began to trust myself, being fallible and human, and yet so much more.

Then what I call the little miracle happened. I was on a slow, mindful walk, totally quiet. And then I disappeared. There was no one—only vast silence and the wind. It became a day of joyful, amazing freedom. And now I know that I'm so much bigger than my fears. Some days I can still feel that vast expanse. And others, I'm still standing on the sidelines. But all I have to do is unfold my arms and step forward into life, and I'm free again.

In a moment, we can shift our identity and step out of what's called the body of fear. We can release what we've carried—we can be so loyal to our suffering—and become something bigger.

Many years ago, in the late seventies, I was invited to the Menninger Foundation. One portion of the Menninger Foundation was a group that was studying altered consciousness and unusual phenomena. And of course, they invited me—you know, that's how it works. It was all the meditation people and the shamans and that sort of thing. We had our conference and sharing and all the things you would expect in such a gathering.

One of the people there was a man named Mad Bear, an Iroquois medicine man. We were each invited to give teachings. I offered a talk and guided meditation. But Mad Bear said, "I can't give teachings in here. Come with me."

He led us out the door to the outdoors of Kansas—huge skies and fields of corn, vast vistas. We stood there in a rough circle in the fields nearby. And then he began to make a prayer.

My goodness, he went on for a long time, that prayer. I kept thinking, when is he going to finish? He's praying and praying. It went on and on, for perhaps forty-five minutes. But as I stayed with it and listened, I began to feel something so different. It wasn't a prayer—it was his gratitude. Gratitude for the people and the animals and the plants and the insects, for the creatures of the sky and the sea, for the air and the water, the fire and the earth, and all their joyful exertions that bless us every day. He gave gratitude to the care and labor of a thousand generations of ancestors and elders that came before us on that land and other lands across the earth. Gratitude for our safety and well-being and whatever health we have. Gratitude for our friends and family and community.

And then he became very particular, and he went down to the earth. Gratitude for Mother Earth for holding us so we don't fly off into space. Gratitude for that which lives within Mother Earth—for the web of life under the soil, the worms and the rhizomes, the wood wide web of the trees sending their sugar to their offspring and to the other trees, which we now know about. Gratitude to the birds—oh, he did the little birds first, those that would come near, and then the great birds. Gratitude for the animals of that land, for the buffalo that were still there in our imagination, even when we couldn't see them. Gratitude for the clouds and the sunlight.

By the time he was done, it was as if he'd offered this long practice of loving-kindness and mindfulness and mystery of this earth. We all went back inside slightly altered and happier than when we'd walked out, connected with one another.

The unseen world.

My dear friend Sylvia Boorstein, colleague at Spirit Rock, said that her main practice at one point had become simply saying thank you. To whatever arose, thank you. Thank you, like the poet says, thank you, dark though it is.

I sat with her when she told me that, and I challenged her. I said, "Thank you to everything?" She said, "Yes." I said, "Sylvia, how about the Holocaust?" Because she had lost family in the Holocaust. She got very quiet. She looked up and she said, "No thank you."

And there was something wise in that. It even had a thank you there.

Your gratitude grows. In Tibet, in Vajrayana practice, you pray for suffering. Grant that I may have enough suffering that my cold or defended or frightened or shamed or grieving heart can become the great heart of compassion. Gratitude for our tears, a kind of humility and grace.

I think about the movie of John Lewis, the great elder who recently passed, who worked tirelessly for racial justice. The title of the movie, he called it Good Trouble. And I think that's what the Tibetans pray for. May I be given good trouble.

And I found when I sat last week, as I do each time and get quieter, that my own personal tears became, after a while, what's called the tears of the way. Not the tears because we've had our own personal griefs and losses—which I have had, and so have you—but the tears that connect us.

And so there I was. I have a tiny little writer's cottage hidden up in the trees above Spirit Rock. Fortunately it has a heater and running water, so I can stay there. And it was wonderful to be there. And my mind started to get a little bit quiet, and I got a bit more aware. And as I would get quiet, I would also see my personality kick in.

When I was first in the Peace Corps, learning, getting prepared to work on these tropical medical teams in the Mekong River Valley, they gave all of us a Thai name as I was learning to speak Thai. And these teachers looked at me and they called me Mr. Doing, because I was always doing something.

And so there I was sitting, feeling loving kindness and vastness, and my mind would kick in. And it had ideas and plans and things that I'm going to do. I'm on these boards, you know, I'm working for immigrant rights and I'm on a board for this huge climate change thing, and I'm involved in a project that's trying to change the way technology is working in a healthy way—all these kinds of things. Mr. Doing.

And then I just had to say, oh, there he is. There's Jack. Kind of bow and say, yeah, he's done some pretty good things, but that's not who I really am. But it's nice. I get this incarnation. It's actually a pretty blessed one. I get to do some good things. But I need to hold it all.

And as I let myself quiet, then actually deeper tears came, and they weren't about me. They were for the friends whose child died of an overdose. And the people I know in communities of color that have been hit so hard by COVID.

And the tears for the loss of the rainforests.

And then one day a peacock came. I hadn't seen peacocks at Spirit Rock until this year, but I guess once we got out of the way, they decided they were going to come and visit. It came right up to my cabin and kind of pecked on the door a little bit while I was sitting. I said, thank you. Thank you for the marvelous visit.

And little by little, there was a shift—not only holding the mind, which does its thing, and the personality, the body. My body was tenser than I'd remembered or felt when I got there. But when I sat still, it reminded me, and gradually it unwound. And mostly there was just a shift, not just of a vastness, but also a shift of love. That all of it was fine. That all of it was intended—as a human being—to be part of our incarnation in some way, to be held with understanding.

Dear friends, the Buddhist texts begin, "O nobly born, you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, do not forget who you really are. Do not forget your true nature."

And so we have these practices. You have them. I have them. We share them. And they open us to our true nature. They open the heart to hold the entire world with mindful loving awareness and compassion.

And of course all these studies—the eight thousand papers and studies from the neuroscientists of the last few decades on these trainings—they explain, as my friend Dan Siegel the neuroscientist calls it, that one of the gifts is expanding the window of tolerance. Like Rumi's guest house again, learning to treat each guest honorably, to receive what life offers us with some sense of gratitude.

Here's the deal. You got a human incarnation, like me. It will include majestic suffering. "Overcome all bitterness because you were not up to the magnitude of the pain that was entrusted to you," said the Sufis. Like the mother of the world who carries a certain measure of that cosmic pain in your heart, you're called upon to meet it in compassion and not self-pity.

And it has to be this way. If there's birth, there has to be death. If there's light, there's also dark. If there's a beginning, there's an end. If there's gain, there's loss. This is called duality. This is incarnation—pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, praise and blame. It's what we are. It's what manifests out of nothing into a world of form and emptiness.

Trouble? Somebody asked Zorba. "Life is trouble," he said. This is the first noble truth of the Buddha. You can't avoid suffering. This is dukkha, this is suffering. But suffering is not the end of the story. This we know too.

The man was my age but looked many years older. He was an Army veteran. He was also homeless, cold, and hungry. I could see he had tried to wash up before coming to the social services department to ask for help. His face and hands were clean, but his clothes were filthy. Though he claimed not to have had any alcohol that day, the smell of it seeped from his pores.

I wanted to get him into rehab, and I asked if he was ready to come in off the streets.

"No, ma'am," he said. "All I'd like is a few dollars, some bus tickets. If I can get sober enough, they'll let me into the shelter across town."

That shelter had fifty beds—cots really. The homeless were admitted at night and forced out at dawn to eat breakfast at a nearby charity. Fifty beds and nearly a thousand homeless just in this part of the city.

Winters here in Northern California mean cold, rain, and mud. Even though this man and many like him slept under bridges to keep dry, the dampness penetrated everything. His clothes and the bedroll he placed on the floor smelled moldy. The pages of the book he carried were swollen.

I asked him how many times he had tried rehab. "Two or three," he said. "Long time ago." Maybe it's time to try again, I suggested. I explained I'd had a client who'd gone through the program seven times before it took. Besides, I said, we're months away from warmer weather. What else have you got going on?

I watched his face as he considered my offer. I thought I saw a flicker of hope in his eyes, followed by a shadow of doubt. He'd tried before. It had been hard—impossibly hard—so he was living on the streets. Finally, he lifted his head and looked at me. I reached for the phone. "Shall I?" I asked. He barely nodded yes.

An hour later, I handed him over to a recovering alcoholic, also a veteran, who would drive him to one of the best rehab facilities in the county. "Come visit me when you graduate," I said as they left. I barely recognized the man when he came into my office six months later—so tall and handsome, smelling like the outdoors, and holding a huge bouquet of flowers.

With your own good hearts, you are asked to learn to trust, to do what Martin Luther King Jr. said: to turn the fatigue of despair into the buoyancy of hope.

In traditional cultures, this trust is learned through initiation. It's part of every wise and traditional culture—deliberate initiations of facing danger or death in some way to find something deeper. You all know the stories of the Maasai sending a young man out with a spear to kill his first lion and come back acclaimed in the village as a man. The Mayans had these amazing initiations for men and women. The boys who were sent out—one of the tasks they had was to come back into the village and steal the grandmother's cooking pot. And the women in the village knew they would be coming back and all had sticks to beat this person. It was really a tricky thing to be able to get the pot.

I think about my dear friend who went through a whole series of very powerful initiations as a youngish man in his twenties, and then again later. I said, "Well, these initiations—they're supposed to make you a man or prepare you for something, or a woman fully. What do they really prepare you for?" He laughed and said, "When you complete an initiation, it prepares you for the next initiation." And that's how life is, you know.

One of the famous Inuit shamans sent a young woman who had many visions out to become a shaman like herself and put her out in a little igloo on an ice floe for thirty days with a bit of water and one small dried fish. She said, "I kind of died in there," as you can imagine. She had her vision. She said, "I died a little"—that was her phrase. But we all have to. We all have our initiations if we accept them.

Karlfried Dürckheim, the Zen teacher, writes: "The person who, really being on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not, as a consequence, turn to that friend who offers them refuge and comfort and encourages their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

Maybe—maybe—out of our political gridlock and suffering today, some new capacities will be born out of this dark night. Maybe we'll move from independence to interdependence, from self-centeredness to thanksgiving.

I like this poem by Heather Altfeld, although I changed it a lot. She wrote a poem about the balance between counting ballots and counting what truly matters:

The last of them there waiting to be counted. Think of them shoveled into piles like old snow. I imagine them in the late night of those rooms, lingering in the smell of yesterday's lunch, in the tepid air with the breath held back by masks. The ballots talking among themselves about the ludicrous folly of humans who should be counting the vanishing whales and tigers. Who should be counting the mountain gorillas and orangutans and the almost-lost ring-tailed lemur and the gopher tortoise. Who should be counting the children behind bars. Who should be voting for phone lines demanding a raise in the minimum age for kindness, demanding a vote on the statutory limitations on human cruelty—a referendum to redeem our cities from an endless migration of sadness and despair. Call it now, she ends. Call it for the rivers, the trees, the rocks.

Call it for the rain, who knows far better than we how to become a fierce and gentle blessing. Vote for the goodness touching us all.

Reflect for a moment as you listen. When did you find trust? What awakened it in you? That sense of the indestructible, the inviolable. You have it, you know. When did you find trust?

Dear friends, the last piece of what I'd like to say. We're all at the crossroads. All of us. And the crossroads is this moment that has infinity, the reality of the present, the eternal now. What will we do at the crossroads? Who are we? What's true is that we're never alone.

There's a story of a young, pious nun who used to go into prayer, raise her eyes, pray and pray, and then came to the Mother Superior and said, "I can't find God. I don't know where to find God." And the Mother Superior looked back at her and said, "You haven't found God, my dear, because you haven't looked down." It's like truly seeing God in the bodies of those nurses and doctors.

"Everything is waiting for you," writes David Whyte. "The great mistake is to act the drama as if you were alone. To feel abandoned is to deny the intimacy of your surroundings. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and see the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you."

When I teach and people bring up the sufferings and struggles and difficulties in their life—the shame they carry or guilt for not doing enough for the world, the addiction in their family line, the death of a child or parent, having a new baby and instead of being joyful they're overwhelmed—I'll ask them, "What have you learned about how to handle this? What have you learned from this?" And often they answer something good. Then I turn to the group and say, "What have you all learned?" And a kind of magic happens because the room becomes wise. It's not me or some teaching. It's the shared hearts of everyone together. The room becomes wise. And they remind you from their hearts that you belong, that they've been through it too. They remind you that your being is enough. That you are enough.

We've been training for this difficult time for many years, you know. There'll be more difficult times, as there have been. But we've been training to do this. And as human beings, we've been training for thousands of generations through pandemics and earthquakes and floods and difficulties and hurricanes and cyclones and loss. We've been training.

I love the story of Thomas Merton when he went on his last pilgrimage to India and Southeast Asia, to the lands of the Buddha, when he met with the Dalai Lama and various other sages. He went to Polonnaruwa, an ancient temple in Sri Lanka, where a huge cliff of marble stone had been carved into giant Buddhas with great faces—a whole cliff. He said he stood there and gazed at those faces, and to him it was the most moving work of art he'd ever seen. Because in those eyes, in those faces brought alive, he saw the eyes of infinite compassion and a wise heart that rejected nothing, that understood it all, and whose response was emptiness, vastness, and boundless compassion.

The words of the Buddha: "There are those who discover they can leave behind destructive reactions and become patient as the earth, unmoved by fires of anger or fear, unshaken as a pillar, unperturbed as a clear and quiet pool." This is who you are.

I like to say, go look in the mirror. You look in the mirror and you notice you've aged. Losing fur in some places, getting extra fur in other places, sagging and wrinkling in some ways. As my dear, beloved friend Wes—the dharma teacher and commentator on life—says, "The hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard." All these strange things of aging happen. It's just how it is. But there's a strange thing as you look in the mirror.

And that is that you don't necessarily feel much older. You know that? There's the body aging, but actually, I don't feel that. This is so common. And that's because it's only the body that's aged. In that moment of gazing in the mirror, you are becoming what Ajahn Chah called the one who knows—the witnessing, the loving awareness, the mindful loving awareness itself that steps out of identity with the body and rests in the vastness of consciousness and says, "Hmm, it's getting a bit older, that body, isn't it?" Just how it happens.

And there's an understanding in that moment. You become like the Buddha, you become the awakened one who sees with the eyes of understanding, of compassion. You become grateful as you open. Gratitude, mercy—when you look with mindful loving awareness, a mysterious love for it all arises, for the whole of human incarnation. The full catastrophe, as Zorba said. Yes, he had it all, and he danced, and he loved it.

When a baby's born, we all go, "Ooh, baby, baby," and hold it. That new baby smell and that incredible feeling of this little being that's just popped out of—good heavens—her or his mother's body and become, "Here I am, another human being on the planet." Amazing. There's so much love for babies that come in.

And when someone is ready to die and we're fortunate enough to be with them, we hold their hand as they're ready to pass as a gesture of the only thing that matters—a gesture of love. We start with love. We end with love. In fact, that's what you are. It is who you really are. You are loving awareness itself.

So take time to be quiet in this little holiday as best you can. Walk in nature. Sit. Meditate. Do your loving-kindness or your compassion or whatever practice you do. It is the sweet oil that eases the hinge to the gate into the garden inside. You can always go there, says the poet.

It is time for Thanksgiving. So reflect for a moment. Maybe let your eyes close just for a minute. I ask you: What are you most grateful for? And what gives you trust in these difficult times? Where have you learned trust? And what gift are you longing to give to the world?

Q and A: Wonder, Mystery, Awe, Gratitude | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 28 min

> In this intimate Monday Night Talk, Jack Kornfield engages in direct dialogue with students exploring some of meditation's most profound questions. The session opens with a teaching on the 'sobat'—the Sufi practice of dialogue with the heart—setting the tone for deep inquiry.
>
> A student's question about equanimity leads to a guided practice exploring how we learned to contract and defend ourselves in childhood, and how witnessing awareness can hold our reactivity with compassion. Jack emphasizes that equanimity isn't about stopping reactions but about finding the spaciousness that recognizes them without being caught. Another student shares the rawness of caregiving for an injured spouse, prompting reflection on how the heart naturally opens and closes in seasons, and how loving awareness holds both our tender connection and our need for rest.
> The talk addresses the challenging territory of forgiveness—particularly when witnessing suffering caused to others far from us. Jack suggests that compassion, rather than forgiveness, may be the more appropriate practice for systemic injustice, invoking the Dalai Lama's phrase 'my friends, the enemy' and Solzhenitsyn's teaching that the line between good and evil runs through every human heart. The session concludes with guidance on vedanā (feeling-tone) practice, encouraging a student to approach this foundational teaching with beginner's mind and appreciation for the profound mystery of human feeling itself.

Trust your good hearts, you know. It doesn't take very long, just a minute or two to get quiet and listen. And when you do, it's called a sobat. The Sufis call it a dialogue with the heart. When you ask, the heart will answer.

I think now we will shift to do a little bit of dialogue with a few people who have questions—and hopefully they also have answers. Let's find out.

Question: I was hoping you might talk about equanimity. Too often I feel like a leaf in the wind. Someone praises me, likes what I've done, and I feel buoyed and happy. Someone else argues with me or criticizes me, and my mood goes down. I think with sitting, I'm becoming more aware that this happens, but I don't feel stability. I still feel like I'm being pushed here and there. I just wondered if you had thoughts about that.

Jack Kornfield: Let's do a tiny bit of practice together, because it's such an important question, and you've articulated it so well. Already you're becoming quite mindful of it.

So if you're kind enough, let your eyes close and remember a time—let's go for blame because that's the tough one—when somebody criticized, judged, or blamed you. Let one pop up on the screen inside. You don't have to tell the content, but just remember it. Tell me when you have a scene.

Student: I do.

Jack Kornfield: Okay. And now notice: the blame arises, the judgment arises, and then you have a reaction. So notice what the reaction is without judging it.

Student: I think the reaction is being defensive, protecting myself, explaining to myself why I'm right.

Jack Kornfield: So feel that. Feel the defensiveness, the protection, and the contraction. If it had a center in your body, where would it be? Someplace most central to it.

Student: Probably my stomach.

Jack Kornfield: So feel that place in your stomach. What's it like? Tight, hot, cold, throttling?

Student: Tight, a bit uncomfortable.

Jack Kornfield: So feel its tight and uncomfortable place. You've been attacked, it feels like, and now you're tight and defending yourself and trying to make yourself right.

One more question: How long ago did you learn to tighten up and contract and defend yourself? When did you first learn it? How old were you?

Student: Oh, gosh.

Jack Kornfield: Pick a number.

Student: Elementary school.

Jack Kornfield: Yeah. Before that.

Student: Yeah, five years old, something like that.

Jack Kornfield: So see this little five-year-old Greg, and somebody's criticizing him, and he doesn't know any better. He thinks there's something wrong with him, and he has to protect himself from that. Protect. Defend.

So if you could put him in your lap now and hold him and say, you know—this is the way incarnation is.

Some people like and some people don't. They judge and they bless and they praise and they blame. And we'll get through this, okay? Let me just hold you a little bit. See how he likes that.

Yeah, I think he likes that.

And now notice that you actually have become the witness to this whole drama—to the child who's been trying to defend himself, and to the adult who remembers and feels it in his stomach. And feel that witnessing like the space in the room. You're actually the vast space of awareness, of loving awareness, mindful loving awareness, that's noticing all this.

You've done it beautifully. And the fact that you can notice it means that it's not who you are. It's part of the drama. And the point of equanimity is not to have the reactions come—they're just reactions. You can bow to them and say, "Oh, yeah, here you are, pain. Here you are, fear. Here you are, defending yourself." Then you can feel that child, though frightened about the world, with compassion. And then you can be like those images from Polonaruwa. You see it all, rejecting none of it, through the great heart of compassion.

How are you doing?

Good. Thank you.

Thank you for that. That was very helpful. I mean, it's not an easy thing to do it in front of lots of people. There was a lot of courage to do that. I appreciate it. And it's not your question—it's our question. All these people are hanging on the screen saying, "Okay, how about me too?" Because the point of equanimity is not to stop the dance, but to come to that stillness and spaciousness that says, "Oh, yeah. This is part of being human. It's okay." And not actually get caught, not believe it so much. You did it beautifully. Thank you.

"Hi, Jack. Can you hear me? It's Arisika."

Oh, hello. I love you, Arisika, my dear friend of so long.

"So I have a question. I think I got this great gift in that on November 1st, right before the election and right before my birthday, my husband fell and fractured a vertebra. Had to be taken out in a sling, down the stairs. And he's been recovering, but it's slow. There are periods when he's in pain, and so I hear this moaning and groaning, and it really takes me back to the twenty years I was a midwife. I feel so connected to all the people all over the world who are caring for loved ones. And I feel this paradoxical, immense gratitude that I can drive to—there is a pharmacy, I can drive there in five minutes, we can get all this paraphernalia, there's running water, there's a washing machine, you know..."

So all this gratitude, and at the same time just such openness of the heart. For the first couple of days, I actually occasionally had pain in the parts of my body where he was hurting. Part of the question is this issue about the differences or boundaries between loving-kindness and equanimity. I'm realizing that I haven't felt this raw and this connected to suffering. I know about the suffering—certainly there's been all the suffering around Black Lives Matter and all these murdered black people and all of that. But this... I mean, we didn't even pay much attention to the election because we were so busy just caring for one another. And so there's some question: if I don't feel this raw, if the heart isn't opening like this with something coming out—is it only when I'm so close to suffering that I can feel it? I just noticed how different it is. I'm not being very coherent, but do you have any thoughts?

First of all, I'm just really touched by what you say, because we've known each other for a long time. And I do know you've lived through a great deal—the sufferings, whether in the family or community, or being a black woman in a racist culture, all of these things, and your work as a midwife and teacher. My experience of you is that you are actually beautiful and perfect exactly as you are. I hate to say this to you.

And with that, I also know that the heart has its seasons. Just as the body breathes—you know this—and the cerebrospinal fluid pulses, and the menstrual cycles move with the moon and the tides, so too does the connecting heart, which is what you're talking about. It opens and closes. Sometimes we want it open, but you can't always live that way. And this is okay enough. We need to come back and just be peaceful for a bit. It's just too much to carry. Sometimes it feels deeply connected, and then sometimes that passes. Because everything is impermanent, that's impermanent too.

What I hear you describing—and I could bow to it—is the deep, intimate, tender connection that comes in that kind of love that you have in your marriage and with the people you care about. Sometimes it's very raw. Sometimes it's raw because it's the world and you feel it. And then sometimes you take a breath and you realize, wow, that was a time of being really raw. It's not like one of them is right and another isn't. The space of loving awareness, of mindfulness, holds all of that and says, yes, this is our human life. And I see you doing it really damn well.

How does that sound to you?

Thank you, Jack.

It's a pleasure. And is he getting better?

Yes, he's getting better. It's just slow. His body—he's eighty, so...

Yeah, you're older, it takes its time. I'm only seventy-five, but I can relate. Thank you.

The next person who appeared spoke: Hi, Jack. This is Seema.

Hi, Seema.

I am thrilled to be in your presence. I'm one of your students in the MMTCP program.

Oh, wonderful.

I have been thanking the pain that I have experienced in life. What I'm noticing is that the forgiveness I had when I was twenty-eight, when my father was shot in the middle of the street back home in Iran—I forgave the person who killed my father. And then right after that, my daughter had PTSD because of the war between Iran and Iraq. I remember that I came to you one day at Spirit Rock and I asked you, "How can I forgive Ahmadinejad?" And you told me, "Just like you and I, he had a mom who cared for him."

But as we go on, I realized that forgiving someone who has done something away from me and my family is actually harder. I find it much harder to forgive someone who is keeping children in cages or doing something to people who are not related to me. I just wanted to see if you have something that can help me.

This is not just your question—it's really a question for a lot of us. There is so much pain that we create. We could call it tragic, because we know better as human beings, and yet some of us are doing things that bring grievous pain to children, to vulnerable people. And it is heartbreaking.

So first, let me just acknowledge what you're describing: some of the great sufferings of the world that you see, and in particular, those who are causing that suffering.

I'm not even sure forgiveness is the right practice for that. Who are we to judge them or forgive them? What we see is that they're creating suffering, and it may inspire us to do what we can to prevent that from continuing—to stand up in whatever ways we can for justice, to stop it in all the ways available to us.

I think there's a place for compassion here. It's a very different channel than forgiveness.

I think about the Dalai Lama speaking of the Chinese military, who not only took over Tibet but burned the sacred monasteries and texts, killed so many monks and nuns, imprisoned them. And he calls them "my friends, the enemy." It's interesting he uses that word. He doesn't just say "my friends." He says, "my friends, the enemy—those who are trying to destroy us."

When he speaks, he speaks about seeing with the eyes of compassion. He says even they, just as we talked about, even they had moms. Even they have their reasons, even if those reasons are twisted and hateful and ignorant, based on so many falsehoods and greed and so forth. He gazes with the eyes of compassion and says, "Yes, they too suffer. They cause suffering, and they will suffer."

There's a way in which I don't want to answer your question because I don't think it's fair. It's too deep a question to just give a verbal answer to.

I think of Alexander Solzhenitsyn, who was in the gulags in Siberia, tortured at times. He said, "It would be so easy if we could blame someone over there—the evil ones—and only get them out of the world, and then everything would be fine. But the line dividing good and evil also cuts through our own hearts. And how can we get rid of a part of our heart?"

So I don't have a simple answer for you. I think forgiveness may be the wrong frame, and that actually it's just compassion for so much suffering.

Doesn't forgiveness start with compassion?

It does. And it might come to that, and it might not. But I wouldn't even aim for that. If you can live with compassion, that already is actually quite magnificent.

How does that feel to you as we talk? Does it feel like it's skipping over the problem?

You said, when does the trust start?

Well, part of the trust is also knowing what's true. You can trust someone who is doing terrible things to continue to do terrible things. It doesn't mean you trust them to be something other than that. You can trust your own perceptions: "Oh, this person is so caught in their hate that what I trust is what I see, and that's what's there."

I think you need to really trust that you see with some clarity. And then you trust: What can I do? What am I able to do in this world that reduces suffering, that protects those as best I can?

I think the same wisdom or teachings that have helped me not to be destroyed, and to be a mindfulness teacher myself in the future, is going to hold the space for me. So that's the kind of trust that I'm talking about.

And I listen to you when you talk about the way your father was shot and killed, and then your daughter too. It's so powerful to hear what you say. You have what Dürckheim talked about—going through something that was annihilating. You now have a kind of moral authority to tell the truth about compassion and pain, because you know it. And to say, "Yes, and that's not all of who we are." You know something bigger, and that's a great gift.

So I honor that. Thank you, Seema.

Thank you, Jack.

"Oh, it's Tim!" Another friend from years and years back.

"How are you?"

"I'm great. It's so great to see you and hear you. I think we met about 44 years ago back at IMS. Every time you speak, it's something new."

"Well, I'm pleased to see you."

"Likewise. So I've been kind of going back to basics a little with my practice, and I've been trying to explore the Vedana practice."

Vedana—feeling, pleasant, neutral, unpleasant, yes.

"I've checked out like six different books and different guided meditations, and I just feel like they're either all over the place or they're not quite right. I was wondering if you had any guidance, any tips on good books or guided meditation recordings, or where to go for something like that."

You're talking about feeling. And there are two dimensions to it. One is the traditional dimension: that every experience can be felt as pleasant or neutral or unpleasant, and we tend to grasp the pleasant and resist the unpleasant. Becoming mindful of that is a gateway to liberation. In some way, that's probably all you need. The rest of those books you can put on your shelf for somebody else to read, honestly.

But there's also something really mysterious about feeling. We are in this human incarnation, and part of what makes us alive is the fact that we can feel. I have friends who are working on the biggest AI project in the world for artificial intelligence computing, and their big question is: is it ever going to start to feel? Because that's what makes us human—that we feel joy and sorrow. There are the primary feelings, and then all these secondary emotions. From pleasure and pain come joy and sorrow, grief and delight, and so forth.

I think more of the practice is to appreciate feeling, not to figure it out, because it's a mystery. Nobody really knows how it is that we have feeling. It's ridiculous that life should feel in consciousness—and it does. It brings tears and it brings art. It brings communion and it brings war. It brings everything out of feelings, which is why the Buddhists say pay attention to feelings, because they can lead you different ways.

Let it be more of a mystery. Keep it really simple. Notice what feelings you follow. There's a practice in that: which feelings arise and which feelings you follow. Follow in what sense? It's not just that you avoid unpleasant and follow pleasant—there are all the secondary feelings and emotions. If you understand that, you start to become really wise about who Tim is in his life and his personality. And hopefully from it comes a greater and greater compassion and understanding. Wow, look at all this. This is what human life is like.

I'm just deeply appreciative that you're practicing with beginner's mind after 44 years. And I'll tell you a funny little story just as a way to end.

Sharon Salzberg, who we all know—the great goddess of metta, wonderful teacher and friend and colleague—when she was young in India, she was practicing as a very ardent student of Vipassana and meditation with Goenka and Munindra and Dipa Ma, her teachers. Somebody handed her the book Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind from Suzuki Roshi, which was published around that time, late 60s, early 70s. She looked at it and sort of tossed it aside and said, "I'm not a beginner. I don't need the beginning book." She told me this later. Only when she opened it did she discover what he says: the goal of meditation, the end of meditation, is always to keep your beginner's mind—in such a deep and brilliant way.

I know that when I go on retreat, sometimes I'll take it and just open it to a random page. Wherever I am, Suzuki Roshi speaks to me. It has that kind of absolute simplicity and absolute depth. So your inquiry into the mystery of feeling is totally cool. And beginner's mind is an advanced practice, so I salute you for it.

All right, everyone. Let's just take a couple of breaths, if you will. Be quiet just for half a minute. Feel whatever's touched or inspired you that you want to remember, because it's what you already know. Know that you can trust your good hearts.

There are twenty, thirty, fifty, sixty of us here together. You can also put words in the chat if you like. And there are probably thousands of people listening on Facebook as well. Say hello, or "I love you," or namaste, or whatever you wish to say. Greet each other. Bless one another. Wish everyone a good Thanksgiving in whatever way feels right.

Thank you. I want to look at all of you.

Be happy.

Have a glorious and wise and loving and peaceful and quiet and grateful Thanksgiving, in whatever way is possible and good for you.

CHAPTER 101

Meditation: Just Like Me Compassion Practice

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this Monday night teaching from Spirit Rock Center, Jack Kornfield offers a guided meditation practice called 'Just Like Me,' drawn from the wisdom of teachers including Joanna Macy, Mirabai Bush, and Ram Dass. Recorded during the Thanksgiving season of a particularly divisive year, this talk addresses the universal challenge of relating to people who seem different from us—whether family members with opposing views or those we find difficult to understand.
>
> The practice itself is a form of mettā (loving-kindness) and karuṇā (compassion) meditation. Practitioners are invited to visualize a difficult person and reflect on their shared humanity through a series of contemplations: 'This person was once a small child, just like me... has known physical pain, just like me... wants to be loved, just like me.' By recognizing our common experiences of joy, sorrow, confusion, and longing, the heart naturally softens toward those we might otherwise hold at a distance.
> Kornfield reminds us that when we see others with 'the eyes and heart of wisdom,' we recognize that our shared humanity runs far deeper than our differences. He encourages practitioners to approach this meditation without self-judgment—if it resonates, continue with it; if not, return to simple mindful awareness. This practice offers a skillful means for transforming our relationship with difficult people, reminding us that behind every pair of eyes is the same original spirit that dwells within ourselves.

Good evening, everyone who is here together watching, listening. It's a pleasure to welcome you to this Monday night teaching from Spirit Rock Center. If we've not met before, my name is Jack Kornfield, and this is the 36th year that I've been able to teach these Monday night classes. Mostly it was once a week for thirty-some years, and the last few years it's been once a month. I'm really grateful to be able to do it—to reflect, to come together, to share with you, and somehow to listen. Because more than anything, I see these as a reminder of what we already know in our hearts, but that gets lost in the busyness of our lives.

It is, as we all know, a really divisive time. A lot of division—political, of course, very obviously for those of you who are in the U.S., but other parts of the world as well. Socially divisive. And now, in Thanksgiving week, you're about to—if not go home to your family—maybe Zoom with your family and friends. Have your Thanksgiving extended family Zoom. And there you have to be with those weird uncles and strange cousins, the ones who believe conspiracies that you don't believe in, or who voted differently than you did and so forth.

How do you relate to people who are different? By the way, they're all different, but the ones that are wildly different and stranger—the fact is, we're all strange. And we all took this human incarnation. In truth, we have more in common than not. In huge ways—not only 99.9% of our DNA—but when we see one another with the heart of wisdom, with the eyes of wisdom, however strange the other seems, when we look in the eyes of another or we just gaze over at another in a simple way and see them with the eyes and heart of wisdom, we're reminded that it's a bigger and different game than all our ideas.

So what we do on Monday night, and we'll do in just a moment, is start with a meditation for a time, follow it by a five-minute break to stretch or relax, and then some teachings and dialogue with others.

Let's begin with this meditation.

Let yourself find a way to sit that's stable and comfortable and at ease. This guided meditation is built on some of the beautiful practices from Joanna Macy and Mirabai Bush and Ram Dass and other dear friends. It is a practice sometimes called Just Like Me.

When you're ready, feet flat on the floor or body resting on the cushion or wherever you are, let yourself settle on this earth, halfway between heaven and earth in this human form. Let your eyes close gently. Take a few deep breaths to allow yourself to exhale and release whatever you can easily. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position.

Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily. Feel your seat on the earth. How gravity pulls you—and you can let go and rest, fully supported where you sit. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the breathing of your body, how it gently and rhythmically breathes itself into breathing with the air, the trees, the wind, all the other creatures around you breathing the same breath. Let your body breathe on its own and you become the witness, the loving awareness that notices this breath. Relax with it, and from a place of presence and some invitation of stillness, we'll do a guided reflection.

Let yourself picture and imagine or envision, in the Thanksgiving and the holiday season coming up, that you will be encountering people who sometimes feel very different than you, or difficult for you, hard to understand, or sometimes just hard to be with. Let yourself select a person in that category. In the traditional teachings of loving-kindness, this person is sometimes referred to as a difficult person. Envision how you might see them—likely on Zoom this crazy year, but oftentimes in person—and imagine or sense that you can now gaze at this person with the heart of wisdom.

And as you picture them, let yourself reflect. This person is incarnated in a body going through life, just like me. This person was once a small child, a little vulnerable child, just like me. Be aware of all the emotions and feelings that arise with each of these reflections. This person has had happy times in their life, just like me. This person is creative, just like me. This person has loved someone, just like me. This person's heart has been broken, just like me.

This person has their measure of sorrows and sadness, just like me. This person has been hurt and disappointed, just like me. This person has been confused by life, just like me. This person has known physical pain, just like me. This person will be young and old, friend and enemy, just like me. This person has regrets, just like me. This person wants to be loved, just like me.

Look at their image. See that behind their eyes is the original spirit born into each one of us. Picture this person's happiest moments as a child—laughing, playing, joyful times. The child of the spirit is still in them, just like me.

As you gaze at them in your mind's eye with the heart of wisdom: I know you want to be happy, just like me. I wish you strength and support and healing in your life so that you can offer your gifts to yourself and the world, just like me. I wish for you blessings and courage, honesty and care, love and compassion, for you are a human being, just like me.

As you reflect, as you see with the heart, notice how this practice has changed the way you hold this person and the way you hold yourself. This practice is a form of loving-kindness and compassion.

Now let yourself continue in the stillness and picture yet another one or two or three people. Each one that you envision and hold in your mind's eye and in your heart, in your own way, gaze at them and reflect just as we have. This person is—and you can fill in the blank—just like me. If you are still continuing with this practice of compassion and loving-kindness, stay with it. And if you feel like you've had enough of this particular active practice and you want to just rest and be, let it go and rest in the reality of the present.

Become loving awareness that notices the breath breathing itself, that notices the rise and fall of feelings and thoughts and sounds like waves of the ocean coming and going around the breath. Rest in the present. You are loving awareness.

For those who found this meditation to be of value for yourself, or perhaps for something that you might do with others, there is a version of it printed in my book, No Time Like the Present. You can find it there toward the end of the book.

What I always say at the end of a meditation, especially if it's guided and introduced in this way as a new practice: please don't use it to judge yourself. It may have been useful and mind and heart opening—lovely. Do it some more. Practice with it. It also may have felt mechanical or artificial, or even brought up its opposite. Hold that too with the same mindful loving awareness and simply recognize that it wasn't necessarily the right practice for you on this evening at this time. Know that there are dozens of other fine practices that we do together and alone. If this is of use, take its benefit, and if not, let it go and come back to the mindful, loving awareness that is the essence of our practice. Keep it simple.

CHAPTER 102

Rekindle and Renew | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 40 min

> In this winter solstice teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together the rhythms of celestial events—the new moon, solar eclipse, and meteor showers—with an ancient Chinese story about Seijo, a woman split from herself who eventually returns home. The story, traditionally explored in Zen's Mumonkan as a kōan about one's true self, becomes a lens for examining our modern exile from body, heart, mind, and the living earth.
> Kornfield reflects on how contemporary culture separates us from embodied presence, from one another across political and social divides, and from the natural world. He offers the practice of mindful loving awareness as a path of return—not through special attainment but through tender attention to what has been exiled. Drawing from teachers including Ajahn Chah, Ajahn Buddhadasa, and Nisargadatta, he emphasizes that separation is ultimately a dream, and that consciousness itself remains whole beneath the stories, emotions, and physical sensations we experience.
>
> The talk acknowledges the genuine difficulties of the pandemic winter ahead while pointing toward trust in healing—the body's natural capacity to mend, the heart's ability to hold all emotions with compassion, and our interconnection with all beings. Through stories of unexpected human connection and the Council for All Beings practice, Kornfield invites listeners to recognize that returning from exile is limited only by the heart's willingness to listen and reconnect.

So hello again after our meditation.

Before I talk or offer any teachings tonight, I want to remind you that the teachings are really not something to believe. They're a kind of meditation or reflection. At their best, they remind you of something that you already know. At their worst, just throw them away. They're not right for you, or maybe not right at all. So you get to have a kind of discernment and really use them, if anything, just to tune to your own wisdom and your own love.

I'd like to start by lighting a candle—it's an electronic candle. Nevertheless, it's a wonderful one, like the one we found at Ram Dass's house, now from Costco, with a little flickering wick in it. Trudy picked them up and it's just great.

I want to light a candle to honor this special day because it's a time coming close to the winter solstice. Today is also a day of the new moon and a full solar eclipse if you were down in Chile and South America. It's also the time of the Geminid meteor showers. Trudy and I went out last night late, looked up in the middle of the sky and waited, and sure enough every minute or so another falling star would show itself silently. That's true for a few more nights—it's the best meteor shower of the year.

I remember when I've had the opportunity to look through a big telescope and see what seemed like points of light in the sky. There was Jupiter, and then you could see the moons going around Jupiter. There was Mercury, and you could see its pockmarked face like the face of our moon. Or Venus moving. In some way there was a magic in it because there was a sense of this slow and elegant—I think the phrase is the music of the spheres—this dance of the orbs that we are a part of. Just as you could feel the trust of your breath breathing in and out, I could somehow feel the dance of the spheres and the music as part of this whole organic tapestry of light and life that's given us our lives.

And of course, all over the Northern Hemisphere now, there are rituals like Christmas and Hanukkah lights and Kwanzaa and Persian festivals and ones in Muslim and Indian traditions and so forth for the solstice—the time for renewal, the time for celebration, a time for trusting that the light will return.

This is really important right now for us to feel, not just to see it or think of it. Vaccines are being distributed today in the US for the first time, and there's the light of the end of the pandemic, even if it's going to be a tough winter. We can see the end of it. And here in California where there's been such a long fire season, we've had beautiful rains in Northern California—the end of the fire season for now.

Like the poet Deena Metzger says: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

This turning of the seasons is the beginning of something new, the beginning of the end of the pandemic and the fire season. It's also, this very day, the Electoral College's work to appoint our next President of the United States, President Biden. In spite of some pretty nutty conspiracy things that were out there, we can take a breath and say, ah, the democratic process of the polls has come to a conclusion that was fair. Somehow we can trust maybe that in this new year, no matter how divided we are, and despite the incredible pain that still exists from racism and economic injustice and caste systems and all of those kinds of things—we're beginning to feel our hearts and collective will move toward the healing, toward the wellbeing of humans and the world around us.

So I'd like to tell a story tonight. You know, I'm a storyteller. It's just what I do. Ram Dass once told me I tell too many stories. I looked at him and said, "Ram Dass, this is the pot and the kettle, you know?"

But here's a story for you. The thing about stories is that they're not just stories. The old stories—and this is an old Chinese story—their word story also means storehouse. They carry within them, these stories that have been told for centuries, a whole storehouse of understanding and wisdom. So I'll let you sense what's in the storehouse. I'll unpack it in my way, but maybe you'll find other treasures.

Once upon a time, as the story is told, and it's told to be a true story, there was a family that lived in a village along a river in west central China. The father of this family, who was a farmer and basically a good man, married a woman from the village and they had two daughters. When the first daughter was six years old, she got ill and died, which broke the heart of her mother, who also fell ill that year and died. Now the father was left with one daughter only, and she became the light of his life. Her name was Sam, or Sanjo, and she was a lovely little child.

He did everything for her, and she liked to play. Her favorite playmate was a distant cousin who lived nearby in the village, Ochu. They played together so well. He was a handsome little boy and they just enjoyed each other. Even the father would say, watching them and seeing how they enjoyed themselves, "You'd make a good marriage when you grow up." Somehow in their little children's hearts, which are very tender and listen very carefully to what the big people say, they believed that they were engaged.

Then it came, as she grew older, time for her to get married. Her father, seeking the best hand for her, found a young man, Henryo, from a very good family and told her that this was who she would marry. She was shocked and heartbroken. And she told Ochu, "I can't marry you."

My father is marrying me off to Henryu.

And Ochu could barely stand it as well. You can imagine after all those years of their play and love. He wept, she wept, cast down and depressed.

And Ochu, unable to bear the pain, put his meager belongings into a small boat, said to his parents, "I can't stay here anymore," and set off down the river that went through the village.

Seijo was so heartbroken herself that she ran away. She ran down the path alongside the river, crying and weeping and calling out. And Ochu heard this voice, this familiar voice. "Oh, Seijo, it's you, it's you!" And he pulled over and she stepped into the boat. They hugged each other and set off down the river, running away, eloping to go to the next province far away and start a new life.

When they got there, this handsome and beautiful new couple found a small place to live. Someone took them in, they began to work and farm and help, and pretty soon they had their own children, a little boy and a little girl.

But over the years, over the first few years of these children's lives, Seijo and her husband Ochu began to feel more and more that there was something wrong, that they had hurt their parents by fleeing. And Seijo especially needed to return, she said, to ask forgiveness of her father.

So they found a boat again and put themselves in it and went back up the river, finally landing at the dock just by her old father's house. Ochu got out first and went to knock at the door. The astonished father, who looked so much older and so tired, saw him. Ochu said, "We've come back. I brought Seijo with me to see you. We want to see you. We want to ask your forgiveness."

The father's eyes grew wide and he said, "This is impossible. This is impossible. You can't bring her with you. She is here. She's been here all along. In fact, when you left, she took to her bed and has not spoken a word since then. We feed her, but she will not say a word, and she has not gotten up for five years. You can look in there and see her."

Ochu took a peek and he said, "Father, she is in the boat. You must come with me."

The father first sent his servant, who nodded yes, and invited Seijo to follow the servant back to the house. The father's eyes grew even wider as he saw his daughter now coming back toward him, older. "Who is this?" he said. "Who could you be?"

And as she walked toward the house, the Seijo that lay in the bed heard this voice and sat up and stood up. The two Seijos walked toward one another until they came together as one and laughed and cried. They brought the two children from the boat and hugged her father and said, "These are your grandchildren." And they all stood there in wonder.

That tenderness is the end of the story.

Now, of course, there are many levels to a story. This story has been told in the great Zen text, the Mumonkan. The question it often asks is: who is your true self? Sometimes it's called "Seijo Loses Her Soul." The question for us is: can we come back? Can we come back to ourselves?

For we live in a culture, if you think about it and look, that's really split. You remember that line from James Joyce where he wrote, "Mr. Duffy lived a short distance from his body." And so we have our kids sitting at desks all day long or watching a screen now, because that's all they can do in the pandemic, when half the time they should be out running and playing in the playground, in the woods, living the life of a child in some physical way.

We've split ourselves off, not only from our bodies, but from the bodies of others. You can drive through the streets of our cities and see the homeless encampments and the people in tents. Or the 800,000 or one million DACA children who were brought here as young children and are now threatened to be sent back to places they don't know, languages they don't speak.

As Ajahn Buddhadasa said of modern society, how it looked to him: "Lost in thought, separated from one another."

I know when I come back to the US after I've traveled to other countries—warm Latin countries or my favorite places in Asia or in Africa, where the men hold hands and put their arms around each other, where they're not so homophobic, where they love each other, where that's not scary to the men, to be tender and close with each other—I feel when I come back, "Oh, I'm back in the cold north." You know what I'm talking about.

And COVID, of course, has highlighted it and made it more so.

And then our crazy divided politics, where we are split and separated. There's a kind of toxic nostalgia that divides us even more—the legacy of our history of white supremacy, the imagined past of the 1950s where women knew their place. That kind of toxic nostalgia, or the 1850s where people of color knew their place. We're still fighting that civil war. In many ways, we're in exile from one another.

But there's another possibility. And in your heart, you all know this.

This is part of a little story that my daughter wrote for her nonprofit, Oasis in Berkeley, which works to get asylum for LGBT people from around the world whose lives are in danger. She said: "Our clients and staff provide me with inspiration. I'm reminded of a young law student from Saudi Arabia, Mariam, who was attending law school in the Bay Area and volunteered to help at Oasis. She was accompanying Elena, a transgender woman from El Salvador, to her asylum interview, despite Mariam's own conflicted cultural feelings around sexual orientation and gender identity—quite different from Elena's. But Mariam was professional, courteous, and respectful as she prepared the client for the hearing. She didn't engage in small talk during the BART ride on what would be one of the most difficult days in Elena's life. Mariam and Elena sat silently in a sterile waiting room. The asylum officer was running late. One hour, then two hours went by.

"Finally Elena pulled out her phone and showed Mariam a photo of her Pomeranian, Lily. Mariam's face lit up—she too had a Pomeranian, named Ali. They traded photos and stories and soon moved on to their love of jewel-studded high heels and Louis Vuitton purses. Mariam taught Elena about the abaya she was wearing.

"By the time the officer was ready, four hours later, Elena's fear had receded and Mariam was whispering reassuring cheers as they walked into the room. Standing outside the station at the end of the day, they held hands and each thanked the other. Elena had won asylum, escaping almost certain death if she returned to El Salvador, and Mariam was preparing to return to her life in Saudi Arabia. They would likely never meet again, but my heart was moved as I watched how each had a profound impact on the other's life."

Though these times can feel dark, we must remember that when we're able to sit down and talk to one another, to see the world through another's eyes and believe in our common humanity, there is hope.

Mindful loving awareness, no matter the darkness, is an invitation to trust—to know that it's never too late to start again. We don't know the full extent of our exile until we stop. Maybe when you meditate, or you pause and let yourself return back to your own body and heart because you've been too busy and too pulled upon by the culture and divided—like Seijo, you come back to yourself. And when you do, often the tears need to come.

The Buddha commended this in one of his stories, where he told his monks about a great elephant that had been captured in the forest and brought to the king to be the lead elephant in the king's army. It was the great father of the elephants in the forest. They began to train it, and it was a magnificent creature. The king would visit, but when it was time to get ready for military campaigns, the elephant would not move.

The king asked the elephant trainer, "What's happened?"

The trainer said, "I was trying to figure it out myself. I got word from those who brought elephants to the palace that this elephant's old mother has been sick. This great elephant had been bringing her food, and now it must be worried about her."

So the king went to the elephant and said, "We will bring your mother here and provide her with food every day." And they did. The majestic elephant then was happy and led the king's forces and parades.

At the end of telling the story, the Buddha said, "When you tell this story, the hearts of those who hear it are softened. Now they can hear the Dharma. Now they can hear what is true."

So when we start to pay attention and begin to listen, part of that listening may be difficult. As in this story, maybe the first part is to feel our tears, to feel the losses, to feel the exile from one another, to feel the division in the culture.

I was listening to Paul Simon sing "American Tune," which Trudy, Teja, and I would sometimes sing at the end of retreats we led at Spirit Rock. It's such a wonderful song. There's a verse I find very poignant for these times, where he sings: "I don't know a soul who's not been battered. I don't have a friend who feels at ease. I don't know a dream that's not been shattered or driven to its knees—yet it's all right." And in another line he says, "We come in the age's most uncertain hour." He's a beautiful poet. The age's most uncertain hour.

You see, our practice of presence, of mindful loving awareness, is not one of having some special attainment, some special state—those come and go. And it's not a grim duty to meditate. It's an invitation of tenderness and courage, of intimacy and wonder.

To trust that it's possible to become intimate with all things, as Zen Master Dogen says—even in exile, even in the darkest night of the year—that our attention itself is what knits us back together.

And we can start with our body, the dignity of your body. We've been so separated, many of us, from our bodies. And it's time to listen. The great playwright Molière writes, "All the ills of humankind, all the tragic misfortunes that fill the history books, all the political blunders, all the failures of the great leaders have arisen merely from a lack of skill at dancing." There's something so beautiful and deep and comedic in this, as Molière was, but also true. What does it mean to actually inhabit this wild, miraculous, amazing human body?

I watched my little grandson Desmond, who has a sandbox in the yard—a big red plastic sandbox with all his toys, and it has a big red lid. He took the lid off. He's two years old. First he was sifting the sand in his hands, and he just loved feeling the earth and the sand, and that was enough to make him happy. Then he took handfuls of the sand and put it into the lid to make a second sandbox on the grass on the ground next to it. And then he got into it and started to twirl, making a big circle, round and round. He just enjoyed being there in the center of his own body, in his own world, and he laughed. It was so beautiful to see.

One of the great meditation masters in Ajahn Chah's lineage said, "In your search for enlightenment, do not desert the body." And so we can begin to trust. As Voltaire said, the art of medicine primarily consists of amusing the patient while nature does the healing. Just as you could feel how you trust the breath to come in and out, each breath after another—even if you're sick or you go to the hospital, you have to have your bone set or you have surgery—what does the healing? The bones knit, the wound begins to heal. We keep it clean, we keep the infection away. The body knows how to heal itself. We can trust this.

Even the neuroscientists show how with meditation, the traumas and the things that have divided our nervous system, with practice, begin to knit back together again. The things that have separated—we can become more whole. We can come back to ourselves.

So close your eyes for a moment to reflect. As we did in the meditation to begin with, really be in tune with this marvelous body, to come back from any exile. What does this body want and ask? You can know. What wants to be listened to, honored, felt?

Let your eyes open again.

Just as you can trust the breath, just as you can trust the body to heal itself and to speak to you when you ask and listen, so too you can trust the heart. We get exiled from our heart as well. Ajahn Chah said, "If you haven't wept deeply, you haven't really begun to meditate." It's going to be one part of your practice—the tears, the ocean of tears. As we get quiet, there's grief and longing and rage and love and joy and fear, all these things held in the heart.

When we're exiled from the heart... Vivek Murthy, who is the Surgeon General under President Obama and now again under President Biden, said that the majority of what comes through the doors in the hospitals and clinics in the US has its origin in our emotions and our lack of awareness of them. I hope that rings true for you. You can understand it—the level of stress, the level of pain, the lack of awareness, the inability to grieve, to love, to long, to touch, to be in the heart—then manifesting in all these physical ways.

But the poet Ghalib says, "When after heavy rain the storm clouds disperse, is it not clear that they have wept themselves to the end?" And one of the most beautiful things we learn from mindful loving awareness is that we can be aware of all of our emotions—the grief and the love, the longing and the pain, the fear and the joy and the excitement. Mindful loving awareness makes the space for all of these to be held in the great heart of compassion.

Again, take a moment. Close your eyes and reflect. What emotions and feelings are in exile? What's asking to be felt? You can know. The heart will speak.

And then there's the mind—the mind of stories and thoughts and images. That thinking mind, which is a good servant but a poor master. Do we believe all those stories? I hope not.

I remember going to see Ram Dass in the last few years. I went to see him after a period that had been a really busy time, and he asked, "So how are you?" I said, "Too busy."

And he looked at me with a smile and said, "Drop the 'too.'"

It was a beautiful moment, because the "too" was saying it wasn't the way it should be—the judgment, the judging mind. Instead, I could simply say, "Oh, how am I? I'm busy," or "I'm tired."

One of the beautiful things about mindful loving awareness, about ending exile with our bodies and our hearts, is that we can see what's in our mind. "Oh, that's the judging mind. That's the body of fear mind." Thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm okay for now. It's all right. Thank you for your opinion. We don't have to believe all of those thoughts.

And we begin to trust that under all the stories and ideas and fixed opinions and views, under the shame and the longing and the hope, is a deep silence. Like this time of year in the fertile darkness, there is a vast stillness, like the music of the spheres. For what we are is not those thoughts or emotions or this body—we are consciousness itself, timeless and still, the witness to it all.

And here's where we reconnect.

The last of these reconnections, of coming back as Seijo did, is to the body of the earth that is our body. Joanna Macy, together with John Seed, used to hold what were called the Council for All Beings. In these weekend or week-long rituals, participants were invited to go and spend time in the woods, by the streams, in the mountains, and find their connection with something that needed a voice in the human world. Then they came back into council. Each one of them—sometimes because they made it a beautiful ritual—would come back in costume of some kind or create a mask. But really it was the voice of their heart. One at a time they would be invited to speak to the human family: "I speak for the salmon, and our rivers are gone—dammed or polluted." And the voice of the salmon would come through that human. "I speak for the otters. I speak for the glaciers. I speak for the condors, for the ocean."

We have this miraculous capacity to return from disconnection and exile and come back to be truly connected. We know this—it's deep in us. When the hurricane hit Houston and the whole city was flooded some years ago, people were on their roofs waiting to be rescued with their children and their dogs. The whole Cajun Navy came—people with their airboats from Louisiana and Mississippi, saying, "It's our brothers, our sisters." This is what it means to come back, as Seijo did.

"The mind creates the abyss," says Nisargadatta, "and the heart crosses it."

Or the great mystic poet Kabir says, "Are you looking for me? I'm in the next seat. My shoulder is against yours."

You see, the deep lesson from Seijo is that you've never really been separated, that the separation is only a dream. The salmon and the glaciers and the otters and all that you care about, the fields of alfalfa and the kelp in the ocean—they're all in your blood and breath. They are you too. And the separation is only a dream.

So we light our candles for love, and the gift of our meditation practice is to take time to quiet the mind and bring a sacred presence. Even if it's boring—Gandhi called it "blessed monotony"—do it anyway. Because the goal is not to be somewhere else, but to open the eyes of the eyes and the ears of the ears.

This is going to be a tough winter. More people will die. Children will be hungry. Especially vulnerable communities—people of color, communities that have already been marginalized—will be lost. Species will be lost. There will be personal and collective suffering. It's true, and your heart needs to allow this to be felt and touched.

But in this darkest time, it's also true that this is only a chapter in the vast music of the spheres, that the sun returns. And like Seijo, we humans can also return. As we get quiet and listen to the fertile darkness, this return is only limited by our own heart. Meditation is the sweet oil that eases the hinge into the garden.

When we listen and reconnect, we tend our family. Trust that when you listen, you will know how. We can listen to the unheard voices.

We can touch and mend what's been broken. And with our hearts, we can bring peace to our lives, and care and peace across the world.

The practices that we do together—loving-kindness, compassion, deep listening and attention—they bring us back from exile to mystery and presence, to awe, and most importantly, to love.

So I thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 103

Meditation: Breath Love In, Breath Love Out

Jack Kornfield · 24 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers a simple yet profound practice that weaves together mindfulness of breathing with mettā (loving-kindness). Beginning with careful attention to bodily ease and stability, he guides practitioners to settle into embodied presence, noticing how the breath breathes itself without effort. The instruction emphasizes softening—the face, jaw, shoulders, belly, and heart—creating conditions for receptive awareness.
>
> The meditation introduces a beautiful synthesis: with each inhalation, one fills the entire body and being with loving-kindness for oneself; with each exhalation, one sends love outward to the whole world. Kornfield highlights the natural trust inherent in breathing—trusting that the breath will continue, that the earth supports us, and that mindful loving awareness can hold all experience. This trust becomes a foundation for the practice.
>
> The session culminates in a practice of deep listening, inviting practitioners to inquire what the body, heart, and spirit need for the seasons ahead. This reflective dimension transforms the meditation from mere relaxation into genuine self-understanding. Kornfield reminds us of the importance of pausing amid busyness—to stop, breathe with love, and listen. The practice serves as both a calming refuge and a means of accessing inner wisdom about what we truly need.

Let us begin in the simplest way with some time for meditation.

If you would, let yourself find a way to sit or be where your body is stable, comfortable, and steady at ease. If you're in a chair, place your feet flat on the floor; if on a cushion, find a way that your body rests steadily on the earth.

For this time, meditation is an invitation to turn our attention to our own body, heart, and mind.

Let your eyes close gently. Take a couple of deeper breaths just to release whatever goes with that. Exhale to become more present. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body—your bottom, your legs, your feet—the weight of gravity, and how you can let go and be fully supported just where you are. The earth fully supports you, steady and stable. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to pay attention to this mysterious human body, this human incarnation and bodily form. Feel how it is breathing itself. You don't have to do anything. It breathes in the breath of the atmosphere and oxygen. Feel the breath wherever it's easy—the nostrils, the back of the throat, the chest or belly. If it helps, you can put your hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

With kind attention to each breath, invite a sense of ease. Breathing in and out with ease and calm. Breathing in with ease, breathing out calm and steady. The whole nervous system relaxes, stands down. Body and attention, heart and mind all come together, just feeling this breath.

Of course, there will be thoughts and emotions and sounds that arise as you sense each breath. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel how the breath breathes itself in the midst of it all.

Now add mettā, or loving-kindness, to each breath. Very simple. As the breath breathes in, fill your body with breath and kindness, loving-kindness. Let each breath in fill your whole body and being with loving-kindness for yourself. With each breath out, feel, sense, or imagine in any way you can that you're sending love out to the whole world. Breathing in love for your whole being, naturally and easily. Every breath out, sending love to the world. If the breath gets soft and quiet, let the love get soft and quiet as well.

Notice as you breathe—breathing in and out love—how there's a natural trust. A trust that after the breath breathes out, it will breathe in again, all of its own. After it breathes in, it breathes out all on its own. Trust the earth to hold you wherever you're seated. Trust the mindful, loving awareness to notice and hold it all—the breath, the love, all the waves of experience that come and go.

In the midst of it all, there is a stillness, a listening.

In this stillness, ask your body: What does my body want or need as we go through this new change of seasons? Now that you're present and quiet, let your body tell you. What do you need for the seasons ahead? What do you want?

Trust that you can know.

What does it need to be at its best? You can listen in this deep presence and stillness.

Just as you listen to the body, you can listen to your heart. As the seasons turn, as the year ahead begins—what does the heart want? What does it need to be at its best? You can know.

And in the same way, ask: What does my spirit need and want for the next season? What would serve? What would bring the best? You can know.

Take whatever gifts of understanding your body and heart and spirit offer. Let the quieting of your mind, the tending of the heart and breath, let this well-being stay with you—even after the bell invites your eyes to open.

So that was a simple practice of deep listening: quieting the mind, tending the breath, body and heart, and listening. Something we need these days. We get so busy. There's so much else going on. And just to pause, to stop, to breathe with love and listen.

CHAPTER 104

Q and A: Rekindle and Renew | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this intimate question-and-answer session from the end of 2020, Jack Kornfield guides his community through the challenges of practicing during pandemic isolation while discovering unexpected gifts. He addresses how to create meaningful intention-setting ceremonies when unable to gather physically, suggesting practitioners find their quiet place, listen deeply to what matters most, and write down their heartfelt vows—whether simple like "I vow to be kind" or more poetic expressions of purpose.
> A new meditator with ADD asks about bridging to retreat practice, and Jack offers encouragement about the surprising effectiveness of online retreats while honoring her discovery that breath meditation has been transformative for her life. Another practitioner raises the question of what beneficial changes from this difficult year might be worth preserving—the slowed pace, the deeper connections across distances, the inward reflection that isolation has fostered.
> The evening concludes with a touching story about iACT's work with Darfuri refugees, where teachers in refugee camps shared that mindfulness practice was their most valued teaching because it helped them live fully in the present rather than being trapped by traumatic pasts or uncertain futures. Jack invites the community to extend their practice of generosity and interconnection, reminding everyone that even in physical separation, we remain deeply connected and capable of meaningful action in the world.

We have time for some questions or dialogue for a little bit, and then following this, I have one more story to tell you before we end this evening.

Linda, please go ahead.

"Hi, Jack. We're coming to the end of the year, a sad year for most of us as we've grieved for people we've known who've died, people around the world who we don't specifically know who died. Each year at the end of the year, we have an intention-setting ceremony around the solstice. I was wondering this year, in light of the fact that we won't be here together physically, what would you recommend for us to do? We usually have the red strings. How can we connect our intentions for the new year? We know there's going to be huge challenges during this winter, and yet we're all looking forward to the fact that we're moving forward with President Biden. I'd like to know how we connect with each other and connect with our own intentions in light of the fact that we won't be together here at Spirit Rock. What would be your thoughts on that?"

Thank you. I love your question because in some way you're bringing in what we've done over many, many years, as you describe, on the last Monday night or the beginning of the new year where we'll tie a blessing cord and begin by meditating on what is our deepest intention and where do we find spiritual refuge or sustenance. The beautiful thing about your bringing it up and describing it is that we've done it many, many years, and now we know how to do it. Even you, in some way, were teaching people as you described it.

So now, instead of physically holding hands on the solstice or on New Year's Eve or whenever the time feels right to you, go to your sacred place, go to your quiet place, go to your meditation place. Take a cord if you like—a red cord, you might—or not, or a piece of paper. Quiet your own mind and heart. And then listen. If you were to set the best intention for the year ahead, like setting the compass of your heart—this is the direction that most matters to me, this is what I want to live—let yourself reflect in that way and then write it, that deep intention.

It might be as simple as a kind of vow: I vow to be kind, which we've talked about every year. Or it might be something more eloquent and poetic, which some people will find, like that beautiful poem from the school prayer from Diana Ackerman: "I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

Or maybe you want to walk in the woods and stand in front of a tree. I speak for the trees—the redwoods and the dogwoods and the maples and the oaks—and listen and say, what is it that I want to do to set this intention of the heart? Write it down and make a prayer.

That's the beautiful thing I've seen in our community and in people all over: that even though we're not together in a physical way, we're carrying something, as you said so clearly, and we have it. So thank you for bringing it in for all of us.

"Thank you."

"Hi, Jack. My name is Anne. I live in South Louisiana. I'm a new meditator, and I think I'm at a point in my practice where I would probably really benefit from a retreat, which is probably not going to happen anytime soon."

And I have ADD. I'm easily distracted. So I don't know if an online retreat would work for me. I'm wondering if you have any suggestions of how I can bridge to some of the gifts that come from being present at a retreat until the time when I can actually do one.

First of all, thank you, Anne, for the question. And I appreciate hearing a voice from Louisiana, even as I mentioned it, you know?

You mentioned the Cajun Navy, and it was just like, oh—

My people.

I'm not from here originally, but I've been here for almost twenty years, so I got here as quick as I could.

Your people, yes—you're some very fine people too.

Anyway, with ADD, because it's an interesting thing, it's difficult in some ways in this culture, but it also is a kind of gift because it allows you to be aware of things in a whole different way, not just that narrow kind of focus. What helps you? What serves you to quiet your nervous system and collect yourself? What have you found that's good for yourself?

As far as practice goes, I really prefer just focusing on the breath. And when I'm kind of in the zone with that, I feel like I can move to more of an open awareness kind of thing. Guided meditations aren't necessarily my jam. But I've really been diligent about it for the last year and it's really been quite life-changing. No more antidepressants. It's just been really transformative, and I really do feel like there's a lot more out there.

Fantastic, fantastic. By the way, those of you who are listening, we did not pay her for this. No, it's really beautiful to hear. And I know it because I've seen it over the years, how people think that meditation is some grim duty when in fact it's an invitation that can change your life. And I hear that from you so beautifully.

So let me talk about retreats for a moment, because your instinct to do a retreat is a wise one. What we found to our surprise is that online retreats kind of work. We were thinking, oh God, you know, the experience of being together in a collective place out in the country, such as Spirit Rock, is so powerful. But now we've done six or eight months of online retreats. And believe it or not, the experience that people report—and it's somewhat fewer hours, you can modulate it so it works for you—there is a kind of collective coming together of having that time that works even online.

And I suspect even for you, since your practice of breath works, even with the ADD you described, it could be quite effective. What I'd suggest is that you start simply—try a three-day retreat, for example, if your schedule allows, if not even a day-long. You can look online at Spirit Rock or other places like that. Insight LA has some online retreats that are very good. And there's an organization called Buddhist Geeks that offers a series of online retreats that are actually also quite good with some Spirit Rock teachers.

Look online and do it as an experiment. You experimented, you were brave enough—and I think wise enough, in some way intuitively—to find a meditation with the breath that worked for you. And clearly it has. I think you could trust yourself to try an online retreat, and it will surprise you. And if it does, let me know. Send me a message.

I surely will. Thank you.

Thank you. It's a pleasure.

that seismographs placed around the world to measure earthquakes have been detecting something remarkable: the vibrations caused by human activity on the earth have gone down. The earth is calming as we slow down. And this started me thinking about other good things that have happened this year. Friends I used to see occasionally—now we have Zoom chats once a month. We've had holiday gatherings that brought together people from around the country rather than just those who live nearby. So I wanted to ask your thoughts about the changes from this last year that you hope might continue, the good things that might come out of this time.

It's a moving and beautiful question. And in it, you've already started to provide the answer. Were we together in a room when you raised this question, you might describe how you're closer to certain friends around the world, how you connect in ways you weren't able to before. You get to live a life that's more measured, and the earth isn't shaking from so many cars and airplanes and people running around. That's the beneficial side of what's happened to us.

I saw it in my granddaughter's graduation. It was really sad—they didn't have a prom this past spring, didn't have the usual celebrations. Instead, all the students in her grade, some forty of them at this small school, each made a little video. Each one spoke. And it was so much more intimate than watching someone walk across a stage to receive a diploma. You saw each of these girls' faces, heard them say: This is my message. This is what I learned. This is what I care about in the world. It was surprisingly beautiful and intimate.

So I guess I have to ask you, since I don't have a room full of people: If you were to make a wish or a hope or a prayer for what we would keep from this time, what would it be?

"My wish would be that we keep this sense of things slowing down, of looking inward more—so that when we can again interact with each other, we carry that with us. That's what I would hope."

What a beautiful blessing to end the questions on, to carry that hope forward. The story tonight of Seijo coming back, reuniting in some deep way—what you've described from the pandemic has allowed us to reconnect in stillness, in simplicity. There's a beauty to it, something truly nourishing that you don't want us to lose, that we don't want to lose, that our practice supports us in holding.

I think of the words of the poet Derek Walcott, who tells us to fall in love with the world in spite of history—to step out of history and ideas and time, and actually come back to this world as it is, this marvelous world. So thank you to all who asked questions.

I have one more story to tell as a way to end our evening.

For almost twenty years at Spirit Rock, on my last teaching night before the holidays—Christmas, New Year, Hanukkah, whatever it might be—we would collect money in a basket for the soup kitchen in San Rafael, the nearest town to Spirit Rock. The B Street Soup Kitchen had been open for decades, and usually we'd fill a basket mostly with ones and fives, maybe fifteen hundred dollars in small bills. I would put them in a bag and go down to the soup kitchen, where I'd occasionally volunteered anyway, and bring this big bag of dollar bills. Sometimes a staff member from Spirit Rock would come with me. It was such a treat because of the outpouring of hearts from the three hundred people that night, all putting money in the basket.

Tonight, I was thinking about carrying on that spirit. Christina, who helps organize things at Spirit Rock, said she had bought a thousand cookies for everyone, the way we've done for celebratory nights in previous years. You'll have to take those cookies out of your own pantry now—they're waiting for you after the talk. But I thought it would still be beautiful to make an offering in this same spirit of falling in love with the world, of knowing we're not disconnected.

The organization I want to tell you about is a small one called iACT—small i, capital A-C-T. It describes itself, quite accurately, as a small but mighty anti-genocide group. It was started by a group of friends in Southern California who, after what happened in Rwanda, said: We can't sit by and let such things continue.

Their first and major project for the last fifteen years has been in the Darfur refugee camps. You know how it is with crises around the world—Darfur was a big thing in the news for a while, then supplanted by the Rohingya, by Syria, and on we could go. But the people there are still there.

What iACT has done is beautiful, and the way they work is part of the story. They went in and sat down with the women in these dusty, poor camps holding hundreds of thousands of people. They asked the women, in circles: What do you want? What do you need? This is very different from the normal NGO approach, the big organizations that come in with their programs to feed people or organize things, replicating what they do from one place to the next. iACT just went and sat with them and listened.

What the women said they wanted were two things: soccer, and kindergarten for their children.

When asked why, they said: We want soccer so our children know they're part of a bigger world, that they're not left out. If you look online at iACT, you'll see they helped form the Darfuri International Soccer Team.

All these kids who were playing barefoot received balls and eventually got shoes, going on to compete in an international competition as Darfuri United. And everybody in those camps heard about it and was rooting for them to even get one goal—which they did.

But the other thing they did was to create these little "ponds," as they called them, to begin educating the little children. That education also gave free time to the parents to be able to go collect firewood or whatever they needed. But more importantly, the mothers wanted it because it showed the children that they could learn and how important that was.

Trudy, my beloved wife, went to Africa to do some teaching in those camps. She has a history in, among many things, early childhood education—she ran a model school for part of Harvard Medical School. Early education is really one of the things she understood deeply, as well as being a mindfulness teacher. So she went to help educate the teachers in each of these little ponds or schools they had built.

The beautiful thing is that not only were they making schools for these young kids, but in the schools, the children would get one meal a day, which was a huge thing because many were undernourished. And equally importantly, the teachers were educated and had jobs and meaning. Now there are many of these ponds with many teachers and hundreds and hundreds of children.

When Trudy came back, she told me she had taught them all kinds of skills for helping children with early development—playful skills, mindful skills, attention practices, all the things she knew from her work in early education. She had trained the teachers both how to do that and how to center themselves with mindfulness and compassion practices, loving-kindness.

At the end, she asked them what their favorite thing had been. Was it the mindful games for the kids? Was it the various things she taught? To her surprise, they said it was mindfulness—it was the meditation.

She asked, "Why is that?"

And they said, "Well, our past was so terrible. Our villages were burned. Many of the people we knew, even in our own families, were killed. We had to run in the night, in the dark, across the desert with wild animals. Some of us escaped with our children and our lives. So we can't go back to that past. And we've been in these camps now for many years, and we don't know how much longer we'll be here, so it doesn't help us to think about the future in that way either. But what you taught us was to live fully in the present, where we are. It helps so much to ease our hearts, to be alive where we are. So thank you for training us in mindfulness."

My invitation for you tonight: make a contribution to IACT. I'll put in the first thousand dollars myself. I think we can get five thousand dollars and create a pond—a whole school with trained teachers, supporting children, giving them meals for a year. It's a huge thing that we're able to do together.

Somehow it feels like then we embrace brothers and sisters and children, women, people in another part of the world who are really also part of our world. It ends, in some small way, our sense of exile or impotence—that feeling of "what can we do?" Because we actually are connected. We can do things. We can share our blessings.

So I hope that you can support that. And more than that—I won't speak to you until the new year has come, sometime in January—I really hope you have blessed holidays. Wait in the darkness and listen in that fertile darkness, that beautiful darkness. Know that there's a light that you can trust, just as the sun will come back. There's a possibility, if we listen, that's only limited by our own hearts.

Thank you. Thank you for your kindness, your attention, your own meditation, your care, and for whatever donations you offer. But more than that, it's just wonderful to see you all. Imagine somehow that we were in a room sharing cookies and smiles and touching one another and writing our intentions. And in a way, we are—even in this fashion.

Thank you, and good night.

CHAPTER 105

Reconciliation

Jack Kornfield · 53 min

> In this profound teaching, Jack Kornfield addresses one of humanity's most persistent challenges: how to navigate and heal conflict. Drawing from the Buddha's own experience with quarreling monks at the Gosīra Monastery, Kornfield illuminates a seven-step reconciliation process that remains remarkably relevant today: face-to-face speaking, deep listening, non-stubbornness, voluntary confession, decision by consensus, accepting the verdict, and 'covering mud with straw' through wise counsel.
> Kornfield weaves together stories from his own difficult childhood, his encounters with Thích Nhất Hạnh, and contemporary examples of truth and reconciliation processes in South Africa, Maine, and North Carolina. He explores how the Buddha intervened to prevent war between the Kolyas and Sākyans, and shares moving accounts of transformation—from a conservative Saudi law student befriending a transgender asylum seeker, to meditation groups holding space for political differences.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for working with conflict at every level, from family disputes to national divisions. Kornfield emphasizes that conflict itself is natural and not inherently problematic; rather, what matters is our willingness to listen deeply, release our attachment to views, and recognize our shared humanity. He reminds us that within each of us lies the capacity for the brahmavihāras—loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity—the very qualities needed to transform hatred into understanding and estrangement into connection.

So tonight, following that meditation, which touches me when I do it—I can feel the distance between different groups and the wish that they be reconciled—I'd like to speak about reconciliation.

It sounds like a Senate procedure at the moment, given what's going on in Washington, D.C. But there's a deeper meaning to it. And as I often say for these evening teachings, let yourself listen in a meditative way, to reflect, to notice if there's something that touches you, that seems important or right or truthful to you, that you already know in your heart, and let that be so. And if it doesn't seem right, just let it go. You become the wise one even as you listen.

It seems important to talk about reconciliation. At least it seemed that way to me as I was getting ready for this evening, because there's a lot of conflict out there. And conflict is natural. It's not even that it's a bad thing.

I remember working one day a week in a preschool, and a lot of the work there—alongside all the wonderful creativity of children—was also reconciliation, because the kids would get in conflict. "It's my toy!" "You had it too long, now it's my turn!" "You got a bigger cookie than I did!" So it starts early. It's because we have different needs and ideas and visions.

When they would really get upset and hit each other with blocks or bite one another, you get down on your knees, as I would, and you'd look at them and say, "How are you feeling? Angry? Frustrated? What's going on for you? What hurts or what's upset you?" And then you'd say, "You can use your words. Use your words."

I think maybe we should go to the capital of the US and some of the other great political centers in the world with big signs that say "Use your words," rather than all the other ways that people are trying to solve conflict.

But conflict is there. And it's even there in spiritual communities, as you might well know, because conflict really starts in the heart with our attachments and our needs and our desires.

This is particularly a divided time where there are different beliefs and views about the pandemic, or climate change, or racial and social justice, or how we go forward—certainly in the US as a country, but also in other parts of the world. We need to pause for a moment and reflect. With all these conflicts that are here with us, that surround us really, what is it that matters?

This is from Robert Kennedy, not long before he was assassinated. He was talking in 1968 about the state of the nation, when our prosperity was measured by the number of telephones and televisions in the household, by gross national product. He said this:

"Our Gross National Product does not include the beauty of our poetry or the strength of our marriages, the intelligence of our public debate or the integrity of our public officials. It allows neither for the justice in our courts nor for the justice of our dealings with each other. The Gross National Product measures neither our wit nor our courage, neither our wisdom nor our learning, neither our compassion nor our devotion to country. It measures everything, in short, except that which makes life worthwhile."

When I hear that, I think: What is it that really does matter to us? This vision is needed more than ever in the midst of our difficulties.

Some years ago, I was on a retreat with Thich Nhat Hanh at the Green Gulch Zen Center. A small group of us who had been teachers or colleagues were with him. He was giving some teaching about smiling, as he did—that kind of half smile of the Buddha that he puts on—and talking about joy. I sat near him and listened. And as I did, I got very sad. I felt a kind of grief in my heart. I was confused because he was talking about being joyful and happy, and yet here I felt this great wave of grief.

We had lunch together, Thich Nhat Hanh and a few of us. And I asked him, in my confusion, "Thay, when you talked about joy, I felt this deep sorrow. And what I want to know is, is it mine? Or is it yours? Am I picking it up from you?"

He paused. His eyes got kind of moist, and he said, "Oh, it's mine." He said, "I've seen so much sorrow and suffering. That's why I must teach joy."

If you remember, when he first came to the US, he met Martin Luther King back in the 1960s and wrote this book, Lotus in a Sea of Fire. He was one of the young Vietnamese leaders trying to bring peace in a divided country. He started the School of Youth for Social Services—clinics, rebuilding schools and things that had been bombed.

But when I heard the story, I also heard that many of the young people who came to work with him were killed, because both sides—the North and the South—considered people who were making peace traitors. And I began to think: what would it be like to bring young people together and know that some of them were going to die? And then I see Thich Nhat Hanh walking, holding the hands of children, which he always did in his walking meditation—the innocence of a new generation, the trust. He said, no matter what has happened, we need to water seeds of peace and joy.

And this was the same for the Buddha. Many, many years before, there was a war building up between the Koliyas and the Sakyas over water in a dry season—who would get the water from the river that divided their countries, not unlike these days. The Buddha went to the kings who were about to make battle and asked them some questions. He asked, "If I have a jar of water, is it precious?" And they said, "Yes." He said, "If I have a jar of water and it becomes blood, is it precious?" And they said, "Oh, all the more so." "Then why," he said, "would you fight over a jar of water, which we can find, when blood is so precious?" And in his own way, he was able to lead them to stop their movement toward battle and war.

So where are you in conflict in your life? What conflicts do you have? How do you navigate them? This is a human dilemma—how to solve this for thousands of generations, because our brain is wired with its negativity bias to look for things that are threatening. But yet some other part of us knows that there's another way. An organization started in the 1970s called "A Better Game Than War." It honored our competition and ambition and desire to compete with one another in all kinds of ways. Let's do this differently. Let's find another way. And for all the messiness and difficulty of politics, you could say that politics is ritualized warfare—that the Democrats and Republicans and so forth, they're not getting their tanks and guns and artillery to go take over the Capitol. It's done in a ritualized way, thankfully.

So part of what's needed is a kind of reconciliation. We have at Spirit Rock the Ethics and Reconciliation Council, which says: "Conflicts will inevitably arise within the Spirit Rock community. The health of our community is not measured by the presence or absence of conflict, as much as by our willingness to find effective, responsible, and compassionate means of resolving our interpersonal tensions—to attend to and learn from conflict in our daily lives. Without this intention, we will be lost in our views."

Buddhist conflict resolution is not based on good or bad, blame or guilt, winning and losing. It is based on addressing the suffering of all concerned and seeking reconciliation over estrangement, forgiveness over resentment.

Our Ethics and Reconciliation process actually comes from a long history. Many, many years ago, when you were much younger and in an earlier incarnation—many of you were around the Buddha, very possibly; you don't know, but it's possible, everything is so mysterious—in one of those years, the Buddha spent a rains retreat, the three months during the rainy season when the monks and nuns would pause and live in one place in the forest and not wander, to do deep meditation and also not to cause harm to beings in the rainy season when it's hard to move around. He was at the Gosira Monastery in a beautiful forest near other groups of monks and nuns.

And in this monastery, there arose conflict. The Buddha was staying at the edge of the Gosira Monastery, in a forest more or less nearby but not in the middle of the community. He heard a little about the conflict between the master of decorum and discipline—the Vinaya master—and the master of recitation, who would recite the Buddha's teachings so they would never be forgotten. They each accused the other of not following the rules and not doing things right—all the kinds of accusations that we all know and make against one another at certain times when we feel entitled or right or caught up. Many took sides, and the conflict increased, although some refused to take sides. Over the weeks it grew, and the lay supporters became upset. Finally, they beseeched the monks in that monastery to call the Buddha from the forest nearby.

And so Nagita, the Buddha's attendant, who himself couldn't endure the situation, went and called the Buddha, who put on his outer robe and went to the meeting hall. They rang the bell for everyone to gather. The Buddha said, "Monks, please cease arguing. It is creating division. Return to your practice of loving-kindness. If we truly follow our practice, we will not become victims of pride and anger."

But his words fell on deaf ears. It got very quiet. And then one of the monks involved stood up and said, "Master, please don't involve yourself in this matter. Return and dwell peacefully in your meditation. This matter does not concern you."

We are adults and capable of resolving this on our own.

Dead silence followed these words. The Buddha stood up and left the hall. He went down into Kosambi for his alms food, and then he headed for the river, not telling anyone, not even Ananda, his attendant. He traveled to a far forest where he found a few monks living together in harmony like milk and water, and joined them for a time before eventually living all by himself for three months among the elephants and the other beings of the forest.

When the three monks living nearby asked why he was doing this, the Buddha remarked, "Sometimes it's more pleasant to live alone than with other people."

Now, of course, I'm sure you have all had those thoughts yourself at certain times. Sometimes it's actually best to step out. He told no one. He left.

After three months he returned, and as he came closer to the Gosira monastery, he asked, "What's happening?" He heard the story that the conflict had gotten worse, and that the lay disciples were upset with the monks and had said, "You continue to argue. You drove the Buddha away." Eventually they declared, "Unless you get over your pride and your arguments, we will no longer offer you food." So the monks quieted down and agreed to pause and meet together. Taking away the food made a difference, as you can imagine.

When the Buddha returned, he met with the wisest of those monks who were still there, who had not been involved in the conflict. They asked, "What should we do now? How do we reconcile them?" He said, "Bring the two groups close together, but still keep them separate." And then he began to outline a seven-step process of reconciliation.

The first step was called face-to-face speaking, where those who had been involved in the conflict were invited to sit surrounded by others in the community and by the elders, and to tell the truth as best as they could of what had happened. The face-to-face gathering in front of all was to avoid, said the Buddha, private conversations. Because those of you who watched The Social Dilemma and know the echo chambers of the internet and the online world understand that our private conversations and separating ourselves into groups can actually heighten and increase the hysteria and the level of fear and all of the emotions. So the first step is to come face to face. Don't talk privately outside. As the saying goes, it's hard to hate up close.

Once there was this gathering face to face, then there was the speaking of truth. The speaking of truth, said the Buddha, is so important. When he was asked at another time, "Why do you ordain both the untouchables and the high caste together? Don't you know that our tradition for a thousand years has placed people in different orders?" he replied, "That is simply tradition and it is not true. Every human being who is born has inherent dignity and value, none higher or lower." He said, "The truth is the truth, whether anyone believes it or not. Though a million people may believe the lie, it is still a lie. You must have the courage to live according to the truth." So there is the telling of truth, face to face with one another.

The second step is called deep listening—remembering with clarity what happened and then being willing to listen to the other side. This allows us to understand in a new way.

I remember when there was considerable conflict at our center on the east coast. The conflict arose between the teachers who were the most conservative and the teachers who were the most progressive—the wild-eyed radicals and the stick-in-the-mud conservative ones who wanted to keep things the way they were. There was a lot of unhappiness and words spoken behind people's backs, and fear and conflict about who we should follow.

We had the benefit of Robert Hall, one of the Spirit Rock teachers and a psychiatrist, who came to help with our meeting. At one point he said, "Let's have the two people who most represent these poles do something that we can learn from."

He first asked the person who was the most radical—a follower of Krishnamurti at certain points, who said we don't need tradition, we don't need to follow the old ways, we need to find truth exactly where we are, throw out a lot of the old things and just keep it true and simple—he asked them to please leave the room.

The twenty of us sat there without that person present. Robert said, "How is it without this firebrand wanting to change everything and make it all new and throw away the old?" People said there was a certain sigh of relief. We weren't getting that pressure. Robert said, "Well, is there anything else? What would you miss about them?" I spoke up and said, "Well, if they weren't here, I would have to become more of a revolutionary. But because they carry that spirit, I can relax a little and I don't have to be so involved in making the changes." Then they were brought back into the room. Others spoke as I did, seeing their value.

Then the most conservative person—who was afraid that the teachings of the Buddha would be lost or changed or sullied, that the depth wouldn't be maintained if we changed things in any meaningful or different way—was asked to leave. You have to understand that each of these teachers was very attached to their view and quite judgmental of the other and of the rest of us.

Robert said, "How is it without this person?" Oh, we relaxed. He's pretty judgmental of a lot of us for not doing things the traditional way completely. If he weren't here, we'd be much more at ease.

And then Robert said, well, what would you miss from him?

And others of us spoke up as I might. Oh my gosh, he really hews to the tradition. He recites the sutras. He tells us the original teachings and stories. If he wasn't here, I would have to do more of that. But because he's in the community, I can teach the way that I choose to.

He was brought back in the room and we looked at each other and learned that between us, there was a greater wisdom and a greater whole. That in fact, the mandala of who we were together—with conservatives and liberals—carried a kind of intelligence and wisdom we needed from one another.

So remembering with clarity, speaking with truth, speaking as an act of truth, and deep listening so we hear one another in a new way. Curiosity in your family: What are you grateful for? What would you do if you had no fear? What conflicts have you solved in your life? How did you do it? How are you managing to cope with all these changes? These are the kind of questions you can ask someone, even someone you feel is very different than yourself. And they will answer in a way that lets you connect outside of that conflict, deeper than that conflict.

And the third step, face to face, deep listening, is non-stubbornness. We get so attached to our views. Here's the Buddha saying, "How could one have conflict with the wise ones who do not grasp at any views? For one is free from views. There are no ties and no suffering. But those who grasp after views and opinions, they wander about the world annoying other people."

I like to think of this as a little bit of humor from the Buddha as well. They wander about the world annoying people.

But non-stubbornness is the next step, the Buddha said. Bring these monks together, deep listening, and then let go of their views. Invite the quality of non-stubbornness for them and for you.

And then the fourth step is called voluntary confession. How painful it is to reflect: How have I contributed to this conflict? Because in some ways we may have all contributed to the conflicts we look at.

And I think of this extraordinary book entitled A Human Being Died That Night by Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela, who is a South African activist and psychologist and part of the Truth and Reconciliation process. She decided to go into the maximum security prison where they had locked up Eugene de Kock, who is known as the commander of the death squads during apartheid, who murdered and tortured many people and ordered others to do it. She said, I need to understand how someone could do this.

And she spent a year going into his cell, at first terrified, just talking and listening and recording. And on one day he came to say, when she asked where he was, "I think that I lost. It's a feeling of deep loss. Well, the first thing that goes is innocence. I mean, there's no more fairy tales and Bambi. That's gone. We killed a lot of people and they killed some of ours. We fought for nothing. We fought each other basically, eventually for nothing. We could all have been alive having a beer. The politicians—if we could put all the politicians in the front lines with their families and grandparents and grandchildren, if they're in the front lines, I don't think we will ever have war again. I think it's educated people, very educated people who sit in parliament and decide about war. So I'm confused. I'm very confused and I'm just very tired."

And she wrote about how, through a year of dialogue, she who had lost family members and seen so much suffering had come to understand him and in her own way had offered forgiveness. When she heard his voluntary confession of how he too had seen this and wished that he had not done what he did. How do I contribute?

And then the next step was decision by consensus. That is to allow the group to be quiet for a time and to reflect and to listen to one another and come to an agreement: yes, this is how we can move forward. Again, a very deep listening.

And then the next step is called accepting the verdict. And that is really the willingness to change. You know this in the work of addictions, where nobody can help someone who's addicted, an alcoholic or a drug addict. My name is Jack and I'm a Buddhist.

And to accept the verdict is really to say, "All right, I have contributed as well, and now the consensus has come that we must move forward, and I accept too."

And then finally, the last step is called covering mud with straw. There they were—the Buddha and senior monks and this whole group of community that had been in conflict. And in the middle are especially the two masters who started the conflict, having gone through face to face, telling the story, deep listening, non-stubbornness, voluntary confession of how I've contributed, decision by consensus, accepting the verdict.

And then covering mud with straw means that you sit and listen to the elders who are there, who will give some teachings as the Buddha did: Practice loving kindness to overcome anger. It has the capacity to bring happiness to others without demanding anything in return. Practice compassion to overcome cruelty. Compassion has the capacity to remove the suffering of others without expecting anything in return. Practice sympathetic joy to overcome hatred. Sympathetic joy arises when one rejoices in the happiness of others and wishes others well. Practice non-attachment to overcome prejudice. Non-attachment is the way of looking at things with open and equal mind and equanimity. This is because that is. That is because this is. Myself and others are not separate. Do not reject one thing only to chase after another.

And when he spoke about resting in loving kindness and compassion with a deep understanding, the community changed.

I remember sitting with Thich Nhat Hanh after he had his major stroke. It was the last day and we did an early morning meditation. He was here in San Francisco, brought by Mark Benioff of Salesforce with a group of monks and nuns to have medical care for six months. And though he couldn't speak—his stroke had taken away his language—he sat in his wheelchair and we all sat together.

At the end, the bell rang. He was about to board a plane later that day and return to Plum Village in France. He looked around the room at the twenty of us sitting with him, and it was as if he looked with two different eyes. One eye acknowledged each person who was there. He nodded to them without words—to myself, to others. We could feel our connection over the years in that moment, absolutely present and deep. And the other eye was looking to eternity. You could feel a vastness of his presence, a sense of timelessness, the fact that yes, he knew his body was toward the end of his life. He could see all of that with one eye, and with the other he could be totally present and loving.

This is the vision of an elder covering mud with straw—loving each person as they are, where they are, and seeing the vastness of things as well.

So you listen to this story of the Buddha and the monks in conflict. You know how guys are—it happens. Reflect for a moment: where are you in the story? If you were to find yourself in the story, are you like the Buddha in that moment where no one will listen to you? Or are you more caught like the stubborn monks? Maybe you're the disgusted lay people who don't want to pay taxes anymore and don't want to support these people in conflict and feed them. Maybe you're the one who didn't take sides. Are you one who listens deeply? Are you willing to cover mud with straw? We all have these in our lives.

I grew up in a very painful, violent family because my father was a tyrant and a wife beater and batterer, and at times brutal with his children—not always, but completely unpredictable and terrible. I tried to be the peacemaker in the family. Now you can see I do it for a living. At times it was a little bit helpful, but mostly not. I just listened, but they didn't listen to me.

Then I remember my twin brother, who was a lot bigger. I was this skinny kid and he played football. We were both fourteen—I was still pretty skinny and he had sort of bulked up—and my father was getting violent with my mother and hit her. My twin brother strode over and stood up, kind of showed his young band of muscles, and raised his hand and said, "I'm going to beat you," to my father. You could see the rage in my twin brother. And my father backed off because my brother really would have just pounced on him. After that time—standing up to the bully—my father did not lay a hand on my mother. He could still be verbally abusive, but he stopped beating her and harming her.

So it also says sometimes maybe you need to stand up to the bully. Maybe so. But more than anything, it talks about how the fact is that there is grief and pain in every one of our lives.

And that we carry a legacy—whether in our families, where we might have had a beautiful, peaceful family, or in our human family. We're all in this together.

And reconciliation is hard. It's hard in our families.

I think of the woman who came to see me, someone I work with, because she was in this terrible divorce where her ex-husband had hired the most vicious lawyer to try to keep all the money and take the children from her, making up stories of her unfaithfulness and her being crazy. I said to her, "Get yourself a really good lawyer," which she did. The father was trying to turn her children against her, as happens in these terrible divorces.

And she came in one day to see me and said, "With all these terrible things happening, I realized that in the midst of them all, I will not turn my children against their father, no matter what he does. I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children." I felt like she was one of those wise elders at the end of the reconciliation process.

A teacher in one of the online groups—we now have so many meditation groups—talked about her online Dharma group and how she imagined, because she was relatively liberal and she looked out at the demographic of who comes to meditation, that there wouldn't be Trump supporters in the group. But of course she was wrong, because the gates to the Dharma open and welcome everyone—liberals and conservatives and libertarians. They welcome all beings.

You could hear that in the story of Robert Hall and our meeting, how we actually need to listen to each other. We each carry something important.

During the first meetings of this group, the teacher unfortunately said something unsupportive of Donald Trump. And one of the group members, who was already uncertain whether he wanted to be in the group and had not showed up a couple of times, said, "Let me request that we don't discuss politics here, because I'm a supporter of Donald Trump and I need this to be a safe space."

So this woman, the teacher, and the group all immediately agreed. And by not talking politics, we kept this man safe. In the process, we've gotten to understand his suffering and see why he thinks the way he does. It's been so valuable. If we stick together, keeping on the path of awareness, we can see each other more clearly, each in our own time. Maybe we're avoiding something by not discussing thorny issues, but it feels right to do in this moment.

And so on this day in our group, we have a Trump supporter who is a war veteran, a gun owner, and a warm and wonderful and wounded person. We are continuing on as a Sangha. We've held him and each other with gentleness and acceptance, and he in turn has become closer to each of us—much more than he ever intended. He was very skeptical of us and felt very much an outsider, for good reason. But now the trust is there among us.

You can hear this and feel the value and benefit in reconciliation. We need to do this in our families, in our work with one another, and we need to do this nationally.

I've been talking to various friends—one of whom is a federal judge—about the fact that we need a truth and reconciliation process in the USA. It doesn't fix things, but it's a start. If you could go to Montgomery, Alabama, and see the National Memorial for Peace and Justice, you would see the names of thousands of victims of lynching and terror over the years—people killed by mobs.

The model of truth and reconciliation from South Africa has now been adopted in thirty-five countries. And we're starting to do it locally.

There was a process done in Greensboro, North Carolina. Reverend Nelson Johnson was a co-founder of the Greensboro Truth and Reconciliation. He said, "We were organizers then, active organizers in the textile industry and in communities throughout North Carolina. We chose to have a march through the historic Black community. Nine carloads of Klan Nazis drove into the march with a cache of weapons and fired on the group. Five people were killed; I was wounded. I knew then that this couldn't happen without police collusion. We fought it from the very beginning. Two juries did not convict the Klan or find anyone guilty of anything. So at the twentieth anniversary of this tragedy, we mulled over what to do and resolved to build a truth process over forty years of persistent work."

They got people to come in who remembered and tell the story, and the entire community heard what had really happened—all the things that had been buried. It made the community come together and say, "Yes, we lived this way, and we will not live this way in the future."

There's been a truth and reconciliation process in Maine as well. Part of this process was started by Denise Altvater, who is a Wabanaki native, an indigenous person, and the founder of the Maine State Child Truth and Reconciliation Process—because the state of Maine removed more children from native families than any other state by percentage.

A third of children were taken from their parents. She wrote, "The state came with a station wagon and took myself and my five sisters out of our home. They put all our belongings in garbage bags. My mother was away shopping. She wasn't home. And we did not see her again for four years. They forbid us to speak our language. They forbid us to talk of our tradition. So when they drove us away from the reservation, they drove me away from the only thing I'd known my whole life. And for four years, the foster parents tortured us, and the state left us there."

These are terrible stories. But without telling the truth of the native genocide, of the history of slavery, of the lynchings, of the way that we've treated one another, we can't move forward. Because we're still fighting the Civil War, as if slavery wasn't bad and it didn't happen, as if we can pass over the native genocide.

But it's not the end of the story. As the Buddha says, "Look how he beat me, abused me, threw me down, robbed me. Continue to live with such thoughts and you live in hate. Look how he beat me, abused me, threw me down, robbed me. Abandon these thoughts and live in love. In this world, hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law."

We can do something different. We can learn from one another. We may, if we are fortunate, be able to create a national process of reconciliation, to listen to one another. As Longfellow said, "If we could read the secret history of our enemy, we would see sorrow and suffering enough to disarm all hostility." If we could really listen and hear the pain and fear that's carried by each one, if we could suspend our prejudice, and in some way be willing to follow this reconciliation process, cover mud with straw, be not so stubborn.

I read, I think last time or the time before, this story from my daughter Caroline's organization, Oasis, which provides legal services and support for LGBT people from around the world whose lives are in danger. She shared this account: "One of our clients and volunteers and staff told me this story. We had a young law student who was here in Berkeley but came from Saudi Arabia. We'll call her Miriam. She volunteered to help us with asylum cases, and she volunteered to help Elena, a transgender woman from El Salvador, attend her asylum interview—despite Miriam's own conflicted views around transgender and sexual orientation and all the things she'd heard about gender identity, the kind of prejudice that she had absorbed in her community. She was professional, courteous, and respectful as she prepared the client for the hearing, but she didn't engage in small talk during the long ride over to what would be one of the most difficult days in Elena's life.

"Miriam and Elena sat silently in the sterile waiting room. The asylum officer was running late. One hour, then two hours went by. Finally, Elena pulled out her phone and showed Miriam a photo of her Pomeranian. Miriam's face lit up. She had a Pomeranian too, named Ali. They traded photos and stories, soon moving on to their love of jewel-studded high heels and Louis Vuitton purses. Miriam taught Elena about the abaya she was wearing. By the time the officer was ready, four hours later, Elena's fear had receded and Miriam was whispering reassuring cheers as they walked into the room.

"Standing outside the subway station at the end of the day, they held hands and each thanked one another. Elena won asylum, escaping almost certain death if she returned to El Salvador. And Miriam, the next year, returned to her life in Saudi Arabia. They would likely never meet again."

Our hearts cannot help but be moved as we see how each had a deep impact on the other's life. In these times of darkness, we must remember that when we're able to sit down and listen to one another, to see the world through another's eyes and believe in our common humanity, there is hope.

This isn't easy stuff. Mahatma Gandhi said, "True love is not for the faint-hearted." And the Bhagavad Gita says, "If you want to see the brave, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the heroic, look to those who can return love for hatred."

On another night, perhaps I'll talk about forgiveness and how it works. It doesn't mean you condone things that cause suffering. Your first step is to do whatever you can to prevent yourself or others from continuing to suffer. But then there's a deep process of forgiveness that's possible. And we all know this because we've all needed forgiveness as well.

Nelson Mandela said, "Do not judge me by my successes, judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up again."

"O nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Remember that you have within you the great heart of wisdom and understanding, the great heart of compassion, that this is possible for you.

And as it says in the Majjhima Nikāya, the words of the Buddha: "Others will be cruel—I will be kind. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will be greedy and hoard—I will be generous. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will speak falsehoods—I will speak truth. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will be envious—I will be appreciative. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will be fraudulent—I will be honest. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will be arrogant—I will be open-minded. Thus I will incline the heart. Others will be harsh—I will establish compassion. Thus I will incline the heart. Others may lack wisdom—I will see what is wise and live with it. Thus I will incline my heart."

You carry within you the seeds of awakening, your own Buddha nature. What seeds will you water? You carry the seeds that the world needs more than anything—your ability to stop, to pause and listen deeply. To not cling to views, but to hear the hearts of others, their pain and their conflict and their difficulty. To live with non-stubbornness. To realize that we are a family, that we're in it together: the family of humans, the family of beings on this earth.

You are of the vastness. Consciousness and loving awareness is your true nature, born into this body. It is who you really are. And even in times of conflict, which will come again and again and are natural, remember your own dignity and nobility. Remember the capacity of your heart to be brave, as the Bhagavad Gita says—to be heroic. See with the eyes of love and compassion and tenderness. Stand up to protect those who need to be protected, including yourself, but do so as Dr. Martin Luther King said: with only the weapons of love, with only the weapons of the heart itself.

You meditate. You listen. You hear these teachings. Some of them may resonate for you—I hope so. But more than anything, you carry the lamp and you carry beauty into the world.

I honor you for it.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 106

Meditation: Reconciliation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 31 min

> In this Monday Night class from Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield offers a meditation that moves from breath awareness into a profound practice of reconciliation. The session begins with establishing embodied presence through mindful, loving awareness of the breath, using the calming phrases suggested by Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh. Kornfield guides practitioners to acknowledge strong mental waves—thoughts, emotions, memories—with gentle naming and a bow of recognition before returning to the breath's anchor.
> The meditation then opens into a contemplation on reconciliation, which Kornfield describes as both prayer and heart reflection. Moving systematically through relationships—from mothers and sons, fathers and daughters, partners and lovers, to sisters and brothers—the practice extends outward to encompass employers and employees, communities, genders, races, religions, nations, and ultimately all beings of every form. This structure, which Kornfield credits to colleague Philip Moffitt, transforms personal meditation into a vision of universal healing.
> Kornfield frames reconciliation as something healthy, wise, courageous, and necessary—particularly relevant given that families, where we are most vulnerable, are often where hurt occurs most easily. The teaching suggests that finding reconciliation within family becomes the foundation for living it in the wider world. This practice offers a contemplative approach to mettā (loving-kindness) that specifically addresses estrangement and division, making it especially meaningful for our times.

Good evening and hi everybody, all you people, many beloveds behind the screens. I know you're there. Some of your faces I can see and some I know are listening, and it's an honor and a pleasure to gather as we do here for this Monday night class.

Monday night class has been ongoing now for 36 years—every week for more than three decades—and now I've been teaching more or less every month while other wonderful teachers have stepped in on the other Mondays.

If you're not part of or haven't been part of programs at Spirit Rock: Spirit Rock has been founded on this beautiful piece of land that we invite you to visit, by a whole community of people who are dedicated to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness, or inner freedom of heart, that are central to the Buddhist teachings but that are really part of all wise spiritual life.

Whatever brings you to this class, whatever your background or caste or race or creed or orientation or ability, whatever human incarnation you are in—and there are many, many kinds—they all are welcome. The Dharma gates open and welcome you with respect and love. So thank you for coming.

And thank you also to the Spirit Rock staff, to Jesse and Christina. In another week, there'll be a class or a daylong with Nikki Mirghafori on living fully and dying fearlessly. If you go on the Spirit Rock website, there's all kinds of other classes and programs that you may find serve you, especially in this pandemic time.

What we do on Monday nights is really quite simple. We meditate for a time with a little bit of guidance as we will have tonight, take a break after for five minutes or so to relax and stretch, and then there's usually a set of teachings as there will be tonight, often followed by dialogue or questions and answers.

So with all of that now, let's take some time to tune into ourselves, to our own bodies and hearts and minds.

Find yourself a way to sit that's stable and present. We'll probably sit for 25 minutes, something like that. Feet flat on the floor if you're in a chair or a cushion. Find a way that your body can rest on the earth with a sense of groundedness and stability and ease.

When you're ready, let your eyes close gently, and using a mindful loving awareness, begin to check in and notice the experience in your body and heart and mind. What's alive is always here and now.

You might start by taking two or three deep breaths, and with each one releasing what you can of obvious tension. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find the simple upright. Allow the shoulders to relax and the arms and hands to rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on the cushion, the chair—how gravity holds you onto the earth and how you can let go and be fully supported. You can relax and be held by the earth just where you are.

Let your belly be soft and your breath natural. Let your heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice how your body is breathing itself. You don't have to do anything or change it, but you'll feel how it breathes itself. Coolness in the nostrils, more swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. In the midst of all the things that you notice as you get quiet, feel how the breath breathes itself in the middle of them all.

Tonight we're starting with the mindful, loving awareness of breath as a way to center and stabilize attention—just here, with this breath, in this moment. As you breathe in and out naturally, noticed with loving awareness. If it's helpful, you can use the words that Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh suggested of "ease" or "calm," so that each breath you feel is an invitation to calm, to ease, to settle.

Of course, there will be thoughts and emotions. There'll be sounds and other experiences that come in as you pay attention to the breath. Let these other experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. And you rest in the middle—this breath, ease and calm.

Come back to the breath quite gently when you notice the attention has wandered. Like training the puppy: sit, stay. Again and again, you return to the breath kindly, just as you would be with a puppy. Sit, stay.

Little by little, let the attention settle. This breath, with ease. This breath, receive with loving awareness.

If it's hard to sense the breath when it gets soft, let your attention get soft. Or put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

As you continue to sense the breath—its rising and falling, its flowing in and out—periodically from all the background waves, something strong will arise: a memory or a plan, an emotion of longing or fear, love or worry, or perhaps a loud sound.

When a strong wave arises and pulls you away from the breath, pulls your attention, let go of the breath for a moment and acknowledge that big wave by naming it gently. Sad, sad. Or excited, excited. Or worried, worried. Planning, planning. Hearing. Almost as if you could bow to it. You acknowledge it kindly: "Oh, sadness. Planning mind. Remembering."

And once you've acknowledged it with a name, notice what happens to it. Planning mind. Sadness, sadness. Let it open a little bit. Let it show itself just a little. And then, "Thank you." You can say thank you and come back to your breath.

So now you're aware of your breath, but also when some strong interruption arises—which will happen every few breaths, or three breaths, or ten breaths—you acknowledge it with loving awareness. "Oh, this is excitement. This is sadness." Feel it, bow to it, say thank you, and then come back to the breath.

You rest in the middle. You sit like a Buddha under your own tree of enlightenment, resting with the ever-changing breath, breathing with the air of the world—gently, calmly. In a centered and steady way, you can acknowledge the waves that arise when they come, naming them gently: "Oh yes, I see you. Thank you." Let them pass. And you're steady in the midst of it all.

Now, as you sit quietly, I'd like to invite you to another dimension of meditation: a practice of reconciliation. I'll read some teachings aloud for you, and you can bring into your own mind and heart the benefits of reconciliation and healing for all those who've grown estranged and set apart.

We begin with family, because family is where we are most vulnerable and can most easily be hurt. And yet it's the place where we need to find reconciliation so we can then live it in the rest of the world. Take your time and reflect as you hear these words. Let them express the tender possibility that love between the people who are named, the beings who are named, can find reconciliation.

May all mothers and sons be reconciled.

May all mothers and daughters be reconciled.

May all fathers and sons be reconciled.

May all fathers and daughters be reconciled.

May all husbands and wives be reconciled.

May all partners and lovers be reconciled.

May all sisters and brothers be reconciled.

May all family members be reconciled.

May all employees and employers be reconciled.

May all community members be reconciled.

May all friends be reconciled.

May all women be reconciled.

May all men be reconciled.

May all men and women be reconciled.

And all of non-binary gender be reconciled.

May all races be reconciled.

May all religions be reconciled.

May all nations be reconciled.

May all people be reconciled.

May all creatures be reconciled.

And may all beings of every form be reconciled.

Feel this meditation as a prayer, as a deep heart reflection, as a possibility, a yearning, a vision. And may our lives lead to wise and healthy and beautiful reconciliation among all beings, all peoples.

May it be so.

I love this practice. This form of it I received from a colleague many of you know, Philip Moffitt. And as I recite it across all these different areas, it turns my heart and my vision toward a possibility of reconciliation that feels healthy and wise and courageous —and necessary.

Come back in five minutes to listen.

May it be so.

CHAPTER 107

Q and A: Reconciliation

Jack Kornfield · 29 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Jack Kornfield responds to three practitioners grappling with real-world conflicts and the desire to bring healing to their relationships and communities. A school wellness specialist shares her heartbreak over struggling students, a practitioner asks about facilitating reconciliation between estranged friends, and a mindfulness teacher seeks guidance on supporting couples in crisis.
>
> Through guided inquiry and somatic awareness practices, Kornfield demonstrates how to work skillfully with grief, exhaustion, and the longing to help others. He emphasizes the importance of acknowledging suffering directly, listening deeply rather than rushing to fix, and recognizing where we carry emotional weight in our bodies. Drawing on Thich Nhat Hanh's teachings on reconciliation from "Old Path White Cloud" and invoking Nelson Mandela's resilience through 27 years of imprisonment, he offers both practical frameworks and profound perspective.
> The teaching illuminates essential principles for those called to help others: the necessity of tending to one's own heart first, the distinction between loving people and trying to fix them, and the importance of acting from integrity without attachment to outcomes. Kornfield reminds listeners that while we cannot control whether others choose reconciliation, we can embody steady-heartedness and become zones of peace. The session closes with an invitation to trust the seeds of compassion we carry—our Buddha nature—as we move through a world hungry for healing.

I'm lighter than when I came tonight, so I'm looking to you for some wisdom. I work at a public high school in a wellness center, and I've been doing a great job for about eleven months, but my students are struggling and I'm becoming heartbroken for them. I'm a helper type, as I suspect everyone is on this call, and I'm running out of help to give, it feels like. I thought I would see if you had advice for me to give to them.

And are you a teacher? I didn't catch what your role was.

I'm an intake specialist in a wellness center, and I'm a mindfulness teacher. A student advocate.

Oh, yes. Doctor, take your own medicine, I see.

You know, I think the first thing is just to acknowledge that this is a lot of suffering. And if you're a young person, a year is like a huge chunk of your entire life. So my experience with young people is that they're really grieving. They've lost so much. And they need to have this acknowledged. The first thing to say is, this is suffering, and you are experiencing it. It's grief. And not to cover it over.

But then I have a question for you. What have you found that is most helpful to your students? What have you learned?

A lot of what you talked about tonight, which is listening. Listening is what they need.

So you listen to them and they can express their tears and their sorrow and their anger and their frustration. All they're experiencing—loss. And you can say, this is one of the great losses of your life. You'll look back and say you lived through this. But really, you're listening. What else helps?

Inviting them to name their experience. Even though we have lessons we have to cover, we're setting everything aside. What's inside you? What's happening?

That's really beautiful, because we have our ideas of what's needed, but right now what's needed is much more the listening of the heart—just what you said—putting some of the lessons aside, because they're not learning them anyway, you said. So this is the chance to get real, and to also teach them that it's okay to be real, that part of school is to learn to do this. So that helps them: listening, telling the truth, not being fixed on the plan. All right, so what's helped you? Now you know how to help them. Turn the spotlight back.

Well, my job's rewarding. It's very rewarding. They're grateful. They're beautiful. I'm impressed by them.

I'm proud of them. I'm trying to be as resilient as I see they are.

But you don't feel it right now.

I don't feel it.

So close your eyes for a second. There's been so much loss in this, and it's so difficult. Where do you carry the loss in your body? The tears for what you've tried to do so hard?

Right in there—upper chest, throat.

What does it feel like? Warm? Cool? What's its shape?

It feels tight.

Tightness. Is there a temperature?

Yes—hot. Hot and tight.

Hot and tight. So let it be there, and bring your loving awareness to the pain that it carries. This is really how you carry the grief in your body. And let it open. Let it actually expand and get bigger. Let it fill as much of your whole body, or the room, if it wants. You can name it—grief, tears, pain, whatever it is. Fire. And notice what happens as you give it space. Does it get bigger? Does it intensify? Expand?

It feels like it's softening.

So notice that. Notice the softening. You're allowing it, and it's softening. What does it want you to understand?

I think that I won't always be this way.

So feel that. Feel that you've paid attention and given it space. It's softened. And now it's speaking to your heart and saying, "It's not always going to be this way." And listen—how does that resonate? How does that affect your body?

It feels right. It feels centered.

Yes. So feel the centeredness and the rightness now. Oh, nobly born—this is your return to your Buddha nature. It doesn't mean you don't carry a deep grief in your body and heart for all the loss, for these young people. It doesn't mean you don't get exhausted. But there's something in you that's inexhaustible, that knows this is not the end of the story, that it does have an end. You can soften and carry.

Again, Nelson Mandela: "Don't judge me by my successes, judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up again." You're in it with Nelson now. You're in it for the long haul. And just think about it—twenty-seven years on Robben Island was half of his whole life. Like your students, it feels that way—up and down. And yes, you carry something, and you're learning to do it with them. They buoy you up and you buoy them up, and of course you go through those times. How are you feeling?

Just filled with love. Thank you.

Thank you so much. Thank you, Casey. A pleasure.

Hey, Jack. Thank you so much for tonight's teaching. Personally, it's felt quite relevant. I've really noticed an uptick in the dehumanizing language that my own friends are using in relation to people on the other side of the political aisle. And I've also personally experienced a great reconciliation with a friend who I hadn't spoken with in over a decade. So it feels timely. I have a great desire to bring some of this reconciliation practice to bear on my own life. But I also realize that could be dangerous without the right grounding. So I wondered if you thought it appropriate for me to take the framework you showed us and start applying it to maybe small, low-level conflicts in my own personal community—or if not, if there were places you would point me to where I could gain training and grounding?

First of all, it's a beautiful question. And I can hear the goodness of your own heart and psyche—to say, "I resonate with this. I know this, I've seen it. And I want to know if I can help others." So I just want to honor that goodness that comes out of you in asking the question. Can you give an example of a kind of place you would want to bring this into?

There are two places that come to mind. I have two really good friends who have gotten into such a terrible conflict that they are no longer speaking, their families are no longer speaking. They've devolved into text messages—even step one, face to face, is not part of the picture. And then I have another situation where two family members have grown estranged over divergent political views, such that I don't know if they'll ever talk to each other. It just seems to me such a loss.

I'm moved by what you say. I think I would start with the friends if you're going to do it. Because quite honestly, family is almost too hard. Even the Buddha and Jesus had trouble with their families when they went home. So you have to understand that's the steep path—maybe you should go to the summit first, then come back.

There is actually a description of this process if you would like to read it. One place you can find it is in Thich Nhat Hanh's book called Old Path White Cloud. It's a great big fat book that is a biography of the Buddha. Somewhere in the middle, in chapter forty-seven—these short chapters—is the whole description of this practice and this process. What I understand is that Thich Nhat Hanh's community—they have Deer Park in Southern California and so forth—they actually use this process. When I was in the monastery, I became part of one of these processes.

So I think first you might want to educate yourself more. Read that, and then look at Deer Park. Once you've done it, then you might ask your friends if they're interested—because if they are, it's possible. If they're not... the Buddha, when he was called in, said, "Okay, I can help you." And they said, "No, we don't want this." So he got up and he left. He was called the teacher of those who can be taught. You have to find out. They may be so caught in it for now. But you also might be able to speak to them and say, "Here's something I've learned."

I'd like to ask you to close your eyes for a moment and get quiet. As you do, first I'd like you to picture these two friends and notice what you feel inside. Keeping your eyes closed, tell me what it's like for you.

I've shared some really good memories with each of them. So I almost felt like a tickle, like I want to laugh a little bit. It feels warm when I think about that.

So there's a warmth and a tingle and almost a laugh, and a memory of all these good things that you've shared with each of them. As you feel all of this, also now bring in: what is your heart's best intention in wanting to work with them? What is your intention?

I think there are some simple truths that they each have that if they just spoke and listened to each other... my intention for them is that they could just listen to each other. I've seen this so much with my parents, how terrible it can be when there isn't just the willingness to listen.

So your intention is that they listen to each other. And what's your intention for yourself? What do you hope for, Christian?

I want to, as we say in Brooklyn, walk the walk. I want to embody what it means to be a person who can listen and who can speak truth. I want to cultivate that—not just for myself, but for my deep, close relationships.

So now imagine that you could say what you just told me to each of them separately. "This is what I want. I want to embody this. I want to carry this." Imagine that you could say that to them, no matter whether they choose to do it or not. This is your heart speaking.

"How does it feel as you picture that?"

"The word that came up was integrity. I feel sort of solid and aligned."

"So feel the quality of solid and aligned—that integrity and the deep love that is there. 'I want to live with this love. I want people to come together.' And obviously there's joy and affection and love that you have for each of them. Now imagine that you're able to say this to them, however they're going to respond. You're going to start by talking about what matters to you, not to them. Feel that integrity and the strength that you have, the love. And finally, let yourself be peaceful with it, because they may or may not listen. Imagine that you can say this out of love, without expectation, and see how that lands in you."

"I think I can do that."

"How are you feeling?"

"I feel good. I feel rested, almost."

"Next time I'll get you an application for graduate school in mediation, but we'll work a step at a time here. No, I love your intention, because you love them both. I could feel it. And you've had so much joy and pleasure with one another. That deep intention that you carry—if you can express it... So learn a little bit. Look at Thich Nhat Hanh's community, read these things, and play with it. You don't need to be a professional. You don't need to go to graduate school and become a mediator. You can be somebody who loves these people and say, 'Listen, there's a simple process. Maybe you want to try some of it.' And let them listen."

"Thank you. I really wish you well."

"Thank you so much, Jack."

"One more. Seema, would you like to speak?"

"Sure."

"Go ahead, dear."

"Hi, Jack. I have asked you a question before, and I noticed someone else is raising her hand. So maybe I can ask my question later because I feel..."

"Well, you're here. The karma, the fates, the universe has put us together. We're having our moment. It's fine. Please ask."

"The first aspiration that I had to come to this teaching tonight was related to the political situation that we're in. But today I was presented with two different conflicts in two sets of people that is, I believe, rooted in the same type of challenge. And I was asked for suggestions that I could make. I need to be skillful—that's my intention. Where do you draw the line between self-compassion and compassion for the others? Because in both these sets of couples, I felt like they have exhausted everything in them, and yet I could see the spark, the flame of some hope. But it was just exhausting, and I need to get some guidance..."

"Are you doing this as a friend, or as a therapist or professional?"

"A mindfulness teacher."

"You're a mindfulness teacher, yes. So when I used to work with couples as a psychologist, especially if they were really in a lot of conflict—I remember one time this couple came in, and they were in very heated conflict."

And they came in and I said, "Well, let's first let you find a way to sit so that you feel safe with one another." Immediately the woman got up and walked out the door and slammed it. Then she cracked the door open and I could see one little eye peeking in. She said, "Okay, I feel safe out here." That's how difficult it was.

In some way, you have to start where you are with people. I'm not sure that it's your job as a mindfulness teacher to do couples work, quite honestly. If you choose to, that's okay, but it's not really in the curriculum to be the couple. It's a whole different training. If you love these people and feel that you can listen to them, and they're willing, they're amenable, of course you can do it. But what I'm hearing from you is that they've kind of worn you out.

"Yeah, it just happened right before this session. During the meditation, they just came up because one of them is pregnant, she's having a C-section on Friday, and there is betrayal going on. It's just very unsettling."

All right, so close your eyes for a moment and feel what you're feeling. Even as you tell this, there's actually both upset—maybe some grief, maybe some anger at how they're behaving. What are the emotions storming around in you?

"Weariness. Compassion."

You have compassion, but you've got more than compassion. You're a little bit fed up and you're worried.

"I am looking at the whole—in the person who has betrayed..."

Yes. You shake your head. What comes out when you shake your head? What would come out?

"Because it's easy to accuse someone for something he has done. But when I get to the root, I have compassion for him."

All right, so you have both. But how are you feeling about this? Do you want to continue being in this role of trying to help these stubborn people?

"Yes."

All right, so what would now go into your heart? What state could you bring that would most serve them?

"Steady heart. Patience."

Is it hard for you to be with them? No? So you can bring a steady heart.

Now I want you to imagine that you have somebody to help you—the most amazing being. It could be Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion, or Mother Mary, or Buddha, whoever it is. Imagine that they could appear and be with you, come right next to you and say, "I'm going to help you." See who wants to come. Who arrives?

"Should I name her?"

Yeah.

"My mentor in my program, Trish."

Okay, your mentor. She's wise and she's strong.

So now imagine that you and she can hold hands and you go in. And as you said, you're full of compassion and you're steady. They may listen to you and they may not, but your role is to be that centered, steady heart that says, "You know, there's another way." You hold it in your heart and they can feel it from you. They feel how peaceful and strong you are. And then you ask them: do they want this?

How does that feel to you?

They came to me because they wanted it.

That you will have to find out. Because you can't fix people. But you can love them. And you can be in their presence. And you can even say, "I love you both. And I'm steady with you. And I want you to find a way if you can." And then you'll see. You can't fix them, but you can love them.

Is it possible for me to just help them widen the aperture of their view?

You can invite them. You can invite them to see how many couples have struggled like they have, that they're not alone, that right now, this very day on January 25th, there are 485,000 couples across America alone who are in the same sort of situation—and that this is human. It's not just them, but it's us. And that the ones who are wise hold it with some tenderness and say, "All right, we can get through this."

How are you doing?

And now I'm dealing with the wanting-to-be-perfect me.

Want to do it perfectly? Oh, well, yeah. You might as well let that one go. You do it as good as you can. We're all perfectly human, you know, and you'll do some and some will be beneficial and some won't, but you do the best you can. If you do it with love in the end—if that's your intention—that carries almost everything that matters.

I wish you well. I wish them well. I wish all the 485,362 couples who are struggling well, especially under COVID. It's not that easy. That book that a friend, Esther Perel, wrote—a New York Times bestseller, one of her areas of expertise is around sexuality—it's called Mating in Captivity, about marriage in some way. But really, we're now under COVID, we're all in captivity in some way. But like Nelson Mandela discovered, they can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit.

And when you carry that spirit of love that you have and steadiness, and you can say, "You know, this is human what you're going through, and it's possible to get through it."

So I thank you, Seema. I thank you to everyone who listened.

Let's just take thirty seconds to be quiet together.

What I heard from each of you who spoke—and you represent so many more of us—is this longing for reconciliation, to actually be an agent of love and compassion for ourselves and for those around. Trust this. This is your good heart and your Buddha nature. Sometimes you may need to walk away for a time, as the Buddha did. But then you come back. And you bring your gifts back from your steadiness of your meditation, your peaceful time.

Oh nobly born, you carry the seeds that the world needs. Trust them. Make your heart a zone of peace and compassion and steadiness as you move through the world.

Thank you all.

CHAPTER 108

Seeing the World with the Heart of Wisdom

Jack Kornfield · 51 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Jack Kornfield invites us to remember our fundamental nature as consciousness itself—what his teacher Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows." Drawing from his years of practice in Thai forest monasteries, Kornfield shares how Ajahn Chah's teacher, Ajahn Mun, redirected practitioners from focusing on meditation experiences to recognizing the awareness in which all experiences arise.
> Kornfield weaves together wisdom stories from diverse traditions—Zen masters Suzuki Roshi and Rinzai, poets Mary Oliver and Emily Dickinson, peacemakers like Vinoba Bhave and A.T. Ariyaratne—to illuminate how resting in loving awareness transforms our relationship with life's inevitable paradoxes: joy and sorrow, birth and death, praise and blame. He reflects on the Buddhist teaching that happiness comes not from possessing but from gratitude and connection, embodying the brahmavihāras of compassion (karuṇā), sympathetic joy (muditā), and equanimity (upekkhā).
>
> The talk offers practical guidance for these challenging times: taking death as an advisor, practicing deep listening, trusting intuition, and recognizing our interdependence. Kornfield reminds us that we are "neck deep in grace" and that our birthright is dignity, compassion, and freedom of heart. Through meditation and the cultivation of loving awareness, we can respond to the world's suffering with both tenderness and spacious perspective, becoming what the texts call "nobly born"—sons and daughters of the awakened ones who remember who they really are.

Welcome back.

I was just having the vision of so many people being together in our beautiful Dharma Hall at Spirit Rock. And now we have this imagined and visioned magnificent Dharma Hall in our hearts, even though we can't be together embodied in that way. We can still be together, connected somehow in the teachings, in mindfulness and compassion. We can be together somehow in our listening and our caring.

Tonight, I'd like to talk about seeing the world with the eyes of wisdom—or maybe seeing the world with the heart of wisdom.

The Buddhist texts begin in some verses with the phrase, "Oh nobly born, oh you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, of the Buddhas, remember who you really are." And this talk is a reminder of this for you. Wisdom stories—some I've told before that I love, some new ones—all of them pointing to this amazing human capacity to be awake. Wisdom with perspective, spaciousness, understanding, steadiness, responsiveness, tenderness, humor, ease. The eyes of wisdom to see the world as it is, with a graciousness and an understanding, a full presence to both enter the world and yet...

As Mary Oliver, the great poet, says: "To live in this world, you must do three things. Love what is mortal, hold it against your bones knowing your life depends on it. And when the time comes to let it go, to let it go." And in other lines she writes, "For years and years, I struggled just to love my life. And then the butterfly spoke, 'Don't love your life too much,' as she rose weightless in the wind."

To love what is mortal and hold it against your bones, knowing your life depends on it. And then when the time comes to let it go, to let it go. This is our dance, our human incarnation—to tend and love that which is ephemeral.

Now we all are living through what is so obviously a time of great challenges. The challenge of the pandemic, which has affected so many people, especially in the communities of poverty and communities of color and in countries that don't get the vaccine. I just had my vaccine. I was very honored to be able to receive one as someone who's seventy-five and older. And I also thought about all those people who need it and haven't been able to get it yet.

It's a time of upheaval in the world, as there has been in Burma and in Darfur again—not to speak of Washington, D.C. It's a time of the continuing selling of arms and the nuclear arms race, which continues to grow in some way. It's a time of continuing struggle to find racial justice and economic justice after centuries of racism. It's a time where we're all seeking to find health, even amidst the pandemic.

I remember speaking with my mother, who died about ten years ago, when we were going through another hard time. She said, "You know, Jackie"—she called me by my name when I was little—"I've lived through a lot. My father came home from the trenches in World War I. I lived through the Great Depression. I lived through World War II. We know how to do this," she said. "We know how to go through hard times."

Someone said no one knows the age of humanity, but we're old enough to know better. It's really obvious when we hear and sense the struggles that we share as a human race. The outer developments which are so spectacular—the computers and biotechnology and nanotechnology, the smartphones that have a portal into all the information across the globe—no amount of technology is going to stop continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing climate destruction, all the things we struggle with, continuing tribalism. It's time for us as human beings to match the outer development that's so remarkable with the inner development of heart.

But how do we do this? How do we hold all these struggles? What kind of perspective and wisdom allows us to open beyond our reactivity, beyond being caught in it?

My teacher Ajahn Chah described an important moment when he'd been practicing in the jungles of Thailand and Laos for years, in caves and out with the tigers. These were the days when it really was still very much jungles, although much has been logged off and cut down by now, fifty, sixty, seventy years later. He went to see the greatest master of the day on the border of Laos, another Ajahn—Master Ajahn Mun—and told him about all his meditation experiences, his insights, his struggles, the visions, the bliss and rapture, the understandings.

The meditation master shook his head and said, "You've missed the point, Chah. Those are just experiences." He said, "There's only one question: To whom do they happen? Who is it that's knowing?" He said, "Turn your attention from the images and the experiences and all that you've described back to the one who knows, to the awareness itself"—as we did in our meditation—as if you're in a movie theater and there's the war movie and the romantic comedy and the documentary and all those things that bring life onto the screen with all their emotions. And then you turn your attention back and see the light projected onto the screen.

In meditation, we can turn our attention from the experience back to become what Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows."

This is who you are, consciousness itself. Whether it's in Zen or Advaita or Dzogchen or all the great spiritual traditions of the East—and not just there, but the spiritual traditions of the world—they all point us back to the mystery of consciousness.

And this isn't some esoteric understanding meant for a small group of people. We know this in our bones. Remember the poem from Juan Ramón Jiménez called "Yo No Soy Yo":

I am not I. I am this one walking beside me whom I do not see, whom at times I manage to visit and at other times I forget. The one who remains silent when I talk. The one who forgives sweet when I hate. The one who takes a walk when I am indoors. The one who will remain standing when I die.

We all know somehow this sense that we're not just the experiences that happen—that who we are is this mysterious witness of it all. And it happens in shock sometimes, at an accident or a diagnosis or the death of someone around us, and all of a sudden the gates between the worlds open and the sense of mystery arises. We're so wedded to our ordinary identity, and then it becomes shaken. And we go, "Oh, who am I really?"

We are the consciousness. We are part of this great dance of life that the Buddha called the star at dawn, flash of lightning in a summer cloud, echo, a rainbow, a dream—all the forms appear and disappear. And underneath it, when we get silent, we become the witness itself. And then our heart becomes tender and open to the mystery.

My friend Roger Walsh, a great meditator and meditation teacher, at one point decided, as a scholar, to read through the entire Encyclopedia of World Religions—many volumes, from Ahura Mazda all the way to Zoroaster. I asked him what he learned from it. Roger said, "What I learned is that each of these religions had a story: the origin of life, the nature of good and evil, how we might behave, what created this world." He said, "And when I read one story after another, I realized that they were all stories that we place upon the mystery."

When we stop, even in these troubled times—and especially in these troubled times—and sense the mystery, our heart can become quiet and more tender. Even the suffering, of which there is a great deal, is held in a different light. Like Zen Master Issa, who wrote this poem:

Dew evaporates and all our world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting.

How ephemeral it all is. But now listen to this poem again, for he wrote it on the death of his seven-year-old daughter: Dew evaporates and all our world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting.

So we become the one who knows. We become the wise and loving witness of it all. As we did in our meditation, we become the loving awareness that sees the ephemeral nature of life with tenderness.

But then what? I'm thinking of sitting with kids in the back of the car after we've had some great adventure, and then they speak up and say, "Now what? Now what?"

So now you remember that you are consciousness itself. You have the perspective of loving awareness. You become the wise witness. And now what?

Remember that the word for mindfulness in Sanskrit and Pali is sati, but it's a compound word: sati sampajañña, which means mindful presence and mindful response. It has two parts. So with wisdom, with the spaciousness of loving awareness, this vast perspective, we then also become responsive, steady, tender. From this vastness, we see the world and we love it. We become that loving awareness.

With this perspective, we're able to see the cycles of life. I think of my dear friend Ari Ariyaratne, who is the Gandhi, the sage, the Martin Luther King of Sri Lanka—an extraordinary being who started Sarvodaya, which got people in half the villages of the country to help one another build schools and dig wells and support one another and feed one another. Amazing things. And he intervened in the middle of the civil war that was so terrible.

In the middle of that civil war, when the Norwegians were trying to broker a peace treaty, he called all of his followers to the great temple of Anuradhapura, the oldest temple in Sri Lanka, and 650,000 people came. He stood up and said, "It's taken us 500 years to get into this trouble of the civil war."

500 years of conflict between the Buddhists and the Hindus and the Muslims, and 400 years of colonial oppression, and 200 years of the rich part of the island separated from the poor parts.

"So to end this," he said, "I offer the Sarvodaya 500-year peace plan. Ten years of a ceasefire. Twenty years of rebuilding roads and schools. Fifty years to learn each other's language and religion. One hundred years of economic development so everyone is included. And then we have a council and see how we're doing. And we do it again and again. And after 500 years, we can make this the island of peace."

When I heard this, I could have wept. I got to tell it to the Dalai Lama at one point when I was teaching at a time he was also present, because I knew how much he carries for so long in the tragedy of Tibet. This is the wisdom of an elder who is not worried about the next election cycle or having people in a focus group. However long it takes—if we've been in conflict this long, we head in the right direction. We open our hearts and we do what's necessary. This is the wisdom of the one who knows.

The one who knows also sees with compassion the ones who forget. Anne Wilson Schaaf wrote, "The best adjusted person in modern society is the person who's not dead and not alive—just numb, a zombie. When you're dead, you're not able to do any work for the society. But if you're fully alive, you're constantly saying no to many of the painful processes of the society: the racism, the polluted environment, the nuclear threat, the arms race, drinking unsafe water and eating carcinogenic foods. Thus, it's in the interest of modern consumer society to promote those things that take the edge off, that keep us busy with our fixes, keep us slightly numbed out and zombie-like. In this way, the whole of modern consumer society functions as an addict."

We see how the world around us can put us to sleep. Noam Chomsky says, "All over the place, from the popular culture to the propaganda system, there's constant pressure to make people feel that they are helpless, that the only role they can have is to ratify decisions and to continue to consume."

But this is not who we really are, and the one who knows recognizes this. The one who knows recognizes that a modern society can feed all of its children, that we can educate everyone in our culture, that a wealthy modern society can provide healthcare for all. The one who knows recognizes there is another possibility.

The one who knows sees that life is short. "What will you do with your one precious and wild life?" asked Mary Oliver. Carlos Castaneda's teacher Don Juan suggested we take death as an advisor, keeping death over our left shoulder. Every morning in the monasteries where I lived, it would be dark and we would gather together and sit in meditation before the breaking of dawn, before going out with our alms bowls. We'd sit in silence with candles and then do our morning chanting. And part of our chanting was a reminder: Life is short. Death will come. It is all evanescent. What matters then? Did I love well? Did I live fully?

How could we not love everyone? I remember being in a very big hospital on the East Coast when my twin brother was dying of blood cancer. I spent months visiting him, as did my other three brothers. We are all quite close and love one another. In the cancer ward where he was getting his chemotherapy and his multiple treatments, where others were all struggling, periodically throughout every hour—every fifteen minutes or so—there would be a tinkling of bells over the sound system. Finally, I asked a nurse, "What's that?" She smiled and said, "That's a new baby that was just born."

Today, 375,000 bell-tinkling new babies are born. How could we not love them? How could we not look at each one—whatever color, shape, or form, whatever their eyes and their hair and their skin—and see that they are human beings coming into this wild human incarnation? How could we not love them equally, every one of them?

"In this short life that lasts only an hour, how much, how little, is in our power," wrote Emily Dickinson. If you had a few days left to live, who would you call? What would you say or do? Why are you waiting, my friends?

The one who knows recognizes that life is short. The one who knows sees human incarnation as a realm of paradox and rests in the vastness that is our true nature. Suffering, like rain, falls on the just and the unjust. Human incarnation—form itself coming out of emptiness—is duality.

Form and emptiness, light and dark, gain and loss, birth and death, joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, fame and shame, praise and blame—the worldly winds. They change, you know they do: praise and blame, joy and sorrow. In human incarnation, we have the ocean of tears and the unbearable beauty, and they cannot be separated and taken apart.

As the great Russian dissident Alexander Solzhenitsyn, that master writer, put it: "If only it were all so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were only necessary to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who among us is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

This is the realm of paradox. Joy and sorrow, praise and blame. And every breath—the Jain monks wear a little mask, now that everybody in America is invited to wear one, so that they don't kill any little bugs with their breath. But that's only the ones you can see. There are one trillion little bugs that live in your gut, in your digestive tract—a trillion of them. There are two billion bacteria on your skin. In one spoonful of soil, there's more life—protozoa and algae and fungus and millions of bacteria—than on whole planets in our solar system. This is the realm of birth and death, of existence and non-existence, of gain and loss, of beginnings and endings.

The one who knows sees this paradox and relaxes. As Zen Master Suzuki said to his students, "You're perfect just the way you are"—which was great news to them. You're perfect just as you are. "And there's still room for improvement," he went on. This is us. There's beauty, perfection, and room for improvement.

The one who knows sees how much we need each other. You know this, and this grows with the practice of compassion that we have. As my teacher and friend Maha Ghosananda said, "This can either be a dog-eat-dog world, or we can feed each other." No one can do it alone. No one can exist alone. We so need one another.

Liu Xiaobo, who was a prominent Chinese dissident, was jailed and tortured for ten years for speaking out about the injustices in his community, for writing about the things that were harming people. To be released from his torture, all he had to do was sign a paper saying his thinking had been wrong, that he now saw it another way. And every time the paper was brought to him, he looked at it and then he said, "I could see the faces of the villagers in my community and all they'd suffered. And I realized I couldn't sign it. They were with me. They are with me."

And I think of Aung San Suu Kyi, now under house arrest again. She fell from grace when she did not stand up against the military for what they were doing to the Rohingya. But I understand—I understood then and much more now—how she was trying to keep the military from taking over the entire country, bending in some way, hoping that she could keep democracy. Sadly, that didn't work. But the one who knows understands we're in this together. We need one another. We're part of one another.

I was sitting with Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh at a teaching one day for a small group of us who were teachers. And someone raised their hand and said, "Thay, is there such a thing as group karma?" And he asked them, "What makes you ask?" And the student said, "Well, I wonder about the war, the American war in Vietnam. So many millions of pounds of bombs, so many people who were killed. And I wonder about the Vietnamese. Do they have a particular karma that made the war happen to them?" And he got very quiet and maybe a little bit sad. And he looked up and he said, "The war didn't happen to them. It happened to all of us."

The one who knows sees this—that our lives are entwined with all the beasts, as Chief Seattle said, for what happens to the beasts happens to mankind.

A story for you, from Karen Ziegler: "When I graduated from nursing school at age forty, the only job I could get was at a Veterans Administration hospital. The work was a challenge in every possible way. It didn't help that the veterans teased me relentlessly, asking over and over if I was married."

I am a lesbian. My growing discomfort with the question seemed only to egg them on. Meanwhile, caring for them required a great deal of physical intimacy. While changing a dressing or washing a severely ill patient, I often could tell it had been a long time since he had been touched with kindness.

Gradually, I came to love the crusty old vets and the stubborn guys in detox, many of whom were homeless. Their spirit and resilience in the face of tremendous adversity were a kind of miracle. Later, I worked on the psychiatric ward where patients could become argumentative, even aggressive. I sometimes didn't feel safe there, especially after it occurred to me that all these troubled veterans were combat trained.

Once, a large psychotic man approached me in a threatening manner. Just as I was starting to worry, an equally large Vietnam vet with dementia quietly came between us. Several other vets seemed to appear out of nowhere and stood nearby in silence. I felt safe. I'm retired now, but I still volunteer on that ward twice a week. I feel like I'm visiting my family.

The one who knows in you sees that we are in this together, how much we need each other. This is compassion.

The one who knows also understands happiness—that happiness doesn't come from possessing. We can't possess, but we can love. And it grows, like the practice we do of mudita, of shared joy.

Maya Angelou writes, "It's a wonderful day. I've never seen this one before."

And we can have the experience of gratitude. It's not happiness that makes us grateful; it's gratitude that makes us happy. There's a story of Socrates, who liked to go to the market. His students asked him, "Why do you like to go to the market?" He laughed and said, "I like to go to see all the things I'm happy without."

It's not how much you get, it's how much you give. And joy is not a luxury, and it's not a privilege. It's an expression of love. It's the heart saying, "Yes, I belong here"—amidst all, amidst the tears and the injustice and the beauty and the hope.

From an Inuit poet, Uvavnuk, who writes: "The great sea has set me in motion, set me adrift, moving me like a weed in a river. The sky and the strong wind have moved the spirit inside me till I am carried away trembling with joy."

Joy is not a luxury or a privilege. André Gide called it a moral obligation. It is gratitude that makes us happy. And the one who knows understands that happiness is not based on things—it's the happiness beyond conditions.

The one who knows in us sees with the eyes of the beloved. And you know, in almost every indigenous and traditional culture, the terms of endearment are family terms. To everyone they meet: "Oh brother, oh sister." In all these countries that I've traveled in—in Africa and Asia and various places—the men hold hands. It's a beautiful thing to see. They're not so frightened and homophobic as the men in this country have become. "Oh, brother. Oh, sister. Auntie." Auntie Kamala Harris. Uncle Donald. You know, we all have wild uncles. We know this. "Grandfather." We see one another in this way, as part of our family.

I remember the story of some peacemakers, anti-nuclear peacemakers, who had been doing large actions and demonstrations in England during a period when there was a buildup of nuclear weapons and nuclear missiles. Finally, after many demonstrations and pleas, they got to meet with the commanding general—not just of the British nuclear forces, but of the NATO nuclear forces. And when they met with him, he wondered what they would say.

They certainly thought about it for a long time before they sat down with him, worried about the explosions that could wipe away an entire city or population. And when they sat down with him, they said, "It must feel difficult. It must feel like a great weight to have to carry responsibility for all these nuclear weapons." And they said it with real care and compassion—imagine having that responsibility. And because they could feel into his responsibility and his weight and his heart, they could see with the eyes of the beloved. He responded and he said, "Yes, it's a terrible weight." And they began a genuine conversation. What can we do that makes a difference?

To see with the eyes of the beloved brings both equanimity, or peace, and love. The one who knows is an embodiment of the practices of compassion, of mudita and joy, and of equanimity itself.

Zen master Rinzai says, "Followers of the way, you who are here listening to the Dharma, when you awaken, you become a person who enters fire without being burned, goes into water without being drowned, and plays about in the three deepest hells as if in a fairground, entering the world of hungry ghosts and dumb animals without being molested by them. Why is this so? Because there's nothing such a person dislikes. Even if you love the sacred, dislike the worldly conflicts—you will go on floating and sinking in the ocean of birth and death. Fears and confusion arise depending on the heart. If the heart is open and quieted, why need you fear anything in the world? Do not tire yourselves making up discriminations of higher or lower, of good and bad, and quite naturally of itself you will live into the way."

This is the radical hospitality of the one who knows—not rushing around but stopping to look in the eyes of another, resting in vastness, inner stillness, deep listening. There's a kind of intuition that comes when we quiet ourselves, like Gandhi taking a day a week in silence in the middle of all the activities and all the demonstrations and all the marches and all the ways of trying to end the British colonization of India. Every week he would take a day in silence to listen to his intuition.

I think of Ruth Dennison, my colleague and teacher, who had a ticket on one of the 9/11 planes and was headed to the airport, and her intuition said, "This is not the plane you should be on." If we listen, if we listen with the eyes of the beloved, if we open our hearts, if we trust our intuition, something beautiful can come of it.

I remember again the story of Vinoba Bhave. Vinoba was the most prominent disciple of Mahatma Gandhi. And after Gandhiji was assassinated, Vinoba was heart-stricken and the whole Gandhian movement fell apart. But half a year or a year later, people began to gather and say, "We need to resume our work. We need to resume the care of making a new nation, one that's built on care for all beings who are here, for justice, for things that were at least in their minds, even if they weren't yet able to fulfill them." And they asked Vinoba to lead the meeting. And he said, "No, no, I don't want to be the leader. Gandhi is gone. We must do something different." But they pressed him. "Please, Vinobhaji, you must come."

So finally he agreed. He said, "I will come if you postpone it for six months." And he walked from where he was on one side of the Indian subcontinent all the way to the other side to the meeting. He said, "I want to walk. And I want to listen."

He came to a village that was very poor, a rural village. And most of the farmers were untouchables, outcasts who were working the land of the richest people in the village. He sat under the great tree in the center of the village, and in the spirit of Gandhi said, "I come with the spirit of Mahatma Gandhi himself, with whom I worked. Let me listen to you." And they laid out their great plight. And they said, "We have nothing. If only we each had a little bit of land, we could grow food for our families and for the village."

And as Vinobhaji listened to all of them and reminded them of the great generosity and heart of Gandhi who'd been assassinated, with tears, one of the richest men in the village stood up and said, "How many acres do they need?" There were twelve families there, five acres each—sixty acres. He said, "I have land. In honor of Mahatma Gandhi, I will give them sixty acres, five acres each."

And Vinobhaji said, "No, go home, talk with your family first before you give this away." And in the morning they reassembled, and the man said, "Yes, I wish to offer." And the villagers joyfully received it.

Then Vinoba took his walking stick and went to the next village and sat under the tree in the center of the gathering place and heard similar stories from the poorest in the village. He told the story of what happened in the prior village in the spirit of Gandhi, how this man had stood up. And Vinoba, as he told the story, looked around and said, "How many of you are struggling?"

And there were thirty families. He said, so how much land would you need? One hundred fifty acres. And inspired by the story that Vinoba told, another of the rich men of the village stood up and said, in honor of Gandhiji, I will give one hundred fifty acres.

There was a celebration, and Vinoba kept walking. By the end, when he reached the conference, he had gathered 2,800 acres for the poorest villagers and began what was called the Bhoodan Land Reform Movement, where he and his colleagues walked on foot for several years across every province in India and collected fourteen million acres of land gifted to the poorest of the poor in honor of Gandhiji. It was the biggest land transfer in the history of the modern world, all done as offerings—but all done because he was the one who knows. He rested in that heart that said, let me listen with the eyes of the beloved, to see them all with the heart of compassion and listen deeply.

And when we do, we become guided. When we rest in the one who knows, there's a kind of grace that comes if we can quiet ourselves.

Oh nobly born, say the Buddhist texts again, remember who you really are. Remember you have within you the great heart of a Buddha. This is your true nature, born into you. You are unique. No one in all the billions of galaxies has ever been quite like you.

And among the sages that I've seen, the grandmothers and grandfathers—some of them are merchants and some of them are healers, some of them are shamans, some of them are politicians, some of them are courtesans when you read the old texts—in every form, whoever you are, there is a fundamental nobility and dignity. You are consciousness itself, wending your way through this mysterious incarnation.

And the story says that you've wandered, parched and hungry, searching for fulfillment in the heart. And yet in this old story, the one who loves you sewed into your robes a jewel. You, the richest person on earth, have been going around begging. If only you look in the hem of your garment, say the Sufi masters, the jewel has been sewn in there for your benefit.

Oh nobly born, you are consciousness. You are loving awareness itself. Remember this. Yes, there is suffering. Yes, there's grief and death. Yes, there's injustice. There's also dignity and trust and a freedom of heart. And it is exactly where you are to be found. It's found in a prison cell when you're Nelson Mandela. It's found in the work you have, whatever it happens to be.

I remember a friend of mine asking a great Indian guru about grace. He was sitting at the ashram of this great teacher who was talking on and on about grace. And he said to the guru, I don't feel grace. What is this grace? What is this grace you're talking about?

The guru got quiet and looked at him with great loving eyes and said, you—you who could have an airplane ticket to fly to India, you who are studying and listening to the teachings of thousands of years to open your heart, you who have education, you who have the blessing of a human body—you are asking about grace? You are neck deep in grace.

Take a pause, a breath. Your birthright is that which cannot be broken, unshaken. Your birthright is dignity, compassion, and freedom of heart. It is here where you are.

Zen Master Suzuki Roshi says, when you realize the fact that everything changes and find your composure in it, there you find yourself in Nirvana. The abode of peace, the indestructible, the timeless. My teacher Buddhadasa called it the great public health measure: everyday Nirvana.

Take the time to meditate. Do the practices of compassion, of joy, of equanimity. Practice being the sky of awareness. Rest in vastness. Be the loving awareness itself. And listen. And you will know what to do.

I end with a poem from Brian Andreas called "Waiting for Signs":

I used to wait for a sign, she said, before I did anything. Then one night I had a dream and an angel in black tights came to me and said, you can start any time now.

And then I asked, "Is this a sign?" And the angel started laughing, and I woke up smiling. Now I think the whole world is filled with signs—but if there's no laughter, I know they're not for me.

"Holy, holy, holy," says Allen Ginsberg. Holy, holy, holy—all of it. The world is holy. The body is holy. Holy the typewriter that writes this poem. Holy the voice, the skyscrapers, the cafeterias. Holy the mysterious river of tears under the streets. Holy the vast lamb of the middle class and the crazy shepherds of rebellion. Holy San Francisco and New York and Peoria and Paris and Tangiers. Holy Moscow and Istanbul. Holy time and eternity. Holy the desert and the sea and the visions. Holy mercy and charity and faith. Holy our bodies. Holy our suffering. Holy magnanimity—the super extra brilliant, intelligent kindness of the soul.

Take a breath.

What a journey we're on, dear ones. What a journey.

Remember who you are. Oh nobly born, you are loving awareness, born into this body. And even though you may forget, in but a moment you can come back. You can remember.

CHAPTER 109

Meditation: Loving Awareness

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a progressive journey from embodied presence to the recognition of awareness itself. Beginning with settling into the body, releasing tension, and establishing a dignified yet relaxed posture, the practice unfolds through careful attention to the breath as an anchor of stability and calm.
>
> The meditation includes a contemplative poem by Bridget Lowry that beautifully captures the essence of simply sitting with all aspects of life—our questioning, our clarity, our shared sorrow, and the blazing energy of being alive. Kornfield then guides practitioners to observe how thoughts, sounds, sensations, and emotions rise and fall like waves of the ocean, teaching the gentle art of acknowledging and naming experiences as they appear in consciousness.
>
> The heart of this practice involves a fundamental shift in identification—from being caught in the content of experience to recognizing oneself as the loving awareness that knows all experience. Kornfield invites practitioners to understand that they are not merely the body, the breath, or the passing waves of thought and feeling, but rather the vast consciousness that receives them all. This teaching points to our true home: the spacious, loving awareness that remains still and present amidst all arising and passing phenomena. The practice offers a direct path to remembering who we truly are beyond the temporary conditions of body and mind.

Make yourself comfortable and let's do some meditation practice together.

If you're in a chair, let your feet be flat on the floor. Sit upright with some sense of dignity and graciousness or ease. If you're on a cushion or a bench, however you sit, let yourself rest fully and stably on the earth.

When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently. Perhaps take a couple of deep breaths to help you release what you're carrying and just be here and now.

Our practice is of mindfulness, of mindful loving awareness. Begin to notice as you come into the reality of the present the experiences of your body. If there are any areas of tightness or tension that you can easily release, do so. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck.

Find a simple upright posture. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight of your body from gravity, the heaviness in your buttocks and feet, and sense how the earth completely supports you. Just where you are, you can relax. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now take your seat with loving awareness in this embodied presence.

I begin with a poem I love from Bridget Lowry:

In the strange early evening half light we sit. In the cloudiness of our questioning we sit. In our madness and our clarity we sit. In the midst of too much to do, we sit. In the warm arms of our shared sorrow, we sit. In community and in loneliness, we sit. In the blazing energy of being alive, we sit. Here with the song of the coyotes and the frogs, here with the rippling of breezes across the grasses. Here with cobwebs and clouds and the wayfaring moon and the dusty road upon us. Us in the sound and the sound in us. Us in the world and the world in us.

As you settle, hearing these words and taking your seat in the midst of all things, let yourself sense the mystery of your body's breathing, how it breathes itself. Feel it as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to sense your breath, you can put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand, and relax with each breath that you sense.

Breathing in and out, invite a sense of ease and calm to grow with each breath. As you sense this life breath that breathes you so beautifully, with the ocean of air shared by all beings, calm and relax with each breath. Gently opening.

Yes, there will be sounds in the background. There will be thoughts and bodily sensations, images and emotions. Let all these experiences of sensations and sounds, thoughts and feelings rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel how the breath continues to breathe itself gently in the midst of them all.

Steady yourself in the breath. Relax into it. Trust it. Let it be your home. Return gently to this breath, this moment. When the attention goes off to other places, acknowledge gently and then come back. This breath.

Let the mind quiet. Let the body come into deeper ease as you breathe. Feel the breath breathing itself in the midst of it all.

As you feel the breath, you can let your mindful loving awareness also acknowledge the waves of the ocean that rise and fall around the breath—thoughts that come and go, sounds, strong sensations. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean, and sense yourself as stillness in the midst, feeling the breath breathe itself.

And when a strong wave of experience pulls your attention from the breath, as if to bow to it, you can acknowledge it, name it gently. Oh, planning, planning mind. Remembering. Sadness, sadness. Excitement. Longing. Tingling, itching. Or sounds—hearing.

And as you name that experience that arises in awareness—hearing, hearing; sad, sad; planning, planning—notice how the wave rises, is felt or received in the space of loving awareness, and then passes away.

Steadying yourself with the breath now invites you to open further and become the field of loving awareness. You are the consciousness that hears these words and that hears the silence between the words. You are the awareness that knows the breath. You are the loving awareness that knows the sensations of body and the moods and emotions that rise and fall like waves of the ocean or clouds.

You are not the body with all its sensations. You are not the breath that comes and goes on its own. You're not the waves of sounds and thoughts and feelings. You are the consciousness, the loving awareness itself. You are the awareness that receives them all.

Rest in this awareness, this loving awareness. You are consciousness, awareness itself. Let experiences come and go like these words, appearing like waves or clouds, bubbles and vanishing in the open space of awareness. Vastness and stillness. This is your home. Relax into it. Trust.

You are the vast space of knowing, receiving sounds like clouds, receiving sensations and breath like waves of experience.

In this meditation, we started in the simple way of embodied awareness, grounding in the body, and then using an awareness of breath to bring some steadiness and calm to the attention, some ease in the midst of all that arises and passes. And then after time, we shifted our attention from the experiences of breath and sensation, from the waves of thoughts and feelings and sounds, to notice that we were aware of all these things—to become the awareness itself, to shift our identity, to become the loving witness as all the waves and clouds appeared and disappeared.

This is who you are. Consciousness was born into this body, will leave this body when you die at the end of life. And here and now, in the reality of the present, you can become this loving awareness. You can remember who you really are.

Q and A: Seeing the World with the Heart of Wisdom

Jack Kornfield · 20 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Jack Kornfield holds space for profound questions about life's deepest mysteries. The dialogue opens with a participant from a death and dying group asking about the afterlife and what happens to accumulated wisdom when we die. Jack gently challenges the assumption that death destroys wisdom, drawing on near-death experiences and encouraging an open mind about what consciousness might encounter beyond the body. He recommends the traditional practice of reflecting on one's best intentions and good deeds as death approaches.
> The conversation turns to the relationship between 'the one who knows' and the concept of non-self, referencing Joseph Goldstein's teachings and the Indian master Nisargadatta's famous saying: 'Wisdom tells me I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything. Between these two my life flows.' Jack guides a participant through her life transition, helping her discover through direct inquiry that service, purpose, and love are the threads that matter most—demonstrating how the one who knows can illuminate our path.
> The session concludes with an exploration of 'the sure heart's release' (nibbāna), referencing Ajahn Buddhadāsa's teaching on everyday nibbāna and the Avataṃsaka Sūtra's descriptions of liberation. Jack emphasizes that peace isn't found elsewhere but in any moment we let go of grasping. When the questioner discovers through reflection that simply being kind to oneself opens the gateway to freedom, Jack affirms this as the essence of the teaching—echoing Aldous Huxley's final wisdom that it all comes down to kindness.

As you and the monks were chanting, "life is short," I found myself reflecting deeply on this truth. I'm in a death and dying group—we're all over age seventy, and some of us have life-threatening illnesses. We naturally start thinking not just about making peace with our friends and families, but about what comes afterwards, what the afterlife is like. My own preference is that I want my good works to continue with me, as well as my intentions to help other people who are left on earth. There's so much confusion about the afterlife, and yet it would be so helpful, so soothing, to think about it clearly. Can you tell me what's been helpful with all the people you've been sitting with as they die?

I will, but I want to ask you something first. I love the fact that you're in that group. What have you found already that helps you as you reflect on dying? What's made the difference?

Truthfully, I resent dying because it kills all the wisdom that I've been learning my whole life. That's why I hope I'd like to get another life to try and do it all over again with the wisdom that I have now, that I've built up in this life.

Let's just pause for a moment. You have the belief that when you die, it's going to kill all the wisdom. Feel that for a second. That's a painful thought to have. Do you know that's true?

No, I don't.

So stay with me for a minute. Say, "Okay, I don't actually know that I'm going to lose wisdom." In fact, sitting with people who died or came near death, left their body, and then came back—everyone thought their heart had stopped—they say, "Oh, wow, I learned so much more as I was dying." What if what you believe is not true at all? What if instead you actually learn when you die?

How would that be?

I would love that. I love learning new things, especially the kind of wisdom that we talk about here.

So you said a few beautiful things. First, I would keep that open mind, because it could well be true. You also said you want to come back and serve, you want to actually get better. That's the Bodhisattva vow—however many lifetimes it takes, I'm gonna come back. Let you and the Dalai Lama hold hands and do it another time. And when he's asked what happens when you die, he says, "I don't know. I'm really interested to find out myself." So you're in good company.

But there's something else. I heard your intention in that. And one of the practices we've learned, a traditional practice as you approach death, is to reflect on your best intentions and on the good deeds that you've done in your life, even little ones, because they brighten the heart and bring joy so that when this mysterious time comes, when consciousness leaves the body—which it will—you'll be surprised. It's not just going to be a flat piece of meat when the body dies. You float out, there's light, there's all these things that are awaiting you. Don't think that it will kill all the wisdom. In fact, you may learn more. How does that sound?

I love it. It sounds very hopeful. And like you say, I want to bring my wisdom forward and my intentions forward.

I think you will, but you'll have to wait and see. We're all in this mystery together.

Louisa, would you like to ask your question?

Yes. Hello.

Hi, Louisa. Nice to see you.

So as I was listening to you talk about the one who knows, I also listened to a recent lecture from Joseph Goldstein where he talked a lot about the known self and how the self is a concept like a river. I've been trying to make a parallel between the one who knows and the known self. I don't know if I'm onto something or if it's totally—

No, this is a beautiful and profound question. My teacher, this Indian master named Nisargadatta—you may have heard this phrase from him—he said, "Wisdom tells me I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything. Between these two my life flows."

So the nature of consciousness—and this isn't something for you to believe, but really to experience—Joseph is talking about this because he's had the profound experience of no-self that comes in meditation. He looked for himself everywhere and he couldn't find something solid that would last. There's a personality in a body, but then it's gone. So, who are you really? Wisdom says, "I'm nothing." That's what Joseph's saying, but it's not the whole sentence. Love says, "I'm everything." And if you become loving awareness—in fact, that's what you are—then it's not your identity with the body or the personality, it's consciousness itself.

Now I'm going to pause for a second because this becomes quite philosophical, and these are deep and important questions. I want you to just get quiet for a moment and reflect: What makes you ask these questions? What's there in you?

I think it's this understanding that we're just... it's this paradox, right, that we are everything and nothing at the same time. And I don't know, maybe I've been thinking a lot about identity. I've been going through a lot of big transitions in life and work. I just finished the MMTCP and I'm teaching lessons and... yeah, I'm creating this whole new identity, but I still have my past as part of my presence.

Close your eyes—this is beautiful. You're in this big life transition. And in some way, as you reflect, you're trying to figure out how to understand it, how to hold it. Keep your eyes closed. So: I was these things, now I'm also becoming this, and I want to kind of figure out how to package it or hold it or understand it so that I can—

So you feel all that just getting quiet. And now hold all that with a compassionate heart and say yes. Here's Luisa in the middle of change, trying to look for some understanding to help navigate.

And then ask your heart: what's the most important thing to navigate change? This is the one who knows inside. Ask your heart. What's the thing, the thread, the thing that's most important to you to guide you in this?

"Service, purpose, love."

Service. So it's love and caring and service.

"Service."

How does that feel?

"It feels really good."

So you answered your question. "I feel very lit up when I think about these things."

So you answered that very deep question you asked just now, from the one who knows, and you could feel it—it lit you up. And you say, "Yeah, this is really the thread through all of it—job change and life change and so forth. Service, caring, love. This is who I am, this is what I really am."

And then forget about self and non-self. I mean, that's all philosophic in a way. The Zen Master Seungsahn, this wonderful great Korean Zen Master, used to look at us with those kind of questions, and he would say, "You already understand. You already understand." And you do. And what you said was beautiful. I could see you get lit up. So thank you.

"Thank you so much."

One more, maybe. Devon, would you like to ask your question?

"My question is, I've read that the sure heart's release is the meaning, the essence of the holy life. And I wonder, what does that mean? What is the sure heart's release?"

And what makes you ask the question?

"Well, based on teachings from you and others, I focused on recovering from trauma and things like that. So I focused a lot on mettā and self-care and things like that. But then sometimes I think, well, in the monasteries it would be all about focusing on the breath, and I should really do the real Buddhist approach, not a sort of Buddhism-light or something. So then I think, well, if the sure heart's release is the essence of it, then maybe I can tell if I'm on the right track or something."

This is beautiful, and it's a deep question. You're saying, "All right, I've done this work—trauma, recovering from trauma, doing lots of mettā." And then you have some thoughts about what happens in a monastery, whether it's the breath or other things.

In fact, monasteries are people. So basically—this is just a little aside, I hate to say this—but they're kind of like any other place. There are people who are wiser and there are ones who aren't. And you think, "Oh, I'm going to go to a peaceful place." And then they get in conflict with one another. So monasteries have all of that, as well as, of course, time to meditate.

Yes, the sure heart's release is a translation for liberation, or for nibbāna. I was reading these beautiful phrases from the Avatamsaka Sutra: non-distress, supreme harmony, the abode of peace, the release from shackles, non-conflict. These are different descriptions.

And again, I use that phrase from Ajahn Buddhadasa of everyday nibbāna. He said, "You think nibbāna is going to be found when you get a ticket and travel somewhere else and you'll find nibbāna there."

He said, but it's not there. It's there in any moment that you let go of grasping and your heart comes to peace. As Suzuki Roshi said, when you realize everything changes and find your composure in it.

So the sure heart's release points to the fact that in any moment, you can either be caught in your ideas, in your self-judgment, in your identification with trauma, in the pain you carry, the pain of the world that you feel—or in that same moment, you can become the loving awareness and say, "Oh yeah, I was caught in that, and I worry about that, and I have that pain, but that's not who I really am."

And here was the Buddha walking on foot for forty-five years, the dusty roads of India, in nirvana. Now, how could that be? It's obviously not some other place. He had to eat and bathe and talk to people. He also had people who got angry with him, and he had conflict in the community, and there were wars around—and still his heart was at peace.

So what you're speaking about and asking about, it's such a deep and beautiful question: Can I find this in my life? Do I have to go to a monastery? I want the real thing. You are the real thing. I hear the sincerity in your question, and you can. And then you ask, well, what is it that supports my heart being at peace? And the one who knows in you understands that. Oh yeah, this is what supports it.

Close your eyes for a moment since we're talking. Take a breath or two. And then a very simple reflection: What is it that supports that spaciousness and peacefulness of heart that you know from some moments in your life, that you know is possible? Let yourself reflect. What is it? And notice what comes as you do.

"When I just let myself be kind to myself. Forget about all the ideas and just be kind."

Forget about all those ideas and just be kind. It's so beautiful to have you say that. That's the one who knows. It's the very same thing Aldous Huxley said at the end of his life, just before he died. He said, all the things I've done, all the spiritual teachings—he said it just boils down to be kind, kind to yourself and others. And that is the release of the heart.

There is a release in that kindness. Kindness and love open the gateway to the garden, to say, I can be here in the world, not in conflict with it. Although conflict comes and you'll have all those pains, I can hold this with kindness. And I hear it from you, and it's beautiful. Thank you. You have it.

So I think that's enough words for the evening. I'm very glad that you all could join and be part of the meditation and the teachings, part of the fabric of community that's grown at Spirit Rock. And I feel a privilege, because when I teach, as I did tonight, I'm talking to myself as much as to you. It's like a little reminder: Jack, yes, remember, this is good stuff.

Thank you. Inviting the one who knows in all of you and in me.

So all of you, good hearts, all of you people, remember your dignity, remember the care for yourself, and to see the secret beauty in every being that you meet with respect. Live with kindness, as our last great master just taught us in that final question.

And I'll see you again. Thank you. Good night.

CHAPTER 111

The Sacred Pause

Jack Kornfield · 52 min

> In this spring 2021 teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together an early Buddhist sutta about the Buddha as a spiritual plowman with reflections on navigating the pandemic, racism, and climate crisis. Drawing from the Kasībhāradvāja Sutta (SN 7.11), where a Brahmin farmer challenges the Buddha's worthiness to receive alms, Kornfield illuminates how faith becomes our seed, mindfulness our plow blade, and compassion our guide pole in cultivating inner freedom.
>
> The talk explores two complementary truths: that we are already perfect as expressions of loving awareness, yet there is always room for growth through tending the seeds of our hearts. Kornfield draws on Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching that the quality of our life depends on which seeds we water—joy, peace, and compassion or fear, anger, and craving. He shares stories of transformation, from Alan Chadwick's miraculous garden grown in a junkyard to Maha Ghosananda leading Cambodian refugees through the killing fields with loving-kindness chants.
> Practically, Kornfield emphasizes that obstacles in meditation—restlessness, doubt, difficult emotions—are not impediments but the very path itself. By learning to hold our inner difficulties with tender awareness, we develop the same capacities needed for relationships, parenting, work, and social change. The teaching culminates in an invitation to reflect on what seeds we most want to plant and water, both within ourselves and in the world, recognizing that we are the earth becoming conscious of itself.

Let's have a bit of a Dharma conversation, some time to listen or reflect. The idea with these teachings or talks is not to try to remember everything—there's no quiz at the end, there's no grade—but to let yourself settle and listen in an inward way, to listen with the heart. Notice if there's anything that rings true to you, that serves as a reminder of what you already know in some deep way in yourself, and let that reminder be a kind of nourishment for you.

So here we are at the beginning of spring 2021, and all kinds of wild changes are happening in the world. The seventeen-year locusts are coming out in the Virginia, Maryland, and East Coast area by the billions. The coronavirus is still spreading widely across the world. While there's some great respite in having vaccines now become available to some, there's also the tragedy that many people are not receiving vaccines and that they're not being shared. Even the intellectual property is being held for profit rather than for the good of humanity. And then we have, of course, the ongoing dilemmas of climate change and the very painful, sad, continued racism and violence—the anti-Asian violence that's happened. We can't say that we're shocked about the racism because it's been here all along. We've known it; it just makes itself more visible.

I've been standing out on the street, as I did for a long time with a sign saying "Black Lives Matter," and now it says "Safe and Protected Asian Lives, Respect and Care." I get a lot of thumbs up and horn honking from certain people and shouts and yells from others. For me it just feels important to stand up and say, "Yes, I'm with you, my brothers and sisters from Asia, or Asian Americans who've been here way longer than I have and my family." And also to express the gratitude I feel for the tradition and the incredible generosity of the teachers and teachings and cultures from India and Thailand and Burma and so forth.

So here we all are sharing this—the midst of the pandemic and the beginning of opening up, in the US anyway and other parts of the world, of our connections with one another. Not post-pandemic, but beginning to emerge. How do we come out of it? How do we hold this? How do we do this in a wise way? And what are the lessons to be learned? There are so many.

There's a lesson I find in how a certain solitude and stillness has come along with the restrictions and being sequestered. I realized this nourishes me. I don't want to get so speedy again and travel quite as much. I somehow want to listen more deeply. All of us have heard this, but it's not been an easy thing either. How do we tend ourselves? How do we tend this world?

Here is a very early sutta, a text from the first years of the Buddha's wandering in India. Early one morning, when the Blessed One was out on his alms round, the Buddha approached an area being plowed in springtime, where a wealthy Brahmin landowner was distributing food to his workers. When the Brahmin saw the Buddha coming for alms, he said, "I, oh monk, plow and sow, and having plowed and sown and worked the fields, then do I eat. You too should likewise plow and sow, and having done so, you should eat." He was putting him down, saying, "Hey, I work—why should I give you food?"

The Buddha responded, "I too, oh Brahman, plow and sow, and having plowed and sown, I eat."

The Brahman said, "You claim to be a plowman, yet I see no plow. Tell me, what kind of plowing is it that you do?"

The Buddha replied, "Faith is my seed and composure the rain. Clarity is my plow and yoke. Compassion is my guide pole, and my heart and mind is the harness. Mindfulness is the plow blade. I use truth to weed and cultivate release. Wise effort is my oxen, drawing the plow steadily toward freedom without regret. This is how I plow, and it bears the fruit of deathlessness. Whoever plows in this way will become free of all sorrow and distress."

Then the Brahmin exclaimed, "Let the venerable monk eat! You are indeed a plowman, and your plowing bears the fruit of freedom." He poured milk rice into the bowl. But as he did, the bowl hissed as if it were red hot, and all that was liquid flew out of the bowl. The Buddha stood there peacefully and then walked on his way.

This is the spring plowing of planting the seeds of faith and tending them with wise effort and compassion, using truth to cultivate release, with compassion as the guide pole. But there's an interesting, almost archetypal or mythological moment in this story. Why is it that when the Brahmin landowner finally put something in the Buddha's bowl, the Buddha stepped back? As the story is told, it's as if to say, "I don't do an exchange for this food." But when the food goes into the bowl, it hisses. Why would that be?

Those of you who are listening who are also farmers will know immediately that when you cut a furrow in a field with a plow blade, at the end of that furrow, if you touch the blade of that plow, it gets red hot. This was the symbol that the bowl the Buddha was carrying was red hot from the plowing that he did—the transformation of all the difficulties of the heart into freedom.

This text, this story, has a couple of different levels to it. The first is the Buddha expressing, in some way, "I have practiced until I've come to the deathless, to that which is beyond birth and death, to a freedom of heart amidst all circumstances."

T.S. Eliot, the poet, called this a condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything. Sometimes it's called the abode of peace, or the supreme harmony. It is that place of being without wanting or resisting a single thing—an openness of heart, absolutely present and awake.

"Oh nobly born," the Buddha reminds us at the beginning of so many texts. Remember, this freedom is possible for you too. Remember that you too can awaken this freedom of heart.

Now, how to do this?

I remember having a conversation with Ram Dass when I was relatively new at teaching. He'd become a friend and a mentor, and in fact came to the second retreat I ever taught, in a camp in Western Massachusetts. Joseph Goldstein and I were teaching together, and that retreat was attended by Jon Kabat-Zinn and Dan Goleman and my beloved Trudy Goodman and a whole group of other people who became themselves well-known dharma teachers.

Sometime after that, I was sitting with Ram Dass—maybe it was after the first year of teaching, or the second—together at Naropa Institute, the Buddhist university. And I said, "I'm kind of getting the hang of teaching in ways that really serve the different people who come. I'll be in a room and there will be those who are quite new to meditation with their questions, and some who have practiced a long time and maybe spent time in an ashram or temple or monastery for months or years, and some in the middle, some with backgrounds in therapy or psychology. And I try to find something I can say to each one of them, where they are, that uplifts their heart, that gives them a sense of nourishment."

And Ram Dass paused. He leaned back the way he did sometimes and smiled. He said, "Yes. And when you get good"—with a little smile—"you can say something so simple and elegant and true that it resonates on all those levels at once."

I think of that often. I think of Suzuki Roshi's phrase "Zen mind, beginner's mind," and picking up that book and reading that the goal of meditation is to always keep our beginner's mind—how simple and elegant and direct that truth is. To be here now, where we are, with a beginner's mind.

I think of my teacher Ajahn Chah, who was simple in that way. You came to him struggling or suffering, and he'd peer at you and say, "Suffering? Having a hard time?" Then he'd smile kindly, with great compassion, and say, "Aw, must be a bit attached, huh?" That was all. So simple.

A condition of complete simplicity, costing not less than everything. A letting go. A presence.

And it's not far away, oh nobly born. We live in the realm of mystery, and we forget it because we go through our quotidian tasks of the day. We get busy, we get lost in thought and all the things that come with being a human being. But then we enter a magnificent cathedral, or hear an extraordinary piece of music, or stand at the edge of the Grand Canyon, or high in the mountains. Or even more—when we're there for the birth of a child, or in that mysterious and tender moment when we might hold the hand of someone at the very end of their life, sensing their body and spirit separate as consciousness leaves and it's just the empty shell of a body, and the gates between the worlds open. We know this in making love. We know the mystery in so many ways.

I think of my daughter when she was little, how astonished she was by a ladybug that came into her room, or by a little red pebble. One day we were walking—maybe she was three years old—in the early evening, and she said, "Daddy, look! The moon is following us. When we turn the corner, the moon comes with us. How does it know to do that?"

The question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity.

Can we, in this equinox, in this beginning of spring, in the midst of the great difficulties of our lives in this world, in the midst of the unbearable beauty of life—can we pause and be present? Can we take a step back and be the witness, the loving awareness, and remember that who we are is consciousness itself, having a human experience?

When we do, our eyes and face get soft. I love watching people come to the end of retreat. They come in all tense, carrying the struggles of their lives. And after a week or ten days or however long it is, you see them and it's as if they've been born anew. Their brows are unfurrowed. We talk about it as the Vipassana facelift.

But you don't have to go on retreat. The invitation to pause, even in short ways—to walk among the trees, to take time as spring begins and as the pandemic begins to open a little bit with very thoughtful care—is always here. Pause and remember the sense of mystery. Find that peace that's not arguing with the world or trying to make it something, but actually, as the Buddha that you are, is simply present, compassionate, and open.

Mary Oliver writes:

When I am among the trees,
especially the willows and the honey locust,
equally the beech, the oaks, and the pines,
they give off such hints of gladness.
I would almost say that they save me, and daily.

I am so distant from the hope of myself,
in which I have goodness, and discernment, and never hurry through the world but walk slowly, and bow often.

Around me, the trees stir in their leaves and call out, "Stay awhile." The light flows from their branches and they call again. "It's simple," they say. "And you too have come into the world to do this—to go easy, to be filled with light, to shine."

Taking the pause, the sacred pause, there's a fundamental dignity that you carry, that every human being carries. And here is the Buddha standing in the middle of the spring plowing, in some way being judged as unworthy, for he's not a farmer or a working person. Yet he stands there in the place of peace and radiance and being, and says, "I have done my plowing, and it bears the fruit of the freedom of heart—to be just as I am in this mystery."

So that's one part of this text: the invitation to be present in mystery, seeking nothing, becoming the conscious witness of it all, the loving awareness.

But there's another part of this text. Zen Master Suzuki Roshi explains it beautifully when he said, "You are perfect just as you are, and there's still room for improvement." And that's the plowing part.

Even as we remember the mystery and rest in being and presence, we can listen to the words of Thich Nhat Hanh: "The mind and the heart is like a piece of land planted with many different kinds of seeds—seeds of joy, peace, mindfulness, understanding, and love; seeds of craving, fear, anger, hate, and forgetfulness. These healthy and unhealthy seeds are always there, sleeping in the soil of the heart and mind. The quality of your life depends on the seeds you water. If you water a seed of peace in your heart, peace will grow. When the seeds of happiness in you are watered, you'll become happy. If the seed of anger in you is watered, you will become angry. The seeds that are watered frequently are those that will grow strong."

So this is also part of this beautiful text. Yes, there's the presence of freedom that the Buddha displays. And yes, he says, "I have done my plowing." Each time you sit in meditation, you follow in those footsteps. Trust and faith is your seed. Attention is your effort to be present for what is. Compassion is your guide. And you too do the plowing that brings freedom.

Now over the last thirty years, as we know, there have been eight or nine thousand papers and studies that show the benefit of training in mindfulness and mindful loving awareness and compassion. It increases empathy and connection. It helps with emotional regulation. It steadies and deepens our capacity for attention. It actually changes our nervous system—measurable MRIs in the brain. It changes the epigenetics in our cells. Even eight weeks of meditation is shown to change the telomeres, those caps at the end of chromosomes that are protective and keep us healthy and help us age well.

So neuroscience is affirming what the Buddha said: our practice of wise attention—yoniso manasikara, it's called, caring or loving attention—planting the seeds of trust, mindfulness, and compassion, they change you. They change me. They change us.

Now what's important also to understand is that this transformation happens not just when things are easy, but even when the gardening gets difficult.

There was a famous gardener who taught at the University of California in Santa Cruz, the father of biodynamic gardening called Alan Chadwick. He gardened by growing soil to grow plants. And what he meant by soil was different than the earth's surface that you usually think of. He meant a power in the universe that could be concentrated in gardening to capture cosmic magic. Chadwick grew soil and planted seeds based on relationships that exist between the Earth and its moon, the sun, the other planets, the weather, the way doves in the area coo, the mist in the trees, and everything you could imagine.

When winter was very bleak, he'd sing about the energies under the surface of the earth: "Underneath, the seeds are full of life, life! This very moment, the seeds are waking up and pushing up to the sun. The doves are singing in spring—coo, coo—life, life!"

Once Chadwick took a class to a junkyard lot that was full of rusted-out cars, broken glass, chunks of cement, sand, lots of abandoned trash. He asked the owner if his class could use the lot for an experiment to grow flowers and vegetables. The owner said, "Sure, but you're crazy—that soil is dead." This garden later became famous for its extraordinarily delicious vegetables and its gorgeous flowers.

This is our task in this world: to plant beautiful seeds, to till the soil with our hearts, and to tend them.

And I think of my teacher, colleague, friend, and inspiration, Maha Ghosananda, the Gandhi of Cambodia, guiding the hundreds of thousands of refugees who escaped the Khmer Rouge back to their villages where temples were burned and most of their families were killed.

And him saying, you can't go back in a bus or the back of a truck. We have to walk together and reclaim this land with loving kindness.

And so he would lead long lines of hundreds and hundreds of villagers with a bell in the front, chanting, "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law." And as he chanted the chant of loving kindness through the killing fields and the places of destruction, until people could go back to their villages, he said, "With every step, you reclaim your heart and you reclaim this land." This was planting the seeds of loving kindness in a place that so needed it.

Now, every gardener expects obstacles to arise. Weeds, drought, insects, blights—all of those kinds of things will come. And guess what happens when you meditate and you do your spiritual journey or practice, or gardening, we shall call it? Go ahead, ring your bells, light your candles, burn your incense, call out to the gods. But watch out, because the gods will come and they will put you on the anvil and fire up the forge and beat you and beat you until they turn brass into pure gold.

So you sit down to meditate and you say, I want to be peaceful, calm, gracious. And what happens? It's hard to make a time. Your life is too busy. You've got a long list of things to do, people and things that you care about to attend to. And then finally you get to sit down and you're sleepy or you're restless. Or you have the "if only" mind—if only I did this, if only I hadn't done that, if only... All the desires. Or your doubt comes: I'm not getting very far. Should I be doing this? Or you feel all the tensions your body holds.

And what do you do? The line from Mary Oliver: "to let the soft animal of your body love what it loves," to hold it in tenderness.

And then you sit and tears come. Ajahn Chah said, if you haven't wept deeply, you probably haven't meditated very long. Because we carry the tears of the world, the ocean of tears of life, along with its magnificent beauty.

And fear comes, and you bow, and you name it. Fear, fear—as we did in our sitting. Let me not turn from you. Let me feel this wave of fear. Fear, open, show me your dance. Breath stops. Everything contracts. Fear, fear, I feel like I'm going to die. Dying, dying. Now what? Oh, I'm still anxious. Anxious, anxious. I wish you would go away. Wishing, wishing. I hate this fear. Hating, hating, hating. Oh, but I'm tired of it all. Tired. Maybe I'll just go back to my breath. Calm, ease, breathing in and out. Hey, I did pretty good with that fear. Oh, pride. Pride.

All right. Another breath.

And you start to smile. You become the loving witness of all your dramas. You name them. The emotions have come—the shame, the guilt, the fear. Instead of resisting, you become the loving awareness that says yes, this too is part of being human.

How do you touch the difficulties that arise in your heart and mind, the pains in your body, the difficult emotions? Can you find the courage as a gardener to turn toward that which is difficult—the weeds, the insects, the blight? And can you tend them with a tender heart and care, and water the seeds of compassion for it all?

Here's the secret, or one of the secrets that's important for you to know: these obstacles are the path. It's not like they're in the way of your getting to some magnificent, great, wonderful state where you're always open and stop breathing because it's just so peaceful.

These obstacles are the path, for the very things that are difficult—your restlessness, the doubting mind, the tears that you carry for yourself or the world—these are the places where you learn to steady your heart, where you learn to recognize and allow what's true, where you learn forgiveness and kindness. They're the places where you shift your identity from being caught in how it's supposed to be and how you're supposed to be, to that place of love. They're the places to grow strong and steady and free in the heart.

The Buddha says, as the farmer channels water to their land, so the wise one directs kindness and compassion to their own heart and mind.

You remember that phrase in Zen: there are only two things—you sit and you sweep the garden, and it doesn't matter how big the garden is. That is, you quiet the mind and tend the heart, and then you get up and tend the garden. A mindful presence as you quiet yourself in this turning of the seasons, and then a mindful loving response.

As you learn these inner capacities in meditation—to be with all the waves of emotion and doubt and thought, all the beautiful things and the joy that open and then the closing again, the contraction and opening and closing, just as the body breathes, the emotions and the heart open and close, and the mind opens fast and then closes in its ideas—as you learn to be with all those waves, that inner gardening gives you the same capacities you will need in tending the world.

In your love relationship, should you have one—and you do in some way, whether it's a loving partner or family member or community—but especially when you fall in love with somebody, it seems so wonderful. They just seem so compatible and magic and special, and you just love it and think that everything's going to be great. You know how it works. And then you decide to live together and have a big family and start a business together and buy property and make a whole tribe, or whatever you do.

But you find someone you fall in love with. And then at some point, this little thing starts to happen we could call disappointment. They fall off the pedestal. You see their messy humanity, like your own. You get irritable, or they are irritable. One of you gets anxious, the other gets judgmental. And there's the place to love. Because you've learned it in your meditation, you've learned it for love.

When I used to perform weddings—which I really don't do anymore, but I did for a long time, and most of them are still married—one of the things I would do is have the two partners who are going to be married, at some point in the ceremony, look at one another. And I'd say, "Do you take this person as is?" You know how in the used car lot there'll be a sign in the window of the car: "Here it is, $6,900 for this car, as is." I'd look at these people who love one another and are getting married, and I'd say, "Do you take this person as is?" Because that's the game. That's really what love is.

There's one way to be in relationship, which is attachment—you want something from them, and it's a sort of business deal where they give you and you give them. There's another way in which you, as the Buddha, as the wise one, as the compassionate goddess Kuan Yin, see the beautiful spirit behind the eyes of this person. And your love is simply like the gardener's, to say, "I'm here for you, and I want to support you to blossom and grow in whatever way you can." That is the game you learn in your inner life, translated into relationship.

But it's true in every relationship and in everything. I certainly see it in my marriage to Trudy, my beloved, after the last year plus of being sequestered together. There were moments of cabin fever, if you will, or irritation. And then I just look at her, and I step back from the place of loving awareness, and I see her as a little girl, one or two years old, toddling around. I see her as seven or eight. I see her as a young teenager, thirteen, fourteen years old, with that kind of brightness and innocence. I see her as a young woman. I see her when she had her child and as she grew. And I see her now, and I see this whole arc of being and the mystery behind it, the joys and the suffering she's been through. When I step back and get quiet and gaze in that way, instead of with judgment or need, I just feel a gratitude and an ability to love and be present for the mystery of this other person. And it's the same gardening.

And parenting—you have these kids and they're small and they try to put everything in their mouth. They're a little older and they hit each other with blocks, and you have to socialize them. Then they start careening down the street on their bicycle and they fall off, and you have to take care of them when they hurt themselves. Then they hit puberty. And what do you do with that teenage angst? Then there's sexuality and alcohol and drugs, and they're not who you think they should be. You get through all of that, and then they leave you.

How do you do it? You do it as a gardener. These are beautiful seeds. You water the goodness in them, as you do in yourself. You tend them, you love them, and you stay steady.

The same thing in business. You'll have obstacles—not enough capital.

The market changes, the competition gets stronger, employees quit—whatever challenges arise. You water the good seeds.

And we need this practice now more than anything for social change. The divisiveness, the war, the racism. I've been reading a wonderful book called Caste by Isabel Wilkerson, where she reframes the racial suffering we have in a deeper way through the lens of caste—like caste in India or caste in Nazi Germany, where one group is empowered over another, abuses another. It's really worth looking at. I recommend it highly because it offers a way of understanding injustice, how we participate in it, and how we can change it.

But it's a tough time. I watch what's happening to my friends in Burma. We led a march across the Golden Gate Bridge a week or two ago with hundreds of people from Burma and from the Buddhist community to say, "We're with you"—and spread those images across the media and underground in Burma so people know they're not alone.

We know this: If we want the world to be different, we have to water the right seeds. We have to see what really matters. We have to tend those seeds that matter most.

Here is Robert Kennedy, from a speech he gave the year before he was assassinated. He was asked about his vision for the economy, and someone raised the question of Gross National Product. Kennedy shook his head and said: Gross National Product does not include the beauty of our poetry or the strength of our marriages, the intelligence of our public debate, or the integrity of our public officials. It allows neither for the justice in our courts nor for the justness of our dealings with each other. The Gross National Product measures neither our wit nor our courage, neither our wisdom nor our learning, neither our compassion nor our devotion to country. It measures everything, in short, except that which makes life worthwhile.

This is it, baby. This is our garden. Maybe the myth is that we stepped out of the Garden of Eden, but we have the garden of this beautiful planet and this beautiful life. How are you tending it? What seeds do you plant? What do you water?

Henry David Thoreau said, "I do not believe that a plant will grow where there are no seeds, but convince me that you have planted a seed and I'm prepared to expect miracles."

And so our meditation, our spiritual life—it's not about becoming a good meditator. It's about one breath at a time, one plant at a time, one day, one moment. And seeing the goodness in the seeds. As Nelson Mandela said, it never hurts to see the goodness in another person, to acknowledge the goodness in another person. They often act the better because of it.

I see my friend Father Greg Boyle—I've read from his book Tattoos on the Heart—where he started Homeboy Industries in Los Angeles, working with gang kids who would otherwise be thrown away by the system into prison, or shot, or worse. And he sees the secret beauty behind these posturing, tattooed gang kids, who are mostly aggressive because they're trying to save their own lives. He meets them exactly where they are. And he loves them.

This is what you get to do. To shift somehow from the struggle of things and say, "I can water beautiful seeds. I can take a walk and stand still among the trees," as Mary Oliver says. I can do compassion practice. I can stand up for justice. And do it not because you have to, but because you get to.

Change your language from "I have to" to "I get to." I get to tend this garden, even with all the rusted cars and cement, as Alan Chadwick found. Underneath, we can tend this soil and make something really beautiful grow.

There's a story of a woman named Cathrine Sneed. Cathrine Sneed started the Garden Project in San Francisco some years ago. She was concerned about the soul death of so many people in the San Francisco prison system. So she began a project to allow any of those who were incarcerated to help plant a garden. They were invited to grow vegetables in a garden plot behind one of the prison buildings. Through some fundraising, she got them seedlings and mulch, fertilizer, garden tools. To be able to grow a garden with their own hands, to be responsible for its blossoming, to overcome insects and drought—this brought out the best in men who had otherwise been thrown away by the world. And we have so many millions in our racist poverty prison system.

Instead, it changed them. She talks about one macho giant saying, "Don't step on my babies," as she walked through the garden. The prison wardens were amazed by the change. The garden became so important to those who cared for these patches that their lives began to revolve around them. In fact, when the time came for these men to be released from prison, some purposely violated their parole so they could return to their gardens.

This led Cathrine to the inevitable next step: a garden project for ex-prisoners that spread across the Bay Area. Because the harvest she was interested in was not the fruits and vegetables—it was the harvest of the souls and spirits of these men.

I don't think this is impossible in this world. I've talked to you about the better angels of our nature—the book by Steven Pinker, where he details with numbers the decrease in slavery in the world, even though it's still here in painful ways. The decrease in child abuse and child labor exploitation, even though it's still here. The decrease in warfare over the centuries, even though it's still present. The increase in the freedom that women experience, even though it's still terrible in many ways around the world.

When you look at centuries of human life on this earth through the lens of consciousness and care and improvement, you start to see that it's possible for us to change this world. Even though things seem difficult, we can do this.

Now, the idea isn't to make it perfect—to create some ideal house and garden where you get the camera at the right angle and the right time of day and post it online, some showy garden representing an ideal you have. It's a little bit like that New Yorker cartoon showing a couple of fish swimming in the depths of the ocean, one fish talking to the other, saying, "I want the whole thing—the glass bowl, the blue pebbles, the little white castle." You know how we are. We always want something else.

But the point isn't to make a perfect garden. The point is to perfect your love. To take the garden that you've been given and find within yourself the intention to turn it into beauty, to do it with joy.

L.R. Knost writes, "Do not be dismayed by the brokenness of the world. All things break and all things can be mended—not with time, as they say, but with intention. So love intentionally, extravagantly, unconditionally. The broken world waits in darkness for the healing and the light and the water that you can offer to it."

Take a moment and reflect as we start the spring amidst the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows of life. What seeds do you most want to plant? What seeds do you most want to water and nourish? What are the seeds in yourself that are calling out to be watered and nourished—your body and your heart? And what are the seeds in the world that you can care for?

You can do this, oh nobly born. You are the plowman in that sutra. The plowwoman. You are the one who tends this garden of the world.

As Mark Morford wrote long ago, stop thinking all these global crises are all there is. Realize that for every ongoing war and religious outrage and environmental devastation, for every trouble of humanity, there are a thousand counterbalancing acts of staggering generosity and humanity and art and beauty happening all over the world right now, on a breathtaking scale, from flower box to cathedral.

Resist the temptation to drown in fatalism, to shake your head or sigh and throw in the towel. Remember, this is the perfect moment to change the energy—to renew and envision the re-enchantment of the world, to step right up and crank up your personal volume right when it might seem dark or bitter or offensive or acrimonious and conflicted. This is your opening.

Remember mystery. Believe in the seeds that you plant and water as part of a groundswell, a seemingly small but actually very large impending karmic shift, a foundational shift, the beginning of something important and beautiful that can grow with your care.

Pablo Neruda writes, "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring."

It's never too late to start again, wherever you are. This day, you can forgive. You can let go. You can honor the secret beauty and mystery in every being. You can become that loving awareness that is your true nature. For we are the earth becoming conscious. We are consciousness itself—the earth becoming conscious of itself. Such a mystery, and we get to do something really beautiful with it.

This is why you meditate. And this is why we get to come together and hold hands with each other, or as we do even this evening, gather to share our care, our respect, our love.

I know as I finish that I speak of my own intention. I want to become like Ram Dass became at the end of his life. He grew more and more transparent and more and more loving. He loved everything. He said, "Whatever it is, I love it." And he really showed it. "I love this too, and this, and this." On his altar, all the saints gathered together—statues of Mother Mary and Jesus and Buddha and Kuan Yin, passages on the mercy of Allah, Indian saints and saints from all around the world. And there, of course, were Dick Cheney and Donald Trump, and they all had their place. He said, "My love is for all. I love it all." And he would gaze with those eyes like the Buddha standing there, not wanting a single thing, but becoming that loving awareness.

This is who we really are.

Plant beautiful seeds. Love it all.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 112

Meditation: The Sacred Pause

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this guided meditation session, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a practice of mindful, loving awareness. He begins by establishing a dignified yet relaxed posture—seated "like the queen or the king on your throne"—and invites participants to take their seat "as the Buddha that you are under your own tree of enlightenment." This framing reflects the tradition's recognition that awakening is available to all beings in this very life.
>
> The meditation unfolds in stages, beginning with breath awareness as an anchor. Kornfield encourages practitioners to notice the breath wherever it naturally appears—nostrils, throat, or belly—while cultivating qualities of calm and ease. He then introduces a technique for working with strong experiences: when powerful sensations, emotions, or thoughts arise, practitioners are invited to release attention from the breath, turn toward the experience with a bow of welcome, and name it gently ("sad, sad" or "planning, planning") until the wave passes.
>
> The practice culminates in resting as awareness itself—what Kornfield calls "loving awareness." Here the instruction shifts from attending to objects of experience to recognizing oneself as the vast, open field of consciousness in which all phenomena arise and pass. This approach integrates samatha (calm abiding) with elements of insight practice, offering practitioners a direct taste of their "own true nature" and "home." The session demonstrates how formal meditation serves as a sacred pause from daily activity, creating space for both settling the mind and recognizing the spacious awareness that is always present.

Good evening, my friends. It's a pleasure to welcome you here to this Monday night sitting group, class, and community.

Let's begin with a period of meditation of mindful, loving awareness.

Find a way that you can sit that's comfortable, stable, and at ease. Feet flat on the floor if you're in a chair, sitting upright with some sense of alertness, but also gracious—not rigid, but rather like the queen or the king seated on your throne. If you're on a floor or cushion in some other form, make sure that you're steady, stable, and connected to the earth.

Once you take a steady posture, halfway between heaven and earth in this human form, allow your eyes to close gently. You take your seat as the Buddha that you are, under your own tree of enlightenment.

First, take a couple of deeper breaths, just to let go and release whatever is obvious that you're carrying. Notice if there's any obvious tension or tightness in your body, and if you can easily release it, do so. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders drop and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body resting through your buttocks and your feet, connected with the earth as if you had roots into the earth—steady, stable. Let your belly be soft and your breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, rest just here where you are. Just as spring begins, start to feel how your body is breathing itself, taking in the air that covers this earth, the shared breath, how it renews itself with each breath.

In the most simple way, bring your loving awareness to feel the breath wherever it's natural—in the coolness and tingling in the back of the throat, or coolness in the nostrils, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to sense the breath, put your hand on your belly and let it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

As you feel each breath, if you like, you can whisper in the back of your mind "calm" or "ease," or simply invite that quality of peaceful steadiness with this breath. One breath after another, rest the attention on the breath. Let all the other experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath—feelings, thoughts, sounds. Calm and ease with each breath.

For now, when you notice the attention wanders during this first part of the meditation, notice and come back gently to the next breath, three or four breaths. Simply return to ease and calm with a few more breaths.

Receive each breath with a loving awareness. This breath inviting ease, calm. Let the breath breathe itself, short or long, deep or shallow. It has its own rhythms, and you are the loving witness, feeling the waves of the breath.

Let the body relax. Let the mind settle. Let the heart be soft. Feel the breath in the midst of it all.

As you sit quietly, feeling the breath breathe itself, letting the thoughts and feelings and sounds rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath, periodically there will be strong experiences that pull your attention away. A strong body sensation—tension, pain, itching, tingling, coolness, heat—or an emotion like sadness or longing, or excitement or joy, or thoughts like planning and remembering.

When a strong wave pulls you from the breath—not a background wave, but a strong one—let go of your attention to the breath and receive that new experience as if with a bow. Welcome it with the same loving awareness that you've given to the breath. Name it gently. If it's sadness, you can note "sad, sad," or "excitement, excitement," or "planning," or "tingling," or "tension."

As you name the waves, let them wash through body and mind, even if they're strong. Sad, sad. Excited, excited. Restless. Peaceful. Planning. Then, when the wave has passed or you're at ease with it, return back to the breath for a time, settling steady with the breath.

Now you alternate attention between the breath and receiving the strong experiences, naming them gently and feeling the whole wave as you do, until they pass. You are the loving witness of the breath and of the waves of life experience.

This breath, this experience, received with mindful loving awareness, just as it is.

Let the breath come and go as it will. Notice the strong waves of experience. You become the field of loving awareness—steady and open.

If it's helpful, you can sense the loving awareness as a space like the sky, vast and open. You are consciousness itself. You are the loving awareness.

And within this loving awareness arises breath and sounds, sensations, feelings, thoughts—arising and passing like waves in the vast open space of loving awareness. You are the consciousness, the witness to it all. Open. Vast. Silent.

Rest in awareness. Rest in loving awareness. It is your own true nature. It is your home.

CHAPTER 113

Q and A: The Sacred Pause

Jack Kornfield · 20 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Jack Kornfield engages with long-time practitioners on the essential question of how to move from simple awareness to loving awareness. Through a guided experiential exercise with one student, he demonstrates that loving awareness isn't a distant goal but an accessible quality of holding our experience with tenderness—like being embraced by a dear friend.
>
> The discussion touches on a common pitfall in meditation: the desire for deeper concentration and special experiences. Kornfield validates that meditative states of bliss and stillness have their place, but reminds us they are not the ultimate goal since everything changes. True freedom lies in becoming what he calls 'the loving witness'—being at peace with things as they are, embracing both pleasant and difficult experiences with acceptance.
> For those teaching the dharma, Kornfield addresses the tension between using research-backed benefits to attract newcomers while staying true to meditation's deeper purpose. He suggests both dimensions are valid: people may begin practice to relieve stress or find steadiness amid upheaval, and these are legitimate starting points that can naturally open into discovering how to love and be at peace wherever one finds oneself. The session concludes with a touching reflection on the practice of recognizing and naming the beauty in others—a form of generosity that creates connection and reminds people of their inherent worthiness.

So we have a bit of time for questions or your own description of your practice. How are you gardening? What are you working with in gardening yourself, tending your own heart or tending the community in the world around you?

Ernest, if you want to unmute and ask your question.

"Hello, Jack."

Hi, Ernie. Glad to see you. We've known each other for thirty years or more.

"Right, for forty. We're pretty close."

Forty. Yeah. We were young, remember?

"Oh, yeah. We were young and foolish, and now you know how it is."

I know. As Ryokan said, "Last year a foolish monk, this year no change."

"So my question is, I would like some encouragement and ways of moving from awareness to this loving awareness. I mean, I know the phrase, and I've been doing the practice for a long time. So the awareness, more or less. But what are some ways of moving toward this quality of loving awareness? It's a word. I can sort of get it, but I don't think I can really rock it."

We've talked about this, but I'm trying to remember. Do you ever do metta practice? Does it work for you or does it feel artificial?

"It's pretty much artificial, pretty much rote, mechanical kind of thing."

Okay, so close your eyes for a moment and sit here and tune into your body just as you sit. Notice both the sensations, the quality of ease as you sit, and also the places of tension or pain that you have, as in everybody. And keeping your eyes closed, notice it all. Are there areas that are tense or tight or painful, as well as places of relaxation?

"Not particularly."

So your body's pretty much at ease?

"Pretty much, yeah. A little pressure at the bottom of my spine from the way I'm sitting, but that's it."

All right, so first of all, some gratitude to have the body at ease. And as we know with human bodies, they're not always at ease. Now imagine that the most loving person you can think of comes over and puts their arm around your shoulder and says, "I am with you," and just kind of sidles up and holds you in some really kind way as a brother or sister or loving being. Imagine how that feels.

"There's a kind of softness and relaxation across my shoulders. I'm imagining Hamid, by the way."

Lovely. So imagine here's Hamid putting his arm around you with this very big heart that he has, saying, "Ernie," you know, he's really loving. You can feel he loves you. Your shoulders relax, your body. Now feel this. What you're experiencing is loving awareness. You've got it. How does it feel?

"There's a kind of softness, a little bit of tears coming up. Relaxation pretty much along here, kind of an 'oh' sort of quality."

Yeah. And you could do the same for—emotions or things that come up—you can hold them in that same way, or imagine Hameed with you. And then you can extend it in ways to others. So it's a beautiful question, and it was fun to go on the ride with you and enjoy it. Thank you.

Just as an aside, I don't know if you remember back in the early 90s, you were teaching groups of senior students at Spirit Rock. There were two groups of about twenty-five each. I don't know if you recall.

Yes, I do remember that we did that.

Oh, half a dozen of us are still meeting twice a month.

Fantastic. That's beautiful. I'm inspired. And the beautiful thing is that we start to teach one another—we actually help each other. As Thich Nhat Hanh said, the next Buddha is going to be the Sangha. It's actually going to be us all holding hands and connecting hearts. So thank you.

Lovely. Thank you.

Let's take another question.

Hello, Jack. I was really called upon to ask a question before the talk, and I don't really have a specific question. I guess I just wanted to share that I've found lately with my meditation practice a desire and longing and craving for experience—for deeper concentration, for peacefulness. And the thing that I found is that what really matters right now is just to love and to be at ease and to be accepting and to just allow. To allow the good, the bad. It's a whole other way, a whole other feeling. It's just a lot more beautiful.

Thank you for sharing this. You described something so important and wise. There are meditative states and experiences, and they can be beautiful. You can have bliss, or dissolve into light, or your mind becomes so still. These are beautiful things worth experiencing and having. But they're not really the goal, because they don't last. Everything changes. And if you get caught—"I want concentration, I want bliss"—then you struggle.

They're useful to know. They open you, and you realize, "Oh, this heart and mind can be peaceful." But then what you said on top of that, with so much wisdom, is that there is a different way, a different dimension—what I'll call the loving witness, the loving awareness—of loving things as they are. That gives you a freedom wherever you are. So mostly I'm just repeating back what you said as a kind of gratitude and acknowledgment, because it's beautiful. And it's beautiful for everybody to listen to and hear.

Thank you. Thanks for your teachings.

It's a pleasure. Thank you.

So as I build up my own little sangha and start teaching—I'm going to start my fourth cohort on Zoom, and I took your and Tara's teacher training, which was absolutely amazing—the one thing that's interesting is that because of all the research that has come out, there is this trap of getting into meditation as part of a great self-improvement project. It's interesting because at the same time, I want to make it appealing for people. I want to bring in as many people as I can reach. But I want to make it clear that that's not really necessarily the goal, that there is no such thing as a goal. As you said, it's not about becoming a good meditator. So I just wanted to see if you have anything to say about the mishaps of all this research. It's a good way to bring people in, but I don't want to be misleading them.

The beautiful thing is that they're both true. They're not actually opposite. Again, it's like that plowing sutra where the Buddha is already content and absolutely joyful and at peace and free, and he says, "I did my plowing to get here." But where it led him was to this freedom. So in some way, these are different dimensions of practice.

Very often in the beginning, people will come because they're suffering or because they need to release their stress, or they need to find a way to steady themselves in the midst of upheaval, or work with their fear. Those are beautiful and legitimate ways to practice. There's a certain way in which the Four Noble Truths say there is suffering, and it has its causes, and there's an end to that. But that's not the end of the story. The story goes on to say you can have more peace.

So it's a beautiful thing to say. You don't have to say this is the only thing, this is the beginning, or this is where you start. But in fact, the goal of practice really is to learn how to love, or to learn how to be at peace wherever you are, even with all the ups and downs. And we'll get to that too. In some way, you get to offer them—you open the banquet, and it gets even bigger, because all of that is part of it. Those are valuable things for people, worth honoring. And what makes you a good teacher is that you know that beyond any particular change or improvement idea they have, it's actually possible to invite them to a kind of freedom and well-being.

Are you enjoying the teaching?

I'm loving teaching. I think the thing I get snagged on is when I'm trying to get a group together—where can I find the people? Or maybe I feel rejected because I reach out to people and they don't want to do it. I don't want to put that on them. Sometimes people are not ready. Sometimes it's really not what they want to be doing with their time.

Yes. And sometimes it will be a very small group. When Suzuki Roshi first came to San Francisco, he sat with two people. And then this whole beautiful community grew. He talked about it. He said, "If I sit myself, if two people come, that's fine. If ten people come, it's fine."

We have ways in which we judge ourselves. I think about Ram Dass again. Many years ago he said, "I used to go in and there'd be a Ram Dass lecture, and the first thing I would do would be to count the house to see how many people came to see Ram Dass." Am I worthy or something? So that's part of being human. And what you do is just smile and say, "Yeah, but actually you don't know." That one person—if you have a group and there's one or two people—you could change their life. And they could change the world.

You have no idea. So I think what you're doing is really beautiful, and it will grow. It's like gardening—you just keep watering the good seeds and things will grow.

"Hi Jack, thank you for all the wonderful teachings. I've been following you for thirty-five years."

This is what I've been doing. One of the things about getting older is you get less afraid to do what you think you should do. In my heart, my feeling is that everybody is worthy, but most people really don't see their own beauty. And so what my practice has been about, in large part, is trying to have the courage to express to them what I see.

I have worked with people both professionally and as a volunteer, and in everyday life—people who are really quite extraordinary in their way, who have no idea. And in telling them, it's been interesting to see the response. Sometimes there are tears: "Nobody's ever said that." Sometimes it's just seeing that they feel seen and known, and that they don't have to be perfect to be that good.

What brings me some grief is when I see the violence that takes place. I really believe that some of those people who commit it have no idea that they are worthy, and that it comes from that. It's difficult for me sometimes just to calm down and say, "It's okay. You can't get to everybody."

But the other thing is that when you do this, something comes back to you, whether you ask for it or not. It's almost like a heart song—you're both in tune with each other. I think what I would like my practice to continue doing is to keep seeing, to keep looking, to look beyond whatever the norm is. It's like when you love somebody and someone asks you if they're beautiful—your automatic reaction is, "Oh yes." You don't even know what they look like anymore. You see them beyond that.

A lot of what you have taught me over the years is the joy of this, the humor of it and the joy. And I would like to continue that. Even if some people would think it's somewhat Pollyanna-ish, it doesn't matter, because I want to confirm what you said: sometimes you can say it to one person and make such a significant difference that it's worth all the risks you took to put yourself out there. So thank you again, because you've changed my life.

I just want to take a breath. Listening to what you say really touches me. It's beautiful. I can feel how you do that with people and how it shines back and forth—that they shine back to you from it. And then I start to think, "Gosh, I wish there were some people I'd like you to talk to in this world before they do more harm." So that the beauty you see in them could, as you do, actually be known to them too.

What a marvelous thing to do. Like that last question—the idea is not to perfect yourself; it's really to perfect your love.

And I think this is kind of a place where we'll stop tonight, because I can't say anything beyond this. It feels like this is a beautiful place for us all to rest in—to hear you speak of seeing the secret beauty in those around you and then giving the gift of speaking to them, letting them know that. And maybe that's what we can do for one another more than anything: to create true community, to create a community of love on this earth. And then we start to act in different ways and tend to the planet and tend to one another.

So I thank you for that, and so much thanks to everyone who spoke, to all of those of you who attended. Just to begin the spring, to take a pause, and to look around, and then to sense: What is our best intention, our deepest intention? What are the seeds that we are planting and watering? What do we want to water to make things beautiful, joyful?

Thank you all for coming. Thanks for those who spoke. Take good care of yourself, and enjoy the spring amidst it all.

Good night.

And so we pause to look around, to sense what is our best intention, our deepest intention. What are the seeds that we are planting and watering? What do we want to cultivate to make things beautiful, joyful?

Thank you all for coming, and thanks to those who spoke. Take good care of yourselves and enjoy the spring amidst it all.

CHAPTER 114

Joy (Muditā)

Jack Kornfield · 58 min

> In this profound teaching on muditā (sympathetic joy), Jack Kornfield illuminates why joy is not merely pleasant but essential for awakening—one of the seven factors of enlightenment in the Buddha's path. Drawing from the Buddha's instruction to "live in joy, in love, even among those who hate," Kornfield addresses the resistance many practitioners feel toward allowing themselves happiness amidst world suffering.
> Kornfield weaves together the Four Noble Truths with the practice of the brahmavihāras (divine abodes), showing how muditā emerges naturally when we quiet the mind and return to what he calls "the child of the spirit"—our innate capacity for wonder and delight. He recounts the Buddha's pivotal memory before enlightenment: recalling childhood joy under a rose apple tree, which revealed the middle path between grasping and aversion. Through stories of the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu laughing together despite profound suffering, a Maryknoll sister whose crippled hands became instruments of deeper compassion, and a revolutionary activist who chose radical happiness, Kornfield demonstrates that joy and engaged service are not opposites but companions.
> The teaching offers practical wisdom for daily life: that beauty and delight are moral obligations rather than luxuries, that sharing joy multiplies it, and that approaching service from love rather than guilt or anger transforms both giver and receiver. As poet Jack Gilbert writes, "We must have the stubbornness to accept our gladness in the ruthless furnace of this world." Kornfield invites practitioners to touch their own magic moments of childhood wonder, recognizing that this joyful awareness remains accessible in every moment of stillness.

So it's a pleasure to welcome you back after that meditation. A couple of things to say about that practice: for some people it's natural, but for others mudita is actually unfamiliar. They can go to compassion or loving-kindness or a peaceful heart, but joy seems unfamiliar or foreign. It brings up its opposite.

You know, why should I feel joyful? So many terrible things are happening in the world, or to myself. And Mara will come—Mara who tempts the Buddha and attacks the Buddha under the Bodhi tree, saying, "What right do you have to feel this?" And if resistance and difficulty arise, the response is to become curious, to say, "Oh, Mara, what is it that you want to tell me? Are you afraid of joy? What are you afraid of, my friend? Are you judging the joy?" Bring a curious and loving heart, even to the resistance that comes. Even to Mara: may you too be joyful.

Tonight, as usual, I'd like to offer some teachings. They're not so much something for you to remember or take notes on—no exam afterward. They're really a reminder to your heart, to your deeper understanding. And if they touch you in some way or remind you of what's important, beautiful. And if they don't, if they don't seem right in some way, trust that and let them go. Let yourself listen as a meditation and sense what it is that wants to be nourished in yourself.

Here are the instructions from the Buddha speaking of joy. He instructs: Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate. Live in joy, in health, even among the afflicted. Live in joy, in peace, even among the troubled. Look within, be still, quiet the mind, tend the heart. Free from fear and clinging, know the sweet joy of living in the way.

That's a kind of wild instruction—to find joy even among hatred or illness or those who are troubled and in conflict. Let's talk about this.

Last month, when I did the Monday talk, I talked about springtime and tending the garden of the heart, a sense of renewal, and how much we need it because we're still in the middle of the viral pandemic. We're in the middle of the terrible military coup and takeover in Burma and endless wars elsewhere. We're in the middle of the climate crisis and the very deep crisis for racial and economic justice. These are the first noble truths of the Buddha—that there is suffering to be seen and acknowledged. And the noble truth that speaks of the causes: greed, hatred, fear, ignorance. These are the causes of war and racism and climate destruction.

But the beautiful and important thing is that these are not the end of the story. From suffering and greed and hatred and fear, we can also shift our whole identity and find well-being, release, freedom. This is possible for us and for those around us.

"Oh, nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember that inner nobility that was born in you, the fundamental dignity that is who you really are.

A poem from William Stafford called "A Story That Could Be True"—Stafford was one of our great poets:

If you were exchanged in the cradle and your real mother died without telling the story, then no one knows your name. And somewhere in the world your father is lost and needs you, but you are far away. He can never find how true you are, how ready. And when the great winds come and the robberies of the rain, you stand in the corner shivering. The people who go by, you wonder at their calm. They miss the whisper that runs any day in your mind: "Who are you really, wanderer?" And the answer you have to give, no matter how dark and cold the world is around you: Maybe I'm a king.

Maybe, if you were exchanged in the cradle—maybe I'm a king.

Or Rumi, who puts it this way: In springtime, it's all right for a beggar to brag that she's a queen today. And this is us.

We practice mindfulness and compassion, and this allows us to see and tend the world accurately and wisely. Mudita, or joy, is a factor of enlightenment. It's necessary for awakening. More than tending the world, it allows us to appreciate the world. Mudita means joy and shared joy—joy with the joy of life itself.

And of course, I think of the exemplars of joy, like the Dalai Lama. There's this remarkable book that many of you have seen called The Book of Joy, conversations between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Desmond Tutu about why they can be so happy after all the suffering they've seen—apartheid and deaths in South Africa, and the suffering in Tibet with the loss of monasteries and the burning of the culture. And they sit there and they laugh.

People go to hear the Dalai Lama. I don't think they go so much for those remarkable but often somewhat inscrutable Tibetan philosophic teachings that he offers. I think people go by the thousands to see somebody who has suffered and gone through so much yet can still have so much joy. They go to hear him laugh.

He and Tutu in this dialogue are teasing one another and playing. At one point, Tutu tries to take the Dalai Lama's hat off and they wrestle. Then the Dalai Lama says, "Hey, we're supposed to be holy men. The cameras are on—stop that!"

They talk about what's going to happen when they die. The Dalai Lama says, "I suppose when you die, you go to heaven." And Tutu asks, "Well, where are you going to go?" "Maybe hell," says the Dalai Lama. "I thought you were supposed to be reborn," said Tutu. The Dalai Lama replied, "Well, it's not certain. I better be nice to the Chinese, because they're going to pick my next incarnation."

You see them bantering in the midst of all the things they've been through. There is somehow this delight that they carry, one that lights up the room.

But it's not just them. I've been hanging out with my two-and-a-half-year-old grandson. Nini—that's Trudy, my beloved—and I go to visit him. I'm Baba Jack. Nini and Baba Jack come, and I've been bringing balloons, which he likes a lot. I have a whole big pouch of different sizes and colors, ones with strings on them. He will say in his little cute two-year-old voice, "Baba Jack, blow up balloon! Blow up! Blow it up!" So I pick a balloon. "What color?" "Oh, red!" I put it to my mouth and he's watching me, and I start to blow—and his eyes get big and his cheeks puff out. As he watches, it's as if he's trying to blow the balloon at the same time. It gets bigger and bigger and his eyes get bigger and bigger. Then he will say when it's all blown up, "Now fly it!" And I have to let go and let it fly up in the air. Or, "Now, Baba Jack, now pop it!" He gets very excited when the balloon pops. "Now do another one!"

It's just so amazing to see how simple the light can be for a child. This is that child of the spirit that was born into each of us.

Mudita, as part of the Brahma Viharas, as part of the awakened heart, is our capacity to find joy, to feel delight and happiness, rapture, well-being, pleasure. In Thai, it's called jai pong sai, which means a lightness of heart.

Why is it a factor of enlightenment, a necessary element in awakening? Because joy arises with the freedom to step beyond the small and separate sense of self. The enemies to mudita are jealousy—"Do I have as much joy as someone else?"—or comparing, or feeling guilty that I shouldn't feel joy, as if there's not enough joy to go around.

As one of the divine abodes, the abodes of the gods, the quality of joy invites us to openness, to wonder, to mystery. It's said in the mythology that after the Buddha's enlightenment, he shifted away some paces from that great Bodhi tree—you can still go find its granddaughter, this huge tree in the temple in Bodh Gaya, the granddaughter of his tree of awakening, with the giant tree and temple there where you can sit under it. He moved away from his seat under the tree, and for seven days he contemplated the tree with gratitude, simply enjoying the fact that there he was, free now and awake. The tree had held him and cared for him, and how joyful his heart was.

After that, he got up, and for forty-five years he wandered the dusty roads of India, offering the teachings of well-being and freedom of heart and joy wherever he went.

This is how it happens. You find joy, and then you find yourself opening for forty-five years. Or there's Rumi, who wandered around, and his poems are called the Divan, the ocean of poetry—one hundred thousand poems. He didn't write them down. Some of his students were there with him, writing them as he wandered in joy, like the Buddha spreading it across the dusty roads from Afghanistan to Turkey, across the Middle East. Dancing lyrics, joyful spirit, profound peace.

Mudita invites us to open a channel to joy and delight and creativity. Joy arises, like the Buddha sitting under the Bodhi tree, from following the heart's silent source. When we get still, as we did in the meditation, and the mind quiets and the heart opens, we remember: live in joy, even among the troubled. Out of that stillness, there is a silent source of something beautiful that wants to come through every one of us—a tending of the garden, a tending of one another.

As the composer Puccini said, "I've done nothing. I've simply written down what I heard from the gods." Mozart expressed the same understanding—he didn't compose things so much as get quiet, hear the symphony, and write it down as quickly as he could.

Joy arises from following the heart's silent source. And it's uplifting. Whenever we stay connected to our deepest love and our joy arises—whether it's in parenting or building or teaching or healing or making a conscious business or tending the world—when we get quiet and listen more deeply, that innate joy is there within us. The possibility of having a joyful heart is present in every moment.

And it's possible to see joy everywhere. The world in joy. Yes, it has its troubles. Yes, it has its ocean of tears. But it also has unbearable beauty and mystery. As Walt Whitman writes, "A mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels." Just the existence of a being like a little mouse—with its tail and ears and eyes—where does this all come from?

Wrens and warblers. There are all these birds around my house now in spring. We're living on a lagoon as part of the San Francisco Bay, and it's filled with pelicans and Canadian geese and all kinds of birds and ducks. And then I look, and if you look everywhere, there's this amazing life happening. I was hiking up the hills behind Spirit Rock and suddenly saw this bright red bug I'd never seen before in thirty years of hiking in those hills. It was tracking its way across the path, and then there was another one following. I thought, wow, they have their own community, their own life, and I don't even know about it. There are one million different species of beetles—bright beetles and luminous beetles. Of course we might be concerned about climate change and what's happening to the beetles, but to understand it, we first have to see the mystery of them all.

"When the eyes and ears are open, the leaves on the trees become like pages in the holy books," the Sufis say. And in Zen, it's said, "When the temple bell stops, the sound keeps coming out of the flowers." This is mysterious.

If I take my little grandson out to see something marvelous—the ocean or the Grand Canyon—he's as likely to look down and pick up a little red pebble and say, "Baba Jack, look at this amazing pebble!" And there's the Grand Canyon or the ocean behind him. Because everything is amazing to him.

"Oh nobly born," say the Buddhist texts, "remember who you really are, the child of the spirit." Oh nobly born, the one who has the potential to live with an awakened and joyful heart no matter what.

As the mystic Thomas Merton writes, "Life is simple. We're living in a world that is absolutely transparent, and the divine is shining through it all the time. This is not just a fable or a nice story. It is true."

So you ask, where can I find enlightenment? In the Himalayas? In some great temple in Thailand or Japan? And the poet Kabir says, "It is nearer than near."

You know the stories of the astronauts who return from traveling around the Earth or even to the moon—sometimes with considerable danger, unsure whether they'll make it back. When they land, especially those who land back on the Earth, one of the first gestures some of them make is to kneel down and kiss this earth. Because when you're far away up there, circling the Earth in your spacecraft or circling the moon, you see that blue globe that has everything on it. Everything that matters—all the people and art and history and love and community and conflict and beauty and tragedy. Everything that makes the great novels. All of humanity. The sequoia trees and the whales and the polar bears, the noteworthy species and the millions of beetles and insects and worms in the fields, the smell of spring and the coldness of winter. They look and they say, "Oh, I want to go home." They kiss the earth. It's such a miracle to be here.

So awakening is really a shift of perception—to see this with a joyful heart.

Here's Rumi again: "Do not sit long with sadness, my friends. When you go to a garden, do you look at thorns or flowers? Spend more time with roses and jasmine." Yes, there are thorns in this world. Yes, the garden needs to be tended. But do you look at thorns or flowers? Spend more time with roses and jasmine. This is that amazing shift of perception—to see the mystery where you are, where we are.

I remember hearing about a university class in sensory awareness. When it came to exam time, after people had been learning to pay careful attention to their body, to other people, to the circumstances around them, here was the final exam.

You know, there were forty students in a room and a big basket of oranges. Each student was invited to take an orange and sit down and write for twenty minutes what they observed about it—the stippled color and the little dimple here, how it ended, whether it was completely round or had a flat side, what it smelled like, what it felt like under their fingers. All the things that, if you took your time to live with an orange, you could see. And because they'd been training, they really looked, and they wrote.

But that wasn't the conclusion of the exam. That was only half of it.

The second part: the oranges were collected and placed in a big bowl, mixed up, and then set out around that bowl on the counter. You had to go up and find your orange and see how long it took. It wasn't a race, but an invitation. And as the story was told to me, when people found their orange—which they did, because they'd looked so closely—it was almost like, "Oh, I found my orange! I found my friend." There's something joyful about being present for every small thing in life as it presents itself.

André Gide says, "Know that joy is rare, and more difficult and more important than sadness. And once you make this discovery, you must embrace joy as a moral obligation."

Your attention, your care, your mindfulness—all these things we've been teaching over the years—is an invitation to this factor of enlightenment. Tutu, the Dalai Lama, whoever you think of: a joyful heart. Those who are awakened.

But what about the ocean of tears? What about the First Noble Truth?

I was sitting at a very small retreat for teachers some years ago with Thich Nhat Hanh, and I may have told this story in recent months. As he was teaching, he talked about smiling, putting a little Buddhist half-smile on your face. I felt a tremendous sadness, a kind of grief, even though I was trying to smile as he spoke of the half-smile.

Then we sat down and had lunch, just a small handful of us. I was confused. I said to him, "Thầy"—the word for teacher, respectfully—"I was in there and you said for us to smile, but I felt this great grief. I don't know if it was my sadness or yours."

He looked at me for a time, gazed at me, and then shook his head. He said, "I've seen so much suffering." I'm sure he was referring, among other things, to all the work he did in the School for Social Services that he created with young people during the Vietnam War—how half the young people who came to follow him and be with him and do this beautiful peacemaking in the middle of war, how half of them were killed. If you can imagine bringing young people together and then having them killed.

And he said, "I've seen so much suffering. I have to teach joy."

Here's a poem I find magnificent, though it's tough also, demanding. It's by Jack Gilbert, one of our great poetic masters who died in recent years. Listen to it:

Sorrow everywhere. Slaughter everywhere. If babies are not starving someplace, they're starving somewhere else, with flies in their nostrils. But we enjoy our lives because that's what the gods want as well. Otherwise the mornings before summer dawn would not be made so fine. The Bengal tiger would not be fashioned orange and black so miraculously well. The poor women at the fountain are laughing together between the suffering they've known and the awfulness in their future, smiling and laughing while somebody in the village is very sick. If we deny our happiness, resist our satisfaction, we lessen the importance of their deprivation. We must risk delight. We can do without pleasure seeking, but not delight, not enjoyment. We must have the stubbornness to accept our gladness in the ruthless furnace of this world. To make injustice the only measure of our attention is to praise the devil. If the locomotive of the Lord runs us down, we should give thanks that the end had magnitude. We must admit that there will be music despite everything.

If we deny our happiness, resist our satisfaction, we lessen the importance of their deprivation. We must have the stubbornness to accept our gladness in the ruthless furnace of this world. To make injustice the only measure of our attention is to praise the devil.

It's a really powerful statement and a call to the heart—to live like Tutu and the Dalai Lama and those great joyful beings, the exemplars of what's possible.

This is the child of the spirit that was born in each of you, as we touched in that opening meditation. Every being—oh nobly born—is born with an innocence, and the child of the spirit can see with eyes of joy.

In the story, the archetypal history of the Buddha, as he was seeking enlightenment, struggling and fasting and doing all kinds of ascetic practices that got him nowhere in the long run—just skinnier and more weary of fighting against himself—he sat one day against a tree quietly, and all of a sudden a memory arose in him, an insight. One of the most important insights, actually part of the opening of enlightenment for him.

He remembered being in his father's garden, in his father's field, during the spring plowing festival. His father being a local king, there he was, seated under a rose apple tree, watching the festivities and the beginning of the planting of seeds, the plowing of the fields. And as he did, a huge contentment came over him. As he closed his eyes, he felt this innate joy as a child, this wonder and well-being, and his mind became silent and absorbed in joy and peace.

The Buddha remembered this.

He thought, "I've been doing the wrong thing. I've been fighting against myself. I forgot that joy and well-being is in me already, is my birthright." And this was the realization of what he later—shortly later, in the next step of his enlightenment—called the middle path: to let go of fighting against the world on one side and to let go of grasping on the other, but to be present with that deep stillness and innocence and presence of a child.

Let yourself reflect for a moment on those magic moments of your own childhood, what that was like when the world was new, when morning has broken like the first morning, to quote that Cat Stevens passage, or maybe it's a biblical passage. Remember it, because it's in you.

When I remember the day that I got let out of the hospital, I was eight years old and I'd had polio and was paralyzed and couldn't walk. And somehow, miraculously, the paralysis lifted. I was looking out of the window of my hospital room, quite scared because of all these doctors and priests and everybody who came to visit me, and the spinal taps with this horse needle, and just all kinds of terrible things. I just wanted to be able to walk again. I saw this green patch of grass out my window, and then my movement came back. I was no longer paralyzed. I got home and I ran to the park next to our house and I tumbled over and over and I put my face in the grass and I just became so happy.

What were your magic moments? They were there. They had to be. No matter what you went through, the child of the spirit is indomitable. It's innate. It's who you are.

So there's a longing in everyone for this beauty, this joy, this love, and it changes everything when we tune into it.

There was a remarkable experiment, if you will, done in London some years ago in a neighborhood that was poor and rundown, where there was a lot of crime. And of course, as you can imagine, sadly, that was the result as well of economic injustice and racism and all these kinds of things that are striking children who are born in that neighborhood who are innocent, like every child saying, "Why is this happening?" Why don't we tend those children? We ask ourselves, that's what's needed now—that every child be born and that spirit in them be honored.

But in this strange kind of social experiment or study, two parallel streets, boulevards, about eight blocks apart, high crime, great poverty—the crime comes because there's nothing. On one of these streets, they fixed the street lights and added more to them. They freshly painted the lines on the street. They swept the street. They sent street sweepers and cleaners once a week. They repainted things. They repotted the plants that were supposed to be along the street, and they made it more beautiful. They did nothing else.

The neighborhood was the same. The oppression was the same, enough to break your heart. The economic injustice, the racism, all there. But something remarkable happened. The level of crime on the street that was made beautiful dropped by half. And I would think that it's because beauty reminded people that they could care about themselves and one another even in the suffering. Whether they knew it or not—nothing was told to anybody, it just was done—there's a longing, even unconsciously, to live with beauty.

It turns out that beauty comes alive, joy comes alive when it's shared. That's why mudita is called shared joy.

I remember when my daughter was young, when the Golden Gate Bridge still took tolls before there were the automatic electronic fast track. One of our favorite things was we'd go over the Golden Gate Bridge regularly, and she said, "Daddy, pay for the car behind us." You remember when that was fashionable? So I'd go to the toll booth and I'd give my whatever it was, five, six dollars, and I'd say, "Oh, here, here's for the car behind us." Then we'd go through and she'd say, "Go slow, daddy." So I wouldn't speed up a lot, and she'd watch the next car go through and the smile on the driver's face. They'd be told, "Oh, the car in front of you paid for you." Sometimes she would wave at them or they'd wave at us. And it brought so much joy, that simple action.

You know, recently in Texas, there was that huge storm that put out the electricity and power and travel for that ice storm and cold storm for almost a week or longer.

And in Plano, Texas, there was a restaurant called Bella Italiano run by Ari and Benere Isufash. I think he was from Kosovo, but it was an Italian restaurant—perhaps some kindred spirit connecting Kosovo and Italy. People were hungry and cold. They couldn't cook, couldn't heat themselves. And what they did at this restaurant, at Bella Italiano, was say, "Come and get food for free." They served hundreds of meals—huge pots of spaghetti sauce and spaghetti, huge trays of lasagna. They said, "People are hungry, they can't cook food, come and eat." And you can imagine, it wasn't just the joy of those families and those children, by the hundreds. It illuminated the whole community.

When we're still and let go of our fears and self-absorption, our plans and our tears, when our heart becomes peaceful in the mystery, then our actions and responses become joyful and virtuous. Like a lovely flower, said the Buddha, bright but scentless, are the fine but empty words of one who does not mean what they say. But like a bright and fragrant flower, the fine and truthful words are like perfume that rises to the gods. There's something so beautiful in caring for one another, in the shared joy and in the integrity of taking care of one another. And that's in you from the beginning.

Albert Camus says a person's life is a slow trek to reclaim those moments in their childhood when their heart first opened. I think at best, meditation is exactly that. It's an invitation to quiet the mind, to come back to a place of inner well-being or peace or wholeness in the midst of things, to have the loving awareness—the mindful, loving awareness—big enough to hold the ocean of tears and the unbearable beauty. And then to come to rest in this mystery of human incarnation.

This longing for beauty is there in everyone, irrespective of caste or race or creed or level in society, wherever you are. You can be in prison and it's still there. Oh nobly born, this is your true nature, and the heart shines.

About a week or so ago, I was part of a celebration event and conversation that I helped to foster for an organization called Combatants for Peace. It was comprised of former combatants from Palestine and Israel. In our group where so many people came to watch was Tully, who'd been an Israeli commando and commandant who had a whole battalion under him, and Osama, who'd been a Palestinian freedom fighter. All of them had seen battles where people were killed, had participated in it. And somehow they'd come to the place where we cannot keep killing children. We cannot kill one another on a land that we both live upon and revere. And you could feel the dignity, the moral authority they had to say, "Yes, we have seen this, we have participated, and we will no longer do so." It was really inspiring because it was their nobility shining.

In Japan, there is an art called kintsugi. And you may have heard of it. Kintsugi is the art of taking something that's broken—initially it might have been a beautiful tea cup or tea bowl or teapot, some piece of ceramic, though it can be other things—and if it falls and breaks, instead of throwing it away, lovingly putting it back together with gold filling in the cracks. The gold filling in the cracks shows that as it's all put back together, it has a new kind of wholeness. And as Leonard Cohen said, the cracks are where the light comes in.

In a book by Chris Cleave called Little Bee, he talks about kintsugi—not just as the Japanese craft for cups, but of course for us. "I ask you right here, please, to agree with me that a scar is never ugly. That is what the scar makers want us to think. But you and I, we must make an agreement to defy them. We must see all scars as beauty, okay? This will be our secret." Because he'd been through a lot in his life. He says, "Because take it from me, a scar does not form on the dying. A scar means I survived." And you can feel the life force in that poem and the meaning. Growing strong in the broken places is the simple way of saying it. The nobility of the heart, no matter what we've been through.

A couple more stories to tell you as we wend our way toward the end of this teaching. This is from one of my favorite books ever, called How Can I Help? by Ram Dass and Paul Gorman, full of gorgeous stories of service and love. It's about a nun who some years ago had volunteered as a Maryknoll sister to go and be a teacher in Peru, to go to some villages and towns where there weren't many teachers, to serve as a teacher for children because she'd taken vows as a sister to serve the world. But it was a very high village, at 13,500 feet. She said, "And then the illness happened."

Rheumatoid arthritis came, and more and more it began to cripple her hands and cripple her knees. The doctor said it was partly because of the altitude and that there was nothing to do about it. She went to see more doctors in Peru and Panama, and gradually it became clear that she needed to come back to the States for treatment.

She got good care. The doctors helped her somewhat, but it was quite clear that she couldn't go back high up in the mountains. She wanted to go back. She wept. She struggled. Self-pity, anger, discouragement, doubt. She wouldn't give up. Every day it seemed like she was losing. She had surgery at the Mayo Clinic. She did a great deal of prayer.

And then one day she realized: I can't go there as I had. I had to use my crippled hands in a different way. Maybe these crippled hands, these broken and cracked hands, could become sacred. They would be the compassionate hands of Jesus as much as the hands of the doctors and nurses that tended me.

So she went back and returned to Peru at a much lower altitude. Almost everything had changed. Most importantly, her attitude toward the people she was working with. She could feel their terrible poverty and pain in a whole new way from what she'd been through. In fact, it seemed she was seeing it for the first time. She wasn't there as a kind of white savior, a colonialist nun-teacher. She could really feel their poverty, how she'd rushed around trying to save people's problems, solve them without really seeing them —not seeing the pain in their faces, the insecure eyes, the nervous hands, all the expressions of struggle and beauty in their lives. It was only when suffering had actually touched her that she began to feel their conditions.

They said to her, "You're the same person you were before, but somehow you've changed." And her ministry changed. It became the ministry of walking together. She became more sensitive and maybe humble.

So then she started to work with what was around her. She began to work with those who were handicapped—but in Peru, handicapped children were hidden away. They were seen in some way as a reflection of their parents who might have done something bad or wrong. They were hidden.

She thinks of Juan, a polio victim at three who'd been hidden by his family in their small mud-brick house until they discovered him at age eight. His brother Julio took them home to see him one day. There was Juan, his twisted legs underneath him, scooting around a small dirt patio on a circular piece of rubber. His mother was suspicious and didn't want them to stay. A handicapped child meant she was being punished for something. She was ashamed.

And in this, you can feel the pain of every disabled person who's judged by others—how much sorrow that brings, and how unnecessary, to not look in their eyes and see them.

So they returned on several occasions to visit Juan. One time they found him all alone. His family, with the rest of the town, had gone to a religious procession. Of course, he'd never seen one. So they borrowed a bicycle, put Juan on it, and joined in the procession itself. It was his first time outside the house, the first time he'd looked at people from a level higher than the ground, his first procession. His parents were momentarily annoyed, but their attitude changed gradually.

And when they thought it right to raise the idea, they asked at the next town meeting if they could raise money to send Juan to Lima for physical therapy. Everyone liked the idea, and Juan went off to the big city. He had a long, hard struggle with much pain and effort, but one day he returned to the village. He was using braces and a cane. It was very hard for him to do, but as he began to walk down the streets to his home, people came out of their homes. They appeared from all over. They were cheering and clapping and followed him all the way home. It was so wonderful. It was Juan's second procession.

It's never too late to be joyful, to take even that which is pained and broken—like kintsugi—and say, let's let something more beautiful shine through it in our life, in our hearts.

And there was a woman in the group—Deborah was teaching meditation, compassion, and mindfulness—who'd had terrible trauma in her childhood, grown up in circumstances where there was addiction, people in and out of prison, other kinds of abuse. Somehow she survived it, got herself out of it, and managed to get herself through high school. But she became bitter.

And then she decided, "I have to change this world." She went from high school to community college and became an activist. She said, "I became a radical—radical for justice, radical for women, radical for those who'd been traumatized. I was a revolutionary." She became a mother with a couple of young children, and she was a revolutionary for parents, a radical fighting for all the things that mattered.

But she was also exhausted when she came to that retreat, to that group and those teachings. After some weeks of practicing mindful, loving awareness, of coming back home to herself, when people were asked in that circle what they were learning when they got quiet—what happened when they practiced compassion toward themselves and others, what happened when they tended their heart, when they looked at who they are and who they wanted to be—she raised her hand.

"I've been a radical," she said. "I got out of the worst circumstances. I got myself an education. I worked for the rights of women and the disabled. I worked for the rights of those who are poor, for children. I was a revolutionary and a radical." She paused. "And now—now I'm going to do something really radical. I'm going to let myself be happy."

After all that fight and struggle, letting herself get quiet and practice as you have, as we did tonight, she touched that deep stream the Buddha invites us into. Live in joy and love and peace, even amidst the trouble and turmoil. Live in the sweet joy of your own heart, the sweet joy of the way.

What would it be like for you to be joyful? To be really radical in your life, to own your joy? When you go into refugee camps, if you go depressed, it doesn't help those people you work with or support or care for or stand as an ally with. It's radical to be joyful. And joy doesn't mean we don't tend to the world. In fact, it allows us to show up with an open heart and be in solidarity, to stand up with others. It's called shared joy—for justice, racial justice, economic justice. Stand up for the earth. Stand up for the innocence and beauty of every child, for the dignity of every adult.

Think of a person who's the most cheerful and good-hearted you know. You could be like them. You could be.

When the great environmentalist and poet Gary Snyder was asked about climate change—remember, fifty years ago he won the Pulitzer Prize for Turtle Island. He was one of the prescient early voices for bioregionalism and caring for the climate. Someone said, "Gary, the world is falling apart. The oceans are rising. The temperature is getting hotter. The storms are getting bigger. There's so much we haven't learned to stop. What do we do? What advice do you have? You've been doing this for fifty years and you're a Zen elder as well. Tell us, please—how do we do this?"

Gary looked back and said simply, "Don't feel guilty. If you feel guilty, it's not a healthy way to operate. Don't do it out of guilt. Don't do it out of anger. Don't do it out of fear. Those are the very energies—fear and anger and guilt—that have caused the problems between humans. If you're going to save the earth, if you're going to care for it, do it because you love it." Let that be the force—love and joy.

One last poem for you, called "Camas Lilies":

Consider the lilies of the field, the blue banks of camas opening into acres of sky along the road, with the longing to lie down and be washed by that beauty. Of bathing—if you knew their usefulness, how the natives ground their bulbs for flour, how the settlers' hogs uprooted them, grunting in gleeful oblivion as the flowers fell.

And you—what of your rushed and useful life? Imagine setting it all down: papers, plans, appointments, everything. Leaving only a note: "Gone to the fields to be lovely. Be back when I'm through blooming."

Even now, unneeded and uneaten, the camas lilies gaze out above the grass from their tender blue eyes.

Even in sleep, your life will shine. Make no mistake, of course your work will always matter. Yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

So let's sit together. And we sit in the tenderness of joy, the sweet tenderness of joy of this mysterious life.

Meditation: Joy (Muditā) | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 29 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through the cultivation of muditā—one of the four brahmavihāras or divine abodes of the awakened heart. The practice begins with establishing a stable, gracious posture and softening the body from face to belly, allowing the heart to become receptive and tender.
>
> The meditation unfolds through a progressive opening to joy: first visualizing someone dear and imagining their happiest childhood moments—running, laughing, playing—then extending wishes for their joy to increase and its causes to grow stronger. This expands to include additional loved ones, and beautifully turns reflexive as practitioners receive these same wishes from those they've blessed, placing a hand on the heart to truly take in the well-wishing for themselves.
>
> Kornfield introduces the evocative image of the heart as a lighthouse or beacon, radiating joy in all directions to humans and non-humans alike across the earth. Throughout, he emphasizes maintaining a gentle half-smile as an embodied expression of muditā. The teaching reminds us that shared joy naturally uplifts our own hearts—that in wishing happiness for others, we open ourselves to the sweetness of joy. Kornfield encourages practitioners to make this practice their own, finding words and images that genuinely invite the heart to open.

Let's begin with some meditation.

Please find a way to sit, as I will, that is stable and comfortable and at ease—where your body can rest on the earth with some sense of alertness, but also a graciousness, like the king or the queen on the throne. You take your seat.

When you're ready for this time, let your eyes close gently, or at least lower your gaze considerably, and direct your attention—this gift of awareness—to notice just now, this moment, this present moment, the state of your body and mind and heart. Perhaps take a couple of very deep, long breaths in and out, and with each breath, release whatever obvious tension or tightness you can.

Now let's invite a deeper level of opening. Bring your attention to your eyes and face, and let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let your shoulders relax and your arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body now—buttocks and feet, the heaviness of gravity pulling you. Since you are met completely by the earth, by the chair, the floor, wherever you are, know that you are held by the earth. You can let go and be stable and steady just where you are on this earth in this moment, like a great tree. Let your belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness and compassion and tenderness.

Now, with this embodied presence, let's shift our attention. Tonight, the guided meditation will be one of muditā, or joy. We could pay attention more fully to our own breath and body and allow things to open and bloom like a flower with a kind attention—and you may be called to do that tonight on your own or at another time. For this evening, joy will be the topic, the theme, the energy.

As you sit now, gently letting the breath breathe itself and holding all the dimensions of your humanity—the ups and downs, the gain and loss—hold it all with a gracious heart.

Here is how to begin the practice of muditā, or shared joy. Let yourself think of someone who you care about quite a lot naturally, where there isn't a lot of conflict or difficulty. Picture them, remember them, see them in your mind's eye or hold them in your heart. When you think of this person for whom you naturally have affection, care, love, notice what happens as you bring them into your mind and heart. Perhaps a little half smile comes to your lips to see them.

Now let yourself imagine and picture their happiest moment as a child—running, tickling, laughing, playing. Let yourself see or feel or imagine that child of the spirit. Every child has had it, no matter how difficult the upbringing. See their joyful moments, their happiest time.

As you sense and envision the most joyful moments of their childhood—just the simplicity of running and laughing, playing—begin to wish them well:

May you be joyful.
May you remember that child of the spirit that was born in you.
May your joy increase.
And may the causes for happiness and joy grow stronger in your life.

May you remember your joy.
May you be joyful, happy.
May you remember the child of the spirit that was born in you.

May your joy increase day by day, year by year.
And may the causes for your joy and wellbeing and happiness grow strong.
May you live in joy.

Notice what it's like to invite the quality of joy, of shared joy, with this person you care about—how it uplifts your own heart, how it opens you to joy.

Now pick another person that you care about, someone easy to think of and not conflicted. Visualize them, remember them. Bring them into your mind's eye and your heart. Again, with a little half smile, the delight of seeing them, about to wish them joy.

As you see them, picture again their happiest moment as a child—laughing, playing, running, teasing, tickling, joyful, delighted. The joy that was born in them.

May you be joyful.
May you remember your joy, the child of the spirit born in you.
And as the years go on, may your joy increase.

And may the causes for your happiness, well-being, and great joy increase and grow strong. See them as joyful.

And again, keeping the half smile on the lips, imagine these two dear ones, ones you care about, now gazing back at you. See their eyes looking at you, smiling. They wish the same for you. They see you with their eyes and their heart.

And they say, "Do you remember your best moments as a child? Laughing, playing, running, delighting. You can remember."

And they gaze at you and say, "May you be joyful." Take it in—their wish is for you. They say, "May you remember your joyful spirit. May your joy increase over the years. And may the causes for your happiness and well-being and joy grow strong."

Here are these two gazing at you, wishing you so well, smiling with you. And you put your hand on your heart and you receive it and wish for yourself: May I be joyful. May I remember the joyful spirit born into me, the child of the spirit. And may the joy of my heart increase over the years. And may the causes of happiness and well-being and joy grow stronger in my life.

Rest in this field of joy—of these two that you love or care for and their care for you. Breathe gently in the space of joy. Feel it in your body and in your heart and mind, the sweetness of joy.

Now let yourself think of another person or two to whom you want to share and send the mudita of joy, of well-wishing. You'll know who. Let another person come to heart and mind. As you picture and remember and think of them, see them as a child—their best day, their most joyful spirit, their happiest time laughing and playing—and extend the well-wishing of joy: May you too be joyful. May you remember this spirit of joy born into you. And may your joy increase over the years. And may the causes for happiness and well-being and joy grow strong in your life so you live well and enjoy.

The birds are singing along with us their songs of joy and happiness, springtime.

Now let yourself imagine that your heart is like a lighthouse, a beacon, and you can shine from joy out with a half smile on your lips. The well-being of joy radiates in every direction to touch the beings around—yes, the birds and the animals, and yes, the humans, young and old and middle, all the human beings in their different stages of life—with this beautiful well-wishing: May you be joyful. May you remember your joyful spirit.

Send out across the world to your loved ones and friends, to beings across the earth, human and non-human: May your joy increase over the years. And may the causes for happiness and well-being and joy grow stronger and stronger in your life.

Sit now silently for a time. Radiate joy with a half smile on your lips and the well-wishing in every direction, or let different people come to mind and see their child of the spirit. Become the beacon of joy as you breathe in and out gently, as you rest in the joyful heart.

May you be joyful. May you remember your joyful spirit. May your joy increase over the years. And may all the causes for your happiness and well-being and joy grow stronger. May you live with a joyful spirit and a joyful heart.

When you're ready, let your eyes open gently.

This is one of the Brahmavihara, the divine abode practices—the practices of the awakened heart, shared joy. Remember it, use it, practice it when you will. Play with it, make it your own. Sometimes these words aren't the right ones, and you have to find that which invites your heart and your joy to open. It's there for you. We'll talk more about it in a little bit.

CHAPTER 116

Q&A: Joy (Muditā) | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 18 min

> In this intimate Monday night Q&A session, Jack Kornfield engages in real-time dialogue with practitioners facing profound challenges. The talk centers on how muditā (sympathetic joy) can be accessed even amid fear, illness, and confrontation with mortality. Through guided meditation and direct inquiry, Kornfield helps a practitioner working through a health crisis discover that the same capacity that allowed her to move through layers of remorse to reconciliation can also hold the fear of death.
> Kornfield draws on the Buddha's encounter with Māra under the Bodhi tree as a template for meeting our own inner demons. Rather than fleeing from fear, he guides practitioners to acknowledge Māra's presence with the words "I see you, Māra"—recognizing that fear, while powerful, is not our deepest identity. He emphasizes that loving awareness is vast enough to hold all experiences, including the most terrifying ones. The teaching echoes Thích Nhất Hạnh's instruction to "serve Māra some tea" rather than resist or flee.
> A second dialogue explores intergenerational trauma, as a practitioner shares the weight of carrying his German parents' World War II experiences. Kornfield introduces the concept of epigenetics—how trauma passes through generations—while reminding him that we are "only German on our parents' side." Our deeper nature is the "nobly born" awareness that can witness suffering without being consumed by it. The session concludes with practical wisdom: rather than trying to fix the entire world, we can mend the fabric of our immediate community through simple, reliable acts of kindness—and that is enough.

Let's have a little conversation. We'll take a few questions or dialogues. What's on your heart? What has this touched in you? What is it that you'd like to open or bring forth—your experience, your questions?

Kristen: When you asked what it would look like for us if we embodied our joy, I think for me it has something to do with being less afraid of death. I'm going through a complex kind of health crisis, and there's a lot of fear. I have had this experience on retreat before—kind of unrelated, but an experience of entering into really just layers and layers and layers of remorse, and feeling so much joy in the remorse. It was deeply painful but very beautiful. I feel like for me, if I had this kind of trust that I can enter fully into the fear that I'm feeling, it would be very freeing. I just wondered if you had any reflections or reinforcement for that.

First of all, thank you for the realness of your question. Already it has so much wisdom in it, because there you were on retreat and you touched a place where you went through the remorse itself to a place of acceptance in the heart of joy—to say, all right, I can be with this. You remember that you did that. And it's pretty amazing that you could, because people run away from that.

So now Mara has come, like Mara does under the Bodhi tree, and says, "Okay, baby, you dealt with remorse. I'm going to give you a bigger one. How about death?" Right? You're sick anyway. You're frightened. "I'm going to come as fear."

So close your eyes for a moment. Take a couple of breaths and feel the tenderness that's there in you. Even as you describe and remember going through those layers of remorse until you came to a place of joy—what did that joy feel like? Keep your eyes closed. Can you say?

Kristen: Oh, yeah. It felt like reconciliation. It felt like a return to...

Stay with it. Keep your eyes closed. You said this remorse felt like—use that word again.

Kristen: It felt like reconciliation.

Yes, like reconciliation. All right, now close your eyes one more time. And feel that reconciliation. Even for all the regret and all the remorse, you have that.

And now Mara comes and says, "Okay, I'm going to show you death now. Your body—it's going to grow old at some point. You're going to have to face death. That's going to happen. It happens to everyone. So I'm going to try and scare you."

And you feel Mara coming, saying, "Oh, it's scary, it's scary."

And now you remember. You say, "I see you, Mara. I see you trying to scare me. But I remember the reconciliation. I remember how I can go through all of this and find a joy anyway."

Remember what that feels like in your body. And notice what it's like when Mara comes and tries to scare you. What do you see? What do you feel?

When Mara is present, there's so much closing. And there's a desire to flee myself, just run away.

Yes, natural. Mara scares you. "I want to run away. It's too painful." You say, "Mara, you're really scary. I want to run away from you."

But now you're like the Buddha who sat there, who felt the reconciliation and the joy of going through everything difficult. And now Mara's saying, "All right, I'm upping the game."

And you say, "I see you, Mara. I feel you. The fear is hard. It's scary. I see the closing and the clinging." You notice all that with a kind heart. "And I'm not going to abandon my kindness. I can even have kindness for you, Mara. We're in this together."

Bring in the whole feeling of compassion for your humanity and all you're going through—and the deep knowledge that when you go through the remorse and the pain and the fear that Mara presents, the loving awareness that you are can hold it all. Feel it. Stay with it.

How are you doing with it?

I'm grateful that you said this thing about Mara upping the ante, because I can see how this could be a gift for me—to encounter some aspects of reality more fearlessly, more directly.

We all have to do it. Mara comes to everyone. He wasn't just in India 2,500 or 2,600 years ago. He happens to live in Des Moines, and Marin County, and in Plano, Texas. Mara gets around.

And Mara will come and say, "I'm going to scare you." And you say—this is what the Buddha said when Mara appeared—"I see you, Mara. I see your stories. I feel you. I feel your fear, your anger, all those stories that you tell. I see who you are."

But that place you found in yourself can say, "I see you, and I know something deeper."

You know this—deeper than remorse. And you already found it. I trust that you know this.

Yes, you lose it. That's fine. We all lose it. Everybody loses it. But it doesn't go away. It's like the joy—it's there underneath.

So live your days. And Mara will come. And as Thich Nhat Hanh says, serve Mara some tea.

Say, "All right, I know you come around regularly, and you're scary. You put on your scary costume, and death is terrifying. But who I am is the awakened one. I'm the one who knows that yes, those stories are just stories, and my heart is big enough to hold all of this."

It's a fun practice. I mean, it's very hard and painful—you're sick, and you're thinking, "I might die," and Mara comes. But you're not dying right now. You might as well have a good time while you can.

Let me share one more question, from Stephen.

"Hi, Jack. I guess first of all, I just want to thank you. You've been my teacher for twenty years, and I really thank you. And even tonight, it's like every time there's a new opening.

"My question was kind of answered before it got to me, but I'll share. My parents came from Germany right after the war, and my father—I grew up with all these stories of just the terrible destruction and inhumanity. And the terrible guilt of not knowing what to do, or what else he could have done.

"It's plagued me in a couple of ways. One is this feeling that I should be more engaged, that there are all these horrible things in the world and I should know about them and be involved. And at the same time, I get so overwhelmed with rage and sadness and everything. I want to continue my spiritual growth, and for so long it seemed like I needed to put those two together, but they seemed diametrically opposite—like I couldn't do both.

"I just got off of a twenty-eight-day retreat, and the nun who led it said one of the things you need to do is become harmless, helpful, kind, and reliable. And that starts in your own heart, with yourself. So during this retreat, it was about always coming back and asking, 'How can you be there for yourself?'

"That started a process. I used to play this game from my father, I guess—after all the things he lost—this game of 'What can't they take away from me?' And during the retreat, it was like every longing, every everything—it was like, 'Okay, they can take that too. They can take that too.' It got to the point where I was sitting there asking, 'What if I can't move my body anymore?' And just asking, 'Can I still make this a friendly place?' Something you said tonight, in this latest answer, really opened something. I feel like I got that last little bit—this thing of joy, that when I don't know what else to do, to look for that. So I really want to thank you."

There's so much beauty in what you describe. And as you said, you've in some way answered the very thing that you wrestle with. Let me add a couple of things, just like icing on your good cake.

First, you know that you carry the epigenetics of World War II. It's in your cells and in your body in ways that are passed on. And now neuroscience and genetics shows that.

So that's part of the suffering that you carry. But then, as Ram Dass said—and I often tell this story because he was asked about being Jewish—he said at some point, "Yeah, but remember, I'm only Jewish on my parents' side." And you're only German on your parents' side. But the other side of you is the nobly born, the one who knows, the carrier of wisdom that you're finding now in yourself.

So it's not that you don't have that. The epigenetics brings you the rage and overwhelm. You feel all the stuff that was there—you can't not. But it's not who you are. That's only your parents' side, not the nobility, the true side that you are.

And then there's that teaching you mentioned from this retreat about being helpful and kind and harmless to people, and reliable. We get overwhelmed when we think of all the sufferings in the world. But to think that you have to change them—for any of us, that would be kind of egotistical. "I'm going to fix the world." Damn, I can just barely fix dinner for my wife in time, and now I'm supposed to fix the whole world?

So instead, close your eyes just for a minute. Let yourself think or imagine some small thing—you may be doing it already, or you could—helping at a local soup kitchen, or extending your help to people standing in line to get vaccinated as a volunteer, or attending something. Let yourself imagine that you could do something, that you could reach out your hand and mend the fabric of the community around you. Notice what happens when you reflect in this way. It's very simple. What do you notice?

"An opening, an opening in my heart, and a voice that says, 'Just enough.'"

Just enough. Yeah, it doesn't have to be the whole world. It can be your neighbors. It can be in your community. Reliable, kind at heart. If human beings do that, it changes the world. You change the world one gesture at a time, just as you've described. You already understand. This great Zen master I studied with, Daesung Sunim, this Korean Zen master—sometimes he would look at us and say, "You already understand." And what you've said is so beautiful. You're just remembering that you're only German on your parents' side, and something else knows a lot more. So thank you for that beautiful teaching in your question.

And with this, I think we will call the evening to a close. You've all been a very faithful and kind and attentive group of meditators. I know you well, and I feel your appreciation and love, and the love for one another. Some of you are on Zoom, and you can look in the tiles and see the other people. Send them a little metta and love. Look at their eyes and wish them well. May the child of the spirit be well. And then send it out, because there are people watching on YouTube and Facebook—lots and lots of people. Now you get to send that spirit of joy. May you be joyful in the midst of it all. May your joy increase. May you be truly happy.

Let that sense of open-heartedness go in every direction. You're the beacon of it. You get to choose joy. And the beautiful thing is that we can garden the heart. We can grow what we tend to, and we can become that. This is part of what it means to awaken.

So thank you for your kind attention.

You can wave goodbye or send metta or blessings to one another.

And stay with us. Stay with the joy or beauty, whatever touched you. Keep it, and bring it alive in the days and weeks ahead.

Thank you, and good night to you all.

CHAPTER 117

The Compassionate Heart

Jack Kornfield · 54 min

> In this heartfelt Vesākha talk, Jack Kornfield addresses the profound question of identity: Who are you, really? Drawing from the Buddha's teaching that one who is not identified with body, heart, and mind will not be seen by the king of death, Kornfield guides listeners toward recognizing their true nature as loving awareness—the witness consciousness that observes all experience without being bound by it.
> Kornfield weaves together wisdom from multiple contemplative traditions, including Thomas Merton's encounter with the Buddha statues at Poḷonnaruwa, the Zen teaching that "there is no trash" in people or things, and the moving story of Miss Okamoto, who transformed her fear of death into joyful presence through understanding that we are born and die in each moment. The talk illuminates how the Buddha walked in Nibbāna for 45 years after his enlightenment—not because Nibbāna is elsewhere, but because freedom is found right here, in recognizing the one who knows.
> The practical implications are profound yet accessible: we can hold our struggles—whether pandemic anxieties, aging parents, or personal difficulties—with greater spaciousness when we remember our essential nature. As Suzuki Roshi taught, "You're perfect just as you are, and there's still room for improvement." This isn't about passive acceptance but about tending the garden of the world with what Kornfield calls "bliss-bestowing hands"—acting from freedom and love rather than grasping and fear. The talk concludes with an invitation to transform even mundane activities into what Morinaga Roshi called "the samādhi of play."

Welcome back from the break. I took a little break and had a drink and a piece of chocolate, so I'm happy for both of those. And mostly I'm happy that we got to practice together.

I want to remind you that these trainings and practices, like the compassion meditation we just did, need to be individualized. Work within your own heart and mind to find the language and the images that most naturally work for you. Trust yourself in this.

The teachings I'd like to offer tonight are not something you have to remember and take notes for—there's no quiz coming later. They're really a reminder to your heart, to your understanding of things that are important. Listen in that way. If they touch you and remind you of something beautiful, wonderful. If they seem not right or off base, just let them go.

So here we are in May 2021. When we sit and meditate—in general, not just doing the compassion practice, but the practice of mindfulness itself, which the Buddha spoke of as all-helpful—we take our seat in this human form, halfway between heaven and earth. With mindfulness, the point is not to create a special meditative experience. Those may come or may not; they come and go. The point is actually to open to the mystery of our human incarnation—to gaze with the eyes, the inner eyes, and the heart at the unbearable beauty and the ocean of tears that make up human life.

I think we're all especially aware of this in the past year-plus of the pandemic, which in some places is winding down—hallelujah—but in other places is not. I went to see my grandson, who's two and a half years old. It's so shocking. He's used to seeing Baba Jack on a little glass screen on the phone, and all of a sudden I'm a live person. And he is to me—it's like moving from virtual reality to the real thing. It's strange being back again, doing social things with vaccinated friends, still being tentative, trying to figure out how I want to live now after this year-plus of being sequestered.

Sadly, the reality is that the pandemic hasn't ended. I was traveling recently with Trudy and our dear friends Larry and Peerjit Brilliant. He's one of the world's great epidemiologists, working with the WHO and the administration. He made it clear that all the variants emerging in different parts of the world, the unvaccinated people in so many countries that haven't been given vaccines even though we could provide them, the huge spread in India and Brazil and Turkey—this will be with us for a long time. And "us" means us as human beings, because we can't isolate ourselves in one country or one continent and close our doors. We are all connected. We know this, but now the pandemic shows it in bright lights, in an unmistakable way.

But it's not just this huge change. There are the ongoing conflicts. I hear from friends in Burma and Myanmar because I've been engaged in trying to help in modest ways, and the situation is terrible. I hear from friends in Palestine and Israel, and it too is heartbreaking—living under rocket fire on all sides, the cruelty, the barbarity of it. And not just there: Syria, South Sudan, so many places in the world. What are we doing as human beings?

At the same time, there is also the incredibly deep need to sustain the movements for social justice and racial justice. The delusion and suffering from racism and injustice—it's very easy for us to slip back into the unconscious ways that have oppressed so many people and kept so many of us locked in separate consciousness. And I don't need to talk about climate change—or maybe I do, the whole time—but we're woven in that too, in this inescapable garment of destiny, as Dr. King said.

It's not just out there. It's our own personal lives, our own share of the ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows: praise and blame, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, pleasure and pain, birth and death. I have all these friends who are sick or dying, because I have a big circle of people who've been friends or colleagues or students—and maybe because I'm seventy-five years old and know a lot of other people in my age range. All of this happening.

So then there's a question with it all: How do we find a peaceful heart in the midst of beauty and catastrophe?

Our experience, our human experience, is not a mistake. As William Blake said, joy and woe are woven fine.

a clothing for the soul divine. When this we rightly know, through the world we safely go, for we were made for joy and woe.

There's a passage in Thomas Merton, the great Christian mystic writer, that speaks of his visit to Polonnaruwa in Sri Lanka in his Asian journals. Polonnaruwa is a temple where huge marble statues of the Buddha—seated and lying down—were carved out of a marble cliff. Giant statues with incredible beauty and a kind of spiritual power that Merton said he'd almost never seen in any other work of art, so powerful they are.

Walking across the green grass up to these statues, he said, "I gazed at these enormous faces and at the eyes of the awakened one, and I could feel in that gaze the consciousness that was seeing it all, seeing every possibility." A peace in the midst of it—the peace not of making an argument with anything, not the peace of emotional resignation, but the eyes of great compassion and of the emptiness that could see all things rising and passing in the space of consciousness itself, in the awakened heart.

It's said in the stories and texts that after the Buddha's enlightenment, he traveled and walked the dusty roads of India for forty-five years—teaching and meeting people, eating and gathering, creating a community. And all the time, he did so in nirvana.

What could that mean? Does that mean nirvana is someplace else? We hear that and think, "Oh, if I go to the Himalayas or have the right meditative experience or take the right substance, I'll get to someplace and that's nirvana." But there he was, trudging through the dusty roads in the rainy season, walking and sitting and speaking, being well and being sick, tending his community—all in nirvana. The compassionate one, the liberated one.

How does this relate to you? To me?

Here's the beginning of an answer, a key to understanding this and what it means for peace of mind and a free heart. And it's a question—maybe a strange question for that: Who are you? Or as Zen Master Seung Sahn used to say, "What am I?" That was our practice, to sit and ask, "What am I? What am I?" Who are you? For this is the question of our human mysterious experience.

One of the things that's most remarkable about our human experience—in Buddhist psychology it's one of the key elements to understand—is that consciousness can create an identity that feels separate from the rest. Me, mine, in this head, in this body, in this bag of skin. We believe this is who we are. But the whole sense of identity is up for grabs. You're invited to look, to examine.

Suppose, for example, I hold up my two hands. This hand is me, and this hand is something I'm going to explore. I take this hand and feel it. I notice that one of the nails is a little long and needs to be clipped. The skin back here is a little rough or aging. In this case, this is me, Jack—Baba Jack, as I'm called by Desmond—and this is the object of my attention.

Now I switch and I feel with this hand. Now this is me, and I'm noticing the palm has these creases in it. It feels slightly moist, as if maybe in speaking and talking with you there's some sense—I don't feel anxiety, I really love doing this—but there's some sense that my body's engaged and alive somehow, and it's warm where I am. All of a sudden, it's me feeling this other thing.

We can put our identity anywhere. We can create ourselves in so many ways. But who are you? Who are we?

I remember sitting in a retreat hall with Ram Dass at one point. There was a man who'd come to practice, a quadriplegic lying on a bed that he could move with one hand a little bit to guide himself around. Ram Dass was teaching, and at one point the man indicated he wanted to speak. Someone went over and held the microphone to his mouth, and he said, "Ram Dass says we are not our body. Hallelujah!" You could feel the joy in him to know that he was not that quadriplegic body.

But who are we? Who are you? There are so many roles we identify with. Yes, we can identify with our body. We can identify with our emotions—but the thing is, they keep changing. We can identify with our thoughts, but that's more troublesome.

There are so many of them, and they're going in so many directions. And then we have our roles.

Here's a woman, a physician, a doctor. When she's in the hospital, she's treated as the doctor. But when she gets home, she's not the doctor anymore. She takes off the white coat and the stethoscope. She's mom to her three children—an entirely different role. And then she is a lover or a wife or a partner, another role. And then she calls her parents who are going through a hard time, and all of a sudden she's a daughter. And that week she goes to the school board that she's on, and people look at her: is she a liberal or a conservative? And then they look at her and try to see her ancestors. Are they from India or Nigeria or Ireland? What is her skin color? What is her sign—is she a Virgo, a Libra, a Sagittarius? And she could identify with all or any of these, as you can. But they're temporary, you know. They keep changing. Like water, they change—our roles, our thoughts, our emotions.

Alan Watts wrote a book called On the Taboo of Not Knowing Who You Really Are. He wrote about how in this society we're taught to pay attention outwardly, to consume, to compete, to be with others, to act in these ways, to get educated, to be in the drama of society. But we're never taught to turn back inside, to step out of our identities. And this is the place of freedom.

This was the Buddha wandering for forty-five years across India. One of his titles is "the one thus come" or "the one thus gone"—not fixed in any way, but just the openness that came and disappeared. It's a shift to vastness and presence.

Now this sounds kind of philosophical as I'm talking about it, but I want it to be practical and real, because it's a profound invitation to you, to me. Let's do a little meditation practice for twenty seconds that I've done before with you. And here's the instruction: when I say start, I want you to stop or cease being aware. When I say begin, do whatever you can to not be aware. Scrunch your eyes, hold your ears—do whatever you need.

All right. Are you ready? Don't be aware. Begin.

Of course, it becomes clear you can't do it. Because who you are is awareness itself. You are consciousness. You are this loving awareness that was born into this body, that is the witness of emotions that come and go and thoughts, that puts on the roles and identifies with your body in all its phases—when it's a tiny infant and a little child and a middle-aged athlete and an older person. Who you are, my teacher Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows," the knowing itself.

There's a text, a story of someone coming to see the Buddha and asking him a profound question. He says, "You are a Buddha, is that correct?" And the Buddha answers, "Yes, an awakened one." He says, "How can I practice so that I will not be seen by the king of death?" This is a profound question. How do I live so that I will not be subject to death? And the Buddha responds: for one who is not identified with his body and heart and mind—with the physical body, the emotions, the thoughts, perceptions that make up this life—for one who does not take this to be themselves, such a one will not be seen by the king of death.

And in this last week or two, I've tended virtually to a couple of dear ones who were dying, passing away. And in doing so—they were people who I was very close to—I had the privilege of the last whispered-in-the-ears instructions, even as they lay in a coma in some cases. But you know, people in coma can hear and remember. I've seen it so many times as people wake up and remember what happened. And I would say, let go. Let go into the clear light, into the ocean of love, loving awareness that is who you really are.

You are returning to the source. You've had this incarnation with its blessings, its difficulties. You've completed this and now it's time to let your heart be at peace and let go into the clear, pure light, the ocean of love. To know that who you are is undying, loving awareness itself.

You don't have to wait till you die, because the reality is that we are born every day. Every day at breakfast, you have a new incarnation, every moment. And to see that consciousness, to see the spirit—we'll use that word—that has taken birth in each being is an extraordinary thing.

Thomas Merton again writes so exquisitely about this, coming out of his monastery and walking down the street in the middle of town. He said, all of a sudden, it wasn't the monastery where I was looking for holiness. But in this moment, I could see the secret beauty behind the eyes of everyone walking by. That place of consciousness and love, the child of the spirit that was born into each one of them. They were shining like the stars for me.

What else is there to see but this? To see the beauty behind the eyes. To know that we get to have this human incarnation and its great dance. Who are we really? Who are you? The one listening, the one who knows. When we see in this way, there's an original innocence.

As I've talked about in India, sometimes the description is this: you go to see a great master, whoever she or he might be. And they look at you, and there you are with all your complexity and your pleasures and pains, your longings and hopes, your fears, your shame and desire and greed, your love and creativity and vision. And they look so deeply at you with what is called the glance of mercy, with a love that sees underneath all those layers and roles, looking right into your heart, into that consciousness that you really are, with great love, loving it all. Not caste or race or creed or birth or accomplishments or lack of accomplishments.

"Oh nobly born," the Buddha reminds us—you, me. Oh you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are. Remember your original dignity and beauty.

I love the poem from William Stafford, where he writes of someone, the one line I always mention, where he writes of a person who felt lost in the rain and then remembered: Maybe I'm a king. Maybe I'm a queen. You are, oh nobly born. Remember who you really are.

Now this week is the celebration of Vesak—Vesakapuja it's called. In the Theravada tradition from which our mindfulness training comes, from Burma and Sri Lanka and Thailand and Laos and Cambodia, it celebrates the birth, the enlightenment, and the death of the Buddha all on the same day. A very tidy way to live a life, to be born and die enlightened on the same day.

I've always been curious why it would be celebrated this way. And I believe it's celebrated this way because we're always being born and always dying—each day, each moment. We're reborn anew in this mysterious, timeless human life. We take birth, take a new identity for a time, and then it passes away. And so our birth and death and our freedom or enlightenment are here, just where we are. As they were for the Buddha, as he walked across India in the state of freedom and nirvana.

Okay, beautiful poetry. But how does this really help? We've just gone through tax season. We still have to wear a mask some of the time, or we don't know who's vaccinated and who's not—should we wear a mask? We have teenagers in our family who are struggling more than teenagers usually did through the pandemic. We invested in cryptocurrency and it just tanked for the week. Our marriage has gotten a little bit stale, or we feel estranged from a friend. We feel guilty because we're not doing enough for the people with COVID in India or Brazil, enough for those most hard hit by the pandemic. We have all these things that weigh on our hearts and that we have to deal with.

How do we do it?

I remember this Peanuts cartoon. There's Charlie Brown lying in his bed saying, "Sometimes I lie awake at night and ask, where have I gone wrong?" And then a voice says to him, "This is going to take more than one night." You know, that great humor of Charles Schultz.

So here's the story. There was an ardent young monk who practiced day and night in order to get enlightened. He struggled and struggled and nothing happened. And finally he decided, I just have to get out of the monastery.

And he'd heard there was some wise old hermit at the top of the mountains. So he began to walk the trails that went way into the mountains. And there, partway up, he saw an old wise woman walking down the path, carrying a great bundle. He realized she was the one he'd heard about, this sage.

He asked her, "I've been struggling and searching for enlightenment. Do you know anything of this?"

She gazed at him with great tender eyes and dropped her bundle on the ground. Just let it go. Whatever you want. Whoever you are. Whatever you imagine. Just let go and be.

And in his case, it was the right moment. He realized what we all can learn—that he could let it go. Not try to be something. Not even look for enlightenment. But just to be.

Then he looked at her and said, "So now what?"

She reached down, picked up the bundle, and continued to walk down toward town. The paintings that are done of this wise sage in different forms show her entering the marketplace with what are called bliss-bestowing hands, going into the shops and speaking with people and being part of the community. All that she does, all that she touches, is with a free and loving heart.

So yes, we are this loving awareness itself. And yes, we have this human life. Suzuki Roshi, the Zen master, puts it this way: "You're perfect just as you are, and there's still room for improvement." One of those brilliant statements by a wise Zen master.

From the place of the one who knows, you become the witness to it all. You remember vastness. Like the woman I worked with who had to go home to her family in Illinois, to the old family home, because her father had Alzheimer's and her mother, who was taking care of him, had fallen and broken her hip. The house was a wreck when she got there, and she realized they couldn't live there anymore. She had to move them out—all those struggles. She began to weep for her parents and the loss. It was her childhood home.

Then she walked out into the hills near her family home and got to the hilltop. In the daytime she could see her house and the neighborhood and the farmland stretched around and the cumulus clouds in the sky and the vastness of that Midwestern landscape. She became quiet and tender inside.

As she breathed, she realized she wasn't the only one whose parents were aging. She wasn't the only one whose life was in change. She could feel that she was part of thousands of others who loved and cared for their parents even as they aged, even as they needed new levels of help, even as they had to let go—all of them together—of the way that it was, to make room for the next moment and the next thing.

She realized, "Ah, I'm not alone in this. This is the human incarnation. This is human life itself, with its joys and its sorrows and its seasons." She could see with the eyes of wisdom, the one who knows.

So you see in this way, and then you go back and mop the floor. You tend the people around you with care and a loving heart. You do it beautifully. We learned this in the monastery—that you took care with your bowl and your robes and all the things that were given to you, and you swept the path beautifully. Not in order to have a clean path, but to express the care and love that you had learned, even as you became vast in your consciousness, in your heart. The goal being to be where you are with inner freedom and love.

And then again, as William Blake said, "If one is to do good, it must be done in the minute particulars. General good is the plea of the hypocrite, the flatterer, and the scoundrel."

So you know who you are underneath it all—under all those robes and roles and thoughts and feelings. You become the one who knows.

And then you enter with caring and bliss-bestowing hands.

As we get toward the end of this talk—though there's still a bit of a ways to go—I want to speak about a book I've been reading called Novice to Master, the story of Soko Morinaga, who became a great Zen master and died in the 1990s. He trained in the Rinzai Zen tradition.

After World War II, his parents died not long after the war's end, and the whole society was in tremendous upheaval. He didn't know what to do. So he decided to enter a Zen monastery to understand himself and the world.

He went to work in the garden of the monastery because after he bowed and was received, Master Zuigan said, "You're here, you need to help." Morinaga asked, "What can I do?" And Zuigan said, "Clean the garden."

So he raked all the leaves—there were many fallen leaves from a storm that had passed. He raked them into a big pile and tended the paths, and he was rather proud of himself because it looked so good. He called the Roshi and asked, "Where should I put this trash?"—referring to the pile of leaves and twigs he'd gathered.

The Roshi shouted at him, which is part of that Rinzai tradition: "There is no trash! There is no trash!" Then the Roshi looked at him and said, "You don't believe me. Here's what I want you to do. Go and get a big sack and take all the leaves out of this pile because we'll use them to make a fire under the hot bath that the monks use."

So he brought the bag and removed all the leaves. But underneath remained a big pile of stones and clods of earth. He thought, surely this is useless. And the master said, "Now, sort out and pick out all the stones, because with the great rains coming down the rain spouts from the building, the stones have been dislodged." With a whole basket of stones, he was directed to place them back and repair where they'd been dislodged until everything was perfectly smooth and the rainwater could flow easily.

He went back and saw the master, then picked up all the sand and clods of dirt in another basket. He walked along the path looking for small depressions and dips where at night, if one wasn't careful, one might fall or misstep. He placed them carefully, one after another.

When it was done and nothing remained of the pile, the master paused with him and said, "From the first, in people and in things, there's no such thing as trash."

What a teaching. What a beautiful teaching. In people and in things, there's no such thing as trash. There's just this world that we have to tend in our way.

The story of Morinaga Roshi is primarily one of very hard training—poor food, little sleep, a tremendous amount of surrender over years—until gradually, with all his self-doubt and insecurity and grief and stupidity, he learned to accept himself and feel confident in his true self. The subtitle of the book is "An Ongoing Lesson in the Extent of My Own Stupidity." So it's not just my word, but his.

At the end of the book, at the end of his Zen journey and story, he speaks of an older woman named Miss Okamoto. When she was forty years old, she'd come to the monastery wanting to serve in whatever way she could. Yes, she would meditate, sit with a koan, but she took it upon herself to wash the robes of the master and the senior monks. She took it upon herself to plant and tend the garden beds, to pickle the vegetables, to cook. She was incredibly devoted to the monastery. Her practice was working from morning to night, serving in a very dedicated and full way.

She lived a strict and upright life such that when the young novices were sent to talk to Miss Okamoto, they were a little scared of her because she was so intent and serious.

Then in her seventies, she called to the Zen master. By then Zuigan had died and Morinaga had become the master of the temple. She said, "You know, I've asked very little of you. But I'm terrified because I was told I have metastatic cancer. I'm grateful for these teachings, but I realize I must have failed because I'm really afraid. I'm afraid of dying. How have I gone wrong? How have I gone wrong?"

And now I will read you some excerpts from Morinaga's description of his work with her. It's more than I usually read in a talk, but there's something so compelling about it that I hope it will be for you as well.

"Although Miss Okamoto, who beseeched me, was twenty-four years my elder, her earnest confession prompted me to bluntly call her attention to something that had been weighing on my mind about her. This woman had led a flawless, commendable life, but she had always stoically gritted her teeth in an effort to do good and avoid evil. Sharply distinguishing between good and bad, forever sizing up and passing judgment on every situation, she went about her endeavors to do better—but with her teeth clenched fast.

"I explained to Miss Okamoto: You come from your mother's womb and leave in your coffin. The time in between you call life. And perhaps you think going into your coffin is death, but true existence is birth and death all the time. Our lives appear to be unbroken blocks, but if you look at a candle flame, which seems to burn continuously, actually the wax is burning down bit by bit, and the wick that blazes is passing as the flame moves down. When you understand this, you realize that you are a wife, a husband, a spouse, a neighbor next door. You have these roles, and you notice that you are born again and again. You die in each instant and get born again.

"I told Miss Okamoto: When you go to the kitchen to prepare dinner, be born in the kitchen. When you finish there, die. When you are born at the dining table, as you eat your dinner, be born, and when you finish eating, die there. When you go to bed at night, die there. And when you wake up fresh, be born anew. And if you have cancer, be born with cancer.

"I've seen many people in practice over the years. I do not know of anyone who so splendidly and thoroughly took my instructions to heart. It wasn't even ten days before her rigid countenance had softened into a baby face, into the face of a sweet old lady. She'd been given permission to leave behind the lifestyle in which she had to grit her teeth and try to live right.

"Miss Okamoto's disease grew progressively worse and she was finally hospitalized. I remember that when I called on her, the doctors and nurses all remarked that though they'd worked in the hospital for many years, they had never encountered a patient like this one. For by this time she had entered the hospital, she was greeting everyone and everything, every scene, in the spirit of one chance, one encounter.

"One chance, one encounter may occur when one encounters a stone, when one comes upon a weed, when one is cleaning the bathroom or cooking rice. It refers to the state of heart and mind in which one makes absolutely no projections of favorability or adversity, but meets life as it is.

"Not long before Miss Okamoto died, as I was tending to her, she looked up and said, 'I've led a pretty stuffy life all these years. So I think I'll just take a ball and go out and play in the woods. Play in the woods now.' These were her last words. And we, the monks of the temple, placed a beautiful ball of colored threads inside her grave."

This story really touches me because we've tried so hard. And it's not that it isn't important to practice—any good musician knows how you need to practice. But when you become a good musician and you keep practicing, you do it for the joy of it. You practice for the pleasure of it. So as Suzuki Roshi says, yes, there's room for improvement—but not as a goal, not as a judgment. Rather, out of the delight of being alive and being able to attend and develop and open to compassion, tenderness, and understanding.

You have within you this loving awareness, this loving presence, and there's no trash. Nothing that cannot be treated with dignity and respect. And then you learn that meditation and mindfulness is not passive but a way of tending the garden of the earth. You honor your true nature. You honor the birth and death and enlightenment of the Buddha within yourself, this Vesak.

I think of a woman who worked in juvenile hall. Her own mother had died when she was quite young, nine years old. Her sister was eight. Their mother died of cancer. And before she died, she sewed a beautiful little doll. One of the last things she did for her children, the two daughters, was to take the doll and cut it in half. She said, "I've given life to both of you. You were in me and I am in you. I'm always a part of you." And she put this in their hands.

So here this woman was later, one of those girls grown up, working in juvenile hall. There were girls there, young women who were depressed and suicidal, who'd been through terrible things—abused and mistreated culturally and in their families, harming themselves. On her last day working with them, she got a big piece of paper and made a big paper doll. She'd been with the girls for some months. Then she cut it into six parts and gave a part to each one of them, saying, "I've come to know you and I've come to love you, and I want you to know that I'm with you."

You can always carry this.

And a year later, she received a letter from one of those girls saying, "I went back and finished high school. I'm about to go to community college now. Yes, I felt terrible at times. I thought sometimes of the worst—of killing myself. And then I would take out the part of the doll you gave me and know you were with me."

In spite of your regrets, your own share of sorrows and struggles, you too are always held—like these girls, held by love, held by the dharma, held by the universe that you cannot fall out of. And of course, we all have times that we forget. But the one who knows in us, the loving witness, knows that what matters in the end is integrity and generosity, reaching out with care, and not holding on so tightly as things are born and die.

This is the inner Vesak—being reborn as the one who knows. And it allows you to enter this world with a free heart.

Here is one last teaching from Morinaga:

If a person is working for wages, shoveling sand onto the bed of a truck, they may get tired. Should someone happen along and offer to help them out, they will most likely be glad to hand over the shovel. But suppose a child is playing in a sand pile, scooping sand into a bucket and then pouring it back out. Should someone walk up and offer to take over for a while, the child would balk at such foolishness. "Why should I want you to take over when I'm having so much fun?"

Even the most fleeting of activities—the business of preparing a meal or cleaning the community hall or tending what is around you—can be what I call the samadhi of play, bringing your awakening alive from moment to moment.

Yes, we need to practice to remember courage and tenderness, to use those skillful means to remind us, so we can quiet our mind and tend our heart. And remember that who you are is the awakened one—herself, himself, the Blessed One. You are loving awareness, witnessing the dance of this life. And from this place of freedom, from awareness itself, you reach out and tend the garden of this world beautifully.

So take a moment just to settle with these words. It's not about improving yourself, but living with joy.

CHAPTER 118

Meditation: The Compassionate Heart

Jack Kornfield · 28 min

> In this gentle guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through the traditional Buddhist practice of cultivating karuṇā—the compassionate heart. Beginning with settling into presence and relaxation, the meditation unfolds in expanding circles of care, starting with someone we naturally love, then turning compassion toward ourselves, extending to those who are struggling, and ultimately radiating boundless compassion to all breathing beings everywhere.
> Kornfield draws on the archetypal imagery of Kuan Yin (Avalokiteśvara), the bodhisattva of infinite compassion with a thousand hands to hold all who suffer, a thousand eyes and ears to witness the world's sorrows. This practice connects to the brahmavihāra tradition of cultivating boundless heart qualities, particularly the quality of compassion that responds to suffering with the wish for its relief.
> The meditation offers simple phrases as vehicles for opening the heart: "May you be held in compassion," "May your struggles and sorrows be eased," "May your heart be at peace." Kornfield emphasizes the flexibility of this practice—practitioners are encouraged to adapt the words, use silence if preferred, and most importantly, to hold even the awkwardness or difficulty of the practice itself with tenderness. This teaching reminds us that compassion meditation is not about achieving a particular state, but about repeatedly turning toward suffering with an open heart, beginning with our own.

Good evening, dear friends. Let us begin by practicing meditation together. Tonight, the practice we will do is the traditional practice of the compassionate heart.

Let yourself settle and find a way to sit that's comfortable and at ease. Allow your eyes to close gently. Take a few deep breaths—slow, deep breaths—inhaling a long breath. As you exhale, release whatever tension you can. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax, and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on the seat—your buttocks, your feet on the floor—wherever you're seated. Sense how you can rest fully on the earth, just where you are. Relax and let the earth support you. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of compassion and tenderness.

Now, in this space of presence and attention, let us begin this guided meditation with a traditional practice of compassion that uses images and words as an invitation to the heart to open and to hold all with a deep sense of compassion. Find your way with this meditation, whatever ways work best for you. You can alter or change it as you need as we go along.

In this space of presence, let yourself first remember, think of, picture someone that you care about—someone that you love, where it's easy and natural and not too conflicted. As you bring them into the mind's eye and into the heart, feel the natural well-wishing of love, the care that you have for them, how you care about them.

As you think of and picture and imagine and sense this human being, this one you care about, feeling that care, let yourself also become aware of the measure of difficulty, the struggles in this person's life, as in all lives—the kinds of pains they've carried, the suffering that they've been through as all human beings endure, the struggles.

As you open to their struggles and difficulties, their pain, begin to surround them with a tender compassion and offer these simple phrases of well-wishing and care: May you be held in compassion, a tender compassion. Feel that you could almost wrap them with your care and kindness for all that's difficult. May your struggles and sorrows be eased. May your heart be at peace.

Feel how much and how natural it is to wish this tender compassion for one you care about. May you be held in great compassion. May you hold yourself in compassion and tenderness. May your sorrows and pains and struggles be eased. May your heart be at peace. Surround them with the warmth, the warm light and field of compassion.

Now this one you care about gazes back at you. As you look into their eyes, they look at you and they see that you too have a measure of struggles and pain. They see that you too carry your sorrows. And they wish the same for you. They gaze at you so kindly, and this loved one, this one you care about, says: May you too hold yourself in tenderness and compassion. May your sorrows and struggles and pains be eased. May your heart be at peace.

As you receive their wishes of compassion, perhaps put a hand on your heart, taking it in. May I hold myself, my struggles and difficulties, with compassion and kindness. May my sorrows and struggles and pains be eased. May my heart be at peace. Feel that this is possible within you—a tender compassion, an easing of struggles, a more and more peaceful heart.

Now you become a beacon, a lamp of compassion. Let yourself think of someone else you know who is struggling in difficulty, and from this field of care and compassion...

Picture them, be aware of their struggles and pains—this human being, all of them—and wrapping them with the light or energy of tenderness and compassion, wish, offer:

May you hold yourself in great compassion.
May your pains and sorrows and struggles be eased.
May your heart be at peace.

And again, gently, in whatever words speak from your heart, words like:

May you hold yourself in tender compassion—and feel it.
May your sorrows and struggles be eased.
May your heart be at peace.

Sense how you are now seated in the field of compassion, and you can radiate this care and loving compassion out in a circle to include first all those close to you, wishing all your friends and family and dear ones—so many, each with their own struggles—as if you could gather them in your arms and hold them.

May you all hold yourself in the great tender compassion of heart.
May your sorrows and struggles be eased.
May your hearts be at peace.

As you extend the field of compassion, feel how your own body is breathing. And all of their bodies are breathing. Breathing beings on this earth.

Now let the circle of compassion, the field of the great heart of compassion, extend itself in every direction to human beings everywhere and to breathing beings, human and non-human—animals, every kind of being breathing on this earth, breathing with you. Those who are being born and those who are dying, so many. Those who are struggling to feed or care for their children or their parents. Those who are struggling for dignity and justice.

Let yourself sense or feel now that you sit like Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion, with a thousand hands to hold the hands of all who are struggling, a thousand arms to support, a thousand eyes and ears to hear the cries and the longing.

You become Kuan Yin, Mother Mary. You become the grandmothers, the generation of great-grandmothers, the indigenous grandmothers who've seen it all.

As if you could float above the earth now and gaze at this blue-green ball floating in the vast space of our galaxy. And with a heart of compassion, the wisdom of Solomon, the Buddha, you spread your compassion and tenderness across this magnificent and troubled world.

All breathing beings, may you all be held in compassion and tenderness, every one.
All breathing beings, may your sorrows and struggles and pains be eased.
All beings in every form, may you feel this well-wishing of compassion.
May it touch you, radiating out from your heart.
May you all find a way for your hearts to be at peace.

Now you sit quietly as the bodhisattva of compassion. Take a few more minutes quietly to radiate this loving compassion and care, or to surround whoever arises in the heart and mind and make sure that they are included.

Finally, feel your breathing and sense how you're breathing together with myriad other beings—millions and billions breathing, all tender beings. And how, as you breathe together with them, wherever they are, you can share the great heart of compassion.

May their struggles be eased.
And may they and all beings be at peace.

When you're ready, let your eyes open gently. Keeping the spirit of compassion, tenderness for yourself especially.

Know that this is a form of meditation that you can alter or change as you need. You can change the phrases so they speak from your heart. You can do it silently, without words at all. And if it feels difficult or awkward or mechanical, have compassion for that too. Tenderness and compassion for how hard it is, for the awkwardness of it, the fears that it brings up. Hold it all with compassion.

CHAPTER 119

Q&A: The Compassionate Heart

Jack Kornfield · 14 min

> In this intimate Q&A session, Jack Kornfield addresses profound questions about death, caregiving, and the wisdom of meeting people exactly where they are. When a student asks how to comfort a dear friend dying of cancer who desperately wants to live, Kornfield shares a powerful story of a Burmese master who surprised everyone by encouraging a terminally ill woman to fight for life rather than teaching her to let go—and she lived two and a half more years.
>
> The conversation deepens as a healthcare worker shares her own transformation while caring for an elderly patient with metastatic cancer. She describes how her judgment about the patient's choices dissolved into acceptance and presence, embodying the teaching that we must honor others' wishes even when we might choose differently. Kornfield affirms that such caregiving is itself a profound spiritual practice.
>
> The talk concludes with reflections on maintaining joy and embodied awareness in daily life, drawing on the themes of Vesākha (the celebration of the Buddha's birth, enlightenment, and death). Kornfield emphasizes that spiritual practice isn't about grim duty but about letting our love and wisdom shine—trusting ourselves, paying attention with kindness, and nurturing what is beautiful in each moment.

And now I would welcome a few questions.

Linda, go ahead with your question.

"I hear everything you said this evening. I have a good friend who's not a Buddhist, who's not a meditator. She's only 63, and she's dying from stage four colon cancer that's metastasized. She wants desperately to live on. I'm wondering what, if anything, I could offer her. She's been a teacher for 25 years, tending to other people's children—the children she never had herself. And she wants so desperately to live. I couldn't go in and say to her, just let it go and walk into the clear light. I don't know what to say to her. What would you say to someone who wasn't coming from the same philosophical understanding that might offer words of comfort, letting her know that with a heart of great compassion, you care about her?"

This is such an important question. And it points to something really beautiful: you already know the answer within your question. This isn't the time to tell her to let go. Remember that common saw that says timing is everything?

I remember a woman who had metastatic brain cancer and was doing all kinds of things to heal herself. It had gotten worse. She did ninety days of a carrot juice fast. She went to see the experts on dying and healing. She did every possible thing, and she was just getting worse. Then she came to a retreat with a great old master who was visiting us from Burma. She went to see him, and I thought he would give her the end-of-life instructions to go into the light.

He listened to her as your friend spoke. And he said, "What is it that matters to you?" She said, "I want to live." And he said, "Great. Here's a practice of sending love into your brain through compassion and loving-kindness. Here's a special herbal remedy that I know from the jungles of Burma. Here are some teachings for you. Let me hold your hand and feel the courage that I impart to you. Do everything you can to stay alive."

I was really surprised when he said that. It turned out she lived two and a half years longer. They had told her she had a month to go. No one knows when it is time for someone to die. Then, when it was time, her head turned from this life to the next.

Your question, which is such a deep one, has in it your own intelligence and wisdom. That's not what she needs to hear now. She needs to have you hold her hand if you're with her in person and love her. Say to her, "You have a great, courageous spirit. Do all you can. How can I help you to stay alive as long as you can and make your days as full and beautiful as you can?"

Only when it's time—maybe at the very end, if you have the privilege of being with her and the privilege of being asked—then at that moment, you might say to her as a dear one, "Now it's time, and you can let go into the ocean of love that is who you really are."

I love that you already know this, and that you can trust that in yourself.

Thank you, Linda.

Padma, you can unmute and ask your question.

I just want to say hello, Jack. I wanted to share that this teaching is coming to me in the moment when I need it. More than asking a question, I wanted to make an observation.

Please.

I was taking care of a seventy-four-year-old today. Part of the care was to give her blood. She had metastatic cancer. And I was seeing myself—there was so much agitation in me from before we went into the procedure, before she was having surgery. I had this judgment in my heart that I wished she chose to let go. Why is she having this surgery? Why is she doing all this? And it's not in my hands, and I am part of her care.

At some point, right in the middle of the second unit of transfusion, I simply let go. And I said, you know what? This is what she wants. She already clearly said she was not ready to go. I need to do everything to just offer the prayer to let her get through this and come out to whatever it is that she's looking for.

And to hear all this—between you and Linda, this conversation—it's just really overwhelming for me. I just wanted to acknowledge that. It is amazing to me how, if we open our heart, we can stop the judgment and then be with the person for whatever they want in life, however they want it. We may not see it. We may not understand it. We may choose differently. But those we love, those we care for—this is what they want. This is who they are.

There were many times in my past when I didn't understand that. I gave my loved ones such a hard time about the choices they were making, because I knew what the right choice was. And I really am very grateful to you for bringing that up. And thank you, Linda. That's all.

Thank you so much. Thank you also for all the care that you give and tend to people. It's not an easy thing. It asks a kind of profound spiritual practice to be able to be present as you describe, and just the wisdom that you offer. I don't want to say any more. It's gorgeous. Thank you.

Thank you.

Louisa, you can unmute and ask your question.

Hello.

Hello, Jack. Hello, everyone.

Hi, Louisa.

I'm just coming out of a week-long retreat, and joy came up so much. In the end it was an online retreat. We all brought our pets and the things that we love—our Buddha statues and our plants. And I just think this talk is so amazing as far as this integration goes back to reality. It was so beautiful to give myself that week of pause and reset, just this looking for joy as embodied awareness and attention to every moment, trying to find the joy in everything. So I just wanted to thank you for this beautiful talk and synchronicity, and for fitting right into my week-long teachings.

It's beautiful. Can you share any more of what was most important for you that you learned in that retreat, or that touched you?

It was a lot about openness and letting go. It was a Mahasati retreat—my first time trying that practice. It's definitely quite heady in some ways, but it's really about letting go at the same time. There were many embodied practices as well, a lot of nervous system regulation. I think this is especially important in a year where we've been so taxed with our own trauma and the collective trauma. It's really essential to be able to bring our nervous systems down and embody ourselves in a grounded way. So that was another significant aspect. It was interesting to dip my toes into the Mahasati approach—pretty interesting stuff, for sure.

One last thing: let your eyes close just for a moment. Feel the joy and the understanding, the embodied wisdom and joy that you carry from this retreat. Let yourself sense and imagine that you can bring this alive, that you can carry this for days and weeks and months, that it can be how you are and how you live. It's not the retreat. No, it's you, Luisa. How does that feel?

It feels amazing right now. I definitely feel like I'm loving awareness right now.

Beautiful. Thank you.

Hopefully I can keep it up, but I'll keep practicing.

Well, you know, it doesn't actually take very much. Sometimes just five minutes of pausing and sitting and saying, "Oh yeah, let me tune in again. Let me remember. I had a busy morning." Because it's right there. And it is who you are.

Beautiful. Thank you so much.

Take a breath, everyone. Perhaps this is the end of questions and dialogue for the evening, which is just fine. Things have their own rhythm.

I'm glad I got to share these stories with you. You know I'm a storyteller—it makes me happy to tell a good story. And then to read a story like Morinaga's, even though that's more than I would normally read, I was so captivated by the tale of him saying there is no such thing as trash, that no one should be discarded, that nothing should be discarded, but all honored. And then to tell the story of Ms. Okamoto and what it means to shift from a spiritual life of grim duty to one of play and joy, of bringing loving awareness wherever we are.

So dear ones, this is the message of Vesak, of the birth and death and enlightenment—the gift of your own life, what you can live. Trust yourself. Pay attention in a kind way. Nurture what's beautiful. Practice not to get something or gain something, but to let your love and wisdom shine.

Thank you. Good night.

CHAPTER 120

Summer Solstice | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 55 min

> In this heartfelt talk delivered during the week of the summer solstice, Jack Kornfield weaves together poetry, story, and contemplative wisdom to explore the great turning of seasons—both outer and inner. He begins by acknowledging the tensions of our time: climate change, social injustice, political upheaval, and the question of whether we are headed into darkness or light. Yet he guides us beyond the trap of optimism versus pessimism, pointing to something deeper: mystery itself.
> Drawing on the famous Zen kōan of Seijō, whose soul separated from her body when she was forced to abandon her true love, Kornfield explores the universal experience of exile—how we become disconnected from our bodies, hearts, and the present moment through shame, anxiety, ambition, or spiritual bypassing. He shares the poem "I Am Not I" by Juan Ramón Jiménez and teachings on how mindful loving awareness can end this exile, bringing us home to the luminosity of our true nature.
> The talk becomes a guided exploration of illumination at three levels: body, heart, and mind. Kornfield invites listeners to tend their bodies with gratitude, to discover what the heart needs to let go of and hold with more love, and to witness the mind's garden with wise attention. He concludes with the Zen image of the sage picking up her bundle and walking back into the village with "bliss-bestowing hands"—reminding us that awakening calls us not to withdraw but to carry our lamp into the world, planting seeds of healing and care for all beings.

So welcome back, my friends. Let yourself relax and listen, not so much to try to remember or take notes—no quiz from this teaching—but rather let it be a reminder to you of something that you already know.

Here we are, the week of the summer solstice, the longest day of the year in the Northern hemisphere. I'm down in Los Angeles staying with Trudy in her place, even though we also live up towards Spirit Rock and Marin part of the year. And everything is blooming. These huge walls of bougainvillea and people's rose gardens—I turn everywhere and there's blossoms, like the sunlight is having its way with the green things and the flowers that want to grow.

And of course, the sun, the center of our solar system, the light that we all live upon—it's something for us to pay attention to, something we take for granted. Ruth Denison, one of our wonderful and great teachers, now an ancestor, was leading a retreat at Insight Meditation Society in Barre in the early years, and she was going through the refuges: to take refuge in Buddha and Dharma and Sangha. Ruth had her own accent, having been born and raised in Germany. And a woman from the South came up and said, "I understand taking refuge in the Buddha and the Dharma, but would you explain why we're taking refuge in the sun god?" And Ruth said, "Ah, the sun god, yes. Sangha, sun god."

But in fact, the sun is the source of so much. It's what we live from. One of the best and most beautiful reflections I have is that every single leaf that I see—the trillions or quadrillions or quintillions of them—has this magic capacity to turn light into sugar to feed us all. What an extraordinary thing. And it all comes from the source of the most primordial light.

Here we are in the change of seasons, which is the great turning. I remember friends who went to see a full eclipse of the sun in Africa. They were up in the mountains, I think in Kenya, looking out across this vast plain. As they looked across the vast plain, this huge edge of a circle, which was actually the shadow of the moon, started racing across the plain and moving toward them until it reached them and they were in the total darkness of the full eclipse. They said it was like seeing the spheres, the music of the spheres, the dance of the spheres. You could feel the moon moving around the earth and the earth around the sun. This is what we are a part of, this great turning.

But as this season turns this week from the most light, it starts to diminish and go toward the winter and the darkness. And that's a question for us, especially in these times. Are we headed into the dark? You know Dickens' beginning: "It was the best of times. It was the worst of times." Should we be optimistic or pessimistic?

There are lots of reasons for pessimism, sensing that we're going into a kind of darkness. Climate change, habitat loss, the pandemic, continuing warfare, economic injustice, the scourge of racism. Plato said, "Only the dead know the end of war." Materialism, the loss of democratic values, fake news—where, as it's said, a lie can travel halfway around the world while the truth is still putting on its shoes. This is samsara. This is part of the deal of a human incarnation. One British reporter's view, looking at the US from England, said, "I hope you Americans learn how to end an empire gracefully"—because that's also what's happening. So we can see in some way through that lens of things getting worse: democracy under threat, the planet.

But there is also cause for optimism, amazing possibilities: the re-enchantment of the world, movements for social justice and racial justice, the science of fusion reactors that will have no terrible byproducts, the possibility that the interdependence revealed by the pandemic and climate change might bring a collaborative model to show us our interconnection. All of this is possible for us at this time.

And so many acts of goodness. Little acts of goodness. "I see the goodness on my husband's face when he sees the kids after an out-of-town trip. Or when my youngest son hears the fatigue in my voice and brings me a cup of water. I see it in my wife when she greets the parking attendant or the cashier with such kindness and attention and respect. I see it in my five-year-old daughter who says to the sun at sunset, 'Goodbye, sun, I love you.' When my husband pulls over to help someone whose car has died and never asks anything for his time."

So many acts of goodness. Mark Morford says, "Stop thinking our global crisis is all there is. Realize that for every ongoing war and religious outrage and environmental devastation and fake news, there's a thousand counterbalancing acts of staggering generosity and humanity and art and beauty happening all over the world right now on a breathtaking scale, from flower box to cathedral. Resist the temptation to drown in fatalism, in pessimism, to shake your head and sigh and throw in the karmic towel."

Realize that this is the perfect moment for enthusiasm, for the re-enchantment of the world—to change the energy, to step right up and crank your personal volume right when it all seems dark or bitter or offensive, acrimonious, conflicted, bilious. There's your opening. Remember the mystery and finally believe in the seeds that you plant as part of a groundswell, a karmic impending shift, small but amazing, the beginning of something important and potent and unstoppable.

So which is it, dear ones? Pessimism, decline, chaos? Or optimism, potential, new ways, synergy?

If you stop and get quiet, you begin to realize that optimism and pessimism are just ideas. They're only thoughts. The average person, it's said, has sixty-seven thousand thoughts a day. How do we even know which ones to believe? Hope, one said, is almost as great a deceiver as despair. Because thoughts are like empty clouds. They appear and disappear, and they only have the power we give them.

So breathe for a moment with me quietly, and step out of the thrall of thoughts and just listen deeper. For the opposite of optimism or pessimism—it's not realism. It's mystery.

Remember the story of the poet Lord Byron. He was taking an exam at Oxford University, a class on theology and the Bible that one had to study back in those days, in the 1800s. For the whole hour and a half, the proctor walked back and forth and saw Lord Byron sitting quietly, not writing anything in his notebook while everyone else scrawled away at the question. The question was: write an essay about the miracle of Jesus turning water into wine. Byron sat and sat until finally the time was about to end and the proctor came by and said, "Have you finished? You only have a couple more minutes. You've written nothing." Byron smiled, got quiet, and wrote one line: "The water met its master and blushed."

He got an A. He got an A because he listened so beautifully to that mystery—what Mary Oliver calls being a bride married to amazement.

When we get quiet, we can feel ourselves in the turning of the spheres. And the way that the world works—when you go on a very long retreat, a year or three years, the retreat master will say, "While you're on retreat, many people will be born and many will die. And your task is to sit and open your heart to it all." If we have birth, we have to have death. That's how it works. If there's birth, there is death. If there's gain, there's loss. If there's joy, there's also sorrow. The world is constructed this way. If our earth didn't spin on its axis and turn the way it does, if it were still, one side would be freezing and the other side would be baking and boiling. But the truth is that all things turn. And we are part of these great turnings of birth and death and gain and loss and pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow.

Remember the Ojibwa saying: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself, and all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

And so on the solstice, we can quiet ourselves and feel this great turning, the timelessness of it. Mindfulness—it's a kind of prosaic word. I like to use the phrase mindful loving awareness. It is an invitation to see with the eyes of wonder.

I was recently asked and invited to give last words to a dear friend who was dying. While I couldn't visit in person, as I have in many cases with people that I'm close to, I was able to say, "Can you put the phone up to her ears?" "Oh, nobly born," I began, as if in the text of the Tibetan Book of the Dead. "Now is the time to let go. Now is the time you are leaving this body. You are dying. It has come to this time. Listen carefully. Let go into the light, into the ocean of light and love that is who you really are—the pure, clear light that is your true nature. Trust it. Relax into it. It is your home."

And it felt so moving to be able to join with this loved one in this mystery. This is to see with eyes of wonder and to remember that who we are underneath it all is a light.

It's the light that Thomas Merton saw walking down the streets of Louisville, Kentucky, shining out of everyone's eyes. He asked, "What was I doing in the monastery when I could see the luminosity behind the eyes of every human being going by?"

But of course the question is, how can we see in this way?

I love this poem that I've read for years and years, by Barbara Ruth. She writes:

I'm a country girl again in a middle-aged disabled body. I once walked the six miles from my house to Kent Lake in four hours, but that wasn't my best time. My personal best is eight hours and fifteen minutes. That includes time resting with lizards sunning on the rock, writing down a dream remembered, staring at Mount Barnaby, listening to woodpecker in the tree that harbors osprey's nest.

This is how.

Thomas Merton goes on: "Of what avail is it to travel to the moon if we cannot cross the abyss that separates us from ourselves and from one another?" And without this loving awareness, we're in exile from the natural world, from our own bodies, from the sacredness of the earth.

A couple of years ago, I told a story that's quite famous in Zen—the story of Seijo. Seijo was a young girl whose mother died shortly after she was born. Then sometime later, her older sister died. In those days, without antibiotics and other medicines, the death of children was more frequent than here. And so she became the anchor for her father, Chokhan. "At least I have this beautiful daughter still."

Seijo played often with a cousin of hers, a neighbor, a distant cousin named Ochu. And because they got along so well, people would joke and say, "Oh, you're such a sweet young couple, you little ones. You'll make a good marriage when you grow up." And so they believed it. They played and believed they were married in some way in their hearts. And over the course of time, their love deepened.

Now it happened that Seijo was also quite beautiful. She grew into this winsome and lovely woman, and she had many suitors. Finally, when she came to marriage age, her father announced to her—which was the way of arranged marriages in that time—that he'd agreed to have her married to a young man from a very prosperous family, and that the marriage would take place in just a month.

She was shocked. She wept. She was depressed, cast down. She thought she was marrying Ochu. That was the love of her heart. She was so brokenhearted, as was he. He was so brokenhearted he could barely breathe. And he decided to run away. He couldn't be around what was happening. So he took his boat, put some possessions in it, bid goodbye to his parents, and began to go downstream on the river that flowed by the village where they lived.

Seijo, hearing that he was doing so, that night gathered a few things in a knapsack and ran along the side of the river calling out his name—"Ochu! Ochu!"—until he pulled the boat over and said, "Get in."

And they went down the river together and found a village some far distance away and began to work and build a life together. They got married. They had two beautiful children. They lived together.

But after five years, regret over leaving her old father and longing for their home grew stronger and stronger. She said, "We have to go back."

So they got back in a boat and went upstream. Finally they arrived at the dock near her father's house. Ochu got out and went toward the house and met the father, Chokhan. He began to apologize. "We're here, we've come back to apologize for leaving you. We're so sorry." He bowed deeply.

And the father grew angry and stunned. He said, "What are you talking about? What are you talking about? Seijo never left. Seijo is here in bed. She's lain in bed without saying a word for five years, and I've lived with her—not quite alive and not quite dead—lying in bed, unable to speak."

And the young man Ochu said, "No. She's here with me in the boat."

We have grandchildren for you to see.

And the father sent a servant out who came back and said, yes, she's there. And the father's eyes got wide, and Seijo came out of the boat and walked toward her home. And at the same time, the Seijo who was in the bed stood up and walked out of the door.

This is a mysterious story.

And the two of them came together and entered one body. And Seijo's spirit or soul that had left her body became reunited again. And her father wept with joy and freedom.

So this is a famous koan, a famous story. And it has many levels. Who are we really? Are we our body? Are we that soul that goes elsewhere, that spirit? Who is Seijo? When we're brokenhearted, when we go through a grave illness, when all these things separate us from ourselves, who are we?

Remember the poem that I read so often, it's almost like a Buddhist text, from Juan Ramón Jiménez called "I Am Not I" — Yo no soy yo:

I am not I.
I'm this one walking beside me whom I do not see,
whom at times I manage to visit and at other times I forget.
The one who remains silent when I talk.
The one who forgives sweet when I hate.
The one who takes a walk when I'm indoors.
The one who will remain standing when I die.

And this poem itself speaks of how we split off. How do you do it? There you are indoors, but somewhere else your heart is in the mountains or by the ocean. How many ways we've split off. We walk down the street on automatic pilot. We eat not paying attention to the mystery of the food coming into our body. We come home and we don't see the eyes and the spirit of the people we live with. And I make it a practice when I come back to look at Trudy and try to see her anew each time in some special way.

But we get carried away with our busyness. You do. Or we have in us shame or guilt, ambition, depression — these default networks that we get lost in. Even in our spiritual life, we lose ourselves, just as we can lose ourselves in shame or anxiety or guilt. Spiritual life can become a grim duty. We're trying to perfect ourselves and make ourselves better, improve ourselves. Or it becomes a bypass — let me go to the light and not really deal with all that's broken in my heart.

So like Seijo, we all have our exile. You do and I do. And often we don't even know the extent of it, of our exile, how lost we are, until we stop, until the tears come.

My daughter Caroline sometimes critiques what I do, as a good child should do with their parents. She said, "Dad, you tell so many stories. You know, you tell these heartbreaking stories." But then I look at her — she runs this beautiful nonprofit called Oasis Legal Services. She and this group of hotshot young lawyers have built what's now become one of the chief places for LGBTQ people whose lives are in danger from around the world to seek asylum. And she sits and she hears their stories, which they may never have told to anyone. She listens, because they need those stories when they go into an asylum interview. And people will tell her the ways they've been abused or tormented or raped or mistreated in Uganda or El Salvador or wherever it happens to be — so many places around the world. And I said to Caroline, you know, we need to hold these stories in our heart too.

The Buddha, when teaching a group of people, could tell how important this was, and he told a famous story about a king whose followers captured a great elephant in the forest — one of the elephant kings — and brought him into the king's palace to lead all the other elephants and the king in battle or in procession. But the elephant wouldn't move. The elephant would do nothing but stand there. And finally, the king called — I don't know what you would call it — an elephant whisperer, some man or woman who knew the heart of elephants, who could listen.

And this elephant sage came and spent time with the great elephant and said, "Oh, your majesty, this great elephant who would be proud to lead your processions cannot move because when he was captured, he'd been feeding his old, old mother who couldn't get food well in the jungle. And now she's alone and he's terribly worried."

And the king said, "Then go find this mother and bring her here, and we will treat her beautifully and give her the best of foods."

And they did so.

And the Buddha went on, this tenderness, where we love someone and care for them no matter what the distance—he said, this is what opens the heart of all those in the Dharma. And he went on: when his listeners said the Buddha shed floods of tears by reason of the softness of their heart, they became fully attentive and then awakened.

Mindfulness, mindful loving awareness, is the way to the end of exile. It's the inner quality of illumination of the path to wellbeing and freedom. And in this week of the greatest light of the summer solstice, it's a time to also let that light shine within us—to remember that who we are is awareness itself, this luminous quality of mindful loving awareness.

And as we do, we bring this mindful loving awareness to this fathom-long body, as we did in that opening meditation. Loving kindness for the body. To honor it, to offer thanks to our body for all that it carries, to tend its wounds and come home to it with love, to feel the mystery of being incarnated and how life wants to continue in you. The body wants to heal itself and continue. As Voltaire said, the art of medicine for a physician is primarily to amuse the patient while nature does the healing. Yes, an orthopedist can set the bone. Yes, a physician could apply an antibiotic to stop the bacteria. But then the body has to heal itself. And it does, day after day, again and again. It is filled with the luminosity of light, growing like spring, renewing itself in this mystery.

And when we bring mindful loving awareness to this body, it teaches us. It teaches us to trust the healing. We feel the breath, and we start to feel inter-breathing with the whole world, that we are connected in breath with all things. And all things arise and pass like the breath and change. And we find a vast stillness in the midst of it. This mindful loving awareness teaches us how to be present with love.

And this body, when we did that meditation practice and invited light—in deep meditation, when the mind becomes concentrated and focused and still, the literal experience is that the body fills with light. It dissolves into light. Because the nature of consciousness, when it's not obscured by the busyness of mind, when it's not lost in that outer way of reacting, and it becomes still and silent and present, is luminous itself. As the Tibetan Book of the Dead says, remember the pure light, the clear pure light from which everything comes, to which everything returns—your own true nature. And this is a direct experience.

And with it, as we quiet the mind and tend the heart, we learn to love with a tenderness. I try to run or jog every day, pretty much five or six days a week. But I'm turning seventy-six, so I have to wrap my knees with some strong support to do it. Still, I can do it. And I so feel the beauty of being able to move my body. And I say, thank you. Thank you to my knees for still holding out. Thank you to this body that I tend and love and care for. I shine the light of loving awareness in myself, as you just did when we sat.

Take a moment. Quiet, maybe even close your eyes. Instead of exile—what happens if you really come back to your body? What is calling to you in your body? What wants to be loved? What wants to be healed? What wants to be honored? What are the honest lessons that your body wants to teach you just now, in this season? You can know.

And feel now how your body is connected to the body of the earth. With every drink of water, with every breath and every step, you are on this earth. What is this illumination of mindful loving awareness? This end of exile? What does the earth want you to know just now?

This is one of the beautiful things of meditation. You can open your eyes if you wish. It shines a light. It opens to the light, it listens, it illuminates. And just as our body can be illuminated, so too our heart, with all its feelings.

You know, when I teach about feelings and emotions, I have this list of five hundred feelings, starting with the A's of feeling aggressive or abandoned or amused or apoplectic or animated or angry—and it goes on to the B's of bored and bunkered and belligerent and betrayed and bright—hundreds of different feelings.

The heart is an organ that can open to the ocean of feelings, but it's also an organ of light. When you pay attention, especially to those difficult feelings of fear, anxiety, anger, grief, depression—they arise because you care. You wouldn't be angry if you didn't care. You wouldn't be afraid or worried if you didn't care. And underneath that which is difficult, there is illumination and care and love and joy and connection when we pay deeper attention. The difficulties, as they say, are where the light shines through. That's where the heart cares the deepest.

We can let that light hold the whole of the heart with all of its possibilities, hold it with beauty, hold it also with lightness and ease.

Here's a story I haven't told in a long time but feel called to tell tonight—what it means to hold all that we're going through, all the feelings of the heart illuminated in the light of mindful loving awareness as they come and go.

Roberto DeVicenzo, who was the most famous Argentine golfer, kind of the equivalent of Tiger Woods, finished a tournament one day which he won. He went back to the clubhouse and smiled for the cameras, they gave him his great accolades, and then they gave him a gift. At the end, he went back to his car in the parking lot and was approached by a young woman, a charming young woman, who congratulated him on his victory and then told him that her child was seriously ill and near death, and just poured her heart out. He was so touched by her story that he took out a pen and signed over his day's winnings, the check, to her, pressed it into her hands and said, "Make some good days for the baby."

The next week, when he came back to that club and had lunch, some of the guys in the parking lot came up to him and said, "You know, last week, that woman who was here after the tournament?" DeVicenzo nodded. "Well," they said, "I have news for you. She's a phony. She doesn't have a husband, a family. She has no child. She's got no sick baby. She fleeced you, my friend."

DeVicenzo looked back and said, "You mean there's no baby who's dying?"

They said, "That's right."

And he smiled. "That's the best news I've heard all week."

Think about it. What does it mean to let the illuminated heart shine? All the things we hold on to out of our fears, the way we care, the way we repeat our stories—the frightened heart, the judgmental heart.

Close your eyes again. With the illumination, the quieting of the mind, and the illumination of awareness—what does your heart need right now? What is it time to let go of in the heart so you can be free? What is it time to illuminate and hold with more love? So many frightened hearts in the world, worried hearts like your own that we share.

Let yourself imagine that the wisest and most loving being has left a gift at your feet. The gift is a clear symbol of just what your heart needs to move through this time of the summer solstice, through this time on earth with all that we're sharing and going through, just what your heart needs to live with love and wisdom. Imagine picking up this gift and unwrapping it—the clear symbol of what the heart needs—holding it up to the sunlight. You can see. You can know.

Sometimes it's so simple. It's a crystal that has many facets and you remember, "Oh yes, there are many ways to see things." It's a staff that gives you support from the earth. Let the symbol appear. This is another way of illuminated attention listening to the wisdom of the heart.

The mind—just as we can illuminate the heart with love and attention, just as we can illuminate the body, what about the mind? So many stories, thousands of stories and opinions and views. As they say, the mind is a good servant but a poor master. It doesn't mean we have to do battle with the mind. The mind produces thoughts the way the salivary gland secretes saliva—it just does. But we can step back, quiet ourselves, and see it all with a loving heart. For the mind can put us in exile into the past and the future. But all those thoughts are like a dream.

Like Seijo and Ochu. Where we're coming back to is this amazing present moment, just where we are. The mystery of being able to see and taste and smell and touch and love.

And so you witness the mind with illuminated, mindful, loving awareness. Instead of fight or flight, it's tend and befriend. And as you do, from this perspective of illuminated attention, you can nourish what's beautiful in the mind.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, the mind is like a beautiful piece of earth with many different seeds in it—seeds of joy and peace, of wellbeing and mindfulness and understanding, love. And also seeds of fear and anger and craving and hate, forgetfulness. These healthy and unhealthy qualities are there always, sleeping in the background, in the soil of the mind. The quality of your life depends on the seeds you water. If you water the seeds of peace, peace will grow. When the seeds of happiness are watered, you will become happy. If the seeds of anger are watered, you'll become angry. The seeds that are watered are those that will grow strong.

Let the sunlight of your attention and loving awareness tend the garden of this mind and heart. Let beautiful things grow.

Who you are is this light. Who you are is loving awareness itself, is the consciousness that was born into this body, the consciousness that creates all things. You're not the body or the emotions or the thoughts—they come and go. You are the awareness that witnesses it all.

So then the question is, now what? And I love this question because I've been with grandchildren. We'll take them out to a special place to eat and get a great ice cream or see a wonderful movie. This is a common scene in Trudy's and my time with grandchildren. Something beautiful would happen and it would be over, and they'd look at us and say, "Now what?" And you may ask the same thing. Now what? What's next?

Remember the story of the monk who struggled and struggled to become enlightened. And although he got a little bit stronger and steadier, he still didn't understand. He heard that there was a great wise hermit living at the top of the mountain, so he decided to visit her one day. He made the long trek up and up the trails in the mountains. And near the top, he found an old woman coming down carrying a huge bundle, with bright eyes. He realized this was the hermit, coming down the mountain, coming back into the valley.

He looked at her and said, "Ah, you are said to be the wise one. I've been seeking enlightenment. Is there anything you know of this?" And she looked at him kindly, stared at him, steadied her eyes, and then dropped her bundle onto the ground. And he realized—oh, that's it. Just let go. She stood there plainly on the earth, carrying nothing, free. And he became illuminated. He realized this is what he needed to do: to stop even seeking to be enlightened, to be anything. Just to be.

Sounds good, doesn't it? There you are. Maybe it worked for you.

But then he asked, "Now what?" He asked that same question that the grandchildren who didn't want to be bored asked—but here he was, illuminated. He just said, "So now what?"

And she reached over and picked up the great bundle and put it on her back and continued to walk down toward the village and the town. The depictions of these in the great scrolls and teachings show the sage entering the village with what are called bliss-bestowing hands, looking upon everyone with the eyes of tenderness and loving awareness and compassion—that they too might be free.

When you see with the eyes of wisdom and compassion, you can see the light behind the eyes of everyone else, the secret beauty, the holiness of simply being alive. And it doesn't matter how dark things get and how difficult they become. Light a candle in the darkness.

And whether it's been a year or a thousand years, that light will illuminate it. Light it with your own heart.

For you become, like it says in the Tao, when your heart is at peace, you can watch the turmoil of beings and remember their return like the turning of the seasons. If you don't realize the source, the illuminated source of where we come from, the pure light of your own consciousness, you'll stumble, caught in confusion and sorrow. When you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kind-hearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king, immersed in the wonder of the Tao. You can deal with whatever life brings you. And when birth and death come, you are ready for them all.

Even in the solar eclipse, when there's no light from the sun, the moon shines with earth light reflected back on it. Light finds its way into everything. The green wants to grow. The green wants to bring blessings back into this earth year by year. Your body wants to heal. In you is the innocent child of the spirit, born in inviolable beauty and light that gets covered over. But you'll see when it comes time to die that who you are is spirit and not this body. But you don't want to wait. Don't wait till that time. This is the time to carry your lamp. The last words of the Buddha: make of yourself a light.

Jasper was identified, labeled as a child with Down syndrome. In his case, his parents explained it should have been called Up syndrome. Every morning when he woke up, he rushed into his parents' bedroom and leapt onto them with enthusiasm. "Happy to you morning!" He meets the entire world with his heart outstretched and hugs everyone he can. They used to call his state retarded. Parents of similar children warned Jasper's parents to curb his hugging behavior or he could be the target of molesters. They disagreed, knowing Jasper's loving nature was his gift.

One day, Jasper and his parents were walking down the street and Jasper got out in front of them. He was almost twelve by then. An angry looking man with tattoos and piercings came toward him, and Jasper's mom thought, uh-oh, but it was too late. Jasper looked up, smiled, stepped in front of him and threw his arms around the man's legs shouting, "Hi there, hi there!" The tough guy paused and tousled Jasper's hair where Jasper was not so tall yet. And then his mom saw this innocent looking smile come over the tough guy's face. Jasper had done his magic again.

This is your time to carry the light, to make of yourself a lamp, to pretend you're enlightened. And who knows—if you pretend for a while, it could happen. And how long do you do it? As long as it takes to step out of the body of fear, to step beyond the limited sense of self, to end the exile of being lost in your fears and shame and all the things that keep you from actually loving this body, this moment, this earth.

And then you plant seeds for the earth that so needs it. You care for justice. You care for the climate. You care for one another because you become that light. You become that carrier of luminosity. You are that heart.

This is why we meditate. Yes, there's healing. Yes, there's breathing. Yes, there's vision sometimes. Yes, there are things we need to come to terms with in ourselves. Yes, there are ways of quieting ourselves and opening. In the end, it's to remember who you really are. The end of exile, the illumination. It is who you are, your true nature. You are loving awareness itself. Trust it.

You're the witness, the consciousness. You are that same light as the sun, the same source. Rest in it. It is your home.

So I hope, dear ones, that this reminds you of something, opens you, nourishes you, brings more love, sweetness, tenderness, courage, strength.

CHAPTER 121

Q and A: Summer Solstice | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 21 min

> In this intimate Summer Solstice Q&A session, Jack Kornfield responds to practitioners' deeply personal questions about the challenges of maintaining an open heart in difficult times. The conversation touches on extending mettā (loving-kindness) to those we find challenging—even political figures who trigger us—recognizing that true diversity of heart must include everyone in our 'neighborhood,' the whole planet.
>
> A school principal shares the weight of shame after a difficult year, and Jack offers profound reframing: shame isn't the enemy but rather a messenger pointing toward our nobility and desire to live more fully. He guides practitioners to hold both pain and pleasant experiences simultaneously, making space for the fullness of human experience. The teaching echoes Zen Master Ryōkan's humble wisdom: 'Last year a foolish monk, this year no change.'
> For a young practitioner struggling with family expectations and the seeming length of the spiritual path, Jack offers transformative guidance: the path leads not from here to there, but from there to here—back to this present moment of tenderness. He suggests the practice of creating an altar where one can place burdens in the care of compassionate figures like Kuan Yin or Mother Mary, recognizing we need not carry these weights alone. Throughout, he emphasizes the essential role of saṅgha (spiritual community) in supporting our practice and the importance of treating ourselves with the same mercy we would offer others.

Let's take a few comments and questions before we end this evening. How was that meditation we did at the beginning?

"I am so much better after tonight. Thank you for this gorgeous evening. I came to it with something I need to share. Up to now, I've been living with this contradiction of really having a sense of the light that I am, and simultaneously, right up against that, when I get too deep in the news and get triggered by certain politicians—I won't even name them all—I'm aware that I haven't felt open-hearted toward them. I'm aware of not watering the seeds that I want to be watering in relation to them.

What this evening has shifted for me is really having a greater sense of what it means when I say the planet is my neighborhood. The planet is my neighborhood. And so I can't leave anybody out of that, even the people I frequently think of as bozos and jerks. When I say diversity, it's not just the people we ordinarily think of as being part of diversity—it now has to include people who, up to now, I could just sock. I mean, I have very non-Buddhist thoughts about many of them. And I'm very aware that this needs to shift if I'm going to create the world I want to be creating. That came out of this evening. So thank you."

First, I'm just touched by what you say and by all the feeling behind it. I even invite you to close your eyes for a moment, because what you're expressing and the tears that come with it is how deep you care, how much it really matters, and how you want to be that beacon of love you want to be. Martin Luther King standing there saying, "We will not hate you. We'll wear you down with our capacity to love everyone." Even the bozos and jerks. Because you do need some humor. We've all had un-Buddhist thoughts. You know that's true. It's not just you, dear.

But I do metta, and I can wish anybody well. I pick the worst dictators in the world, and I wish: May you be free from fear. May you be free from ignorance. May you find love in yourself. I can wish that for anyone because, as you said better than I, this is your neighborhood. You become Mr. Rogers' neighborhood. And I just feel the goodness of your heart opening. Thank you. It's beautiful.

"Great to see you, and thank you for tonight. Last week I had chronic pain, and one of my openings and breakthroughs has been that I can feel the pain but also be aware of all these other parts of my body that are pleasant or neutral, and just make more space for all of that. That's been wonderful.

Tonight I came in feeling a deal of shame. I'm closing out a year of being an elementary school principal—what a crazy year that's been. I've been short-tempered and lashed out at too many people, and I was really wearing that. Then tonight, as we sat and as I listened to you talk, just like with the physical pain, I realized I can make space. There's a place for shame, and there's a place for so much more. Some of the gratitude and the pride and successes—all of that helped shift me."

So I thank you for that.

And I thank you for your honesty, and also for your service. You're a first responder to our children. And it's not an easy thing. I mean, I remember being sent to the principal, and I was terrified. So you have to hold all this stuff.

Our school systems are overburdened because they're supposed to be the clinics, they're supposed to offer advice to parents about how to raise their children, they're supposed to be the surrogate parents when parents are working all the time. They're tasked with so much, and often under-resourced. I don't have to tell you any of this. You want to give the children both an education and heart, and so you get discouraged at times, and then you lose it.

You might close your eyes for a moment and think of all those principals out there, all those teachers who are struggling, because it wasn't just you. Think of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of teachers who entered the profession because they care, how much they love, and how once in a while they lose it. They also feel ashamed because they want to be their best all the time. Just let a sense of tenderness and mercy come in. What a hard thing to choose to do. Feel the courage of those like you who've chosen to do it even though it's so hard, and feel the love behind it.

If you were to put it all on a scale—all the years of work and care, and some of the stupid things you did, like we all do—remember that line from Zen Master Ryokan where he wrote, "Last year a foolish monk, this year no change." When you hold all that in, sort of like the feather in the Egyptian Book of the Dead where your soul is weighed against Ma'at's feather—when you think of your years of care and what you've offered—yes, there's regret. And that regret you can say thank you for, because it's reminding you that you can be even better than you are. It's not a bad thing. The shame isn't a bad thing. It's just saying, yes, there's a nobility in you that says, "I want to live even more fully and beautifully." So it serves you.

I think all of us listening—I want to invite us all to make a kind of inner bow to the teachers and principals and those who are entrusted with our children in often really difficult circumstances, who hang in there anyway.

How does that feel to you?

Yeah.

Thanks to you and all of your cadre, this amazing cadre of dedicated educators. Take care.

Thank you so much for your teachings tonight, and all of them. I recently discovered your teachings a few months ago, and they've been a great salvation for me. I stayed up quite late on the East Coast to hear this talk tonight because today—through all your teachings, I've learned that you have to sit and sweep the garden. And lately, especially today, I find it hard to sit on the long path to liberation that's required to sweep your garden.

I wondered if you had more insights to share. My heart is needing to hear more about when you're so dismayed on certain days, how to find the patience to trust when you can't find the worth in trusting.

And I think so much about what your teacher Ajahn Chah said about the boulders in the field—they're heavy, but not if you don't pick them up. I really don't want to pick them up, but it feels very hard to let them go.

Can you tell me what some of those boulders are?

Just false narratives I've been told, or aspects of personal life—whether family or something you're so close to that perhaps doesn't always serve you. I want to sit and keep sweeping my garden, but sometimes it feels like a really long path. How does one find the worth in patience, in trusting?

A couple of things to say. It's really step by step. If you think of it as long, you can get lost and overwhelmed. But if you realize that where you're going is not there—you're not going from here to there, you're going from there to here—the path leads you back to this moment, and in this moment to a more tender heart toward yourself and those around you. When you feel that, you can pause and say, "Oh yes, I have all these expectations."

They're trying to help you. Thank you to the expectations. And where I'm going is here. Can I find some tenderness?

Now, a couple more things to say. If you have a little bit of difficulty with your family or things they say to you or their expectations—it sounds like you do, yes?

Yes.

Remember that Buddha and Jesus both had a hard time when they went back to their families. Which is to say, family is like the advanced spiritual practice. You don't want to have a lot of expectations that you're going to do it right or fix them or whatever. They are who they are. And you just have to love their quirkiness and their judgments and their being lost and all that. They gave you life. They did what they could. They still do. And you can say thank you, even though you don't have to follow everything they say. And you shouldn't. You really have to follow the wisdom of your heart. But understand that family is family, and you don't have to do anything about them or fix them. You just have to say thank you, take what's good, and love yourself.

Now, here's another thing. I'd like you to close your eyes for a moment because I can feel the dedication in you—that you really want to live with tenderness and courage and love. Can you feel that in yourself?

Yes.

I'd like you to imagine—I don't know if you have one—that you make a little altar where you live, someplace where you can put a few precious things and maybe some images of whoever inspires you. It can be Kuan Yin, the Bodhisattva of Infinite Compassion, or Mother Mary, or whoever it happens to be. And then on this altar, I want you to imagine that when things seem difficult or too hard for you, you can acknowledge them lovingly and then write them on a little piece of paper—impatience, fear, longing. You honor them kindly and then put them on the altar and say to Mother Mary or whoever is there, the Buddha, "Will you hold these with me?" So it's not just you. It's you and the illumined ones of all the ages. And it's also all the young women of the world who need their own altars, saying, "Yes, let's do this together. Let's not be under the weight of these, but let's carry them with mercy and tenderness."

Feel how, as you do that, it frees you in some way. Now you don't have to carry it alone. It's actually carried by Mother Mary, by Kuan Yin. Sense this image and tell me—does this feel like it might be useful?

It does. It feels lighter, like I'm not picking up the boulder.

Yes, you can place it there. Let your eyes open.

The other thing to say is that one of the things that most helps all of us in this journey is community. We started taking refuge in the Sangha with that funny story, but Sangha as community—we can't do it alone. I don't know if you have a connection with a community online or where you are, but to join a group, to be part of something, helps because you can practice together and hear everybody else's stories and realize, "Oh, we're doing this together. We're holding this together." Do you have any connection with community yet?

I do.

What's the community?

My friends.

And are they interested in the same things, including this kind of awakening compassion?

Some are. I think some of it too is feeling shame around some of my stories, but that's okay.

So feel the shame too and put your hands on your heart. You don't have to make the shame go away. You don't have to shame the shame, because it's really trying to protect you.

It's trying to say, "All right, I want you to be better." It believes that. The fact is that you are good—that you're actually good and beautiful. But the shame is taught to you, and it's a fear. Hold it and say, "Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm actually fine, thank you. I'm just fine. I'm good just now." And then you can put the shame in the lap of Kuan Yin or Mother Mary and say, "You carry this for all the young women who feel shame. You carry this. I'm fine, thank you."

So much tenderness. You're doing great.

And I think beyond your friends, it would be useful to look for an online meditation community, or depending on where you live, some place where you can connect with others who are actually meditating and dealing with the same things that we do as we open our hearts and our minds. Look for that. And thank you for your honesty. You're actually doing really well, just so you know.

Take care.

With this, I think we'll pause for the evening. It feels like enough.

I hope you take whatever was a reminder into yourself—from the meditation, the stories, the conversations we've just had—whatever reminds you of the goodness in your own heart. And in this week of the illumination of the light, remember that you are that light, that you are the light of awareness itself come into this body. As the Buddha's last words said, make of yourself a light. Let that love and light, that illumination of awareness that you are, shine through.

Thank you, and be safe and well. See you again. Good night.

CHAPTER 122

Meditation: Summer Solstice | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this guided meditation offered during the week of the summer solstice, Jack Kornfield shares a unique approach to mettā (loving-kindness) practice that he learned from his wife and teaching colleague Trudy Goodman, who received it from a Sri Lankan monk during a retreat at Insight Meditation Society. This body-focused loving-kindness meditation moves systematically through each part of the body—head, neck and shoulders, arms and hands, torso, pelvis, legs, and feet—offering wishes of well-being, happiness, and healing to each area.
> What makes this practice distinctive is the weaving together of traditional mettā phrases with imagery of light and luminosity, appropriate for celebrating the season of greatest light. Kornfield guides practitioners to fill each body part with both loving-kindness and the sense of radiant light, culminating in experiencing oneself as a 'being of light' and a 'beacon of kindness.' The meditation then naturally expands outward, extending these wishes to all beings and all bodies everywhere.
> Kornfield emphasizes that there are many versions of loving-kindness practice—what he calls '108,000 skillful means'—and encourages practitioners to explore and discover which approaches genuinely open their hearts. The invitation is not to judge oneself by the practice, but to find what truly serves one's awakening to loving-kindness, compassion, and peaceful presence.

So in a minute, I'd like us to take time to meditate, maybe twenty or thirty minutes. The practice I'd like to lead tonight I learned from my beloved Judy Goodman, my wife and teaching colleague and just dear one. She learned this during a long retreat at Insight Meditation Society in Massachusetts from a wonderful old Sri Lankan monk. At first—I'll use part of it anyway—at first it seemed to her a little bit silly, but then as she did it, she found out that it was powerful and she loved it.

It was a kind of metta or loving-kindness practice directed first toward our own body with such simple phrases as "may my head be well, be strong, be happy," or "may my arms and hands be well"—a kind of well-wishing to the body. Tonight, because it's the week of the summer solstice, the time of greatest light, I want to weave in an image of light as well for those of you who find that it works. If the light doesn't work, then the feeling of kindness can work, or both together. Let's see what happens.

Let's begin simply. Find a way to sit that's comfortable and at ease. It's hard to do loving-kindness practice—and this is one variety of it—if your body's in a lot of pain. Although you can, you might then want to shift actually to tenderness and compassion and mercy. But for this, let your body be at ease. Take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this remarkable human form that you've been given, and let your eyes close gently.

First, just take a few long, deep breaths in and out. With each breath, let go of whatever obvious tension or tightness you can so that you can be here more fully. Even though we use words, and sometimes they can bring up other feelings—it can feel mechanical, or even bring up their opposite, worries or fears—let this practice be like planting seeds. Just trust as you go along that something interesting may happen, especially if you're new to it.

Now bring a mindful, loving awareness, a loving attention, to this body that you've been given, that almost all of us treasure when it comes down to it. If you step off the curb and a car comes whizzing around the corner, without any thought you jump back out of the way, because your body itself loves life, wants to preserve itself, wants to preserve all the good things that make life possible.

So this precious body, as it's called in the texts—bring your attention, your kind attention, first to your head. Feel what's there. It might be tension or tightness in the scalp, sensations around the eyes, incipient tears or incipient smile, holding in the jaw. Let the face soften and the eyes be soft.

Begin: May my head be at ease, be well, be happy. As you wish this, as you offer this loving-kindness to all the parts of your head—the eyes and ears and tongue, the remarkable nose—imagine, with this loving-kindness, that you can fill your head with light, the beautiful light of your awareness. Feel or imagine that light, the light that comes in through your eyes, can fill your head. May my head be filled with loving-kindness. May it be well, healed.

Now let your attention, your loving awareness, drop down a little bit through your neck and shoulders. So much is carried in your shoulders—like Sisyphus sometimes, carrying burdens up and down, steadying yourself. Feel all that's there, both the tensions and the strength, the courage, the voice. Let the field of loving-kindness fill your throat and your neck and your shoulders. May my neck and shoulders that carry so much, may they be at ease. May they be well, healed, and happy. Sense or feel, if you can, a lightness or literal light. If it works for you, feel your shoulders and neck and head now all with a sense of light, and certainly with tenderness, kindness.

Now your arms and hands, all the way from your shoulders down through your upper arms and lower. May these arms that do so much, that carry so much—may these hands that touch and move and create and cook and love, these hands that do so much, these wrists—may these arms and wrists and hands be filled with kindness. May they be happy and well and strong. Offer this loving-kindness, feeling the courage of your arms and hands. May they be filled with light, lightness of being, luminous light and care.

Now feel your whole chest, the front and back, your whole torso. Your lungs that breathe and connect you with the ocean of air. The heart that pumps. All the inner organs of digestion—stomach, liver—the organs that keep your body going. And your back, the strength of your spine, that which keeps you upright, the bodily courage. Fill it all with loving-kindness, your whole torso. May my heart and lungs, my whole torso, be filled with loving-kindness and the sweetness of light. May my heart and lungs and all the insides be happy and well and healed.

Be filled with the light of loving kindness. And if it works to be filled with the luminosity of light, let the whole of your upper body now be filled with light and loving kindness.

And now let the loving kindness care drop down into your pelvis—the bowl of your pelvis that carries the whole of your upper body. Your hips, your sacrum, your genitals, all those tender parts, the lower belly and the pelvis. Let the loving kindness fill this whole dimension of your mysterious body with care.

May this whole pelvis, sacrum, hips, the bowl of pelvis, my genitals—all of it be filled with loving kindness. Be happy. Imagine that—be happy. Be healed and well, strong. And let the luminous quality of loving kindness, as light or tenderness or both, fill your pelvis as it has filled all the rest—strong and tender and loving.

Now move this loving attention down through your legs. Your strong legs, your thighs, your knees, your calves, shins, and all the great bones of your legs that move you and hold you up and carry you. Feel the strength of your legs and wish them well. Fill them with loving kindness.

May my legs be filled with loving kindness. May they be happy moving, dancing, standing, walking, running. May they be happy. May they be well and healed and strong. Let the loving kindness and the light of the loving kindness, the illumination, touch and fill these legs. And if it works, fill them with light—shining the light of love and attention.

And now let this loving kindness drop down to ankles and feet. I think of the line from Jimmy Cliff: "My feet is my only carriage." These feet that carry you so many places, that you stand upon and connect with this body of the earth. The flexibility of your ankles. Let the loving kindness fill your ankles and feet, all the way to your toes, your heels. With gratitude, loving kindness.

May my feet and ankles be filled with loving kindness every step of the way—standing and walking. May they be happy. Happy feet. May they be well and strong and healed. Feel the illumination of loving kindness fill your feet.

And if it works for you, let yourself join the tenderness and loving kindness with the feeling or the image, the sense of your body now filled with light—lightness and light itself. For you are a being of light. Sense the whole of your body, the energy field of this life you've been given.

May my whole body be filled with loving kindness. Be filled with luminous kindness. May my whole body be happy. Strong and healed and happy.

And even though you may be in difficult circumstances at times, as we all can be, let yourself feel or imagine that you can walk around where you live, with the people that surround you and the community around, shining—loving kindness filled within your body, light and luminous, shining from your eyes and your spirit. Feel that you can meet people from this place of loving kindness and strength. That you are like a lamp or a beacon.

And let the loving kindness of your heart and your body and your spirit now shine out. Just as "may my body be happy" illuminates this body with kindness, so now extend: may your bodies be happy. May your hearts and spirits be happy. All those around.

Rest quietly as a beacon of kindness in this mysterious body, drinking the waters of this earth, breathing the ocean of oxygen and air, resting on the mother of this earth that gave you this body. May you shine out. May all bodies—all bodies—be happy. Be well, healed. Be awakened to loving kindness, all of them.

Rest in a luminous field of metta, in whatever way opens your heart and spirit and body to love, tenderness, courage, and kindness.

This is one beautiful version of the practice of loving kindness and metta. There are many, many versions.

You can go online and find beautiful versions from Sharon Salzberg and Trudy Goodman and Tara Brach and Sylvia Boorstein and Howie Cohen and so many of our Spirit Rock teachers. It doesn't always work for each person—there are many different versions, and many other practices of compassion and equanimity and peaceful heart, practices of joy, deep practices of mindful, loving awareness.

So if it served you, use it, remember it, practice it. If it didn't feel quite right, that's totally fine. The point of these practices is not to use them to judge yourself, but to begin to learn that which opens the flower of your heart, that opens the vision of your mind to something vast, that invites you to come back to who you really are.

Take them. There are one hundred and eight thousand skillful means and meditations. Listen and take the ones that serve you.

CHAPTER 123

Meditation: Listening with the Heart

Jack Kornfield · 24 min

> In this gentle guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a progressive deepening of awareness, beginning with settling into embodied presence through breath and body relaxation. The practice moves through layers of listening—first to the body's wisdom and messages, then to the heart's feelings and counsel, and finally to the mind's stream of thoughts and deeper understanding.
> Kornfield draws on the Sufi concept of sobet, an intimate conversation of the heart, to illuminate this quality of tender, respectful listening. The meditation cultivates what he calls "mindful loving awareness"—a quality of witnessing that holds whatever arises with kindness and compassion. Rather than doing or fixing, practitioners are invited to simply receive the wisdom that body, heart, and mind naturally offer when we become quiet enough to listen.
> The practice then expands outward, extending this same compassionate listening to the natural world—trees, birds, seasons—and to the people in our lives. Kornfield suggests that by quieting ourselves and listening with the heart, we can sense the hopes, fears, longings, and love of those around us. This deep listening becomes a foundation for wise and loving response, arising as naturally as breath. The meditation offers a practical method for developing presence, compassion, and connection that can be carried into daily life and relationships.

When you're ready, let your eyes close gently. Take two or three deep breaths—a slow in-breath, an out-breath. With each out-breath, release whatever you can to help you be more fully present, and allow the tensions carried in the body to soften.

Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let your shoulders relax and your arms and hands rest easily. Let your belly relax as well, and let the breath breathe itself naturally, with ease. Soft belly.

Feel the weight of your body, gravity pulling you onto your seat, onto the earth. Let go so you can feel yourself fully supported from the earth below. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness, with compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, simply begin to notice how the body is breathing itself. You don't have to do anything when it breathes in and out this ocean of air that we share with all other creatures. Feel the breath—the coolness in the nostrils, or swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly—and relax with the breathing.

As you feel each breath, let it be an invitation for the mind to quiet and the heart to soften. Just as you can feel the body breathing itself gently, trustworthy, you can relax and trust the breath to come and go, and the heart to beat, and all of the organs and functions of the body miraculously taking place. You become the quiet, mindful, loving awareness of this mystery.

As you sit quietly, let the listening heart deepen. First, listening to the body. In this quiet, let your attention go to some part of your body that wants to speak to you—to remind you, to instruct or inform you, to ask for your attention or your understanding. You can know. As you sense this part of your body, let an intuitive understanding come of what drew you here and what you need to know. If you listen, the body will tell you.

Now open the lens, the field of your awareness, to sense the whole body as a field of sensation and aliveness—tingling and warmth and cool, vibration, pleasures and pain. If your body had a message for you now, as you listen kindly, what does it want you to know, to understand, to remember or tend?

In the Sufi tradition, this is called sobet, an intimate conversation of the heart. You are listening to the body kindly, tenderly, respectfully.

Now bring the same mindful, loving awareness, the deep listening, to the heart. Just as there is a stream of body sensations and energy and information, the heart carries so many feelings and emotions. Listen to the compassionate heart that can hold all these feelings and emotions with tenderness. Let your heart remind you of the feelings you need to listen to. You can know. Receive with compassion and kindness. What does your heart want you to understand now, at this miraculous time in your life? Listen to its counsel, its instruction.

In the background, the body gently breathes itself, and you become the listening heart.

Now shift the same mindful, loving awareness to the mind. The mind produces—it secretes thoughts, word thoughts and picture thoughts and images and stories and memories. The stream of the mind, the mind stream. You are the loving awareness, the witness that feels the stream of the mind, that knows it—all the busyness and hopes and ideas and ways of trying to keep you safe and care. The wisest understanding of the mind has a message for you. It has wisdom that you need just now. Listen to the wisdom mind, to what it will tell you, what it reminds you.

Now let the field of loving awareness open so the listening heart remembers you can listen to the world around you with the same tender care. You can listen to the pine trees and the maples, their sound in the wind, the deeper voices of their wisdom. You can listen to the hummingbird and the sparrow and the squirrel, the changing of seasons. They will speak to you when you are quiet. They will remind you of tenderness and compassion and courage.

And with the same mindful loving awareness, you can listen to those around you—family and friends, each one in turn—seeing and hearing, yes. But as you quiet yourself, you can listen with the heart to their songs, to their fears and hopes and longings and love and pain. And by listening with a compassionate heart and a wisdom mind, breathing gently, your understanding can grow. Your connection can grow. Your loving response will arise as natural as the next breath.

Or you can listen to the whole world and beyond, with its ten thousand joys and sorrows. And you are the listening heart—steady and safe, tender and wise. This deep listening is your gift. All things will tell you how to live, how to respond, how to love.

And when you're ready, in your own time, allow your eyes to open gently. Maybe bring a soft half smile to your lips. And tune into the sense of calm and steadiness, of loving presence that you have opened in your own body and heart and mind.

CHAPTER 124

Listening with the Heart | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 50 min

> In this heartfelt talk from July 2021, Jack Kornfield invites us to cultivate a different quality of attention—listening with the heart rather than the analytical mind. Speaking during the ongoing uncertainty of the pandemic, he reflects on how difficulties have always been gateways to discovering what is indestructible within us, drawing on his teacher Ajahn Chah's teaching that our deepest learning comes through challenges rather than ease.
> Kornfield shares a remarkable story of the Tibetan physician Yeshe Dunden examining a patient at Yale Medical School, holding her pulse in profound presence for thirty minutes and diagnosing her heart condition through deep listening rather than modern instruments. This becomes a metaphor for how we might meet one another and our world—with the quality of attention that truly receives and understands. He also recounts how Vinoba Bhave, Gandhi's foremost disciple, walked across India listening to villagers, catalyzing one of history's largest land reforms through simple presence and care.
> The teaching points toward the Buddha's instructions on inclining the heart: when others are cruel, we cultivate kindness; when others grasp, we practice generosity; when confusion arises, we respond with compassion. Kornfield reminds us that we have been training for these difficulties our whole lives, and that by quieting the mind and listening deeply, we can access the wisdom, compassion, and love that are already present. The practice is not complicated—it is about tending to small beginnings with integrity and care, trusting that our smallest acts of listening and kindness ripple outward into the world.

I'd like to speak tonight on a theme that was central to the meditation we just did—on listening.

And I invite you to listen, not to take notes. There's no quiz, no exam, just listening to sense what this reminds you of. If there's something of value, something that touches a wisdom you already carry, let it awaken that within you. And if not, just let it go.

Here we are, July 2021. We were hoping to be post-pandemic, but we're not out of the woods yet with the variants and the spread of COVID in many parts of the world that don't even have vaccines—which is almost immoral, I'm sorry to say. This along with the ongoing global dilemmas of climate change and the struggles for social, economic, and racial justice. And here we are in the middle of all this.

We have uncertainty. We don't know if we can travel. We don't know about school even. And of course there's worry or anxiety, and even kvetching and moaning about it all. And yet what we're called upon to do—kvetching has its time and anxiety has its place—but somehow underneath it, we're called upon to meet this time with our best spirit.

From the perspective of wisdom, difficulties have a purpose. My teacher, Ajahn Chah, would ask us sometimes: Where did you learn more? Where did you learn your wisdom? Where did your heart learn—when things were easy or when they were difficult? And he would smile. You know the answer.

This from the Zen teacher Karlfried Dürckheim, who writes: "The person who, being really on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not as a consequence turn to those friends who offer them refuge and comfort and encourage their old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out those who faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a human being exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them." Facing dangers in this way with daring, facing difficulties—this is the gateway.

And so this is both personal for us as we go through difficulties. It's also true for us as a society and for us as a global community of humanity. How do we respond?

A friend of mine who works at one of the big online meditation platforms asked me if I would do a show on post-pandemic practice. And I reflected about it because I think we all have some mild forms of trauma from the pandemic, and it's still ongoing—our pandemic PTSD, depending on how you have lived with it and how you've been attuned to those around you and the suffering globally.

In difficulties, our bodies go into fight, flight, or freeze. We get a kind of limbic hijack, the survival brain. Will things be okay? Will it touch me? Will it touch my children, my family? What will happen? And so we have worry and anxiety, or grief for what we've lost. Or just the fact that it's been long—long haul in some ways for all of us, even though some who've had COVID have had severe long-haul COVID.

And then we're supposed to come out, and I remember seeing someone on the street wearing a t-shirt that says, "Now that the virus is subsiding, I still don't want to see you." Kind of the message of the introvert who loved the stillness of this time.

Our minds are trying to figure this out, to plan and rehash, figure out the future, make things better or safe for ourselves as we navigate. But remember the passage from Mark Twain: "My life has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened."

So what is the alternative? The invitation is to live here and now in the reality of the present, which is all we have. To breathe as we did in the meditation. To quiet the mind. To listen to the heart. And in this listening, here in the present, to find wisdom, compassion, and love.

Being in the present reduces the stress of trying to figure it all out. It's not that we don't have to make appropriate plans, but we can plan a little bit and live here a lot. And as Nelson Mandela said, when things are difficult, just tie your shoes and keep walking in the right direction.

In this phase of the pandemic, in this cycle of climate change, in this political time, in this time of humanity on this earth coming to terms with the unbearable beauty of this world and the ocean of tears—we'd like to figure out how to navigate it properly.

But we don't actually know. Even as you've come out of the pandemic—maybe you used to like parties, but do you really want to be at a party? How does it feel at first? It's exciting, but then I kind of also like taking walks by the river. I kind of also liked taking time with those I love, or taking tea, or reading, or listening to something that nourishes me. No one's ever been in this time, in this place before, you know. Like Somerset Maugham, who said there are three rules for writing the great English novel. Unfortunately, no one knows what they are.

So we're in an unknown time. Then what?

As you open loving awareness, as you sit and quiet yourself, you become the witness—the one who knows, Ajahn Chah's phrase for the witnessing consciousness. And there opens a bigger perspective: the turning of the seasons, the rise and fall of ideologies. As it says in the Tao, there's a time for being ahead and a time for being behind. A time for being in motion and a time for being at rest. A time for being vigorous and a time for being exhausted. A time that we are in danger and a time for being saved. As Ecclesiastes says.

And when we step back, we begin to see the rhythms of life unfolding. Then we can sense how we might respond to the rise and fall of all the things we're subject to—in our personal life, in our collective society.

I think about that wonderful conversation in the Book of Joy that I've mentioned in previous talks, between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu, asking them how they can be happy after the sufferings they've seen—of apartheid, or the loss of the culture and monasteries in Tibet. And they laugh, they tease each other. As the Dalai Lama said, "So much has been taken from me. Why should I let them take my happiness?" And Tutu teases him, and he teases Tutu about his big nose, and Tutu teases him about his hat. They start kind of wrestling like young boys. Then Tutu stops and says, "Hey, we're supposed to be holy men. Cut that out!"

But then they say more deeply: If sorrow brings us together, let some good and joy be born of this. Let some sweetness come, even from what we've been through.

And the next volume, if you will, of the same spirit—created by Doug Abrams, who helped with the Dalai Lama and Tutu's Book of Joy—is a new book, the Book of Hope, coming out at the end of the summer, by Jane Goodall. The conversation in the book is about what it means to have hope in the midst of the loss of species and the rising oceans and the shifting environment. Jane talks about amazement and resilience, about the power of the younger generation to start things anew, and the indomitable human spirit. She says, "I've seen so much. I have to go on because I care. I care passionately about nature, about children, about life itself." And hope is really spirited out of care.

So all these are beautiful reminders. The question is, how do we practice?

Mindful loving awareness invites a deep listening—to step out of the thrall of time and listen in a deeper and different way.

When you read the Book of Hope, which I hope you get to see when it comes out, Jane Goodall talks about Professor Louis Leakey, who sent her into the jungle to study the live chimps, hoping it would help him understand the skeletons he was discovering in the Olduvai Gorge. He gave her a grant for six months. She sat and watched and peered and looked. After five months, she still couldn't get close to them. She was almost despairing, but she said she had tenacity and patience. In the last month, a chimp she named David Graybeard decided to come close and study her as she was studying him. Eventually he showed the other chimps that it was safe, and he began to show her the tools he used to pull the ants out of the anthill so he could eat them, the ways the chimps lived. And it all came from her listening.

Here's one of my favorite stories about listening. It's by Richard Selzer, one of the great essayists and a surgeon at Yale University in the medical school. He writes:

On the bulletin board in the front hall of the hospital where I work, there appeared an announcement: "Yeshi Dhonden will make rounds at 6 a.m. on June 10th." The particulars were given, with a note: "Yeshi Dhonden is personal physician to the Dalai Lama."

I'm not so leathery a skeptic that I would knowingly ignore an emissary from the gods. Thus on the morning of June 10th, I joined the clutch of white coats waiting in a small conference room adjacent to the ward selected for the grand rounds. The air in the room was heavy with ill-concealed dubiety and suspicion of bamboozlement.

At precisely six o'clock, he materialized—a short, golden, barrelly man dressed in a sleeveless robe of saffron and maroon. His scalp was shaven. He bowed in greeting while his young interpreter made introductions. Yeshe Donden, we were told, would examine a patient selected by a member of the staff. The diagnosis was as unknown to Yeshe Donden as it was to us. He would examine the patient in our presence, after which we would reconvene and discuss the case. We were further informed that for the past two hours, Yeshe Donden had purified himself by bathing, fasting, and prayer. I, having performed my lesser ablutions and given no thought at all to my soul, glanced furtively at my colleagues. Suddenly we seemed as soiled and uncouth a lot.

The patient had been awakened early and told she was to be examined by a foreign doctor, and had been asked to produce a fresh specimen of urine. So when we entered her room, the woman showed no surprise. She had long taken on that mixture of compliance and resignation that comes with illness. But this, for her, was going to be another in an endless series of tests and examinations.

Yeshe Donden stepped to the bedside while the rest of us stood apart, watching. For a long time, he gazed at the woman, and I too studied her. No physical sign or obvious symptom gave a clue to the nature of her disease. At last, he took her hand, resting it in both of his own. Now he bent over the bed in a kind of crouching stance, his head drawn down into the collar of his robes, his eyes closed as he felt for her pulse.

For the next half hour, he remained thus—an exotic golden bird with folded wings, holding the pulse of the woman, cradling her hand in his. All the power of the man seemed to have been drawn into this one purpose. From the foot of the bed where I stood, it was as though he and the patient had entered a special place of apartness and silence, about which a vacancy hovered. After a moment, the woman rested back on the pillow. From time to time, she raised her head to look at the strange figure. I could not see their hands joined in this correspondence that was intimate and exclusive, but I was envious—not of him, not of Yeshe Donden for his gift of beauty and holiness, but of her. I wanted to be held like that, touched so, received. And I knew that I, who have palpated a thousand pulses, had not felt a single one.

At last, Yeshe Donden straightened, gently placed the woman's hand on the bed, and stepped back. The interpreter produced a small wooden bowl, and he poured a small portion of the urine specimen and proceeded to whip the liquid with two sticks. Then, as he had done in bowing above the pulse, he inhaled the odor three times, set down the bowl, and turned to leave. All the while, he had not uttered a single word.

As he neared the door, the woman raised her head and called out in an urgent voice, "Thank you, doctor," and touched with her other hand the place he had held on her wrist. Yeshe Donden turned back for a moment to gaze at her, then stepped into the conference room.

He spoke now in Tibetan, in sounds I had never heard, translated. He spoke of winds coursing through the body of the woman, currents that break against barriers, eddying. These vortices are in her blood, he said—the last spendings of an imperfect heart. Between the chambers of her heart, long before she was born, a wind had come and blown open a deep gate that must never be opened. And through it charged the full waters of her river, as a mountain stream cascades in spring, battering, knocking loose the land, flooding her breath. He was silent.

"May we now have the diagnosis?" the professor asked—the host of these rounds, the man who knew the answer. "Congenital heart disease. Interventricular septal defect with resultant heart failure."

A gateway in the heart, I thought, that must not be opened, through which charged the full waters of her breath. So here is the doctor, listening not for distant signs of disease but for stirrings of spirit, as if in prayer. I know now. Now and then, as it happens, as I make my own rounds, it is as if I can hear the sounds of his voice, like an ancient Buddhist prayer whose meaning has long since been forgotten. I remember only this: the music, and a jubilation that possesses me, and I feel myself touched by something divine.

It is such a tender story. It is a beautiful story of listening. And this is what is asked of us in all these ways—in politics, in the ending of the pandemic, in addressing the climate—because all the difficulties are symptoms. They are symptoms rooted in the human heart that has been mistakenly taken over by separateness, by fear, greed, hatred, and anger, and underneath all that, by our pain.

Thomas Merton asks, of what use is it to travel to the moon if we cannot cross the abyss that separates us from one another and ourselves?

So in this time of difficulties, with a listening heart, instead of turning on one another, we can turn to one another. When my beloved Trudy went to work in the Darfur refugee camps in Chad with the anti-genocide group, the main thing they did for quite a time was simply sit down with the women and listen to them and ask, "What do you need?" And they said, "We need preschool for our children so they can understand that they can learn and grow. We need soccer, so our children feel like they're part of a greater world." What NGO would have imagined that, bringing in their supplies? But now there's Darfur United, a global entry in the soccer teams of the unrecognized nations. And the hundreds of thousands in the camps are so proud. We have to listen more deeply.

A friend of mine, a celebrated filmmaker, was so worried about her son, who's an artist and a musician. She said, "I'm giving him money because he doesn't make much as an artist, but I'm afraid I'm ruining his life. Doesn't he need to go out there and get some other job and make money?" And I said, "Well, to tell you the truth, I don't know. Why don't you ask him?" So we got together, sat down, and she asked him. He said, "Oh no, this is perfect. I love being an artist like you as a filmmaker, but I don't make a lot of money from it. You've had that great success, but this is exactly what I want to do. I want to make more art and music, and you are my patron, and I'm so grateful." She said she didn't know that's how he wanted to live, and they both laughed. She actually cried.

What does it mean to speak to and listen to one another in this way? In the Tao it says, "Do you have the patience to let the mud settle till the water is clear? Can you remain unmoving until the right response arises by itself?"

One of the benefits from this terrible pandemic is that it's given us more time to quiet our mind, to listen to our heart, to listen as we did in the meditation. What is it that this body needs? What kind of care and attention? Thank you to this body for caring so much. What is it in our heart that needs to be accepted, that needs to be loved, understood? Thank you, heart, big heart, for caring so much—tender, compassionate heart. Thank you.

What is it in the rhythm of our life that we want and need to listen to? You can tell. It will tell you. What is it in our family, the society around us, the earth that we inhabit, that is our body? We are the body of the earth. By listening—and listening deeply, listening with the heart—you can know.

One of my favorite stories is of the foremost follower of Mahatma Gandhi, named Vinoba Bhave. After Gandhiji was assassinated, the entire Gandhian freedom movement that gained freedom for India from the British colonial empire was in disarray and fell apart. In the year that followed, some people began to gather again and say, "There's still work to be done in our country. We must carry on Gandhi's spirit." So they decided on a gathering in Gandhi's spirit and asked Vinoba if he would please come and lead the meeting. But he demurred and said, "No, it's far away. Gandhiji is gone, and we cannot just recreate it the way that it was." They begged him: "Please, please, this is so important. His legacy must be carried on." Finally Vinoba agreed to go, but he said, "You must postpone it for six months so I can walk there."

And he walked more than halfway across India, stopping at one village after another. In the first village, he sat under the banyan tree in the middle of the village with some of the elders and people gathered there. He listened and asked, "What are the problems of this village, and what are the hopes?" One of the people who spoke up said, "We are part of the untouchable community, the Dalits in this village. We work so hard, but we have no way of taking care of our family. We cannot own land. We're not allowed. We haven't been given that kind of permission. We have no resources. What can the government do for us?"

Vinoba listened and spoke about the inspiration of Gandhi, the feeling that the people of India somehow could come to a solution. Hearing the suffering, the richest man in the village said, "You know, I have a great deal of land. How much land do these people need? I'm so honored by your coming and the connection to Gandhi." It was sixteen families. They each needed five acres. He said, "I will give eighty acres. Each family will have a plot." Vinoba said, "No, you must go back first to your family and make sure that they agree." The next morning they met again, and the man said, "I spoke with my wife, my children, my family, and I will give the eighty acres."

People celebrated. And when Vinoba walked to the next village and asked about their difficulties and their hopes, he heard a similar story. He told what had happened in the first village, and another wealthy man stood up and said, "Yes, in Gandhiji's name, I will give acres to these families." And he went on and on. In six months, he had collected 2,800 acres.

At that conference, when he told this story, he began what was called the Bhoodan Land Reform Movement, where Vinobaji and his followers walked on foot through every province and almost every district in India. Over the next few years, they collected 14 million acres of land, given to the poorest of the poor in these villages. It was one of the biggest transfers of land ever in modern history—and all because Vinoba walked and listened.

When you listen, you can sense the universal truths. Grasping and greed, hatred and ignorance cause suffering. Clarity of wisdom and truthfulness, love instead of hate, generosity instead of clinging, gratitude—it's not that complicated.

I was asked to be part of a group of well-known spiritual leaders, serving as advisors to a group at Facebook. Among these spiritual leaders—rabbis, priests, Muslim clerics, and others—there was appreciation for the fact that Facebook allows people around the world to connect, whether in faith communities or in all kinds of other communities. There was celebration of that. But then came great concern about the hate speech, about the anti-Muslim and anti-Islamic rhetoric, about the antisemitism. These were all raised as problems. What can we do about this? What can Facebook do?

Then there were concerns about not just hate speech, but also false speech—lies and untruths, the kind of ignorance being promulgated. What can Facebook do about this, the group raised?

I noted, "Well, you've gotten two of the roots of human suffering from Buddhist psychology—hatred and ignorance—but you've forgotten about greed. What about the fact that the online world makes an enormous amount of money, and some of it comes from getting children and teenage girls to look at themselves compared to others in unhealthy ways? Some of it comes from promoting fearful material, the worst of human ideas and images that attract us in some way."

So I raised this question: What about the greed? What about the way it's designed? Is it really healthy?

They asked me if I had any suggestions. I came back and said, "Yes. Reflecting for a little while, Facebook's valuation is over a trillion dollars. How about if Facebook took 10% of its valuation, 10% of its annual income—that would be $100 billion—and used it to solve some important and pressing problem? You don't need that extra 10%. Use that $100 billion to end homelessness in the US. You could get a place for all the half million homeless people on the streets. Or use that money to get laptops or iPads and medicine for every child in the refugee camps around the world."

They said, "We'll think about it." I'm waiting for their answer.

But you know the ancient truth: hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. Love. Generosity. Kindness is the language which the deaf can hear and the blind can see—that's Mark Twain again.

When my twin brother, who died a few years ago of leukemia, was at Dana-Farber Cancer Institute around Harvard Medical School, I spent a long time with him there. Part of what was so touching was to see patients who come from all around the world to this great medical center with their families. The families, like I was as a twin, were there with so much care and love and tenderness, trying to help. Because my brother had leukemia, there were all these blood donations and transfusions and platelet donations. You could just feel the field of care that had poured in.

It's like Mr. Rogers' mother, who said, "When there's a disaster, don't just look at the hurricane and the floods and the typhoon and the earthquake. Look at the helpers. Watch and see the human response that pours in from all over."

Oh nobly born, you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas, of the awakened ones, remember these truths. Remember this deep listening. You know it.

If all the beasts were gone, men would soon die from a great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man. All things are connected. Whatever befalls the earth befalls the sons and daughters of the earth.

We know this in our hearts. And when you know this, then you join together and you join your spirit with billions of others. Even in the course of this talk, there have been a thousand, a million, a billion acts of a mother putting rice gruel or scrambled eggs or peanut butter and jelly on the table for her child, of a father tending to a daughter or a son, offering them help, of so many who are tending the plots of land around them, who are attending one another in gracious ways, who are just being polite and kind, standing in line, waiting as a group of human beings to do what we need to do in harmony with those around us.

Gandhi remembered saying, "When I despair"—so he did too—"I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time they can seem invincible, but in the end, they always fall. Think of it—always."

It takes a kind of humility. Not my strong suit, by the way. It's not what we were taught in my family. We were taught to know things. And my brothers and I, we all have a lot of facts. They were actually really brilliant—architect, engineer, scientists, geneticists—all kinds of skills. Boat captains and amazing chefs and all these things that my brothers and I have learned and worked with. But underneath, I know the importance of not really having the answer, of humility.

I know it when I've sat on retreats for forty-five years and come together for those tender meetings of people in the middle of their ten-day or two or three months of meditation, just to sit and listen, to gaze at them, to notice the energy of their body, to feel the emotions that are visible emanating from their heart and mind, to hear the stories they tell. To be able to listen in that way and feel intuitively: How can I respond and remind them of something bigger? Of compassion to hold it all. Of the witnessing wisdom. Of the steadiness of the heart that's possible. Humility, a willingness to really listen and trust. We're a part of such a great mystery.

A story I haven't told for a time, and one of my favorites, is of the great Sioux medicine man Black Elk. This beloved story is told in his biography by John Neihardt called Black Elk Speaks, one of the great spiritual testaments to the wisdom holders and elders of this very land upon which we live—much of which was taken, most of which was taken. So we have to feel that in our hearts as well and listen as Black Elk tells us something.

In the last chapter of the book, it describes Black Elk's final hike up Harney Peak. The Sioux holy man had explained that when death approached, a Lakota could climb this sacred mountain to see if the Great Spirit approved of his life. Rain would fall on those who had the blessing of the Great Spirit.

As a young man, Black Elk had a vision that told him how to save his people and homeland from soldiers and settlers. He had this vision atop Harney Peak. And all these years he had worked to fulfill this vision and restore what he called the sacred hoop of life. Living through tragic circumstances and great loss, he felt that he had somehow failed and that the sacred hoop was broken.

On the day of his climb, Black Elk was a very old man. He dressed in red long johns, moccasins, war paint, and a feathered headdress. Slowly and laboriously, he climbed to the summit. Tourists were staring at him. Neihardt teased him that he should have picked a day with at least one cloud in the sky. But Black Elk rebuked him, saying that the rain would have nothing to do with the weather.

At the top of the peak, not far from the tourists, the old man lay down on the earth under a blue sky. To his astonishment, Neihardt watched as a small cloud formed over Black Elk and a soft rain began to fall. Black Elk wept with relief. He felt that even though he had not succeeded in fulfilling his vision, the Great Spirit was recognizing that he had done his best.

Sometimes we don't know what will be the fruits of what we do, but the secret is to act beautifully without attachment to the fruit of the action. And even our smallest things can make a difference.

Someone wrote to thank me. "My teenage daughter began to have seizures. It was really scary before they were properly medicated. I was terrified and she was as well. And it involved many drives over some distance to the clinic to regulate her and get the tests and medicine. And to help me, I began to listen to your dharma talks. And my teenage daughter, who would never have listened, began to listen too."

And after a few months of our going back and forth to the clinic, she would say, "Do you have another talk of Jack's to put on?" "It helped us a lot," she wrote. "Thank you."

Listen, dear ones. You have been training for these difficulties for a long time—for your whole life, and if you want to be amused, probably for many lifetimes. And you know what it means to listen and to care and to choose wisely.

The teachings from the Buddha: "Others will be cruel. We shall not be cruel, but be kind. Thus, we will incline the heart. Others will be greedy. We shall be generous. Thus, we will incline the heart. Others will speak maliciously and untruthfully. We will speak truthfully and kindly. Thus, we shall incline the heart. Others will be arrogant. We shall have humility. Thus, we will incline the heart. Others will lack mindfulness and care. We will cultivate mindfulness and care. Thus, we will incline the heart. Others will respond with fear and confusion. We will respond with compassion. Thus, we will incline the heart."

In times of uncertainty—this is called "the most uncertain hour" by one of my favorite poet-songwriters—in times of uncertainty, it's not complicated. When we listen with the heart, we tend our business with integrity and care. We stand up for justice and against injustice, against racism, against all those things that would denigrate a human being. We act beautifully—billions of acts in this hour, breathtaking in scale, from flower box to cathedral.

Trudy said the greeting for her when she was in the Darfur refugee camps was not "How are you?" but "How is your family?" We are each other's bond. We are each other's community. We are each other's family. And what we most want, perhaps under it all, is to be listened to in the deepest way, to be met with the heart.

I think of Leonard Cohen's "Hallelujah," where he talks about the holy or the broken heart: "Even though it all went wrong, I stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah."

Big things in the world can only be achieved, it says in the Tao, by tending to their small beginnings. And Jane Goodall, in her beautiful book—and interview that was recently in the New York Times a few days ago—says, "You just plod on and do what you can to make the world a better place." But she said it with such a beautiful smile and such a caring heart. And you know she's planting the seeds, and she has for a lifetime that has touched us all.

We can do this. We can listen with the heart, and then the heart will respond.

Thank you, dear ones.

CHAPTER 125

Breath of the Earth Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 21 min

> Jack Kornfield leads a gentle 20-25 minute guided meditation centered on breath awareness as a gateway to stillness and presence. The practice begins with establishing a comfortable, stable posture and using the breath as an anchor—not to become skilled at breathing, but to allow each inhalation and exhalation to carry a whispered invitation toward calm and ease.
>
> The meditation explores a beautiful understanding of breath as the earth breathing herself through us, encouraging practitioners to relax into this natural rhythm rather than controlling it. Kornfield guides listeners to let thoughts, emotions, and sensations rise and fall like ocean waves around the steady point of the breath. This approach reflects the classic ānāpānasati practice while emphasizing the quality of spacious, effortless awareness rather than concentrated effort.
>
> The final portion of the meditation invites reflection on the beautiful qualities we carry in our hearts—steadiness, compassion, caring attention, presence—and how we might offer these gifts to the world. Rather than framing this as resolution or striving, Kornfield points to the inherent goodness already present within, waiting to be brought forth from a place of stillness. The practice concludes with the traditional half-smile of the Buddha, connecting inner peace with the outward expression of wisdom and care in this "mysterious, magnificent, troubled, amazing world."

And so tonight, let's begin with a meditation, a very simple one.

Let yourself settle, be comfortable and at ease for the next twenty or twenty-five minutes in a posture that feels stable and steady. When you're ready, let your eyes close gently. Take a couple of long breaths and exhale whatever wants to be let go of, so you can be just here and now.

When you take your seat in the middle of the turning world, as your world travels around its star, the sun, in this moment you take a seat of listening and stillness. To help invite and establish that stillness, it is good to begin with attention, a mindful loving awareness of the breath—not to become a good breather, but with each breath that you feel through the nostrils and throat, whether the rise and fall of chest or belly, with each breath a gentle whisper in the background: calm, ease, allowing the whole body and heart and mind to settle. Nowhere to go. Just this breath, this moment.

If it's at all hard to sense the breath, you can put your hand on your belly. Leave it there and feel the belly rise and fall in the palm of your hand. Ease and calm with each breath, an invitation.

As you quiet, there will naturally be waves of thoughts and plans and memories, waves of emotions—sad and happy, worried and excited—waves of sensations, all the things that come and go, and sounds. Let these rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Rest with the breath like a still point between the waves of the sea. Let the other things come and go around the breath. The breath brings a stillness. With this breath, a steady, calm ease.

The breath breathes itself, its own rhythm, long or short, shallow or deep. Your breath is the earth breathing herself through you. Relax. Easy come, easy go. Let the earth breathe herself through you and invite a deepening stillness, openness, ease. Spacious, vast, easy—with each breath an invitation to open to presence and stillness.

Now, for the last minutes of the meditation, sitting quietly as the earth turns about the sun, let yourself reflect with the returning of the light. What beautiful qualities would you like to bring into the world in this year ahead? Not as a New Year's resolution, but the qualities you already carry in your heart: steadiness, calm, and stillness; caring attention, presence, compassion. These are gifts you can carry from this place of stillness and bring forth from your heart and your being—beautiful gifts into this mysterious, magnificent, troubled, amazing world.

From your own inner beauty and wisdom, what is it you wish to offer?

Add a smile to your lips, a half smile of the Buddha, as you sit. Feel what energy and gifts can come from you and through you. You can know.
